L. S. BE IT REMEMBERED, That on the fourteenth day of April, in the fifty-second year of the Independence of the United States of America, NOAH WEBSTER, of the said District, hath deposited in this office the title of a Book, the right whereof he claims as Author, in the words following, to wit :

"An American Dictionary of the English Language; intended to exhibit, I. The origin, affinities, and primary signification of English words, as far as they have been ascertained. II. The genuine orthography and pronunciation of words, according to general usage, or to just principles of analogy. III. Accurate and discriminating definitions, with numerous authorities and illustrations. To which are prefixed, an introductory dissertation on the origin, history and connection of the languages of Western Asia and of Europe, and a concise grammar of the English language. By Noah Webster, LL. D. In two volumes."

In conformity to the act of Congress of the United States, entitled, "An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of Maps, Charts and Books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies, during the times therein mentioned."—And also to the act, entitled, "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act for the encouragement of learning, by securing the copies of maps, charts, and books, to the authors and proprietors of such copies during the times therein mentioned,' and extending the benefits thereof to the arts of designing, engraving, and etching historical and other prints."

PREFACE.

In the year 1783, just at the close of the revolution, I published an elementary book for facilitating the acquisition of our vernacular tongue, and for correcting a vicious pronunciation, which prevailed extensively among the common people of this country. Soon after the publication of that work, I believe in the following year, that learned and respectable scholar, the Rev. Dr. Goodrich of Durham, one of the trustees of Yale College, suggested to me, the propriety and expediency of my compiling a dictionary, which should complete a system for the instruction of the citizens of this country in the language. At that time, I could not indulge the thought, much less the hope, of undertaking such a work; as I was neither qualified by research, nor had I the means of support, during the execution of the work, had I been disposed to undertake it. For many years therefore, though I considered such a work as very desirable, yet it appeared to me impracticable; as I was under the necessity of devoting my time to other occupations for obtaining subsistence.

About twenty seven years ago, I began to think of attempting the compilation of a Dictionary. I was induced to this undertaking, not more by the suggestion of friends, than by my own experience of the want of such a work, while reading modern books of science. In this pursuit, I found almost insuperable difficulties, from the want of a dictionary, for explaining many new words, which recent discoveries in the physical sciences had introduced into use. To remedy this defect in part, I published my Compendious Dictionary in 1806; and soon after made preparations for undertaking a larger work.

My original design did not extend to an investigation of the origin and progress of our language; much less of other languages. I limited my views to the correcting of certain errors in the best English Dictionaries, and to the supplying of words in which they are deficient. But after writing through two letters of the alphabet, I determined to change my plan. I found myself embarrassed, at every step, for want of a knowledge of the origin of words, which Johnson, Bailey, Junius, Skinner and some other authors do not afford the means of obtaining. Then laying aside my manuscripts, and all books treating of language, except lexicons and dictionaries, I endeavored, by a diligent comparison of words, having the same or cognate radical letters, in about twenty languages, to obtain a more correct knowledge of the primary sense of original words, of the affinities between the English and many other languages, and thus to enable myself to trace words to their source.

I had not pursued this course more than three or four years, before I discovered that I had to unlearn a great deal that I had spent years in learning, and that it was necessary for me to go back to the first rudiments of a branch of erudition, which I had before cultivated, as I had supposed, with success.

I spent ten years in this comparison of radical words, and in forming a synopsis of the principal words in twenty languages, arranged in classes, under their primary elements or letters. The result has been to open what are to me new views of language, and to unfold what appear to be the genuine principles on which these languages are constructed.

After completing this synopsis, I proceeded to correct what I had written of the Dictionary, and to complete the remaining part of the work. But before I had finished it, I determined on a voyage to Europe, with the view of obtaining some books and some assistance which I wanted; of learning the real state of the pronunciation of our language in England, as well as the general state of philology in that country; and of attempting to bring about some agreement or coincidence of opinions, in regard to unsettled points in pronunciation and grammatical construction. In some of these objects I failed; in others, my designs were answered.

It is not only important, but, in a degree necessary, that the people of this country, should have an American Dictionary of the English Language; for, although the body of the language is the same as in England, and it is desirable to perpetuate that sameness, yet some differences must exist. Language is the expression of ideas; and if the people of one country cannot preserve an identity of ideas, they cannot retain an identity of language. Now an identity of ideas depends materially upon a sameness of things or objects with which the people of the two countries are conversant. But in no two portions of the earth, remote from each other, can such identity be found. Even physical objects must be different. But the principal differences between the people of this country and of all others, arise from different forms of government, different laws, institutions and customs. Thus the practice of hawking and hunting, the institution of heraldry, and the feudal system of England originated terms which formed, and some of which now form, a necessary part of the language of that country; but, in the United States, many of these terms are no part of our present language,—and they cannot be, for the things which they express do not exist in this country. They can be known to us only as obsolete or as foreign words. On the other hand, the institutions in this country which are new and peculiar, give rise to new terms or to new applications of old terms, unknown to the people of England; which cannot be explained by them and which will not be inserted in their dictionaries, unless copied from ours. Thus the terms, land-office; land-warrant; location of land; consociation of churches; regent of a university; intendant of a city; plantation, selectmen, senate, congress, court, assembly, escheat, &c. are either words not belonging to the language of England, or they are applied to things in this country which do not exist in that. No person in this country will be satisfied with the English definitions of the words congress, senate and assembly, court, &c. for although these are words used in England, yet they are applied in this country to express ideas which they do not express in that country. With our present constitutions of government, escheat can never have its feudal sense in the United States.

But this is not all. In many cases, the nature of our governments, and of our civil institutions, requires an appropriate language in the definition of words, even when the words express the same thing, as in England. Thus the English Dictionaries inform us that a Justice is one deputed by the King to do right by way of judgment—he is a Lord by his office—Justices of the peace are appointed by the King's commission—language which is inaccurate in respect to this officer in the United States. So constitutionally is defined by Todd or Chalmers, legally, but in this country the distinction between constitution and law requires a different definition. In the United States, a plantation is a very different thing from what it is in England. The word marshal, in this country, has one important application unknown in England or in Europe.

A great number of words in our language require to be defined in a phraseology accommodated to the condition and institutions of the people in these states, and the people of England must look to an American Dictionary for a correct understanding of such terms.

The necessity therefore of a Dictionary suited to the people of the United States is obvious; and I should suppose that this fact being admitted, there could be no difference of opinion as to the time, when such a work ought to be substituted for English Dictionaries.

There are many other considerations of a public nature, which serve to justify this attempt to furnish an American Work which shall be a guide to the youth of the United States. Most of these are too obvious to require illustration.

One consideration however which is dictated by my own feelings, but which I trust will meet with approbation in correspondent feelings in my fellow citizens, ought not to be passed in silence. It is this. “The chief glory of a nation,” says Dr. Johnson, “arises from its authors.” With this opinion deeply impressed on my mind, I have the same ambition which actuated that great man when he expressed a wish to give celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton and to Boyle.

I do not indeed expect to add celebrity to the names of Franklin, Washington, Adams, Jay, Madison, Marshall, Ramsay, Dwight, Smith, Trumbull, Hamilton, Belknap, Ames, Mason, Kent, Hare, Silliman, Cleveland, Walsh, Irving, and many other Americans distinguished by their writings or by their science; but it is with pride and satisfaction, that I can place them, as authorities, on the same page with those of Boyle, Hooker, Milton, Dryden, Addison, Ray, Milner, Cowper, Davy, Thomson and Jameson.

A life devoted to reading and to an investigation of the origin and principles of our vernacular language, and especially a particular examination of the best English writers, with a view to a comparison of their style and phraseology, with those of the best American writers, and with our colloquial usage, enables me to affirm with confidence, that the genuine English idiom is as well preserved by the unmixed English of this country, as it is by the best English writers. Examples to prove this fact will be found in the Introduction to this work. It is true, that many of our writers have neglected to cultivate taste, and the embellishments of style; but even these have written the language in its genuine idiom. In this respect, Franklin and Washington, whose language is their hereditary mother tongue, unsophisticated by modern grammar, present as pure models of genuine English, as Addison or

PREFACE.

Swift. But I may go farther, and affirm, with truth, that our country has produced some of the best models of composition. The style of President Smith ; of the authors of the Federalist ; of Mr. Ames ; of Dr. Mason ; of Mr. Harper ; of Chancellor Kent ; [the prose] of Mr. Barlow ; of the legal decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States ; of the reports of legal decisions in some of the particular states ; and many other writings ; in purity, in elegance and in technical precision, is equaled only by that of the best British authors, and surpassed by that of no English compositions of a similar kind.

The United States commenced their existence under circumstances wholly novel and unexampled in the history of nations. They commenced with civilization, with learning, with science, with constitutions of free government, and with that best gift of God to man, the christian religion. Their population is now equal to that of England ; in arts and sciences, our citizens are very little behind the most enlightened people on earth ; in some respects, they have no superiors ; and our language, within two centuries, will be spoken by more people in this country, than any other language on earth, except the Chinese, in Asia, and even that may not be an exception.

It has been my aim in this work, now offered to my fellow citizens, to ascertain the true principles of the language, in its orthography and structure ; to purify it from some palpable errors, and reduce the number of its anomalies, thus giving it more regularity and consistency in its forms, both of words and sentences ; and in this manner, to furnish a standard of our vernacular tongue, which we shall not be ashamed to bequeath to three hundred millions of people, who are destined to occupy, and I hope, to adorn the vast territory within our jurisdiction.

If the language can be improved in regularity, so as to be more easily acquired by our own citizens, and by foreigners, and thus be rendered a more useful instrument for the propagation of science, arts, civilization and christianity ; if it can be rescued from the mischievous influence of sciolists and that dabbling spirit of innovation which is perpetually disturbing its settled usages and filling it with anomalies ; if, in short, our vernacular language can be redeemed from corruptions, and our philology and literature from degradation ; it would be a source of great satisfaction to me to be one among the instruments of promoting these valuable objects. If this object cannot be effected, and my wishes and hopes are to be frustrated, my labor will be lost, and this work must sink into oblivion.

This Dictionary, like all others of the kind, must be left, in some degree, imperfect ; for what individual is competent to trace to their source, and define in all their various applications, popular, scientific and technical, sixty or seventy thousand words ! It satisfies my mind that I have done all that my health, my talents and my pecuniary means would enable me to accomplish. I present it to my fellow citizens, not with frigid indifference, but with my ardent wishes for their improvement and their happiness ; and for the continued increase of the wealth, the learning, the moral and religious elevation of character, and the glory of my country.

To that great and benevolent Being, who, during the preparation of this work, has sustained a feeble constitution, amidst obstacles and toils, disappointments, infirmities and depression ; who has twice borne me and my manuscripts in safety across the Atlantic, and given me strength and resolution to bring the work to a close, I would present the tribute of my most grateful acknowledgments. And if the talent which he entrusted to my care, has not been put to the most profitable use in his service, I hope it has not been "kept laid up in a napkin," and that any misapplication of it may be graciously forgiven.

INTRODUCTION.

DEFINITION OF LANGUAGE.

Language or Speech is the utterance of articulate sounds or voices, rendered significant by usage, for the expression and communication of thoughts.

According to this definition, language belongs exclusively to intellectual and intelligent beings, and among terrestrial beings, to man only; for no animal on earth, except man, can pronounce words. The word language is sometimes used in a more comprehensive sense, and applied to the sounds by which irrational animals express their feelings or affections; as to the neighing of the horse, the lowing of the ox, the barking of the dog, and to the cackling and chirping of fowls; for the sounds uttered by these animals are perfectly understood by the respective species. So also language is figuratively applied to the signs by which deaf and dumb persons manifest their ideas; for these are instruments of communicating thoughts.

But language, in its proper sense, as the medium of intercourse between men, or rational beings, endowed with the faculty of uttering articulate sounds, is the subject now to be considered.

Written language is the representation of significant sounds by letters, or characters, single or combined in words, arranged in due order, according to usage.

ORIGIN OF LANGUAGE.

We read, in the Scriptures, that God, when he had created man, "Blessed them and said to them, Be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth and subdue it; and have dominion over the fish of the sea, &c." God afterwards planted a garden, and placed in it the man he had made, with a command to keep it, and to dress it; and he gave him a rule of moral conduct, in permitting him to eat the fruit of every tree in the garden, except one, the eating of which was prohibited. We further read, that God brought to Adam the fowls and beasts he had made, and that Adam gave them names; and that when his female companion was made, he gave her a name. After the eating of the forbidden fruit, it is stated that God addressed Adam and Eve, reproving them for their disobedience, and pronouncing the penalties, which they had incurred. In the account of these transactions, it is further related that Adam and Eve both replied to their Maker, and excused their disobedience.

If we admit what is the literal and obvious interpretation of this narrative, that vocal sounds or words were used in these communications between God and the progenitors of the human race, it results that Adam was not only endowed with intellect for understanding his Maker, or the signification of words, but was furnished both with the faculty of speech, and with speech itself, or the knowledge and use of words, as signs of ideas, and this before the formation of the woman. Hence we may infer that language was bestowed on Adam, in the same manner as all his other faculties and knowledge, by supernatural power; or in other words, was of divine origin; for supposing Adam to have had all the intellectual powers of any adult individual of the species, who has since lived, we cannot admit as probable, or even possible, that he should have invented and constructed even a barren language, as soon as he was created, without supernatural aid. It may even be doubted, whether without such aid, men would ever have learnt the use of the organs of speech, so far as to form a language. At any rate, the invention of words, and the construction of a language must have been by a slow process, and must have required a much longer time, than that which passed between the creation of Adam and of Eve. It is therefore probable that language as well as the faculty of speech, was the immediate gift of God. We are not however to suppose the language of our first parents in paradise to have been copious, like most modern languages; or the identical language they used, to be now in existence. Many of the primitive radical words may and probably do exist in various languages; but observation teaches that languages must improve and undergo great changes as knowledge increases, and be subject to continual alterations, from other causes incident to men in society.

A brief account of the origin and progress of the principal languages, ancient and modern, that have been spoken by nations between the Ganges and the Atlantic ocean.

We learn from the Scriptures that Noah, who, with his family, was preserved from destruction by the deluge, for the purpose of re-peopling the earth, had three sons, Shem, Ham and Japheth. This fact, a little obscured by tradition, was retained by our rude German ancestors, to the age of Tacitus.*

Japheth was the eldest son; but Shem, the ancestor of the Israelites, and of the writers of the Scriptures, is named first in order.

The descendants of Shem and Ham peopled all the great plain, situated north and west of the Persian Gulf, between that Gulf and the Indian ocean on the east and the Arabic Gulf and the Mediterranean Sea on the west, with the northern coast of Africa; comprehending Assyria, Babylonia or Chaldea, Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Egypt, and Lybia. The principal languages or dialects used by these descendants, are known to us under the names of Chaldee, or Chaldaic, which is called also Aramean, Syriac, Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, Samaritan and Coptic. Of these, the Chaldee, and Hebrew are no longer living languages, but they have come down to us in books; the Samaritan is probably extinct or lost in the modern languages of the country, but the language survives in a copy of the Pentateuch; the Coptic is nearly or quite extinct, and little of it remains; the Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic are yet living languages, but they have suffered and are continually suffering alterations, from which no living language is exempt.

These languages, except the Coptic, being used by the descendants of Shem, I call Shemitic, or Assyrian, in distinction from the Japhetic. As the descendants of Japheth peopled Asia Minor, the northern parts of Asia, about the Euxine and Caspian, and all Europe, their languages, have, in the long period that has elapsed since their dispersion, become very numerous.

All languages having sprung from one source, the original words from which they have been formed, must have been of equal antiquity. That the Celtic and Teutonic languages in Europe are, in this sense, as old as the Chaldee and Hebrew, is a fact not only warranted by history and the common origin of Japheth and Shem, but susceptible of proof from the identity of many words yet existing, in both stocks. But there is a marked difference between the Shemitic and Japhetic languages; for even when the radical words are unquestionably the same, the modifications, or inflections and combinations which form the compounds are, for the most part, different.

As it has been made a question which of the Shemitic languages is the most ancient, and much has been written to prove it to be the Hebrew, I will state briefly my opinion on what appears to me to be one of the plainest questions in the history of nations. We have for our certain guides, in determining this question—1st. The historical narrative of facts in the book of Genesis, and 2d. The known and uniform progress of languages, within the period of authentic profane history.

1. The Scripture informs us that, before the dispersion, the whole earth was of one language and of one or the same speech; and that the descendants of Noah journeyed from the east, and settled on the plain of Shinar, or in Chaldea. The language used at that time, by the inhabitants of that plain, must then have been the oldest or the primitive language of man. This must have been the original Chaldee.

Noah is here called Man.

INTRODUCTION.

2. The Scripture informs us, that in consequence of the impious attempts of the people to build a city and a tower, whose top might reach to heaven, with a view to make themselves a name and prevent their dispersion, God interposed and confounded their language, so that they could not understand each other; in consequence of which they were dispersed "from thence over the face of all the earth."

3. If the confusion of languages at Babel originated the differences which gave rise to the various languages of the families which separated at the dispersion, then those several languages are all of equal antiquity. Of these the Hebrew, as a distinct language, was not one; for the Hebrew nation was of posterior origin.

4. All the words of the several great races of men, both in Asia and Europe, which are vernacular in their several languages, and unequivocally the same, are of equal antiquity, as they must have been derived from the common Chaldee stock which existed before the dispersion. The words common to the Syrians and Hebrews, could not have been borrowed from the Hebrew, for the Hebrews originated from Heber and Abram, several centuries after Syria and Egypt were populous countries. This fact is attested by the Scripture history, which declares that when Abram migrated from Chaldea, and came into Canaan or Palestine, "The Canaanite was then in the land;" and when he returned from Egypt, "the Perizzite dwelt in the land." These declarations, and the history of Abimelech, and of the war of four kings or chieftains with five; as also of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, prove Syria to have been, at that time, well-peopled. The language of the inhabitants then must have been coeval with the nation, and long anterior to the Hebrew as a distinct dialect. It may be added that in the early periods of the world, when no books existed, nations, living remote or distinct, never borrowed words from each other. One nation, living in the midst of another, as the Hebrews did among the Egyptians, may adopt a single word, or a few words; but a family of words thus adopted is an occurrence rarely or never known. The borrowing of words, in modern times, is almost wholly from the use of books.

5. It is probable that some differences of language were produced by the confusion; but neither that event nor any supernatural event is necessary to account for the differences of dialect or of languages, now existing. The different modern languages of the Gothic or Teutonic stock, all originated in the natural course of events; and the differences are as great between them as they are between the languages of the Shemitic stock.

6. Soon after two races of men of a common stock have separated and placed themselves in distant countries, the language of each begins to diverge from that of the other, by various means.—1. One tribe or nation will suffer one word to become obsolete and be forgotten; another, will suffer the loss of another; sometimes a whole family of words will be lost; at other times, a part only; at other times, a single word only of a numerous family will be retained by one nation, while another nation will retain the whole. 2. The same word will be differently applied by two distant races of men, and the difference will be so great as to obscure the original affinity. 3. Words will be compounded by two nations in a different manner, the same radical words taking a different prefix or suffix, in different languages. Thus wisdom in English is in German weisheit, [wisehead, wisdom] from weise, weis. In English mislead is in Danish förlede, from lead, leder. 4. The pronunciation and orthography of words will often be so much changed, that the same word in two languages, cannot without difficulty, be recognized as identical. No person, without a considerable attention to the changes which letters have suffered, would at once suspect or believe the English let and the French laisser to be the same word.

7. As Abram migrated from Chaldea, he must have spoken the Chaldee language, and probably, at that time, the Syriac, Arabic and Egyptian, had not become so different, as to render it impracticable for him to converse with the inhabitants of Palestine and Egypt. But the language of Abram's descendants, and that of the land of Shinar or the Chaldee must, in the natural course of things, have begun to diverge, soon after the separation; and the changes in each language being different, would, in the course of a few centuries, form somewhat different languages. So in the days of Hezekiah the Syriac and Hebrew had become, in a degree, distinct languages. 2 Kings xviii. In which of these languages, the greatest number of alterations were produced, we do not know; but from the general observations I have made, in my researches, it appears that the Chaldee dialect, in the use of dental letters instead of sibilants, is much the most general in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of Europe. Thus the German only has a sibilant in wasser, when the other Teutonic languages have a dental, water. I think also that there are far more words in the European languages which accord with the Chaldee or Arabic, than there are words which accord with the Hebrew. If this observation is well-founded, the Hebrew must have suffered the loss of more primitive words than the other languages of the Shemitic family. This however is true, that all of them have lost some words, and in some cases, the Hebrew retains what the others have lost.

8. The Hebrew Scriptures are, by many centuries, the most ancient writings extant. Hence probably the strange inference, that the Hebrew is the oldest language; as if the inhabitants of Chaldea and Syria had had no language, for ages before the progenitor of the Hebrews was born.

9. The vernacular words in the Celtic and Teutonic languages of modern Europe, which are evidently the same words as still exist in the Shemitic languages, are of the same antiquity; being a part of the common language which was used on the plain of Shinar, before the dispersion.

The descendants of Japheth peopled the northern part of Asia, and all Europe; or if some colonies from Egypt planted themselves in Greece, at an early period, they or their descendants must have been merged in the mass of Japhetic population. Certain it is that the Greek language is chiefly formed on the same radical words, as the Celtic and Teutonic languages.

The Japhetic tribes of men, whose descendants peopled the south and west of Europe, were first established in the country now called Persia, or by the natives themselves, Iran. Of this fact, the evidence now existing is decisive. The numerous words found in the Greek, Latin, Gaelic, English and the kindred tongues, which are still used in Persia, prove, beyond all question, that Persia must have been the residence of the people whose descendants introduced into Europe the languages from which the modern languages are derived. The fact proves further that a great body of the original Persians remained in their own country, and their descendants constitute the mass of the population at this day.

In the early stages of society, men dwelt or migrated in families, tribes or clans. The family of Abraham and Jacob in Asia, and the clans of the Gaels in Scotland, exhibit to us the manner in which societies and nations were originally formed. The descendants of a man settled around him, and formed a clan, or tribe, of which the government was patriarchal. Such families often migrated in a body, and often the personal characteristics of the progenitor might be distinctly traced in his descendants for many generations. In process of time, some of these families became nations; more generally, by means of wars and migrations, different tribes became blended, and the distinction of families was lost.

In rude ages, the families or tribes of men are named from some characteristic of the people; or more generally, from the place of their residence. The Greeks gave the name of Scythia to the north of Europe and Asia, but the primitive inhabitants of the west of Europe, they called Κελτοι, Kelts, Celts, a word signifying woods men. These were descendants from the same ancestors as the Greeks and Romans themselves, but they had pushed their migrations into Gaul, Spain and Britain. The first settlers or occupiers of these countries were driven forward by successive hords, until they were checked by the ocean; there they made their stand, and there we find their descendants at this day. These may be considered as the descendants of the earliest settlers, or first inhabitants of the countries where they are found. Among these are the inhabitants of France, south of the Garonne, and those of the north of Spain, called by the Romans Aquitani and Cantabri, in more modern times Gascoigns, Basques, and Cantabrians, who still retain their native language; and in Great Britain, the Gaels in Scotland, and the natives of the north and west of Ireland, who also retain their primitive language.

The first inhabitants of the north and west of Europe, known to the Greeks and Romans, to whom we are indebted for our earliest accounts of that region, were the Cimbri, who inhabited the peninsula of Denmark, now called Jutland, and the tribes which belonged to the Teutonic and Gothic races, which were established in Germany and on both sides of the Baltic. Whether tribes of Celtic origin had overspread the latter countries, before the arrival of the Gothic and Teutonic races, and all Europe had been inhabited by

* Welsh celt, a cover, or shelter, a Celt; celtiad, an inhabitant of the covert or wood; celu, to conceal, Lat. celo. In Gaelic the word is coilt or ceilt. The Celts were originally a tribe or nation inhabiting the north of Italy, or the still more northern territory.

† I purposely omit all consideration of the different families, tribes or nations which first peopled Greece and Italy. In Greece, we read of the Γραικοι or Γραικοι, the Hellenes, the Achæans, the Dorians, the Æolians, the Ionians, the Pelasgi, &c. In Italy, of the Illyrians, the Liburni, the Siculi, the Veneti or Heneti, the Iberi, Ligures, Sicani, Etrusci, Insubres, Sabini, Latini, Samnites, and many others. But as these nations or their descendants gave the name of CELTS to the Umbri, or nations that dwelt in the north, in the less cultivated parts of Europe, and to the inhabitants of Gaul; and as all the tribes, under whatever denomination they were known, were branches of the great Japhetic stock, I shall call them by that general name, CELTS; and under the general name of Goths or Teutons, shall comprehend the various tribes that inhabited the north of Germany, and the country north of the Baltic or Scandinavia.

A late writer seems to consider the Teutonic races, as the only ancestors of the Greeks and Romans. But from Celtic words, still found in the Greek and Latin; words not belonging to any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages; it is demonstrably certain that the primitive settlers in Greece and Italy, belonged to the Celtic races. Thus the Greek βραχίον, Lat. brachium, the arm, is formed on the Gaelic braigh, raigh, W. braic, a word not found among the Teutonic nations. So the Welsh moctaw, to mock, is found in the Greek μακκω, and French moquer, to mock, and Ir. mogadh, a mocking; but not in any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages. Many similar facts prove that the Celtic races were among the earliest inhabitants of Greece.

INTRODUCTION.

the Celts, even to the borders of Sarmatia, has been a question much disputed by historians and antiquaries. The German and French writers generally contend that the Celts inhabited all the north of Europe, as far at least as Sarmatia; but some respectable English writers are of a different opinion. Now it is agreed that the Welsh are descendants of the Cimbri, inhabitants of Jutland, and their language bears a strong affinity to the Celtic languages, which still exist; a fact that countenances the opinion of the German and French writers. But the dispute is of little moment: the Celtic, Teutonic and Gothic races being all of the Japhetic stock, migrating from Asia through Asia Minor at different times, and pursuing different courses westward. The first tribes probably sought the warm climates along the north coast of the Mediterranean, and established themselves in Greece and Italy. Others followed the course of the Danube and its subsidiary streams, till they fell upon the rivers that conducted them to the Baltic. The first inhabitants of Greece and Italy were probably of the Celtic race, but if they were, it is very evident that tribes of the Teutonic or Gothic races invaded those countries before they were civilized, and intermingled with the original inhabitants. The Pelasgi may have been among the number. This is an inference which I draw from the affinities of the Greek and Latin languages, with those of Teutonic origin. The Teutonic and Gothic races impressed their language upon all the continent of Europe west of the Vistula, and from that river to the Rhine, or rather to the Seine, anterior to the conquest of Gaul by Julius Cesar. The same races invading and conquering the south of Europe, in the fourth and fifth century, on the downfall of the Roman empire, infused a portion of their language into the Italian and Spanish, which is still distinguishable.

The ancient Sarmatia, including Poland and Russia, was probably peopled originally by races of men who passed into Europe by the country north of the Euxine. Their original residence was along the rivers Kur and Araxes, or on the mountains between the Euxine and Caspian. The name of the Russ or Russians is clearly recognized in the Roxolani of Pliny and Ptolemy, and possibly the ancestors of this race may have entered Europe by Asia Minor. That the Teutonic races, originally from Persia, inhabited Asia Minor, and migrated westward by that course, is evident from the names which they impressed on mountains, rivers and places—Such are the Cragus of Pliny, the Welsh and English crag;* Perga in Pamphylia, now burg or bergen; Thymbreck, the name of a small stream, near the site of Troy; a word in which we recognize the English brook. It was contracted by the Greeks into Thymbrius.†

It is admitted by all gentlemen, acquainted with oriental literature, that the Sanscrit, or ancient language of India, the parent of all the dialects of that great peninsula, is radically the same language or from the same stock as the Greek and Latin; the affinities between them being remarkably clear and decisive. If so, the inhabitants of India and the descendants of the Celtic and Teutonic nations are all of one family, and must have all migrated from one country, after the separation of the nations of the Shemitic stock from those of the Japhetic race.‡

Whether that country was Persia, or Cashmir, or a country farther east, is a point not easily determined. One important inference results from this fact, that the white men of Europe and the black or tawny men of India, are direct descendants from a common ancestor.

Of the languages of Europe, the Greek was first improved and refined, and next to that the Latin. The affinity between these languages, and those of the west and north of Europe is very striking, and demonstrates their common origin. It is probable however that there are some words in the Greek derived from Africa, if Egyptian colonies were established in Greece, as historians inform us.

The modern Italian, Spanish, French and Portuguese, are composed chiefly of Latin words, much altered however both in orthography and inflections. Perhaps nine tenths of all the words now found in those languages are of Latin origin; being introduced by the Romans, who held Gaul in subjection, five or six centuries, and Spain much longer; or being borrowed from Latin authors, since the revival of letters. All these languages, however retain many words of Celtic origin; the primitive language not having been entirely extirpated. In some instances, the same word has been transmitted through both channels, the Celtic and the Latin, and is yet retained. Thus in French céder, and in Italian cedere, is directly from the Latin cedo; while the French, congédier, and Italian, congedare, are composed of the same word, with a prefix, derived from the Celtic, and retained in the Welsh gadaw, to quit, to leave. [L. concedo.] And this same verb probably appears also in quit, a word common to the Teutonic and to the Celtic languages. See Conge, in the Dictionary.

It must be observed further, that the Spanish language contains some words of African origin, introduced by the Carthaginians, before the Roman conquest of Spain, or afterwards by the Moors, who, for several centuries, were masters of that country. It contains also some words of Gothic origin, introduced by the Goths who conquered that country, at the downfall of the Roman Empire. The French also contains some words of Teutonic origin, either from the Belgic tribes who occupied the country to the Seine, at the time of Cesar's invasion, or from the Franks who established the dynasty of the Merovingian Kings in the fifth century, or from the Normans who obtained possession of the northern part of that kingdom in the tenth century, or from all these sources.

The German, Dutch or Belgic, Anglo-Saxon, Danish and Swedish languages are of Teutonic or Gothic origin.* They are all closely allied; a great part of the words in them all being the same or from the same roots, with different prefixes or affixes. There is however a greater difference between the Danish and Swedish, which are of the Gothic stock, and the German and Dutch, which are of Teutonic origin, than between two languages of the same stock, as between the Danish and Swedish. The Norwegian, Icelandic, and some of the languages or dialects of Switzerland, belong to the same stock; but of these I have no particular knowledge.

The Basque or Cantabrian in Spain; the Gaelic in the north of Scotland, and the Hiberno-Celtic, or native language of Ireland, are the purest remains of the ancient Celtic. From a comparison of a vocabulary of the Gaelic and Hiberno-Celtic, I find little or no difference between them; and from a long and attentive examination of this language, and of the languages of Teutonic origin, I find less difference between them, than most authors have supposed to exist.

The Armoric or language of Brittany in the northwest angle of France, and the Cornish, in the southwest of England, are also of Celtic origin. The Cornish is now extinct; but the Armoric is a living language.

The English as now spoken, is a language composed of words from several others. The basis of the language is Anglo-Saxon, or, as I shall, for the sake of brevity, call it, Saxon, by which it is closely allied to the languages of Teutonic and Gothic origin on the continent. But it retains a great number of words from the ancient languages of Britain, the Belgic, or Lloegrian, and the Cymraeg, or Welsh; particularly from the latter, and some from the Cornish. Cesar informs us, that before he invaded Britain, Belgic colonies had occupied the southern coast of England; and the inhabitants of the interior, northern and western parts, were the ancestors of the present Welsh, who call themselves Cymry, and their country Cymru, a name which indicates their origin from the Cimbri, inhabitants of the modern Denmark, or Cimbric Chersonese, now Jutland.

The modern Welsh contains many Latin words introduced by the Romans, who had possession of Britain for five hundred years. But the body of the language is probably their vernacular tongue. It is more nearly allied to the languages of Celtic origin, than to those of the Teutonic and Gothic stock; and of this British language, the Cornish and Armoric are dialects.

It has been commonly supposed that the Britons were nearly exterminated by the Saxons, and that the few that survived, escaped into the west of England, now Wales. It is true that many took refuge in Wales, which their descendants still retain; but it cannot be true that the other parts of England were entirely depopulated. On the other hand, great numbers must have escaped slaughter, and been intermixed with their Saxon conquerors. The Welsh words, which now form no unimportant part of the English language, afford decisive evidence of this fact. It is probable however that these words were for a long time used only by the common people, for few of them appear in the early Saxon writers.

The English contains also many words, introduced by the Danes, who were, for some time, masters of England; which words are not found in the Saxon. These words prevail most in the northern counties of England; but many of them are incorporated into the body of the language, and are used in the United States.

After the conquest, the Norman Kings endeavored to extirpate the English language, and substitute the Norman. For this purpose, it was ordained that all law proceedings and records should be in the Norman language; and hence the early records and reports of law cases came to be written in Norman. But neither royal authority, nor the influence of courts, could change the vernacular language. After an experiment of three hundred years, the law was repealed; and since that period, the English has been, for the most part, the official, as well as the common language of the nation. A few Norman words however remain in the English; most of them in law language.

Since the conquest, the English has not suffered any shock from the intermixture of conquerors with the natives of England; but the language has undergone great alterations, by the disuse of a large portion of Saxon words, and the introduction of words from the Latin and Greek languages, with some French, Italian, and Spanish words. These words have, in some instances, been borrowed by authors, directly from the Latin and Greek; but most of the Latin words have been received through the medium of the French and Italian. For terms in the sciences, authors have generally resorted to the Greek; and from this source, as discoveries in science demand new terms, the vocabulary of the English language is receiving continual

* Plin. N. H. Lib. 5, cap. 27. Strabo, Lib. 7. 6. informs us that the Dalmatians had the singular practice of making a division of their fields every eighth year. Hence perhaps the name from deal, and math or madh, country.

* In strictness, the Swedish and Danish are of Gothic origin, and the German and Saxon, of Teutonic origin.

INTRODUCTION.

augmentation. We have also a few words from the German and Swedish, mostly terms in mineralogy, and commerce has introduced new commodities of foreign growth or manufacture, with their foreign names, which now make a part of our language.—Such are camphor, amber, arsenic, and many others.

The English then is composed of,

- 1st, Saxon and Danish words of Teutonic and Gothic origin.
- 2d, British or Welsh, Cornish and Armoric, which may be considered as of Celtic origin.
- 3d, Norman, a mixture of French and Gothic.
- 4th, Latin, a language formed on the Celtic and Teutonic.
- 5th, French, chiefly Latin corrupted, but with a mixture of Celtic.
- 6th, Greek, formed on the Celtic and Teutonic, with some Coptic.
- 7th, A few words directly from the Italian, Spanish, German, and other languages of the continent.
- 8th, A few foreign words, introduced by commerce, or by political and literary intercourse.

AFFINITY OF LANGUAGES.

On comparing the structure of the different languages of the Shemitic and Japhetic stocks, we cannot but be struck with the fact, that although a great number of words, consisting of the same or of cognate letters, and conveying the same ideas, are found in them all; yet in the inflections, and in the manner of forming compounds and derivatives, there are remarkable differences between the two great families. In the modifications of the verb, for expressing person, time, and mode, very little resemblance is observable between them. If we could prove that the personal terminations of the verb, in the Japhetic languages, were originally pronouns, expressive of the persons, we should prove an affinity between the words of the two races, in a most important particular. Some attempts of this kind have been made; but not with very satisfactory results.*

In the formation of nouns, we recognize a resemblance between the English termination th, in birth, truth, drouth, {Saxon drugoth warmth, &c., and the Shemitic terminations ן and ת; and the old plural termination en, retained in oxen, and the Welsh plural ending ion, coincide nearly with the Arabic termination of the dual number ان and the regular masculine plural termination ون, as well as with the Chaldee, Hebrew, and Syriac ן. And it is justly remarked by Mitford, that in the variety of plural terminations of nouns, there is a striking resemblance between the Arabic and the Welsh. There is one instance, in the modern languages of Teutonic origin, in which we find the Arabic nunnation:—this is the German and Dutch binnen, the Saxon binnan or binnon, signifying within, Hebrew and Chaldee בין, Ar. بين without the mark of nunnation, when it signifies within; but when it signifies separation, space, interval, the original sense, it is written بين, and pronounced, with the nunnation, like the Teutonic word.

One mode of forming nouns from verbs in the Shemitic languages is by prefixing m. I know of no instance of this manner of formation, in the Japhetic languages, except in some names which are of oriental origin. Mars is said to be from aprys, but if so, the word was undoubtedly formed in the east. So we find Morpheus, the god of sleep, to be probably formed with the prefix m, from the Ethiopic ሞሪ to rest, to fall asleep; whence we infer that Morpheus is sleep deified.†

But as many words in all the languages of Europe and Asia, are formed with prepositions, perhaps it may be found on examination, that some of these prefixes may be common to the families of both stocks, the Japhetic and the Shemitic. We find in German, gemuth, in Dutch, gemoed, from muth, moed, mind, mood. We find mad in Saxon is gemaad; polish, the Latin polio, is in Welsh caboli; mail in Italian is both maglia and camaglia; belief in Saxon is geleaf, and in German, glaube. We find that in the Shemitic languages מלא signifies to fill or be full, and we find in the Arabic ملأ has the same signification. In Syriac ܡܠܐ signifies to remove;

* According to Dr. Edwards, there is a remarkable resemblance between the Shemitic languages, and the Muhhekanew, or Mohegan, one of the native languages of New England, in the use of the pronouns as prefixes and affixes to verbs.—Observations, &c. p. 13.

† Ludolf, Col. 446, 447.

and ܡܠܐ signifies to wander in mind, to be delirious. In Chaldee and Syriac, ܡܠܐ is to wonder, precisely the Latin demiror, which is a compound of de and miror.

We find also that nations differ in the orthography of some initial sounds, where the words are the same. Thus the Spanish has llamar, llorar, for the Latin clamo, ploro, and the Welsh has llaur, for the English floor, llabi, a tall, lank person, coinciding with flabby, llac for slack, and the like.

As the prepositions and prefixes, in all languages, constitute an important class of words, being used in composition to vary the sense of other parts of speech, to an almost unlimited extent, it may be useful to give them a particular consideration.

The simple prepositions are, for the most part, verbs or participles, or derived from them; when verbs, they are the radical or primary word, sometimes varied in orthography by the addition or alteration of a single vowel, or perhaps, in some cases, by the loss of the initial consonant, or aspirate. Such are the Greek κατα, κατε, κατα; the Latin con and per; the English for, which retain their original consonants. The following, of, by, in, on, un; the Latin ab, ad, pro, præ, re; the Greek απο, επι, προς, may have lost the initial or final consonants; of for hof; in for hin; ab for hab; pro for prod. In some words, this loss can only be conjectured; in others, it is known or obvious. Thus the English by and be was originally big, as it is in the Saxon; and the Latin re, is written also red, evidently a derivative of an Arabic verb still existing; the Latin sub and super are formed probably from the Greek υπο, υπερ, by the change of an aspirate into s, or the Greek words have lost that letter. The English but in the phrase "They are all here but one," is a participle; the Sax. butan, or buton; Dutch buiten, from buiten, to rove. Among is the Saxon gemang, the verb, or the participle of gemengan, to mingle.

In general, the primary sense of the preposition is moving, or moved. Thus to in English and ad in Latin, primarily denote advancing towards a place or object; as in the sentence, "We are going to town." From, of, Lat. ab, Gr. απο, denote motion from a place or object. The French pres, is from the Italian presso, and this is the Latin participle pressus, pressed; hence it denotes near, close.

In some instances prepositions are compounds, as the English before; that is, be or by fore, by the front, and the Fr. auprès, at or near.

Prepositions, from their frequent use, and from the ease with which their primary signification is modified to express differences of position, motion or relation, as occasions demand, have, in many instances, a great variety of applications; not indeed as many as lexicographers sometimes assign to them, but several different, and sometimes opposite significations; as for examples, the English for, with; the Latin con, and the Greek κατα. For, which is from the root of Saxon faran, Gr. παρανομα, to pass, denotes towards, as in the phrase "A ship bound for Jamaica;" or it denotes in favor of, as "This measure is for the public benefit;" or "The present is for a friend." But it denotes also opposition or negation, as in forbear, forgive, forbid.

With is a verb, but has rather the sense of a participle. It is found in the Gothic with a prefix, ga-withan, to join or unite. Its primary sense then is joined, close; hence, in company; as in the sentences—"go with him," "come with me." It has the sense also of from, against, contrariety, opposition, as in withdraw, withstand, without. In Saxon it had also the sense of towards, as "with eorðan," towards the earth; also of for, denoting substitution or equivalent in exchange, as "sylan with dagas weorce," to give for a day's work; also of opposite, over against, as "with the sæ," opposite the sea.

Con in Latin generally signifies with, towards or to, denoting closeness or union, approach, joint operation and the like, as in concurro, conjungo, congregor; but it has also the sense of against or opposition, as in contendo.

The Greek κατα, is doubtless from the root of the English fare, Saxon faran, to go, to pass. It signifies from, that is, departure—also at, to, Lat. ad; near, with, beyond, and against.

To understand the cause of the different and apparently contrary significations, we are to attend to the primary sense. The effect of passing to a place is nearness, at, presso, près, and this may be expressed by the participle, or in a contracted form, by the verb. The act of passing or moving towards a place readily gives the sense of such prepositions as to, and the Latin ad, and this advance may be in favor or for the benefit of a person or thing, the primary sense of which may perhaps be best expressed by towards; "a present or a measure is towards him,"—But when the advance of one thing towards another, is in enmity or opposition, we express the sense by against, and this sense is especially expressed when the motion or approach is in front of a person, or intended to meet or counteract another motion. Hence the same word is often used to express both senses; the context determining which signification is intended. Thus for in English, in the sentence, "He that is not for us is against us," denotes in favor of. But in the phrase "for all that," it denotes opposition. "It rains, but for all that, we will take a ride," that is, in opposition to that, or notwithstanding the rain, we will ride.

The Greek κατα, among other senses, signifies beyond, that is, past, and over, Hebrew על.

INTRODUCTION.

The prepositions which are used, as distinct words, are called separable prepositions, or more generally prepositions:—those which are used only in composition are called inseparable prepositions. For the sake of brevity, I give to all words or single letters, prefixed to other words in composition, the general name of prefixes.

One of the best modes of ascertaining the true sense of a preposition, is, to examine its various uses in composition, and discover what effect it has in modifying the signification of the word to which it is prefixed.

Prepositions, used in compounds, often suffer the loss or change of a letter, for the sake of euphony, or the ease of pronunciation. Thus ad in Latin becomes f in affero; con becomes col in colligo; the Gr. παρα loses a letter in παρεμν, as does αυτ, in many words.

The following sketch of the principal prepositions and prefixes in several languages of Europe will exhibit some of the affinities of these languages, and in a degree, illustrate the uses of this class of words.

SAXON AND GOTHIC.

And, Sax. and Goth. signifies against, opposite. This is the Gr. αν, and Latin ante, not borrowed from the Greek or Latin, but a native word. Examples, andstandan, to stand against, to resist. Andswarian, answarian, to answer; that is, to speak again, against or in return.

Amb, emb, ymb, usually emb, Saxon, signifying about, around; coinciding with the Latin amb, and Gr. αμφ. Example, emb-faran, to go around, to walk about; embutan, about; emb, about, and butan, without. See But. Ambeht, embeht, ymbeht, office, duty, whence we have embassador. This in Gothic is andbahtei, and a bailiff, minister or servant is andbahts. The Germans have the word contracted in amt, charge, office, Dutch ampt, Dan. ambt. The Gothic orthography gives rise to the question whether amb, emb, and avt, Sax. and Goth. and, are not radically the same word; and it is very certain that the Gothic and Saxon and, is radically the same word as the Latin in, Dan. ind. So in Gothic, "and wigans," in the ways, into the highways. Luke, xiv. 23. "and haimos" per vicus, through the towns. Luke, ix. 6.

This preposition, amb, is in Dutch om; in German um; in Swedish and Danish om.

At, is a Gothic preposition and prefix, coinciding with Eng. at, Lat. ad. Be, in Saxon, as a preposition and prefix, is always written be, or big, answering to the English by, a preposition, and be in beset. In Gothic, it is written bi, by and be, being contractions of big. The primary and principal signification is near, close; as "stand or sit by me." So in the word by-stander. It is a prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish and Swedish. Its use in denoting instrumentality, may be from the sense of nearness, but more probably it is from passing, like per, through, or it denotes proceeding from, like of, as salvation is of the Lord.

For, in Saxon, as in English, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. In Saxon for signifies a going, from faran, to go, to fare. It is radically the same word as fore, in the sense of in front, before. Its primary sense is advancing; hence moving towards; hence the sense of in favor of, and that of opposition, or negation. See the preceding remarks.

This word in German is fur, but, with this orthography, the word is little used in composition. Yet the German has furbitte, intercession or praying for; furwort, intercession, recommendation, and a pronoun [for-word]; and fur-wahr, forsooth.

In the sense of fore, the German has vor, a word of extensive use as a prefix. Thus in Saxon foreseon, to foresee, is in German vorsehen. The identity of these words will not be questioned. But in German as in Dutch the preposition ver, which is the English far, and Saxon fyr, is used in composition, in words in which the Saxon and English have for. Thus for-gifun, to forgive, is in German vergeben, and in Dutch, vergeven—Saxon, for-gitan, to forget; German vergessen; Dutch vergeeten. Hence we see that the Saxon for, fore, fyr, the English for, fore, far, and the German fur, vor and ver, are from the same radix.

In Dutch, for and fore are represented by voor, and ver represents for and far.

The Danish also unites for and fore, as does the Swedish.

The French has this word in pour, and the Spanish and Portuguese in por. The latter signifies not only for, but through, as in Portuguese, "Eu passarei por França." "I will pass through France. Here we see the sense of moving. In Spanish and Portuguese this word is written also para, as if from the Greek. It is evidently the same word, probably received through a different channel from that of por. Now through is the exact sense of the Latin per; and per is the Italian preposition answering to for and por. But what is more to the purpose, the Spanish, Italian and Portuguese word, equivalent to the English *for*give, is in Spanish perdonar; in Italian, perdonare, and in Portuguese, perdoar; and the French is pardonner. Here then we have strong, if not conclusive evidence, that for, pour, por, per, par, and para, in different languages, are all from one stock, the word being varied in dialect, or by the different families; just as we have far, farther, as well as the Saxon fyr, and the English forth, further, from the same primitive word. We have the same word in pursue and purchase, from the French pour.

The Greek has περα, and παρα, probably from the same root, as well as πορευομαι, πορος.

Ga, in Gothic, and ge in Saxon, is a prefix of very extensive use. In Saxon, it is prefixed to a large portion of all the verbs in the language: According to Lye, it has sometimes the sense of the Latin cum; but in most words I cannot discern any effect of this prefix on the signification of the simple verb. It is retained in the Danish and in some German and Dutch words, especially in the participles of verbs, and in nouns formed from them. But it is remarkable that although the Saxon is our mother tongue, we have not remaining in the language a single instance of this prefix, with the original orthography. The only remains of it are in the contraction, a, as in awake, adrift, ashamed, &c. from gewæcan, awæcan; gedrifan, adrifan; gesceamian, asceamian. The letter y prefixed to verbs and participles used by Chaucer, as yberied, yblent, ybore, yldight, and a few others, is the remnant of the ge. The words yclad, and ycleped, are the last English words used, in which this letter appears.

It is possible that the first syllable of govern, from Lat. gubern, Gr. κυβερνω, may be the same prefix; or it may be the Welsh prefix go, which occurs in goberu, to work, which the Romans wrote operor. But I know not whether the first syllable of govern is a prefix or not.

There is another word which retains this prefix corrupted, or its equivalent; this is common, which we have received from the Latin communis. This word in the Teutonic dialects is, Sax. gemæne; Ger. gemein; Dutch. gemeen; Dan. gemeen; Sw. gemen. Now if this is the Latin communis, and of the identity of the last component part of the word, there can, I think, be no doubt; then the first part of the word is the Teutonic ge altered to com, or what is more probable, com is the equivalent of ge, or ge may be a contracted and corrupted form of cum, com. In either case, we arrive at the conclusion that the Teutonic ge, and the Latin cum, are equivalent in signification.

In, is used in the Saxon and Gothic, as in modern English. It is in German ein, Dutch and Swedish in, Danish ind, Greek εν, Lat. in, Fr. en. This is radically the same word as on and un, the German an, Dutch aan, and Welsh an. In its original sense, it implies moving, advancing towards, and hence its use as a particle of negation or contrariety. "Eunt in urbem," they are going to the city. "Hæc audio in te dici," I hear these things said against you. In modern military usage, on is used in the same sense of advancing. "The army is marching on Liege."

Mid, in Saxon, signifies with. It is the Gothic mith, German mit, Dutch mede or met, and the Gr. μετα; but not retained in English. It seems to have the same origin as mid, middle, amidst. In the Gothic it is used as a prefix.

Mis, a prefix, is the verb miss, to deviate. It is used in Saxon, German, Dutch, Swedish and Danish, in nearly the same sense, as in English. Its radical sense is to depart or wander.

Of, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use in the Saxon, as in English. It denotes primarily issuing, or proceeding from; hence separation, departure, and distance; in the latter sense, it is written off. It is the Latin ab, written by the early Romans af; the Greek απο, the German ab, the Dutch af; Dan. and Sw. af. The Saxons often prefixed this word, in cases where we use it after the verb as a modifier; as of-drifan, to drive off; as it is still used by the Germans, Dutch, Swedes and Danes. We retain it as a prefix, in offset and offspring, Sax. of-spring. As it denotes proceeding from, it is the proper sign of the genitive case; the case expressing production.

Over, Eng. over, Goth. ufar, G. uber, D. over, Dan. over, Sw. öfver, is a preposition and prefix, in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages, which I have examined; and in the same or similar senses. This seems to be the Greek υπερ, from which the Latins formed super, by converting the aspirate of the Greek vowel into s. This is probably the Heb. Ch. Syr. Ar. עבר, to pass, a passing, beyond.

On, is a Saxon preposition and prefix of very extensive use. It is obviously a different orthography of in, and it is used for in, in the Saxon, as "on onginu," in the beginning. It has also the sense we now give to on and upon, with other modifications of signification.

In composition, it signifies into, or towards, as on-blawan, to blow in; onclifian, to adhere, to cleave to; and it is also a particle of negation, like un, as onbindan, to unbind. This on is only a different spelling of un, in Dutch on, German un, used as a word of negation. The Gothic has un and und, in the like sense, as the Danish has un; the D. ont. In this sense, un answers precisely to the Greek αυτ, and as this is sometimes written und in Gothic, as in is written ind, in Danish, there can be little doubt, that in, on, un, avt, are all from one stock. The original word may have been han, hin, or hon; such loss of the first letter is very common; and inn, from the Ch. and Heb. ונה, presents us with an example. See in and inn.

The German has an, and the Dutch aan, in the sense of in and on.

Oth, is a Saxon preposition and prefix, sometimes written ath and ed, and answering nearly to the Latin ad and re; as in oth-witan, to twit, to throw in the teeth. It has also the sense of from, or away, or against, as in oth-swerian, to abjure. This preposition is obsolete, but we have the remains of it in twit, and perhaps in a few other words.

Sam, samod, a prefix. See the Danish and Swedish infra.

INTRODUCTION.

To, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use in our mother tongue. It occurs as a prefix, in such words as, to-bræcan, to break; to-beran, to bring or bear, [ad-ferre.] We retain it in together, Sax. togedere; and in to-wards, Sax. toward, towardes; and in to-morrow, to-day, to-night. The Dutch write it toe, and the Germans zu, and both nations use it extensively as a prefix. In Gothic it is written du, as in du-ginnan, to gin, that is, to begin. It would be gratifying to learn whether the Ethiopic †, which is prefixed to many verbs, is not the remains of the same preposition.

Un, is a Saxon prefix of extensive use, as a privative or particle of negation. See on and in.

Under, is a Saxon preposition and prefix of considerable use, in the present English sense. The Germans write it unter, and the Dutch onder, and use it in like manner. The Danes and Swedes write it under, and use it in the same sense.

Up, uppe, is a Saxon preposition and prefix of considerable use, in the present English sense. The Gothic has uf, in the sense of the Latin sub. The Germans write it auf and the Dutch op, the Danes op and the Swedes up, and all use it as a prefix.

Us, in Gothic, is a preposition and prefix. This is the German aus, and equivalent to the Latin ex. It is the Saxon ut, the English out, Dutch ut, Swedish ut, and Danish ud, dialectically varied. To this answers the Welsh ys, used in composition, but ys seems rather to be a change of the Latin ex, for the Latin expello is written in Welsh yspeliaw, and extendo is estyn.

Wüther, in Saxon, from the root of with, denotes against, or opposition. It is a prefix in Saxon, written in German wider, in Dutch, weder; Dan. and Swedish eder. It is obsolete, but retained in the old law term withernam, a counter-taking or distress.

In the German language, there are some prepositions and prefixes not found in the Saxon; as,

Ent, denoting from, out, away.

Er, without, out or to. Dan. er.

Nach, properly nigh, as in nachbar, neighbor; but its most common signification in composition is after; as in nachgehen, to go after. This sense is easily deducible from its primary sense, which is close, near, from urging, pressing, or following. In Dutch, this word is contracted to na, as in nabuur, neighbor; nagaan, to follow. The Russ has na also, a prefix of extensive use, and probably the same word. This fact suggests the question, whether the ancestors of these great families of men had not their residence in the same or an adjoining territory. It deserves also to be considered whether this na, is not the Shemitic נ, occurring as a prefix to verbs.

Weg, is a prefix used in the German and Dutch. It is the Saxon, German, and Dutch weg, way; in the sense of away, or passing from, from the verb, in Saxon, wægan, wegan, to carry, to weigh, Eng. to wag, the sense of which is to move or pass; as Ger. wegfallen, to fall off or away.

Zer, in German, denotes separation.

In the Gothic dialects, Danish and Swedish, fra is used as a prefix. This is the Scottish fra, Eng. from, of which it may be a contraction.

Fram in Swedish, and frem in Danish, is also a prefix. The primary sense is to go, or proceed, and hence it denotes moving to or towards, forth, &c., as in Danish fremfører, to bring forth; fremkalder, to call for. But in Danish, fremmed is strange, foreign, and it is probable that the English from is from the same root, with a different application. It may be from the same stock as the Gothic frum, origin, beginning, Latin primus, signifying to shoot forth, to extend, to pass along.

Gien, igen, in Danish, and igen, in Swedish, is the English gain in again, against. This is a prefix in both these Gothic languages. It has the sense of the Latin re, as in igienkommer, to come back, to return; of against, as in igienkalder, to countermand, or recall; of again, as gienbinder, to bind again. This may be the Latin con.

Mod, in Danish, and mot, emot, in Swedish, is a preposition, signifying to, towards, against, contrary, for, by, upon, out, &c.; as "mod staden," towards the city; modstrider, to resist; modgift, an antidote; modbor, a contrary wind; modvind, the same. This is the English meet, in the Gothic orthography, motyan, to meet, whence to moot.

O, in Swedish, is a negative or privative prefix, as in otidig, immature, in English, not tidy. It is probably a contracted word.

Paa, in Danish, på in Swedish, is a preposition and prefix, signifying on, in, upon. Whether this is allied to be, by, and the Russ. po, I shall not undertake to determine, with confidence; but it probably is the same, or from the same source.

Samman, signifying together, and from the root of assemble, is a prefix of considerable use in both languages. It answers to the Saxon sam, samod, equivalent to the Latin con or cum. It seems to be allied to same and the Latin similis.

Til, both in Danish and Swedish, is a prefix, and in Danish, of very extensive use. It is equivalent to the English to or towards, and signifies also at, in, on, by, and about, and in composition often has the sense of back or re, as in tilbage, backwards, that is, to back; but generally it retains the sense of to or onward; as in tilbyder, to offer, that is, to speak or order to; tildriver, to drive on; tilgiver, to allow, to pardon, that is, to give to, and hence to give back, to remit. This is the English till, which we use in the same sense as the Danes, but in English it always refers to time, whereas in the Danish and Swedish, it refers to place. Thus we cannot say, "We are going till town," but we say, "wait till I come, till my arrival;" literally, "wait to I come," to my arrival; that is, to the time of arrival. The difference is not in the sense of the preposition, but in its application.

The Scotch retain the Danish and Swedish use of this word; no slight evidence of their origin.

U, in Danish, the Swedish O, is a prefix, equivalent to in, and is used as a privative or negative; as in uaar, an unseasonable year; uartig, uncivil.

RUSSIAN.

Vo or ve, signifies in, at, by, and may possibly be from the same root as the Eng. be, by. But see po.

Za, is a prefix signifying for, on account of, by reason of, after, as in zaviduyu, to envy, from vid, visage; riju, to see, Lat. video; zadirayu, from deru, to tear; zamirayu, to be astonished or stupefied, from the root of Lat. miror, and Russ. mir, peace; miryu, to pacify, to reconcile; mirnie, pacific; zamirenje, peace, pacification; zamirayu, to make peace; Arm. mirret, to hold, to stop; the radical sense of wonder, astonishment, and of peace.

Ko, a preposition signifying to, towards, for.

Na, a preposition and prefix, signifying on, upon, at, for, to, seems to be the Germ. nach, Dutch na, as in nagrada, recompense; na, and the root of Lat. gratia; nasidayu, to sit down, &c.

Nad, a preposition, signifying above or upon.

O, a preposition, signifying of or from, and for.

Ob, a preposition and prefix, signifying to, on, against, about, as obnemayu, to surround, to embrace; ob and Sax. neman, to take.

Ot, is a preposition, signifying from, and it may be the Eng. out.

Po, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying in, by, after, from, &c. as podayu, to give to; polugayu, to lay, to expend, employ, lay out; to tax or assess; to establish or fix; to believe or suppose; po and lay. This corresponds with Eng. by, and the Latin has it in possideo, and a few other words. [Sax. besittan.] Pomen, remembrance, po and mens, mind.

Rad, a preposition signifying for, or for the love of.

So, a preposition and prefix of extensive use, signifying with, of, from; and as a mark of comparison, it answers nearly to the Eng. so or as.

Y, with the sound of u, is a preposition and prefix of extensive use. It signifies near, by, at, with, as uberayu, to put in order, to adjust, to cut, to reap, to mow, to dress, Fr. parer, Lat. paro; ugoda, satisfaction; ugodnei, good, useful, Eng. good; udol, a dale, from dol.

WELSH.

The prefixes in the Welsh Language are numerous. The following are the principal.

Am, about, encompassing, Sax. amb, Gr. αμφι.

An. See Sax. in.

Cy, cyd, cyr, cym, implying union, and answering to cum, con and co in Latin. Indeed cym, written also cye, seems to be the Latin cum, and cy may be a contraction of it, like co in Latin. Ca seems also to be a prefix, as in caboli, to polish, Lat. polio.

Cyn, cynt, former, first, as if allied to begin.

Di, negative and privative.

Dis, negative and precise.

Dy, iterative.

E and ec, adversative.

Ed and eit, denoting repetition, like re, Sax. ed, oth.

Es, separating, like Lat. ex. See ys.

Go, extenuating, inchoative, approaching, going, denotes diminution or a less degree, like the Latin sub; as in gobrid, somewhat dear. This seems to be from the root of English go.

Han, expressive of origination.

Lled, partly, half.

Oll, all.

Rhag, before.

Rhy, over, excessive.

Tra, over, beyond. Lat. trans.

Try, through.

Ym, mutual, reflective.

Ys, denoting from, out of, separation, proceeding from, answering to the Latin ex; as yspeliaw, to expel. So es, Welsh estyn, to extend.

Most of these prepositions, when used as prefixes, are so distinct as to be known to be prefixes.

But in some instances, the original preposition is so obscured by a loss or change of letters, as not to be obvious, nor indeed discoverable, without resorting to an ancient orthography. Thus without the aid of the Saxon orthography, we should probably not be able to detect the component parts of the English twit. But in Saxon it is written edwitan and othwitan; the preposition or prefix oth, with witan, to disallow, reproach or cast in the teeth.

It has been above suggested to be possible, that in the Shemitic languages, the י in triliteral roots, may be the same prefix as the Russian na, the Dutch na, and German nach. Let the reader attend to the following words.

INTRODUCTION.

Heb. בָּרַךְ To look, to behold, to regard. The primary sense of look, is, to reach, extend or throw.

Ch. To look; also to bud or sprout.

Ar. نَبَطَ To spring, or issue as water; to flow out; to devise or strike out; to draw out.

If the first letter is a prefix, the Hebrew word would accord with Lat. video; the Chaldee, with video and with bud, Sp. botar, Fr. bouton, bouter, to put, and Eng. to pout, and Fr. bout, end, from shooting, extending.

Ar. نَبَتَ To bud; to germinate. See Ch. supra.

Heb. נָפַל To fall; to sink down; to wither; to fall off, as leaves and flowers; to act foolishly; to disgrace. Derivative, foolish; a fool; נָפַל Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. to fall.

Ch. נָפַל To make foul; to defile; that is, to throw or put on.

Ar. نَبَلَ To shoot, as an arrow; to drive as camels; to excel; also to die, that is probably to fall.

Can there be any question, that fall, foul and fool are this very word, without the first consonant? The Arabic without the first consonant agrees with Gr. βαλλω, and the sense of falling then, is to throw one's self down.

Heb. נָשָׂא To keep, guard, preserve, retain, observe.

Ch. To observe; to keep; to lay up.

Syr. and Sam. id.

Eth. ሰለሰ To shine.

Ar. نَظَرَ To keep; to see; to look; to attend.

Remove the first letter, and this coincides with the Greek επεσθαι.

No person will doubt whether נָמַל to circumcise, is formed on נָמַל.

Ch. נָמַל to cut; to saw. Syr. id. Lat. serra, serro.

Ar. زَادَ To fade, to vanish, to perish, to be empty, to fail.

Heb. נָפַח to blow, to breathe. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar. id. from נָפַח, to blow.

If the Shemitic נ in these and similar words is a prefix or the remains of a preposition, it coincides very closely with the Russ. and Dutch na, and the latter we know to be a contraction of the German nach. Now the German nach is the English nigh; for no person can doubt the identity of the German nachbar and the English neighbor.

In the course of my investigations, I very early began to suspect that b, f, p, c, g and k before l and r, are either casual letters, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, or the remains of prepositions; most probably the latter. I had advanced far in my dictionary, with increasing evidence of the truth of this conjecture, before I had received Owen's Dictionary of the Welsh language. An examination of this work has confirmed my suspicions, or rather changed them into certainty.

If we attend to the manner of articulating the letters, and the ease with which bl, br, fl, fr, pl, pr, cl, cr, gl, gr are pronounced, without an intervening vowel, even without a sheva, we shall not be surprised that a preposition or prefix, like be, pe, pa, po, or ge should, in a rapid pronunciation, lose its vowel, and the consonant coalesce closely with the first letter of the principal word. Thus blank, prank, might naturally be formed from belank, perank. That these words are thus formed, I do not know; but there is nothing in the composition of the words to render it improbable. Certain it is, that a vast number of words are formed with these prefixes, on other words, or the first consonant is a mere adventitious addition; for they are used with or without the first consonant. Take the following examples.

Hiberno-Celtic, or Irish, brac or brach, the arm, is written also raigh, Welsh braic, whence βραχιον, brachium. Braigh, the neck, Sax. hraca, Eng. rack, Gr. ραχις. Fraoch, heath, ling, brake, L. erica.

Welsh, llawr, Basque, lurra, Eng. floor.

Lat. floccus, Eng. flock or lock.

Sax. hraccan, Eng. to reach, in vomiting.*

Sax. hracod, Eng. ragged.

Ger. rock, Eng. frock.

Dutch, geluk, Ger. gluck, Eng. luck.

Greek, Eolic Dialect, βροδον, for ποδον, a rose.

Latin, clunis, Eng. loin, G. lende, W. clun, from llun.

Eng. cream, Ger. rahm, Dutch. room.

Sax. hlaf, Polish chlieb, G. leib, Eng. loaf.

Sax. hladan, Eng. to lade or load, Russ. kladu, to lay.

Greek. κλινω, Lat. clino, Sax. hlinian, hleanan, Russ. klonyu, Eng. to lean.

Greek, λαγνηος, Lat. lagena, Eng. flagon.

Sax. hrysan, Eng. to rush.

* H before l and r in Saxon corresponds to the Greek κ, and Latin c, before the same letters.

French, frapper, Eng. to rap.

Sax. gerædian, to make ready; in Chaucer, greith, to make ready. Sax. hræd, quick; hradian, to hasten; hrædnes, Eng. readiness.

Spanish, frisar, to curl or frizzle; rizar, the same.

Sax. gerefa, Eng. reeve, G. graf, D. graaf.

Lat. glycyrrhiza, from the Greek; Eng. liquorice.

But in no language, have we such decisive evidence of the formation of words, by prefixes, as in the Welsh.

Take the following instances, from a much greater number that might be produced, from Owen's Welsh Dictionary.

Blanc, a colt, from llanc.

Blith, milk, from lith.

Bliant, fine linen, from lliant.

Plad, a flat piece or plate, from llad.

Pled, a principle of extension, from lled.

Pledren, a bladder, from pledryr, that distends, from lled.

Pleth, a braid, from lleth, Eng. plait.

Plicciau, to pluck, from llig.

Ploc, a block, from lloc; plociau, to block, to plug.

Plung, a plunge, from llung, our vulgar lunge.

Gluth, a glutton, from lluth.

Glas, a blue color, verdancy, a green plat, whence Eng. glass, from llas.

Glyd, gluten, glue, from llyd.

Cluer, clear, from llaer.

Clav, sick, from llav.

Clupa, a club, a knob, from lheb.

Clut, a piece, a clout, from llud, llut.

Clamp, a mass, a lump.

Clawd, a thin board, from llawd.

Cledyr, a board or shingle, whence cledrwy, lattice, from lled.

Bran, Eng. bran, from rhan; rhanu, to rend.

Brid, a breaking out, from rhid.

Broc, noise, tumult, a brock, from rhoc.

Broc, froth, foam, anger, broci, to chafe or fret, from bruc, a boiling or ferment, from rhuc, something rough, a grunt, Gr. βρυχω.

Bryd, what moves, impulse, mind, thought, from rhwyd.

Brys, quickness, brisiau, to hasten, to shoot along, from rhys, Eng. to rush, and crysiaw, to hasten, from rhys, to rush. [Here is the same word rhys, with different prefixes, forming brysiaw and crysiaw. Hence W. brysg, Eng. brisk.]

Graz, [pronounced grath], a step, a degree, from rhaz, Lat. gradus, gradior.

Greg, a cackling, from rheg.

Grem, a crashing, gnash, a murmur, gremiau, to crash or gnash, from rhem. Hence Lat. fremo, Gr. βριμω.*

We have some instances of similar words in our own language; such flag and lag; flap and lap; clump and lump.

There is another class of words which are probably formed with a prefix of a different kind. I refer to words in which s precedes another consonant, as scalp, skull, slip, slide, sluggish, smoke, smooth, speed, spire, spin, stage, steep, stem, swell, spout. We find that tego, to cover, in Latin, is in Greek τεγω; the Latin fallo, is in Greek φαλλω. We find μαραγδος

* I do not follow Owen to the last step of his analysis, as I am of opinion that, in making monosyllabic words to be compound, he often errs. For example, he supposes broc a tumult, to be from rhoc, a broken or rough utterance; a grunt or groan; and this, to be a compound of rhy, excess, what is over or beyond, and oc, a forcible utterance, a groan. I believe rhoc to be a primitive uncompounded word, coinciding with the English rough.

Owen supposes plad, a flat thing, a plate, to be from llad, with py. Llad he explains, what is given, a gift, good things, and py, what is inward or involved. I have no doubt that the first letter is a prefix in plad, but beyond all question, llad is from the same root as lled, breadth, coinciding with Lat. latus; both from a common root signifying to extend. But I do not believe llad or lled to be compound words.

Dug, a duke, Owen supposes to be formed on ug, over; which cannot be true, unless the Latin dux, duco, are compounds. Dur, steel, he derives from ur, extreme, over, but doubtless it is from the root of the Latin durus.

So par, signifying what is contiguous, a state of readiness or preparation, a pair, fellow, or match, Owen makes a compound of py, and ar; py, as above explained, and ar, a word of various significations, on, upon, surface, &c. But there can be no doubt that par is from the root of the Latin paro, to prepare, being the Latin par, equal; the root of a numerous family of words not only in the Japhetic languages of Europe, but in the Shemitic languages of Asia. It certainly is not a Welsh compound, nor is there the least evidence to induce a belief that it is not an uncompounded word. Had the learned author of the Welsh Dictionary extended his researches to a variety of other languages, and compared the monosyllabic roots in them with each other, I think he would have formed a very different opinion as to their origin. I am very well convinced that many of the words which he supposes to be primitive or radical, are contractions, such as rhy, lle, lly, the last consonant being lost.

INTRODUCTION.

is written also σπαρπιδος; and it may be inquired whether the English spin, is not from the same root as σπιν, web or woof, σπινος, a spindle, σπινω, to spin. Sprout in English is in Spanish brota.

We find the Welsh ysbrig, the English sprig, is a compound of ys, a prefix denoting issuing or proceeding from, like the Lat. ex, and brig, top, summit.

Ysgar, a separate part, a share; ysgar, ysgaru, to divide; ysgariau, to separate, is composed of ys and car, according to Owen; but the real root appears distinctly in the Gr. σπινω. This is the English shear, shire.

Ysgegiaw, to shake by laying hold of the throat, to shake roughly, is a compound of ys and cegiaw, to choke, from ceg, the mouth, an entrance, a choking. This may be the English shake; Sax. sceacan.

Ysgin, a robe made of skin; ys and cin, a spread or covering.

Ysgodi, to shade; ysgawd, a shade; ys and cawd.

Ysgrab, what is drawn up or puckered, a scrip; ys and crab, what shrinks. See Eng. crab, crabbed.

Ysgrawu, to scrape; ys and craw, claws, from rhaw.

Ysgrec, a scream, a shriek, ysgrechaw, to shriek, from crec, a shriek, crecian, to shriek, from creg, cryg, hoarse, rough, from rhug, rye, that is rough; the grain so named from its roughness. This is the English rough. Lat. raucus. Here we have the whole process of formation, from the root of rough. We retain the Welsh crecian, to shriek, in our common word, to creak, and with a formative prefix, we have shriek, and our vulgar scream. The Latin ruga, a wrinkle, Eng. rug, shrug, are probably from the same source.

Ysgrienu, to write, Lat. scribo, from ysgriw, a writing, from eriv, a mark cut, a row of notches; cribiaw, to cut, to grave; from rhiv, something that divides. Hence scribener.

Ysgub, a sheaf or besom, ysgubaw, to sweep, Lat. scopæ, from cub, a collection, a heap, a cube.

Ysgud, something that whirls; ysgudaw, to whisk or scud; from cud, celerity, flight; ysguth, ysguthaw, the same.

Ysguth, a push; ysguthiaw, to push or thrust; from guth, guthiaw, the same; probably allied to Eng. shoot. The Welsh has ysgythu, to jet or spout, from the same root.

Yslac, slack, loose; yslaciaw, to slacken; from llac, loose, slack, llaciaw, to slacken, from llag, slack, sluggish; allied to Eng. lag and slow.

Yslapiaw, to slap, from yslab, what is lengthened or distended, from llab, a flag, a strip, a stroke. Llabi, a tall, lank person, a stripling, a looby, a lubber, is from the same root; llabiaw, to slap.

Ysled, a sled, from lled, says Owen, which denotes breadth, but it is probably from the root of slide, a word probably from the same root as lled, that is, to extend, to stretch along.

Ysmot, a patch, a spot; ysmotiaw, to spot, to dapple, from mod, Eng. mote.

Ysmociaw, ysmygu, to dim with smoke, from mug, smoke. So smooth from Welsh mryth.

Yspail, spoil, from pail, farina, says Owen. I should say from the root of palea, straw, refuse, that is, from the root of peel, to strip. Yspeiliota, to be pilfering.

Yspeliaw, to expel, from pel, a ball, says Owen; but this is the Latin ex-pello, from pello. Ball may be from the same root.

Yspig, a spike, a spine; yspigaw, to spike; from pig, a sharp point, a pike. Hence Eng. spigot.

Yspin, a spine, from pin, pen.

Ysgynu, to ascend, Lat. ascendo, from cyn, first, chief, foremost. The radical sense is to shoot up.

Ysluc, a slough, from lluc, a collection of water, a lake.

Yspar, a spear, from pâr, a cause or principle of producing, the germ or seed of a thing, a spear. This consists of the same elements as ber, a spit, and Eng. bar, and in Italian bar is sbarra. The primary sense is to shoot, thrust, drive.

Yspine, a finch, from pinc, gay, fine brisk; a sprig, a finch.

Ysplan, clear, bright; ysplana, to explain; from plan, that is parted off, a ray, a shoot, a planting, a plane; whence plant, a child; Eng. a plant; planu, to shoot, as a plant. Hence splendor, W. ysplander.

Ysporthi, to support, from porth, a bearing, a port, passage, &c. Lat. porta, porto.

Ystac, a stack, a heap; ystaca, a standard; from tag, a state of being stuffed or clogged.

Ystad, a state; ystadu, to stay; from tad, that spreads, a continuity. The primary sense is to set.

Ystain, that is spread; a stain; tin, Lat. stannum; ystaeniaw, to spread over, to stain; ystaenu, to tin, or cover with tin; from taen, a spread, a layer. Qu. is tin from spreading?

Ystawl, a stool, from tawl, a cast or throw. The sense is to set, to throw down. Tawl is the root of deal.

Ystor, a store, that forms a bulk, from tor, a swell, a prominence.

Ystorm, a storm, from torm, that is stretched, but the sense is a rushing.

Ystrym, a stream, from trym, compact, trim, that is, stretched, straight, from extending.

Ystump, a stump, from tump, a round mass, a tump.

Yswatiaw, to squat, from yswad, a throw, or falling down, from gwad, a denial; gwadu, to deny, or disown. If this deduction is correct, the sense of denial is a throwing or thrusting back, a repelling. It is so in other words.

Yswitiaw, to chirp, twitter, from yswid, that makes a quick turn. Qu. twitter.

In some of the foregoing words, it appears evident that the Welsh prefix, ys, is an alteration of the Latin ex, and the words, in which this is the case, were probably borrowed from the Latin, while the Roman armies had possession of England. But there is a vast number of words, with this prefix, which are not of Latin origin; and whether ys is a native prefix in the Welsh, may be a question. One thing is certain, that s before another consonant, and coalescing with it, is, in a great number of words, a prefix.

The modern Italian affords abundant proof of the extensive use of s, as the remains or representative of ex; as shallare, to unpack, unbale; sbarbato, beardless; sbatte, to abate; sbrancare, to pluck off branches; scaricare, to discharge; scomodare, to incommode; sconcordia, discord; scornare, to break the horns; scrostare, to pull off the crust; and a great number of others.

Now if the same manner of forming words with this prefix has actually prevailed among the northern nations of Europe, we may rationally suppose that many English words, and perhaps all of this class, are thus formed. Thus scatter may be formed from a root in Cd; shape, from Cb, Cf or Cp; skill, from the root of Lat. calleo; slip, from the root of Lat. labor; smart, from the root of Lat. amarus, bitter, Heb. מר; smite, from the root of Latin mitto; span, from the root of pan, to stretch; spar, from the root of bar; speed, from the root of Lat. voco; steep, from the root of deep; stretch, from the root of reach; sweep, from the root of wipe; swan, from wan, white; swell, from the root of to well, Sax. wellan, to boil, &c. That many English and other Teutonic and Gothic words are thus formed, appears to be certain.

These facts being admitted, let us examine a little further. In Russ. swaliba is a wedding. Is not this formed on the root of wed, with s for a prefix? Ssara is a quarrel. Is not this formed on the root of vary, variance, or of spar? Sserlo is a borer; qu. bore and veru; svertirayu, to roll; qu. Lat. verto; skora, furs, peltry; qu. Fr. cuir; skot, a beast; qu. cattle; skupayu, to purchase in gross; qu. cheap, Dan. kioben, and its root; slabei, weak; qu. Lat. labor, lapsus; slagayu, to fold; qu. lay, and plico; slivayu, to pour out liquors; qu. Lat. libo; slupayu, to peel off bark or skin; qu. Lat. liber; animayu, to take away; qu. Sax. neman, to take; snova, new; qu. Lat. novus; snig, sneig, snow, Fr. neige. The Lat. nivis is from this root, with g opened to v. Russ. spletayu, to plait, &c.

The Russ. prefix so occurs in a great number of words; sobirayu, to collect or assemble, precisely the Heb. and Ch. צבר.

It now becomes an interesting question, to determine how far any analogy exists, between the languages of the Japhetic and Shemitic families, in regard to prefixes. For example, in the Shemitic languages, ב is a prefix of extensive use, corresponding almost exactly with the English and Dutch by, the Saxon be, and German bei. This preposition and prefix has several senses in the Saxon which are now obsolete; but its present prevailing sense occurs in all the Shemitic languages. ברוח קרים עז, by a strong east wind. Ex. xiv. 21. Compare the following definitions of this preposition; the Sax. from Lye, and the Shemitic from Castle.

Sax. de, e, ex, in, secus, ad, juxta, secundum, pro, per, super, propter, circa.

Heb. Ch. Syr. in, e, ex, cum, propter, usque ad, adeo ut, ad, super, per, contra, ante.

Eth. in, per, pro, propter, cum, secundum, apud.

Ar. in, cum, propter, per, ad, erga.

In Numbers, xiv. 34, it signifies according to, or after; במספר הימים, according to the number of days. This signification is now perhaps obsolete in English, but was common in the Saxon; as, "be his magnum," according to his strength; pro viribus suis. So "be tham mæstan;" by the most, is now expressed by, at the most.

Now it is remarkable that this word in Hebrew, Arabic and Persic, is the preposition used in oaths, precisely as it is in English. Gen. xxii. 16, ב, By myself have I sworn. Arabic, ballah or by Allah; Persic, بخدا bechoda, or begoda, by God, the very words now used in English. The evidence then is decisive that the Shemitic prefix ב is the Teutonic be, by, bei contracted, and this Teutonic word is certainly a contraction of big, which is used in the Saxon, especially in compound words, as in bigspell, [by-spell] a fable; bigstandan, to stand by. This prefix then was in universal use by the original stock of mankind, before the dispersion; and this word alone is demonstrative proof of the common origin of the Shemitic and Teutonic languages. Now it is equally certain that this is the prefix b, and probably p, before l and r, in block, braigh, and a multitude of words in all the modern languages; and probably, the same letter is a prefix in many Shemitic words.

We know that be in the Saxon bedalan, and Dutch bedeelen, is a prefix, as the simple verb is found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages. The Hebrew and Chaldean ברך corresponds exactly in elements and in signification.

INTRODUCTION.

tion, with the Saxon and Dutch. Whether the first letter is a prefix in the latter languages, let the reader judge. See the word deal, which when traced, terminates in the Welsh taul, a cast off, a throw; separation; taclu, to cast or throw off, to separate.

In Chaldee, כרר signifies to scatter, to disperse. The word has the same signification in the Syriac and Samaritan.

In Ethiopic, the word with አ prefixed, signifies to wish, love, desire, and with ተ prefixed, to strive, to endeavor, and without a prefix, strife, course, race. Both these significations are from stretching, straining.

In Arabic بذر signifies generally to hasten, to run to; but بذر signifies to disperse, to sow or scatter seed.

This verb is written in Hebrew כרר with precisely the same signification. The Arabic also has the verb with this orthography, signifying to sow, and also to beat or strike with a stick.

Now in Syriac ܕܪܪ, dar, signifies to strive, or struggle. Here we have the simple verb, without the prefix, with the sense of the Ethiopic, with a prefix. Supra.

We find also the Arabic ذر tharra, the simple verb, signifies to sprinkle.

We find in Chaldee ܕܪܪ, ܕܪܪ and ܕܪܪ, the simple verb, signifies to disperse; in Syriac, the same. In Arabic ذر signifies to sow, like the foregoing verb, and hence to procreate. Both this and the former verb signify also to whiten, as the hair of the head, as we say, to sprinkle with gray hairs. The Arabic ذر signifies to drive, to impel, to repel, to contend, to strive; to shine, to sparkle. And here we have the literal signification of this whole class of verbs; to drive, urge, throw, send; hence to scatter, to strive, to shoot as rays of light, procreate, &c.

The Hebrew corresponding verb is זרר or זרר to scatter, to sow; and the word with the like orthography occurs in Ch. Syr. and Ar. This is the Latin sero. And who can doubt that ז is a prefix in the verb זרר above mentioned?

In Welsh, gobru signifies to work, to operate; gobu, work, operation; formed by the prefix go and per; go denoting progress towards, approach, and per rendered by Owen, that pervades, a fruit, a pear; but the real sense is to strain, to bring forth, to drive, thrust, urge, &c.

This word, in the Armorican dialect, is written either gobu or ober; in Latin operor, whence Eng. operate. The same word is in the Ethiopic, ገበረ gaber, to make, to do. ለገበረ agabar, to cause to be made; ተገበረ tagabar, to work, operate, negotiate; ገበረ gabar, a maker.

This is the Heb. and Ch. גבר to be strong, to prevail, to establish, and as a noun, a man; Ar. جابر jabara, to make strong, to heal, as a broken bone; to strengthen.

That this Shemitic word and the Welsh and Ethiopic are all radically one, there cannot be a question; and the Welsh proves indisputably that go is a prefix. This then is a word formed on כר or כר. The Heb. מכר, strong, that is, strained, and מכר, a wing, that is, a shoot, are from the same root, and in Arabic ابر abara, signifies to prick, to sting, and its derivatives, the extremity of a thing, a point, a needle, corresponding with the Welsh bar, a summit, a tuft, a branch, a bar, and the Welsh ber, a pike, a lance, a spit, a spear, Lat. veru; in Welsh also, pâr, a spear, and per, a spit, are all doubtless of the same origin.

In Syriac, ܕܪܪ, tsabar, signifies to make, to work or operate. Is this the same root with a different prefix?

The same word in Arabic صابر signifies to be patient, to bear, to sustain.

We observe, that in the Teutonic and Gothic languages, the same word is used with different prefixes. Thus in our mother tongue, begin is written gynnan, the simple radical word, and aginnan, beginnan, and ongynnan; and in the Gothic, duginnan, which, in English, would be, togin.

Should it appear upon investigation, that verbs in the Assyrian languages have the same prefixes which occur in the European languages, the fact will evidence more affinity between the languages of these two stocks than has yet been known to exist.

Let us now attend to the natural causes which may be supposed to have obscured or destroyed the identity or resemblance of languages which had a common origin.

The affinity of words, in two or more different languages, is known by identity of letters and identity of signification; or by letters of the same organ, and a signification obviously deducible from the same sense. Letters of the same organ, as for example, b, f, p and v are so easily converted, the one into the other, and the change is so frequent, that this circumstance seldom occasions much obscurity. The changes of signification occasion more difficulty, not so much by necessity, as because this branch of philology is less understood.

1. CHANGE OF ARTICULATIONS, OR CONSONANTS.

The articulations, letters which represent the junctions or joinings of the organs, usually called consonants, are the stamina of words. All these are convertible and frequently converted into their cognates. The English word bear represents the Latin fero and pario, and fero is the Greek φέρω. The Latin ventus is wind in English; and habeo is have. The Latin dens, in Dutch, Danish and Swedish is tand; and dance in English is in German tanz.

These changes are too familiar to require a multiplication of examples. But there are others less common and obvious, which are yet equally certain. Thus in the Gaelic or Hiberno-Celtic, m and mb are convertible with v; and in Welsh m and v are changed, even in different cases of the same word. Thus in Irish the name of the hand is written either lamb or lar, and in Welsh maen, a stone, is written also vaen. The Greek β is always pronounced as the English v, as βούλα, Lat. volo, English will, German wollen; and the sound of b the Greeks express by μβ.

In the Chaldee and Hebrew, one remarkable distinction is the use of a dental letter in the former, where the latter has a sibilant. As כוּת cuth in Chaldee is כוּש cush in Hebrew; דהב, gold, in Chaldaic, is דָּהָב in Hebrew. The like change appears in the modern languages; for water which, in most of the northern languages, is written with a dental, is, in German, written wasser, and the Latin dens, W. dant, Dutch tand, Swedish and Danish tand, is, in German, zahn. The like change is frequent in the Greek and Latin. Φάρω, in one dialect, is φάσσω, in another; and the Latins often changed t of the indicative present, or infinitive, into s in the preterit and participle, as mitto, mittere, missi, missus.

L and R, though not considered as letters of the same organ, are really such and changed the one into the other. Thus the Spaniards write blandir for brandish, and escorta for escort. The Portuguese write brando for bland, and branquear, to whiten, for blanch. The Greek has φραγμῶν for the Latin flagellum. In Europe however this change seems to be limited chiefly to two or three nations on the coast of the Mediterranean. L is sometimes commutable with D.

We have a few instances of the change of g or gh into f. Thus rough is pronounced ruf, and trough, trauf.

The Russians often change the d of a noun into the sound of j, or the compound g, in the verb formed from that noun; as lad, accord, harmony, laju, to accord, or agree; bred, damage, loss; breju, to injure.

The Italians and French have also changed a dental into a palatal letter, in many words; as Italian raggio, a ray, from Lat. radius; and ragione, reason, from ratio; Fr. manger, to eat, from Lat. mando, or manduco.

In the south of Europe, the Greek χ has been changed, in some instances, into the Italian or Spanish z, and then by the French into s. It seems that the Spanish z has, at some former period, been pronounced as a guttural. Thus the Gr. βραχίον, Lat. brachium, the arm, is in Spanish brazo, and the Spaniards have the word from the Latin, or from the same source as the Latin and Greek, the Celtic braic. This word, brazo, the French changed into bras, and from that we have brace and embrace. A similar change occurs in Durazzo, from Dyrrachium, and in the Spanish luz, light.

The Teutonic nations often used h to express the power of the Greek κ, and the Latin c, as heart for καρδιά, horn for cornu. Hence we find that the Saxon hlinian, hleonian or hlymian, to lean, is the Greek κλίνω, Latin clino. The letter h is now dropped and we write the word lean.

In like manner, the Saxon hlid, which we now write lid, is from the same root as the Latin claudo, cludo, the Greek κλινω, which is contracted into κλινω. And in this word we may notice another fact, that the word signifies not only to shut, but to praise or celebrate, proving that this word and the Latin plaudo, are the same, with different prefixes, the same as laudo, and that the primary sense is to strain. This in Saxon appears in hlud, loud, hlydan, to cry out.

In Latin, f and h have been converted, as hordeum for fordeum; and the Spaniards now write h for f, as hacer for the Latin facere; hilo for filum; herir for ferire, &c.

2. CHANGE OF VOWELS.

The change of vowels is so common, as to occasion no difficulty in determining the sameness of words; indeed little or no regard is to be had to them, in ascertaining the origin and affinity of languages. In this opinion I accord with almost all writers on this subject; but I have to combat the opinion of that elegant scholar, Sir William Jones, who protests against the licentiousness of etymologists, not only in transposing letters, but in totally disregarding the vowels, and seems to admit the common origin of words only when written with the same letters, and used in a sense precisely the same.*

* Asiatic Researches, vol. 3, p. 489.

INTRODUCTION.

I am not at all surprised at the common prejudice existing against etymology. As the subject has been treated, it is justly liable to all the objections urged against it. But it is obvious that Sir W. Jones had given very little attention to the subject, and that some of its most common and obvious principles had escaped his observation. His opinion with regard to both articulations and vowels is unequivocally erroneous, as will appear from the following list of words, taken from modern languages, and respecting the identity of which, that gentleman himself, if living, could not have the slightest doubt.

ENGLISH.	SAXON.	DUTCH.	GERMAN.	SWEDISH.	LATIN.
draw, } drag, }	dragan,	trekken,	tragen,	draga,	traho.
give, } foot, } feet, }	gifan,	geeven,	geben,	gifva,	pes. Gr. πους .

Here are scarcely two words written with the same letters in two languages; and yet no man ever called in question their identity, on account of the difference of orthography. The diversity is equally great in almost all other words of the same original. So in the same words we often find the vowel changed, as in the Lat. facio, feci; ago, egi; sto, steti; vello, vulsi. Nothing is more certain than that the Welsh gwyz, and the English wood, are the same word, although there is one letter only common to them both. It is pronounced gooyth, that is, g, and wyth; as guard for ward.

3. CHANGE OR LOSS OF RADICAL LETTERS.

There are some words, which, in certain languages, have suffered a change of a radical letter; while in others it is wholly lost. For example, word, in Danish and Swedish is ord; wort, a plant, is urt; the Saxon gear, or ger, English year, in Danish is aar, in Swedish is år, in Dutch jaar, and in German jahr.

In the word, yoke, and its affinities, we have a clear and decisive example of changes in orthography. Yoke, the Latin jugum, is from the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic jug, to join, to couple; a word not found in the Hebrew. The Greeks retained the original letters in zygon, zygion; the Latins changed the first letter to j in jugum, and inserted a casual n in jungo. From the Latin, the Italians formed giogo, a yoke, and giugnere, to join; the Spaniards, yugo, a yoke, and juntar, to join; the French, joug, a yoke, and joindre, to join. In Saxon, yoke is geoc or ioc; in Dutch, juk; G. joch; Sw. ok.

One of the most general changes that words have undergone is the entire loss of the palatal letter g, when it is radical and final in verbs; or the opening of that articulation to a vowel or diphthong. We have examples in the English bow, from Saxon bugan, to bend; buy, from bycgan; brow, from breg; lay, from lægan, or legan; say, from sægan; fair, from fæger; flail, from the German flagel, Lat. flagellum; French nier, from Lat. nego, negare.

The same or similar changes have taken place in all the modern languages of which I have any knowledge.

The loss and changes of radical letters in many Greek verbs deserve particular notice. We find in the Lexicons, πραγμα, παρως, πρακτικος, are referred to πρασσω, παρνω, as the theme or root; ταγμα, to τασσω; ρητωρ, to ρω; and φραγμα, to φρασσω. This reference, so far as it operates as a direction to the student where to find the verb to which the word belongs, and its explanation, is useful and necessary. But if the student supposes that these words are formed from the theme, so called, or the first person of the indicative mode, present tense, he is deceived. I am confident no example can be found, in any language, of the palatals γ and κ, formed from the dentals and sibilants, τ and σ, nor is ρητωρ, or any similar word formed by the addition of the dental to a verb ending in a vowel. The truth is, the last radical in ρω is lost, in the indicative mode, and in πρασσω, παρνω, it is changed. The radical lost in ρω is δ or θ; the original word was πεδω or πεθω, and the derivatives ρητωρ, ρητορικη, were formed before the radical letter was dropped in the verb. No sooner is the verb restored to its primitive form, than we recognize its connection with the Irish raidham, to speak; Saxon ræd, speech; rædan, to read; German rath, Dutch raad, &c.

The original root of πρασσω, was πραγω, παρω, or πανω, and from this were formed πραγμα, πρακτικος, before the last radical was changed. No sooner is the original orthography restored, than we see this to be the Teutonic verb, German brauchen, Dutch gebruiken, Danish bruger, Sw. bruka, Sax. brucan, to use, to practice, and hence the English broker.

The same remarks are applicable to ταγμα and τασσω; φραγμα and φρασσω; αλλαγη and αλλασσω; χαρακτηρ and χαρασσω, and many other words of like formation. In all these cases, the last radical letter is to be sought in the derivatives of the verb, and in one of the past tenses, particularly in an aorist. This fact affords no feeble evidence that in Greek, as in the Shemitic languages, the preterit tense or an aorist, was the radix of the verb.*

But it is not in the Greek language only that we are to seek for the primitive radical letters, not in what is now called the root of the verb, but in the derivatives. The fact is the same in the Latin, and in the English. The Latin fluctus and fluxi, cannot be deduced from fluo; but the orthography of these words proves demonstrably that the original root was flugo, or fluco. So in English sight cannot be deduced from see, for no example can be found of the letter g introduced to form the participles of verbs. Sight, in Saxon gesicht, D. zigt, G. sicht, Dan. sigt, Sw. sicht, is a participle; but the verb in the infinitive, in Saxon is seon, geseon, Ger. sehen, D. zien, Dan. seer, Sw. se; in which no palatal letter is found, from which g or ch can be deduced. The truth then is that the original verb was segan, or in Dutch zegen; the g being lost as it is in the French nier, from the Lat. nego.

In the change of letters in the Greek verbs before mentioned, the process seems to have been from γ or κ to ξ, and then to σ and τ; πραγω, παρω, πασσω, παρνω. This is certainly a process which is natural and common. The Latin brachium thus became in Spanish brazo, and then in French bras; and thus in the Italian, Alexandria has become Alessandria.

When the last radical of a Greek verb is a dental, it may not be certain whether the original letter was d, or th or t. We find the Greek verb σπρω, to draw, forms its derivatives with σ, σπασμα, σπασσι; and this is probably the Armoic spaza, from which we have spay. So κραζω, φρασσι, and φραδω, are evidently of the same family. It is not improbable that the original letter might have a compound sound, or it might correspond nearly to the Arabic ظ or ذ, or the English dh or th, or ds, so as easily to pass into d or into s.

It is equally clear that many Greek words have lost an initial consonant. The letter most generally lost is probably the oriental π, but obviously the palatals, γ and κ, have, in many instances, been dropped. There seems to be no question that the Greek ολος is the English whole and perhaps all. This in Welsh is oll or holl, in Saxon al or geall; and this is undoubtedly the Shemitic ל. So the Gr. αλλωμι is the Welsh colli, to lose; and αλω may be the English coil, Fr. cueillir.

In like manner, the Greek has, in many words, lost a labial initial, answering to the English b, f or v. The Greek ιδω is undoubtedly the Latin video; ιργω is from the same root as work; ιδω is from the root of vid, in the Latin divido, and individuum, that is, separate, and from the Arabic, ب, badda, to separate.

In many instances, the Latin retained or restored the lost letter; thus harmaxa, for αμαξα; harpago for απαρη; harmonia for αρμυνα; video for ιδω. If the marks of breathing, called spiritus asper and spiritus lenis, now prefixed to Greek words, were intended to represent the letters lost, or to stand in the place of them, they answer this purpose very imperfectly. The spiritus asper may stand for a palatal or guttural letter, but it does not designate which letter, the π, or the κ; much less does this or the other spiritus justly represent the labials, b, f, v or w. Whenever the Latins wrote h in the place of the Greek spiritus, we may conclude that the original letter was π or a cognate letter; and we may conclude also that the υ in video, and in divido, viduus, individuum, stands for the original labial lost in ιδω, and ιδω. But there are many words, I apprehend, in which the lost letter is unknown, and in which the loss cannot be recovered, by any marks prefixed to the words. We may well suppose that hymnus exhibits the correct written form of υμνος; but what is there in the Greek υπν, to lead us to consider this word as the English woof, and υπνω, to be the same as weave? Both the Greek words have the spiritus asper.

What proportion of Greek words have been contracted by the loss of an initial or final consonant, cannot, I apprehend, be determined with any precision; at least, not in the present state of philological knowledge. It is probable the number of contracted words amounts to one fourth of all the verbs, and it may be more.

Similar contractions have taken place in all other languages; a circumstance that embarrasses the philologist and lexicographer at every step of his researches; and which has led to innumerable mistakes in Etymology. We know that the Swedish år, and Danish aar, a year, have lost the articulation g, and that the English y in year, is the representative of g, as j is in the Dutch jaar, and German jahr: for the g is found in our mother tongue; and in a multitude of words, one language will supply the means of deter-

* Κραζω, in Greek, is to cry like a crow or rook; but the last radical is changed from γ, as in the second aorist, it forms κραγυς. Now in Danish, crow is krage, in Ger. krahe, in D. kraai, in Sw. kräka; a fact that demonstrates the last radical letter to be a palatal, which in English is opened to o, in crow.

INTRODUCTION.

mining the real origin or true orthography which cannot be ascertained by another. But doubtless many changes have taken place of which the evidence is uncertain; the chain which might conduct us to the original orthography being broken, and no means now remaining of repairing the loss.

In no language, has the rejection or change of consonants served so effectually to obscure the original words as in the French. So extensive have been the changes of orthography in that language, that had not the early lexicographers indicated the loss of letters by a mark, it would be impossible now to discover the original orthography, or to trace the connection of words with other languages, in a large portion of them. And it is with regret we observe the influence of the French practice of suppressing consonants, extending itself to other countries. It is owing to the most servile obsequiousness of nations, that Basil or Basilea, the elegant name of a town in Switzerland, has been corrupted to Basle, and pronounced most barbarously bale. The Germans are pursuing a like course in suppressing the palatal letters; a most unfortunate circumstance for the strength of the language.

The Italians also have a disposition to reject letters when they interfere with their habits of pronunciation, and hence we see, in their language, piano, written for plano; flore for flor; fiocco for flocco; a change that has removed a radical consonant, and thus obscured or rather destroyed the affinity between the Italian and the Latin words.

Another difference of writing and pronouncing, has been produced by the change of a sibilant letter into an aspirate: or e converso, by the change of an aspirate into a sibilant. No person doubts whether the Latin super is the Greek σῦπερ; or σμιλilis is sal, salt. The latter in Welsh is halen, hal. So hellyg, a willow, is in Latin salix. The Greek σπῆρα is the Latin septem, English seven. This in Persic is هفت heft or haft, which approaches the Greek σπῆρα. It has been commonly supposed, that in this case, the aspirate in Greek has been converted into an s. There are however strong reasons for believing that the change has been the reverse, and that s has been dropped, and its place supplied by an aspirate. The word seven is, beyond a question, the Shemitic שבע, whence שבת, Eng. sabbath; and the Gaelic sean, old, whence Latin senex, in Welsh hen, seems clearly to be the Ar. سنان sanna, to be old. It is then clear that in these words s is radical. It is probable however that the aspirate, in some cases, has been changed into s.

It deserves to be noticed that the radix of a word is sometimes obscured, in Greek and Latin, by the loss or change of a radical letter in the nominative case. We find in Latin nepos, in the nominative, is nepotis in the genitive; homo, honoris, &c. In these changes, I suppose the letter restored in the oblique cases to be the true radical letter. Thus adamant has been deduced by our etymologists from the Greek α negative and δαμναω, to subdue, on the supposition that the stone was named from its hardness. This is a good example of a great part of all etymological deductions; they are mere conjectures. It did not occur to the inquirer that adamas, in the nominative, becomes in the genitive adamantis; that n is radical, and that this word cannot be regularly deduced from the Greek verb. Any person, by looking into a Welsh dictionary, may see the original word.

In some words it is not easy to determine whether n before d is casual or radical. In such words as the Latin fundo, to pour, and tundo, to beat, there is reason to think the n is casual, for the preterit is formed without it, fudi, tudi. But in other words n before d seems to be radical, and the d casual; as in fundo, fundare, to found. For this word coincides with the Irish bun, foundation, and with the Shemitic בנה, banah, to build. So the English find is in Swedish finna, and in is in Danish ind.

Another fact of considerable consequence, is, the casual sound of n given to g, which produced the effect of doubling the g in Greek, and of occasioning the insertion of n before g in the Latin, as also in the Teutonic and Gothic languages. Thus we see the g is doubled in the Greek αγγελος, and we know, in this case, how the change originated; for the original word is in the Gaelic and Irish, agalla. So g is prefixed to another palatal or guttural letter in αγγελος, αγγελος, αγγελος.

A similar nasal sound of g probably introduced the n before g in lingo, to lick; linguo, to leave.

We may be confident, in all cases, that n is not radical, when it is dropped in the supine and participle, as in licum, lictus, from linguo. When n is retained in the supine and participle, there may be more reason for doubt; but in this case, the question may often be determined by the corresponding word in another language, or by some other word evidently of the same family. Thus we can have little doubt that lingo and the English lick are the same word, or that the Lat. lingua and ligula are of one family.

This casual insertion of n in words of this class must be carefully noticed by the etymologist, or he will overlook the affinity of words, which are evidently the same. We have many words in English which are written with n before a g or a k, when the ancient words in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, and some of them in the modern Danish and Swedish, are written without n. Thus sink, in Gothic is sigewan; to think, is thagkyan. It is not improbable that the Gothic word was pronounced with the sound of n or ng as in English. So also in siggwan, to sing; laggs, long. In a few instances, we find the Swedes and Danes have the word written in both ways, as thänka, tänker and tycka, tykker, to think. But in general the Germans, Danes, Swedes and Dutch write words of this sort with ng.

To show how important it is to know the true original orthography, I will mention one instance. In our mother tongue, the word to dye, or color, is written deagan; the elements or radical letters are dg. To determine whether this and the Latin tingo are the same words, we must first know whether n in tingo is radical or casual. This we cannot know with certainty, by the form of the word itself, for the n is carried through all the tenses and forms of the verb. But by looking into the Greek, we find the word written with γ, τιγγω; and this clearly proves the alliance of the word with deagan. See Dye in the Dictionary.

We have many English words, in which a d has been inserted before g, as in badge, budge, lodge, pledge, wedge. In all words, I believe, of this class, the d is casual, and the g following is the radical letter, as pledge from the French pléige; wedge from the Saxon wecg. The practice of inserting d in words of this sort seems to have originated in the necessity of some mode of preserving the English sound of g, which might otherwise be sounded as the French g before e. And it is for this reason we still retain, and ought to retain d in alledge, abridge. In like manner the Teutonic c has been changed into the sound of ch, as Sax. wacian, wæcian, to wake, to watch; Sax. thac, thatch.

There are some nations which, in many words, pronounce and write g before u or w; as in the French guerre, for war; guede, for wood; guetier, for wait; in Welsh, gwael, for wall; grain, for wain; guared, for guard, which in English is ward, Sp. guarda. In some instances, the u or w is dropped in modern writing, as in the French garenne, a warren; garde, for guard. This difference of orthography makes it difficult, in some cases, to ascertain the true radical letters.

CHANGE OF SIGNIFICATION.

Another cause of obscurity in the affinity of languages, and one that seems to have been mostly overlooked, is, the change of the primary sense of the radical verb. In most cases, this change consists in a slight deflection, or difference of application, which has obtained among different families of the same stock. In some cases, the literal sense is lost or obscured, and the figurative only is retained. The first object, in such cases, is to find the primary or literal sense, from which the various particular applications may be easily deduced. Thus, we find in Latin, libeo, libet, or habeo, lubet, is rendered, to please, to like; lubens, willing, glad, cheerful, pleased; libenter, lubenter, willingly, gladly, readily. What is the primary sense, the visible or physical action, from which the idea of willing is taken? I find, either by knowing the radical sense of willing, ready, in other cases, or by the predominant sense of the elements lb, as in Lat. labor, to slide, liber, free, &c. that the primary sense is to move, incline or advance towards an object, and hence the sense of willing, ready, prompt. Now this Latin word is the English love, German lieben, liebe. "Lubet me ire." I love to go; I am inclined to go; I go with cheerfulness; but the affinity between love and libeo has been obscured by a slight difference of application, among the Romans and the Teutonic nations.

Perhaps no person has suspected that the English words heat, hate and hest, in behest, are all radically the same word. But this is the fact. Sax. hatian, to heat, or be hot, and to hate; hætan, to heat and to call; hatan, to call, to order, to command; ge-hatan or gehatan, to grow warm, to promise, to vow; Gothic, gahaitan, to call, to promise; Dutch, heeten, to heat, to name, to call, bid or command; German, heitzen, to heat; heissen, to call; hitzen, to heat, to hoist; Swedish, hetsa, to inflame, to provoke; Danish, heder, to heat, to be called. Behest, we have from the German or Swedish dialect. Heat coincides with the Latin æstus for hæstus, which is written with s, like the German. Hate coincides with the Latin odi, osus, so written for hodi, hosus, and as the Teutonic h often represents the Latin c, as in horn, cornu, the Danish orthography heder, coincides with the Latin cito, to call. Now what is the radical sense? Most obviously to stir, agitate, rouse, raise, implying a driving or impulse; and hence in Latin æstuo, to be hot, and to rage or storm; hence to excite, and hence the sense of the Latin cito, quickly, from stirring, rousing to action. In this case hatred, as well as heat, is violent excitement. We find also in the Saxon and Gothic the sense of vowing, that is, of driving out the voice, uttering, declaring, a sense allied to calling and commanding, and to this is allied the sense of the Latin recito, to recite.

In English befall signifies to fall on, to happen to; in German the same word, befallen, has the like signification. But in Saxon gefeallan signifies to fall, to rush on, while in German gefallen signifies to please, that is, to suit, to come to one's mind, to be agreeable. The Danish gefælde has the same signification as the German.

We find by the Saxon, that the English reck, to care, and reckon, and the Latin rego, to rule, are all the same word, varied in orthography and application. To find the primary sense of reck, to care, we are then to examine the various derivative senses. And we need go no farther than to the Latin rectus and English right, the sense of which is straight, for this sense is derived from straining, stretching. Care then is a straining of the mind, a stretching towards an object, coinciding with the primary sense of attention. The primary sense of reckon is to strain out sounds, to speak, tell, relate; a sense now disused.

INTRODUCTION.

The Saxon carc, care, carcian, to care, to cark, is connected in origin with the Latin carcer, a prison; both from the sense of straining, whence holding or restraint.

To prove how the primary general sense of a word may ramify into different senses, by special appropriation of the word among separate families of men proceeding from the same stock, let us observe the different senses in which leap is used by the English, and by the nations on the continent. In English, to leap is simply to spring; as, to leap a yard; to leap over a fence. But on the continent it signifies to run. Now it will be seen that this word as used by the Germans cannot always be translated by itself, that is, by the same word, into English. Take for illustration the following passage from Luther's Version of the Scriptures. 1. Sam. xvii. 17. "Nimm für deine brüder diese epha sangen, und diese zehen brod, und laufs ins heer zu deinen brüdern." "Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and leap to the camp to thy brethren." Leap, instead of run, is good German, but bad English.* There are two other words in this passage, of which a like remark may be made. The German brod, loaves, is our bread, which admits of no plural; and sangen is our singed, which we cannot apply to parched corn.

So in some of the Teutonic languages, to warp kittens or puppies, to warp eggs, is correct language, though to our ears very odd; but this is only a particular application of the primary sense, to throw. We say to lay eggs, but to lay is to throw down.

By this comparison of the different uses and applications of a word, we are able, in most cases, to detect its original signification. And it is by this means, I apprehend, that we may arrive at a satisfactory explanation of the manner in which the same word came to have different and even opposite significations.

It is well known, for example, that the Hebrew word בָּרַךְ, is rendered, in our version of the Scriptures, both to bless and to curse. The propriety of the latter rendering is controverted by Parkhurst, who labors to prove, that in Kings and in Job, where it is rendered, to curse, it ought to be rendered, to bless; and he cites, as authorities, the ancient versions. It is true that in 1 Kings xxi. 10. 18; and in Job i. 11, and ii. 5, the seventy have rendered the word by εὐλογῶ, to bless; and other ancient versions agree with the Septuagint. But let the word be rendered by bless in the following passages. "Put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone, and his flesh, and he will bless thee to thy face." "Bless God and die." How very absurd does such a translation appear. It shows the immense importance of understanding the true theory of language, and the primary sense of radical words. Let us then endeavor to discover, if possible, the source of the difficulty in the case here mentioned. To be enabled to arrive at the primary sense, let us examine the word in the several languages, first, of the Shemitic, and then of the Japhetic stock.

Heb. בָּרַךְ To bless; to salute, or wish a blessing to.
 2. To curse; to blaspheme.
 3. To couch or bend the knee, to kneel.
 Deriv. A blessing, and the knee.
 Chaldee, בָּרַךְ To bless; to salute at meeting, and to bid farewell at parting.

2. To bend the knee.
 3. To dig; to plow; to set slips of a vine or plant for propagation.
 Talm. and Rabbin.

Deriv. The knee; a blessing; a cursing; a cion; the young of fowls.
 Syriac, ܒܪܟܬܐ To fall on the knees; to fall or bow down. Judg. v. 27.

2. To issue or proceed from. Math. xv. 19.
 3. To bless.
 Samaritan, ܒܪܟܬܐ To bless.

Ethiopic, ቢረከ To bless. Deriv. the knee.

Arabic, برك To bend the knee; to fall on the breast, as a camel.
 2. To be firm, or fixed.

3. To rain violently; to pour forth rain, as the clouds. Gr. βροχω.
 4. To detract from; to traduce; to reproach or pursue with reproaches; to revile.

5. To bless; to pray for a blessing on; to prosper; to be blessed.
 6. To hasten; to rush, as on an enemy; to assail.

Deriv. The breast; the bason of a fountain; a fish pond, or receptacle of water, as in Heb. and Ch.: also increase; abundance; constancy; splendor; a flash of light.

In the latter sense, usually from برك Heb. and Ch. בָּרַךְ.

The Arabic word supplies us with the certain means of determining the radical sense; for among other significations, it has the sense of pouring forth rain; and this is precisely the Greek βροχω. The primary sense then is to send, throw, or drive, in a transitive sense; or in an intransitive sense, to rush, to break forth.

To bless and to curse have the same radical sense, which is, to send or pour out words, to drive or to strain out the voice, precisely as in the Latin appello, from pello, whence peal, as of thunder or of a bell. The two senses spring from the appropriation of loud words to express particular acts. This depends on usage, like all other particular applications of one general signification. The sense in Scripture is to utter words either in a good or bad sense; to bless, to salute, or to rail, to scold, to reproach; and this very word is probably the root of reproach, as it certainly is of the Latin precor, used, like the Shemitic word, in both senses, praying and cursing, or deprecating.* It is also the same word as the English pray, It. pregare, L. precor, the same as preach, D. preeken, W. pregethu. To the same family belong the Gr. βραχω, βροχω, βροχισμα, to bray, to roar, to low, Lat. rugio. Here we see that bray is the same word, applied to the voice of the ass and to breaking in a mortar, and both are radically the same word as break.

The sense of kneeling, if radical, is to throw, and if from the noun, the sense of the noun is a throwing, a bending.

The Chaldee sense of digging, if radical, is from thrusting in an instrument, or breaking the ground; but perhaps it is a sense derived from the name of a shoot or cion, and in reality, to set a shoot, to plant.

The Syriac use of this word in Matthew xv. 19, is intransitive, to issue, to shoot or break forth. So in Arabic, to rush on, to assault. The sense of firmness in Arabic is from setting, throwing down, as in kneeling; and hence the sense of breast, the fixed, firm part.

That this word has the sense both of blessing and of cursing or reproaching, we have demonstrative evidence in the Welsh language. Rhig, in Welsh, is בָּרַךְ, without the prefix. It signifies a sending out; utterance; a gift or present; a consigning; a ban, a curse or imprecation. Rhegu, to give; to consign; to curse. From rhig is formed preg, a greeting, or salutation, [the very Hebrew and Chaldee word.] pregethu, a sermon, and pregethu, to preach. Here we have not only the origin of preach, but another important fact, that preg, and of course בָּרַךְ, is a compound word, composed of a prefix, p or b, and rhig. But this is not all; the Welsh greg, a cackling, gregar, to cackle, is formed with the prefix g on this same rhig. [Dan. krage, a crow.]

In Welsh, bregu signifies to break; brég, a breach, a rupture. This Owen deduces from bar, but no doubt erroneously. It is from rhegu, and there is some reason to think that break is from בָּרַךְ, rather than from שָׁרַף, but probably both are from one radix, with different prefixes.

We observe one prominent sense of the Arabic برك baraka, is to rain violently; to pour forth water, as clouds. This is precisely the Greek βροχω; a word found in all the Teutonic and Gothic languages, but written either with or without its prefix.

Saxon, ragn or regn, rain; regnan, to rain.
 Dutch, regen, rain; regenen, beregenen, to rain upon.
 German, regen, rain; regnen, to rain; beregnen, to rain on.
 Swedish, regna, to rain.
 Danish, regn, rain; regner, to rain.
 Saxon, racu, rain; Cimbric, raekia, id.

Here we find that the English rain, is from the same root as the Welsh rhég, rhegu, and the Shemitic בָּרַךְ.

Pursuing the inquiry further, we find that the Saxon recan, or reccan, [W. rhegu,] signifies to speak, to tell, to relate, to reckon, the primary sense of which last is to speak or tell; also, to rule, which shows this to be the Latin rego; also to care, which is the English reck. That this is the same word as rain, we know from the Danish, in which language, regner signifies both to rain and to reckon, to tell, to count or compute. In the German, the words are written a little differently; rechnen, to reckon, and regnen, to rain. So in Dutch, rekenen and regenen; but this is a fact by no means uncommon.

Here we find that the English reckon and reck, and the Latin rego, are the same word. The primary sense is to strain, to reach, to stretch. Care is a stretching of the mind, like attention, from the Latin tendo, and restraint is the radical sense of governing. Hence rectus, right, that is, straight, stretched.

Hence we find that rain and the Latin regnum, reign, are radically the same word.

Now in Saxon racan, or ræcan, is the English reach, to stretch or extend, from the same root, and probably reek, Saxon recan, reocan, to fume or smoke; for this is, to send off.

I might have mentioned before, that the Chaldee בִּרְכָּה, a cion or branch, is precisely the Celtic word for arm; Irish braic, or raigh; Welsh braic; whence the Greek βραχιον, the Latin brachium, whence the Spanish brazo, whence the French bras, whence the English brace. The arm is a shoot, a branch, and branch is from this root or one of the family, n being casual; branch for brach.

* He walks, he leaps, he runs.—Cowper.

INTRODUCTION.

On this word, let it be further observed, or on פִּרַק or פִּרְק, if radically different, are formed, with the prefix s, the German sprechen, to speak, sprache, speech; Dutch spreken, spraak; Swedish språka, språk; Danish sprog, speech; and Swedish spricka, to break; Danish sprekker. The same word with n casual is seen in spring, the breaking or opening of the winter; and here we see the origin of the marine phrase, to spring a mast, Danish springer, to burst, crack or spring. This in Swedish is written without n, spricka, to break, burst, split; but a noun of this family has n, springa, a crack, and spring, a spring, a running.

Now let us attend to other Shemitic words consisting of cognate elements. Chaldee, פִּרַק To rub or scrape; to rub out or tread out, as grain from the ear or sheaf; Latin frico, frio.

2. To collect and bind, as sheaves; perhaps English, to rake.
3. To break or break down.
4. To question; to doubt. In Saxon and Gothic fragnan, fragan, signifies to ask.

Deriv. Froward; perverse. Prov. ii. 12. So in English refractory. This verb is not in the Hebrew; but there are two derivatives, one signifying the inner veil of the temple; so called probably from its use in breaking, that is, interrupting access, or separation, like diaphragm in English. The other derivative is rendered rigor, or cruelty; that which strains, oppresses, breaks down, or rakes, harasses.

With this verb coincides the Irish bracaim, to break, to harrow, that is, to rake.

Syr. פִּרַק To rub, so rendered, Luke vi. 1. Lat. frico. A derivative signifies to comminute.

Deriv. Distortion; winding; twisting. Let this be noted.

Ar. فَرِكَ To rub, Lat. frico.

2. To hate, as a husband or wife; to be languid, or relaxed.

Deriv. Laxity; frangibility; friability.

Heb. פִּרַק To break, burst, or rend; to break off; to separate.

Deriv. A breaking or parting of a road.

Ch. פִּרַק To break.

2. To redeem, that is, to free, separate or deliver.
3. To explain, as a doubtful question.

Deriv. One who ransoms or delivers; a rupture; the neck or its jointure; a joint of the fingers, &c.; the ankle; the joint of a reed; a chapter, or section of a book; explanation; exposition. פִּרַק, a rupture, coinciding with the English broke.

Syr. פִּרַק To redeem.

2. To depart; to remove; to separate.

Deriv. A recess, or withdrawing; separation; liberation; redemption; safety; vertebra.

Sam. The same as the Syriac verb.

Ar. فَرِكَ to separate; to divide; to withdraw; to disperse, [qu. Lat. spargo]; to lay open; to disclose; to cast out; to immerse.

Deriv. Separation; distinction; distance; interval; dispersion; aurora, as we say, the break of day; also, a garment reaching to the middle of the thigh, qu. frock; also breech.

I have placed these two words together, because I am convinced they are both of one family, or formed on the same radical word. The latter coincides exactly with the Latin frango, fregi, fractum, for n in frango, is undoubtedly casual. Now in Welsh bregu, to break, would seem to be directly connected with פִּרַק, yet doubtless bregu is the English break, the German brechen, the Dutch breken, &c. In truth, the three words פִּרַק, פִּרַק and פִּרַק are probably all from one primitive root, formed with different prefixes, or rather with the same prefix differently written; the different words bearing appropriate senses, among different tribes of men.

We observe in the Chaldee word the sense of questioning. Perhaps this may be the Gothic fragan, to ask, and if so, it coincides with the Latin rogo, the latter without the prefix. In the sense of break, we find, in the Greek, πρηνος, without a prefix.

Most of the significations of these verbs are too obvious to need illustration. But we find in the Syriac the sense of distortion, a sense which at first appears to be remote from that of breaking or bursting asunder. But this is probably the primary sense, to strain, to stretch, a sense we retain in the phrase, to break upon the wheel, and by dropping the prefix, we have the precise word in the verb, to rack.

Now if this is the genuine sense, we find it gives the English wreck and wrack, the Danish vrag, Sw. vrak, a wreck. In Saxon, wracan, wreacan, is the English wreck, that is, to drive, or throw on; wrace, is an exile, a wretch. In Dan. vrag signifies to reject; Sw. vråka, to throw away; all implying a driving force, and that wreck is connected with break is probable for another reason, that the Latin fractus, frango, forms a constituent part of naufragium, the English shipwreck, which in Danish is simply vrag.

Now if straining, distortion, is one of the senses of this root, the English wring, wrong, Danish wrang, Sw. wrång, may be deduced from it, for undoubtedly n is not radical in these words. The Dutch have wringen, but the German drops the first letter and has ringen, both to twist or wind and to ring or sound; the latter sense from straining or throwing, as in other cases. Without n, wring would be wrig, and wrong, wrog; wrang, wrag, Dan. wrag.

In Greek, πρηνος is a blanket or coverlet, and connected with πρηνος; that is, a spread, from stretching, or throwing over.

We find also among the Chaldee derivatives the sense of a neck, and a joint. Now we find this word in Irish, braigh, the neck; in Greek, without the prefix, πρηνος, the spine of the back, Saxon, hracca, English, the rack, and from the Greek, the rickets, from distortion.

Coinciding with the Greek πρηνος, to break, we find in Welsh rhogaw, to rend, and coinciding with πρηνος, a rock, a crag, Welsh, craig, and connected with these, the Saxon hracod, English ragged, that is, broken; evidently the participle of a verb of this family.

Hence we find the senses of distortion and breaking connected in this root, in a great variety of instances.

The Shemitic פִּרַק, to lighten, to shine or flash, is one of this family. The sense is to shoot or dart, to throw, as in all like cases. And under this root, the Arabic has the sense, to adorn, as a female; to make bright or shining; which gives the English prank and prink, D. pragt, G. pracht. Prance is of the same family, from leaping, starting, darting up.

In Greek πρηνος, short, stands in the Lexicons as a primary word or root. But this is from the root of break, which is lost in Greek, unless in πρηνος, without the prefix. From πρηνος, or the root of this word, the French language has abreger, to abridge, and what is less obvious, but equally certain, is, that from the same root the Latin has brevis, by sinking the palatal letter, as we do in bow, from bugan, and in lay, from legan; so that abridge and abbreviate, brief, are from one root.

It should have been before mentioned that the Latin refractor, signifies to resist, to strive against, to deny, whence refractory; a sense that demonstrates the primary sense to be to strain, urge, press; and refraction, in optics, is a breaking of the direct course of rays of light by turning them; a sense coinciding with that of distortion.

We see then that one predominant sense of break, is, to strain, to distort. Let us now examine some of the biliteral roots in rg and rk, which, if b is a prefix, must be the primary elements of all the words above mentioned.

Ch. פִּרַק To desire, to long for. This is the Greek πρηνος, and English to reach; for desire is expressed by reaching forward, stretching the mind towards the object. So in Latin appeto, and expeto, from peto, to move towards. This coincides nearly with the Latin rogo, to ask, and the Goth. fragnan, Sax. fragan.

Syr. פִּרַק; To desire; and with olaph prefixed, פִּרַק; to desire, or long; also to wet or moisten; also פִּרַק; to moisten—Latin riro, irrigo, to irrigate.

Deriv. Tender, soft, fresh, from moisture or greenness. Qu. Lat. recens, a derivative.

Here desire and irrigation are both from one root; desire is a reaching forward, and irrigation is a spreading of water.

This root, in Hebrew פִּרַק, signifies to weave, or connect as in texture and net work; but the primary sense is to stretch or strain.

In Arabic, the same verb فَرِكَ signifies to emit an agreeable smell; to breathe fragrance; radically to throw or send out; to eject; a mere modification of the same sense. This is the Latin fragro, whence fragrant, with a prefix; but according exactly with the English reek.

פִּרַק in Ch. Heb. Syr. and Sam., signifies to prolong, to extend. In Ar. as in Heb. in Hiph. to delay, or retard; that is, to draw out in time.

פִּרַק in Heb. has been differently interpreted; indeed, it has been rendered by words of directly contrary signification. The more modern interpreters, says Castle, render it, to split, divide, separate, or break; the ancient interpreters rendered it, to stiffen, to make rigid or rough, to wrinkle or corrugate. Castle and Parkhurst, however, agree in rendering it, in some passages, to quiet, still, allay. Jer. xlvii. 6. l. 34. In Job vii. 6. our translators have rendered it broken, my skin is broken, [rough, or rigid.] In Job. xxvi. 12. it is rendered by divide. "He divideth the sea by his power." In Vanderhooght's Bible it is in this place rendered by commovet—He agitates the sea. The Seventy render it by καταρυσσιν, he stilled; and this is the sense which Parkhurst gives it.

In Isaiah li. 15, and Jer. xxxi. 35, it is rendered in our version by divide. "But I am the Lord thy God, that divided the sea, whose waves roared."

In Vanderhooght's Bible it is rendered in Isaiah li. 15, "I am Jehovah thy God, qui commovens mare, ut perstrepat fluctus ejus." In Jer. xxxi. 35, commovens mare, ut tumultuenter fluctus—agitating or moving the sea, that the waves roar, or may roar. The passage in Isaiah is rendered by the seventy, οτι ο θεος σου, ο καταρυσσων την θαλασσαν, και ηχησεν τα νεματα αυτης, agitating the sea and causing its waves to roar and resound. In the French translation, the passage in Isaiah is "qui fend la mer, et ses flots bruient." [I] who divide the sea and the waves roar. In Jeremiah the passage is "qui agite la mer et les flots en bruient." Who agitates the sea and therefore the waves roar. In Italian, the passage in Isaiah is rendered "che muove il mare, e le sue onde romoreggiano." In Jeremiah, "che commuove il mare, onde le sue onde romoreggiano." Who moveth the sea, wherefore its waves roar, or become tumultuous.

INTRODUCTION.

These different renderings show the importance of understanding the literal or primary sense of words; for whatever may be the real sense in the passages above mentioned, it cannot be to divide. If we are given to vau in the following word, its usual sense of and, it is difficult to make sense of the word רָנַע, by translating it, he stilleth: he stilleth the sea and its waves are tumultuous, or he stilleth the sea that the waves may roar or be agitated! This will not answer. The more rational version would be, he roughens the sea, and its waters roar, or he drives, impels it into agitation. In Ethiopic, the same word signifies to coagulate, to freeze, to become rigid; and this is undoubtedly the Latin rigeo, and with a prefix, frigeo, and this signification is perhaps allied to Lat. rugo, to wrinkle; for as a general rule, the radical sense of wrinkle is to draw, as in contract, contraho, and this seems to be the sense of rigeo. Both these words are allied to rough, which is from breaking or wrinkling. This sense would perhaps well suit the context in these two passages, as it would also that in Job vii. 5: My skin is rough.

Now in Arabic, the general signification of رָנַע is to return, to repeat, to withdraw, which may be from drawing back; a different application of the original sense, to strain, stretch, or extend.

The root רָנַע in Chaldee signifies to spit, and this is probably the Latin ructo, somewhat varied in application. The same verb in Arabic رَاقَ signifies to drive off, to reject, to shoot or grow long as teeth, to strain, purify or make clear as wine; precisely the English to rack; also to spread, and to pour out. Hebrew רָקַע, to empty, to draw out, to attenuate or make thin, and as a noun, spittle; Syriac, to spit, to draw out, to attenuate; Samaritan, to pour out, to draw out, to extend; Ethiopic, to be fine, slender, or thin; Arabic, to be soft, tender, thin. The verb רָקַע has a like signification, and is perhaps from the same original root. Hebrew רָקַע, to spread, stretch, extend. But, says Castle, all the ancient interpreters rendered the word, to ordain, establish, make firm; to strike, to beat, as plates of metal. But the sense is to stretch, to spread, and the beating is only the means of extending. Hence רָקַע the firmament, which agrees well with Lat. regio, an extent; in Hebrew, properly an expanse. And to reconcile the ancient and modern interpretations of this word, let it be remembered that strength and firmness are usually or always from stretching, tension.

Now let us hear Ainsworth on the word regio. "Regio a rego quod prorsusquam provincie fierent, regiones sub regibus erant atque ab his regebantur." How much more natural is it to deduce regio from the primary sense of rego, which is to stretch, to strain, to extend! Regio is an extent, a word of indefinite signification.

In Chaldee and Arabic this verb signifies to mend, to repair, to make whole, from extending spreading over or making strong. See the root רָנַע infra.

We observe that רָנַע and רָקַע agree in original signification, with the English reach, on the root of which or some of its derivatives was formed stretch. That רָנַע, רָקַע, and רָקַע were formed on any of the foregoing biliteral roots we may not be able to affirm; but it is certain from the Welsh that the first consonant of the triliteral root is a prefix, and it is certain from the Shemitic languages that the primary sense is the same in the biliteral and triliteral roots, or that all the applications or particular significations may readily be deduced from one general signification.

To illustrate this subject more fully, let us attend to the various applications of some other Shemitic words of extensive use.

רָנַע.

Heb. רָנַע To create. This, by most lexicographers, is given as the first signification, in all the Shemitic languages. Parkhurst says, to create; to produce into being. Gen. i. 1.

2. To form, by accretion or concretion of matter. Gen. i. 21.
3. In Hiph. To make fat; to fatten or batten. 1 Sam. ii. 29.
4. To do or perform something wonderful. Num. xvi. 30.
5. In Niph. To be renewed. In Kal, to renew, in a spiritual sense. Ps. li. 12.

Castle says,

1. To create from nothing, or to produce something new or excellent from another thing. Gen. i. Is. xlii. 5.
2. In Niph. To be renewed or re-created. Is. xlviii. 7. Ps. cii. 19.
3. To cut off; to take away; to bear away, or remove; also to select; to prepare. Josh. xvii. 15. 18. Ezek. xxiii. 47.

Gesenius says,

1. Strictly, to hew, to hew out. [Ar. to cut, to cut out, to plane.]
2. To form; to make; to produce. Ar. بَرَأَ The order of significations is, as in the Ar. خَلَقَ galaka, to be smooth, to make smooth. 2.

To plane. 3. To form, make. Gen. i. 1. 21. 27.

1. Niph. passive of Kal. No. 2. Gen. ii. 4.
2. To be born. Ezek. xxi. 30. Ps. cii. 18.

Pi. בָּרָא, the verb differently pointed, to hew, to cut down. Josh. xvii. 15. 18.

2. To cut down with the sword; to kill. Ez. xxiii. 47.

3. To make fat. 1 Sam. ii. 29.

Thus far the Hebrew.

Chal. בָּרָא To create. Gen. i. 1.

2. To cut off. Is. xl. 20.

3. To make fat; to grow sound or strong. Talm.

Deriv. Fat; whole; sound; strong.

Castle.

Syr. ܒܪܐ To create. Gen. i. 1. Mark xiii. 19.

2. To remove to a distance, and Deriv. distance, distant.

Castle.

Sam. ܒܪܐ To create. Gen. i. 22. Deut. iv. 32.

Castle.

Ar. بَرَأَ

To create. Job xxxviii. 7. [qu. 4 and 6.]

2. To be free, or guiltless, not obnoxious to punishment. Num. v. 28.

31. and xxxii. 22. Rom. vii. 6.

3. To free; to absolve, from a crime; to liberate; to dismiss; to justify.

Ex. xx. 7. Num. xiv. 18.

4. To escape; to forsake.

5. To recover from disease; to be healed; to restore to health. Lev. xiii

18. Josh. v. 8. Math. iv. 23.

6. To cleanse; to free from impurities.

7. To abstain from.

Deriv. Creator; free; unobnoxious; clean; empty.

Ar. بَرَأَ

To create.

2. To cut off; to hew or pare.

3. To separate; to distinguish.

4. To make thin.

5. To oppose; to strive; to resist.

6. To provoke; to boast, or make a parade.

7. To distribute; to disperse.

Castle.

According to Gesenius, the primary sense of this verb is to hew, to cut out, and thus to make smooth, and thus to create; and he deduces these senses in the same order, as he does those of the Arabic verb, which gives the word like. But there is no ground for this opinion; and doubtless the verb originated before the use of edge tools.

The predominant senses of this word, are, to separate, to free, to remove; as we see by the Arabic and Syriac.

Now hewing is indeed separating, and we have the English word pare from this root; but we must seek for a signification which is more general than that of paring, or we shall not be able to account for the sense of making fat, sound, entire, and strong, nor for that of being born.

The truth undoubtedly is, this word is of the same family with the English bear, the Latin pario, and the radical sense is to throw, to thrust, to send, to drive, to extend; hence to throw out, to produce, as applied to the birth of children or of the world. To throw or drive, is the primary sense of separation and division, that is, to drive off. The English word deal, when traced to its root, presents the same fact. See Deal. To create, is to produce or bring forth, the same sense as that of birth, applied to a different object. The sense of hewing and paring is from driving off, separation. In Syriac, we observe the general application, in removal, or departure to a distance. The sense of fattening is derivative, and allied to that of healing or making whole, sound, strong, in the Arabic, that is, preparing, bringing to a good state, or from tension, the usual primary sense of strength and power.

To obtain a more full and satisfactory view of this subject, let us attend to the same word in the modern languages of Europe.

LATIN.

Paro, to prepare, make ready, procure, design, &c. The radical sense of paro is probably the same as in the Shemitic languages; to produce, to bring forward. So also ready implies an advancing, and so does promptness. But the various ways of preparing a thing for use naturally give to the word, in process of time, a variety of particular significations; each of which results in bringing the thing to the state desired. The compounds of paro, are apparo, to prepare, to furnish, accouter or set out; comparo, to prepare or procure, to make equal, to compare, to join, to dress or make ready; præparo, to prepare; reparo, to repair, to create anew, to regain, to compensate; separo, to separate. Let the Latin uses of this word be compared with the same Hebrew word in Joshua xvii. 15, where it is rendered cut down. "Ascend to the wood country and cut down for thyself;" Septuagint, ἀναβαρὶς σταυρῶ, clear for thyself. This is one mode of preparation for use. In Ezek. xxi. 19, it is rendered choose. Septuagint, διατάξας, appoint.

ITALIAN.

Parare, to prepare; to garnish; to adorn; to propose an occasion; to parry, or ward off, as a blow; to defend; to cover from or shelter; to repair;

Pair, a peer, an equal; paire, a pair; apparier, to pair, to match.

S'emparrer, to seize, to invade.

Reparer, to repair.

Separer, to separate.

ARMORIC.

Para, to dress, to trim, to stop, to parry, to prepare.

RUSSIAN.

Uberayu, to put in order, to adjust, to mow or reap, to cut, to dress as the hair. This word has the common prefix u.

PERSIC.

پريدن poridan, to cut off.

WELSH.

Par, something contiguous, or that is in continuity; a state of readiness or preparedness; a pair or couple; a fellow, match.

Par, a cause; the essence, germ or seed of a thing; a spear.

Para, to continue, to endure, to persevere.

Parad, a causing; parai, that causes to be.

Parawd, prepared, ready; parodi, to prepare.

That all the foregoing words in the present European languages, [and several others might have been added,] are formed from one stock or radix, coinciding with the Latin paro, is a fact that admits of no question. The only doubt respecting the correctness of the whole preceding statement, is, whether the Latin paro is radically the same as the oriental פָּרָא; and with regard to this point, I should suppose the evidence to be convincing. Indeed there is good reason to believe that the oriental verbs פָּרָא, פָּרַד, פָּרַח, and פָּרַח, are all formed from one primitive radix. Certain it is that the English bear comprehends both the Latin fero and pario, and the latter corresponds nearly with פָּרָא and Eth. ḫ. ḫ. ḫ. to bear.

But admitting only what is certain, that all the foregoing European words are from one radix, we are then to seek for a primary meaning from which may be deduced the following significations; Lat. to prepare; Ital. to adorn, to parry, to stop, to defend, to repair, to learn; Span. to prepare, to stop, to lay or stake as a wager, a pair or couple; Port. to stop, to confine upon or be contiguous, to drive or aim at, to parry, to pare; Fr. to deck, to parry, to stop, to pare; Arm. to dress, to prepare, to parry; Russ. to adjust, to dress, to mow or reap; Welsh, preparedness, contiguity, a pair, a cause, to continue or endure; and several other significations.

The various significations result from throwing, sending, driving. To separate or remove is to drive or force apart; hence to parry, and hence to defend. Separation implies extension, a drawing out in length or time; hence the Portuguese senses of confining upon, reaching to the limit. This gives the sense of par, equal, that is, of the same extent, and hence coming to, and suiting, as in Latin convenio.

Here let it be observed that admitting the word par, equal, to belong to this family, as in the Welsh, we have strong reason to believe that the Shemitic פָּרָא, to join, or fit together, to associate, whence as a noun, an associate, is formed from the same root, or פָּרָא; for in the Saxon, we find not only fera, but gefera, a companion, fellow or peer; gefera, answering precisely to the oriental word.

The sense of betting is from throwing down, as we say, to lay a wager. The sense of stopping is from setting, fixing, or from parrying. The sense of adorning is from putting on, which is from sending, or from extension, enlargement, as we say, to set off, and hence it is allied to the sense of show, display, parade. Preparation is from producing, bringing forward, or adjusting, making right; and often implies advancing, like ready, prompt, and the latter word, prompt, from promo, to bring forth, affords a good illustration of the words derived from paro.

The senses of cutting off, paring, and the like, require no explanation.

The Italian, disparare, and the Spanish and Portuguese, disparar, to discharge fire arms, present the original sense of the root, to send or drive. This sense gives that of the Welsh par, a spear, as well as a cause, or that which impels. A spear is a shoot, from the sense of thrusting; and our word spear is probably formed from the root of bar and Welsh ber, a spit, a pike, a lance, a spear, Lat. veru. Now in Chaldee, a bar is פָּרָא from פָּרַח, to pass, a verb which is probably of the same family with פָּרָא. It is further to be observed that in Italian, bar is written both barra and sbarra.

It is observed above that פָּרָא is the English bear and the Latin pario; but pario would seem to be the Hebrew פָּרָא, parah, to be fruitful, to bear fruit, applied to plants and animals. But this word seems to denote producing in general, rather than the production of children. However this may be, it is certain that bear in English, as well as in Saxon, expresses the sense of both pario and fero in Latin. The Latin fero, and the Greek φορέω, signify both to carry and to produce, as young or fruit. Pario, does not. So in the Gothic, bairan is to carry, gabairan is to carry and to produce young. In German, föhren is to carry, and gebären, to bring forth, to bear a child. In Dutch, beuren is to lift; voeren, to carry; and baaren, to bring forth, as children, to bear, to beget, to cause, Danish, bærer, to carry, to support, and to yield or produce. Sw. bära, to carry; barn, a son. Irish, beirim, to bear or bring forth, and to tell or relate, like the Latin fero, whence Fr. parler, to speak.

INTRODUCTION.

It appears then that the English bear and the Saxon from which we have received it, and the Gothic and the Danish corresponding words unite, in the same orthography, the senses of two words of different orthography in other languages. I have found other examples of a similar kind. There is therefore solid ground to believe that all these words are from one primitive root; the different modes of writing the word, and the several appropriations having originated in different families of the great races of men, before languages were reduced to writing; and when they came to be written, each word was written according to its usual pronunciation, and defined according to its use in each family. And by the intermixture of tribes, two or three derivatives of the same stock might have become a part of the same national language. Unquestionably the Greek $\phi\epsilon\omega$, and $\phi\epsilon\rho\omega$, are branches of the same stock.

We have, in the modern languages, decisive evidence that different verbs may have, and in fact have a common radix. Thus in English list and lust, are different modes of writing the same word; both are united in the other Teutonic dialects. So in Latin libet and lubet; and similar instances I have found in almost every language which I have examined.

The Latin pareo, to appear, to come to light, if not a compound word, may be of this family. Paries, a wall, if primarily a partition wall, is of the same stock. Per, belongs to this family, as its signification is passing. The Saxon faran, to fare, Gr. $\rho\epsilon\rho\omega\mu\alpha\iota$, seems to be from one branch of this stock, probably $\phi\epsilon\rho$. See the word pass in the Dictionary, in the derivative senses of which there are some resemblances to those of $\phi\epsilon\rho$.

This verb, says Lowth, means to cover, to cover sin, and so to expiate; and it is never used in the sense of breaking or dissolving a covenant, though that notion occurs so often in the Scriptures; nor can it be forced into this sense, but by a great deal of far fetched reasoning. See Isaiah xxviii. 18. Lowth on Isaiah. Prelim. Diss.

כִּסֵּר , says Castle, "texuit, operuit, Anglice, to cover; per metathesis, $\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha\theta\epsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$, peculiariter bitumine, sive glutinosa aliqua materia obdixit; pica-vit." Gen. vi. 14.

Parkhurst gives to this verb the sense of covering or overspreading, as primary; and deduces from it the Greek $\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha\theta\epsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$, and English cover and coffer. He however admits that in Isaiah xxviii. 18, it signifies, to annul, as a covenant. He also considers the sense of atonement or expiation to be radically that of covering.

Gesenius agrees with the English Lexicographers, in assigning to this verb the primary sense of covering or overlaying, as in Gen. vi. 14. He admits that this word has the sense, in Isaiah xxviii. 18, of blotting out, obliterating. But he gives to it the sense of forgiving, in some passages, in which our version has that of purging away. Ps. lxxv. 3, and lxxix. 9. In these passages, Castle renders the word, to be merciful or propitious.

In all these authors, there is, I conceive, a radical mistake, in supposing the primary sense to be to cover, and in the opinion that this Hebrew word is the English verb to cover. A still greater mistake is in the supposition of Castle and Parkhurst, that this, by a metathesis, gives the Greek $\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha\theta\epsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$.

The English word cover comes to us through the French couverir, from the Italian coprire, a contraction of the Latin co-operio, whence co-opertus, Italian coperto, covered, Eng. covert. The Latin aperio, is to open, and operio, is to cover, both from pario, or one of the roots in Br, which has just been explained. The root in these words is per or par, and the sense is varied by prefixes; perhaps ad-pario or ab-pario and ob-pario. Now cover can have no connection with כִּסֵּר , unless this latter word is a compound, with כ for a prefix. This may be the fact, but the connection, even in that case, is very remote.

Let us see if we can gain any light upon the subject of the primary sense of כִּסֵּר from the cognate languages.

Chaldee, כִּסֵּר To deny, to reject. Prov. xxx. 9.

2. To wipe; "She eateth and wipeth her mouth." Prov. xxx. 20.

3. To wash or cleanse. Matt. xxvii. 24.

Castle.

Syriac, ܕܢܝܐ To deny. Gen. xviii. 15. Luke xii. 9.

2. To wipe, to wipe away, to disannul, to abolish. Prov. xxx. 20. Is. xxviii. 18.

Castle.

Arabic, كسر To deny; to disbelieve; to be an infidel; to be impious; to blaspheme. Acts iii. 13, 14. 2 Pet. ii. 1. 5. Jude 15.

2. To cover; to conceal.

3. To expiate; to make expiation for one, and free him from crime.

Castle.

Now the senses of the Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic, to deny, to reject, to disannul, to wipe, wash, or to cleanse by these acts, cannot be deduced from covering.

In Hebrew, the word has the sense of covering, as the ark, with bitumen or pitch, in Gen. vi. 14; that is, to smear, or pay over, as our seamen now express it. But it should be considered that the sense of covering is rarely or never primary; it is usually, from the sense of putting on, which is from the sense of throwing or pressing, or it is from overspreading, which is a spreading, stretching or throwing over; hence the derivative senses of covering and hiding. These latter senses are sometimes derived from others; but these are the most general. And in this passage of Genesis, the literal sense is probably to put on, or to rub or spread over, a sense which coincides with that of the Chaldee and Syriac, Prov. xxx. 20, though differently applied.

The real original sense of this Shemitic verb is to remove, to separate, by thrusting away or driving off. Hence its application, in the Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic, to denial, the rejection of God or truth. To deny or reject, is to thrust away. Hence from the Arabic, casser, an infidel, one who denies and rejects the Mohammedan religion; hence Caffraria, the southern part of Africa, the country of infidels; so called by the followers of Mohammed, just as the christians gave the name of paganis, to the inhabitants of villages, [pagus.] who rejected the christian religion.

This signification explains the Hebrew uses of this word. Its literal sense is applied to the cleansing or purification of sacred things, as the altar. Lev. xvi. 18. In a spiritual sense, to the purification of the soul, a type of the purification by the blood of Christ; hence it is rendered atonement, or expiation. Hence probably the sense of appeasing, Gen. xxxii. 21. Prov. xvi. 14, though this may be from removing, or smoothing.

The sense of forgiveness is from thrusting away or giving back, precisely as in the modern languages; Lat. remitto, to send back or away; forgive, to give back or away: pardon, in French, Spanish, and Italian, has a like sense, which is more clearly exhibited by the Dutch vergeeren, German vergeben; ver being the English far, to give far, to give away, hence, to reject, and remember no more. The sense of give and of the French donner, is nearly the same as that of כִּסֵּר . To give, is to send, to cause to pass; and so of donner.

Now it is a question of some moment whether the opinion that כִּסֵּר is the same as the English cover, has not inclined lexicographers and commentators to render it by this word, in several passages, where the true sense is to forgive, or to purify by cleansing from sin.

However this may be, the interpretation given above will fully disprove Lowth's assertion, that this word is never used in the sense of breaking or disannulling a covenant. So confident is the learned Bishop on this point that he ventures to call in question the reading, Isaiah xxviii. 18; and to suppose the true word to be חָסַר from חָסַר to break. With respect to the reading I shall offer no opinion; but if the present reading is correct, I am confident that no word in the Hebrew language is better fitted to express the sense. Your covenant with death shall be ripped away, abolished, or as in the version, disannulled. And so is the rendering in the Syriac.

If כִּסֵּר is a compound word and the first letter a prefix, it may be from the same root as the Arabic كسر gafara, whose signification is to cover. But the primary sense is to throw or put on. It signifies also to forgive, but to forgive is to send back or away, remitto, and not to cover. And I apprehend that for want of knowing the primary sense of such verbs, the word cover has been often substituted for forgive, in the translating of this verb.

כָּל

No. 1. Heb. כָּל kol To hold, to contain; Sw. hålla. כָּלֵל To hold, to sustain, to maintain, to comprehend.

Ch. כָּל To measure, that is, to ascertain the contents, or to stretch, and comprehend the whole.

Pah. To feed, to nourish. See אָכַל .

Deriv. A measure; also, custom, rite, manner, probably from holding or continued practice.

Syr. In Aph. To measure. Deriv. A measure.

Eth. ከፊት To follow; to go behind; Gr. $\alpha\sigma\lambda\omicron\upsilon\sigma\iota\omega$; that is, to hold to, or to press after.

Deriv. The hinder part; the poop of a ship; behind. French, cul.

No. 2. Heb. כָּלֵל To finish; to complete; to make perfect. Gr. $\mu\alpha\lambda\omicron\varsigma$. כָּל all; the whole; Gr. $\alpha\lambda\omicron\varsigma$, Eng. all, by the loss of the first letter; but in Welsh, holl, or oll; and in Saxon al, æl and geall.

Ch. כָּלֵל To crown; to adorn

Pih. To perfect; to complete; to comprehend; to embrace.

Deriv. Comprehending; universality; a general rule, &c.

Syr. ܕܢܝܐ To crown. Deriv. a crown; all; every one.

Sam. כָּלֵל As the Chaldee.

Eth. ከፊት The same; also, to cover.

Ar. كس To be weary or dull; to be languid; to tire: also, to crown; to shine.

Deriv. All; dullness; heaviness.

No. 3. Heb. כָּלֵל To hold; to restrain; to shut or confine; to check; Gr. $\mu\alpha\lambda\omicron\varsigma$; Sw. hålla.

* In this deduction of cover from the Latin, I am supported by Lunier, the ablest French etymologist, whose works I have seen.

INTRODUCTION.

Deriv. A place of confinement; Lat. caula.

Ch. כָּלַה, כָּלָה, כָּלָה To hold; to restrain; also, to trust; to confide in, or rely on; to hope. (See No. 6.) Also, to finish; to perfect; also, to consume; to cause to fail.

In Aph. To call; to cry out; to thunder; Gr. καλεω; Lat. calo; W. galw; Eng. to call; Lat. gallus, from crowing.

Syr. כָּלַ To hold; to restrain; to forbid; to deny.

Deriv. all; a cork, bar or bolt.

Sam. כָּלַ To hold, or restrain.

Eth. ከለክ To hold, restrain, or prohibit.

Deriv. Lat. alius; a fellow, or companion.

Ar. كَس To keep; to preserve; to turn the face towards a thing and look repeatedly. So in English, to behold. Also, to come to the end, as of life; also, to feed, to devour food; also, to abound in pasture; also, to hinder, or detain; also, to look attentively; also, to sprout; also, to take upon a pledge, or upon trust; supra, Chaldee. (See No. 6.)

No. 4. Heb. כָּלַה To finish; to consume; to bring to naught; to waste; to fail. (See No. 8.)

No. 5. Ch. כָּלַה To eat; to consume; also, to take; to hold; to contain. In Aph. to feed; to give food; also, to call; to thunder; to roar, or bellow; also, to publish; to accuse; to defame.

Heb. to eat; to consume.

Sam. כָּלַה To eat.

Syr. כָּלַ To publish; to divulge, as a crime; to accuse.

Eth. ከለክ To suffice, as we say, it is well, Lat. valeo; also, to be or exist; that is, to be held, or to be fixed or permanent, to continue.

Ar. to eat; to devour; to corrode; Lat. helluo.

No. 6. Ar. كَس To trust; to commit to another in confidence. (See No. 3.)

Eth. ከለክ with a prefix; to trust, as above.

No. 7. Heb. כָּלַ To be able; to prevail; Lat. calleo; W. gallu; Eng. could.

No. 8. Ch. כָּלַ To digest; to consume. (No. 5.)

Ar. كَس To collect; to tie; to bind; to unite; also, to divide, impel, or compel. This is the primary sense of the word, or rather of this root; to press; to strain; to urge, or impel; also, to extend. These verbs are different modifications of one radix; and hence the English hold, call, hollow, heal, hale; the Latin calo, caulis, calleo, callus; Greek, καλλειν, καλος or καλλος; and a multitude of words in all the modern languages of Europe.

The sense of holding, restraining, forbidding, hindering, and keeping, are too obvious to need any explanation. They are from straining. To this sense is nearly allied the sense of measuring, or ascertaining what is held or contained. That which is contained is all, the whole that is comprehended, from the sense of extension.

The signification of finishing or perfecting, seems, in a good sense, to be from that of soundness; a sense which is from stretching or strength. Or it may be from coming to the end, like finish and achieve, or from shutting, closing. And the sense of consuming, wasting, failing, may be from bringing to an end. In Latin, to consume is to take all; and possibly this may be the sense of this verb. But the Arabic sense of failure would seem rather to be from holding, stopping, or coming to an end.

The sense of eating may be from consuming, or taking apart, but from some of the derivatives of No. 5, I am inclined to think the primary sense is to feed, to crowd, to stuff; the primary sense of the root applied to this particular act; for under the Chaldee root we find words which signify the nut of a species of oak, the Gr. ακυλος, and a collection or crowd of people, [Gr. ακυλος] both of which are from collecting or pressing together.

The sense of seeing and looking is from reaching or casting and striking, or from holding or fixing the eyes on.

The sense of trusting seems also to be that of holding to or resting on. The English hold in behold is from this root.

The sense of calling, roaring, and thunder, is from impelling the voice or sound; a pressing, driving, or straining, applied to sound; like the Latin appello, from pello. Hence the sense of publishing, accusing and defaming.

The sense of sprouting, in the Arabic, is a shooting or pushing out, as in other cases; Lat. caulis.

The sense of ability, power, strength, in No. 7, is from straining, stretching, or holding, as in other words of the like sense. Hence Lat. calleo, to be skilled, and to be hard, callus.

On this root כָּלַ is probably formed כָּלַ, a word differently pointed in the Hebrew and Chaldee. This word signifies in Hebrew to pervert, to err, to be foolish or infatuated, to act foolishly.

In Chaldee, to understand, know, or consider; to look or behold; to cause to understand; Rabbinic, to be ignorant; whence its derivatives, knowledge, wisdom, ignorance. These different significations may result from the different effects of the prefix on the original verb.

In Syr. כָּלַ the same word, signifies to be foolish, or mad; to cause to know, or to give understanding; to observe; to search or know thoroughly; to ask or seek to understand; to discern or distinguish; also to err, to sin, to be foolish, or perverse.

In Sam. the same word signifies to look, and to be accustomed. See Castell. col. 2523.

That כָּלַ is formed on the same root with a different prefix, is obvious and certain, from the correspondence of significations. This word in Hebrew signifies to understand, or know; to cause to understand; to be wise, or to act wisely; corresponding with the Ch. כָּלַ above; and being a mere dialectical orthography of the word. It signifies also to deprive, strip, bereave; and to waste, scatter and destroy; also, to cast, as fruit or offspring; also, to prosper.

Ch. to understand, and Ch. כָּלַ to complete, to finish; also, to found, to lay the foundation. This is כָּלַ with ו prefixed.

Syr. to found, to finish, to adorn.

Ar. كَس shackala, to bind under the belly; to gird; to bind the feet; to fetter; to shackle; to form, or fashion; to be dubious, obscure, and intricate; to agree, suit or answer to; to be like; to have a beautiful form; to know, perceive, or comprehend; to hesitate; to be ignorant. Derivative, a shackle. See Castell. Col. 3750.

To this root Castle refers the English skill; and it is certain the words correspond both in elements and in sense. Now in the Gothic and Teutonic languages, the verbs corresponding to these Shemitic verbs, signify in Saxon, scylan, to separate, to distinguish; Icelandic and Swedish, skilia, to divide, separate, sever; whence shield, that which separates, and hence defends; D. scheelen, to differ; schillen, to peel, or pare; whence scale and shell. To this root our lexicographers refer skill. The prefix in this word would seem to have the force of a negative, like L. ex. Now is it possible to suppose that these words can be formed from a common root?

The sense of sin and folly is probably from wandering, deviating, as in delirium; and this is only a modification of the primary sense of כָּלַ, to stretch or extend; that is, departure, separation. Or the ו has, in these senses, the force of a negative.

The sense of knowing, understanding, is usually or always from taking, holding, or extending to; as we say, I take your meaning. In this application these words would seem to be directly from the Eth. and Ch. כָּלַ to be able; the Latin calleo, to be hard, and to know or be well skilled.

That this word כָּלַ is from the same root as כָּלַ, כָּלַ, כָּלַ, we know by the Samaritan כָּלַ which signifies all, and which is a mere dialectical spelling of the Heb. and Ch. כָּלַ.

The sense of depriving and wasting, in the Hebrew, is from separation, the sense of the Gothic and Teutonic words; but it is to be noticed that this sense seems to imply throwing, as one mode of parting, and this is also the direct act of founding, laying the foundation.

When we turn our attention to the Arabic, new affinities are disclosed. The first definition is to bind, to gird, to shackle, and hence the English word. The radical sense of bind is to strain, the sense of hold. And here we arrive at the origin and primary sense of shall, should; Saxon scealan, to be obliged; that is, to be bound or constrained. Hence we see why the words scale, shell and shall are all written alike in Saxon, seal; for scale and shell are from peeling, or covering, binding.

From this verb the Saxon has scyld, a crime, or guilt, Lat. scelus, and scyld, a shield. The German has the same word in schuld, guilt, culpability, debt; Dutch, schuld; Danish skulde, should, and scyld, a debt, a fault, a crime; Sw. skuld, the same. This word scyld, skuld, and schuld, is the English should, the preterit of the verb shall; and it is the word used in the Saxon, German, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Icelandic, and Swiss Lord's prayer, to express what is rendered in English debts; forgive us our debts. Here we see the primary sense of the word is to be held, or bound; hence, liable. The English word guilt may be from the same root, without a prefix; but whether it is or not, we observe the word expresses more than the English word debt, trespass or offense; it comprehends the sense of fault, or sin, with that of being held, or liable to answer or to punishment. Debt, in the modern use of the word, implies the latter, but not the former; trespass and offense imply the sin, but not the liability to answer. We have no English word that includes both senses, except guilt, and this seems to be hardly adequate to express the full sense of scyld.

To account for the various significations of the same word, in different languages, and often in the same language, it is necessary to find the primary action expressed by the root; and in compound words it is necessary to observe or ascertain the different effects produced on the original word by the prefixes. Thus the verb inculpo in Low Latin signifies to excuse; but some modern writers use inculcate in a directly different sense; that is, to blame.

In like manner impartible has two different significations; that may be imparted; and in law, not partible, or divisible. Such is the fact also with impassionate. I am persuaded a vast number of instances of similar diversities in the application of prefixes may be found in the Shemitic languages; and this will account for differences which otherwise seem utterly irreconcilable.

We find in our mother tongue, that the same word signifies to heal, and to conceal, Lat. celo; Saxon hæl, health; hælan, helan, to heal, to conceal; ge-hælan and ge-helan, to heal and to conceal; Old English hele. Hence we see that the English heal and the Latin celo are the same word, differently applied, but from a common signification, which is to make strong or fast, or to hold, from the sense of pressing. Or perhaps the Latin celo may have this sense of holding, restraining; and heal may rather be from making perfect. No. 2. Supra.

We may now also see the radical sense of holy; Saxon hal and ge-hal, whole, sound, safe; halig, holy; halgian, to hallow. If this word contains the sense of separation, or driving off, like Latin sacer, as it may, it is from shutting, confining, or restraining intercourse. But I am inclined to believe the primary sense of holy is sound, entire, coinciding with the radical sense of heal.

Clod, Laudo, Claudio.

In Welsh clod is praise, from llod, a forcible utterance. This is the English loud, and Lat. laudo, which with a prefix becomes plaudo. In Welsh, llodi signifies to reach out, to crave, from the radical sense of llod, to thrust out or extend; but according to Owen, llodi is from llawd, which signifies a shooting out, or a going onward, productiveness, a lad, and as an adjective, tending forward, craving, lewd; llodig, craving, brimming; llodineb, lewdness. Now, beyond all question, these words are the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, and Samaritan לד to beget; to bring forth; to cause to be born; and as a noun, a child of either sex, a lad. The Arabians and Ethiopians use vau or wau, where the Hebrews use yod. The Arabic corresponding word is لَد, the Ethiopic ወለደ to beget, to bring forth.

But this is not all. In Greek, the verb λαῖω, a contraction of λαῖσθαι, signifies to praise, to celebrate. Here we have precisely the Welsh llod, above, corresponding with the Latin laudo and plaudo. But the same Greek word λαῖω, λαῖσθαι, signifies to shut or make fast. This is the Latin cludo, claudo. The Saxons used h for the Greek κ and the Latin c; and with these words accords the Saxon hlid, a cover; English a lid; that which shuts or makes fast. That these words are all from one root, is a fact, apparent beyond any reasonable doubt; nor is there the least difficulty in ascertaining the affinity, for the radical sense, to reach forward, to thrust, to strain, solves the whole mystery. To thrust, gives the sense of begetting and producing; to strain or throw out the voice, gives the sense of praise; and to thrust or press together, gives the sense of closing and making fast. In this manner, words, which, at first view, appear to have no connection, will, when pursued through different languages, assimilate and unite, not only without forced analogies, but in defiance of all preconceived opinions; and the reluctant mind is at last compelled to admit their identity.

There is another set of words whose derivation from the same root is very certain, though perhaps less obvious. These are the Danish slutter, to shut, close, conclude, finish, determine; slutter, a key-keeper, a jailor; Swedish, sluta, claudere, obserare, to shut, or shut up, or end; slott, a castle; D. slutel, a key; slot, a lock, a castle, a conclusion; sluiten, to shut, lock, close, stop, conclude; G. schloss, a lock; schliessen, to close, conclude, finish, fetter, shackle; schleuse, a sluice; D. sluis, id. Eng. sluice, that is, which shuts or fastens; Low Latin, exclusa. See Spelman's Glossary. These words are unequivocally formed from the root of claudio, clausi, by the prefix s, just as the Welsh yslac, slack, loose, is formed on llac, and yspeliaw, on yspail, spoil, and this on the root of peel. We observe all the Teutonic dialects use the dental t, as the final radical, except the German. The Latins use both the dental and a sibilant, claudio, clausi, clausus.

If the Danish lyd, sound, Sw. lyda, to sound, is the same word as English loud, these words belong to this family.

Cradle.

Another example. The English word cradle, Saxon cradel, is in Welsh cryd, a rocking, a shaking, a cradle. In Welsh, the verbs crydu, crydiaw, crydian, signify to shake, to tremble. These correspond to the Irish creatham, to shake; Greek κραῖω, to shake, to swing. The Welsh verbs are by Owen, deduced from rhyd, which signifies a moving. Now רד in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Ethiopic, signifies to shake or tremble. The same word in Arabic رَد, signifies to thunder; to impress terror; to tremble; to shake. This coincides with the Latin rudo, to roar, to bray; and we know from the voice of the ass, that roughness or shaking is an ingredient in the sense of this word. We know it also from rudis, one of the affinities of rudo. There is also in Arabic رَد, which is rendered to run hither and thither; to move one way and the other; to tremble; to shake. In Hebrew רדד signifies to tremble or shake, and to palpitate; in Syriac and Eth. to rub or scrape. This connects the word directly with cradle, through the Hebrew; and through the Syriac, with the Latin rudo. Here again we find the sense of roughness or grating. Then turning to the Welsh, we find grydiaw, which signifies to utter a rough sound; to shout, hoop or scream; grydiust, a murmur, from gryd, a shout or hoop, and this from rhyd, the word above mentioned; so that crydu, to shake, whence cradle, is from the same root as grydiaw, to shout, and this is the Italian gridare; Sp. and Port. gritar; Saxon grædan; Sw. gråta; Dan. græder; Dutch kryten; German greiten. This word in French is contracted, by the omission of the last radical, into crier for crider; whence, probably, we have cry, W. eri. Hence we find that the sense of cry is to utter a rough sound; and this is connected with the braying of the ass, with shaking, trembling, and with roaring, murmuring, and thunder. The connection in this example, is so marked as to preclude all hesitation as to the identity of the words.

The Shemitic roots רדד, רד, רדד, and רד, all, in some of the languages of that stock, coincide in sense and elements with the English grate, French gratter; and if the first letter is a prefix, they would seem to unite with the Latin rudo. But this is a point I would not undertake to determine.

One fact more. The Welsh eri, above mentioned, signifies a cry; and as an adjective, rough, raw. Now this coincides with the Latin crudus, in sense; and crudus with the Welsh cryd, above mentioned.

The Dan. brægger, English to brew, are probably connected with break, with freckle, and with rough. So under this root, the Welsh grediau, signifies to heat, scorch, parch, whence grydyll, a griddle, from graid, that shoots in rays, heat, ardency, from gra, that shoots, or rises, as the nap or frize of cloth. The latter is probably a contracted word, of the same family, but not the root, as Owen supposes. But the radical sense implies a shaking, agitation and roughness.

Meet, mete, measure.

SAXON.—Matan, to put, to place; Fr. mettre, It. mettere, Sp. Port. meter, Lat. mitto.

Matan, metan, to find, to meet, or meet with; to paint; to dream; to measure, to mete, Lat. metior, metor, Gr. μετρον, μετρος, Lat. mensus, with a casual n, that is, mesus, Fr. mesure.

Ametan, gemetan, to meet, to find, to measure.

Gemetan, gemetung, a meeting.

Gemet, gemete, fit, suitable, Eng. meet; also, painted or portrayed.

Gemetegan, gemetian, to moderate; gemetic, moderate, modest.

Mete, measure, mode, Lat. modius, modus.

Meter, measure in verse, meter. [Not metre.]

Metere, an inventor, a painter.

Mate, middling, [mediocris,] modest, moderate.

Mot, gemot, a meeting, a council.

Witena-gemot, a council of wise men.

Motian, to meet, especially for debate. Eng. to moot.

GOthic.—Molyan, gamotyān, to meet, to find.

Mota, a place for the receipt of toll or customs.

Dutch.—Ontmoeten, to meet, to encounter.

Meeten, and toemeeten, to measure.

Meeter, a measurer.

Gemoeten, to meet; gemoet, a meeting.

GERMAN.—Mass, measure, meter; musse, moderation.

Messen, vermessen, to measure; messer, a measurer.

Gemass, measure; also conformable, suitable; Eng. meet, suitable; German gemässigt, temperate, moderate.

SWEDISH.—Möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. [This is the sense of finding.]

Möte, a meeting.

Mot, and emot, towards, against; as in motså, to stand against, to resist.

Möta, to measure; mätt, measure, meter, mode.

Mättelig, moderate, middling, frugal, temperate.

Mätta, to be sufficient, to satisfy, to cloy.

DANISH.—Møder, to meet, to convene; møde or mode, a meeting; mod, contrary, opposite, against, to, towards, for, on, by, aside, abreast, as in modsetter, to set against, to oppose; modsiget, to say against, to contradict; mod-vind, a contrary wind.

Moed, moden, ripe, mellow, mature. [Qu. Lat. mitis.]

Mode, manner, fashion. [Probably from the Latin.]

Maade, measure, form, style of writing, way, mode, manner, fashion.

[This is the native Danish word corresponding to the Lat. modus.]

Maadelig, moderate, temperate.

Mæt, enough, sufficient; mætte, to satisfy, or sate, to glut.

From the same root are the G. mit, D. met, mede, Sw. and Dan. med, Gr. μετρον, signifying with.

By the first signification of the Saxon matan, or metan, we find that this word, which is the English meet, is also the French mettre and Lat. mitto, the sense of which is to throw or send, to put, to lay. Meet is only a modification of the same sense, to come to, to fall, to reach, hence to find; as we say, to fall on.

The sense of painting or portraying is peculiar to the Saxon. I am not confident that this sense is from finding; but we observe that metere is rendered an inventor and a painter. The sense of paint then may be to find out, to devise or contrive.

INTRODUCTION.

The sense of dreaming is also peculiar to the Saxon. The sense may be to devise or imagine, or it may be to rove, as in some other words of like signification. If so, this sense will accord with the Syriac ܡܪܝܬܐ infra.

The other significations present no difficulty. To meet, is to come to, to reach in proceeding or in extending; hence to find. The primary sense of measure is to extend, to stretch to the full length or size of a thing.

Meet, fit, suitable, like par, peer, pair, is from extending or reaching to. So suit is from the Latin sequor, through the French, to follow, to press or reach toward. See par, under ܡܪܝܬܐ, supra.

The English meet and mete appear to be from the Saxon dialect, but moot from the Gothic.

Let it be remarked that in the Saxon, meet and mete, are united in the same orthography; and in the Dutch the orthography is not very different; ontmoeten, gemoeten, to meet, and meten, to measure. Not so in the other languages.

In German, mass is measure, and messen, to measure; but the sense of meet, does not occur. Yet that mass is the same word as meet, fit, varied only in dialect, appears from this, that gemäss, with a prefix, is suitable, answering to the English meet.

The Swedish and Danish words follow the Gothic orthography; Swedish möta, to meet, to fall on, to come to, to happen. These significations give the sense of finding, and are closely allied to the senses of the Arabic verb ܡܪܝܬܐ infra.

The Danish verb is möder, to meet, but in both the Swedish and Danish, the sense of measure is expressed by a different orthography. Sw. måta, to measure; mätt, measure; Dan. maade, measure, mode. In these two languages we find also the sense of sufficiency, and to satisfy. See infra, the Ar. ܡܪܝܬܐ and Heb. and Ch. ܡܪܝܬܐ.

But in these Gothic dialects, there is one application of meeting, which deserves more particular notice. In Swedish, mot and emot is a preposition of the same signification as the English against. It is rendered toward, against. So in Danish, mod is contrary, opposite, against, to, toward, by, aside, abreast. This preposition is the simple verb, without any addition of letters, prefix or suffix. We hence learn that the sense of such prepositions is a meeting or coming to, which gives the sense of to or toward; but when one meets another in front, it gives the sense of opposition, or contrary direction. This coming to or meeting, may be for a friendly purpose, and hence in one's favor, like for in English. Thus in Danish, "Guds godhed mod os," God's goodness or mercy towards us. In other cases, mod signifies against and implies counteraction or opposition; as modgift, an antidote; modgang, adversity. So for in English signifies towards, or in favor of; and also opposition and negation, as in forbid.

In the Danish we find moed, moden, ripe, mature. We shall see this sense in the Chaldee ܡܪܝܬܐ. The sense is to reach, extend, or come to.

The Latin modus is from this root, and by its orthography, it seems to have been received from the Gothic race. The sense is measure, limit, from extending, or comprehending. This then becomes the radix of many words which express limitation or restraint, as moderate, modest, modify; a sense directly contrary to that of the radical verb.

This leads us a step further. In Saxon, Gothic, and other northern languages, mod, moed, signifies mind, courage, spirit, anger, whence English moody. The primary sense is an advancing or rushing forward, which expresses mind or intention, that is, a setting or stretching forward, and also spirit, animation, heat, and lastly, anger. So the Latin animus, gives rise to animosity; and the Greek μῆτις, mind, signifies also, strength, force, vehemence, and anger. Mania is from the same radical sense.

Let us now connect this root or these roots, with the Shemitic languages.

In Hebrew and Chaldee, ܡܪܝܬܐ signifies to measure; ܡܪܝܬܐ, a measure. This coincides with the Latin metior, and Gr. μετρεω, as well as with the Saxon, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish, which all write the word with a dental, but the German is mass.

In Syriac ܡܪܝܬܐ signifies to escape, to get free, that is, to depart, a modification of the sense of extending in the Arabic. A derivative in Syriac signifies a duty, toll or tribute; and we have seen in the Gothic, that mota is a toll-house. It may be from measuring, that is, a portion, or perhaps income.

This word in Arabic ܡܪܝܬܐ madda, signifies,

1. To stretch or extend, to draw out, to make or be long, to delay or give time, to forbear, to bring forth. To extend is the radical sense of measure.

2. To separate, or throw off or out; to discern, secrete or discharge. Hence to become matter or sanies, to produce pus, to maturate. Here we have the origin of the word matter, in the sense of pus. It is an excretion, from throwing out, separating, freeing, discharging. Here we have the sense of the Latin mitto, emitto.

3. To assist, to supply. This sense is probably from coming to, that is, to approach or visit. "I was sick and ye visited me. I was in prison and ye came to me." Math. xxv.

VOL. I.

D.

This application coincides with the English meet, but particularly with the Swedish and Danish sense of the word.

4. To make thin, to attenuate; probably from stretching.

Among the Arabic nouns formed under this root, we find a measure, or modius, showing that this verb is the same as the Chaldee and Hebrew; we find also matter or pus, and lenity. Qu. Lat. mitis.

In Chaldee, ܡܪܝܬܐ or ܡܪܝܬܐ, signifies to come to, to happen, to reach, [to meet,] to be ripe or mature, to cause to come, to bring or produce. The first sense gives that of finding, and the latter gives that of maturing, and we observe that matter, or pus, is from the Arabic ܡܪܝܬܐ madda, and the sense of mature from the Chaldee ܡܪܝܬܐ mita. Yet in the use of maturate from the Latin maturus, we connect the words, for to maturate, is to ripen, and to generate matter.

In Syriac, this verb signifies the same as the Chaldee, to come to; and also to be strong, to prevail, that is, to strain or stretch, the radical sense of power.

In Hebrew, ܡܪܝܬܐ has the sense of the foregoing verb in the Chaldee, to find, to come to, to happen.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to find, and to be strong, to prevail; hence both in Hebrew and Chaldee, to be sufficient. Here we see the Danish and Swedish, matter, and mätta, to be sufficient. This is also meet, dialectically varied.

In Syriac also this verb signifies to be strong or powerful; also in Pahl. to bring or press out, to defecate, which sense unites this word with the Heb. ܡܪܝܬܐ, to press, to squeeze. In Ethiopic, this verb signifies to come, to happen, to cause to come, to bring in, to bring forth. Now it is evident that ܡܪܝܬܐ, and the Chaldee ܡܪܝܬܐ, are dialectical forms of the same word; the former coinciding with the German mass, in orthography, but with the other languages, in signification.

In Chaldee, ܡܪܝܬܐ signifies the middle, and as a verb, to set in the middle, to pass the middle, in Syriac, to be divided in the middle. Qu. Is not this a branch of the family of meet?

The Chaldee ܡܪܝܬܐ, amad, to measure, is evidently from ܡܪܝܬܐ, with a prefix or formative N. This word, in Syriac, signifies like the simple verb, to escape, to be liberated. In Pael, to liberate.

In Arabic, this verb ܡܪܝܬܐ amida, signifies, to be terminated, to end, whence the noun, an end, limit, termination, Latin meta, which, Ainsworth informs us, signifies, in a metaphorical sense, a limit. The fact is the reverse; this is its primary and literal sense, and that of a pillar and goal are particular appropriations of that sense.

In Hebrew, ܡܪܝܬܐ signifies a cubit, a measure of length.

The same in the Rabbinic, from ܡܪܝܬܐ, with a prefix.

In Chaldee, this verb signifies to be contracted, to shrink.

Is not this sense from ܡܪܝܬܐ, measure, modus, a limit, or a drawing.

That the Shemitic words, ܡܪܝܬܐ, ܡܪܝܬܐ, ܡܪܝܬܐ and ܡܪܝܬܐ, are words of the same stock with meet, mete, Lat. metior, there can be no doubt, but it is not easy to understand why the different significations of meeting and measuring, should be united in one word, in the Saxon language, when they are expressed by very different words in the Shemitic, and in most of the Teutonic languages. We know indeed that in German a sibilant letter is often used, in words which are written with a dental in all the other kindred languages. But in this case the German mass, measure, must coincide with ܡܪܝܬܐ, as must the Swedish måta, and Dan. maade, and the Saxon metan, Dutch gemoeten, Goth. motyan, Sw. möta, Dan. möder, with the Chaldee ܡܪܝܬܐ, but not with the word ܡܪܝܬܐ.

It may not be impossible nor improbable that all these words are from one stock or radix, and that the different orthographies and applications are dialectical changes of that root, introduced among different families or races of men, before languages were reduced to writing.

In the Latin mensus, from metior, the n is probably casual, the original being mesus, as in the French mesure. I have reason to think there are many instances of this insertion of n before d and s.

From this exhibition of words and their significations, we may fairly infer the common origin of the following words. Lat. mitto, French mettre, English meet, to come to, meet, fit, and mete, to measure, Lat. metior, metor, Gr. μετρον, μετρεω, Lat. mensura, Fr. mesure, Eng. measure, Lat. modus, mode, Sax. and Goth. mod, mind, anger, whence moody, Eng. moot, Lat. maturus, mature, and Eng. matter.

In Welsh, madu signifies, to cause to proceed; to send, [Lat. mitto;] to suffer to go off; to render productive; to become beneficial; and mad signifies, what proceeds or goes forward, hence what is good; and mad, the adjective, signifies, proceeding, advancing, progressive, good or beneficial. This word then affords a clear proof of the radical sense of good. We have like evidence in the English better, best, and in prosperity, which is from the Greek εὐπορεω, to advance.

In Welsh also we find madrez, matter, pus; madru, to dissolve, to putrefy, to become pus. That these words are from the same root as the Arabic supra, I think to be very obvious; and here we observe that the Welsh have one important sense derived from the root, that of good, which occurs in none of the other languages. But the primary sense is the same as that of the other significations, to go forward, to advance; hence to promote interest or happiness. Here we have undeniable evidence that the sense of good, Welsh mad, and the sense of matter, pus, proceed from the same radix.

LEGO.

The Greek legō is rendered, to speak or say; to tell, count, or number; to gather, collect, or choose; to discourse; and to lie down. This last definition shows that this word is the English lie and lay; and from this application, doubtless, the Latins had their lectus, a bed, that is, a spread, a lay.

The Latin lego, the same verb, is rendered, to gather; to choose; to read; to steal, or collect by stealing; and the phrase, legere oram, signifies to coast, to sail along a coast; legere vela, is to furl the sails; legere halitum, to take breath; legere littus, to sail close to the shore; legere milites, to enlist or muster soldiers; legere pugno, to strike, perhaps to lay on with the fist.

It would seem, at first view, that such various significations cannot proceed from one radix. But the fact that they do is indubitable. The primary sense of the root must be to throw, strain or extend, which in this, as in almost all cases, gives the sense of speaking. The sense of collecting, choosing, gathering, is from throwing, or drawing out, or separating by some such act; or from throwing together. The sense of lying down is, probably, from throwing one's self down. The sense of reading, in Latin, is the same as that of speaking in the Greek, unless it may be from collecting, that is, separating the letters, and uniting them in syllables and words; for in the primitive mode of writing, diacritical points were not used. But probably the sense of reading is the same as in speaking.

The phrases legere oram, legere littus, in Latin, may coincide with that of our seamen, to stretch or lay along the shore or coast, or to hug the land; especially if this word lay in Sanscrit signifies to cling, as I have seen it stated in some author, but for which I cannot vouch. If this sense is attached to the word, it proves it closely allied to the L. ligo, to bind.

That the sense of throwing, or driving, is contained in this word, is certain from its derivatives. Thus, in Greek, legō signifies to select, to collect; and also to reject, to repudiate, and to forbid; which imply throwing, thrusting away.

Now, if throwing, sending, or driving, is the primary sense, then the Latin lego, to read, and lego, legare, to send, are radically the same word; the inflections of the verb being varied, arbitrarily, to designate the distinct applications, just as in pello, appello, appellere, to drive, and appello, appellare, to call.

And here it may be worth a moment's consideration, whether several words with prefixes, such as slay, flog, and the Latin plico, W. plygu, are not formed on the root of lay, that is, lag or lak. The sense of slay, Sax. slagan, slaan, is properly to strike, to beat; hence in Saxon, "Hig slo-gon heora wedd," they slew their league, or contract; that is, they struck a bargain. It signifies also to throw, as to slag one into prison; also to fall; to set or lay. The sense of killing is derivative from that of striking, a striking down.

Flog, Lat. fligo, signifies primarily to rush, drive, strike, Eng. to lick; and if formed on the root of lay, is precisely the popular phrase, to lay on.

If plico is formed with a prefix on lay or its root, it must have been originally pelico, that is, belico, belay. Then to fold, would be to lay on or close; to lay one part to another. Now this word is the Welsh plygu, to fold, which Owen makes to be a compound of py and lly. The latter word must be a contraction of llyg.

We know that the word reply is from the French repliquer, the Latin replico. Now, to reply, is not to fold back, but to send back, to throw back, as words, or an answer; and this gives the precise sense of lay, to throw, to send, which must be the sense of the radical word.

It is no inconsiderable evidence of the truth of my conjecture, that we constantly use the phrase to lay on, or lay to, as synonymous with ply, a word belonging to this family. To pledge, another of this family, is to lay down, to deposit; and the primary sense of play, Sax. plegan, Dan. leger, Sw. leka, is to strike or drive.

In Welsh, lluçiau signifies to throw, fling, cast, or dart; to pelt; to drift; from lluç, a darting, a flash, glance, or sudden throw; hence lluçed, lightning. Llug signifies also, that breaks, or begins to open, a gleam, a breaking out in blotches; the plague. Llug signifies also, that is apt to break out, that is bright, a tumor, eruption. These words coincide with English light, Lat. luceo; the primary sense of which is to throw, shoot, or dart; and these words all contain the elements of flog and fling.

In Welsh, llygu signifies to fall flat, to lie extended, or to squat. This is evidently allied to lay and lie.

These senses agree also with that of luck, to fall, or come suddenly; that is, to rush or drive along.

In Russ. vlagayu is to lay, or put in; equivalent to the German einlegen. The Latin fluo is contracted from flugo; and the radical sense of flow is the same as that of light. So the river Mar, in Europe, is doubtless from the same source as the Oriental מַר, to shine, whence air. And מַר, which, in Hebrew, signifies to flow as water, as well as to shine, chiefly signifies in Chaldee and Syriac, to shine.

To show the great importance, or rather the absolute necessity, of ascertaining the primary sense of words, in order to obtain clear ideas of the sense of ancient authors, more particularly of difficult passages in dead languages, let the reader attend to the following remarks.

In commenting on certain parts of Isaiah xxviii, Lowth observes in his Preliminary Dissertation, the difficulty of determining the meaning of לִי, in verse 15th. In our version, as in others, it is rendered agreement; but, says Lowth, "the word means no such thing in any part of the Bible, except in the 18th verse following; nor can the lexicographers give any satisfactory account of the word in this sense." Yet he agrees with Vitringa, that in these passages it must have this signification. The difficulty, it seems, has arisen from not understanding the primary sense of seeing, for the verb generally signifies to see; and as a noun the word signifies sight, vision; and so it is rendered in the Latin version annexed to Vanderhooght's Bible. The seventy render it by συνθήκη, a covenant or league; and they are followed by the moderns. "Nous avons intelligence avec le sépulchre." French. "Noi habbiam fatta lega col sepolcro." Italian of Diodati.

Parkhurst understands the word to signify, to fasten, to settle, and he cites 2 Sam. xx, 9, לִי, "Joab took Amasa by the beard." Here the sense is obvious; and from this and other passages, we may infer with certainty, that the radical sense is to reach to, or to seize, hold, or fix. If the sense is to reach to, then it accords with covenant, conveniens, coming to; if the sense is to fix, or fasten, then it agrees with league, Lat. ligo, and with pact, pactum, from pango, to make fast; all from the sense of extension, stretching, straining. Hence the meaning of לִי, the breast; that is, the firm, fixed, strong part. And if the English gaze is the same word, which is not improbable, this determines the appropriate sense of seeing in this word, to be to fix, or to look or reach with the eye fixed.

But we have other and decisive evidence of the primary signification of this word in the obvious, undisputed meaning of לִי, the same word with a prefix, which signifies to catch, or lay hold on; to seize; hence, behind, following, as if attached to; and hence drawing out in time, to delay.

Now it is not improbable that the Arabic هَاضَ hauz, may be a word of the same stock; and this signifies among other senses, to collect, contract or draw together, to accumulate, to have intercourse or commerce with another. The latter sense would give nearly the signification of the Hebrew word.

Lexicographers are often embarrassed to account for the different signification of words that are evidently derived from the same root. Thus, in Hebrew, שָׁרָה is rendered to sing; to look, behold, or observe; and to rule; and its derivatives, a ruler, a wall, the navel-string, a chain or necklace, &c. How can a word signify to rule, and to sing, and to look? Nothing can be more easy or natural. The sense is in both cases to stretch or strain, to reach. To sing is to strain the voice; to rule is to restrain men; and to see is to reach, or to hold in view.

In Latin sero, signifies to sow, to plant, to beget, to spread; consero, to sow, and to close or join; desero, to leave off, to desert; assero, to plant by or near, and to assert, affirm, and pronounce; dissero, to discourse; insero, to insert, to implant; resero, to unlock, to open, to disclose. Desero, to desert, Ainsworth says, is a compound of de and sero, "ut sit desertum quod non seritur nec colitur." And dissero he supposes must be a metaphorical use of the word. Now, on the principles I have unfolded, nothing is easier than an explanation of these words. The sense of sero is to throw, to thrust; its literal sense is applied to sowing and planting; consero is to thrust or drive together; desero is to throw from; assero is to throw, in words, or to throw out, as in appello; dissero is to throw words or arguments, with the sense of spreading, expatiating; insero is to throw or thrust in; resero is to throw or drive from, hence to unlock or open.

It is by resorting to the primary idea of words that we are able to explain applications, apparently, or in fact, diverse and even contrary. A very common example of this contrariety occurs in words which signify to guard or defend. For instance, the Latin arceo signifies to drive off, and to protect, secure, hold, restrain, or keep from departing or escaping; two senses directly opposite. This is extremely natural; for arceo signifies to thrust off, repel, drive back; and this act defends the person or object attacked. Or if we suppose the sense of straining to be anterior to that of repulsion, which is not improbable, then the act of straining or holding produces both effects; to repel or stop what advances to assault, and protect what is inclosed or assaulted. The words guard and warren present a similar application of the primary idea; and all languages which I have examined, furnish a multitude of similar examples.

These examples illustrate the utility of extensive researches in language; as all cognate languages throw light on each other; one language often retaining the radical meaning of a word which the others have lost. Who, for instance, that is acquainted only with the English use of the verb to have, would suspect that this word and happen are radically one, and that the primary sense is to fall or rush, hence to fall on and seize? Yet nothing is more certain. In the Spanish language the senses of both verbs are retained in haber; and the Welsh hapiaw gives us the true original signification.

In like manner the primary sense of venio in Latin, cannot be certainly determined without resorting to other words, and to kindred languages. In Latin, the word signifies to come or arrive; but in Spanish, venida, from venir, the Latin venio, signifies not only a coming or arrival, but an attack in fencing. Venio coincides in origin with the English find; Saxon findan; German and Dutch finden, to find, to fall or light on; Danish finde; Swedish finna, to find, to discover, to meet, to strike against [offendere.] The primary sense of venio then is not merely to come or arrive, but to rush or move with a driving force; and this sense is applicable to coming or going.

That the primary sense is to fall or rush, we have evidence in the Latin ventus, and English wind, both from the root of this verb. We have still further evidence in the word venom, which in Welsh is gwenwyn; gwen, white, and gwyn, rage, smart, whence gwynn, wind. Venom is that which frets or excites a raging pain. Hence we may infer that L. venor, to hunt, to chase, is of the same family; and so is venia, leave, or leave to depart, or a departure, a leaving, coinciding in signification with leave.

The latter word, venia, proves another fact, that the primary sense of venio is, in general, to move in any direction, and that the Latin sense, to come, is a particular appropriation of that sense.

In ascertaining the primary sense of words, it is often useful or necessary to recur to the derivatives. Thus the Latin lædo is rendered to hurt; but, by adverting to allido, elido, and collido, we find that the original signification is to strike, hit, or dash against. Hurt then is the secondary sense; the effect of the primary action expressed by the verb.

So the Latin rapio, to seize, does not give the sense of rapidus, rapid, but the sense of the latter proves the primary sense of rapio to be to rush, and in its application, to rush on and seize.

These examples will be sufficient to show how little the affinities of language have been understood. Men have been generally satisfied with a knowledge of the appropriate sense of words, without examining from what visible or physical action, or primary sense, that particular application has been derived. Hence the obscurity that still rests on the theory of language. It has been supposed that each word, particularly each verb, has an original specific sense, or application, distinct from every other verb. We find, however, on a close examination and comparison of the same word in different languages, that the fact is directly the reverse; that a verb expressing some action, in a general sense, gives rise to various appropriate senses, or particular applications. And in the course of my researches, I have been struck with the similarity of manner in which different nations have appropriated derivative and figurative senses. For example, all nations, as far as my researches extend, agree in expressing the sense of justice and right, by straightness, and sin, iniquity, wrong, by a deviation from a straight line or course. Equally remarkable is the simplicity of the analogies in language, and the small number of radical significations; so small indeed, that I am persuaded the primary sense of all the verbs in any language, may be expressed by thirty or forty words.

We cannot, at this period of the world, determine, in all cases, which words are primitive, and which are derivative; nor whether the verb or the noun is the original word. Mon. Gebelin, in his Monde Primitif, maintains that the noun is the root of all other words. Never was a greater mistake. That some nouns may have been formed before the verbs with which they are connected, is possible; but as languages are now constructed, it is demonstrably certain, that the verb is the radix or stock from which have sprung most of the nouns, adjectives, and other parts of speech belonging to each family. This is the result of all my researches into the origin of languages. We find, indeed, that many modern verbs are formed on nouns; as to practice from practice; but the noun is derived from a Greek verb. So we use wrong as a verb from the adjective wrong; but the latter is primarily a participle of the verb to wring. Indeed a large part of all nouns were originally participles or adjectives, and the things which they denote were named from their qualities. So pard, pardus, is from ברד barad, hail; and the animal so named from his spots as if sprinkled with hail, or rather from the sense of separation. Crape, the Fr. crêpe, is from crêper, to crisp. Sight signifies, primarily, seen; it being the participle of seon contracted from sigan. Draught is the participle of draw, that which is drawn, or the act of drawing; thought is the participle of think.

As the verb is the principal radix of other words, and as the proper province of this part of speech is to express action, almost all the modifications of the primary sense of the verb may be comprehended in one word, to move.

The principal varieties of motion or action may be expressed by the following verbs.

1. To drive, throw, thrust, send, urge, press.
2. To set, fix, lay. But these are usually from thrusting, or throwing down.
3. To strain, stretch, draw, whence holding, binding, strength, power, and often health.
4. To turn, wind, roll, wander.
5. To flow, to blow, to rush.
6. To open, part, split, separate, remove, scatter. See No. 16.

7. To swell, distend, expand, spread.
8. To stir, shake, agitate, rouse, excite.
9. To shoot as a plant; to grow; allied to No. 1.
10. To break, or burst; allied sometimes to No. 3.
11. To lift, raise, elevate; allied to No. 9.
12. To flee, withdraw, escape; to fly; often allied to No. 1.
13. To rage; to burn; allied to No. 7 and 8.
14. To fall; to fail; whence fading, dying, &c.
15. To approach, come, arrive, extend, reach. This is usually the sense of gaining. No. 34.
16. To go, walk, pass, advance; allied to No. 6.
17. To seize, take, hold; sometimes allied to No. 31.
18. To strike; to beat; allied to No. 1.
19. To swing; to vibrate. No. 29.
20. To lean; to incline; allied to the sense of wandering, or departing.
21. To rub, scratch, scrape; often connected with driving, and with roughness.
22. To swim; to float.
23. To stop, cease, rest; sometimes at least from straining, holding, fastening.
24. To creep; to crawl; sometimes connected with scraping.
25. To peel, to strip, whence spoiling.
26. To leap, to spring; allied to No. 9 and 1.
27. To bring, bear, carry; in some instances connected with producing, throwing out.
28. To sweep.
29. To hang. No. 19.
30. To shrink, or contract; that is, to draw. See No. 3.
31. To run; to rush forward; allied to No. 1.
32. To put on or together; to unite; allied to No. 1 and 3.
33. To knit, to weave.
34. To gain, to win, to get. See No. 15.

These and a few more verbs express the literal sense of all the primary roots. But it must be remarked that all the foregoing significations are not distinct. So far from it, that the whole may be brought under the signification of a very few words. The English words to send, throw, thrust, strain, stretch, draw, drive, urge, press, embrace the primary sense of a great part of all the verbs in every language which I have examined. Indeed it must be so, for the verb is certainly the root of most words; and the verb expresses motion, which always implies the application of force.

Even the verbs which signify to hold or stop, in most instances at least, if not in all, denote primarily to strain or restrain by exertion of force; and to lie is primarily to throw down, to lay one's self down. So that intransitive verbs are rarely exceptions to the general remark above made, that all verbs primarily express motion or exertion of force. The substantive verb has more claims to be an exception, than any other; for this usually denotes, I think, permanence or continued being; but the primary sense of this verb may perhaps be to set or fix; and verbs having this sense often express extension in time or duration. So τενω in Greek is to stretch, but the same word teneo in Latin, is to hold; hence continuance.

Let us now attend to the radical sense of some of the most common verbs.

Speaking, calling, crying, praying, utterance of sounds, is usually from the sense of driving or straining. Thus in Latin, appello and compello, though of a different conjugation from pello, depello, impello, are from the same root; and although the Latin repello does not signify to recall, yet the corresponding word in Italian rappellare, and the French rappeler, signify to recall, and hence the English repeal. Hence also peal, either of a bell or of thunder. This is the Greek βαλλω, and probably βαλλω is from the same root. The sense of striking is found in the Greek verb, and so it is in the Lat. loquor, Eng. clock. But in general, speaking, in all its modifications, is the straining, driving, or impulse of sounds. Sometimes the sense coincides more exactly with that of breaking or bursting.

Singing is a driving or straining of the voice; and we apply strain to a passage of music, and to a course of speaking.

I am not confident that I can refer the sensation of hearing to any visible action. Possibly it may sometimes be from striking, hitting, touching. But we observe that hear is connected in origin with ear, as the Latin audio is with the Greek αωω, the ear; whence it appears probable that the verb to hear, is formed from the name of the ear, and the ear is from some verb which signifies to shoot or extend, for it signifies a limb.

The primary sense of seeing, is commonly to extend to, to reach; as it were, to reach with the eye. Hence the use of behold, for the radical sense of hold is to strain; and hence its signification in beholden, held, bound, obligated. See the verb See in the Dictionary.

The sense of look may be somewhat different from that of see. It appears in some instances to have for its primary signification to send, throw, cast; that is, to send or cast the eye or sight.

The primary sense of feeling is to touch, hit, or strike; and probably this is the sense of taste.

Wonder and astonishment are usually expressed by some word that signifies to stop or hold. Hence the Latin miror, to wonder, is the Armoric miret, to stop, hold, hinder; coinciding with the English moor, and Spanish amarrar, to moor, as a ship.

INTRODUCTION.

To begin is to come, or fall on; to thrust on. We have a familiar example in the Latin incipio, in and capio; for capio is primarily to fall or rush on and seize. See Begin in the Dictionary.

Attempt is expressed by straining, stretching, as in Latin tento. See Assay and Essay.

Power, strength, and the corresponding verb, to be able, are usually expressed by straining, stretching, and this is the radical sense of ruling or governing. Of this the Latin rego is an example, which gives rectus, right, that is, stretched, straight.

Care, as has been stated, is usually from straining, that is, a tension of the mind.

Thinking is expressed by setting. To think is to set or fix or hold in the mind. It approaches to the sense of suppose, Lat. suppono.

And under this word, let us consider the various applications of the Latin puto. The simple verb puto is rendered to prune, lop or dress, as vines, that is, according to Ainsworth, putum, i. e. purum reddo, purgo, by which I understand him to mean, that putum is either a change of purum, or used for it; a most improbable supposition, for the radical letters t and r are not commutable. Puto is rendered also, to make even, clear, adjust, or cast up accounts; also to think or consider; to suppose; to debate. Its compounds are amputo, to cut off, prune, amputate, to remove; computo, to compute, to reckon, to think or deem; disputo, to make clear, to adjust or settle, to dispute or debate, to reason; imputo, to impute, to ascribe or lay to, to place to account; reputo, to consider, to revolve, to reckon up, to impute. The Latin deputo signifies to think, judge or esteem, to account or reckon, and to prune; but the Italian deputare, Spanish diputar, and French deputer, from the Latin word, all signify, to send. How can the sense of think, and that of lop or prune, be deduced from a common root or radical sense? We find the solution of this question in the verb depute. The primary sense is to throw, thrust or send, or to set or lay, which is from throwing, driving. To prune is to separate, remove, or drive off; to force off; to think is a setting in the mind; to compute is to throw or put together, either in the mind or in numbers; to dispute is to throw against or apart, like debate, to beat from; to impute, is to throw or put to or on; and to repute, is to think or throw in the mind, repeatedly. To amputate, is to separate by cutting round. Puto then in Latin is from the same root probably, as the English put, or the same word differently applied; and also the Dutch poeten, to plant; poot, a paw, a twig or shoot, Gr. ποτα, &c.

In attempting to discover the primary sense of words, we are to carry our reflections back to the primitive state of mankind, and consider how rude men would effect their purposes, before the invention or use of the instruments which the moderns employ. The English verb cut, signifies ordinarily to separate with an edged tool; and we are apt to consider this as the chief and original sense. But if so, how can cut, the stroke of a whip, which is a legitimate sense of the word, be deduced from the act of severing by an edged tool? We have, in this popular use of the word, a clew to guide us to the primary sense, which is, to drive, urge, press, and applied to the arm, to strike. But we have better evidence. In the popular practice of speaking in New England, it is not uncommon to hear one person call to another when running, and say, cut on, cut on; that is, hurry, run faster, drive, press on; probably from striking a beast which one rides on. This is the original sense of the word. Hence we see, that this verb is the Latin cado, to strike, to cut down, somewhat differently applied, and cado, to fall, is only a modified sense of the same root, and the compounds incido, to cut, and incido, to fall on, are of one family. To cut, is therefore primarily to strike, or drive, and to cut off, if applied to the severing of bodies, before edged tools were used, was to force off, or to strike off; hence the sense of separating in the phrase to cut off a retreat or communication.

So the Latin carpo is the English carve, originally to separate by plucking, pulling, seizing and tearing, afterwards, by cutting.

Asking is usually expressed by the sense of pressing, urging. We have a clear proof of this in the Latin peto and its compounds. This verb signifies primarily to rush, to drive at, to assault, and this sense, in Dictionaries, ought to stand first in the order of definitions. We have the force of the original in the words impetus and impetuous. So the Latin rogo, coincides in elements with reach.

The act of understanding is expressed by reaching or taking, holding, sustaining; the sense of comprehend, and of understand. We have a popular phrase which well expresses this sense, "I take your meaning or your idea." So in German, begreifen, to begripe, to apprehend.

Knowing seems to have the same radical sense as understanding.

Pain, grief, distress, and the like affections, are usually expressed by pressure or straining. Affliction is from striking.

Joy, mirth, and the like affections, are from the sense of rousing, exciting, lively action.

Covering, and the like actions are from spreading over or cutting off, interruption.

Hiding, is from covering or from withdrawing, departure; or concealment may be from withholding, restraining, suppressing, or making fast, as in the Latin celo.

Heat usually implies excitement; but as the effect of heat as well as of cold is sometimes to contract, I think both are sometimes from the same radical. Thus cold and the Lat. calco, to be warm, and callus and calleo, to be hard, have all the same elementary letters, and I suppose them all to be from one root, the sense of which is, to draw, strain, shrink, contract. I am the more inclined to this opinion, for these words coincide with calleo, to be strong or able, to know; a sense that implies straining and holding.

Hope is probably from reaching forward. We express strong desire by longing, reaching towards.

Earnestness, boldness, daring, peril, promptness, readiness, willingness, love and favor, are expressed by advancing or inclining.

Light is often expressed by opening, or the shooting of rays, radiation; and probably in many cases, the original word was applied to the dawn of day in the morning. Whiteness is often connected in origin with light. We have an instance of this in the Latin caneo, to shine and to be white.

And that the primary sense of this word, is to shoot, to radiate, that is, to throw out or off, we have evidence in the verb canto, to sing, whence canto, the sense of which is retained in our popular use of cant; to cant a stone; to cant over a cask; give the thing a cant; for all these words are from one stock.

The Latin virtus, the English worth, is from the root of vireo, to grow, that is, to stretch forward, to shoot; hence the original sense is strength, a sense we retain in its application to the qualities of plants. Hence the Latin sense of virtus, is bravery, coinciding with the sense of boldness, a projecting forward.

Pride is from swelling or elevation, the primary sense of some other words nearly allied to it.

Fear is usually from shrinking or from shaking, trembling; or sometimes perhaps from striking, a being struck, as with surprise.

Holiness and sacredness are sometimes expressed by separation, as from common things. The Teutonic word holy however seems to be from the sense of soundness, entireness.

Faith and belief seem to imply a resting on, or a leaving. It is certain that the English belief is a compound of the prefix be and leaf, leave, permission. To believe one then is to leave with him, to rest or suffer to rest with him, and hence not to dispute, contend or deny.

Color may be from spreading over or putting on; but in some instances, the primary sense is to dip. See Dye and Tinge.

Spots are from the sense of separating or from sprinkling, dispersion.

The radical sense of making is to press, drive, or force. We use make in its true literal sense, in the phrases, make your horse draw, make your servant do what you wish.

Feeding is from the sense of pressing, crowding, stuffing, that is, from driving or thrusting. Eating seems to have a somewhat different sense.

Drinking is from drawing, or from wetting, plunging. Drench and drink are radically one word.

Anger, and the like violent passions imply excitement, or violent action. Hence their connection with burning or inflammation, the usual sense of which is raging or violent commotion.

Agreement, harmony, are usually from meeting, or union, or from extending, reaching to.

Dwelling, abiding, are from the sense of throwing or setting down, or resting, or from stretching; as we see by the Latin continuo, from teneo, Gr. τενω, to extend.

Guarding and defending, are from roots that signify to stop, or to cut off; or more generally, from the sense of driving off, a repelling or striking back. In some cases perhaps from holding.

Opposition is usually expressed by meeting, and hence the prepositions which express opposition. Thus the Danish preposition mod, Swedish mot or emot, against, contrary, is the English word to meet.

Words which express spirit denote primarily breath, air, wind, the radical sense of which is to flow, move or rush. Hence the connection between spirit and courage, animus, animosus; hence passion, animosity. So in Greek φρενις, frenzy, is from φρη, the mind, or rather from its primary sense, a moving or rushing.

So in our mother-tongue, mod is mind or spirit; whence mood, in English, and Sax. modig, moody, angry. Hence mind in the sense of purpose, its primary signification, is a setting forward, as intention is from intendo, to stretch, to strain, the sense that ought to stand first in a Dictionary.

Reproach, chiding, rebuke, are from the sense of scolding, or throwing out words with violence.

Sin, is generally from the sense of deviating, wandering, as is the practice of lewdness.

Right, justice, equity, are from the sense of stretching, making straight, or from laying, making smooth.

Falsehood is from falling, failing, or from deviation, wandering, drawing aside.

The primary sense of strange and foreign, is distant, and from some verb signifying to depart. Wild and fierce are from a like sense.

Vain, vanity, wane, and kindred words, are from exhausting, drawing out, or from departing, withdrawing, falling away.

Paleness is usually from failure, a departure of color.

Glory is from opening, expanding, display, or making clear.

Binding, making fast or close, is from pressure, or straining.

Writing is from scratching, engraving, the sense of all primitive words which express this act.

INTRODUCTION.

A crowd, a mass, a wood, &c., are from collecting or pressing, or some allied signification.

Vapor, steam, smoke, are usually from verbs which signify to exhale or throw off.

Stepping seems to be from opening, expanding, stretching. Thus passus in Latin is from pando, to open, but this agrees in origin with pateo, and with the Greek παύω. Gradus in Latin coincides with the Welsh rhawd, a way, and this, when traced to its root, terminates in the oriental רדח, Chaldee, to open, stretch or expand: in Syriac רדח radah, to go, to pass. Walking may be sometimes from a like source; but the word walk signifies primarily to roll, press, work and full, as a hat, whence walker signifies a fuller.

Softness and weakness are usually named from yielding, bending, withdrawing, as is relaxation. Softness however is sometimes connected with smoothness, and perhaps with moisture.

Sweetness seems to have for its primary sense, either softness or smoothness.

Roughness is from sharp points, wrinkling or breaking; and acidity is from sharpness or pungency, and nearly allied to roughness.

Death is expressed by falling or departure; life by fixedness or continuance, or from animation, excitement.

Selling is primarily, a passing or transfer. Sellan, in Saxon, signifies to give as well as to sell.

A coast or border, is usually the extreme point, from extending.

Law is from setting, establishing.

The primary sense of son, daughter, offspring, is usually a shoot, or as we say, issue. Hence in Hebrew בן ben, signifies both a son, a cion, a branch, and the young of other animals. A son, says Parkhurst, is from בנה banah, to build, and hence he infers that a son is so called, because he builds up or continues his father's house or family. But if so, how does the word apply to a branch, or an arrow? What do these build up? The mistake of this author, and of others, proceeds from their not understanding the original meaning of the verb, which is not to erect, or elevate, but to throw, to set, to found; and this verb is probably retained in our word found. A son is that which is thrown or shot out, a cion or branch is the same, an offset, one an offset of the human body, the other of a plant, and an arrow is that which is shot or thrown. Hence probably the Hebrew בן eben or even, a stone, W. maen, or vaen, that which is set, so named from its compactness or hardness.

And in Arabic أبى abana, signifies to think, Lat. opinor, that is, to set in the mind.

Few and small are senses often expressed by the same word. Thus, although few in English expresses merely a small number, yet the same word in French, peu, and in the Italian, poco, signifies little in quantity, as well as few in number.

Cause is from the sense of urging, pressing, impelling. Hence it well expresses that which produces an effect; and hence it is peculiarly expressive of that by which a man seeks to obtain a claim in law. A cause in court is properly a pressing for right, like action from ago; and prosecution from the Latin sequor, which is our word seek. Hence the Latin accuso, to accuse, to throw upon, to press or load with a charge. The Saxon saca, contention, suit in law, is synonymous with cause, and from the root of seek, sequor. It is the English sake.

The word thing is nearly synonymous with cause and sake. See Thing in the Dictionary.

The primary sense of time, luck, chance, fortune, is to fall, to come, to arrive, to happen. Tide, time and season, have a like original sense. Tide in Saxon is time, not a flow of the sea, the latter being a secondary and modern application of the word. This primary signification of time will unfold to us what I formerly could not understand, and what I could find no person to explain, that is, why the Latin tempora should signify times and the temples. It seems that tempora are the falls of the head. Hence also we understand why tempest is naturally deducible from tempus, as the primary sense is to fall, to rush. Hence tempestivus, seasonable, that comes in good time. Season has a like sense.

Hence also we are led to understand, what has seemed inexplicable, how the French heureux, lucky, happy, can be regularly deduced from heure, an hour. We find that in Greek and Latin, the primary sense of hour is time, and time is a coming, a falling, a happening, like the English luck, and hence the sense of lucky; hence fortunate and happy. The word fortunate is precisely of the same character.

The primary sense of the Shemitic דבר davar, or thavar, corresponds almost precisely with that of cause and thing in English, that is, to strain, urge, drive, fall or rush. Hence it signifies, to speak, and in Ch. and Syr. to lead, to direct, to govern. As a noun, it signifies a word, that which is uttered; a thing, cause or matter, that is, that which happens or falls, like event from evenio; also a plague, or great calamity, that is, that which falls, or comes on man or beast, like plague, a stroke or affliction, from striking. And it may be observed, that if the first letter is a prefix answering to the Gothic du, Saxon and English to, in the Saxon to-drifan, to drive, then the root ד coincides exactly with the Welsh peri, to command, which is retained in composition in the Lat. impero. Indeed if the first syllable of guberno is a prefix, the root of this word may be the same. The object however for which this word is here mentioned, is chiefly to show the uniformity which men have observed in expressing their ideas; making use of the same visible physical action to represent the operations of the mind and moral ideas.

Silence, deafness, dumbness, are from stopping, holding, or making fast.

War is from the sense of striving, driving, struggling.

Good is generally from enlarging, or advancing, like prosperous.

Evil is from wandering, departing, or sometimes from softness, weakness, flowing or fluxibility, as is the case with the Latin malum, from the Welsh mall.

The primary sense of the names of natural and material objects cannot always be ascertained. The reasons are obvious. Some of these names are detached branches of a family of words, which no longer form a part of our language, the verb and all the derivatives, except a single name, being extinct or found only in some remote country. Others of these names have suffered such changes of orthography, that it is difficult or impossible to ascertain the primary or radical letters, and of course the family to which they belong. Numerous examples of such words occur in English, as in every other language.

But from such facts as have occurred to me, in my researches, I may venture to affirm with confidence, that most names of natural objects are taken from some obvious quality or action, or some supposed quality of the thing; or from the particular action or operation by which it is produced. Thus tumors are named from pushing, or swelling; and redness, or red, seems, in some instances at least, to be named from eruptions on the body. The human body is named from shaping, that is, setting, fixing, or extending, and hence sometimes, the general name of the human race. The arm is a shoot, a push, as is the branch of a tree. A board, a table, a floor, is from spreading, or expanding, extending. Skin, and bark are from peeling, stripping, &c.

The names of particular animals and plants cannot always be traced to their source; but as far as I have been able to discover their origin, I find animals to be generally named from some striking characteristic of external appearance, from the voice, from habits of life, or from their office. There is reason for believing that the Greek σπούδα and Latin struthio, or ostrich, is from the same root as the English strut, the strutter; the primary sense of which root is, to stretch, which explains all the senses of the Greek and Latin words of this family. It is certain that the crow is named from its cry, and the leopard from his spots.

Thus plants were named from their qualities: some from their form, others from their color, others from their effects, others from the place of their growth. The English root, Lat. radix, is only a particular application of rod and ray, radius; that is, a shoot. Spurge is undoubtedly from the root of the Latin purgo.

There is reason to think that many names of plants were originally adjectives, expressing their qualities, or the name was a compound used for the same purpose, one part of which has been dropped, and the other remaining as the name of the plant. Thus pine, pinus, is from pin, pinna, penna; for in Welsh pin is a pin and a pen or style for writing, and pinbren is a pine-tree. The tree then was named from its leaf.

Fir has a similar origin and signification.

It is probable or rather certain that some natural objects, as plants and minerals, received their names from their supposed qualities; as in ages of ignorance and superstition, men might ascribe effects to them, by mistake. The whole history of magic and enchantment leads us to this conclusion.

Minerals are, in many instances, named from their obvious qualities, as gold from its yellowness, and iron from its hardness. The names can, in some cases, be traced to their original, as that of gold and of the Latin ferum; but many of them, are not easily ascertained. Indeed the greatest part of the specific names of animals, plants and minerals appear to be obscure. Some of them appear to have no connection with any family of words in our language, and many of them are derived to us from Asia, and from roots which can be found only, if found at all, in the Asiatic languages.

These observations and explanations will be sufficient to show the importance of developing, as far as possible, the origin of words, and of comparing the different uses of the same word in different languages, in order to understand either the philosophy of speech, or the real force and signification of words in their practical application.

If it should be found to be true, that many of the Shemitic verbs are formed with prefixes, like those of the European languages, this may lead to new illustrations of the original languages of the scriptures. In order to determine this fact, it will be useful to examine whether the Chaldee and Hebrew נ is not often a prefix answering to be in the Teutonic languages; whether נ and נ are not prefixes answering to the ga and ge of the Gothic and Teutonic; whether נ, נ and נ, and נ, a dialectical form of נ, do not coincide with the Gothic du, the Saxon to, the Dutch toe, and the German zu; whether נ does not answer to the Russ. and Dutch na, the German nach; and whether נ and נ do not answer to s, sh, and sch in the modern English and German.

If many of the Shemitic trilateral verbs are compound, it follows that the primary radix has not been detected. At any rate, I have no hesitation in affirming that the primary sense of many of the roots in the Shemitic lan-languages, that sense which is almost indispensable to an understanding of many obscure passages in the scriptures, has been hitherto overlooked or mistaken. In order fully to comprehend many uses of the words, it will be necessary to compare them with the uses of the words of the same family in the modern languages, and this comparison must be far more extensive than any hitherto made, and conducted on principles which have not been before duly appreciated and applied.

I have introduced the foregoing comparative view of the several significations of the same word in different languages, not merely to illustrate the general principles of language, but with a special reference to an explanation of the etymologies which occur in this work. Should my synopsis ever be published, the learned enquirer might pursue the subject at his pleasure.

The results of the foregoing remarks and illustrations may be thus recapitulated.

1. The nations which now constitute the distinct families or races of Japhet and Shem, are descendants of the common family which inhabited the plain of Shinar, before the dispersion.

2. The families at the dispersion retained a large proportion of the words which were in common use, before that event, and the same were conveyed to their posterity. In the course of time, some of these words were dropped by one family or tribe, and some by another, till very few of them are retained in their original form and signification by all the nations which have sprung from the main stock. A few of them however are still found in all or nearly all the languages which I have examined, bearing nearly the same signification and easily recognized as identical.

3. Although few of the primitive words can now be recognized, as existing in all the languages, yet as we better understand the changes which have been made in the orthography and signification of the same radical words, the more affinities are discovered; and particularly, when we understand the primary sense, we find this to unite words whose appropriate or customary significations appear to have no connection.

4. A great number of the primitive radical words are found in compounds, formed in different languages, with different affixes and prefixes, which obscure the affinity. Thus veritas in Latin is wahrheit in German; the first syllable in each is the same word, the last, different. In other instances, both difference of orthography, of formation and of application concur to obscure the affinity of words. Thus, the English word strong is in Danish streng, signifying stern, severe, rigid, strict; and strenged [stronghood] is severity, rigor, strictness. Now, n in these words is not radical; remove this letter and we have strog, streg, which coincide with the Latin stringo, strictus; and these words are found to be from the same radix, which signifies to draw, to strain, to stretch.

5. It appears that b, p and f are often prefixes, either the remains of prepositions, or casual additions to words, introduced by peculiar modes of pronunciation, which prefixes now precede consonants with which they readily coalesce in pronunciation, as l and r, forming trilateral words on biliteral roots; as in block from lloc, or lock; play, Saxon plegan, from leg or lek. Swedish leka, Dan. leger; flow, Lat. fluo, from lug, or luc, which appears in light, lux, luceo, and in lug, a river, retained in Lugdunum.

6. It appears also that c or k and g, are often prefixes before the same consonants, l and r, as in Lat. clunis, Eng. loin; W. clod, praise, from lod, Latin, laus, laudo; German gluck, English luck; Lat. gratia, W. rhad.

7. It appears also that s is a prefix in a vast number of words, as in speed, spoil, swell, sweep; and it is very evident that st are prefixed to many words whose original, radical, initial consonant was r, as in straight, strict, strong, stretch, from the root of right, rectus, reach, and in stride, from the root of the Latin gradior, W. rhaz.

If these inferences are just, as I am persuaded they are, it follows that there is a more near resemblance and a much closer affinity between the languages of Europe and of Western Asia, than has hitherto been supposed to exist. It follows also that some of the most important principles or rudiments of language have hitherto escaped observation, and that philology is yet in its infancy. Should this prove, on further examination, to be the state of philology, it is reserved for future investigators to examine the original languages of the scriptures on new principles, which may serve to illustrate some obscure and difficult passages, not hitherto explained to the general satisfaction of critics and commentators.

If any persons should be disposed to doubt or contradict these facts, let them first consider that my conclusions are not hasty opinions, formed on isolated facts; but that they have been forced upon me, in opposition to all my former habits of thinking, by a series of successive proofs and accumulating evidence, during a long course of investigation, in which I have compared most of the radical words, in more than twenty languages, twice and some of them three times.

No part of my researches has given me more trouble or solicitude, than that of arriving at the precise radical signification of moral ideas; such for example, as hope, love, favor, faith. Nor has it been with much less labor that I have obtained a clear knowledge of some of our physical actions. It is literally true that I have sometimes had a word under consideration for two or three years, before I could satisfy my own mind, as to the primary signification. That I have succeeded at last, in every instance, can hardly be supposed—yet, in most cases, I am perfectly satisfied with the results of my researches.

Progress and Changes of the English Language.

It has been already observed that the mother tongue of the English is the Anglo-Saxon. The following are specimens of that language as it was spoken or written in England before the Norman conquest. The first is from the Saxon Chronicle. The original is in one column, and the literal translation in the other. The English words in italics are Saxon words. The number of these will show how large a proportion of the words is retained in the present English.

An. DCCCXCI. Her for se here east, and Earnulf cyning gefeah with thæm ræde-here ær tha scipu comon mid East-Francum, and Scaxum, and Bægerum, and hine gelymde. And thry Scottas cwomon to Ælfrede cyninge on anum bate, butan ælcum gerethum, of Hibernia; and thenon hi hi besta-lon, forthon the hi woldon for Godes lufan on eltheodinesse bion, hy ne rohton hwær.

An. 891. Here [this year] fared the army east and Earnulf, the king, fought with the cavalry [ride army] ere the ships come, with the East-Franks, and Saxons and Bavarians, and put them to flight. And three Scots come to Ælfred, the king, in a [an] boat, without any rowers, from Hibernia, and thence they privately withdrew [bestole] because that they would, for God's love be [or live] where they should not be anxious—[reck, care.]

Se bat was geworht of thriddan healfre hyde, the hic on foron, and himamon mid him that hie had-lon to seofon nihtum mete, and tha comon hie ymb seofon niht, to londe on Cornwealum, and foran tha sona to Ælfrede cyninge.

The boat was wrought of two hides and a half [third half hide,] in which they fared [came] and they took with them that they had for seven nights meat, and they come about the seventh night, to land in Cornwall, and fared [went] soon to Ælfred, the king.

The following specimen is from the Anglo-Saxon version of Orosius, supposed to be made by King Alfred.

Ohthere sæde his hlaforde, Ælfrede kyninge, thæt he ealra North-manna north mest bude. He cwæth thæt he bude on thæm lande north-weardum with tha west sæ. He sæde theah thæt thæt land sy swythe north thanon; ac hit is eall west buton on seawum stowum sticce mælum wiciath Finnas, on huntathe on wintra, and on sumera on fiscothe be there sæ. Othere told [said] his lord, king Alfred, that he lived north most of all the north men. He quoth that he dwell in the [them] land northward, opposite [with] the west sea. He said though, that that land is due north from thence, and that it is all waste except [but] in a few places [stows] where the Finns for the most part dwell, for hunting in winter, and in summer for fishing in that sea, [by the sea.] He said that he, at some time, would find how long that land lay right north.

Laws of King Æthelbert.

Gif man gold-finger (of a slæhth) VI scil. gebete. Gif man thon litan finger (of a slæhth) XI scil. gebete.

If the thumb shall be cut off, twenty shillings. If the thumb nail shall be cut off, three shillings shall be the compensation. If any one [off slayeth, striketh off,] cutteth off the fore finger [shoot finger,] let him compensate with eight shillings. If one cutteth off the middle finger, let him pay four shillings. If any one cutteth off the gold finger [ring finger,] let him pay six shillings. If any one cutteth off the little finger, let him pay eleven shillings.

INTRODUCTION.

Laws of King Eadgar.

We læraþ that eac cristen man his bearn to cristendome geornlice wenige and him pater noster and eredon tæce.

We order or instruct that each christian man earnestly accustom [wean] his children to christianity [Christendom] and teach him the Pater Noster and Creed.

We læraþ that preost ne beo hunta ne hafecere ne tæflere; ac plegge on his bocum swa his hade gebirath.

We direct that a priest be not a hunter, nor hawker, nor a gamester; but that he apply to his books, as it becomes his order.

We observe by these extracts that rather more than half the Saxon words have been lost, and now form no part of our language.

This language, with some words introduced by the Danes, continued to be used by the English, till the Norman conquest. After that event, great numbers of Saxon words went into disuse, not suddenly, but gradually, and French and Latin words, were continually added to the language, till it began to assume its present form, in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Yet the writings of Gower and Chaucer cannot now be fully understood without a glossary.

But it was not in the loss of native Saxon words and the accession of French and Latin words alone that the change of our language consisted. Most important alterations were made in the sounds of the vowels. It is probable, if not certain, that our first vowel a had usually or always the broad sound, as we now pronounce it in fall, or in some words perhaps the Italian sound, as it is now called, and as we pronounce it in ask. The sound of e was probably nearly the same as it is in French and Italian, and in the northern languages on the continent of Europe; which is nearly that of a in favor. The Saxon sound of i was probably the same as it is still on the continent, the sound of ee or long e. The sound of u was that of our present oo, French ou, the sound it still has in Italian, and in most countries on the European continent. It is probable that the change of the sound of u happened in consequence of the prevalence of the French pronunciation after the conquest; for the present sound of u may be considered as intermediate, between the full sound of oo, or French ou, and the French sound of u.

These changes, and the various sounds given to the same character, now serve to perplex foreigners, when learning English; and tend, in no small degree, to retard or limit the extension of our language. This is an unfortunate circumstance, not only in obstructing the progress of science, but of christianity.

The principal changes in the articulations are the use of k for c, as in look for locian; the loss of h before l, as in loaf from hlaf, lot for hlot, lean for hlinian; and the entire loss of the prefix ge or ga, as in deal for ge-dalan, deem for ge-deman; and of to as a prefix, as in to-helpen, to help; to-dalian, to deal. In no instance do we feel more sensibly the change of sounds in the vowels, than in that of i, which in French, Spanish and Italian, is e long; for in consequence of this, persons, who are not acquainted with these foreign languages, mispronounce such words as marino, Messina, Lima, giving to i its English sound, when in fact the words are to be pronounced mareeno, Messeena, Leema.

In grammatical structure, the language has suffered considerable alterations. In our mother tongue, nouns were varied to form cases, somewhat as in Latin. This declension of nouns has entirely ceased, except in the possessive or genitive case, in which an apostrophe before s has been substituted for the regular Saxon termination es. Some of our pronouns retain their declensions, somewhat varied. The plural termination in en has been dropped, in a number of words, and the regular plural termination been substituted, as houses for housen.

In most cases, the Saxon termination of the infinitive mode of verbs, has been dropped, and for gifan, we now write, to give. The variations of the verb, in the several persons, have been materially changed. Thus for the Saxon—

we now write—	Ic lufige,	We lufiath,
	Thu lufast,	Ge lufiath,
	He lufath.	Hi lufiath.
	I love,	We love,
	Thou lovest,	Ye love,
	He loveth or loves.	They love.

In the Saxon plural however we see the origin of the vulgar practice, still retained in some parts of England and of this country. We loves, they loves, which are contractions of lufiath.

In the substantive verb, our common people universally, and most persons of better education, unless they have rejected their traditionary language, retain the Gothic dialect, in the past tense.

I was,	We was,
Thou wast,	Ye was,
He was.	They was.

However people may be ridiculed for this language, it is of genuine origin, as old as the Saxon word were. In Gothic, the past tense runs thus—

Ik was,	Weis wesum,
Thu wast,	Yus wesuth,
Is was.	Eis wesun.*

In the present tense of the substantive verb, our common people use a'nt as in this phrase: "he a'nt present." This is evidently a contraction of the Swedish and Danish, är, er, present, indicative, singular, of the substantive verb, vara or værer, to be, which we retain in are and were.

In Swedish, han är, and in Danish, han er, he is. Hence he er not or ar not, contracted into he a'nt or e'nt.

These facts serve to show how far the Gothic dialect has been infused into the English language.

It would be tedious and to most readers uninteresting, to recite all the changes in the forms of words or the structure of sentences which have taken place, since the Norman conquest. Since the invention of printing, changes in the language have been less rapid, than before; but no art nor effort can completely arrest alterations in a living language. The distinguished writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth, improved the language, but could not give it stability. Many words then in common use are now obsolete or have suffered a change of signification. In the period between Queen Elizabeth, and the beginning of the eighteenth century, the language was improved in grammar, orthography, and style. The writers in the reign of Queen Ann and of George I, brought the language nearly to perfection; and if any improvement has since been made, it is in the style or diction, by a better selection of words, and the use of terms in science and philosophy with more precision.

In regard to grammatical construction, the language, for half a century past, has, in my apprehension, been suffering deterioration, at least as far as regards its written form. This change may be attributed chiefly to the influence of the learned Bishop Lowth, whose grammar made its appearance nearly sixty years ago. I refer particularly to his form of the verb, which was adjusted to the practice of writers in the age of Queen Elizabeth, instead of the practice of authors in the age of William and Mary, Queen Ann, and George I. Hence he gives for the form of the verb in the subjunctive mode, after the words which express a condition, if, though, &c. I love, thou love, he love, observing in a note, that in the subjunctive mode, the event being spoken of under a condition or supposition, or in the form of a wish, and therefore doubtful and contingent, the verb itself in the present, and the auxiliary both of the present and past imperfect times, often carry with them somewhat of a future sense; as "if he come to-morrow, I may speak to him"—"If he should come, I should speak to him." This is true; but for that very reason, this form of the verb belongs to the future tense, or should be arranged as such in Grammars. If he come, would be in Latin si venerit, in the subjunctive future.

But the learned author has entirely overlooked the important distinction between an event or fact, of uncertain existence in the present time, and which is mentioned under the condition of present existence, and a future contingent event. "If the mail that has arrived contains a letter for me, I shall soon receive it," is a phrase that refers to the present time, and expresses an uncertainty in my mind, respecting the fact. "If the mail contain a letter for me," refers to a future time, that is, "if the mail of to-morrow contain [shall or should contain] a letter for me." The first event, conditional or hypothetical, should be expressed by the indicative mode, and the latter by the subjunctive future. The Saxon form of the verb, if he slay, if he go, is evidently a contingent future, and is so used in the laws.

This distinction, one of the most important in the language, has been so totally overlooked, that no provision has been made for it in British Grammars; nor is the distinction expressed by the form of the verb, as used by a great part of the best writers. On the other hand, they continually use one form of the verb to express both senses. The fact is the same in the common version of the scriptures. If he go, if he speak, sometimes express a present conditional tense, and sometimes a contingent future. In general this subjunctive form of the verb in scripture, expresses future time. "If he thus say, I have no delight in thee," expresses a future contingent event. 2 Sam. xv. 26. "If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away," expresses a fact, under a condition, in the present time. Job xi. 14.

In many instances, the translators have deviated from the original, in using the subjunctive form of the English verb to express what in Greek, is expressed in the indicative. Thus Matthew iv. 6. Εἰ υἱὸς εἶ τοῦ Θεοῦ, if thou be [art] the son of God.

Ch. v. 29 and 30. Εἰ δὲ ὁ ὀφθαλμὸς σου ὁ δεξιὸς σκανδαλίζει σε; if thy right eye offend, [offendeth] thee; εἰ ἡ δεξιὰ σου χεὶρ σκανδαλίζει σε, if thy right hand offend, [offendeth] thee.

So also in Chapter xviii. 8 and 9.

* This is probably the Latin esse. The Latins dropped the first articulation e, which answers to our u.

The present tense indicative mode of the Latin verb, with the e restored, would be written thus.

Ego vesum,	nos vesumus, [was,] tu ves,	vos vestis, [was,] ille vest.	illi vesunt, [was,]

INTRODUCTION.

Ch. xii. 26. Εἰ ὁ σατανᾶς τὸν σατανᾶν ἐκβάλλει, if Satan cast [casteth] out Satan.

Ch. xix. 10. Εἰ οὕτως εἰνῇ ἡ αἰτία τοῦ ἀνθρώπου μετὰ τῆς γυναῖκος, if the case of the man be [is] so with his wife.

Ch. xxii. 45. Εἰ οὖν Δαβὶδ καλεῖ αὐτὸν Κύριον, if David then call [calleth] him Lord.

2 Cor. iv. 16. Εἰ ὁ ἐξω ἡμῶν ἀνθρώπος διαφθείρεται, though our outward man perish, [perishes or is perishing.]

In all these passages, the English verb, in the subjunctive, properly expresses a conditional, contingent or hypothetical future tense, contrary to the sense of the original, except in the last passage cited, where the apostle evidently speaks of the perishing of the outward man as a fact admitted, which renders the translation still more improper.

Let us now attend to the following passages.

Matthew vii. 9. Ἢ τίς ἐστὶν ἐξ ὑμῶν ἀνθρώπος, ὃν τὰν αἰτήσῃ ὁ υἱὸς αὐτοῦ ἀπὸν, or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask [shall ask] bread, will he give him a stone.

Καὶ τὰν ἐχθρὸν αἰτήσῃ, if he ask [shall ask] a fish, will he give him a serpent.

Here the original tense is varied to express a future or hypothetical event, yet the verb in English is in the same tense as in the first class of examples; and what renders the version more objectionable, is, that the verb in the first clause, does not correspond with that in the second clause. There is no possible way of making good English of the translation, but by supposing the verb in the first clause ask, to be in the future tense. So it would be in Latin, and so it is, "si petierit." If thy son shall ask (or should ask) a fish, will he give, (or would he give) him a serpent?

This fault runs through the whole English version of the scriptures, and a distinction of tenses clearly marked in the original languages, is generally neglected in the translation.

Now the most unlettered man in this country, would express the sense in English, with the same marked distinction of tenses, which appears in the Greek. If thou art the son of God; if thy right eye offends thee; if the case of the man is such; if David calls him Lord; or if the sense is understood to be future and contingent, if thy son shall ask bread, or if he should ask bread, would be the uniform language of any of the common people of our country. There would not probably be a single exception, unless in the use of the substantive verb, which is often used in the subjunctive form. And the most unlettered man would use the corresponding verbs in the two clauses, if he shall ask, will he give; or if he should ask, would he give. The use of the verb in all similar phrases, is perfectly well settled in this country, and perfectly uniform among the higher and lower classes of men; unless when the practice has been varied by the influence of Grammarians, in which the conjugation of the verb is according to the antiquated practice of the age of Elizabeth.

1 Tim. v. 4. Εἰ δὲ τις χήρα τέκνα ἢ ἐκγόνα ἔχει, if any widow, have [has] children or nephews.

Verse 8. Εἰ δὲ τις τῶν ἰδίων καὶ μαλίστα τῶν οὐκῶν οὐ προνοεῖ, if any provide [provideth] not for his own, and especially for those of his own house.

This subjunctive form of the verb, if he be; if he have; if he go; if he say; if thou write; whether thou see; though he fall, which was generally used by the writers of the sixteenth century, was, in a great measure, discarded before the time of Addison. Whether this change was in consequence of the prevalence of colloquial usage over grammar rules, or because discerning men perceived the impropriety and inconsistency of the language of books, I pretend not to determine. Certain it is, that Locke, Watts, Addison, Pope, and other authors of the first distinction, who adorned the close of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, generally used the indicative mode to express condition, uncertainty, and hypothesis in the present and past tenses. Thus Locke writes—"If these two propositions are by nature imprinted." "If principles are innate." "If any person hath never examined this notion." "Whether that substance thinks or no." "If the soul doth think in sleep." "If one considers well these men's way of speaking." "If he does not reflect." "Unless that notion produces a constant train of successive ideas." "If your Lordship means." Such is the language of Locke.

Now what is remarkable, the learned Dr. Lowth, the very author who has, by his grammar, done much to sanction the subjunctive form of the verb, in such cases, often uses the indicative in his own writings. "If he does not carefully attend to this—if this pleasure arises from the shape of the composition—if this is not firmly and well established." These verbs are in contradiction of his own principles. On Isaiah. Prelim. Diss.

Addison. "If the reader has a mind to see a father of the same stamp." "If exercise throws off all superfluities—if it clears the vessels—if it dissipates a growing distemper." Such is the language of Addison, the most elegant writer of the genuine English idiom in the nation.

"If the thief is poor—if it obliges me to be conversant with scenes of wretchedness."

"If America is not to be conquered."

"If we are to be satisfied with assertions." "If it gives blind confidence to any executive government." "If such an opinion has gone forth."

"If our conduct has been marked with vigor and wisdom."

"If my bodily strength is equal to the task." "A negro, if he works for himself and not a for master, will do double the work." "If there is any aggravation of our guilt." "If their conduct displays no true wisdom." "The honorable gentleman may, if he chooses, have the journals read again." "Whether this is a sufficient tie to unite them." "If this measure comes recommended." "If there exists a country which contains the means of protection."

"If the prudence of reserve and decorum dictates silence." "If an assembly is viciously or feebly composed." "If any persons are to make good deficiencies." "If the King of the French has really deserved these murderous attempts." "If this representation of M. Neckar was false." "Whether the system, if it deserves the name." "The politician looks for a power that our workmen call a purchase, and if he finds the power."

"If he feels as men commonly feel." "If climate has such an effect on mankind." "If the effects of climate are casual."

"If he finds his collection too small." "If he thinks his judgment not sufficiently enlightened." "Whether it leads to truth." "If he learns others against his own failings." This is generally the language of Johnson.

In regard to this distinguished author, I would observe that, except the substantive verb, there is in his Rambler but a single instance of the subjunctive form of the verb in conditional sentences. In all other cases the use of the indicative is uniform.

Such also is the language of the most distinguished men in the United States, particularly of those who wrote their native language as they received it from tradition, and before grammars had made any impression on its genuine construction.

"The prince that acquires new territory, if he finds it vacant." "If we are industrious we shall never starve." "If one has more corn than he can consume, and another has less." Such is the language of Franklin.

"If any persons thus qualified are to be found." "If it is thought proper." "If the congress does not choose to point out the particular regiment." "If I am rightly informed." "If the army has not removed." "If a proposition has not been made." Such is the language of Washington.

"If any philosopher pretends." "If he has food for the present day." "If a revelation is not impossible." "If the Christian system contains a real communication to mankind." "If the former of these facts opposes our reception of the miraculous history of the gospel." "If the preceding reflections are just." Such is the language of the late President Smith.

"If any government deems the introduction of foreigners or their merchandize injurious." "Unless he violates the law of nations." "If a person has a settlement in a hostile country." "If he resides in a belligerent country." "If a foreign Consul carries on trade as a merchant." Such is the language of the ex-Chancellor Kent.

But neither the authors here mentioned, nor most others, even the most distinguished for erudition, are uniform and consistent with themselves in the use of the tenses. In one sentence we find the indicative used, "If it is to be discovered only by the experiment." "If other indications are to be found." In the next sentence, "If to miscarry in an attempt be a proof of having mistaken the direction of genius."

"If the former be refined—if those virtues are accompanied with equal abilities."

"If love rewards him, or if vengeance strike."

"Or if it does not brand him to the last."

"If he is a pagan—if endeavors are used—if the person hath a liberal education—if man be subject to these miseries."

The following expressions occur in Pope's Preface to Homer's Iliad, in the compass of thirteen lines.

"If he has given a regular catalogue of an army."

"If he has funeral games for Patroclus."

"If Ulysses visit the shades."

"If he be detained from his return."

"If Achilles be absent."

"If he gives his hero a suit of celestial armor."

I recollect one English author only, who has been careful to avoid this inconsistency; this is Gregory, who, in his Economy of Nature, has uniformly used the indicative form of the verb in conditional sentences of this kind.

The like inconsistency occurs in almost all American writings. "If moral disposition lie here." "If preference necessarily involves the knowledge of obligation." "If the proposition is true." "If the proposition be confirmed." "If he refutes any thing."

In a pamphlet now before me, there are no less than fifty of these inconsistencies in the compass of ninety pages; and three of them in one sentence.

*The substantive verb is often used in the subjunctive form by writers who never use that form in any other verb. The reason doubtless is that be is primarily the indicative as well as the subjunctive mode of that verb. I be, we be, as used in Scripture. So in German Ich bin.

INTRODUCTION.

Now, in this case, is a foreigner to understand the author? and how can such sentences be translated into another language without a deviation from the original?

The propriety of using the indicative form of the verb to express a present or past event conditionally, does not rest solely on usage; it is most correct upon principle. It is well known, that most of the words which are used to introduce a condition or hypothesis, and called most improperly conjunctions, are verbs, having not the least affinity to the class of words used to connect sentences. If is the Saxon gif, give, having lost its first letter; if for the ancient gif. Though is also a verb now obsolete, except in the imperative mode. Now let us analyze this conditional tense of the verb. "If the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel." Here is an omission of the word that after if. The true original phrase was "If that the man knows his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel"—that is, give that [admit the fact which is expressed in the following clause] the man knows his true interest, then the consequence follows, he will avoid a quarrel. That in this sentence is a relative or demonstrative substitute for the following clause. This will more plainly appear by transposing the clauses. "The man knows his true interest; give that [admit that:] he will then avoid a quarrel. Now let the subjunctive form be used. "The man know his true interest; give that; he will avoid a quarrel."

Here the impropriety of this form of the verb appears in a strong light. It will appear more clearly by the use of other words of equivalent signification. Grant the man know his true interest, he will avoid a quarrel. Allow the man know his true interest. Suppose the man know his true interest. We never use the subjunctive form after the three last verbs which introduce the condition. Though is sometimes followed by the indicative; sometimes by the subjunctive; but it ought always to be followed by the indicative, for it supposes the fact to be given; and so does admit, when used in hypothetical sentences. Admit that the man knows his interest. We have then decisive proof that the use of the indicative form of the verb after if, when it expresses a conditional event in present time, is most correct; indeed it is the only correct form. This remark is equally applicable to the past tense, conditional.

The language of Addison, Johnson, and other distinguished writers of the last century, in the use of the indicative, is therefore, more correct than the language of the writers in the age of Elizabeth; and their practice is principally the common usage of our country at this day.

I have, therefore, constructed a grammar on this usage; bringing down the standard of writing a century and a half later than Bishop Lowth. I have done this, first, on the authority of strict analogical principles, as above stated; secondly, on the authority of the best usage of that cluster of distinguished writers who adorned the beginning of the last century; and thirdly, on the authority of universal colloquial practice, which I consider as the real and only genuine language. I repeat this remark, that general and respectable usage in speaking is the genuine or legitimate language of a country to which the written language ought to be conformed. Language is that which is uttered by the tongue, and if men do not write the language as it is spoken by the great body of respectable people, they do not write the real language. Now, in colloquial usage, the subjunctive form of the verb, in conditional sentences, is rarely used, and perhaps never, except when the substantive verb is employed. Our students are taught in school the subjunctive form, if thou have, if he come, &c. and some of them continue, in after life, to write in that manner; but in the course of more than forty years, I have not known three men who have ventured to use that form of the verb in conversation. We toil in school to learn a language which we dare not introduce into conversation, but which the force of custom compels us to abandon. In this respect, the present study of grammar is worse than useless.

This colloquial custom accords with other languages. The French say and write s'il est, if he is. The Latins often used the same form, "si quid est in me ingenii, judices;" but the use of the Latin subjunctive depends on certain other words which precede; as "cum sit civis," as he is a citizen, or, since he is a citizen; and the present tense is often used to express what we express by an auxiliary. That the Greeks used the indicative to express a conditional present tense, we have seen by citations above.

By this arrangement of the verb, the indicative form after if and other verbs introducing a condition or hypothesis, may be used uniformly to express a fact or event under a condition or supposition, either in the present or past tenses; the speaker being uncertain respecting the fact, or representing it as doubtful.

If the man is honest, he will return what he has borrowed. If the ship has arrived, we shall be informed of it tomorrow. If the bill was presented, it was doubtless paid. If the law has been passed, we are precluded from further opposition.

On the other hand, when it is intended to speak of a future contingent event, I would always use the auxiliaries that are proper for the purpose. "If it shall or should rain tomorrow, we shall not ride to town." I would never use the subjunctive form if it rain in prose; and in poetry, only from necessity, as an abridged phrase for if it shall or should rain. In this manner, the distinction between the tenses, which are now constantly confounded, may be preserved and made obvious, both to natives and foreigners.

The effect of the study of Lowth's principles, which has been greatly extended by the popularity of Murray's grammar,* has been to introduce, or establish a form of the verb in writing, which is obsolete in colloquial language; to fill our books with a confusion of tenses, and thus to keep the language unsettled. Nothing can be more perplexing to the student than every where to meet with discrepancies between rules and practice.

There is another erroneous manner of writing, common to the best authors in the language, which seems to have escaped notice. This is, to connect a verb in the past tense with a preceding one in the same tense, when the latter verb is intended to express a very different time from the former. Thus, "Then Manasseh knew that the Lord, he was God." 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13.

The Latins, in this case, would probably have used the infinitive; Manasseh novit Jehovah deum esse. In English we ought to write and say, "Manasseh knew Jehovah to be God," or, Manasseh knew that Jehovah he is God. In most similar cases, the use of the infinitive in English is as elegant as in Latin. But there are many cases where the infinitive cannot be used. We cannot use it after say; "he said him to be a good man," is not English; though he declared, or affirmed, or believed him to be a good man, is elegant.

In order to understand the impropriety of the common mode of using the latter verb, as in the example above cited, it may be remarked, that the present tense is that which is used to express what exists at all times. Thus we say, God is or exists, whenever we speak of his permanent existence; we say, gold is yellow or ductile; iron is a most valuable metal; it is not convertible into silver; plants and animals are very distinct living beings. We do not say, gold was yellow; iron was a valuable metal; for we mean to express permanent qualities. Hence, in the passage cited from Chronicles, the first verb knew, referring to a fact past, is correct; but the last, which is intended to express the permanent being or character of God, should be in the infinitive or the indicative present tense. The following are examples of correct language: "His master had taught him that happiness consists in virtue." Anacharsis, ii. 120.

"Sabellius, who openly taught that there is but one person in the God-head." Encyclopedia.

"Our Savior taught that eternal death is the proper punishment of sin." Emmons.

But very different is the following: "Having believed for many years, that water was [is] an elastic fluid." The following would be still better: "Having believed water to be an elastic fluid."

So the following: "We know not the use of the epidermis of shells. Some authors have supposed that it secured [secures] the shells from being covered with vermes." Edin. Encyc.

"It was just remarked, that marine fossils did not [do not] comprise vegetable remains." Ib.

"If my readers will turn their thoughts back on their old friends, they will find it difficult to call a single man to remembrance who appeared to know that life was short [is short,] till he was about to lose it."

"They considered the body as a hydraulic machine, and the fluids as passing through a series of chemical changes; forgetting that animation was [is] its essential characteristic." Darwin.

"It was declared by Pompey, that if the Commonwealth was [should be] violated, he could stamp with his foot and raise an army out of the ground."

Rambler, No. 10.

In the foregoing sentence, the past tense is used for the future contingent. "It was affirmed in the last discourse, that much of the honorable practice of the world rested [rests] on the substratum of selfishness; that society was [is] held together, in the exercise of its relative virtues, mainly by the tie of reciprocal advantage; that a man's own interest bound [binds] him to all those average equities which obtained [obtain] in the neighborhood around him; and in which if he proved [should prove] himself glaringly deficient, he would be abandoned by the respect, and the confidence, and the good will of the people with whom he had [might have, or should have] to do."

Chalmers's Com. Dis. 4.

"In the last discourse, I observed that love constituted [constitutes] the whole moral character of God," Dwight's Theology.

"And he said, nay, father Abraham; but if one went [shall or should go] to them from the dead, they will repent. And he said to him, if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose [shall or should rise] from the dead." Luke, xvi. 30, 31.

"Independent of parties in the national legislature itself, as often as the period of discussion arrived, the state legislatures, who will always be not only vigilant, but suspicious and jealous guardians of the rights of the citizens, against encroachments from the federal government, will constantly have their attention awake to the conduct of the national rulers, and will be ready enough, if any thing improper appears, to sound the alarm to the people."

* Lindley Murray, in the introduction to his grammar, "acknowledges, in general terms, that the authors to whom the grammatical part of this compilation is principally indebted for its materials are, Harris, Johnson, Lowth, Priestley, Beattie, Sheridan, Walker, and Coote." But on examination, it appears that the greatest portion of the grammatical part is from Lowth, whose principles form the main structure of Murray's compilation. Some valuable notes and remarks are taken from Priestley's grammar. I studied grammar in the originals long before Murray's compilation appeared, and, in citing authorities, deem it proper to cite the originals.

Let any man attempt to resolve the foregoing sentence, if he can, or render it into another language.

"Cicero vindicated the truth, and inculcated the value of the precept, that nothing was [is] truly useful which was [is] not honest."

"He undertook to show that justice was [is] of perpetual obligation."

"The author concedes much of his argument, and admits that the sea was [is] susceptible of dominion." [Better still; he admits the sea to be susceptible of dominion.]

"A nation would be condemned by the impartial voice of mankind, if it voluntarily went [should go] to war, on a claim of which it doubted [should doubt] the legality."

"The Supreme Court observed that they were not at liberty to depart from the rule, whatever doubt might have been entertained, if the case was [had been] entirely new."

"He held that the law of nations prohibited [prohibits] the use of poisoned arms."

"He insisted that the laws of war gave [give] no other power over a captive than to keep him safely."

"The general principle on the subject is, that, if a commander makes a compact with the enemy, and it be of such a nature that the power to make it could be reasonably implied from the nature of the trust, it would be valid and binding, though he abused his trust." Let any man translate this sentence into another language, if he can, without reducing the verbs to some consistency.

"Congress have declared by law, that the United States were [are] entitled to priority of payment over private creditors, in cases of insolvency."

"The Supreme Court decided, that the acts of Congress, giving that general priority to the United States, were [are] constitutional."

"It was admitted that the government of the United States was [is] one of enumerated powers."

"From his past designs and administrations we could never argue at all to those which were future." [This is an odd combination of words.]

"Jesus knowing that the father had given all things into his hands, and that he was come from God and went to God." John xiii. 3.

"Alexander dispatched Eumenes with three hundred horse to two free cities—with assurance that if they submitted and received him, [should or would submit and receive,] as a friend, no evil should befall them."

"The apostle knew that the present season was [is] the only time allowed for this preparation."

"What would be the real effect of that overpowering evidence, which our adversaries required, [should require,] in a revelation, it is difficult to foretell."

"It could not otherwise have been known that the word had [has] this meaning."

I told him if he went [should go] to-morrow, I would go with him.

This fault occurs in our hearing every hour in the day.

A like fault prevails in other languages; indeed the English may have been led into it by reading foreign authors. "Mais on a remarqué avec raison, que l'espace conchoïdal était infini." Lunier. It has been remarked with reason that the conchoïdal space was [is] infinite.

But whatever may be the practice of other nations, there would be no difficulty in correcting such improprieties in our own language, if as much attention were given to the study of its true principles, as is given to other subjects of literature and science. But if in this particular, there is a British or American author who writes his vernacular language correctly, his writings have not fallen under my inspection.

There is another fault very common among English writers, though it is less frequent in the United States; this is the conversion of an intransitive verb into a passive one. It is surprising that an error of this kind should have gained such an established use, in some foreign languages, as to be incurable. Barbarous nations may indeed form languages; but it should be the business of civilized men to purify their language from barbarisms.

In the transitive verb, there is an agent that performs some action on an object, or in some way affects it. When this verb becomes passive, the agent and the object change places in the sentence. Thus, John loves Peter, is transitive, but Peter is loved by John, is passive. In the intransitive verb, the case is different; for the action is limited to the agent; and when it is stated that a thing is done, there is no agent by which it is done. I perish is intransitive; I am perished is the passive form; but the latter neither expresses nor implies an agent by which I perish.

This fault occurs frequently in the common version of the Scriptures.

"Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me, in whom old age was [had] perished." Job xxx. 2.

"Their memorial is [has] perished with them." Ps. ix. 6.

"The heathen are [have] perished out of this land." Ps. x. 16.

"Israel is [has] fled before the Philistines." 1 Sam. iv. 17.

"David is [has] fled." 2 Sam. xix. 9.

"The days were [had] not expired." 1 Sam. xviii. 26.

"And when the year was [had] expired." 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10.

"I only am [have] escaped alone to tell thee." Job i. 15.

"And it came to pass, when he was [had] returned." Luke xix. 15.

Return is sometimes a transitive verb, and sometimes intransitive. When a sum of borrowed money is returned, the phrase is correct, for this is the passive form of a transitive verb. But when a man is returned, we may ask, who has returned him? In this case, the man returns by his own act, and he cannot be said to be returned.

"He found the Empress was [had] departed." Core.

"They were [had] arrived within three days journey of the spice country." Gibbon, Ch. i. Note.

"Neither Charles nor Diocletian were [had] arrived at a very advanced period of life." Ib. Ch. xiii.

"The posterity of so many gods and heroes was [had] fallen into the most abject state." Ib. Ch. ii.

"Silver was [had] grown more common." Ib.

"He was [had] risen from the dead, and was [had] just ascended to heaven." Milner, i. 20.

"Hearing that they were [had] arrived." Ib. 211.

"Claudius—vexed because his wife was [had] become a christian." Ib. 274.

"Does not the reader see how much we are [have] already departed from christian simplicity?" Ib. 299.

"My age is [has] departed." Isaiah xxxviii. 12.

"The man out of whom the demons were [had] departed." Luke viii. 35.

"Workmen were [had] arrived to assist them." Mitford.

"A body of Athenian horse was [had] just arrived." Ib.

This fault is common in Mitford's History of Greece. In the writings of Roscoe, which are more elegant, it occurs, but less frequently.

"The time limited for the reception of the cardinal was expired." Roscoe, Leo. X.

"He inquired whether the report was true, that a legate was arrived." Ib. L. Med.

"The nation being [having] once more got into a course of borrowing." Price on Liberty.

"When he was [had] retired to his tent." Core's Russ.

"He was [had] not yet arrived." Ib.

The intransitive verb grow is constantly used by the English as a transitive verb, as to grow wheat. This is never used in the northern states, unless by persons who have adopted it recently from the English.

It seems almost incredible that such errors should continue, to this time, to disfigure the language of the most distinguished writers, and that they should escape animadversion. The practice has evidently been borrowed from the French or Italian; but surely no lover of correctness can excuse such violation of the best established principles in our language.

This fault occurs in a few instances, in the writings of the best American authors, as in the writings of Ames and Hamilton. It is however very rare, either in books or in colloquial usage. Even our common people are remarkably accurate in using the auxiliary have with the participles of intransitive verbs. They always, I believe, say, a ship has arrived, a plant has perished, the enemy had fled, the price had fallen, the corn has or had grown, the time has expired, the man has returned, the vessel had departed. Such also is the language of our most eminent writers.

"The Generals Gates and Sullivan have both arrived." Washington's Letters.

"The Indians of the village had fled." B. Trumbull.

"Our Tom has grown a sturdy boy." Progress of Dullness.

"Our patriots have fallen." Discourse of D. Webster, Aug. 1826.

"Our commissary had not arrived." Ellicott.

The exceptions to this correct practice are chiefly in the use of the participles of come and go. It is very common to hear the expressions he is come or is gone, in which case, the participle seems to take the character of an adjective; although in most instances, the regular form of expression, he has come or has gone, is to be preferred. So dead, originally a participle, is used only as an adjective; and deceased and departed are often used in the like manner. We say, a deceased, or departed friend; but it should be remarked that the original expression was, our friend has deceased, or has departed this life; and this phraseology, by an easy but heedless transition, became is deceased or is departed. In general, however, the conversion of an intransitive verb or form of expression into the passive form, is very rare among the people of New England.

There is a grammatical error running through the writings of so respectable a writer as Mitford, which ought not to be passed unnoticed; as it seems to be borrowed from the French language, whose idioms are different from the English, but which the English are too apt to follow. This fault is, in using the preterit or perfect tense, instead of the past tense indefinite, usually called most improperly, the imperfect. Take the following sentences for examples. "The conduct of Pelopidas towards Arcadia and its minister at the Persian court—has scarcely been the result of mere caprice or resentment." The verb here ought to be was.

* On this use of intransitive verbs, as the ship was departed, it may be asked, who departed it? The mail is arrived, who has arrived it? The tree is perished, who has perished it? The enemy was fled, who fled them? The time was expired, who expired it?

INTRODUCTION.

"The oration [of Isocrates] has been [was] a favorite of Dionysius of Halicarnassus."

This form of expressing the time would be good in French, but is very bad in English. And it may be here remarked, that the tense he was, he arrived, he wrote, is not properly named imperfect. These verbs, and all verbs of this form denote actions finished or perfect, as "in six days God created the heaven and the earth." Imperfect or unfinished action is expressed in English in this manner, he was reading, they were writing. The error of calling the former tense imperfect has probably proceeded from a servile adoption of the Latin names of the tenses, without considering the difference of application.

There are some errors in all the English Grammars, that have been derived to us from antiquity. Such is the arrangement of that among the conjunctions, like the Greek οτι, and the Latin ut. Και παρρησια η πνευματος οτι εσται τελευτως τοις λελασμενοις αυτη παρα Κυριον. And blessed is she who believed that there shall be a performance of the things which were told her from the Lord. Luke i. 45. In our version, οτι is rendered for, but most erroneously. The true meaning and character of οτι will best appear, by a transposition of the clauses of the verse. "There shall be a performance of the things told her from the Lord; blessed or happy is she who believed that." Here οτι, that, appears to be what it really is, a relative or substitute for the whole clause in Greek succeeding it. So in Luke xxii. 18. Λεγω γαρ υμιν οτι ου μη πινω, &c. I say to you that I will not drink. I will not drink, I say to you that. It is the same in Latin, "Dico enim vobis quod non bibam." Quod is here a relative governed by dico, and referring to the following clause of the sentence.

So also Matthew ix. 28. Πιστευετε οτι δυναμαι τουτο ποιησαι; Do ye believe that I am able to do this? [I am able to do this, do ye believe that?]

This error runs through all Grammars, Greek, Latin, French, English, &c. But how such an obvious fact, that the word that and its corresponding words in other languages, refer to the clause of a sentence, should escape observation, age after age, it is not easy to explain. How could it be supposed that a word is a conjunction which does not join words or sentences? That is used, in the passages cited, not to unite two sentences, but to continue the same sentence, by an additional clause.

The relative, when referring to a sentence or the clause of a sentence, is not varied, for a variation of case is not wanted.

So notwithstanding and provided in English, and pourvu que in French, are called conjunctions: but most improperly; as they are participles, and when called conjunctions, they always form, with a word, clause or sentence, the case absolute or independent. Thus, "it rains, but notwithstanding that, [it rains,] I must go to town." That fact, (it rains,) not opposing or preventing me, that is, in opposition to that, I must go to town; hoc non obstante.

"I will ride, provided you will accompany me." That is, I will ride, the fact, you will accompany me, being provided.

Such is the structure of these sentences. See my Philosophical and Practical Grammar. It is the same in French, pourvu que, that being provided, que referring to the following clause.

There are other points in grammar equally faulty. Not only in English grammar, but in the grammars of other languages, men stumble at the threshold, and teach their children to stumble. In no language whatever can there be a part of speech properly called an article. There is no word or class of words that falls within the signification of article, a joint, or that can otherwise than arbitrarily be brought under that denomination. The definitive words called articles, are all adjectives or pronouns. When they are used with nouns, they are adjectives, modifying the signification of the nouns, like other adjectives; for this is their proper office. When they stand alone, they are pronouns, or substitutes for nouns. Thus hic, ille, ipse in Latin, when used with nouns expressed, are adjectives; hic homo, this man; ille homo, that man. When they stand alone, hic, ille, they stand in the place of nouns. The fact is the same in other languages.

The English the is an adjective, which, for distinction, I call a definitive adjective, and for brevity, a definitive, as it defines the person or thing to which it refers, or rather designates a particular person or thing. But why this should be selected as the only definitive in our language, is very strange; when obviously this and that are more exactly definitive, designating more precisely a particular person or thing than the. These words answer to the Latin hic and ille, which were always used by the Romans, when they had occasion to specify definite persons or things.

As to the English an or a, which is called in grammars, the indefinite article, there are two great mistakes. A being considered as the original word, it is said to become an before a vowel. The fact is directly the reverse. An is the original word, and this is contracted to a by dropping the n before a consonant.

But an is merely the Saxon orthography of one, un, unus, an adjective found in nearly all the languages of Europe, and expressing a single person or thing. It is merely a word of number, and no more an article than two, three, four, and every other number in the language. Take the following examples.

Bring me an orange from the basket; that is, any one of the number.

Bring me two oranges from the basket; that is, any two of the number.

Bring me three oranges from the basket; that is, any three of the number; and so on to any number ad infinitum.

When thus used, an, two, three, are all indefinite; that is, they are used with nouns which are indefinite, or expressing things not particularly designated. But this is not owing to the essential character of the adjectives, an, one, two, three; for any of them may be used with definite nouns; and an is continually thus used.

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries."

"The angel stood for an adversary against Balaam."

"Make this fellow return, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us."

"Rezon—was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon."

"And he spake a parable to them to this end."

"And there was a widow in that city."

"And seeing the multitude, he went up into a mountain."

"I will be a God to thee and thy seed after thee."

"Thou art a God ready to pardon."

Now let any of these phrases be tested by the common definition of an or a, "that it is used in a vague sense, to point out one single thing of the kind; in other respects indeterminate."

"I will be an adversary to thine adversaries;" that is, "I will be any adversary, one of the kind, but vague or indeterminate."

"Rezon was an adversary to Israel;" that is, in a vague sense any adversary, indeterminate.

"And he spake a parable to them;" that is, any parable, indeterminate.

"Thou art a God, ready to pardon;" that is, any God, one of the kind, in a vague sense, indeterminate!

If it should be said, the noun is rendered determinate, by other words in the sentence, and not by an or a, this may be and generally is true; but this shows that an does not give to the noun its character of definiteness or indefiniteness; it always retains its proper signification, which is one, and nothing more; and it is used indifferently before nouns definite or indefinite.

This mistake of the character of an is found in other languages; but I was gratified to find a French Grammar in Paris, recommended by the Institute, the author of which had discarded the indefinite article.

In English, an or a is, for the most part, entirely useless. Used with a noun in the singular number, it serves no purpose, except that which the form of the word, in the singular number, is intended to answer. It expresses unity only, and this is the province of the singular number. Were it not for habit, "give me orange," would express the sense of "give me an orange," with precision and certainty. In this respect the Latin language has the advantage over the English. But the use of such a short word is not very inconvenient, and the usage cannot be changed. Other languages are subject to the same inconvenience; even the definite articles, or definitives, in Greek and in French, are very often useless, and were it not for usage, would be improper.

ORTHOGRAPHY.

From the period of the first Saxon writings, our language has been suffering changes in orthography. The first writers, having no guide but the ear, followed each his own judgment or fancy; and hence a great portion of Saxon words are written with different letters, by different authors; most of them are written two or three different ways, and some of them, fifteen or twenty. To this day, the orthography of some classes of words is not entirely settled; and in others, it is settled in a manner to confound the learner and mislead him into a false pronunciation. Nothing can be more disreputable to the literary character of a nation, than the history of English orthography, unless it is that of orthoepey.

1. The Saxon diphthong æ, which probably had a specific and uniform sound or combination of sounds, has been discarded and ea generally substituted in its place, as bræth, breath. Now ea thus united have not a uniform sound, and of course they are no certain guide to pronunciation. In some instances, where the Saxon spelling was not uniform, the modern orthography follows the most anomalous and difficult, instead of that which is regular. Thus the Saxons wrote fæther and fether, more generally the latter, and the moderns write feather.

2. The letter g in Saxon words, has, in many English words, been sunk in pronunciation, and either wholly lost, or it is now represented by y or w. Thus dag, or dag, has become day; gear is year, bugan is bow, and sæger is fair.

3. The Saxons who adopted the Roman alphabet, with a few alterations, used c with its hard sound like that of k. Thus lic, like; locian, to look. But after the Norman conquest, c before e, i, and y, took the sound of s; hence arose the necessity of changing this letter in words and syllables, where it was necessary to retain the sound of k before these vowels. Thus the Saxon liccan, pronounced originally likean, becomes, with our present sound of c before e, liscan; and locian becomes losian. To remedy this evil, our ancestors introduced k from the Greek, writing it generally after c, as in lick, stick, though in some instances, omitting c, as in like and look. Hence in all monosyllables in which a syllable beginning with c or i is added to the word, as in the past time and participles of verbs, we use k in the place of the Saxon c, as in licked, licking.

Our early writers attempted to extend this addition to words introduced from the Latin and Greek, in which no such reason exists for the use of k. Thus they wrote publick, musick, rhetorick. In these and similar words the Latins used c for the Greek κ, as musicus, for μουσικός, and the early English writers took both letters, the Roman c and Greek κ. This was absurd enough; but they never proceeded so far as to carry the absurdity through the derivatives; never writing publickation, musickal, rhetorickal. After a long struggle with the force of authority, good sense has nearly banished this pedantic orthography from use; and all words of this kind now appear in most of our public acts and elegant writings, in their proper simplicity: public, publication, music, musical.

In many words, formerly ending in ie, these letters have been discarded from the singular number, and y substituted. Thus remedie, memorie, are now written remedy, memory. But what is very singular, the plural of these words retains the ie, with the addition of s, as in remedies. This anomaly however creates no great inconvenience, except that it has been extended by negligent writers to words ending in ey, as in attornies. But words ending in ey properly make the plural by simply taking s, as in surveys, attorneys. The same rule applies to verbs when an s is added, as in conveys.

5. In a vast number of words, the vowel e has been discarded as useless; as in eggs for eggies; certain for certainie; empress for empresse; goodness for goodnesse. This is an improvement, as the e has no sound in modern pronunciation. But here again we meet with a surprising inconsistency; for the same reason which justifies this omission, would justify and require the omission of e final in motive, pensive, juvenile, genuine, sanguine, doctrine, examine, determine, and a multitude of others. The introduction of e, in most words of these classes, was at first wrong, as it could not plead any authority in the originals; but the retaining of it is unjustifiable, as the letter is not merely useless, but, in very numerous classes of words, it leads to a false pronunciation. Many of the most respectable English authors, a century ago or more, omitted e in such words as examin, determin, famin, ductil, fertil, definit, &c. but these improvements were afterwards rejected to the great injury of orthography. In like manner, a final e is inserted in words of modern coinage, as in alumine, chlorine, chloride, oxyde, &c. without the least necessity or propriety.

6. A similar fate has attended the attempt to anglicize the orthography of another class of words, which we have received from the French. At a very early period, the words chambre, desastre, desordre, chartre, monstre, tendre, tigre, entre, fievre, diametre, arbitre, nombre, and others were reduced to the English form of spelling; chamber, disaster, disorder, charter, monster, tender, tiger, enter, fever, diameter, arbitr, number. At a later period, Sir Isaac Newton, Camden, Selden, Milton, Whitaker, Prideaux, Hook, Whiston, Bryant, and other authors of the first character, attempted to carry through this reformation, writing scepter, center, sepulcher. But this improvement was arrested, and a few words of this class retain their French orthography; such are metre, mitre, nitre, spectre, sceptre, theatre, sepulchre, and sometimes centre. It is remarkable that a nation distinguished for erudition, should thus reject improvements, and retain anomalies, in opposition to all the convenience of uniformity. I am glad that so respectable a writer as Mitford has discarded this innovation, and uniformly written center, scepter, theater, sepulcher. In the present instance, want of uniformity is not the only evil. The present orthography has introduced an awkward mode of writing the derivatives, for example, centred, sceptred, sepulchred; whereas Milton and Pope wrote these words as regular derivations of center, scepter, sepulcher: thus, "Sceptered King." So Coxe, in his travels, "The principal wealth of the church is centered in the monasteries." This is correct.

7. Soon after the revival of letters in Europe, English writers began to borrow words from the French and Italian; and usually with some little alteration of the orthography. Thus they wrote authour, embassadour, predecessour, ancestour, successour; using our for the Latin termination or, and the French eur, and writing similar words, in like manner, though not of Latin or French origin. What motive could induce them to write these words, and errour, honour, favour, inferiour, &c. in this manner, following neither the Latin nor the French, I cannot conceive. But this orthography continued down to the seventeenth century, when the u began to be rejected from certain words of this class, and at the beginning of the last century, many of these words were written, ancestor, author, error, &c. as they are now written. But favor, honor, labor, candor, ardor, terror, vigor, inferior, superior, and a few others, were written with u, and Johnson introduced this orthography into his dictionary. Nothing in language is more mischievous than the mistakes of a great man. It is not easy to understand why a man, whose professed object was to reduce the language to some regularity, should write author without u and errour and honour with it! That he should write labour with u and laborious without it! Vigour, with u, and vigorous, invigorate, without it! Inferiour, superiour, with u, but inferiority, and superiority, without it! Strange as it is, this inconsistency runs through his work, and his authority has been the means of continuing it, among his admirers, to this day.

In this country, many of our best writers have rejected the u from all words of this class, and reduced the whole to uniformity.* This is a desirable event; every rejection of an anomaly being a valuable improvement, which sound judgment approves, and the love of regularity will vindicate and maintain. I have therefore followed the orthography of General Washington, and the Congress of the United States, of Ash in his Dictionary, of Mitford in his History of Greece, &c.

8. There is another class of words the orthography of which is not uniform, nor fully settled, such as take the termination able to form an adjective. Thus Johnson writes proveable with e, but approvable and reprovable, without it. So moveable, but immovable and removable; tameable, but blamable, censurable, desirable, excusable; salable, but ratable.

With like inconsistency Walker and Todd write daub with u and bedaub with ie, deviating in this instance, from Johnson. Todd writes abridgement and judgement with e, but acknowledgment without it. Walker writes these words without e, but adds it to lodgement. I have reduced all words of this kind to uniformity.

9. Johnson writes octoedrical; Todd octoedral; Sheridan, Walker and Jones follow Johnson; but Jones has octahedron, which is not in the other Dictionaries. The Greek, in words of this kind, is inconsistent, for οκτώ is changed, in compound words, to οκτα. I have followed the Greek compounds, and have inserted h which I consider as almost indispensable in the English orthography, as octahedron.

10. Johnson introduced instructor, in the place of instructer, in opposition to every authority which he has himself adduced to exemplify his definitions; Denham, Milton, Roscommon, Locke, Addison, Rogers, and the common version of the Scriptures. But what is more singular, this orthography, instructor, is contrary to his own practice; at least, in four editions of his Rambler which I have examined, the word is uniformly written instructer. The fact is the same with visitor.

This is a point of little importance in itself; but when instructor had been from time immemorial, the established orthography, why unsettle the practice? I have in this word and in visitor adhered to the old orthography. There is not a particle of reason for altering instructor and visitor, which would not apply to collector, cultivator, objector, projector, and a hundred other words of similar termination.

11. Most of these and some other inconsistencies have been of long continuance. But there are others of more recent date, which admit of no apology, as they are changes from right to wrong. Such is the change of the old and correct orthography of defense, expense, offense, pretense, and recompense, by substituting c for s as in defence. This change was probably made or encouraged by printers, for the sake of avoiding the use of the old long s; but since this has been discarded, that reason no longer exists. The old orthography, defense, &c. is justified, not only by the Latin originals, but by the rule of uniformity; for the derivatives are always written with s, defensive, extensive, offensive, pretension, recompensing.

12. No less improper was the change of sceptic into skeptic. In favor of this innovation, it is alleged that the word is from the Greek σκηπτικός. True; but is not scene derived from the Greek σκηνη, and scepter from σκηπτρον, and ascetic from ασκητικός, and ocean from ωκεανος? Are not all these words in exact analogy with each other, in their original orthography? Were they not formerly analogous in the English orthography? Why violate this analogy? Why introduce an anomaly? Such innovations, by dividing opinions and introducing discrepancies in practice, in classes of words of like formation, have a mischievous effect, by keeping the language in perpetual fluctuation.

13. In like manner, dispatch, which had, from time immemorial, been written with i, was changed into despatch, on the wonderful discovery, that the word is derived from the French depêcher. But why change one vowel and not the other? If we must follow the French, why not write despech, or depech? And why was this innovation limited to a single word? Why not carry the change through this whole class of words, and give us the benefit of uniformity? Is not disaster from the French desastre? Is not discharge from decharger? Is not disarm from desarmer? Is not disobey from desobeir? Is not disoblige from desobliger? Is not disorder from desordre? The prefix dis is more properly English than de, though both are used with propriety. But dispatch was the established orthography; why then disturb the practice? Why select a single word from the whole class, and introduce a change which creates uncertainty where none had existed for ages, without the smallest benefit to indemnify us for the perplexity and discordance occasioned by the innovation?

It is gratifying to observe the stern good sense of the English nation, presenting a firm resistance to such innovations. Blackstone, Paley, Coxe, Milner, Scott and Mitford, uniformly use the old and genuine orthography of instructor, visitor, sceptic and dispatch.

14. The omission of one l in befall, install, installment, recall, enthral, &c., is by no means to be vindicated; as by custom, the two letters ll, serve as a guide to the true pronunciation, that of broad a or aw. According to the established rules of English pronunciation, the letter a in instal- ment would have the sound it has in balance; it is therefore expedient to retain both letters in all words of this class.

INTRODUCTION.

15. It is an established rule, in the English language, that monosyllabic verbs, ending in a single consonant, not preceded by a long vowel, and other verbs ending in a single accented consonant, and of course not preceded by a long vowel, double the final consonant, in all the derivatives, which are formed by a termination beginning with a vowel. Thus, fit, blot, bar, when they take the terminations, ed, eth, ing, are written fitted, blotted, fitting; blotted, blotteth, blotting; barred, barreth, barring. Abet, compel, form the like derivatives; abetted, abetteth, abetting; compelled, compelleth, compelling. The reason of this rule is, that without this duplication of the last consonant, the vowel of the primitive word would, in the derivative, be naturally pronounced wrong, that is, with its long sound; fitted, blotted, barred, compelled. Hence we see the reason why verbs, having the long sound of a vowel, do not double the last consonant, as fear, repaid, repeated.

The converse of this rule is, that verbs, ending in a single consonant, but having the accent on the first syllable, or on a syllable preceding the last, ought not to double the final consonant in the derivatives. Thus limit, labor, charter, clatter, pardon, deliver, hinder, have for their derivatives, limited, laboreth, chartered, pardoning, delivering, hindereth. But strange as it may seem, the rule is wholly neglected and violated, in most of the words of this class in the language. Thus we observe, in all authors, ballotting, beveling, levelled, travelled, cancelled, revelling, rivalling, worshipped, worshipper, apparelled, embowelled, libelling, and many others, in which the last consonant is doubled, in opposition to one of the oldest and best established rules in the language. Perry, in his Dictionary, lays down the rule for guidance, but has not been careful, in all cases, to observe it. I have endeavored to reduce these classes of words to a regular and uniform orthography. In like manner, nouns formed from such verbs are written with a single consonant, as jeweler, traveler, worshiper, for the purpose of establishing a general rule, to which there may be no exception. What should we say to a man who should write auditor, alterer, barterer, batterer, gardenner, laborer? Yet no good reason can be assigned why the final consonant should not be doubled in these words as well as in jeweller, traveller, enameller. The truth is, the syllable to be added is the usual termination er or or, and nothing more.

Not less remarkable is the practice of doubling the last consonant in equalled, equalling, but not in the verb equalize. And to add to the inconsistency, the last consonant is sometimes doubled in tranquillize, a word in exact analogy with equalize.

With regard to words which recent discoveries have introduced into the sciences, there may be some apology for differences of orthography, as writers have not established usage for a guide. Hence we find oxyd is written also oxide and oxyde; oxygen and hydrogen, are written also oxigene, oxygene and hydrogene. Sulphate, nitrate, &c., are written also sulphat, nitrat.

In this case, what course is the Lexicographer to pursue? Shall he adopt the method by which Walker attempts to settle pronunciation, and cite authorities in favor of each mode of spelling? Then the result is, so many names appear on one side, and so many on the other. But who, it may be asked, will undertake to graduate the scale by which the weight of authorities is to be determined? Numbers will not always decide questions of this sort to the satisfaction of the public.

In this case, I have determined to conform the orthography to established English analogies; the only authority from which there can be no legitimate appeal. Now, no rule in orthography is better established, than that which we have adopted from the Latin language, of representing the Greek upsilon by the letter y. In the orthography of oxygen and hydrogen, from oxys and hypos, this rule has been observed; and why should oxyd be an exception?

With regard to sulphate, nitrate, and other names of that class of compounds, I consider the final e as essential to the words, to prevent a false pronunciation; the vowel a having its first sound as in fate, though slightly pronounced.

The word chemistry has undergone two or three changes, according to fancy or to conjectural etymology. Men have blundered about the plainest thing imaginable; for to determine its true orthography, nothing was necessary but to open an Arabic Lexicon. The inhabitants of the South of Europe, who introduced the word, doubtless knew its origin, and wrote it correctly with i, not with y or e; and had the English been contented to take it as they found it, the orthography would have been correct and uniform.

In introducing words from other languages, it is desirable that the orthography should be conformed, as nearly as may be, to established English analogies. For this reason I must approve of the practice of Darwin who drops the Latin termination of pyrites, writing pyrite, with the accent on the first syllable. Botanic Garden, Canto 2. 350.

Stalactite has in like manner, been anglicized; and barytes, it is hoped, may suffer the like change. In this manner, the words, in the English form, become susceptible of a regular plural; barytes and pyrites in two syllables, and stalactites in three: and further they admit of regularly formed adjectives, pyritic, barytic, stalactitic, which cannot be regularly formed from the Greek terminations.

The word talc is also ill-formed. The original word on the continent of Europe is talk or talq; and the change of k into c is not merely needless, but worse, for it precludes the use of the regular adjective, talc. Hence we see the adjective used is talcose, an awkward compound of a Teutonic word with a Latin termination. This word should be written talk or talck, which would admit regular derivatives, talcky, talckiness. In like manner, zinc, if written zink, would admit the regular adjective zinky, as written by Kirwan.

In botany, as the sexual system of the celebrated Swedish naturalist is now generally received, it seems proper to make the new terms, by which the classes and orders of plants are designated, a part of our language. Hitherto these names have not been anglicized; but from the technical terms, English and American writers have begun to form adjectives which are at variance with the analogies of our language. We see in books such words as hexandrous, monogamous, polygamous, and syngenesious. The writers who use these words, seem not to be aware of the importance of pursuing settled rules in the coining of words, as uniformity aids both in learning and in recollecting new names. The regular mode of forming adjectives from nouns ending in a or ia, is to add n to the noun, not ous. So we form Italian from Italia; American from America. In some cases, the termination ic is used, but rarely or never ous; or if it is, it is an anomaly.

To arrest, if possible, the progress of these irregularities, and at the same time, to make the more important botanical terms really English, by giving them appropriate English terminations, and further to abridge the language of description, I have ventured to anglicize the names of all the classes and orders, and insert them in this work.

Thus from monandria, the name of the class containing plants with flowers having one stamen, I form monander, the name of an individual plant of that character. From monogynia, the name of the order containing plants with flowers which have one pistil, I form monogyn, [pronounced monogyn] to express an individual plant of that order. The adjectives are formed from the nouns with regular English terminations; monandrian, monogynian, syngenesian, diccian, monecian, &c.

In describing a plant technically, according to this nomenclature, instead of saying, it is of the class monandria and order monogynia, the botanist will call it a monogynian monander, a digynian pentander, a trigynian octander, a pentandrian diadelph. These terms designate the class and order, as perfectly as the use of the Latin technical names: and in this manner we unite, in our botanical language, technical precision, with brevity, correctness and elegance.

It is with no small regret, that I see new terms formed, without a due regard to regular English analogies. New terms are often necessary, or at least very useful; but they ought to be coined according to the settled principles of the language. A neglect of these principles is observable in the word systematize, which, not being borrowed from the Greek, ought to follow the general rule of English formation, in agreement with legalize, modernize, civilize, animalize, and others, and be written systemize. This is the more important, as the derivatives systemizing, systemization, are of more easy utterance, than those of systematize, and particularly the noun systematization.

I observe in modern works on Natural History, the words crustaceology, and testaceology; terms that are intended to designate the science of different kinds of shells, from crustacea, testacea. But who can countenance the use of such words? Where do we find another instance of similar terms formed from adjectives? Why should we violate an established principle in coining words of this family? Besides, who can endure the derivatives, crustaceological, testaceological, and much less the adverbs, if they should ever be wanted? I have not admitted these anomalous words into this vocabulary; but have inserted the proper words, crustalogy, testalogy, which are regularly formed, like mineralogy.

On this head I would subjoin a remark or two on the mode of writing Indian names of rivers, mountains and places in America, which we have adopted.

The French were the first Europeans who explored the country between the great lakes and the gulf of Mexico, and of course, the first to commit to writing the Indian names which occurred to them in their travels. In doing this, they attempted to express the sounds in letters, according to the French manner of pronunciation. Hence it happened that they wrote ch, where we should have written sh, had we first reduced those names to writing. Thus we have Chenango, Michigan and Michillimackinac,* in the French orthography. And as the French have no w in their language, they could not express the proper sound of the first syllable of Wabash, Wisconsin, Wachita, otherwise than by writing them Ouabache, Ouisconsin, Ouachita, and Missouri in French is Missouri. All this is very proper for Frenchmen, for the letters used express the true sounds of the words. But in English, the letters used lead to a false pronunciation, and for this reason, should not be used in English compositions. It is to be deeply regretted that our language is thus doomed to be a heterogeneous medley of English and foreign languages; as the same letters representing

* This word is, I believe, customarily pronounced Mackinaw, and the original may well be suffered to fall into disuse.

INTRODUCTION.

different sounds, in different languages, serve to embarrass the reader who understands only his own.

The irregularities in the English orthography have always been a subject of deep regret, and several attempts have been made to banish them from the language. The first attempt of this kind was made by Sir Thomas Smith, Secretary of State, to Queen Elizabeth; another was made by Dr. Gill, a celebrated master of St. Paul's School in London; another by Charles Butler; several attempts were made in the reign of Charles I.; an attempt was made by Elphinstone, in the last century; and lastly, another effort was made by Dr. Franklin. The latter gentleman compiled a dictionary on his scheme of reform, and procured types to be cast, which he offered to me, with a view to engage me to prosecute his design. This offer I declined to accept; for I was then, and am still convinced, that the scheme of introducing new characters into the language, is neither practicable nor expedient. Any attempt of this kind must certainly fail of success.

But that some scheme for expressing the distinct sounds of our letters by visible marks, ought to be adopted, is a point about which there ought to be, and I trust there can be, but one opinion. That such a scheme is practicable as well as expedient, I should presume to be equally evident. Such is the state of our written language, that our own citizens never become masters of orthography, without great difficulty and labor; and a great part of them never learn to spell words with correctness. In addition to this, the present orthography of some classes of words leads to a false pronunciation.

In regard to the acquisition of our language by foreigners, the evil of our irregular orthography is extensive, beyond what is generally known or conceived. While the French and Italians have had the wisdom and the policy to refine and improve their respective languages, and render them almost the common languages of all well-bred people in Europe; the English language, clothed in a barbarous orthography, is never learned by a foreigner but from necessity; and the most copious language in Europe, embodying an uncommon mass of science and erudition, is thus very limited in its usefulness. And to complete the mischief, the progress of arts, science and christianity among the heathen, and other rude or uncivilized nations, is most sensibly retarded by the difficulties of mastering an irregular orthography.

The mode of ascertaining the proper pronunciation of words by marks, points and trifling alterations of the present characters, seems to be the only one which can be reduced to practice. This mode resembling the use of points in the Hebrew, has been adopted by some of the nations on the continent; and I have pursued it, to a certain extent, in designating distinctions in the sounds of letters, in this work. The scheme I have invented is not considered as perfect; but it will accomplish some important purposes, by removing the most numerous classes of anomalies. With this scheme, the visible characters of the language will present to the eye of a reader the true sounds of words; and the scheme itself is so simple, that it may be learned in a few moments. To complete a scheme of this kind, a few other alterations would be necessary, but such as would not materially change the orthography, or occasion the least difficulty to the learner or reader.

After these alterations, there would remain a few words whose anomalies may be considered as incorrigible, such as know, gnaw, rough, &c., which may be collected into tables and easily learned, and all the other irregularities may be so classed under general rules, as to be learned with very little labor.

The adoption of this or any other scheme for removing the obstacles which the English orthography presents to learners of the language, must depend on public opinion. The plan I have adopted for representing the sounds of letters by marks and points, in this work, is intended to answer two purposes. First, to supersede the necessity of writing and printing the words a second time in an orthography adapted to express their pronunciation. The latter method pursued by the English orthoepists, as applicable to most words, is I think not only unnecessary but very inexpedient. The second purpose is, to exhibit to my fellow citizens the outline of a scheme for removing the difficulties of our irregular orthography, without the use of new characters; a scheme simple, easy of acquisition, and sufficient to answer all the more important purposes of a regular orthography.

PRONUNCIATION.

As our language has been derived from various sources, and little or no systematic effort has been made to reduce the orthography to any regularity, the pronunciation of the language is subject to numerous anomalies. Each of our vowels has several different sounds; and some of the consonants represent very different articulations of the organs. That part of the language which we have received from the Latin, is easily subjected to a few general rules of pronunciation. The same is the fact with most of the derivatives from the Greek. Many words of French origin retain their French orthography, which leads to a very erroneous pronunciation in English; and a large portion of our monosyllabic words of Saxon origin are extremely irregular both in orthography and pronunciation.

If we can judge, with tolerable certainty, from the versification of Chaucer, the pronunciation of words must have been, in many respects, different in his age, from that of the present day; particularly in making a distinct syllable of e final, and of the termination ed. But no effort was probably ever made to settle the pronunciation of words, till the last century. In England, which was settled by various nations, there are numerous dialects or diversities of language, still retained by the great mass of the population.

The first settlers of New England, were almost all of English origin, and coming from different parts of England, they brought with them some diversities of language. But in the infancy of the settlements, the people lived in towns adjacent or near to each other, for mutual aid and protection from the natives; and the male inhabitants of the first generation frequently assembled for the purpose of worship or for government. By the influence of these and other causes, particularly by that of common schools, the differences of language among our citizens have been gradually lost; so that in this part of the United States, there can hardly be said to exist a difference of dialect.

It is to be remarked further, that the first ministers of the gospel, who migrated to this country, had been educated at the English universities, and brought with them all the learning usually acquired in those institutions, and the English language as it was then spoken. The influence of these men, who were greatly venerated, probably had no small effect in extinguishing differences of speech.

Hence it has happened that the traditional pronunciation of the language of well-educated people has been nearly the same in both countries, to this day. Among the common people, whose pronunciation in all countries is more or less corrupt, the diversities in this country are far less numerous than in England.

About fifty or sixty years ago, Thomas Sheridan, an Irish gentleman, who had been the pupil of an intimate friend of Dean Swift, attempted to reduce the pronunciation of English words to some system, and to introduce it into popular use. His analysis of the English vowels is very critical, and in this respect, there has been little improvement by later writers, though I think none of them are perfectly correct. But in the application of his principles, he failed of his object. Either he was not well acquainted with the best English pronunciation, or he had a disposition to introduce into use some peculiarities, which the English did not relish. The principal objection made to his scheme is that he gives to s the sound of sh, in sudorific, superb, and other words where s is followed by u long. These he pronounces shooderific, shooperb, shoopersufty, &c. This pronunciation of s corresponding to the Shemitic š, he probably learnt in Ireland, for in the Irish branch of the Celtic, s has often the sound of sh. Thus sean, old, is pronounced shean. This pronunciation was no sooner published, than condemned and rejected by the English.

Another most extraordinary innovation of Sheridan was, his rejection of the Italian sound of a, as in father, calm, ask, from every word in the language. Thus his notation gives to a in bar, the same sound as in barren, barrel, bat; to a in father, pass, mass, pant, the same sound as in fat, passion, massacre, pan, fancy. Such a gross deviation from established English usage was of course condemned and rejected.

In his pronunciation of ti and ci, before a vowel, as in partiality, omniscience, Sheridan is more correct than Walker, as he is in some other words; such for example as bench, tench, book, took, and others of the same classes.

Sheridan also contributed very much to propagate the change of tu into chu, or tshu; as in natshur, cultshur, virtshue. This innovation was vindicated on the supposed fact, that the letter u has the sound of yu; and natyur, cultyur, virtue, in a rapid enunciation, become natshur, &c. And to this day, this error respecting the sound of u is received in England as truth. But the fact is otherwise, and if not, it does not justify the practice; for in usage, u is short in nature, culture, as in tun; so that on the principles of Sheridan himself, this letter can have no effect on the preceding articulation.

This innovation however has prevailed to a considerable extent, although Sheridan subjected the change of tu to no rules. He is consistent in applying this change equally to tu, whether the accent follows the t or not. If tu is to be changed to tshu, in future, and perpetual, it ought to undergo the same change in futurity, and perpetuity; and Sheridan, in pronouncing tutor, tutelage, tumult, as if written tshootor, tshootelage, tshootmult, is certainly consistent, though wrong in fact. In other words, however, Sheridan is inconsistent with himself; for he pronounces multitshood, rectitshood, servitshood, while habitude, beatitude, certitude, decrepitude, gratitude, &c. retain the proper sound of t.

Walker's rule for changing tu to chu, only when the accent precedes, is entirely arbitrary, and evidently made by him to suit his own practice. It has however the good effect of reducing the chus, and removing the outrageous anomalies of tshootor, tshootmult, &c.

There are many other words which Sheridan has marked for a pronunciation, which is not according to good usage, and which the later orthoepists have corrected. In general, however, it may be asserted that his notation does not warrant a tenth part as many deviations, from the present respectable usage in England, as Walker's; yet as his Dictionary was republished in this country, it had no small effect in corrupting the pronunciation of some classes of words, and the effects of its influence are not yet extinct. What the precise effect of Sheridan's scheme of pronunciation was in England, I am not able to determine. But I have had information from the late venerable Dr. Johnson of Stratford, and from the late Dr. Hubbard of New Haven, who were in England between the year 1765 and the revolution, that about that period, the change of t into ch had not taken place, to any extent. It began to prevail on the stage and among the younger barristers and members of parliament, before Dr. Johnson left England, just before the war with America, and Sheridan's Dictionary, published soon after, undoubtedly contributed to extend the innovation. This change presents a new obstacle to the acquisition of a language, whose anomalies were before frightfully formidable and perplexing. The favorers of innovation, seem not to reflect on the immense inconvenience of a correct notation of sounds in a language, by its proper characters; the utility of uniformity and permanence in that notation; and the extensive evil of destroying or impairing the use of alphabetical writing. The man who perverts or changes the established sound of a single letter, especially of a consonant, does an injury to that language, and to the community using it, which fifty men of the same talents, can never repair.

INTRODUCTION.

In a few years after the publication of Sheridan's Dictionary, appeared Walker's, the author of which introduces the work to the public, with the following remarks, on the labors of his predecessors.

"Among those writers who deserve the first praise on this subject, is Mr. Elphinstone; who, in his principles of the English language, has reduced the chaos to a system, and laid the foundation of a just and regular pronunciation. But this gentleman, by treating his subject with an affected obscurity, and by absurdly endeavoring to alter the whole orthography of the language, has unfortunately lost his credit with the public, for the part of his labors which entitles him to the highest praise."

"After him Dr. Kenrick contributed a portion of improvement, by his Rhetorical Dictionary, but he has rendered his Dictionary extremely imperfect, by entirely omitting a great number of words of doubtful and difficult pronunciation; those very words for which a Dictionary of this kind would naturally be consulted." [Let it be noted, that the same objection lies in full force against Sheridan, Walker, and Jones.]

"To him succeeded Mr. Sheridan, who not only divided the words into syllables, and placed figures over the vowels, as Dr. Kenrick had done, but by spelling these syllables as they are pronounced, seemed to complete the idea of a Pronouncing Dictionary, and to leave but little expectation of improvement. It must be confessed that his Dictionary is generally superior to every thing that preceded it, and his method of conveying the sound of words by spelling them as they are pronounced, is highly rational and useful. But here sincerity obliges me to stop. The numerous instances I have given of impropriety, inconsistency, and want of acquaintance with the analogies of the language, sufficiently show how imperfect I think his Dictionary is, upon the whole, and what ample room was left for attempting another, that might better answer the purpose of a guide to pronunciation."

"The last writer on this subject is Mr. Nares, who, in his elements of orthoepy, has shown a clearness of method, and an extent of observation, which deserve the highest encomiums. But he seems, on many occasions,* to have mistaken the best usage, and to have paid too little attention to the first principles of pronunciation."

Soon after the publication of Walker's Dictionary, appeared the Dictionary of Stephen Jones, who undertakes to correct the errors of Sheridan and Walker. This author objects to Sheridan, that he has not introduced the Italian sound of a, [as in father,] in a single instance, and that Walker has been too sparing in the use of it. He objects that Sheridan has not, by any peculiar marks, pointed out the sound of oi or oy, as in noise and cloy; and that Walker has given distinctive marks of pronunciation to the diphthong ou, which are terrific to the learner, and not well calculated to express the exact sound. He considers it as no trivial error in Walker's system, that he uses the long e in place of the short y, which gives to asperity, for example, the ludicrous sound of asperetee. He notices also as a fault in Walker's scheme, that he makes no difference in the sound of oo in tool, tooth, and in look, took.

In all these particulars, except that of oi and oy, I think every man who understands genuine English, will accord with Jones. From careful observation, while in England, I know that Jones's notation is far more correct than that of Sheridan or Walker, and except in two or three classes of words, his pronunciation is exactly that which I uniformly heard in England, and nearly the same as that of well-educated gentlemen in New England.

A few years after the appearance of Jones's Dictionary, William Perry published a pronouncing dictionary, in which an attempt is made to indicate the sounds of the letters by certain arbitrary marks. In this work, the author has rejected most of the peculiarities of Sheridan, Walker and Jones, and given the language nearly as it was spoken, before those authors undertook to regulate the pronunciation. This author's manner of designating the sounds of the letters is too complex for convenience, but his pronunciation is nearer to the actual usage in England, than that of either of his predecessors before mentioned. His orthography also is more correct, according to present usage, than that of his predecessors.

During the year past, appeared the dictionary of R. S. Jameson, of Lincoln's Inn, intended to combine the merits of the most popular dictionaries, and to correct the false pronunciation of Walker, whose notation in some classes of words, he entirely rejects. He condemns, as a slovenly enunciation, the sound given to d, which, before i and u, Walker directs, in certain words, to be pronounced like j. He rejects also his notation of ch, or tsh, in congratulation, flatulent, natural, and all similar words. He rejects also the affected pronunciation of Sheridan and Walker, in such words as guide and kind. Most of the other errors of Walker, he copies, as he does his antiquated orthography.

The English orthoepists have analyzed, and in general, have well defined or described, the sounds and appropriate uses of the letters of the alphabet. Sheridan's analysis, which appeared a few years before Walker's, is for the most part, correct; but in describing the sounds of what may be called the diphthongal vowel i, I think he has erred, in making it to consist of the broad a or aw and e. He admits indeed that the voice does not rest on the sound aw, but he contends that the mouth is opened to the same degree of aperture, and is in the same position, as if it were going to sound aw; but before the voice can get a passage to the lips, the under jaw is drawn up to the position, for sounding e. On this it is justly remarked by Walker, that aw and e are precisely the component elements of the diphthong oi and oy. If the aw is pronounced, I would add, then i and oy must be pronounced exactly alike; and if aw is not pronounced, then it is not a component part of the diphthongal vowel i.

Walker contends that this diphthong i, is composed of the sound of the Italian a, as in father, and the sound of e. If so, he must have given to a, a very different sound from that which we are accustomed to give it. But this is a mistake; that sound of a is no more heard in i, than the sound of aw. The sound of i in fight, mind, time, idle, is not faueght, mawend, tawem, awedle; nor is it faeght, maend, taem, oedle. Let any man utter the aw or the Italian a before the e, and he will instantly perceive the error, and reject both definitions, as leading to a false pronunciation. The truth is, the mouth, in uttering i, is not opened so wide as in uttering aw or a; the initial sound is not that of aw or a; nor is it possible, by any characters we possess, to express the true sound on paper. The initial sound is not formed so deep in the throat as aw or a; the position of the organs is nearly, yet not exactly the same. The true sound can be learned only by the ear.

Equally inaccurate is the definition of the diphthongal u, or long u; which these writers alledge to consist of the sounds of e and oo or yu. It has this sound indeed in certain words, as in unite, union, and others; but this is a departure from the proper sound of this character, as heard in cube, abuse, durable, human, jury. These words are not pronounced, keoob, abeoose, deoorable, heooman, jeoory. The effort to introduce this affected pronunciation is of most mischievous tendency. The sound of e is not heard in the proper enunciation of the English u, and for that reason, it should not be so stated on paper, nor named yu; as the error naturally leads to a corrupt pronunciation. Dr. Kenrick remarks that we might as well prefix y to the other vowels, as to u, and pronounce them ya, ye, yi, yo.

But this is not the whole evil; this analysis of u has led orthoepists to give to our first or long u, two distinct sounds, or rather to make a diphthong and a vowel of this single letter. Thus they make it a diphthong in almost all situations, except after r, where they make it a vowel equivalent to oo or the French ou. They represent u as being equivalent to ew, that is, e and oo, in cube, tube, duty, confusion, endure, pronounced, keuwe, teuwe, deuwy, confewsiun, endewre, but in brute, fruit, rude, intrude, ruby, they make u equivalent to oo; thus, broote, froot, roode, introode, rooby.

I know not where this affectation originated; it first appeared in Sheridan's Dictionary, but it is a most unfounded distinction, and a most mischievous error. No such distinction was known to Dr. Johnson; he gives the long u but one sound, as in confusion; and no such distinction is observed among good speakers generally, either in this country or in England. I was particularly attentive to the public speakers in England, in regard to this point, and was happy to find, that very few of them made the distinction here mentioned. In that country as in this, the long u has a uniform sound after all the consonants.

The source of the error in this as in another case to be mentioned hereafter, may be an inattention to the manner in which the articulations affect the vowels which follow them. To understand this, it will be necessary or useful to examine the anatomical formation of articulate sounds.

"An articulate sound," says Lowth, "is the sound of the human voice, formed by the organs of speech. A vowel is a simple articulate sound."

These definitions seem not to be sufficiently accurate. Articulation, in human speech, is the joining, juncture or closing of the organs, which precedes and follows the vowels or open sounds, and which partially or totally intercepts the voice. A vowel or vocal sound is formed simply by opening the mouth. Thus in sounding a or o, the mouth is opened in a particular manner, but without any articulation or closing of the organs. In strictness therefore, a simple vowel is not an articulate sound, as Lowth supposes; and it is certain that many irrational animals, without the power of articulation, do utter vowel sounds with great distinctness.

An articulate sound then is properly a sound preceded or followed or both, by an articulation or junction of the organs. Thus ba, ab, and bad, are articulate sounds; the vowel being begun or closed, with a junction of the lips, interrupting the voice, in ba and ab; and in bad the vocal sound being preceded by one articulation and followed by another. The power of arti-ulation constitutes the great difference between men and brutes; the latter being unable to articulate, can utter only vocal sounds. The imperfect articulations of the parrot and some other animals form no exception that deserves notice.

INTRODUCTION.

I give the name articulation, to the act of joining the organs, and to the character or letter which represents the junction. In the latter sense, the word is equivalent to consonant; and articulation may be considered the preferable term, as it expresses the fact of closing the organs.

Human speech then consists of vocal sounds separated and modified by articulations of the organs. We open the mouth, in a particular manner, to utter a vowel; we then close the organs, interrupt that sound, and open the organs to utter a second vowel, and continue this opening and closing, to the end of the word. This process is carried on with surprising rapidity.

Now in passing from an articulation or close position, to an open position for uttering a vowel, it happens often that a very slight sound of e is uttered so as to be perceptible to the ear, either before or after the utterance of the proper vowel. This is remarkably the case with the long vowels preceding r, for such is the nature of that letter, that bare, mire, more, parent, apparent, &c., cannot well be pronounced without a slight sound of e, between the long vowel and the consonant. Thus the words above named are pronounced nearly baer, mier, moer, paerent, appaerent, and bare, mire, really form two syllables, though they are considered to be monosyllables.

A like case, though less obvious, occurs in uttering u, particularly after the labial and palatal articulations. In passing from the articulations, eb, eg, em, ep, or pe, to the sound of u, as in mute and pure, we are apt insensibly to utter a slight sound of e; and this utterance, which proceeds from the particular situation of the organs, has been mistaken for the first component sound of the diphthongal u. The same cause has given rise to the pronunciation of e before the vowel in such words as guide, guard, kind, guise. This is precisely similar to the vulgar pronunciation of cote, gown, county, town, &c., that is, keow, geown, keounty, teown; a pronunciation formerly common in New England, and not yet wholly extinct. This vicious pronunciation, in all words of this kind, whether countenanced by men of low life or of fashionable life, ought to be carefully avoided; as the slender sound of e, in such cases, gives a feebleness to the words utterly inconsistent with that full, open and manly enunciation which is essential to eloquence.

The genuine sound of u long, detached from the influence of consonants, is the same in all the words above specified; and the reason why it has been made a distinct vowel after r, as in rude [rood,] is, that the organs are open, before the sound commences; whereas when it follows most of our consonants, the sound is commenced immediately after an articulation, or close position of the organs, as in mutable and infusion. For this reason, u has more distinctly its diphthongal sound after labials and palatals, than after r; but this accidental circumstance should not be the ground of radical distinctions, equivalent to the sounds of different letters.

There is, in Walker's analysis of the alphabet, an error peculiar to himself. This is, in making a distinction between the short i when it is followed by a consonant, and when it is not; as in ability. In this case, he calls the first i, in abil, short; but the second he calls open, and equivalent to e in equal. See principles 107, 544. He also makes the unaccented y at the end of a syllable precisely like the first sound of e, in me, meter. Ability then written according to his principles would be abilettee. Never was a grosser mistake. The sound of i and y in unaccented syllables, whether followed by an articulation or not, is always the short sound of e long, that is, e shortened; the same sound in quality or kind, but not in quantity. To prove this fact, nothing is necessary but an attention to the manner in which the words little and tiny, are pronounced, when they are made emphatical by utterance. They are then pronounced leetle, teeny—and this we hear every day, not only among children, but often among adults. In this change of pronunciation, there is nothing more than a prolongation of the sound of i, which, in the syllables, lit, tin, is short, in leetle, teeny, is long.

In consequence of this mistake, Walker has uniformly made a different notation of i when accented, and followed by a consonant in the same syllable, and when it stands alone in the syllable and unaccented. Thus to the first i in ability he assigns a different sound from that of the second; and in article, he gives to i the sound of e long, arteecle; but in articular, articulate, he gives it the short sound, tik. It is in consequence of this mistake, that he has throughout his Dictionary assigned to i and y unaccented and to y unaccented terminating words, the sound of e long; an error, which it is ascertained by actual enumeration, extends to more than eleven thousand vowels or syllables; an error, which, if carried to the full extent of his principles, would subvert all the rules of English versification. Jones and Perry have corrected this error in their notations, throughout the language.

If it should be said, that Walker did not intend to direct y in this case, to be pronounced as e long, but that his notation is intended only to mark the quality of the sound; it may be replied, he either intended the sound to be that of e long, according to his express direction, or he did not. If he did, his notation is not according to any good practice, either in England or the U. States, and by changing a short vowel into a long one, his notation would subvert the rules of metrical composition. If he did not, his notation is adapted to mislead the learner, and it does mislead learners, wherever his book is strictly followed. In truth, this notation is generally condemned in England, and universally rejected in practice.*

In the notation of sounds, there is a mistake and inconsistency in all the orthoepists, which deserves notice, not on account of its practical importance, so much, as to expose an error in syllabication or the division of words into syllables, which has been maintained by all writers in Great Britain, from time immemorial. The rule is that "a single consonant between two vowels, must be joined to the latter syllable." According to this rule, habit, baron, tenet, are to be divided thus, ha-bit, ba-ron, te-net.

This rule is wholly arbitrary, and has for ages, retarded and rendered difficult, the acquisition of the language by children. How is it possible that men of discernment should support a rule that, in thousands of words, makes it necessary, to break a syllable, detaching one of the letters essential to it, and giving it a place in the next? In the words above mentioned, hab, bar, ten, are distinct syllables, which cannot be divided without violence. In many words, as in these, this syllable is the radix of the word; the other syllable being formative or adventitious. But where this is not the case, convenience requires that syllables should, if possible, be kept entire; and in all cases, the division of syllables should, as far as possible, be such as to lead the learner to a just pronunciation.

As in our language the long and short vowels are not distinguished by differences of character, when we see a single consonant between vowels, we cannot determine, from the preceding vowel character, whether the sound is long or short. A stranger to the language knows not whether to pronounce habit, ha-bit or hab-it, till he is instructed in the customary pronunciation. It was probably to avoid this inconvenience that our ancestors wrote two consonants instead of one in a great number of words, as in banner, dinner. In this respect however there is no uniformity in English: as we have generally retained the orthography of the languages from which we have received the words, as in tutor, rigor, silent, and the like.

Now it should be observed that although we often see the consonant doubled, as in banner, yet no more than one articulation in these cases is ever used in speaking. We close the organs but once between the first and second syllable, nor is it possible to use both the letters n, without pronouncing ban, then intermitting the voice entirely, opening the organs and closing them a second time. Hence in all cases, when the same consonant is written twice between vowels, as in banner, dinner, better, one of them only is represented by an articulation of the organs, the other is useless, except that it prevents any mistake, as to the sound of the preceding vowel.

In the notation of all the orthoepists, there is inconsistency, at least, if not error. If they intend to express the true pronunciation by using the precise letters necessary for the purpose, they all err. For instance, they write bar-run for bar'on, when one articulation only is, or possibly can be, used; so also ballance, biggot, biggamy, mellon, mettaphor, melody. This is not only useless, for the use of the accent after the consonant, as bar'on, bal'ance, big'ot, mel'on, &c. completely answers the purpose of determining the pronunciation; but it is contradictory to their own practice in a vast number of cases. Thus they write one consonant only in ciril, ciric, rivet; and Walker writes kollonade, doubling l, but kelony, kolonise, with a single l. This want of system is observable in all the books which are offered to the public as standards of orthoepy.

A still greater fault, because it may lead to innumerable practical errors, consists in the notation of unaccented syllables. In this particular, there is error and discrepancy in the schemes of the orthoepists, which shows the utter impossibility of carrying them into effect. The final y unaccented, Walker makes to be e long, as I have before observed; while Sheridan, Jones, and Perry, make it equivalent to short i, or at least, give it a short sound, according to universal practice. Walker pronounces the last vowel in natural and national, as a short; Sheridan, as e short, natur'e; Jones, as u short, naturul. Sheridan's notation may be a mistake, for he gives to al in national, the sound of ul. In the adjective deliberate, Walker and Jones give a in the last syllable its proper long sound; and Sheridan, the sound of e short, deliberet. Dignitary is pronounced by Sheridan dignite-ry, and Walker and Jones give to a its short sound, as in at. The terminating syllable ness is pronounced by Walker and Jones nes, by Sheridan nis, as blessednes, blessednis. The same difference exists in their notation of less; Sheridan, pronouncing it lis, as in blamelis, and Walker and Jones,

* From the fact, which Walker relates of himself, Prin. 246, that he made a distinction between the sound of ee in flee and in meet, until he had consulted good speakers and particularly Mr. Garrick, who could find no difference in the sound, it might be inferred that his ear was not very accurate. But his mistake evidently arose from not attending to the effect of the articulation in the latter word, which stops the sound suddenly, but does not vary it. It is the same mistake which he made in the sound of i in the second syllable of ability, which he calls short, while the sound of the second i and of y is that of long e. The celebrity of Walker as a teacher of elocution, and his key to the pronunciation of ancient names, which, with a few exceptions, is a good standard work, have led many persons to put more confidence in his English Orthoepy than a close examination of its principles will support.

INTRODUCTION.

giving e its proper sound. These differences, and many others, run through their works, and appear in a large portion of all the words in the language.

Now it is probable that all these gentlemen pronounced these words alike, or so nearly alike that no difference would be noticed by a bystander. The mischief of these notations is, that attempts are made to express minute distinctions or shades of sounds, so to speak, which cannot be represented to the eye by characters. A great part of the notations must, necessarily, be inaccurate, and for this reason, the notation of the vowels in unaccented syllables should not be attempted. From a careful attention to this subject, I am persuaded that all such notations are useless, and many of them mischievous, as they lead to a wrong pronunciation. In no case can the true pronunciation of words in a language be accurately and completely expressed on paper; it can be caught only by the ear, and by practice. No attempt has ever been made to mark the pronunciation of all the vowels, in any other language; and in our language it is worse than useless.

As Walker's pronunciation has been represented to the people of this country as the standard, I shall confine my remarks chiefly to his work, with a view to ascertain its merits, and correct any erroneous impressions which have been received from such representations.

1. The first class of words which I shall mention, is that in which a has what is called, its Italian sound, as we pronounce it in father, psalm, calm. From a hasty enumeration of words of this class, I find there are two or three hundred in number, in which Walker gives to a its short sound, as in fat, bat, fancy, when, in fact, the most respectable usage in England, as well as in the United States, gives that letter its Italian sound. This error Jones and Perry have corrected. To be correct in this class of words, we have only to retain the customary pronunciation of the northern States.

2. The notation of the sound of oo by Walker is wrong in most or all the words in which oo are followed by k, and in some others. Notwithstanding the distinction between the long and short sound of oo is clear and well established in a great number of words, yet he assigns the short sound to eight words only, viz. wool, wood, good, hood, foot, stood, understood, and withstood. Principles 307. It seems inconceivable that a man, bred or resident in London, should assign to oo in book, cook, took, and other like words, the same sound as in cool, boom, boot, food. Jones and Perry have corrected this notation, and given the pronunciation according to good usage, and just according to our customary pronunciation. While in England, I did not hear a single word of this class pronounced according to Walker's notation.

3. To the letters ch in bench, bunch, clinch, drench, inch, tench, wrench, and many other words, Walker gives the French sound, that is, the sound of sh, instead of ch, as denish, inish, &c. It would seem by this and other examples of wrong notation, that the author had been accustomed to some local peculiarities, either in London where all kinds of dialects are heard, or in some other place. In this instance, he gives to these words a pronunciation different from that of other orthoepists, and one which I have never heard either in England or in this country. His notation is palpably wrong, as our customary pronunciation is universally correct.

4. It has been already remarked, that Walker's notation of the sound of i and y short, in unaccented syllables, which he directs to be pronounced like e long, in me, mete, is contrary to all good usage, and is rejected by every other orthoepist, except Jameson. Walker admits i to be short when followed by a consonant in the same syllable. Thus the first i in ability is short, but the second i and the y are long e, abiletee. Now observe the consequence. In the plural, abilities, according to his rule, must be pronounced abileteez; but the word is never thus pronounced; universally it is pronounced abilitis; the last vowel sound is in practice immediately followed by a consonant, and by his own rule must be short. Then the result is, y in ability is long e, but ie in the plural is short i. And for this change of sound no provision is made in Walker's scheme, nor in any other that I have ever seen.

5. In the analysis of the sounds of our letters, Walker alleges the diphthong ou, ow, to consist of the broad a, or aw, and the Italian sound of u. According to his scheme, about, abound, round, now, vow, are to be pronounced, abawut, abawund, rawund, nawu, vawu. But whoever heard this pronunciation? The fact is not so; the broad sound of a is not the initial sound of this diphthong; it is not commenced as deep in the throat, or with the same aperture as aw; it is a sound that can be learned only by the ear. The pronunciation of this diphthong is uniform in both countries.

6. In noting the sound of the unaccented vowels, and those which have the secondary accent, there are mistakes without number, in all the schemes which I have seen, and one continued series of differences between the orthoepists. The following is a specimen.

I take no notice of the different letters by which these writers express the same sound, one using e where another uses y, but of the different sounds which they give to the vowels in the second, third, or last syllable. Now, I appeal to any person who has a tolerably correct ear, whether it is the sound of a that is uttered by good speakers, or any speakers in deliverance and dignitary? Is it the sound of a that we hear in the last syllable of penance, penetrant, and assemblage? Do we hear in the last syllable of profligate, the short a, as in fat? So far from it, that a public speaker, who should utter the sound of a so that it should be distinctly recognized in any polite audience, would expose himself to ridicule. The sound of the last vowel approaches to that of e or u, and the notation of Sheridan is nearest the truth. But any notation is worse than useless; for without it, there would be no difference in customary pronunciation.

To show the utter impracticability of expressing the unaccented vowels, in all cases, with precision, let the reader observe Walker's notation of a in the word moderate and its derivatives. In the adjective and verb, the a is long, as in fate; in moderately and moderateness, it is short, as in fat. This is certainly incorrect notation; no good speaker ever pronounces these words moderately, moderateness. In addition to this, the a in the verb to moderate is more distinctly pronounced than it is in the adjective, in which it has rather the sound of e short, moderet; at least the sound is more nearly that of e than of a. And this distinction of sound, between letters in the same word, when an adjective, and when a verb, occurs in a multitude of cases; a distinction for which no provision is made in any system of orthoepy that I have seen, and one which must be left to the cognizance of the ear alone.

There is another class of vowel sounds that comprises too many inaccuracies to be overlooked. This is the class in which the first syllable has an unaccented e, as in debate. In all words of this kind, Walker directs the letter e to have its long sound, as in me, mete. Then, become, bedeck, begin, debate, debar, declare, elect, legitimate, mechanic, medicinal, memorial, necessity, peculiar, petition, rebuke, recant, relate, secure, select, velocity, &c. are to be pronounced become, beedeck, beegin, deebate, deebare, deedeclare, eelect, leegitimate, meechanic, meedical, meemorial, neecessity, peeculiar, peetition, reebuke, reecant, reelate, seecure, seelect, veelocity, &c.

According to this notation, the first vowel e in evil, even, and in event, is to have the same sound, being all marked with the same figure. Now, let me ask, where a speaker can be found who pronounces these words in this manner? Who ever heard of such a pronunciation? This notation is erroneous and mischievous, as it is inconsistent with the regular accent, which carries the stress of voice forward to the next syllable, and must, necessarily, leave the first vowel with the feeble sound of short i or y. This short sound is that which we always hear in such words.

The like error occurs in Walker's notation of i in direct, diminish, and many other words. Walker himself, under despatch, calls the sound of e the short i, but under rule 107, says this sound of i cannot be properly said to be short, as it is not closed by a consonant; yet it has half its diphthongal sound, the sound of e!! This reason that i or e is not short, because the sound is not closed by a consonant, is entirely groundless, and contradicted by the universal pronunciation of thousands of English words. To direct such words to be pronounced deereet, deeminish, is inexcusable. This error corresponds with that specified under No. 4, supra.

Thus, there is neither uniformity nor consistency among the orthoepists in the notation of the unaccented vowels; and it is hardly possible there should be, for many of the sounds are so slight, in ordinary pronunciation, that it is almost impossible for the ear to recognize the distinctions, and absolutely impossible to express them on paper. In truth, as Dr. Ash remarks, in a dissertation prefixed to his Dictionary, the sounds of the five vowels, in unaccented, short, and insignificant syllables, are nearly coincident; and it must be a nice ear that can distinguish the difference of sound in the concluding syllable of altar, alter, manor, murmur, satyr. It is for this reason that the notation of such vowels at all savors of hypercritical fastidiousness, and by aiming at too much nicety and exactness, tends only to generate doubts and multiply differences of opinion. If the accent is laid on the proper syllable, and the vowel of that syllable correctly pronounced, the true pronunciation of the word will follow of course; at least, the pronunciation is more likely to be right than wrong, and no mistake will occur, which shall be an object of notice.

Nor can I approve the practice of writing all words, in different characters, to express their pronunciation, as if their proper letters were so many hieroglyphics, requiring interpretation. A great part of English words have an orthography sufficiently regular, and so well adapted to express the true pronunciation, that a few general rules only are wanted as a guide to the learner.

7. Another error of notation, in most of the English books, is that of the vowel in the first syllable of circle, circumstance, and many other words, the first syllable of which Sheridan first and afterwards Walker and Jones directed to be pronounced ser. This pronunciation I have never heard either in England or in this country. Perry's notation makes the syllable sur, according to all the usage with which I am acquainted.

8. Another objection to the books offered as standards of pronunciation, particularly to the dictionaries of Sheridan and Walker, is that the rules are inconsistent, or the execution of the work is inconsistent with the rules. Thus Walker lays it down as a rule, No. 357, that c after the accent and followed by ea, ia, ie, io, or eous, takes the sound of sh, as in ocean, social, Phocion, saponaceous, which are pronounced as if written oshean, sosheal, Phosheon, saponasheous. But in the Dictionary, the author departs from the rule, and directs these words to be pronounced as if written oshun, osshal, saponashus. So also in gracious, ancient, especial, provincial, tenacious, rapacious, and I know not how many others, the author departs from his own rule; so that either his rule or his practice must be wrong.

And here it may be proper to notice a mistake of the author which has led to an erroneous notation in a great number of words. The mistake is, that he assigns to c and t before the vowels ea, ia, ie, eo, and io, the sound of sh. Thus in ocean, he considers c as pronounced like sh; and in partial he considers the sound of sh as proceeding from t only. Now the truth is, that the sound of sh in these and in all similar cases, results from the combination of c, t, or s with the following vowel; that is, from the rapid enunciation and blending of the two letters. Then the sound of the first vowel being blended with c or t, it ought not to be repeated and form a distinct syllable. To make three syllables of ocean, is to use the vowel e twice. In most cases, all the orthoepists agree in pronouncing these combinations correctly in dissyllables, and primitive words; as oshun, grashus, tenashus, parshal, substanshal, nashun, relashun, preshus, and the like. But in a number of words that are primitive in our language, Walker and Jones depart from this rule; for although they pronounce conscience in two syllables, conshense, yet they pronounce nescience and prescience, in three, neshyense, preshyense. So also when they make tial one syllable in the primitive word, they make two syllables of these letters in the derivatives; partial is parshal, but partiality is parshedality. Thus one error has led to another, and a large part of all words of this kind are mispronounced. Sheridan and Perry, in this respect, are consistent and correct; making one syllable only of cia, cie, cio, tia, tio, both in primitives and derivatives, throughout the language. A single line of poetry ought to settle this point forever.

Expatiate free o'er all this scene of man.

9. A remarkable instance of inconsistency occurs in the following words. Armature, aperture, breviature, feature, &c., Walker pronounces armatshure, apertshure, breviatshure, overtshure; but forfeiture is forfeetshure, and judicature, ligature, literature, miniature, nunciature, portraiture, prefecture, quadrature, signature, are pronounced as here written. Can any reason be possibly assigned for such inconsistency?

10. Obedience and its family of words, Walker pronounces obejeence, obejeent, obejeently, but disobedience, disobedient, as here written. Expedient is either as here written, or expejeent; but expedience without the alteration. Why this inconsistency?

11. Obdurate, obduracy, are marked to be pronounced obdurate or objurate, obduracy or objuracy; but objurately, objurateness, without an alteration. In these last words occurs another error, the a in the third syllable is made short, as if pronounced rat; a deviation from all good usage.

This notation of obdurate is inconsistent also with that of indurate, and with that of obdure; an inconsistency which appears to have no plausible pretext.

The conversion of d into j before i, is rejected, I believe, in all words, by Jones, Perry and Jameson, and before u is rejected by Perry and Jameson, and in many words by Jones. It is a departure from orthography wholly inexcusable.

12. Walker, Principles No. 92, lays it down as a rule, that when a is preceded by the gutturals hard g or c, [he should have said palatals,] it is, in polite pronunciation, softened by the intervention of a sound like e, so that card, cart, guard, regard, are pronounced like keard, heart, gheard, reheard. Now it is remarkable that in the vocabulary or dictionary, the author has departed from his rule, for in not one of the foregoing words, except guard, nor in a multitude of other words which fall within the rule, has he directed this sound of e before the following vowel. Had he conformed to his own rule, he must have perverted the pronunciation of car, carbuncle, care, carcass, cardinal, cargo, garden, garter, discard, and a long list of other words, too long to be here enumerated. The English orthoepists now confine this prepositive sound of e to guard, guaranty, guardian, guile, kind, and a few others. The probable origin of this fault, has been already assigned, in treating of the letter u. It is an affected pronunciation, which Nares calls "a monster, peculiar to the stage." Indeed this slender sound of e before another vowel, is wholly incompatible with that manly enunciation which is peculiarly suited to the genius of the language. Perry and Jameson have rejected it.

13. In the first edition of Walker's Dictionary, the author, under the word tripod, observes, that "all words of two syllables, with the accent on the first, and having one consonant between two vowels, ought to have the vowel in the first syllable long." But this was too rash, for such words as cem'ent, des'ert, pref'ace, pres'ent, prof'it, reb'el, trop'ic, and a multitude of others, stand, in the author's book, in direct opposition to his own rule. In a subsequent edition, the author, or some other person, has qualified the rule by an exception in favor of settled usage. This exception destroys the value of the rule; and indeed there is, and there can be no rule applicable to words of this class. The pronunciation of the first vowel can be known only by the usage.

14. The derivatives of nation and ratio, Walker and Jones pronounce nash'onat, rash'onat. If this should be defended on the ground of the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, then let me ask why we have not nosh'onat from notion, derosh'onat from derotum, probash'onat from probation, stash'onary from station? Why make rules and not apply them? Why indulge such palpable inconsistencies and multiply anomalies?

15. Possess is, by the English orthoepists, pronounced poz'zess; but why not then pronounce assess, assist, assassin, consession, obsession, with the sound of z? Can any good reason be assigned for making possess an exception to the pronunciation of this class of words? This utterance of sounds through the nose is always disagreeable to the ear, and should be restricted to words in which usage is established. Good taste should rather induce a limitation, than an extension of this practice. This remark applies also to some words beginning with dis, in which Walker goes beyond other orthoepists in giving to s this nasal sound.

16. Walker lays it down as a fact, that u has the sound of e and oo or yu. This is true in many words, as in union, unite, unanimity, &c. Hence according to his principle, u in these words is to be pronounced yunion, yunite, without the letter y prefixed. Yet he writes these and similar words with y, yunion, which upon his principles, would prefix yu to the sound of yu, and the pronunciation would be yuyunite, or eooyunite. But his notation of this sound of u is not uniform; for he writes disunion and disunite without y, though it must be as proper in the compound as in the simple word. The same inconsistency occurs between use, written yuse, guze, and disuse, disuze.

17. There is a fault in Walker's notation of o, when it has the sound of oo, the French ou. In the Key, he marks o when it has this sound with the figure 2, and gives move as an example. Then according to his Key, o alone when thus marked, sounds as oo. But in the vocabulary, he thus marks both vowels in book, look, boot, and all similar words. Then according to his notation, each of the vowels has the sound of oo, and book, look, are to be pronounced boo-ook, loo-ook. He certainly did not intend this; but such is precisely his direction, or the result of his notation; and a foreigner, without counter-direction, must be led into this pronunciation.

The same fault occurs in his notation of ee, as in meet and seek.

18. Volume, Walker and Jones pronounce vol'yume; why not then change column into col'yum? Will it be said that in volume the u is long? This is not the fact; at least I never heard it thus pronounced either in England or America; it is always short in common usage, and so marked by Perry.

19. Ink, uncle, concord, concourse, concubine, are pronounced by Walker, ingkl, ungkl, kongkord, kongkorse, kongkubine; and these odious vulgarisms are offered for our adoption. There can be no apology for such attempts to corrupt our language.

20. The words bravery, finery, knavery, nicety, scenery, slavery, are, by Walker and the other orthoepists, pronounced in three syllables, and imagery, in four; the final e of the primitive word being detached from it, and uttered with r as a distinct syllable. Why savagery has escaped the same fate, I do not know. It is obvious that in negligent practice, these words have often been thus pronounced. But the most correct pronunciation retains the original word entire in the derivative, the slight sound of e before r no more constituting a syllable, than it does in more and mire. Take the following examples.

Of marble stone was cut
An altar carv'd with cunning imagery .	Spenser.
When in those oratories might you see
Rich carvings, portraitures, and imagery .	Dryden.
Your gift shall two large goblets be
Of silver, wrought with curious imagery .	Dryden.
What can thy imagery of sorrow mean?	Prior.

Pronounced in four syllables, imagery, in these lines, makes a syllable too much, and injures the measure, and in the last example, utterly destroys it. The true pronunciation of Spenser, Dryden and Prior is the same as it always has been in my elementary books.

21. Formerly, the words puissance, puissant, had the accent on the second syllable; although the poets seem, in some instances, to have blended the four first letters into one syllable. But the modern change of the accent to the first syllable is not in accordance with English analogies, and it impairs the measure of many lines of poetry in which these words occur. In the adverb puissantly it has a very bad effect.

The foregoing observations extend to whole classes of words, in which the genuine pronunciation has been changed, unsettled and perverted. It would be inconsistent with the limited nature of this Introduction, to enter into an examination of every particular word of disputable pronunciation. It seems to be inexpedient and useless to bestow, as Walker has done, half a page or a page, on a single word, in attempting to settle some trifling point, or, in many cases, to settle a point that, in this country, has never been disputed.

To give a brief statement of the errors, diversities and contradictions of the principal schemes of orthoepy, which have been offered to the public, within the last half century, two classes of words only will be sufficient, as specimens.

The following lists are not complete, but they comprehend the greatest number of words in their respective classes. The dates at the head of the columns designate the year when the dictionaries in my possession were published, indicating nearly, but not exactly, the origin of each scheme. In the orthography, I have given the letters used by each author, in the syllable which contains the difference of pronunciation; in the others, I have followed the common orthography.

This table of words may perhaps be thought a burlesque on English orthoepy. It certainly presents a phenomenon altogether novel in the history of language.

Of these five authorities, the notation of Perry, with the exception of a few words ending in ure, is most nearly accordant to the present usage in England, as far as my observations, while in that country, extended. That of Walker is by far the most remote from that usage. From an actual enumeration of the syllables in certain classes of words in which the vowel is erroneously pronounced, in Walker's scheme, I have ascertained that the number amounts to more than twelve thousand, without including several classes of unaccented syllables, which would swell the number by some thousands. Of this whole number, I did not, while in England, hear one vowel pronounced according to Walker's notation. The zeal manifested in this country, to make his pronunciation a standard, is absolute infatuation, as if adopted in its full extent, it would introduce many differences in the pronunciation of words in the two countries, where sameness now exists; and even the attempt, should it not be successful, must multiply discordances and distract opinions, and thus place the desired uniformity at a greater distance than ever. Fortunately, Walker's pronunciation has never been generally received in England, and where it has been received, we see, by Jameson's Dictionary, that it is becoming unpopular and obsolete.

We observe in the following list, that the three first of these orthoepists have no rule by which their pronunciation is regulated. Hence the want of uniformity in words of like orthography. See bounteous, courteous, dutious and plenteous. Why should plenteous be reduced to two syllables, when bounteous is pronounced in three? And what reason can be assigned for the different notation of capitulate and recapitulate?

A remarkable instance of inconsistency in Walker's notation occurs in words of more syllables than two, ending in ture. Thus we find ture converted into chure [shure] in

In this class of words, Sheridan and Jones are also inconsistent with themselves, though not to the same extent as Walker. Perry and Jameson retain, in all these words, the true orthography and pronunciation. In these words also, Walker gives to u, in the last syllable, its first or long sound; but this is an inaccurate notation; the sound, in actual usage, is that of short u, at least so far as my observation extends, either in England or the United States.

In the following classes of words, as pronounced by Walker, there is either error or inconsistency, or both.

Assidjuous,	Individual or individjual,
Commodious or commojeus,	Ingrejent [for ingredient,]
Credjulous,	Insidious or insidjeus,
Dividual or dividjual,	Intermedial or intermejeal,

Sedulous or sedjulous,
Studious or stujeus,
Tedious or tejeus.

It would seem that, in a large part of these words, we may take our choice, either to retain the proper sound of d, or to convert it into that of j. This choice certainly makes an odd kind of standard. But why mediate should retain the sound of d, while immediacy and medium suffer a change; or why radiate should be given in the alternative, radiate or rajeate, while irradiate and irradiance are not subjected to any change; or why obedience should be changed into obejeence, and disobedience remain unchanged, I am not able to conjecture.

These classes of words exhibit a specimen of the modern ORTHOEPEY, so called, of our language; it is indeed a brief and imperfect specimen, for I have ascertained by actual enumeration, that a catalogue of all the differences of notation in these authors, would comprehend about one third of all the words in their vocabularies. Amidst this mass of errors and contradictions, our consolation is that the good sense of the English nation, a learned and respectable people, is triumphing over the follies and caprices of fashion, and frowning on this most mischievous spirit of innovation.

In proportion as the importance of settled usages and of preserving inviolate the proper sounds of letters, as the true and only safe landmarks of pronunciation, shall be appreciated by an enlightened people, just in that proportion will all attempts of affected speakers to innovate upon such established usages be reprobated and resisted.

The intentions of the men who have undertaken to give a standard of pronunciation, have unquestionably been upright and sincere; but facts have proved that instead of good they have, on the whole, done harm; for instead of reducing the pronunciation of words to uniformity, they have, to a considerable extent, unsettled it, and multiplied differences. The whole process of these attempts, from Sheridan's first publication, is within my memory, and I am confident, that whatever has been the effect of these attempts in Great Britain, the result of them in the United States, has been to multiply greatly the diversities of pronunciation. And such is the present state of the authorities, offered as standards, that it is impossible from books to gain a correct knowledge of what is the general usage. If I had no other means of knowing this general usage, than the English books, I should be utterly unable to ascertain it and should give up the attempt as hopeless."

Some of the differences of notation, in the several books, may be rather apparent than real; but with all due allowance for this imperfection of the schemes, I am persuaded that there are ten differences among these orthoepists, where there is one in the actual pronunciation of respectable people in England and the United States; and in most of them, the notation, if strictly followed, will lead to ten differences of pronunciation, where one only now exists in the actual practice of the two countries.

This effect of multiplying doubts and diversities, has resulted from very obvious causes.

1. The limited acquaintance of orthoepists with the general usage, and

* The multiplicity of books for instructing us in our vernacular language is an evil of no small magnitude. Every man has some peculiar notions which he wishes to propagate, and there is scarcely any peculiarity or absurdity for which some authority may not be found. The facility of book-making favors this disposition, and while a chief qualification for authorship is a dextrous use of an inverted pen, and a pair of scissors, we are not to expect relief from the evil.

INTRODUCTION.

their taking the pronunciation of London, or some dialect or local practice in that city, for the best usage. The propagation of such a dialectical or peculiar practice would of course disturb the uniformity of any other practice, in other parts of England or in this country.

2. The difficulty or rather impracticability of representing sounds, and nice distinctions of sound, on paper; especially in unaccented syllables.

3. The partiality of authors for the practice of particular speakers, either stage players or others, which would lead them to denominate that the best practice, which had been adopted by their favorites.

4. A spirit of fastidious hypercriticism, which has led writers to make minute distinctions, that are liable to be disputed, and which tend only to perplex the inquirer, and generate uncertainty or diversity, where no essential difference had previously existed in practice. This spirit is continually producing new books and new schemes of orthoepy, and every additional book serves only to increase the difficulty of uniting opinions and establishing uniformity.

This view of the subject is probably the most favorable that can be presented. The real fact seems to be this; these men have taken for the standard, what they were pleased to call the best usage, which, in many cases, is a local usage or some favorite peculiarity of particular speakers, at least if they have had any authority at all; or they have given the pronunciation which happened to please their fancy, though not authorised by usage. In this manner, they have attempted to bend the common usage to their particular fancies.

It has been in this manner, by presenting to the public local or particular practice, or mere innovation, for a standard, instead of general or national usage, that the authors above mentioned have unsettled the pronunciation of many words and multiplied diversities of practice. These attempts to obtrude local usage on the public, and bend to it the general or national usage, are the boldest assumptions of authority in language that the history of literature has ever exhibited. In England however these pretensions to direct the pronunciation of the nation have less effect than they have in the United States, for this obvious reason, that in England pronunciation is regulated almost exclusively by the practice of the higher classes of society, and not by books; hence if books do not exhibit the customary pronunciation, the falsity of notation is easily detected, and the work which offers it is neglected. But in this country, where the people resort chiefly to books for rules of pronunciation, a false notation of sounds operates as a deception and misleads the inquirer. How long the citizens of this country will submit to these impositions, time only can determine.

The English language, when pronounced according to the genuine composition of its words, is a nervous, masculine language, well adapted to popular eloquence; and it is not improbable that there may be some connection between this manly character of the language and the freedom of the British and American constitutions. They may perhaps act and react upon each other mutually, as cause and effect, and each contribute to the preservation of the other. At the same time, the language is, by no means, incapable of poetical sweetness and melody. The attempts to refine upon the pronunciation, within the last half century, have, in my opinion, added nothing to its smoothness and sweetness, but have very much impaired its strength of expression as well as its regularity. The attempts to banish the Italian sound, of a and to introduce the sound of e before i and u, as in kind, guard, duty, &c. ought to be resisted, as injurious to the manly character of the genuine English pronunciation.*

In order to produce and preserve a tolerable degree of uniformity, and the genuine purity of our language, two things appear to be indispensable, viz.

1. To reject the practice of noting the sounds of the vowels in the unaccented syllables. Let any man, in genteel society or in public, pronounce the distinct sound of a in the last syllable of important, or the distinct sound of e in the terminations less and ness, as in hopeless, happiness, and he would pass for a most inelegant speaker. Indeed so different is the slight sound of a great part of the unaccented vowels, in elegant pronunciation, from that which is directed in books of orthoepy, that no man can possibly acquire the nicer distinction of sounds, by means of books; distinctions which no characters yet invented can express. Elegant pronunciation can be learned only by the ear. The French and Italians, whose languages are so popular in Europe, have never attempted to teach the sounds of their letters by a system of notation, embracing the finer sounds of the vowels.

2. To preserve purity and uniformity in pronunciation, it is necessary to banish from use all books which change the orthography of words to adapt the pronunciation to the fashion of the day. The scheme now pursued is the most mischievous project for corrupting the language, that human ingenuity ever devised. By removing the landmarks of language, all the fences which can secure the purity and regularity of the language from unlicensed depredations without end are demolished, the chief use and value of alphabetical writing are destroyed, and every thing is given to chance and to caprice.

In determining the pronunciation of words in this work, I have availed myself of the most respectable English authorities, as well as of my own personal observations in both countries, and of the observations of American gentlemen of erudition who have visited England. In selecting from a mass of contradictory authorities, I may not, in all cases, have adopted the best pronunciation; but I have spared no pains to execute this part of the work with fidelity.

In general, the rules I have prescribed to myself are these. 1. The usage of respectable people in England and the United States, when identical in the two countries, settled and undisputed. This rule comprehends most of the words in the language. 2. When usage is unsettled or uncertain, I have adjusted the pronunciation to the regular, established analogies of the language, as far as these can be definitely ascertained; having however, in accentuation, some regard to euphony, or the prosaic melody which proceeds from a due succession of accented and unaccented syllables.

There are some words, differently pronounced by respectable people, in which no decisive reasons appear for preferring one mode of pronouncing them to another; either might be adopted, without any injury to melody or analogy. I see no particular reason, why pat'ent should have its first vowel short, and ma'tron, pa'tron, and pa'triot, the first vowel long. Much less do I approve the reasons assigned for making the a short in ma'tronal, and not in ma'tronly, or short in pa'tronal, and not in pa'troness. The reasons assigned by Walker appear to me to be absolute trifling. The rule of uniformity is paramount to every other, excepting that of general undisputed custom; and when the practice is unsettled, it seems to be the duty of the lexicographer to be guided by that rule, for his authority may lead to the uniformity desired.

In a few instances, the common usage of a great and respectable portion of the people of this country accords with the analogies of the language, but not with the modern notation of English orthoepists. In such cases, it seems expedient and proper, to retain our own usage. To renounce a practice confessedly regular for one confessedly anomalous, out of respect to foreign usage, would hardly be consistent with the dignity of lexicography. When we have principle on our side, let us adhere to it. The time cannot be distant, when the population of this vast country will throw off their leading strings, and walk in their own strength; and the more we can raise the credit and authority of principle over the caprices of fashion and innovation, the nearer we approach to uniformity and stability in practice.

It is difficult, if not impracticable, to reconcile the opinions of a nation, in regard to every point, either of orthography or pronunciation. Every attempt that has yet been made, in regard to the English language, has served only to increase the difficulty; and as a gentleman remarked to me in London, a convention of learned men could not effect the object, for no two men would think alike on the subject.

The language of a nation is the common property of the people, and no individual has a right to make inroads upon its principles. As it is the medium of communication between men, it is important that the same written words and the same oral sounds to express the same ideas, should be used by the whole nation. When any man therefore attempts to change the established orthography or pronunciation, except to correct palpable errors and produce uniformity, by recalling wanderers into the pale of regular analogies, he offers an indignity to the nation. No local practice, however respectable, will justify the attempt. There is great dignity, as well as propriety, in respecting the universal and long established usages of a nation.

With these views of the subject, I feel myself bound to reject all modern innovations, which violate the established principles and analogies of the language, and destroy or impair the value of alphabetical writing. I have therefore endeavored to present to my fellow citizens the English language, in its genuine purity, as we have received the inheritance from our ancestors, without removing a landmark. If the language is fatally destined to be corrupted, I will not be an instrument of the mischief.

ETYMOLOGY.

Irregular as is the orthography of the English Language, and unsettled or corrupt as is the pronunciation, there is nothing either in English or in any other language of which I have any knowledge, which exhibits so strikingly the low state of philology as the etymological deductions of words, or the history of their origin, affinities and primary signification. To enable the young inquirer to estimate the erudition, correctness, or negligence of writers on this subject, and to awaken more attention to this branch of learning, I will state briefly the results of my researches and the opinions which I have been compelled to form on the merits of the principal treatises on this subject. And if these opinions or this statement should be charged to egotism, or my over-weening confidence in the success of my own investigations, my apology is, that I have suffered so much myself by a misplaced confidence in the erudition of writers; I have so often embraced errors

*The French language, by the loss or imperfect use of articulations, though rendered easy in utterance, has become so feeble in sound as to be unfit for bold, impressive eloquence. From the specimens which I witnessed in the Chamber of Deputies in Paris, I should suppose the orator must depend almost entirely on his own animation and action for success in popular speaking, with little or no aid from the strength and beauty of language. The language of popular eloquence should be neither the mouthing cant of the stage, nor the mincing affectation of dandies, nor the baby talk of the nursery. Such was not the language of Demosthenes nor of Cicero; and such may never be the language of the British Chatham, and of the American Ames.

INTRODUCTION.

which it has cost me more labor to unlearn than to learn; that if I can prevent my fellow-citizens, who have a taste for this study, from being subjected to the same evils, I shall think the advantage obtained more than a balance for any unmerited imputation.

The first example of etymology which I shall mention, is that of Josephus, the historian of the Jews, who informs his readers, that the first man "was called Adam, which in the Hebrew tongue signifies one that is red, because he was formed out of red earth compounded together; for of that kind is virgin and true earth." Here is a mistake proceeding from a mere resemblance of words; it being certain that Adam no more signifies red earth, than it does red cedar. This mistake is connected with another, that Adam was the proper name of the first man, an individual; whereas the word is the generic name of the human species, and like man in English, signifies form, shape, image, expressing distinctively the characteristic eminence or distinction of form of the human race. This fact explains the use of the plural pronoun, in the account of the creation of the species. "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, &c." Gen. i. 26. It is evident also that the words used in relation to the species, the image, the likeness of God, have reference, not only to their intellectual and moral faculties, but also to their external form; and so the Apostle interprets the words, 1 Cor. xi. 7. Not that God has any bodily shape of which man can be the image, but that man has a superior or super-excellent form, corresponding to his intellectual powers, and distinguishing him from all other animals. Now the mistake of Josephus has infected the christian world for eighteen hundred years, and the mistake, with erroneous inferences from it, enters into the most recently published systems of theology.

Among the most celebrated authors of antiquity, who have written on the subject of language, is Varro, who has left a treatise De Lingua Latina. On this author's learning, Cicero, Quintilian and Augustine have bestowed the most unbounded praises. He is pronounced to have been vir egregius; eruditissimus Romanorum; peritissimus lingue Latine et omnis antiquitatis, sine ulla dubitatione, doctissimus.^{*} He was doubtless a man of uncommon erudition for the age in which he lived; and his etymological treatise may be consulted with advantage by persons who have knowledge enough of this subject to separate the certain or probable from the improbable and conjectural. But it is certain from what remains of his treatise, that his knowledge of the origin of words did not extend beyond the most obvious facts and principles. Thus he deduces initium from ineo; exitus from exeo; victoria from vinco. All this is well; and we have reason to think him correct, in deducing vellus, fleece, from vellere, to pluck, as doubtless fleeces were plucked from sheep, before the use of shears. And we have reason to believe him when he informs us that imber was originally written himber; that hircus was written by the Sabines fircus, and hædus, fedus.

Very different must be our opinion of the following etymologies.

Pater, says Varro, is from patefacio; ager cultus is so called because in it seeds coalesce or unite with the earth; referring ager perhaps to the root of agger, or the Greek αγρος. Campus, he says, was so named because fruits were first gathered from the open field, deducing the word from capio. Next to this, were the hills, colles, so named colendo, from colo, because these were cultivated next to the open plain. That land or field which appeared to be the foundation of cattle and money was called fundus, or it was so called because it pours forth [fundat] annual crops. He deduces cogitare from cogendo; concilium from cogitatione; cura from burning cor, the heart; volo from voluntas, and volatu, a flying, because the mind flies instantly whither it will. How low must have been the state of philology, when such improbable conjectures as these could attract the encomiums before mentioned from Cicero and Quintilian!

The reader will find many things in Isidore and Priscian, worthy of his attention, though much of what their works contain is now so familiar to scholars of moderate attainments, as scarcely to repay the labor of perusal. But he who learns that Isidore makes oratio, a compound of oris ratio; notamen, a contraction of notamen; and that he derives verbum, from verberato uere, will hardly think it worth his labor to pursue his researches into that author's works. Nor will he be disposed to relish Priscian's deduction of litera from legiliter, because a letter affords the means of reading, or from lituro, to obliterate, because the ancients used to write on wax tables, and afterwards to obliterate what they had written.

Vossius wrote a folio on the etymology of Latin words; but from repeated examinations of his book, I am persuaded that most of his deductions are far-fetched, conjectural and fanciful; many of them are certainly erroneous.

Menage and Minshew I have not consulted; chiefly because from such extracts as I have seen, from their writings, I am certain that little reliance can be placed on their opinions, except in cases too plain to be mistaken.

Junius and Skinner, the authorities for most of the etymologies of Bailey and Johnson, are sufficiently correct in referring English words to the language from which they are immediately derived, especially when the orthography is too plain to be mistaken. They inform us that father is from the Saxon fader, that drop is from Sax. droppan, that picket is from the French piquet, and the like. So Johnson informs us that accent is from the Latin accentus, and accept from the French accepter, Latin accipio. All this is well, but it can hardly be called etymology, or the deduction of words from their originals.

Whiter, in his ETYMOLOGICON MAGNUM, the first volume only of which I have perused, began his work on a good plan, that of bringing together words of the same or of cognate radical letters, and in pursuance of his plan, he has collected many real affinities. But he has destroyed the value of his work by mistaking the radical sense of many words, and by confounding words of different elements.

Jamieson, in his Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language, has collected the affinities of words in that language, particularly words of Gothic and Teutonic origin, with industry and probably with judgment and a good degree of accuracy. In some instances, I think he has departed from correct principles of etymology, and mistaken facts, and he, as well as Whiter, falls very short of truth in a most important particular, a clear understanding of the primary sense of words. Jamieson's Dictionary however contains a valuable addition to our stock of etymological materials.*

To Horne Tooke are we indebted for the first explanation of certain indeclinable words, called conjunctions and prepositions; and for this let him have all merited praise. But his researches were very limited, and he has fallen into most material errors, particularly in his second volume. I have made no use of his writings, in this work.

* Thus far had I written, before I had seen this author's HERMES SCYTHICUS. By this work I find the author agrees with me in regard to the identity and common origin of many of the Gothic and Greek prepositions. Indeed I had supposed that proof of such an obvious fact could hardly be necessary, in the present state of philological knowledge. Some of these prepositions he has illustrated with a good degree of accuracy; although should this work ever fall into his hands, I think he will be convinced that in one or two important points, his explanations are defective. In regard to other prepositions, I am satisfied the author has ventured upon unsafe ground, at least his opinions appear to me not to be well supported.

In respect to his explanations of the names of the mythological deities, it appears to me the author, like all other authors whose works I have seen, wanders in darkness. From all my researches into the origin of words, I have drawn this conclusion, that the pagan deities are mostly the powers or supposed powers of nature, or imaginary beings supposed to preside over the various parts of creation, or the qualities of men, deified, that is, exalted and celebrated as supernatural agents. There are few of the names of these deities which I pretend to understand; but there are a few of them that seem to be too obvious to be mistaken. No person, I think, can doubt that the Dryads are named from δρυς, an oak or tree. Hence I infer that this name was applied to certain imaginary beings inhabiting the forests.

No person can doubt, that Nereus, the deity of the sea, and the nereids, nymphs of the sea, are named from the oriental נָהַר, נָהַר a river, from the corresponding verb, to flow. No person doubts that Flora, the goddess of flowers, is merely a flower-deified.

Hence I infer that the true method of discovering the origin of the pagan deities, is to find the meaning of their names.

Now Diana is the goddess of hunting. What quality then is most necessary for a hunter? What quality would rude men, destitute of the weapons which we possess, most value as useful in obtaining subsistence? Doubtless courage and swiftness. Thus we have substantial reasons for believing that Diana is the Celtic dan or dian, which signifies bold, strong, vehement, impetuous, the root of Danube, Don, and other names of large rivers.

If we examine the name of Minerva, we shall find that the first syllable contains the elements of manus, the hand, and of mind; and the last constituent part of the word corresponds well with the German arbeit, D. arbeit, labor, work, the last consonant being lost. Well, what are the characteristics of Minerva? Why, she is the goddess of wisdom and of the arts. The sense of μυνη, would give one of her characteristics, and that of manus and arbeit, the other; but which is the true word, I do not know.

The two circumstances which chiefly distinguish Hercules are his labors and his club. We never hear of Hercules but with these accompaniments. Now the first syllable of his name is precisely the root of the Greek εργον, εργον, that is, εργον or εργον, which would give the sense of work, labor. Whether the last constituent of the name is κλειος or from that root, I shall not pretend to affirm. Indeed, I offer these explanations rather as probable, than as clearly proved; but they do appear to be probably well founded. Hercules then was a name given to any bold, heroic leader of a tribe of rude men, who was distinguished for his achievements as a warrior; and this name must have originated in very early ages, when clubs were the principal weapons of war, and instruments of defense. And hence probably the origin of the scepter, as a badge of royalty. Now it is worthy of remark that the war club of rude nations, at this day, especially of the savage nations of the south sea isles, is of the same shape as the ancient scepter.

* Of the full value of these encomiums we can hardly judge, as most of Varro's writings have perished, and some of those which survive appear in a mutilated form. But the greater his erudition, the more striking will appear his ignorance of this subject.

INTRODUCTION.

The HERMES of Harris, according to Dr. Lowth, "is the most beautiful and perfect example of analysis, that has been exhibited since the days of Aristotle." This, in my opinion, is not the character of the work, which, for the most part, consists of passages from the works of Aristotle, Ammonius, Apollonius, Priscian, and other grammarians. It is little more than a collection of the opinions of the ancient writers on philology, whose metaphysical subtleties rather obscure than illustrate the subject. To show how easily men may be misled by metaphysics, when applied to the plainest subject imaginable, take the following example from the Hermes.

"A respects our primary perception, and denotes individuals as unknown; it respects our secondary perception, and denotes individuals as known." [This is nearly a literal translation of a passage in Priscian, Lib. 17.]

To illustrate the truth of this observation, the author gives the following example. "There goes a beggar with a long beard"—indicating that the man had not been seen before; and therefore a denotes the primary perception. A week after the man returns and I say, "There goes the beggar with the long beard;" the article the here indicating the secondary perception, that is, that the man had been seen before. All this is very well. But let us try the rule by other examples, and see whether it is universal, or whether it is the peculiar and proper office of an or a to denote primary perception.

"The article a, says Harris, leaves the individual unascertained." Let us examine this position.

"But Peter took him, saying, stand up; I myself also am a man." Now, according to Harris, a here denotes the primary perception, and the individual is unascertained. That is, this man is one, I have never seen before.

"He that cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Whether a, in this sentence, denotes first perception, I cannot determine; but sure I am the individual is not left unascertained.

A B says to me, "I have lately dismissed an old servant, who has lived with me for thirty years." Here an may present a primary perception to the hearer, but not so to the speaker. To both, the individual must be well ascertained.

It appears then that this definition of an or a is incorrect, and the pains of these metaphysical writers who form such perfect analyses of language, is little better than learned trifling. On testing the real character of an or a by usage and facts, we find it is merely the adjective one, in its Saxon orthography, and that its sole use is to denote one, whether the individual is known or unknown, definite or indefinite.

Again Harris translates, and adopts the definition which Aristotle has given of a conjunction. "An articulate sound or part of speech devoid of signification by itself, but so formed as to help signification, by making two or more significant sentences to be one significant sentence."

This is so far from being true, that some of the conjunctions are verbs, equivalent to join, unite or add, in the imperative mode. In like manner, the prepositions called inseparable, and used as prefixes, are all significant per se, although by custom, they sometimes lose their appropriate use. For example, re, which denotes repetition, has lost its use in recommend, which is equivalent to commend, without the sense of repetition. But still it has ordinarily an appropriate sense, which is perfectly understood, even when first prefixed to a word. Let any person prefix this word to pronounce for the first time, and direct a boy of fourteen years old to repronounce his oration, and he would perfectly well understand the direction.

Bryant, the author of "An Analysis of Ancient Mythology," whose works I should love to read, if I could have confidence in his opinions, has given to the public a history of the Cuthites or descendants of Ham, a race of bold adventurers, who, as he supposes, made expeditions by sea and land, introducing arts, founding cities, and corrupting religion by the propagation of Sabianism. For proof of his opinions, he relies very much on etymology and the signification of names. Two or three examples of his deductions will be sufficient to show his manner of proof. Ham or Cham, signifying heat and the sun, he deduces from חם to be hot, to heat. So far he may be correct. But he goes on to deduce from this root, also, as Castle had done before him, the Greek καύω, heat, not considering that this is from καίω, to burn, in which m is not radical, but probably s is the radical consonant, as this occurs in the derivatives. Καύω has no connection with Ham. From Cam or Cham he then deduces the Latin Camera, Gr. καμαρα, an arched roof or vault, whence our chamber, though it is not easy to discover the connection between this word and heat, and from the same root, he deduces Camillus, Camilla, and many other words, without any support for his opinions, but a mere similarity of orthography in the first syllable. In all this, he is certainly wrong.

The Greek Θιός, God, he supposes most unwarrantably to be formed from the Egyptian Theuth or Thoth, Mercury.

The sun he supposes to have been styled El-uc; El [אֱלֹהִים] and uc or och, a title of honor among the Babylonians. This word, says Bryant, the Greeks changed into λυκος, [a wolf,] and hence the Latin lux, luceo. A strange conjecture this, not to call it by a harsher name. Now if Bryant had examined the Teutonic dialects, and the Welsh, he would have seen his mistake; for the Saxon leoht, liht, Dutch and German licht, are from the common root of the Welsh llug, a shooting or gleaming, llucau, to throw, lluc, a darting or flashing, the root of luceo; a simple root, that can have no connection with El-uc.

Excepting Faber's work on the Cabiri, I have seen scarcely a book in any language, which exhibits so little etymological knowledge, with such a series of erroneous or fanciful deductions, as Bryant's Analysis. Drummond's Origines abounds with etymological deductions of a similar character.

Gebelin, a French writer, in his Monde Primitif, has bestowed much labor in developing the origin and signification of words; but a large part of his labor has produced no valuable effect. His whole system is founded on a mistake, that the noun is the root of all other words.

Of all the writers on etymology, whose works I have read or consulted, Spelman and Llyud are almost the only ones, in whose deductions much confidence can be placed. I do not name Camden, Hicks, Selden and Gibson, as their etymological inquiries, though generally judiciously conducted, were very limited. This is true also in some degree of Spelman and Llyud; but the researches of Spelman into the origin of law terms, and words of the middle ages, have generally produced very satisfactory results. From the limited nature of the designs of Spelman and Llyud, errors may have occasionally escaped them; but they are few, and very pardonable.

I know of no work in any language in which words have been generally traced to their original signification, with even tolerable correctness. In a few instances, this signification is too obvious to be mistaken, but in most instances, the ablest etymologist is liable to be misled by first appearances, and the want of extensive investigation. I have been often misled myself, by these means, and have been obliged to change my opinions, as I have advanced in my inquiries. Hence the tendency of my researches has been very much to increase my caution in referring words to their originals; and such, I am persuaded, will be the result of all critical and judicious investigations into the history and affinities of language.

A principal source of mistakes on this subject, is a disregard of the identity of the radical consonants, and a licentious blending and confounding of words, whose elementary letters are not commutable. Another source of error is an unwarrantable license in prefixing or inserting letters, for the purpose of producing an identity or resemblance of orthography; a fault very justly opposed by Sir William Jones.

The learned Dr. Good, in his Book of Nature, Lecture IX, of the second series, suggests it to be probable that both papa and father, issued from the Hebrew source אב, אבא, אבה. He then fearlessly ventures to affirm, that there is scarcely a language or dialect in the world, polished or barbarous, in which the same idea is not expressed by the radical of one or the other of these terms. True; the letter א is found in most words of this signification; although our knowledge of languages is too limited to warrant such a broad assertion. But the attempt to deduce all words signifying father from the Hebrew must certainly fail; for we know from history that a great part of Asia and of Europe was inhabited before the existence of the Hebrew nation. Besides, a large portion of the European population have no word for father which can be rationally deduced from אב. The Welsh tad, whence our daddy, the Gothic atta, Irish athair, Basque aita, and Laponic atki, cannot be formed from the Hebrew word, the letter D and T not being commutable with B. One would suppose that a learned physiologist could not fail to assign the true cause of the similarity of words, bearing the sense of father and mother, among the nations of the earth. The truth is, the sound of a is very easy and probably the easiest for children, being formed by simply opening the mouth, without any exertion of the organs to modulate the sound. So also the articulations b, m, and d or t, being natural and easy, will generally enter into the first words formed by children. The labials are formed by simply closing the lips, and the dentals, by placing the tongue against the root of the upper teeth; the position which it naturally occupies in a healthy child. From these circumstances, we may fairly infer, a priori, that such words as ab, aba, papa, tad, mama, must be the first words uttered by children. Indeed, were the whole human race to lose their present names for father, mother, and nurse, similar names would be formed by a great portion of mankind, without any communication between different nations.

The author further observes, that the generic terms for the Deity are chiefly the three following, Al or Allah, Theus or Deus, and God. "Besides these, there is scarcely a term of any kind, by which the Deity is designated, in any part of the world, whether among civilized or savage man. Yet these proceed from the same common quarter of the globe." True; men, and of course words, all came from a common quarter of the globe. But it so happens, that these three terms must have originated among different families, or from different sources, for they are all formed with different radicals, and can have had no connection with a common radix. But it happens also, that not one of these terms, as far as I can learn, exists among the Slavonic nations, who compose a large portion of all the population of Europe, and whose name of God is Bog, a word radically distinct from all which the author has mentioned.

The author proceeds to say, "that the more common etymon for death, among all nations, is mor, mort or mut." But if either of these terms for death, is a native word among the great Gothic, Teutonic, and Slavonic families, which constitute the half or two thirds of all the inhabitants of Europe,

INTRODUCTION.

I have not been able to find it. Besides, mor and mut are words radically distinct, and thus originated in different families.

"Sir," says the author, "is, in our language, the common title of respect; and the same term is employed in the same sense throughout every quarter of the globe. In the Sanscrit and Persian, it means the organ of the head itself." He finds the word in Arabia, Turkey, in Greek, among the Peruvians in South America, in Germany, Holland, and the contiguous countries. In some of the languages of these countries, I have found no such word; but if it exists, the author's inference, that the name of the head gave rise to this term of respect, (for this is what I understand him to mean,) is totally unfounded; and equally fanciful and unfounded is his supposition, that, by the loss of h from sher, the pronoun her, and the German herr, lord, are to be deduced from sir. In all this, it is demonstrably certain there is no truth or even semblance of reality.

Man, the author deduces from the Hebrew מן to discern or discriminate, [a sense I do not find in the Lexicons,] and hence he infers that the radical idea of man is that of a thinking or reasonable being. With this word he connects Menu, Menes, Minos, and μνος, mens, mind; a sweeping inference made at random from a similarity of orthography, without a distant conception of the true primary meaning of either of these words. But what is worse, he appears, if I do not mistake his meaning, to connect with these words, the tane, tanato, or tangi, of the Sandwich isles; words, which are formed with a radical initial consonant not convertible with m, and most certainly unconnected with man. See the words father, man, and sir, in the Dictionary.

The author offers some other etymologies and affinities equally remote from truth, and even from probability.

The governing principles of etymology are, first, the identity of radical letters, or a coincidence of cognates, in different languages; no affinity being admissible, except among words whose primary consonants are articulations of the same organs, as B, F, M, P, V and W; or as D, T, Th and S; or as G, C hard, K and Q; R, L and D. Some exceptions to this rule must be admitted, but not without collateral evidence of the change, or some evidence that is too clear to be reasonably rejected.

Second. Words in different languages are not to be considered as proceeding from the same radix, unless they have the same signification, or one closely allied to it, or naturally deducible from it. And on this point, much knowledge of the primary sense of words, and of the manner in which collateral senses have sprung from one radical idea, is necessary to secure the inquirer from mistakes. A competent knowledge of this branch of etymology cannot be obtained from any one, or from two or three languages. It is almost literally true, that in examining more than twenty languages, I have found each language to throw some light on every other.

That the reader may have more clear and distinct ideas of what is intended by commutable letters, and the principles by which etymological deductions are to be regulated, it may be remarked that commutable or interchangeable letters are letters of the same organs; that is, letters or articulations formed by the same parts of the mouth. Thus b, m and p, are formed immediately by the lips, the position of which is slightly varied to make the distinction between these letters. F and v are formed by the lips, but with the aid of the upper teeth. Now the difference of the jointings of the organs to utter these letters is so small, that it is easy for men in utterance to slide from one form into another.

The following examples will illustrate this subject.

Labial letters commuted for other labials.

English bear, Lat. fero, pario, G. φέρω, φορέω, D. voeren, G. führen.

Here is the same word written in different languages, with five different initial letters.

German wahr, true, L. verus.

Celtic lamh, law, the hand, Goth. lofa.

L. gubernio, Fr. gouverner, Eng. govern.

Dental letters commuted for other dentals.

Eng. dew, G. thau.

Eng. good, G. gut.

Eng. dare, Gr. δάρω.

Eng. day, G. tag.

Eng. thank, D. danken.

Eng. brother, D. broeder.

Palatal letters commuted for other palatals.

Eng. call, W. gallo, Gr. καλέω.

Eng. get, It. cattare.

Greek χειμα, L. hiems, winter.

Dentals converted into sibilants.

Eng. water, G. wasser.

Lat. dens, a tooth, G. zahn.

Eng. let, Fr. laisser.

Fr. blanc, white, Port. branco.

Letters formed by different organs are not commutable; hence we are not to admit a radical word beginning or ending with b, f or v, to be the same as a word beginning or ending with g, d, t, r or s; nor a word whose radical letters are m, n, to be the same as one whose elements are r, d, or s, t. If such words are in any case the same, they must have suffered some anomalous changes; changes which are very unusual and which are never to be admitted without the clearest evidence.

When this work was in the press, I first obtained a sight of a "History of the European Languages," by the late Dr. Alexander Murray, Professor of Oriental languages in the University of Edinburgh.

From a hasty perusal of the first volume, I find this learned professor studied the European languages with much attention and profit. He has gone further into the origin and formation of languages, than any author whose works I have read; and his writings unfold many valuable principles and facts. But he formed a theory which he attempted to support, in my opinion with little success: at least, on his principles, all the usual rules of etymology are transgressed, and all distinction between words of different radical letters is abandoned. According to his theory, nine words are the foundations of language, viz. ag, wag, hwag, bag or bwag, [of which fag and pag are softer varieties,] dwag, thwag or twag, gwag or cwag, lag and hag, mag, nag, and hnag, rag and hrag, swag. "By the help of these nine words and their compounds all the European languages have been formed." These are the author's words.

To make out his scheme, he joins ag, having, to wag, move, and forms a diminutive, wagag, to move a little or often. With ba, bear or bring, and la, hold, wagaba signifies literally move-bearing, and wagla is move-having. Then wagaba contracted into wabba, to wave, to weave, and wagla into wala, to turn. From dag, to wet, bedew, comes damp; from ceag, to chew, comes champ; fal, joined, wrought together, from fag, to work, to join; hwal and hal, to hold, and turn, from hwag; bat from bagd or bagt; bigt, a bite, from bigt; bladder from blag; modera, mother, the producer, from maga, produced; bottom from bogd, a stump, root or foundation; field from fagd; earth from airtha, acertha, from acer, aker, ager; field, an uncultivated plain, from fag, to make to fall.

It seems that in order to maintain his theory, it was necessary to make it appear that g formed a part of all original words, and that this letter has, in modern words, been dropped. The author then introduces this letter into words where it never had any place, such as field, earth, bat, &c. The author's work presents one of the most singular medleys of truth and error, of sound observation and visionary opinions, that has ever fallen under my notice.

On the same principles, he must have inserted the letter g in bear, fero, pario, בָּרָא; in bend, found, tame, δαμάω, domo; in dream, wander, turn, &c.; and supposed them to have been originally beager, segro, pagrio, בָּרָא, begnd, fovgnd, tagme, δαγμαω, dogmo, dreagm, wagnder, tugrn, &c.

Now on such a principle as this we might deduce any word in the language from any other word, or from any root that could be imagined. In short, all such theories are the produce of wild conjecture, and they serve no purpose but to confound the student and bring the study of etymology into contempt.

ACCENTUATION.

ACCENT is the more forcible utterance of a particular syllable of a word, by which it is distinguished from the others. The accented syllable of a word serves therefore as a kind of resting place or support of the voice, which passes over the unaccented syllables with more rapidity and a less distinct utterance.

Accent is of two kinds, or rather of two degrees of force, primary and secondary. Words of one syllable can have no accent. Words of two syllables have the primary accent only. Words of three and four syllables may have the primary and secondary accent; but many of them have no secondary accent that deserves notice; such are dignity, enemy, annuity, fidelity. In words of four, five or more syllables, a secondary accent is often essential to a clear distinct articulation of the several syllables. Thus heterogeneous cannot be well uttered without two accented syllables; the fourth syllable receiving the principal stress of the voice, and the first clearly distinguished by more forcible utterance, than the second, third, fifth, and sixth.

The accent of most English words has been long established; and evidently, it has been determined by the natural ease of speaking, without the aid of rules or instruction. If any man should ask, why we lay the accent of such words as elocution, meditation, relation, congratulation, on the last syllable, except one; the answer is, that such accentuation renders the pronunciation more easy to the organs of speech and more agreeable to the ear, than the accentuation of any other syllable. The ease of speaking, and a kind of prosaic melody, resulting from a due proportion of accented and unaccented syllables, which enables the speaker to bound with ease from one accented syllable to another, without omitting those which are unaccented, are the two great principles by which the accentuation of words has been regulated. And it is to be extremely regretted that these principles should, in any instances, be neglected, or forced to yield to arbitrary reasons of derivation, or to a pedantic affectation of foreign pronunciation. When we know that the great mass of a nation naturally fall into a particular manner of pronouncing a word, without any rule or instruction, we may rely upon this tendency as a pretty certain indication that their accentuation is according to the analogies of the language, by which their habits of speaking have been formed; and this tendency cannot be opposed without doing violence to those analogies and to national habits.

Thus formerly, the word horizon was universally accented on the first syllable, and this accentuation was according to the settled analogy of the language. But the early poets had a fancy for conforming the English to the Greek pronunciation, and accented the second syllable; the orthoepists followed them; and now we have this forced, unnatural pronunciation of the learned in collision with the regular, analogous popular pronunciation. By this affectation of the Greek accent, the flowing smoothness of the word is entirely lost.

In like manner, an imitation of the French pronunciation of confesseur, and successeur, led the early poets to accent the English words on the first syllable, in violation of analogy and euphony; and some orthoepists affect to follow them; but public usage frowns on this affectation, and rejects their authority.

There are many words in the English language, indeed a large part of the whole number, which cannot be reduced under any general rule of accentuation, as the exceptions to any rule formed will be nearly as numerous as the words which the rule embraces. And in most instances, we shall find, in the structure of the words, satisfactory reasons for the difference of pronunciation.

DISSYLLABLES.

No general rule can be given for the accentuation of words of two syllables. It is however, worth observing that when the same word is both a noun or an adjective and a verb, it happens, in many instances, that the noun or adjective has the accent on the first syllable, and the verb on the last. Instances of which we have in absent, to absent; concert, to concert; export, to export. The reason is, the preterit and participles of the verbs require to have the same syllable accented, as the verb; but if the first syllable of the preterit and participles were to be accented, it would be difficult to pronounce the words, as may be perceived by attempting to pronounce absenting, concerted, conducted, with the accent on the first syllable.

In a few instances, the word has a different accent when a noun, from that which it has when an adjective; as August, august; gallant, gallant.

TRISSYLLABLES.

Words of three syllables, derived from dissyllables, usually retain the accent of their primitives. Thus Poet, poetess; pleasant, pleasantly; gracious, graciously; reldte, reldted; polite, politest.

In like manner, words of four syllables, formed from dissyllables, generally retain the accent of the primitives; as in collectible from collect, serviceable from service.

In all cases, the preterit and participles of verbs retain the accent of the verbs.

Words ending in tion, sion, tian, cious, tious, cial, cian, tial, tiate, tient, cient, have the accent on the syllable preceding that termination; as motion, christian, precious, erudition, patient, &c.

Words of more than two syllables, ending in ly, have, for the most part, the accent on the antepenult; as gratuity, propriety, prosperity, insensibility.

Trissyllables ending in ment, for the most part have the accent on the first syllable, as compliment, detriment; but to this rule there are many exceptions, and particularly nouns formed from verbs, as amendment, commandment.

Words with the following terminations have the accent on the last syllable except two, or antepenult.

- fluus, as superfluus, mellifluus.
- ferous, as bacciferous, argentiferous.
- fluent, as circumfluent.
- cracy, as democracy, theocracy.
- gonal, as diagonal, sexagonal.
- gony, as cosmogony, theogony.
- macy, as logomachy, theomachy.
- loquy, as obloquy, ventriloquy.
- macy, as polymathy.
- meter, as barometer, hygrometer.
- nomy, as economy, astronomy.
- pathy, as apathy, antipathy.
- phony, as euphony, symphony.
- parous, as oviparous, viviparous.
- scopy, as deuteroscopy, aeroscopy.
- strophe, as apostrophe, catastrophic.
- tomy, as ignitomy.

- borous, as earthenous, graminiferous.
- tomy, as anatomy, lithotomy.
- raphy, as geography, orthography.

Compound words, as book-case, ink-stand, pen-knife, note-book, usually have a slight accent, that is, one syllable is distinguished by some stress of voice; but as the other syllable is significant by itself, it is uttered with more distinctness than the syllables of other words which are wholly unaccented. And in some words, there are two accents, one on each component part of the word, which are barely distinguishable. Thus in legislature, legislator, legislature, the accent on the first syllable can hardly be distinguished from that on the third; and if a speaker were to lay the primary accent on the third syllable, his pronunciation would hardly be noticed as a singularity. Indeed there are some compound words, in which there is so little distinction of accent, that it is deemed unnecessary to mark either syllable or part of the word as accented.

As to a great part of English words, their accent must be learned from dictionaries, elementary books, or practice. There is no method of classification, by which they can be brought under a few simple general rules, to be easily retained by the memory; and attempts to effect this object must only burden the memory, and perplex the learner.

The differences in the accentuation of words, either in books or in usage, are not very numerous. In this respect, the language is tolerably well settled, except in a few words. Among these are acceptable, commendable, confessor, successor, receptacle, receptory, deceptory, refragable, dyspepsy, which the orthoepists incline to accent on the first syllable. But with regard to most of these words, their accentuation is contrary to common usage, and with regard to all of them, it ought to be rejected. The ease of pronunciation requires the accent to be on the second syllable, and no effort to remove it can ever succeed.

The words accessory, desultory, exemplary and peremptory would all have the accent on the second syllable, were it not very difficult, with this accent, to articulate the three last syllables of the derivatives, accessorily, desultorily, exemplarily, peremptorily. It is for this reason, that the primary accent is laid on the first syllable, and then a secondary accent on the third enables the speaker to articulate distinctly and with tolerable ease the last syllables. If the primary accent is laid on the second syllable, there can be no secondary accent. Yet the natural accent of the primitives being on the second syllable of the three first, and the derivatives little used, we find good speakers often lay the accent on the second syllable; nor is it easy to change the practice.

This circumstance of regarding the pronunciation of derivative words, in settling the accent, has been either wholly overlooked, or not sufficiently observed in practice. Hence the orthoepists accent the second syllable of the verbs alternate, demonstrate, contemplate, compensate, extirpate, confiscate, expurgate. Notwithstanding all authorities however, such is the tendency to consult ease and melody in utterance, that many respectable speakers lay the accent of these and similar words on the first syllable. The reason of this is obvious, although perhaps it never occurs to the speakers themselves. It is, that when the accent is laid on the second syllable, the two last syllables of the participles, alternating, demonstrating, compensated, &c. are either pronounced with difficulty, being wholly unaccented, or they are disgustingly feeble. How very difficult it is to utter distinctly the words alternating, demonstrating, &c. with the accent on the second syllable; the organs being compelled to change their position and form three, four, five, or six articulations in an instant, to utter the two last syllables! But place the primary accent on the first syllable, and a secondary one on the third, and the voice resting on these, the speaker is enabled to bound with ease from syllable to syllable and utter the whole word distinctly without effort, alternating, demonstrating.

In extirpate, compensate and confiscate, the accent on the second syllable leaves the last syllables of the participle most miserably weak. What a feeble line is this of Pope:

Each seeming ill compensated of course.

This evil is remedied by placing the primary accent on the first syllable, and a secondary one on the third; compensated; compensating; extirpating; extirpated; confiscating; confiscated; the full sound of a giving due strength to the last syllables.

It is further to be observed that there are some words which, in poetry and prose, must be differently accented, as the accent has been transferred by usage from one syllable to another within the two last centuries. Nares enumerates more than a hundred words, whose accent has been thus changed since the age of Shakspeare. Of this class of words are aspect, process, sojourn, convex, contest, retinue, converse, the noun horizon, which Milton accents on the second syllable, and acceptable, which he accents on the first, as he does attribute and contribute. But the accent of all these words has been changed; the seven first have the accent indisputably on the first syllable; the two last, on the second syllable; and although some difference of opinion may exist, as to the accentuation of horizon and acceptable, yet the common popular practice of accenting horizon on the first and acceptable on the second, is according to regular analogies and cannot well be altered. Nor ought it to be; the poetic accent, in both, is harsh and unnatural. This difference of accent is a slight inconvenience; but custom is the arbiter in language; and when well settled and general, there is no appeal from its decisions, the inconvenience admits of no remedy.

INTRODUCTION.

Of Johnson's Dictionary, and of the manner in which the following work is executed.

Dr. Johnson was one of the greatest men that the English nation has ever produced; and when the exhibition of truth depended on his own gigantic powers of intellect, he seldom erred. But in the compilation of his dictionary, he manifested a great defect of research, by means of which he often fell into mistakes; and no errors are so dangerous as those of great men. The authority created by the general excellence of their works gives a sanction to their very mistakes, and represses that spirit of inquiry which would investigate the truth, and subvert the errors of inferior men. It seems to be owing to this cause chiefly that the most obvious mistakes of Johnson's Dictionary have remained to this day uncorrected, and still continue to disfigure the improved editions of the work recently published.

In like manner, the opinions of this author, when wrong, have a weight of authority that renders them extremely mischievous. The sentiment contained in this single line is of this kind; that we are to make no corrections, because we cannot complete the reformation; a sentiment that sets itself in direct opposition to all improvement in science, literature and morals; a sentiment, which, if it had been always an efficacious principle of human conduct, would have condemned not only our language, but our manners and our knowledge to everlasting rudeness. And hence whenever a proposition is made to correct the orthography of our language, it is instantly repelled with the opinion and ipse dixit of Johnson. Thus while the nations on the European continent have purified their languages and reduced the orthography to a good degree of regularity, our enemies of reform contend most strenuously for retaining the anomalies of the language, even to the very rags and tatters of barbarism. But what is more extraordinary, the very persons who thus struggle against the smallest improvement of the orthography are the most ready to innovate in the pronunciation, and will, at any time, adopt a change that fashion may introduce, though it may infringe the regularity of the language, multiply anomalies, and increase the difficulty of learning it. Nay, they will not only innovate themselves, but will use their influence to propagate the change, by deriding those who resist it, and who strive to retain the resemblance between the written and spoken language.

A considerable part of Johnson's Dictionary is however well executed; and when his definitions are correct and his arrangement judicious, it seems to be expedient to follow him. It would be mere affectation or folly to alter what cannot be improved.

The principal faults in Johnson's Dictionary are

1. The want of a great number of well authorized words belonging to the language. This defect has been in part supplied by Mason and Todd; but their supplemental list is still imperfect even in common words, and still more defective from the omission of terms of science.

2. Another great fault, that remains uncorrected, is the manner of noting the accented syllable; the accent being laid uniformly on the vowel, whether it closes the syllable or not. Thus the accent is laid on e in te'nant as well as in te'acher, and the inquirer cannot know from the accent whether the vowel is long or short. It is surprising that such a notation should still be retained in that work.

3. It is considered as a material fault, that in some classes of words, Johnson's orthography is either not correct upon principle or not uniform in the class. Thus he writes heedlessly, with ss, but carelessly, with one s; defence, with c, but defensible, defensive, with s; rigour, inferiour, with u, but rigorous, inferiority, without it; publick, authentick with k, but publication, authenticate, without it; and so of many other words of the same classes.

4. The omission of the participles or most of them, is no small defect, as many of them by use have become proper adjectives, and require distinct definitions. The additions of this kind in this work are very numerous. It is also useful both to natives and foreigners, to be able, by opening a dictionary, to know when the final consonant of a verb is doubled in the participle.

5. The want of due discrimination in the definitions of words that are nearly synonymous, or sometimes really synonymous, at other times not, is a fault in all the dictionaries of our language, which I have seen. Permeate, says Johnson, signifies, to pass through, and permeable, such as may be passed through. But we pass through a door or gate; although we do not permeate it, or say that it is permeable. Obedience, says Johnson, is obsequiousness, but this is rarely the present sense of the word; so far from it that obedience is always honorable, and obsequiousness usually implies meanness. Peculation, says Johnson, is robbery of the public, theft of public money. But as robbery and theft are now understood, it is neither. Inaccuracies of this kind are very numerous.

6. There are in Johnson's Dictionary, some palpable mistakes in orthography, such as comptroller, bridegroom, redoubt, and some others, there being no such legitimate words in the language. In other instances, the author mistook the true origin of words, and has erred in the orthography, as in chymistry and diocess.

7. The mistakes in etymology are numerous; and the whole scheme of deducing words from their original is extremely imperfect.

8. The manner of defining words in Johnson, as in all other dictionaries, is susceptible of improvement. In a great part of the more important words, and particularly verbs, lexicographers, either from negligence or want of knowledge, have inverted the true order, or have disregarded all order in the definitions. There is a primary sense of every word, from which all the other have proceeded; and whenever this can be discovered, this sense should stand first in order. Thus the primary sense of make is to force or compel; but this in Johnson's Dictionary is the fifteenth definition; and this sense of facio in Ainsworth, the nineteenth.

9. One of the most objectionable parts of Johnson's Dictionary, in my opinion, is the great number of passages cited from authors, to exemplify his definitions. Most English words are so familiarly and perfectly understood, and the sense of them so little liable to be called in question, that they may be safely left to rest on the authority of the lexicographer, without examples. Who needs extracts from three authors, Knolles, Milton and Berkeley, to prove or illustrate the literal meaning of hand? Who needs extracts from Shakspeare, Bacon, South and Dryden, to prove hammer to be a legitimate English word, and to signify an instrument for driving nails? So under household, we find seven passages and nearly thirty lines employed to exemplify the plain interpretation, a family living together.

In most cases, one example is sufficient to illustrate the meaning of a word; and this is not absolutely necessary, except in cases where the signification is a deviation from the plain literal sense, a particular application of the term; or in a case, where the sense of the word may be doubtful, and of questionable authority. Numerous citations serve to swell the size of a Dictionary, without any adequate advantage. But this is not the only objection to Johnson's exemplifications. Many of the passages are taken from authors now little read, or not at all; whose style is now antiquated, and by no means furnishing proper models for students of the present age.

In the execution of this work, I have pursued a course somewhat different; not however without fortifying my own opinion with that of other gentlemen, in whose judgment I have confidence. In many cases, where the sense of a word is plain and indisputable, I have omitted to cite any authority. I have done the same in many instances, where the sense of a word is wholly obsolete, and the definition useful only to the antiquary. In some instances, definitions are given without authority, merely because I had neglected to note the author, or had lost the reference. In such cases, I must stand responsible for the correctness of the definition. In all such cases, however, I have endeavored to be faithful to the duty of a lexicographer; and if in any instance, a mistake has escaped me, I shall be happy to have it suggested, that it may be corrected.

In general, I have illustrated the significations of words, and proved them to be legitimate, by a short passage from some respectable author, often abridged from the whole passage cited by Johnson. In many cases, I have given brief sentences of my own; using the phrases or sentences in which the word most frequently occurs, and often presenting some important maxim or sentiment in religion, morality, law or civil policy. Under words which occur in the scriptures, I have often cited passages from our common version, not only to illustrate the scriptural or theological sense, but even the ordinary significations of the words. These passages are short, plain, appropriate, and familiar to most readers. In a few cases, where the sense of a word is disputed, I have departed from the general plan, and cited a number of authorities.

In the admission of words of recent origin, into a Dictionary, a lexicographer has to encounter many difficulties; as it is not easy, in all cases, to determine whether a word is so far authorized as to be considered legitimate. Some writers indulge a licentiousness in coining words, which good sense would wish to repress. At the same time, it would not be judicious to reject all new terms; as these are often necessary to express new ideas; and the progress of improvement in arts and science would be retarded, by denying a place in dictionaries, to terms given to things newly discovered. But the lexicographer is not answerable for the bad use of the privilege of coining new words. It seems to be his duty to insert and explain all words which are used by respectable writers or speakers, whether the words are destined to be received into general and permanent use or not. The future use must depend on public taste or the utility of the words; circumstances which are not within the lexicographer's control.

Lexicographers are sometimes censured for inserting in their vocabularies, vulgar words, and terms of art known only to particular artisans. That this practice may be carried too far, is admitted; but it is to be remarked that, in general, vulgar words are the oldest and best authorized words in language; and their use is as necessary to the classes of people who use them, as elegant words are to the statesman and the poet. It may be added that such words are often particularly useful to the lexicographer, in furnishing him with the primary sense, which is no where to be found, but in popular use. In this work, I have not gone quite so far as Johnson and Todd have done, in admitting vulgar words. Some of them are too low to deserve notice.

The catalogue of obsolete words in Johnson has been considerably augmented by Mason and Todd. I have, though somewhat reluctantly, inserted nearly the whole catalogue, which, I presume, amounts to seven or eight, and perhaps, to ten thousand words. Most of these may be useful to the antiquary; but to the great mass of readers, they are useless.*

INTRODUCTION.

I have also inserted many words which are local in England; being retained from the different languages that have been spoken in that country, but which are no more a part of our present language in the United States, than so many Lapland words. These however occur in books which treat of agriculture and the arts; books which are occasionally read in this country.

Law-terms, which are no part of the proper language of the U. States, and never can be, as the things they express do not exist in this country, are however retained, as it is necessary that the gentlemen of the bar should understand them; and it will be time to dismiss them from books, when they are obsolete in practice.

As to Americanisms, so called, I have not been able to find many words, in respectable use, which can be so denominated. These I have admitted and noted as peculiar to this country. I have fully ascertained that most of the new words charged to the coinage of this country, were first used in England.

In exhibiting the origin and affinities of English words, I have usually placed first in order the corresponding word, in the language from or through which we have received it; then the corresponding words in the languages of the same family or race; then the corresponding word in the languages of other families. Thus, for example, the word break we have from our Saxon ancestors; I therefore give the Saxon word first; then the same word in the other Teutonic and Gothic languages; then the Celtic words; then the Latin; and lastly the Hebrew, Chaldaic and Arabic. This order is not followed in every instance, even of vernacular words, but it is the more general course I have pursued. When there can be no rational doubt respecting the radical identity of words, I have inserted them without any expression of uncertainty. When there appears to be any reason to question that identity, I have mentioned the probability only of an affinity, or inserted a query, to invite further investigation. Yet I am aware that many things, which, in my view, are not doubtful, will appear so to persons not versed in this subject, and who do not at once see the chain of evidence which has led me to my inferences. For this there is no remedy but further investigation.

In regard to words, which have been introduced into the language in modern days, I have generally referred them to the language, from which the English immediately received them. A great part of these are from the Latin through the French; sometimes probably through the Italian or Spanish. In some instances however the order is reversed; indeed it cannot always be known from which language the words have been received, nor is it a matter of any consequence.

One circumstance however deserves to be particularly noticed; that when I refer a vernacular word to the corresponding word in one of the Shemitic languages, I would not have it understood that the English word was derived or borrowed from that oriental word. For example, I have given the Shemitic brk as the verb corresponding with the English break, that is, the same word in those languages; not intending by this that our ancestors borrowed or received that word from the Chaldeans, Hebrews or other Shemitic nation. This is not the fact. It would be just as correct for the compiler of a Chaldee or Hebrew lexicon to derive brk from the English break or German brechen. So when I deduce coin, through the French, Spanish or Italian, from the Arabic قان, I do not consider the word as borrowed from the Arabic but as proceeding from a common radix. With regard to vernacular words, in any European language, such deduction is always incorrect. Yet errors of this kind abound in every book I have seen, which treats of this subject. The truth is, all vernacular words in the languages of Europe, are as old as the same words in Asia; and when the same words are found in the Shemitic and Japhetic languages, it is almost demonstrably certain that these words were in use before the dispersion; the nations of both families have them from the common stock, and the words, like the families of men, which use them, are to be considered as of the same antiquity.

When therefore I state the words of another language as corresponding with vernacular words in the English, they are offered as affinities, or the same word, varied dialectically perhaps, in orthography or signification, but words from the same root as the English. Thus under the word bright, I state the Saxon word, and then the corresponding word in the Ethiopic, the participle of a verb; not that our ancestors borrowed the word from the Ethiopians, but that the verb, from which bright was derived, though lost in the Saxon, is still retained in the Ethiopic. This fact proves that the ancestors of the Saxons once used the verb, but suffered it to go into disuse, substituting shine, scinan, in its place.

It is much to be regretted that British authors and travelers admit into their writings foreign words without conforming them, in orthography, to regular English analogies. It is owing to this disregard of the purity and regular form of orthography in English, that we are perplexed with such words as burlesque, soup, group, tour, corps, depot, suite, pacha, ennui, and many others. In this respect, modern writers manifest less taste than the writers of former centuries, who, when they borrowed foreign words, wrote them in conformity to English analogies. This practice of blending with the English many words of an orthography, which in our language is anomalous, is very embarrassing to readers who know only their vernacular tongue, and often introduces an odious difference between the pronunciation of different classes of people: an evil more sensibly felt in this country, than in Great Britain, where differences of rank exist: in short, it multiplies the irregularities of a language, already so deformed by them as to render it nearly impracticable for our own citizens ever to overcome the difficulties of its orthography; irregularities which foreigners deem a reproach to the taste of a literary nation.

Where is the good sense which should dictate a manly firmness in preserving the regular analogies and purity of the language? Where is there a due attachment to UNIFORMITY which constitutes the principal beauty and excellence of a language, and beyond all other means facilitates its acquisition? I would not refuse to admit foreign words into the language, if necessary or useful; but I would treat them as our laws treat aliens; I would compel them to submit to the formalities of naturalization, before they should be admitted to the rights of citizenship; I would convert them into English words, or reject them. Nor would I permit the same word to be written and pronounced in two different ways, one English, the other French. The French suite in English is suit, whether it signifies a set of clothes, or of apartments, or of armor, or of attendants.

In the orthography of certain classes of words, I have aimed at uniformity; but I have not proceeded so far in this desirable reformation of the common spelling, as my own wishes, and strict propriety might dictate. Thus if ricious, from the Latin vitium, is written with c, the verb vitiate should regularly be written with the same letter, and we have precedents in the words appreciate and depreciate, from the Latin pretium. In like manner, expatiate should be conformed to the orthography of spacious; exceed, proceed, and succeed, should follow the analogy of concede, intercede, and recede. These are points of minor importance, but far from being unimportant.

In writing the termination of such verbs as civilize, legalize, modernize, there is a diversity which may be corrected without inconvenience. We indeed have some of the verbs of this class from the French in which language iser is the termination; but most of them we have borrowed directly from the Latin or Greek, or perhaps from the Spanish or Italian, or they are of our own coinage. As the termination ize is conformable to the Greek original, and as it expresses the true pronunciation in English, it seems expedient to reduce the whole class to a uniformity of orthography.

Enterprise, devise, comprise, revise, compromise, and surprise, belong to a different class and retain the orthography of their originals.

There is a fact respecting the pronunciation of gn, in cognizance, and recognizance, which seems to have escaped observation; this is, that g was introduced to express a nasal sound, as in the French gn, or Spanish ñ, but not for the purpose of being pronounced as g. It is probable that the Latins changed con before nosco into cog for this reason; and it may be inferred from the modern pronunciation of these words, that the Greeks omitted or softened the sound of γ in γνωσκω and γνωμαι. However this may be, the old pronunciation of the words was undoubtedly conusance, or conizance, reconizance, and hence in the old writers on law, the letter g was omitted. Indeed there is a harshness in the pronunciation of g in these words, that offends the organs both of the speaker and hearer, and which well justifies the pronunciation of the old lawyers; a pronunciation which we frequently hear, at this day, among gentlemen of the bar.

Whether the Latins pronounced the letter g in such words as benignus, condignus, malignus, it is of no moment for us to determine. In our mode of writing benign, condign, malign, the sound of g must be dropped; but it is resumed in the derivatives benignity, condignity, malignity: so in design, designate; resign, resignation.*

In noting the obsolete words which amount to some thousands, I may have committed mistakes; for words obsolete in one part of the British dominions, or in some part of the United States, may be words in common use, in some other part of such dominions, not within my knowledge. The rule I have generally observed has been to note as obsolete such words as I have not heard in colloquial practice, and which I have not found in any writer of the last century. The notation of such words as are disused may be of use to our own youth, and still more to foreigners, who learn our language.

Under the head of etymology, in hooks, the reader will observe references to another work, for a more full explanation or view of the affinities of the words under which these references occur. These are references to a Synopsis of the principal uncompound words in twenty languages; a work that is not published, and it is uncertain whether it will ever be published. But if it should be, these references will be useful to the philologist, and I thought it expedient to insert them.

* There is, among some poets of the present day, an affectation of reviving the use of obsolete words. Some of these may perhaps be revived to advantage; but when this practice proceeds so far as to make a glossary necessary to the understanding of a poem, it seems to be a violation of good taste. How different is the simple elegance of Dryden, Pope, Gray, Goldsmith and Cowper!

* The Spanish puño is the Latin pugnus; and our word pawn, the D. pand, is the Latin pignus. So we pronounce impune, for impugn, French impugner, from the Latin pugno, pugna. How far these facts tend to show the Latin pronunciation, let the reader judge.

A

PHILOSOPHICAL AND PRACTICAL GRAMMAR

OF THE

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

ADVERTISEMENT.

IN the year 1803, I received a Letter from Lindley Murray, with a copy of his Grammar. The following is a copy of the Letter.

"I take the liberty of requesting that the author of 'Dissertations on the English Language,' will do me the favor to accept a copy of the new edition of my grammar, as a small testimony of my respect for his talents and character. At the same time, I hope he will permit me to thank him for the pleasure and improvement, which I have derived from perusing his ingenious and sensible writings.

"If, on looking over the Grammar, any thing should occur to him, by which he thinks the work may be further improved, I will take the communication of it, as a particular favor; and will give it an attentive and respectful consideration. Should he prepare any remarks, he will be so good as to send his letter to my brother John Murray, jun., Pearl Street, New York, who will carefully forward them to me. I am very respectfully, &c.

LINDLEY MURRAY."

Holdgate, near York, 1803."

Twenty years before the date of this letter, I had prepared and published a Grammar, on the model of Lowth's, with some variations, and on the same principles, as Murray has constructed his. This work passed through many editions, before Murray's book appeared in this country. But before this period, my researches into the structure of language had convinced me that some of Lowth's principles are erroneous, and that my own Grammar wanted material corrections. In consequence of this conviction, believing it to be immoral to publish what appeared to be false rules and principles, I determined to suppress my Grammar, and actually did so; although the public continued to call for it, and my bookseller urged for permission to continue the publication of it. As I had the same objections to Murray's Grammar, as I had to my own, I determined on the publication of a new work, which was executed in 1807; and with a view to answer Lindley Murray's request, but in a different manner, I sent him a polite letter, with a copy of my Grammar. I have understood from his friends in New York, that these never reached him; but he received a copy of my Grammar from his friends, and soon afterward prepared for publication a new edition of his own Grammar, in the octavo form. In the preface to this edition, dated in 1808, he informs his readers, that, "in preparing for the octavo edition, the author examined the most respectable publications on the subject of grammar, that had recently appeared; and he has, in consequence, been the better enabled to extend and improve his work." On carefully comparing this work with my own Grammar, I found most of his improvements were selected from my book.

In the first edition of this work, the compiler gave me credit for one passage only, (being nearly three pages of my Grammar,) which he acknowledged to be chiefly taken from my work. In the later editions, he says, this is in part taken from my book, and he further acknowledges that a few positions and illustrations, among the syntactical notes and observations, were selected from my Grammar. Now the fact is, the passages borrowed amount to thirty or more, and they are so incorporated into his work, that no person except myself would detect the plagiarisms, without a particular view to this object. It may be further observed that these passages are original remarks, some of them illustrating principles overlooked by all British writers on the subject.

This octavo edition of Murray's Grammar, has been repeatedly published in this country, and constantly used in our higher seminaries of learning; while the student probably has no suspicion that he is learning my principles in Murray's Grammar.

For the injustice done to me, by this publication, in violation of the spirit, if not of the letter of the law, for securing to authors the copy-right of their works, I have sought no redress; but while I submit to the injury, it seems to be my duty to bear testimony against this species of immorality. A man's reputation, and character, and writings, are as much his property, as his land, and it is to be hoped that correct morality will, in due time, place the protection of the former on as high ground as that of the latter.

Being perfectly satisfied that some principles of Lowth's Grammar, which constitutes the body of Murray's, are entirely erroneous, I have prefixed a brief Grammar to this Dictionary; which is committed to my fellow citizens, as the mature result of all my investigations. It is the last effort I shall make to arrest the progress of error, on this subject. It needs the club of Hercules, wielded by the arm of a giant, to destroy the hydra of educational prejudice. The club and the arm, I pretend not to possess, and my efforts may be fruitless; but it will ever be a satisfaction to reflect that I have discharged a duty demanded by a deep sense of the importance of truth. It is not possible for me to think with indifference, that half a million of youth in our schools are daily toiling to learn that which is not true. It has been justly observed that ignorance is preferable to error.

Some of the more prominent errors of the English Grammars, are,

1. The admission of the article, as a distinct part of speech, and an entire mistake respecting what is called the indefinite article. The word article signifies, if any thing, a joint; but there is no class of words, unless it may be the conjunctions, which can, with a shadow of propriety, be brought under that denomination. The words called articles, are, in all languages, adjectives; words limiting or in some way qualifying the sense of names or nouns. In most languages, they are varied like the nouns which they qualify, and attached to them like other adjectives.

2. The arrangement of words in a class to which they do not belong. Thus, that is called sometimes a pronoun, and sometimes a conjunction, when in fact it is always a pronoun or substitute, and never a conjunction. So also if, though, unless, notwithstanding, are called conjunctions; which is a most palpable mistake. Notwithstanding, is placed by Murray among the conjunctions. But after he procured my Grammar, he inserted, under his twenty-first rule of Syntax, the following remark. "It is very frequent, when the word notwithstanding agrees with a number of words, or with an entire clause, to omit the whole, except this word; and in this use of notwithstanding, we have a striking proof of the value of abbreviations in language," &c. The whole passage, taken from my Grammar, and the two subsequent passages, are too long to be here recited. The remark to be made here is, that the author, by attempting to patch a defective system, falls into the absurdity of making notwithstanding a conjunction, in one part of his book, and in another, he makes it a word agreeing with a number of words, or with an entire clause!

3. There is no correct and complete exhibition of the English verb in any British Grammar which I have seen. The definite tenses, which are as important as the indefinite, are wholly wanting; and the second future in Murray is imperfect. It seems that he had in his first editions inserted this form, thou shalt, or ye shall have loved, but in his octavo edition, he informs us that shall in the second and third persons is incorrectly applied. To prove this, he gives the following examples. "Thou shalt have served thy apprenticeship, before the end of the year." "He shall have completed his business, when the messenger arrives." Very true; but the author forgot that by placing when or after, as an introduction to the sentence, the use of shall is not only correct, but in many cases, necessary. When thou shalt or you shall have served an apprenticeship, after he shall have completed his business, are perfectly correct expressions. But in consequence of this oversight, Murray's second future is defective throughout the whole paradigm.

4. The Syntax of every British Grammar that I have seen, is extremely imperfect. There are many English phrases which are perfectly well established and correct, which are not brought within the rules ; and of course they cannot be parsed or resolved by the student.

5. There are several false rules of construction which mislead the learner ; rules which are in direct opposition to the practice of the best writers.

6. There are some phrases or modes of expression, frequently used by authors, which are not good English, and which it is the business of the Grammarian to correct, but which are not noticed in any British Grammar. Some of these have been considered in the preceding Introduction.

There is a great difficulty in devising a correct classification of the several sorts of words ; and probably no classification that shall be simple and at the same time philosophically correct, can be invented. There are some words that do not strictly fall under the description of any class yet devised. Many attempts have been made and are still making to remedy this evil ; but such schemes as I have seen, do not, in my apprehension, correct the defects of the old schemes, nor simplify the subject. On the other hand, all that I have seen, serve only to obscure and embarrass the subject, by substituting new arrangements and new terms, which are as incorrect as the old ones, and less intelligible.

On the subject of the tenses of the verbs, for example, we may attempt philosophical accuracy, and say that there are, and there can be three tenses only, to express the natural division of time into past, present, and future. But a language which should have words to express these three divisions only, would be miserably imperfect. We want to express not only the past, the present, and the future, with respect to ourselves or the time of speaking and writing, but the past with respect to other times or events. When we say, the mail will have arrived before sun-set, we express not only a future event, at the time of speaking, but an event to be past before another event, the setting of the sun. Hence I have given to that form of words, the denomination of the prior-future. So of the past time. He had delivered the letter, before I arrived, denotes an event not only past, as to the time of speaking, but past before another event, my arrival. This tense I call the prior-past. These denominations, like the terms of the new chemistry, define themselves. The old names of the latter tense, pluperfect or preterpluperfect, more than finished or past, or beyond more than finished or past, I have discarded. These small alterations of the old system will, I hope, be well received.

If it should be said, that our verbs have not tenses, because they have not variations of termination to express them ; I would reply, that this may be considered as a mistake, proceeding from an early bias, impressed upon us by the Greek and Latin forms of the tenses. A tense is a term intended to denote a form of verbs used for expressing time or some division of it, and it is just as properly applied to a combination of words for that purpose, as to a modification of the simple verb. The use of it is entirely arbitrary. Locutus sum are not the less a tense, because two words are employed. It is the time and not the form of words used to express it, which stamps propriety on the denomination.

If we attempt to dispense with some of the English tenses, by analyzing them, and resolving them into their primary elements, that is, parsing the words composing them, each distinctly, we shall meet with insuperable difficulties. Let a man attempt to make out the sense of this phrase, he had been writing, by analysing it. Had alone denotes held, possessed, as in the phrase, "he had an estate in New York." Then in the phrase above, it will signify, he held or possessed been writing.

It is alledged that the auxiliary verbs are not secondary, but the most important verbs in the language. The point of importance must be determined by this fact, that by themselves they do not make complete sense ; they leave the sense or affirmation imperfect. He may, he can, he will, he shall, are incomplete sentences, without another verb expressed or understood. They express nothing definite which is intended to be affirmed. When I ask, whether you can lend me a sum of money, and you reply, I can, the verb lend is understood. Not so with the verbs considered as principal. When I say, I write, I walk, the sense or affirmation is complete without the use of another verb. Hence it is with perfect propriety, that such verbs as can be used only in connection with others, should be considered as of a secondary character, and being used to aid in forming the tenses, they may very justly be denominated auxiliars or auxiliaries.

Some of our verbs are used either as principal or as auxiliary, as have and will ; and will takes a different and regular form when principal ; I will, thou wilt, he willeth or wills an estate or a legacy ; but when auxiliary, thou wilt, he will bequeath his estate.

ADVERTISEMENT.

Will, indeed, in its primary use, expresses volition, as when we say, "I will walk or ride ; but as an auxiliary, it often loses this signification. When it is said, "it will rain to-morrow," what relation has will to volition ?

To show the utter futility of attempting to explain phrases by the primary signification of the auxiliaries, take the following example. May and might express power, liberty or possibility ; have and had express holding or possession. On this plan of explanation, resolve the following sentence. "He might have had more prudence than to engage in speculation ;" that is, he was able, or had power, to hold or possess, held or possessed more prudence than to engage in speculation.

So the following. "It may have rained on the land." That is, it has power or is possible, to hold or possess, rained on the land.

All attempts to simplify our forms of the tenses by such resolution, must not only fail, but prove to be perfectly ridiculous. It is the combination of words only that admits of definition ; and these must be exhibited as tenses ; forms of expression presenting to the hearer or reader the precise time of action. This is necessary for our own citizens ; but for foreigners, indispensable, as they want to know the tenses in English which correspond with the tenses in their own languages.

Nor shall we succeed much better in attempting to detect the primary elements of the terminations which form the variations of the simple verb. We may conjecture any thing ; we may suppose loved to be a contraction of love-did ; but in opposition to this, we find in our mother tongue, this termination ed, was od, or ode. Ic lufode, I loved ; we lufodon, we loved. Besides, if I mistake not, this termination is the same as that in the early Roman laws, in which esto was written estod ; and I believe we have no evidence that do and did ever belonged to the Latin language. But what settles this question, is, that did itself is formed of do and this same termination, do-ed. Here the question may rest.

We may conjecture that the personal terminations of the verbs were originally pronouns, and this conjecture is certainly better founded than many others ; but we find in our mother tongue, the verb love, in the plural number, is written, we lufiath, ge lufiath, thi lufiath, all the persons having the same termination ; but certainly the same word was never used to express we, you or ye, and they.

I have attentively viewed these subjects, in all the lights which my opportunities have afforded, and I am convinced that the distribution of words, most generally received, is the best that can be formed, with some slight alterations adapted to the particular construction of the English language. Our language is rich in tenses, beyond any language in Europe ; and I have endeavored to exhibit all the combinations of words forming them, in such a manner that students, natives or foreigners, may readily understand them.

I close with this single remark, that from all the observations I have been able to make, I am convinced the dictionaries and grammars which have been used in our seminaries of learning, for the last forty or fifty years, are so incorrect and imperfect, that they have introduced or sanctioned more errors than they have amended ; in other words, had the people of England and of these States been left to learn the pronunciation and construction of their vernacular language solely by tradition, and the reading of good authors, the language would have been spoken and written with more purity than it has been and now is, by those who have learned to adjust their language by the rules which dictionaries and grammars prescribe.

PHILOSOPHICAL AND PRACTICAL GRAMMAR, &c.

THE Grammar of a language is a collection of principles and rules, taken from the established usages of the nation using that language; in other words, an exhibition of the genuine structure of the language. These principles and rules are derived from the natural distinctions of words, or they are arbitrary, and depend for their authority wholly on custom.

A rule is an established form of construction in a particular class of words. Thus it is a rule in English that the plural number of nouns is formed by adding s or es to the singular, as hand, hands, cage, cages, fish, fishes.

An exception to a rule is, the deviation of a word from the common construction. Thus the regular plural of man would be mans; but the actual plural is men. This word then is an exception to the general rule of forming plural nouns.

Grammar is usually divided into four parts—orthography, etymology, syntax, and prosody.

Orthography treats of the letters of a language, their sounds and use, whether simple or in combination; and teaches the true mode of writing words, according to established usage.

Etymology treats of the derivation of words from their radicals or primitives, and of their various inflections and modifications to express person, number, case, sex, time and mode.

Syntax is a system of rules for constructing sentences.

Prosody treats of the quantity or rather of the accent of syllables, of poetic feet, and the laws of versification.

The elements of language are articulate sounds. These are represented on paper by letters or characters, which are the elements of written language.

A syllable is a simple sound, or a combination or succession of sounds uttered at one breath or impulse of the voice.

A word consists of one syllable or of a combination of syllables.

A sentence consists of a number of words, at the pleasure of the speaker or writer; but forming complete sense.

ENGLISH ALPHABET.

The English Alphabet consists of twenty six letters or characters, viz.: A a—B b—C c—D d—E e—F f—G g—H h—I i—J j—K k—L l—M m—N n—O o—P p—Q q—R r—S s—T t—U u—V v—W w—X x—Y y—Z z.

Of these, three, a, e, and o, are always vowels; i and u are either vowels or diphthongs; and y is a vowel, diphthong, or consonant. To these may be added w, which is actually a vowel. H is an aspirate or mark of breathing, and the rest are consonants, or articulations.

A vowel is a simple sound formed by opening the mouth, in a particular manner. This may be known by the power we have of prolonging the sound, without changing the position of the organs, as in uttering a, e, and o. When the position of the organs is necessarily varied, during the utterance, the sound is not simple, but diphthongal; as in uttering i and u.

The vowel characters in English have each several different sounds.

1. A has four sounds; First or long, as in fate, ale.
 2. Short, as in at, bat, ban. This is nearly the fourth sound shortened.
 3. Broad, as in all, fall, and shortened, as in what.
 4. Italian, as in father, calm, ask.
- E* has two sounds; First or long, as in mete, me, meter.
2. Short, as in met, bet, pen. This is nearly the first sound of a shortened.
- E* has also the sound of a long, as in prey, vein; but this is an anomaly.
- I* has two sounds; First or long, and diphthongal, as in fine, wine, mind.
2. Short, as in pit, ability. This is the short sound of e long.
- O* has three sounds; First or long, as in note, roll.
2. Short, as in not, nominal. This is the short sound of broad aw, as in what, warrant.
 3. The sound of oo, or French ou, as in move, tomb, lose.

U has three sounds; First or long, as in cube, rude, enumerate; a diphthongal sound.

2. Short, as in cub, but, number.
 3. The Italian u, as in bush, bullet; the short sound of oo.
- Y* has two sounds; the first and long is the same as that of i long, as in defy, rely, try, chyle.
2. Short, as in sympptom, pity; the same as the short sound of i.

VOL. I.

H.

At the beginning of words, y may be considered a consonant, as in year.

W is properly a vowel, having the same sound as oo, in wool, the French ou, the Italian, German, and Spanish u. It is the same in English as in the Welsh. Thus dwell is pronounced doell. When initial, it has been considered to be a consonant, as in well, will, ocell, ooill; but although the position of the organs in uttering this letter at the beginning of words may be a little closer, it can hardly be called an articulation. In this combination, the two vowels are rather diphthongal.

Consonants or articulations are characters that represent the junctions, jointings, or closings of the organs, which precede or follow the vocal sounds. Some of them are close articulations, which wholly intercept the voice. Such are k, p, and t, as in the syllables ek, ep, et. These are usually called mutes, or pure mutes. Others admit a short prolongation of sound, as b, d, and g, in the syllables eb, ed, eg. These are called impure mutes.

Others are imperfect articulations, not entirely interrupting the voice, but admitting a kind of hum, a hiss, or a breathing; and for this reason, they are sometimes called semi-vowels. Such are f, l, m, n, r, s, v, and z, as in the syllables ef, el, em, en, er, es, ev, ez.

J and the soft g represent a compound sound, or rather a union of sounds, which may be expressed by edge, or dje, as in join, general.

X represents the sounds of ks, or gz.

Th have an aspirated sound, as in thing, wreath; or a vocal sound, as in thus, thou, breathe.

Sh may be considered as representing a simple sound, as in esh, she, shall. This sound, rendered vocal, becomes exh, for which we have no character. It is heard in fusion, pronounced fushun.

The letters ng in combination have two sounds; one as in sing, singer; the other as in finger, longer. The latter requires a closer articulation of the palatal organs, than the former; but the distinction can be communicated only by the ear. The orthoepists attempt to express it by writing g after the ng, as finger. But the peculiar sound of ng is expressed, if expressed at all, solely by the first syllable, as will be obvious to any person, who will write sing-ger for singer; for let sing in this word be pronounced as it is by itself, sing, and the additional letter makes no difference, unless the speaker pauses at sing, and pronounces ger by itself.

The articulations in English may all be thus expressed: eb, ed, ef, eg, ek, el, em, en, ep, er, es, et, ev, ez, eth, aspirate and vocal, esh, exh, ing.

These articulations may be named from the organs whose junctions they represent—Thus Labials, or letters of the lips, eb, ef, ev, ep, em.

Dentals, ed, et, eth, es, esh, ez, exh, en.

Palatals, eg, ek, el, er.

Nasals, em, en, ing.

The letters s and z, are also called sibilants, or hissing letters—to which may be added, esh, and exh.

Q is precisely equivalent to k; but it differs from it in being always followed by u. It is a useless letter; for quest might as well be written kwest or kwest, in the Dutch manner.

A diphthong is a union of two vowels or simple sounds uttered so rapidly and closely, as to form one syllable only, or what is considered as one syllable; as oi and oy in voice and joy, ou in sound, and ow in vow.

A triphthong is a union of three vowels in one syllable; as in adieu.

There are many combinations of vowels in English words, in which one vowel only is sounded: as ai, ea, ie, ei, oa, ui, ay, ey, &c. These may be called digraphs. They can be reduced to no rule of pronunciation.

The combinations au and aw have generally the sound of the broad a, as in fraud, and law. The combination ew has the sound of u long, as in pcw, new, crew; and sometimes at the beginning of words the sound of yu, as in eucharist, euphony.

The letters cl, kl, at the beginning of a word, are pronounced as tl, as in clear. Gl at the beginning of words are pronounced as dl, as in glory.

DIVISION OF SYLLABLES.

The first and principal rule in dividing syllables, is not to separate letters that belong to the same syllable, except in cases of anomalous pronunciation.

GRAMMAR OF THE

The best division of syllables is that which leads the learner most easily to a just pronunciation. Thus, hab-it, ham-let, bat-ter, ho-ly, lo-cal, en-gage, an-i-mal, al-i-ment, pol-i-cy, eb-o-ny, des-ig-nate, lam-ent-a-ble, pref-er-a-ble.

An exception to this rule occurs in such words as vicious, ambition, in which the ci and ti are pronounced like sh. In this case, it seems preferable to divide the words thus, vi-cious, am-bi-tion.

In dividing the syllables of derivative words it seems advisable to keep the original entire, unless when this division may lead to a wrong pronunciation. Thus act-or, help-er, op-press-or, may be considered as a better division than ac-tor, hel-per, op-pres-sor. But it may be eligible in many cases, to deviate from this rule. Thus op-pres-sion seems to be more convenient both for children in learning and for printers, than op-press-ion.

RULES FOR SPELLING.

1. Verbs of one syllable, ending with a single consonant preceded by a short vowel, and verbs of more syllables than one, ending with an accented consonant preceded by a short vowel, double the final consonant in the participle, and when any syllable is added beginning with a vowel. Thus,

Abet,	Sin,	Permit,
Abetted,	Sinned,	Permitted,
Abetting,	Sinning,	Permitting,
Abettor.	Sinner.	Permitter.

2. When the final consonant is preceded by a long vowel, the consonant is usually not doubled. Thus,

Seal,	Repeal,	Defeat,
Sealed,	Repealed,	Defeated,
Sealing,	Repealing,	Defeating,
Sealer.	Repeater.	Defeater.

3. When the accent falls on any syllable except the last, the final consonant of the verb is not to be doubled in the derivatives. Thus,

Bias,	Quarrel,	Worship,	Equal,
Biased,	Quarreled,	Worshipped,	Equaled,
Biasing,	Quarreling,	Worshipping,	Equaling,
Biased.	Quarreler.	Worshiper.	Equaler.

The same rule is generally to be observed in nouns, as in jeweler, from jewel.

These are general rules; though possibly special reasons may, in some instances, justify exceptions.

CLASSIFICATION OF WORDS.

Words are classified according to their uses. Writers on grammar are not perfectly agreed in the distribution of words into classes. But I shall, with one exception, follow the common distribution. Words then may be distributed into eight classes or parts of speech. 1. The name or noun. 2. The pronoun or substitute. 3. The adjective, attribute or attributive. 4. The verb. 5. The adverb. 6. The preposition. 7. The connective or conjunction. 8. The exclamation or interjection.

The participle is sometimes treated as a distinct part of speech; it is a derivative from the verb, and partakes of its nature, expressing motion or action. But it sometimes loses its verbal character, and becomes a mere adjective, expressing quality or habit, rather than action.

Names or Nouns.

A name or noun is that by which a thing is called; and it expresses the idea of that which exists, material or immaterial. Of material substances, as man, horse, tree, table—of immaterial things, as faith, hope, love. These and similar words are, by customary use, made the names of things which exist, or the symbols of ideas, which they express without the help of any other word.

Division of Names.

NAMES are of two kinds; common, or those which represent the idea of a whole kind or species; and proper or appropriate, which denote individuals. Thus animal is a name common to all beings, having organized bodies and endowed with life, digestion, and spontaneous motion. Plant and vegetable are names of all beings which have organized bodies and life, without the power of spontaneous motion. Fowl is the common name of all feathered animals which fly—fish, of animals which live wholly in water.

On the other hand, Thomas, John, William, are proper or appropriate names, each denoting an individual of which there is no species or kind. London, Paris, Amsterdam, Rhine, Po, Danube, Massachusetts, Hudson, Potomac, are also proper names, being appropriate to individual things.

Proper names however become common when they comprehend two or more individuals; as, the Capets, the Smiths, the Fletchers.

"Two Roberts there the pagan force defy'd." Hoole's Tasso, b. 20.

Limitation of Names.

PROPER names are sufficiently definite without the aid of another word to limit their meaning, as Boston, Baltimore, Savannah. Yet when certain individuals have a common character, or predominant qualities which create a similitude between them, this common character becomes in the mind a species, and the proper name of an individual possessing this character, admits of the definitives and of plural number, like a common name. Thus a conspirator is called a Cataline; and numbers of them Catalines or the Catalines of their country. A distinguished general is called a Cesar—an eminent orator the Cicero of his age.

But names, which are common to a whole kind or species, require often to be limited to an individual or a certain number of individuals of the kind or species. For this purpose the English language is furnished with a number of words, as an, or a, the, this, that, these, those, and a few others, which define the extent of the signification of common names, or point to the particular things mentioned. These are all adjectives or attributes, having a dependence on some noun expressed or implied.

RULE I.—A noun or name, without a preceding definitive, is used either in an unlimited sense, extending to the whole species, or in an indefinite sense, denoting a number or quantity, but not the whole.

"The proper study of mankind is man."

Pope.

Here man comprehends the whole species.

"In the first place, woman has, in general, much stronger propensity than man to the perfect discharge of parental duties."

Life of Cowper.

Here woman and man comprehend each the whole species of its sex.

NOTE.—The rule laid down by Lowth, and transcribed implicitly by his followers, is general. "A substantive without any article to limit it, is taken in its widest sense; thus man means all mankind." The examples already given prove the inaccuracy of the rule. But let it be tried by other examples.

"There are fishes that have wings, and are not strangers to the airy regions."—Locke, b. 3. ch. 6. 12. If the rule is just, that fishes is to be taken in its widest sense," then all fishes have wings!

RULE II.—The definitive an or a, being merely one, in its English orthography, and precisely synonymous with it, limits a common name to an individual of the species. Its sole use is to express unity, and with respect to number, it is the most definite word imaginable; as an ounce, a church, a ship, that is, one ship, one church. It is used before a name which is indefinite, or applicable to any one of a species; as "He bore him in the thickest troop,"

Shakspeare.

Here a limits the sense of the word lion, and that of herd to one—but does not specify the particular one—"As any lion does or would do in any herd."

This definitive is used also before names which are definite and as specific as possible: as, "Solomon built a temple." "The Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden." London is a great commercial city. A decisive battle was fought at Marengo. The English obtained a signal naval victory at the mouth of the Nile.

NOTE.—When the sense of words is sufficiently certain, by the construction, the definitive may be omitted; as, "Duty to your majesty, and regard for the preservation of ourselves and our posterity, require us to entreat your royal attention."

It is also omitted before names whose signification is general, and requires no limitation—as "wisdom is justified of her children"—"anger resteth in the bosom of fools."

The definitive a is used before plural names preceded by few or many—as a few days, a great many persons. It is also used before any collective word, as a dozen, a hundred, even when such words are attached to plural nouns; as a hundred years.

It is remarkable that a never precedes many without the intervention of great between them—but follows many, standing between this word and a name—and what is equally singular, many, the very essence of which is to mark plurality, will, with a intervening, agree with a name in the singular number; as

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene."

Gray.

"Where many a rose bud rears its blushing head."

Beattie.

RULE III.—The definitive the is employed before names, to limit their signification to one or more specific things of the kind, discriminated from others of the same kind. Hence the person or thing is understood by the reader or hearer, as the twelve Apostles, the laws of morality, the rules of good breeding.

This definitive is also used with names of things which exist alone, or which we consider as single, as the Jews, the Sun, the Globe, the Ocean; and also before words when used by way of distinction, as the Church, the Temple.

RULE IV.—The is used rhetorically before a name in the singular number, to denote the whole species, or an indefinite number; as, "the fig-tree putteth forth her green figs."

Sol. Song.

"The almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden."

"Or ever the silver cord shall be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken," &c.

Ecclesiastes.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

"The Christian, who, with pious horror, avoided the abominations of the circus or the theater, found himself encompassed with infernal snares," &c. Gib. Rom. Emp. ch. 15.

"The heart likes naturally to be moved and affected." Campbell's Rhet. ch. 2.

NOTE 1.—This definitive is also used before names employed figuratively in a general sense; as,

"His mates their safety to the waves consign." Lusiad, 2.

Here waves cannot be understood of any particular waves; but the word is a metaphor for a particular thing, the ocean.

NOTE 2.—The definitive the is used before an attribute, which is selected from others belonging to the same object; as, "The very frame of spirit proper for being diverted with the laughable in objects, is so different from that which is necessary for philosophizing on them." Campbell's Rhet. 1. 2.

Number.

As men have occasion to speak of a single object, or of two or more individuals of the same kind, it has been found necessary to vary the noun or name, and usually the termination, to distinguish plurality from unity. The different forms of words to express one or more are called in Grammar, numbers; of which there are in English, two, the singular and the plural. The singular denotes an individual, or a collection of individuals united in a body; as, a man, a ship, an office, a company, a society, a dozen. The plural denotes two or more individuals, not considered as a collective body; as, men, ships, offices, companies, societies. The plural number is formed by the addition of s or es to the singular.

RULE 1. When the terminating letter of a noun will admit the sound of s to coalesce with the name or the last syllable of it, s only is added to form the plural; as sea, seas; hand, hands; pen, pens; grape, grapes; vale, vales; vow, vows.

2. When the letter s does not combine in sound with the word or last syllable of it, the addition of s increases the number of syllables; as, house, houses; grace, graces; page, pages; rose, roses; voice, voices; maze, mazes.

3. When the name ends in x, ss, sh, or ch with its English sound, the plural is formed by adding es to the singular; for a single s after those letters cannot be pronounced; as, fox, foxes; glass, glasses; brush, brushes; church, churches. But after ch with its Greek sound, like k, the plural is formed by s only; as monarch, monarchs.

4. When a name ends with y after a consonant, the plural is formed by dropping y and adding ies; as vanity, vanities. Alkali has a regular plural, alkalies.

But after ay, ey, and oy, s only is added; as, delay, delays; valley, valleys; joy, joys; money, moneys.

NOTE.—A few English nouns deviate from the foregoing rules in the formation of the plural number:—

CLASS 1.—In some names, f in the singular, is for the convenience of utterance, changed into v, as,

life,	lives.	self,	selves.	sheaf,	sheaves.
knife,	knives.	half,	halves.	shelf,	shelves.
wife,	wives.	beef,	beeves.	wolf,	wolves.
leaf,	leaves.	staff,	staves.	wharf,	wharves.
calf,	calves.	loaf,	loaves.	thief,	thieves.

CLASS 2.—The second class consists of words which are used in both numbers, with plurals irregularly formed; as, child,	children.	hypothesis,	hypotheses.

foot,	feet.	brother,	brothers or brethren.
tooth,	teeth.	penny,	pennies or pence.
man,	men.	die,	dies or dice.
woman,	women.	pea,	peas or pease.
ox,	oxen.	criterion,	criteria or criteria.
louse,	lice.	focus,	focuses or foci.
goose,	geese.	radius,	radiuses or radii.
beau,	beaux.	index,	indexes or indices.
thesis,	theses.	calx,	calxes or calces.
emphasis,	emphases.	phenomenon,	phenomena.
antithesis,	antitheses.

Pennies is used for real coins; pence for their value in computation.—Dies denotes stamps for coining; dice, pieces used in games.—Peas denotes the seeds as distinct objects; pease the seeds in a mass.—Brothers is the plural used in common discourse; brethren, in the scripture style, but is not restricted to it.

Cherubim and Seraphim are real Hebrew plurals; but such is the propensity in men to form regular inflections in language, that these words are used as in the singular, with regular plurals, cherubins, seraphims. In like manner, the Hebrew singulars, cherub and seraph, have obtained regular plurals.

The influence of this principle is very obvious in other foreign words, which the sciences have enlisted into our service; as may be observed in the words radius, focus, index, &c. which now begin to be used with regular English plural terminations. This tendency to regularity is, by all means, to be encouraged; for a prime excellence in language is the uniformity of its inflections. The facts here stated will be evinced by a few authorities.

"Vesiculated corallines are found adhering to rocks, shells and fucuses." Encyc. art. Corallines.

"Many fetuses are deficient at the extremities." Dar. Zoon. Sect. 1, 3, 9.

"Five hundred denariuses." Baker's Livy, 4. 491.

"The radiations of that tree and its fruit, the principal focuses of which are in the Maldivia islands." Hunter's St. Pierre, vol. 3.

"The reduction of metallic calxes into metals." Ency. art. Metallurgy.

See also Mediums, Campbell's Rhetoric, 1, 150—Calyxes, Darwin's Zoon. 1, 74—Caudexes, Phytologia, 2, 3—Iris, Zoon. 1. 444. Reguluses and residuiums. Ency. art. Metal.

In authorities equally respectable, we find stamens, stratums, funguses; and in pursuance of the principle, we may expect to see lamens for lamina; lamels for lamellæ; baryte for barytes; pyrite for pyrites; strontite for strontites; stalactite for the plural stalactites. These reforms are necessary to enable us to distinguish the singular from the plural number.

CLASS 3.—The third class of irregulars consists of such as have no plural termination; some of which represent ideas of things which do not admit of plurality; as rye, barley, flax, hemp, flour, sloth, pride, pitch, and the names of metals, gold, silver, tin, zinc, antimony, lead, bismuth, quicksilver. When, in the progress of improvement, any thing, considered as not susceptible of plurality, is found to have varieties, which are distinguishable, this distinction gives rise to a plural of the term. Thus in early ages our ancestors took no notice of different varieties of wheat, and the term had no plural. But modern improvements in agriculture have recognized varieties of this grain, which have given the name a plural form. The same remark is applicable to fern, clay, marl, sugar, cotton, &c. which have plurals, formerly unknown. Other words may hereafter undergo a similar change.

Other words of this class denote plurality, without a plural termination; as cattle, sheep, swine, kine, deer, hose; trout, salmon, carp, perch, and many other names of fish. Fish has a plural, but it is used in the plural sense without the termination; as,

"We are to blame for eating these fish." Anacharsis 6. 272.

"The fish reposed in seas and crystal floods," Hoole T. 2. 726.

"The beasts retired in covert of the woods."

Cannon, shot and sail, are used in a plural sense; as,

"One hundred cannon were landed from the fleet." Burchett, Naval Hist. 732.

"Several shot being fired." Ibm. 455.

"Several sail of ships." Ibm. 426.

In the sense in which sail is here used, it does not admit of a plural ending.

Under this class may be noticed a number of words, expressing time, distance, measure, weight, and number, which, though admitting a plural termination, are often, not to say generally, used without that termination, even when used with attributes of plurality; such are the names in these expressions, two year, five mile, ten foot, seven pound, three tun, hundred, thousand, or million, five bushel, twenty weight, &c. Yet the most unlettered people never say, two minute, three hour, five day, or week, or month; nor two inch, yard or league; nor three ounce, grain, dram, or peck.

A like singularity is observable in the Latin language. "Tritici quadraginta millia modium." Liv. lib. 26. 47. Forty thousand modium of wheat. "Quatuor millia pondo auri," four thousand pound of gold. Ibm. 27. 10.

Here we see the origin of our pound. Originally it was merely weight—four thousand of gold by weight. From denoting weight generally, pondo became the term for a certain division or quantity; retaining however its signification of unity, and becoming an indeclinable in Latin. Twenty pound then, in strictness, is twenty divisions by weight; or as we say, with a like abbreviation, twenty weight.

The words horse, foot and infantry, comprehending bodies of soldiers, are used as plural nouns and followed by verbs in the plural. Cavalry is sometimes used in like manner.

CLASS 4.—The fourth class of irregular nouns consists of words which have the plural termination only. Some of these denoting plurality, are always joined with verbs in the plural; as the following:

Annals,	drawers,	lees,	customs,
archives,	downs,	lungs,	shears,
ashes,	dregs,	matins,	scissors,
assets,	embers,	mallows,	shambles,
bettors,	entrails,	orgies,	tidings,
bowels,	fetters,	nippers,	tongs,
compasses,	filings,	pincers, or	thanks,
clothes,	goods,	pinchers,	vespers,
calends,	hatches,	pleiads,	vitals,
breeches,	ides,	snuffers,	victuals.

Letters, in the sense of literature, may be added to the foregoing list. Manners, in the sense of behavior, is also plural.

GRAMMAR OF THE

Other words of this class, though ending in s, are used either wholly in the singular number, or in the one or the other, at the pleasure of the writer.

Amends,	wages,	conics,	economics,
alms,	billiards,	catoprics,	mathematics,
bellows,	fives,	dioptrics,	mechanics,
gallows,	sessions,	acoustics,	hydraulics,
odds,	measles,	pneumatics,	hydrostatics,
means,	hysterics,	statics,	analytics,
pains,	physics,	statistics,	politics,
news,	ethics,	spherics,
riches,	optics,	tactics,

Of these, pains, riches, and wages,* are more usually considered as plural—news is always singular—odds and means are either singular or plural—the others are more strictly singular; for measles is the name of a disease, and in strictness, no more plural than gout or fever. Small pox, for pocks, is sometimes considered as a plural, but it ought to be used as singular. Billiards has the sense of game, containing unity of idea; and ethics, physics and other similar names, comprehending each the whole system of a particular science, do not convey the ideas of parts or particular branches, but of a whole collectively, a unity, and hence seem to be treated as words belonging to the singular number.

Gender.

GENDER, in grammar, is a difference of termination, to express distinction of sex.

There being two sexes, male and female, words which denote males are said to be of the masculine gender; those which denote females, of the feminine gender. Words expressing things without sex, are said to be of neuter gender. There are therefore but two genders; yet for convenience the neuter is classed with the genders; and we say there are three, the masculine, feminine and neuter. The English modes of distinguishing sex are these:

1. The regular termination of the feminine gender, is ess; which is added to the name of the masculine; as lion, lioness. But when the word ends in or, the feminine is formed by retrenching a vowel, and blending two syllables into one; as actor, actress. In a few words, the feminine gender is represented by ix, as testatrix, from testator; and a few others are irregular. The following are most of the words which have a distinct termination for the feminine gender:

Actor,	actress.	deacon,	deaconess.
abbot,	abbess.	duke,	duchess.
adulterer,	adultrress.	ambassador,	embassadress.
baron,	baroness.	emperor,	empress.
benefactor,	benefactress.	tiger,	tigress.
governor,	governess.	songster,	songstress.
hero,	heroine.	seamster,	seamstress.
heir,	heiress.	viscount,	viscountess.
peer,	peeress.	jew,	jewess.
priest,	priestess.	lion,	lioness.
poet,	poetess.	master,	mistress.
prince,	princess.	marquis,	marchioness.
prophet,	prophetess.	patron,	patroness.
shepherd,	shepherdess.	protector,	protectress.
sorcerer,	sorceress.	executor,	executrix.
tutor,	tutoress.	testator,	testatrix.
instructor,	instructress.	elector,	electress.
traitor,	traitress.	administrator,	administratrix.
count,	countess.	widower,	widow.

2. In many instances, animals, with which we have most frequent occasions to be conversant, have different words to express the different sexes;

* Originally wagis, and really singular.

as man and woman; brother and sister; uncle and aunt; son and daughter; boy and girl; father and mother; horse and mare; bull and cow.

Man however is a general term for the whole race of mankind; so also, horse comprehends the whole species. A law to restrain every man from an offence would comprehend women and boys; and a law to punish a trespass committed by any horse, would comprehend all mares and colts.

3. When words have no distinct termination for the female sex, the sexes are distinguished by prefixing some word indicating sex; as a male rabbit, a female opossum; a he goat, a she goat; a man servant, a maid servant; a male coquet, a female warrior; a cock-sparrow, a hen-sparrow.

4. In all cases, when the sex is sufficiently indicated by a separate word, names may be used to denote females without a distinct termination. Thus, although females are rarely soldiers, sailors, philosophers, or mathematicians, and we seldom have occasion to say, she is a soldier, or an astronomer, yet there is not the least impropriety in the application of these names to females, when they possess the requisite qualifications; for the sex is clearly marked by the word she or female, or the appropriate name of the woman; as "Joan of Arc was a warrior." "The Amazons, were a nation of female warriors."*

Encyc. art. Amazons.

5. Although the English language is philosophically correct in considering things without life as of neither gender, yet by an easy analogy, the imagination conceives of inanimate things as animated and distinguished by sex. On this fiction, called personification, depends much of the descriptive force and beauty of poetry. In general, those objects which are remarkable for their strength, influence, and the attribute of imparting, take the masculine gender; those which are remarkable for the more mild and delicate qualities, for beauty and the attribute of producing, become feminine; the sun darts his scorching rays; the moon sheds her paler light.

"Indus or Ganges rolling his broad wave."

"There does the soul Consent her soaring fancy to restrain."

Ibm.

"Now morn her rosy steps in th' eastern clime Advancing—"

Case.

CASE in Grammar denotes a variation of words to express the relation of things to each other. In English, most of the relations are expressed by separate words; but the relation of property, ownership or possession, is expressed by adding s to a name, with an apostrophe; thus, John's book; which words are equivalent to "the book of John." This is called the Possessive Case. In English therefore names have two cases only, the nominative or simple name, and the possessive. The nominative before a verb and the objective after a verb are not distinguished by inflections, and are to be known only by position or the sense of the passage.

When the letter s, added as the sign of the possessive, will coalesce with the name, it is pronounced in the same syllable; as John's. But if it will not coalesce, it adds a syllable to the word; as Thomas's bravery, pronounced as if written Thomasis; the Church's prosperity, Churchis prosperity. These examples show the impropriety of retrenching the vowel; but it occasions no inconvenience to natives.

When words end in es or ss, the apostrophe is added without e; as on eagles' wings; for righteousness' sake.

Pronouns or Substitutes.

PRONOUNS or substitutes are of two kinds; those which are used in the place of the names of persons only, and may be called personal; and those which represent names, attributes, a sentence or part of a sentence, or a series of propositions.

The pronouns which are appropriate to persons, are, I, thou, you, he, she, we, ye, and who.

I is used by a speaker to denote himself, and is called the first person of the singular number.

When a speaker includes others with himself, he uses we. This is the first person of the plural number.

Thou and you represent the person addressed—thou, in solemn discourse, and you, in common language. These are the second person. In the plural, ye is used in solemn style, and you in familiar language.

He represents the name of a male, and she, that of a female, who is the subject of discourse, but not directly addressed. These are called the third person.

It is a substitute for the name of any thing of the neuter gender in the third person, and for a sentence.

They is a substitute for the names of persons or things, and forms the third person of the plural number.

* The termination or in Latin, is a contraction of vir, a man; as er in English is of wer, the same word in Saxon. But in common understanding, the idea of gender is hardly attached to these terminations; for we add er to words to denote an agent, without life, as grater, heater.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Who is a relative or personal pronoun, used to introduce a new clause or affirmation into a sentence, which clause has an immediate dependence on the preceding one. Who is also used to ask questions, and hence it is called an interrogative.

Which is also a relative, but is of neuter gender. It is also interrogative. These pronouns have two cases; the nominative which precedes a verb, and the objective which follows it. They are inflected in the following manner.

	Sing.	Plu.		Sing.	Plu.
Nominative	I	we	Nom.	she	they
Objective	me	us	Obj.	her	them
Nom.	thou	ye	Nom.	it	they
Obj.	thee	you	Obj.	it	them
Nom.	you	you	Nom.	who	who
Obj.	you	you	Obj.	whom	whom
Nom.	he	they
Obj.	him	them

NOTE.—Mine, thine, his, hers, yours and theirs, are usually considered as the possessive case. But the three first are either attributes, and used with nouns, or they are substitutes. The three last are always substitutes, used in the place of names which are understood, as may be seen in the note below.*

Its and whose have a better claim to be considered as a possessive case; but as they equally well fall under the denomination of attributes, I have, for the sake of uniformity, assigned them a place with that part of speech.

* That mine, thine, his, yours, hers and theirs, do not constitute a possessive case, is demonstrable; for they are constantly used as the nominatives to verbs and as the objectives after verbs and prepositions, as in the following passages. "Whether it could perform its operations of thinking and memory out of a body organized as ours is,"—Locke, b. 2. 27. "In referring our ideas to those of other men called by the same name, ours may be false."—"It is for no other reason but that his agrees not with our ideas."—ibm. ch. 32. 9 and 10.

"You may imagine what kind of faith theirs was."

"He ran headlong into his own ruin whilst he endeavoured to precipitate ours,"—Bacon, Unity in Religion.

"The reason is that his subject is generally things; theirs, on the contrary, is persons."—Bolingbroke, Lett. to Windham.

"Yours of the 26th Oct. I have received, as I have always done yours, with no little satisfaction."—Camp. Rhet. b. 1. ch. 10.

"Therefore leave your forest of beasts for ours of brutes, called men."—Wycherley to Pope.

"These return so much better out of your hands than they went from mine."—ibm.

"Your letter of the 20th of this month, like the rest of yours—tells me with so much more wit, sense and kindness than mine can express," &c. —ibm.

"Having good works enough of your own besides to ensure yours and their immortality."—ibm.

"The omission of repetitions is but one, and the easiest part of yours and of my design."—Pope to Wycherley.

"My sword and yours are kin."—Shakspeare.

It is needless to multiply proofs. We observe these pretended possessives uniformly used as nominatives or objectives. To say that, in these passages, ours, yours, theirs, and mine form a possessive case, is to make the possessive perform the office of a nominative case to verbs, and an objective case after verbs and prepositions—a manifest solecism.

Should it be said that a noun is understood; I reply, this cannot be true, in regard to the grammatical construction; for supply the noun for which the word is a substitute, and the pronoun must be changed into an adjective. "Yours of the 26th of October," becomes your letter—"he endeavoured to precipitate ours," becomes our ruin." This shows that the words are real substitutes, like others, where it stands for other men or things.

Besides in three passages, just quoted, the word yours is joined by a connective to a name in the same case; "to ensure yours and their immortality." "The easiest part of yours and of my design." "My sword and yours are kin." Will any person pretend that the connective here joins different cases?

Another consideration is equally decisive of this question. If yours, ours, &c. are real possessives, then the same word admits of two different signs of the case; for we say correctly, "an acquaintance of yours, ours, or theirs"—of being the sign of the possessive; but if the words in themselves are possessives, then there must be two signs of the same case, which is absurd.

Compare these words with a name in the possessive case—"My house is on a hill; my father's is on a plain." Here father's is a real possessive case; the word house being understood; and the addition of the noun makes no alteration in the word father's; "my father's is, or my father's house is."

† This case does not compare with that of names. We say, a "soldier of the king's," or a soldier of the king's soldiers; but we cannot say, "an acquaintance of your's acquaintance."

But it must be observed, that although it and who are real substitutes, never united to names, like attributes—it day—who man; yet its and whose cannot be detached from a name expressed or implied—as, its shape, its figure—whose face—whose works—whose are they? that is, whose works. These are therefore real adjectives.

In the use of substitutes, it is to be remarked, that I, thou, you, ye and we are generally employed without an antecedent name. When I, and the name of the person are both employed, as they are in formal writings, oaths and the like, the pronouns precede the name; as, "I, Richard Roe, of Boston." In similar language, you and we also precede the name; as, "You, John Doe, of New-York." "We, Richard Roe and John Doe, of Philadelphia."

You is used by writers very indefinitely, as a substitute for any person who may read the work—the mind of the writer imagining a person addressed.

He and they are used in the same indefinite manner; as, "He seldom lives frugally, who lives by chance." "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

He and they, in such sentences, represent any persons who fall within the subsequent description.

Who and whom are always substitutes for persons, and never for things or brutes. Whose is equally applicable to persons as to things.

Whoever is often employed as the nominative to two verbs; as, "Whoever expects to find in the scriptures a specific direction for every moral doubt that arises, looks for more than he will meet with."—Paley, Phil. ch. 4.

Mine, thine and his are equally well used as substitutes, or as attributes. "The silver is mine, and the gold is mine."—Hag. ii. 8. "The day is thine, the night also is thine."—Ps. lxxiv. 16. "The lord knoweth them that are his."—2 Tim. ii. 19. In these examples the words, mine, thine, his, may be considered as substitutes—"The silver is mine," that is, my silver.

In this character the words usually follow the verb; but when emphatical, they may precede it; as "His will I be."—2 Sam. xvi. 18. "Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, the power and the glory."—"Thine is the kingdom."—1 Ch. xxix. 11.

These words are also used as attributes of possession; as, "Let not mine enemies triumph." "So let thine enemies perish." "And Abram removed his tent." Mine and thine are however not used in familiar language; but in solemn and elevated style, they are still used as attributes.

"Mine eyes beheld the messenger divine."—Lusiad. B. 2.

There is another class of substitutes, which supply the place of names, attributes, sentences or parts of a sentence.

It.

In the following sentence, it is the substitute for a name. "The sun rules the day; it illumines the earth." Here it is used for sun, to prevent a repetition of the word.

In the following passage, it has a different use. "The Jews, it is well known, were at this time under the dominion of the Romans."—Porteus, Lect. 8. Here it represents the whole of the sentence, except the clause in which it stands. To understand this, let the order of the words be varied. "The Jews were at this time under the dominion of the Romans, it [all that] is well known."

"It is a testimony as glorious to his memory, as it is singular, and almost unexampled in his circumstances, that he loved the Jewish nation, and that he gave a very decisive proof of it, by building them a synagogue."—ibm.

To discover what is represented by the first it, we must inquire, what is a glorious testimony? Why, clearly that he loved the Jewish nation, and gave them a decisive proof of it, by building them a synagogue. It then is a substitute for those clauses of the sentence. The second it refers to the same clauses. In the latter part of the sentence, he gave a magnificent proof of it—of what? of what is related in a preceding clause—He loved the Jewish nation—of that he gave a decisive and magnificent proof. Here it represents that member of the sentence.

"As for the pulling of them down, if the affairs require it."—Bacon on Ambition. Require what? "The pulling of them down"—for which part of the sentence, it is a substitute.

"And how could he do this so effectually, as by performing works, which it utterly exceeded all the strength and ability of men to accomplish."—Porteus, Lect. 5.

What utterly exceeded? To what does it refer? Let us invert the order of the words—"as by performing works to accomplish which exceeded all the strength of men." Here we find to accomplish, a verb in the infinitive, is the nominative to exceeded, and for that verb, it is a substitute.

This inceptive use of it forms a remarkable idiom of our language, and deserves more particular illustration. It stands as the substitute for a subsequent member or clause of a sentence; and is a sort of pioneer to smooth the way for the verb. Thus, "It is remarkable, that the philosopher Seneca makes use of the same argument."—Porteus Lect. 6. If we ask, what is remarkable? The answer must be, the fact stated in the last clause of the sentence. That this is the real construction, appears from a transposition of the clauses. "The philosopher Seneca makes use of the same argument, that is remarkable." In this order we observe the true use of that, which is also a substitute for the preceding clause of the sentence, and it becomes redundant. The use then of the inceptive it appears to be to enable us to begin a sentence, without placing a verb as the introductory word; and by the use of it and that as substitutes for subsequent members of the sentence, the order is inverted without occasioning obscurity.

It is to be noticed also that this neuter substitute, it, is equally proper to begin sentences, when the name of a person is afterwards used; as, "It was John who exhibited such powers of eloquence." But if we transpose the words, and place who or that, the substitute which begins a new clause, next after the inceptive word, we must use he for the inceptive—"He, who or that exhibited such powers of eloquence, was John."

In interrogative sentences, the order of words is changed, and it follows the verb. Who is it that has been thus eloquent?

There is a sentence in Locke, in which the inceptive it is omitted. "Whereby comes to pass, that, as long as any uneasiness remains in the mind. B. ch. 21. In strictness, this is not a defective sentence, for that may be considered as the nominative to comes. Whereby that comes to pass which follows. Or the whole subsequent sentence may be considered as the nominative—for all that comes to pass. But the use of the inceptive it is so fully established as the true idiom of the language, that its omission is not to be vindicated.

This and that, these and those.

This and that are either definite attributes or substitutes. As attributes, they are used to specify individuals, and distinguish them from others; as, "This my son was dead and is alive again." "Certainly this was a righteous man." "The end of that man is peace." "Wo to that man by whom the son of man is betrayed." This and that have plurals, these and those.

The general distinction between this and that, is, this denotes an object to be present or near in time or place; that, to be absent. But this distinction is not always observed. In correspondence however with this distinction, when, in discourse, two things are mentioned, this and these refer to the last named, or nearest in the order of construction; that and those to the most distant; as,

"*Self love and reason to one end aspire,
Pain their aversion, pleasure their desire;
But greedy that [self love] its object would devour,
This [reason] taste the honey and not wound the flower.*" Pope.
"*Some place the bliss in action, some in ease,
Those call it pleasure, and contentment these.*" Ibm.

The poets sometimes contrast these substitutes in a similar manner, to denote individuals acting or existing in detached parties, or to denote the whole acting in various capacities; as,

"*'Twas war no more, but carnage through the field,
Those lift their sword, and these their bosoms yield.*" Hoole's Tasso. b. 20.

"*Nor less the rest, the intrepid chief retain'd;
These urged by threats, and those by force constrain'd.*" Ibm.

There is a peculiarity in the use of that; for when it is an attribute, it is always in the singular number; but as a substitute for persons or things, it is plural as well as singular, and is used for persons as well as things more frequently than any word in the language; as,

"I knew a man that had it for a by-word, when he saw men hasten to a conclusion, 'Stay a little that we may make an end the sooner.'"

Bacon on Dispatch.

Here that is the representative of man, and it stands for the last clause of the sentence or by-word.

"Let states that aim at greatness take heed how their nobility and gentlemen multiply too fast."

Bacon.

Here that is a substitute for a plural name. So also in the following, "They that are whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." "They that had eaten were about four thousand"—"they that are in the flesh"—"they that weep"—"bless them that curse you."

Another very common use of this and that, is to represent a sentence or part of a sentence; as,

"It is seldom known that, authority thus acquired is possessed without insolence, or that, the master is not forced to confess that, he has enslaved himself by some foolish confidence." Rambler, No. 68.

In this sentence, the first that represents the next member—"Authority thus acquired is possessed without insolence, that is seldom known." It represents the same clause. The second that represents all which follows, including two clauses or members. The third that is the substitute for the last clause. In strictness the comma ought always to be placed after that; which punctuation would elucidate the use of the substitute and the true construction; but the practice is otherwise, for that, in this and like sentences, is either a nominative or an objective. The first that in the foregoing sentence is the nominative, coinciding with it, or in apposition to it; and when the clauses are transposed, the inceptive it, being redundant, is dropped, and that becomes the nominative. The same remark is applicable to the second that; the verb and first clause, it is seldom known, being understood. The third that is the objective after confess. "The master has enslaved himself by some foolish confidence—he is forced to confess that—all that is seldom known."

Such is the true construction of sentences—the definitive that, instead of being a conjunction, is the representative of a sentence or distinct clause, preceding that clause, and pointing the mind to it, as the subject which follows. And it is as definite or demonstrative in this application to sentences, as when it is applied to a name or noun.

The following sentence will exhibit the true use of that as a substitute—"He recited his former calamities; to which was now to be added that he was the destroyer of the man who had expiated him."

Beloe's Herodotus, Clio, 45.

According to our present grammars, that is a conjunction; if so, the preceding verb was, has no nominative word. But the sense is, "to which was to be added that" which is related in the following words.

The use and importance of this substitute are more clearly manifest, when it denotes purpose or effect; as in this passage, "And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth; that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, 'He shall be called a Nazarene.'" Matt. ii. 23. Here that is equivalent to that purpose or effect.—He came and dwelt in Nazareth, for the purpose expressed in what follows. It and which represent the last clause in the sentence—"He shall be called a Nazarene." The excellence and utility of substitutes and abbreviations are strikingly illustrated by this use of that.

This substitute has a similar use in this introductory sentence. That we may proceed—that here refers to the following words. The true construction is, But that we may proceed—but, as will hereafter be shown, denoting supply or something more or further—So that the literal interpretation of the expression is—More that—or further that, we may proceed. It is the simple mode our ancestors used to express addition to what has preceded, equivalent to the modern phrase, let us add, or we may add what follows, by way of illustrating or modifying the sense of what has been related.

That, like who and which, has a connecting power, which has given to these words the name of relative; in which character, it involves one member of a sentence within another, by introducing a new verb; as, "He, that keepeth his mouth, keepeth his life." Prov. xiii. In this passage, that keepeth his mouth, is a new affirmation, interposed between the first nominative and its verb, but dependent on the antecedent nominative.

"The poor of the flock, that waited upon me, knew that, it was the word of the Lord." Zech. xi. 11. In this passage we have that in both its characters—the first that is a substitute for poor of the flock; the second, for the last clause of the sentence, it was the word of the Lord.

This exposition of the uses of that enables us to understand the propriety of that that joined in construction.

"Let me also tell you that, that faith, which proceeds from insufficient or bad principles, is but little better than infidelity." In this passage, the first that is a substitute for the whole subsequent part of the sentence; the second that is an attribute agreeing with faith—"That faith which proceeds from bad principles is little better than infidelity—let me tell you that." Hence it might be well always to separate the two words by a comma. We now distinguish these words by a stronger emphasis on the last.

"He, whom thou now hast, is not thy husband; in that saidst thou truly." John iv. 18. That is, in that whole declaration.

From these passages and the explanation, we learn that that is a substitute, either for a single word or a sentence; nor has it any other character, except when an attribute.

This is much less frequently a substitute for sentences than that, but is used in this character, as well as in that of an attribute; as, "Let no prince measure the danger of discontents by this, whether they be just or unjust; for that were to imagine people to be reasonable, who do often spurn at their own good; nor yet by this, whether the griefs whereupon they rise be in fact great or small." Bacon on Kingdoms.

Here this, in each part of the sentence, is the representative of the clause in Italics succeeding.

"Can we suppose that all the united powers of hell are able to work such astonishing miracles, as were wrought for the confirmation of the christian religion? Can we suppose that they can control the laws of nature at pleasure, and that with an air of sovereignty, and professing themselves the lords of the universe, as we know Christ did? If we can believe this, then we deny," &c. We observe here, this represents a series of sentences.

In some cases, this represents a few words only in a preceding sentence, as in the following—"The rule laid down is in general certain, that the king only can convoke a parliament. And this, by the ancient statutes of the realm, he is bound to do, every year or oftener, if need be."

Blacks. Comment. B. 1. ch. 2.

If we ask, what is the king bound to do? The answer must be, convoke a parliament; for which words alone this is the substitute, and governed by do.

The plurals, these and those, are rarely or never used as substitutes for sentences.

Which.

Which is also a substitute for a sentence, or part of a sentence, as well as for a single word; as, "if there can be any other way shown, how men may come to that universal agreement, in the things they do consent in, which I presume may be done." Locke on Und. B. 1. 2.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Which, in this passage, represents all which precedes—which or all that is above related, may be done.

"Another reason that makes me doubt of any innate practical principles, is, that I think there cannot any one moral rule be proposed, whereof a man may not justly demand a reason; which would be perfectly ridiculous and absurd, if they were innate, or so much as self-evident, which every innate principle must needs be." Ibm. Chap. 3.

In this passage, the first which represents the next preceding part of the sentence, a man may justly demand a reason—which power of demanding a reason would be ridiculous—The second which is a substitute for self-evident; which, that is, self-evident, every principle must be.

"Judas declared him innocent, which he could not be, had he, in any respect, deceived the disciples." Porteus, Lect. 2. Here which represents the attribute innocent.

That would equally well represent the same word, with a connective. "Judas declared him innocent, and that he could not be," &c.

"We shall find the reason of it to be the end of language, which being to communicate thoughts"—that is, end of language, and for those words, is which the substitute.

What.

This substitute has several uses. First, it has the sense of that which; as, "I have heard what has been alledged."

Secondly—What stands for any indefinite idea; as, "He cares not what he says or does." "We shall the better know what to undertake."

Locke on Und. 1. 6.
Thirdly—What is an attribute, either in the singular or plural number, and denotes something uncertain or indeterminate; as, "In what character, Butler was admitted into that lady's service, is unknown."

Johnson's Life of Butler.

"It is not material what names are assigned to them."

Camp. Rhet. 1. 1.

"I know not what impressions time may have made upon your person."

Life of Couper. Let. 27.

"To see what are the causes of wrong judgment."

Locke 2. 21.

Fourthly—What is used by the poets preceding a name, for the or that which, but its place cannot be supplied by these words, without a name between them; as,

"What time the sun withdrew his cheerful light,

And sought the sable caverns of the night."

Hoole's Tasso. b. 7.

That is, at the time when or in which.

Fifthly—A principal use of what is to ask questions; as, "What will be the consequence of the revolution in France?"

This word has the singular property of containing two cases; that is, it performs the office of a word in the nominative, and of another in the objective case; as, "I have, in what goes before, been engaged in physical inquiries farther than I intended." Locke 2. 8. Here what contains the object after in and the nominative to goes.

What is used with a name as an attribute and a substitute; as, "It was agreed that what goods were aboard his vessels, should be landed." Mickle's Discovery of India. 89. Here what goods, are equivalent to the goods which; for what goods include the nominative to two verbs, were and should be landed. This use of the word is not deemed elegant.

As.

As, primarily signifies like, similar; the primary sense of which is even, equal. It is used adverbially in the phrases, as good, as great, as probable; the sense of which is like or equally good, great or probable. Hence it frequently follows such. "Send him such books as will please him." But in this and similar phrases, as must be considered as the nominative to will please; or we must suppose an ellipsis of several words. "Send him such books as the books which will please him, or as those which will please him." So in the following sentences.

"We have been accustomed to repose on its veracity with such humble confidence as suppresses curiosity." Johnson's Life of Cowley.

"All the punishment which God is concerned to see inflicted on sin is only such as answers the ends of government."

"Many wise men contented themselves with such probable conclusions as were sufficient for the practical purposes of life."

Enfield, Hist. Phil. 2. 11.

"The malcontents made such demands as none but a tyrant could refuse."

Bolingbroke on Hist. Let. 7.

In the last example, if as is to be considered as a pronoun, or substitute, it is in the objective case.

These and similar phrases are anomalous; and we can resolve them only by supplying the ellipsis, or by considering as in the nature of a pronoun, and the nominative to the verb.

In the following form of expression, we may supply it for the nominative.

"Do every thing as was said about mercury and sulphur." Encyc.

"As it was said."

In poetry, as supplies the place of such.

"From whence might contest spring and mutual rage,

As would the camp in civil broils engage."

Hoole's Tasso.

In prose we would say, "such contest and rage as."

As sometimes refers to a sentence or member of a sentence, and sometimes its place may be supplied by which. "On his return to Egypt, as I learned from the same authority, he levied a mighty army." Beloe, Herod.

Which I learned. "On his return to Egypt, he levied a mighty army, which [fact] I learned from the same authority."

As often begins a sentence. "As to the three orders of pronouns already mentioned, they may be called prepositive, as may indeed all substantives." Harris. That is, concerning, respecting the three orders, or to explain that which respects the three orders, &c.

Both.

Both is an adjective of number, but it is a substitute also for names, sentences, parts of sentences, and for attributes.

"Abraham took sheep and oxen, and gave them unto Abimelech, and both of them made a covenant." Genesis xxi. 27.

Here both is the representative of Abraham and Abimelech.

"He will not bear the loss of his rank, because he can bear the loss of his estate; but he will bear both, because he is prepared for both."

Boling. on Exile.

In the last example, both represents the parts of the sentences in italics.

When it represents two attributes, it may and usually does precede them; as, "He endeavored to render commerce both disadvantageous and infamous."

Mickle, p. 159.

As an attribute, it has a like position before names; as, "Tousa confessed he had saved both his life and his honor."

Ibm. 160.

"It is both more accurate, and proves no inconsiderable aid to the right understanding of things, to discriminate by different signs such as are truly different."

Campbell's Rhet. 1. 33.

In this passage, both represents more accurate, and the following member of the sentence; but the construction is harsh.

"The necessity which a speaker is under, of suiting himself to his audience, both that he may be understood by them, and that his words may have an influence upon them."

Camp. Rhet. ch. 10.

Here both represents the two following clauses of the sentence. The definitive the is placed between both and its noun; as, "To both the preceding kinds, the term burlesque is applied."

Camp. Rhet. 1. 2.

Same.

The attribute same is often used as a substitute for persons and sentences or parts of a sentence; as, "Nothing appears so clearly an object of the mind or intellect only, as the future does, since we can find no place for its existence any where else. Not but the same, if we consider, is equally true of the past."

Hermes, p. 112.

In this ill constructed sentence, same has reference to all which is predicated of the future tense—that is, that it is an object of intellect only, since we can find no place for its existence any where else—The same, all this, is true of the past also.

"For brave and generous ever are the same."

Lusiad, 1.

Many, few, all, any.

These words we often find used as substitutes for names. "For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many." Matt. xxiv. 5. "Many are called, but few chosen." xx. 16. "All that come into the tent, and all that is in the tent shall be unclean seven days." Num. xix. 14. "If a soul shall sin against any of the commandments." Lev. iv. 2. "Neither is there any, that can deliver out of my hand." Deut. xxxii. 39.

First, last, former, latter, less, least, more, most, are often used as substitutes.

"The victor's laurel, as the martyr's crown,

The first I hope, nor less the last I prize." Hoole's Tasso. 6. 8.

"The last shall be first, and the first last." Matt. xx. 16.

"It will not be amiss to inquire into the cause of this strange phenomenon; that, even a man of discernment should write without meaning, and not be sensible that he hath no meaning; and that judicious people should read what hath been written in this way, and not discover the defect. Both are surprising, but the first much more than the last." Camp. Rhet. 2. 7.

Here both represents the two clauses of the sentence, preceded by that—both of those propositions are surprising. First and last stand in the place of the same clauses.

"Sublimity and vehemence are often confounded, the latter being considered as a species of the former." Camp. Rhet. 1. 1.

"Leonis refused to go thither with less than the appointed equipment." Mickle, 1. 181. Here less supplies the place of equipment, and prevents the necessity of its repetition.

"To the relief of these, Noronha sent some supplies, but while he was preparing to send more, an order from Portugal arrived." Mickle, 1. 180.

Here more is sufficiently intelligible without a repetition of the name—supplies.

GRAMMAR OF THE

"And the children of Israel did so, and gathered some more, some less." Erod. xvi. 17.
 "I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord, my God, to do less or more." Numb. xxii. 18.
 "Then began he to upbraid the cities wherein most of his mighty works were done." Matt. xi. 20.

"Was not this love indeed?
 We men say more, swear more, but indeed
 Our shews are more than will."

Shaks. Twelfth Night.

Such.

"Jabal was the father of such as dwell in tents." Gen. iv.
 "Thou shalt provide able men such as fear God." Ex. xviii.
 "Objects of importance must be portrayed by objects of importance; such as have grace, by things graceful." Camp. Rhet. 1. 2.
Such here supplies the place of a name or noun, but it retains its attributive sense and the name may be added.

Self and own.

Self is said to have been originally an attribute, but is now used as an intensive word to give emphasis to substitutes and attributes. Sometimes it is used as a noun. In the plural, it forms selves. It is added to the attributes my, your, own, as myself, yourself, ourselves; and to him, her, them, as himself, herself, themselves. And though annexed to substitutes in the objective case, these words are indifferently in the nominative or objective. Self is never added to his, their, mine, or thine.

The compounds himself, herself, thysself, ourselves, themselves, may be placed immediately after the personal substitute, as he himself wrote a letter to the minister, or immediately after the following verb or its object, as "He wrote a letter himself;"—"he went himself to the admiralty." In such phrases himself not only gives emphasis to the affirmation; but gives to an implied negative, the force of one expressed. "He went himself to the minister," carries with it a direct negation that another person went. In negative sentences, it has a different effect. "He did not write the letter himself," implies strongly that he wrote it by an agent, or had an agency in procuring it to be written.

These compound substitutes are used after verbs when reciprocal action is expressed; as, "They injure themselves."

Itself is added to names for emphasis; as, "this is the book itself."

Own is an attribute denoting property, used with names to render the sense emphatical; as, "this book is my own."

Own is sometimes a substitute; as, "He came unto his own and his own received him not." John i. 11.

"This is an invention of his own."

One, other, another, none.

The attribute one is very often a substitute; other is used in the same manner, and often opposed to one. "All rational or deductive evidence is derived from one or the other of these two sources." Camp. Rhet. ch. 5.

To render these words more definite, and the specification of the alternative more explicit, the definitive the is placed before them; as, "either he will hate the one and love the other."

Another has sometimes a possessive case; as, "the horse is another's," but this form of speech is but little used.

Another is the Saxon an, one, and other—one other. It is an attribute, but often used as a substitute. "Let another praise thee and not thine own mouth." Prov. xxvii. 2.

None [no one] is often a substitute; as, "Ye shall lie down and none shall make you afraid." Lev. xxvi. 6. It is used in the plural as well as the singular number.

The cardinal numbers are all used as substitutes, when the things to which they refer are understood by the train of discourse, and no ambiguity is created by the omission of the name; as, "The rest of the people also cast lots, to bring one of ten to dwell in Jerusalem." Neh. xi. 1.

One has sometimes the possessive form; as, "One's person is to be protected by law;" and frequently the plural number; as, "I have commanded my sanctified ones, and I have called my mighty ones." Isa. xiii. 3.

* In this compound, we have a strong confirmation of what I have alleged respecting the arrangement of you in the singular number, when used of a single person. Self is invariably in the singular—selves in the plural. Now if you is to be classed with plurals in all cases, we must, to be consistent, apply yourselves to a single person. Yet we make the proper distinction—yourself is applied to one person—yourselves to more. But upon the principle of our grammar, that you must always be joined to a verb in the plural, we are under the necessity of saying "You yourself were," when we address a single person—which is false construction. Whatever verb therefore is used with you when applied to an individual, must be considered as a verb in the singular number.

One, when contrasted with other, sometimes represents plural names, and is joined with a plural verb, as in this passage, "The reason why the one are ordinarily taken for real qualities, and the other, only for bare powers, seems to be," &c. Locke, b. 2. ch. 8. 25.

One and another, have a peculiar distributive use in the following and the like expressions; "Brethren, let us love one another." The effect of these words seems to be, to separate an act affirmed of a number collectively, and distribute it among the several individuals—"Let us love—let each one love the other." "If ye have love one to another—" "by love serve one another." One another, in this phraseology, have the comprehensive sense of every one. "By love serve"—every one serve the other. Each is used in a like sense—They loved each other—that is—they loved—each loved the other.

Several.

Several is an attribute, denoting originally one thing severed from others. But this sense seems to be now confined to technical law language; as a "joint and several estate." In common use, it is always plural, expressive of an indefinite number, not very large. It is frequently a substitute; as, "Several of my unknown correspondents." Spectator, 281.

Some.

The attribute some is often used as a substitute; as, "Some talk of subjects they do not understand; others praise virtue who do not practice it." Johnson.

Each, every, either, neither.

Each is a distributive attribute, used to denote every individual of a number, separately considered; as, "The king of Israel and the king of Judah sat each on his throne." "Thou also and Aaron, take each of you his censer." "The four beasts had each of them six wings."

In these passages, each is a substitute for the name of the persons or objects, one separate from the other.

Every denotes all the individuals of a number considered separately. It is therefore a distributive attribute, but sometimes a substitute, chiefly in the law style; as, "every of the clauses and conditions." It is generally followed by the name to which it belongs, or by the cardinal number one.

We sometimes see every separated from its name by the definitive the and an attribute of the superlative degree; as, "every the least variation." Locke.

Either and neither are usually classed with the conjunctions; but in strictness, they are always attributes or substitutes. Their correlatives or and nor, though considered as conjunctions, belong to the latter class of words; or being merely an abbreviation of other, and nor being the same word with the Saxon negative prefixed, as will be hereafter shown.

Either and or denote an alternative; as, "I will take either road at your pleasure." That is, I will take one road or the other. In this use, either is an attribute.

Either is also a substitute for a name; as, "Either of the roads is good." It also represents a sentence or a clause of a sentence; as, "No man can serve two masters, for either, he will hate the one and love the other, or else," &c. Matt. vi. 24. To understand the true import of either, let or be also reduced back to its original orthography, "for either, he will hate the one and love the other; other else he will hold to the one and despise the other." Here we are presented with the sentence as it would have stood in the Saxon; and we see two distinct affirmations, to the first of which is prefixed either, and to the last other. These words then are substitutes for the following sentences when they are intended to be alternative. Either and or are therefore signs of an alternative, and may be called alternatives.

Either is used also for each; as, "Two thieves were crucified—on either side one." This use of the word is constantly condemned by critics, and as constantly repeated by good writers; but it was the true original sense of the word, as appears by every Saxon author.

Either is used also to represent an alternative of attributes; as, "the emotion must be either not violent or not durable." Camp. Rhet. 1. 2.

Neither is not either, from the Saxon ne-either; and nor is ne-other, not other. As either and or present an alternative or a choice of two things, so neither and nor deny both or the whole of any number of particulars; as, "Fight neither with small nor great." 1 Kings, xxii. 31. Which sentence when resolved stands thus; "Fight not either with small, not other with great." Such is the curious machinery of language!

Neither is also used as an attribute and as a substitute for a name; as, "Neither office is filled, but neither of the offices will suit the candidate."

NOTE.—Or, either, nor and neither are here explained in their true original character; but when they stand for sentences, it is more natural to consider them as connectives, under which head I have arranged them.

In general, any attribute [adjective] which describes persons or things with sufficient clearness, without the name to which it strictly belongs, may be used as a substitute; as, "The rich have many friends"—"Associate with the wise and good"—"The future will resemble the past"—"Such is the opinion of the learned."

* Each is as applicable to a hundred or thousand as to two. "The prince had a body guard of a thousand men, each of whom was six feet high."

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Attributes or Adjectives.

Attributes or Adjectives, in grammar, are words which denote the qualities inherent in, or ascribed to things; as, a bright sun; a splendid equipage; a miserable hut; a magnificent house; an honest man; an amiable woman; liberal charity; false honor; a quiet conscience.

As qualities may exist in different degrees, which may be compared with each other, suitable modes of speech are devised to express these comparative degrees. In English, most attributes admit of three degrees of comparison, and a few admit of four. There are therefore four degrees of comparison.

The first denotes a slight degree of the quality, and is expressed by the termination ish; as reddish, brownish, yellowish. This may be denominated the imperfect degree of the attribute.

The second denotes such a degree of the attribute as to constitute an absolute or distinct quality; as red, brown, great, small, brave, wise. This is called the positive degree.

The third denotes a greater or less degree of a quality than exists in another object, with which it is compared; as greater, smaller, braver, wiser. This is called the comparative degree.

The fourth denotes the utmost or least degree of a quality; as bravest, wisest, poorest, smallest. This is called the superlative degree.

The imperfect degree is formed by adding ish to an attribute; as yellow, yellowish. If the attribute ends in e, this vowel is omitted; as white, whitish.

The comparative degree is formed by adding r to adjectives ending with e, as wise, wiser; and by adding er to words ending with an articulation, as cold, colder; or by prefixing more or less, as more just, less noble.

The superlative degree is formed by adding st to attributes ending with e, as wise, wisest; and est to those which end with an articulation, as cold, coldest; or by prefixing most and least, as most brave, least charitable.

Every attribute, susceptible of comparison, may be compared by more and most, less and least.

All monosyllables admit of er and est, and dissyllables when the addition may be easily pronounced; as happy, happier, happiest; lofty, loftier, loftiest. But few words of more syllables than one will admit of er and est. Hence most attributes of more syllables than one are compared by more and most, less and least; as more fallible, most upright, less generous, least splendid.

When attributes end in y after a consonant, this letter is dropped, and i substituted before er and est; as lofty, loftier, loftiest.

A few attributes have different words or irregular terminations for expressing the degrees of comparison; as good, better, best; bad or evil, worse, worst; fore, former, first; less or lesser, least; much, more, most; near, nearer, nearest or next; old, older, oldest or eldest; late, later, latest or last.

When qualities are incapable of increase or diminution, the words which express them do not admit of comparison. Such are the numerals, first, second, third, &c., and attributes of mathematical figures, as square, spherical, rectangular; for it will readily appear, that if a thing is first or square, it cannot be more or less so.

The sense of attributes however is not restricted to the modification, expressed by the common signs of comparison, but may be varied in an indefinite number of ways, by other words. Thus the attribute very, which is the French trai, true, formerly written veray, is much used intensively to express a great degree of a quality, but not the greatest; as very wise or learned. In like manner are used much, far, extremely, exceedingly, and most of the modifiers in ly.

Some attributes, from particular appropriate uses, have received names, by which they are distinguished. But the usual classification is by no means correct. The following distribution seems to result from the uses of the words named.

An or a, the, this, that, these, those, other, another, one, none, some, may be called definitives, from their office, which is to limit or define the extent of the name to which they are prefixed, or to specify particulars.

My, thy, her, our, your, their, and mine, thine, his, when used as attributes, with names, are possessive attributes, as they denote possession or ownership. Its and whose, if ranked with attributes, belong to the same class.

Each and every are distributives, but they may be classed with the definitives.

Either is an alternative, as is or, which is now considered merely as a connective.

Own is an intensive adjective. The words to which self is affixed, himself, myself, themselves, yourself, yourselves, ourselves, thyselves, itself, may be denominated intensive substitutes, or for brevity, intensives. Or they may be called compound substitutes.

Verb.

The verb is a primary part of speech, and next to the name or noun, is of the most importance. The uses of the verb are,

1st. To affirm, assert, or declare; as, the sun shines; John loves study; God is just; and negatively, avarice is not commendable.

VOL. I.

I.

2d. To command, exhort or invite; as go, attend, let us observe.

3d. To pray, request, entreat; as, O may the spirit of grace dwell in us.

4th. To inquire, or question; as, does it rain? Will he come?

From the various uses and significations of verbs, have originated several divisions or classes. The only one in English which seems to be correct and sufficiently comprehensive, is, into transitive and intransitive. To these may be added a combination of the verb be, with certain auxiliaries and participles, which is called a passive verb.*

1. A transitive verb denotes action or energy, which is exerted upon some object, or in producing some effect. In natural construction, the word expressing the object, follows the verb, without the intervention of any other word, though the order may be sometimes varied. Thus, "ridicule provokes anger," is a complete proposition; ridicule is the agent or nominative word, which causes the action; provoke is the verb, or affirmation of an act; anger is the object or effect produced, following the transitive verb provoke.

"The wind propels a ship," is the affirmation of an act of the wind exerted on a ship. Wind is the agent; propels, the verb; and ship, the object.

2. An intransitive verb denotes simple being or existence in a certain state, as to be, to rest; or it denotes action, which is limited to the subject. Thus, "John sleeps," is an affirmation, in which John, the nominative to sleeps, is the subject of the affirmation; sleeps is a verb intransitive, affirming a particular thing of John, which extends to no other object.

3. The passive verb in English is formed by adding certain auxiliaries and participles to the verb be. It denotes passion or suffering; that is, that the subject of the affirmation or nominative is affected by the action affirmed; as, "John is convinced;" "Laura is loved and admired."

In this form of the verb, the agent and object change places. In the transitive form the agent precedes the verb, and the object follows; as, "John has convinced Moses." In the passive form the order is changed, and the agent follows the verb preceded by a preposition; as, "Moses is convinced by John."

To correspond with their nominatives, verbs are used in both numbers, and with the three persons in each.

As action and being may be mentioned as present, past and future, verbs have modifications to express time, which are called tenses. And as action and being may be represented in various ways, verbs have various modifications to answer these purposes, called modes or moods. Hence to verbs belong person, number, tense and mode.

The persons, which have been already explained, are I, thou or you, he, she, it, in the singular number; in the plural, we, ye or you, they. The numbers have been before explained.

Tenses.

There are six tenses or modifications of the verb to express time. Each of these is divided into two forms, for the purpose of distinguishing the definite or precise time from the indefinite. These may be thus explained and exemplified.

Present Tense, indefinite.

This form of the present tense affirms or denies action or being, in present time, without limiting it with exactness to a given point. It expresses also facts which exist generally, at all times, general truths, attributes which are permanent, habits, customary actions, and the like, without reference to a specific time; as, God is infinitely great and just; man is imperfect and dependent; plants spring from the earth; birds fly; fishes swim.

Present Tense, definite.

This form expresses the present time with precision; usually denoting action or being which corresponds in time with another action; as, I am writing, while you are waiting.

Past Tense, indefinite.

This form of the past tense represents action which took place at a given time past, however distant and completely past; as, "In six days, God created the heavens and the earth." "Alexander conquered the Persians." "Scipio was as virtuous as brave." "The Earl of Chatham was an eloquent statesman."

Past Tense, definite, [imperfect.]

This form represents an action as taking place and unfinished in some specified period of past time; as, "I was standing at the door when the procession passed."

* The common distribution into active, neuter and passive, is very objectionable. Many of our neuter verbs imply action in a pre-eminent degree, as to run, to walk, to fly; and the young learner cannot easily conceive why such verbs are not called active.

GRAMMAR OF THE

Perfect Tense, indefinite.

This form of the perfect tense represents an action completely past, and often at no great distance, but the time not specified; as, "I have accomplished my design." But if a particular time is named, the tense must be the past; as, "I accomplished my design last week." "I have seen my friend last week," is not correct English. In this respect, the French idiom is different from the English, for "J'ai vu mon ami hier" is good French, but "I have seen my friend yesterday" is not good English. The words must be translated, "I saw my friend yesterday." No fault is more common than a mistranslation of this tense.

It is to be noted however that this perfect indefinite tense is that in which we express continued or repeated action; as, "My father has lived about eighty years." "The king has reigned more than forty years." "He has been frequently heard to lament." Life of Couper. We use it also when a specified past time is represented, if that time is expressed as a part of the present period. Thus, although we cannot say, "We have been together yesterday," we usually say, "We have been together this morning, or this evening." We even use this tense in mentioning events which happened at a greater distance of time, if we connect that time with the present; as, "His brother has visited him once within two years." "He has not seen his sister, since the year 1800."

Perfect Tense, definite.

This form represents an action as just finished; as, "I have been reading a history of the revolution in France."

Prior-past Tense, indefinite, [pluperfect.]

This form of the prior past tense expresses an action which was past at or before some other past time specified; as, "he had received the news before the messenger arrived."

Prior-past, definite.

This form denotes an action to be just past, at or before another time specified; as, "I had been reading your letter when the messenger arrived."

Future Tense, indefinite.

This form of the future tense gives notice of an event to happen hereafter; as, "Your son will obtain a commission in the navy." "We shall have a fine season."

Future Tense, definite.

This form expresses an action which is to take place and be unfinished at a specified future time; as, "He will be preparing for a visit, at the time you arrive."

Prior-Future, indefinite.

This form of the future tense denotes an action which will be past at a future time specified; as, "They will have performed their task, by the appointed hour."

Prior-Future, definite.

This form represents an action which will be just past at a future specified time; as, "We shall have been making preparations, a week before our friends arrive."

In the use of the present tense, the following things are to be noticed.

1. The present tense is customarily used to express future time, when by any mode of expression, the mind is transported forward to the time, so as to conceive it present; as, "I cannot determine, till the mail arrives." "As soon as it is light, we shall depart." "When he has an opportunity, he will write." The words till, when, as soon as, carry the mind to the time of an event to happen, and we speak of it as present.

2. By an easy transition, the imagination passes from an author to his writings; these being in existence and present, though long after his decease, we substitute the writer's name for his works, and speak of him as living, or in the present tense; thus, Milton resembles Homer in sublimity and invention, as Pope resembles Virgil, in smoothness of versification. Plato is fanciful; Aristotle is profound.

*The common names and distribution of the tenses, are so utterly incorrect and incompetent to give a just idea of their uses, that I have ventured to offer a new division, retaining the old names, as far as truth will warrant. The terms prior-past, and prior-future, are so perfectly descriptive of the tenses arranged under them, that I cannot but think they will be well received. The distinction of indefinite and definite is not wholly new; but I have never seen the definite forms displayed, though they are as necessary as the indefinite forms. Indeed, I see not how a foreigner can learn our language, as the tenses are commonly distributed and defined.

3. It gives great life and effect to description, in prose or verse, to represent past events as present; to introduce them to the view of the reader or hearer, as having a present existence. Hence the frequent use of the present tense for the future, by the historian, the poet and the orator:

"She spoke; Minerva burns to meet the war;
And now heaven's empress calls the blazing car;
At her command rush forth the steeds divine,
Rich with immortal gold, the trappings shine."

Iliad, 5.

The definite tenses, it will be observed, are formed by the participle of the present tense, and the substantive verb, be. This participle always expresses present time, even when annexed to a past or future tense; for, I was writing, denotes that, at the past time mentioned, the action was present; I shall be writing, denotes future time, but an action then to be present.

The past tense of every regular verb ends in ed; d being added to a verb ending in e, and ed to a verb with other terminations; as hate, hated; look, looked.

The future tense is formed by the present tense of shall and will; for, I shall go, he will go, are merely an appropriate use of I shall to go, I will to go. See an explanation of these words under the head of auxiliaries.

There are other modes of expressing future time; as, "I am going to write"; "I am about to write." These have been called the inceptive future, as they note the commencement of an action, or an intention to commence an action without delay.

We have another mode of expression, which does not strictly and positively foretell an action, yet it implies a necessity of performing an act, and clearly indicates that it will take place. For example, "I have to pay a sum of money to-morrow." That is, I am under a present necessity or obligation to do a future act.

The substantive verb followed by a radical verb, forms another idiomatic expression of future time; as, "John is to command a regiment." "Eneas went in search of the seat of an empire which was, one day, to command the world." The latter expression is a future past; that is, past to the narrator, but future as to the event, at the time specified.

Modes.

Mode, in grammar, is the manner of representing action and being, or the wishes and determinations of the mind. This is performed by inflections of the verb, or by combinations of verbs with auxiliaries and participles, and by their various positions.

As there are scarcely two authors who are agreed in the number and denominations of the modes in English, I shall offer a distribution of the verbs, and a display of their inflections and combinations, somewhat different from any which I have seen.

1. The first and most simple form of the verb, is the verb without inflections, and unconnected with persons. This form usually has the prefix to; as to love.

This form of the verb, not being restricted to person or number, is usually called the Infinitive Mode.

2. Another use of the verb is to affirm, assert or declare some action or existence, either positively, as he runs, or negatively, as you are not in health. This form is called the Indicative Mode.

3. Another office of the verb is to command, direct, ask, or exhort; as arise, make haste, let us be content. This is called the Imperative Mode.

4. Another form of the verb is used to declare the power, liberty, possibility or necessity of acting or being, by means of certain words called auxiliaries, as may, can, must, &c. This form is called the Potential Mode; as, I may or can write; he must wait.

5. Another use of verbs is to represent actions or events which are uncertain, conditional or contingent; as, if he shall go; if they would attend. This is called the Subjunctive Mode, but would better be denominated the Conditional. The Indicative and Potential become conditional, by means of words used to express condition; as if, though, unless, whether.

The Modes then are five; the Infinitive, the Indicative, the Imperative, the Potential, and the Subjunctive.

It may also be observed that the combinations and arrangements of our verbs and auxiliaries to express negative and interrogative propositions, are really modes of the verb, and a place might be assigned to the verb for each purpose, were it not for the inconvenience of having modes of modes. For the sake of distinction, I denominate these verbs interrogative and negative, and have exhibited the conjugation of each.

Participles.

Participles are derivatives from verbs, formed by particular terminations, and having the sense of verbs, attributes or names.

There are two species of participles; one denoting present time, and formed by adding ing to the verb, as turn, turning, or when the verb ends with e, by dropping that letter and adding ing, as place, placing. But e is

* This mode is inserted in compliance with the opinions of many Grammarians, but in opposition to my own. It is in fact the indicative mode, affirming the power, &c. of acting, instead of the act itself.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

retained in dyeing from dye, to color, to distinguish it from dying, the participle of die; in which word, y is used to prevent the duplication of i. In singeing from singe, e is retained to soften g, and to distinguish the word from singing; so also in twingeing.

This participle of the present tense is used, as before observed, to form the definite tenses. But it often loses the sense of the verb, and becomes an attribute; as a loving friend, lasting friendship. In this use, it admits of comparison by more or less, most and least; as more lasting, less saving, most promising.

This participle also becomes an adverb or modifier by receiving the termination ly, as lovingly, laughingly; and this species of modifiers admits of comparison, as more lovingly, most charmingly.

This participle also becomes a name and admits of the definitive; as, "the burning of London in 1666." In this capacity, it takes the plural form; as, "the overflowings of the Nile;" "he seeth all his goings." And sometimes the plural is used when a modifier is attached to the participle; as, "the goings out, the comings in." Ezek. xliii. 11. But this use of the participle is not esteemed elegant, nor is it common.

In a few instances, the participle in ing becomes a name by receiving the termination ness; as willingness, from willing.

The other species of participle is formed from the verb, by adding d or ed, and in regular verbs, it corresponds exactly with the past time; as loved, preceded. This may be called the participle of the perfect tense.

This participle, when its verb is transitive, may be joined with the verb be, in all its inflections, to form a passive verb, and the participle, in such combination, is called passive.

But this participle, when formed from an intransitive verb, cannot, except in a few instances, be joined to the substantive verb, or used in a passive sense; but it unites with the other auxiliaries.

This participle often loses its verbal character, and becomes an attribute; as a concealed plot, a painted house. In this character it admits of comparison, as "a more admired artist," "a most respected magistrate;" and a few of these verbal attributes receive the termination ly, and become modifiers, as pointedly, more conceitedly, most dejectedly.

Those verbs, whose past tense and participle end in ed, are deemed regular. All which deviate from this rule, are deemed irregular, and their participles of the perfect tense end mostly in t, n and g. A list of them will be found in the sequel.

Auxiliaries.

In English, a few monosyllabic verbs are chiefly employed to form the modes and tenses of other verbs, and from this use, are denominated auxiliaries or helping verbs. These are followed by other verbs, without the prefix to, as "he may go;" though they were originally principal verbs, and some of them still retain that character, as well as that of auxiliaries.

The verbs which are always auxiliary to others, are may, can, shall, must; those which are sometimes auxiliaries, and sometimes principal verbs, are will, have, do and be. To these may be added need and dare.

May conveys the idea of liberty or permission; as, "he may go, if he will." Or it denotes possibility; as, "he may have written or not."

Can has the sense of to be able.

Shall, in its primitive sense, denotes to be obliged, coinciding nearly with ought; which sense it retains in the German. But this signification, though evidently the root of the present uses of this word, is much obscured. The following remarks will illustrate the several uses of will and shall.

Will has a common origin with the Latin volo. Hence the German wollen, the old English woll, and the present contraction won't, that is, woll-not.

This was originally a principal verb, and is still used as such in our language. It denotes the act of the mind in determining, or a determination; for he *will*s to go, and he will go, are radically of the same import.

* The primitive idea expressed by may was power; Sax. magan, to be able.

† It is supposed that the Roman v was pronounced as our w, volo.

When a man expresses his own determination of mind, I will, we are accustomed to consider the event, or act willed as certain; for we naturally connect the power to act, with the intention; hence we make the declaration of will a ground of confidence, and by an easy association of ideas, we connect the declaration, with an obligation to carry the determination into effect. Hence will expressed by a person himself, came to denote a promise.

But when a person declares the will of another, he is not supposed to possess the power to decide for him, and to carry his will into effect. He merely offers an opinion, grounded on information or probable circumstances, which give him more or less confidence of an event depending on another's will. Hence will in the second and third person simply foretells, or expresses an opinion of what will take place.

Shall, in some of its inflections, retains its primitive sense—to be obliged or bound in duty; but in many of its uses, its sense is much varied. In the first person, it merely foretells; as, "I shall go to New-York to-morrow." In this phrase, the word seems to have no reference to obligation; nor is it considered by a second person as imposing an obligation on the person uttering it. But when shall is used in the second and third persons, it resumes its primitive sense, or one nearly allied to it, implying obligation; as when a superior commands with authority, you shall go; or implying a right in the second and third person to expect, and hence denoting a promise in the speaker; as, "you shall receive your wages." This is radically saying, "you ought to receive your wages;" but this right in the second person to receive, implies an obligation in the person speaking to pay. Hence shall in the first person foretells; in the second, promises, commands, or expresses determination. When shall in the second and third persons, is uttered with emphasis, it expresses determination in the speaker, and implies an authority to enforce the act. "You shall go."

Must expresses necessity, and has no variation for person, number or tense.

Do is a principal and a transitive verb, signifying to act or make; but is used in the present or past tenses as an auxiliary to give emphasis to a declaration, to denote contrast, or to supply the place of the principal verb.

"It would have been impossible for Cicero to inflame the minds of the people to so high a pitch against oppression, considered in the abstract, as he actually did inflame them against Verres the oppressor." Camp. Rhet. I. 10. Here did expresses emphasis.

"It was hardly possible that he should not distinguish you as he has done." Cowp. Let. 40. Here done stands in the place of distinguished you. For it must be observed that when do is the substitute for another verb, it supplies the place not only of the verb, but of the object of the verb.

"He loves not plays

As thou dost, Anthony."

That is, as thou lovest plays.

Do is also used in negative and interrogative sentences; the present and past tenses of the Indicative Mode being chiefly formed by this auxiliary; as, "I do not reside in Boston." "Does John hold a commission?"

Have is also a principal and transitive verb, denoting to possess; but much used as an auxiliary, as "He has lately been to Hamburg." It is often used to supply the place of a principal verb, or participle, preventing a repetition of it, and the object after it; as, "I have not seen Paris, but my brother has," that is, has seen Paris.

Equally common and extensive is the use of be, denoting existence, and hence called the substantive verb. Either in the character of a principal verb, or an auxiliary, it is found in almost every sentence of the language.

The inflection of a verb, in all the modes, tenses, numbers and persons, is termed Conjugation. The English verbs have few inflections, or changes of termination; most of the tenses and modes being formed by means of the auxiliaries.

NOTE.—In the following conjugations, a small n in an Italic character, is inserted in the place where not should stand in negative sentences. The same place is generally occupied by never, but not in every case. It is believed this letter will be very useful, especially to foreigners. The learner may conjugate the verb with or without not, at pleasure.

* It may be remarked once for all, that thou and ye are the second person used in the sacred style, and sometimes in other grave discourses. In all other cases, you is the second person of the singular number, as well as of the plural. It is not one of the most trivial absurdities which the student must now encounter at every step, in the study of English grammar, that he meets with you in the plural number only, though he finds it the representative of an individual. Now if you is always plural, then you yourself is not grammatical, but absurd; the true expression then must be, you yourselves, applied to an individual. Then I must say to a friend, who visits me, please to seat yourselves, Sir. This is equal to the royal style, we ourselves."

Infinitive Mode. Participle.

To do. Doing, done, having done.

NOTE.—In the third person singular of the present tense, doth is used in sacred and solemn language; does in common and familiar language. This verb, when principal and transitive, has all the tenses and modes, I have done, I had done, I will do, &c.

HAVE.—Infinitive Mode, Present Tense.—To have.
Perfect Tense.—To have had.
Participle of the Present Tense.—Having.
Of the Perfect Tense.—Had.
Compound.—Having had.

NOTE.—In the foregoing tenses, this verb is used either as a principal verb or an auxiliary.

* Hath is used in the solemn style; has in the familiar.

Perfect Tense.
Singular.	Plural.
I have n had	We have n had
Thou hast n had	Ye have n had

Prior-past Tense.
I had n had	We had n had
Thou hadst n had	Ye had n had
You had n had	You had n had
He had n had	They had n had

NOTE.—In these tenses, the perfect and prior-past, this verb is always principal and transitive.

Future Tense.
In this tense the verb is principal or auxiliary, with the same form of conjugation.

The following form foretells.

I shall n have	We shall n have
Thou wilt n have	Ye will n have
You will n have	You will n have
He will n have	They will n have

The following form promises, commands or determines.

I will n have	We will n have
Thou shalt n have	Ye shall n have
You shall n have	You shall n have
He shall n have	They shall n have

Prior-Future.

This tense foretells, and is used only when the verb is principal.

I shall n have had	We shall n have had
Thou shalt or wilt n have had	Ye shall or will n have had
You shall or will n have had	You shall or will n have had
He shall or will n have had	They shall or will n have had NOTE.—Will is not used in the first person of this tense; it being incompatible with the nature of a promise. We cannot say, "I will have had possession a year, on the first of October next;" but I shall have had, is a common expression.

Imperative Mode.

Singular.	Plural.
Have n or have thou n	Have ye n, have you n
Have you n or do n you have	Don you have
Let me n have	Let us n have
Let him n have	Let them n have

NOTE.—A command, request or exhortation, must, in the nature of things, be addressed to the second person; nor can these phrases, let me have, let us have, be considered, in strictness, as the first person of this mode, nor let him have, as the third; but they answer to the first and third persons of this mode in other languages, and the mere naming of them is wholly immaterial.

The true force and effect of the verb, in this mode, depend on its application to characters, and the manner of utterance. Come, go, let him go, if uttered with a respectful address, or in a civil manner, may express entreaty, request or exhortation. On the other hand, such words uttered with a tone of authority, and addressed to inferiors, express command.

Potential Mode.—Present Tense.

In the following tense, this verb is either auxiliary or principal.

I may or can n have	We may or can n have
Thou mayest or canst n have	Ye may or can n have
You may or can n have	You may or can n have
He may or can n have	They may or can n have

NOTE.—Must is used in the foregoing tense, and in the perfect also.

Past Tense.
In this tense, the verb is principal or auxiliary.

I might n have	We might n have
I should n have	We should n have
I could n have	We could n have
I would n have	We would n have

Thou mightest n have	Ye might n have
Thou shouldst n have	Ye should n have
Thou couldst n have	Ye could n have
Thou wouldst n have	Ye would n have

You would n have	You would n have
He might n have	They might n have
He should n have	They should n have
He could n have	They could n have
He would n have	They would n have

Perfect Tense.
In this tense, have is a principal verb only.

I may n have had	We may n have had
Thou mayest n have had	Ye may n have had
You may n have had	You may n have had
He may n have had	They may n have had

Prior-past Tense.—the principal verb only.

I might n have had	We might n have had
Thou mightest n have had	Ye might n have had
You might n have had	You might n have had
He might n have had	They might n have had

In the same manner with should, could and would.

There is no future tense, distinct from that of the indicative mode.

Conditional or Subjunctive Mode.
The Conditional or Subjunctive Mode is the same as the Indicative, with some preceding word expressing condition, supposition or contingency. These words are, if, though or although, unless, except, whether, lest, albeit.

If is a corruption of gif, the imperative of gifan, the Saxon orthography of give. Though, the Saxon theah, signifies permit, allow. Although is a compound of all and though, give or allow all. The old word thof, still used in some parts of England, is the imperative of the Saxon thafian, to allow. Unless is the imperative of the Saxon on-lysan, to loose or dissolve. Except is the imperative of that verb. Lest is from lesan, to lease or dissolve. Albeit is a compound of all, be and it, let it be so.

These words, if, though, answer in signification and use, to the following: admit, grant, allow, suppose, as signs of a condition or hypothesis. "If you shall go," is simply, "give, you shall go;" that is, give that condition or fact; allow or suppose it to be so.

It has been, and is still customary for authors to omit the personal terminations of the second and third persons of the verb in the present tense, to form the subjunctive mode; if thou go, if he write.

The correct construction of the subjunctive mode is precisely the same as that of the indicative; as it is used in popular practice, which has preserved the true idiom of the language; if thou hast, if he has or hath; to denote present uncertainty. But a future contingency may be expressed by the omission of the personal terminations; if he go, that is, if he shall go.

Be.

Be is a verb denoting existence, and therefore called the substantive verb. It is very irregular, being derived from different radicals, and having undergone many dialectical changes.

Infinitive Mode, Present Tense.—To be.
Perfect Tense.—To have been.
Participle of the Present Tense.—Being.

The foregoing tenses express uncertainty, whether a fact exists or existed; or they admit the fact. The following form is used for the like purposes:

If I be { Thou be { We be { Ye be
You be { He be { They be

But this is more properly the form of the conditional future; that is, the verb without the sign of the future—if he be, for if he shall be.

The following is the form of expressing supposition or hypothesis, and may be called the

 The potential mode becomes conditional by means of the modifiers, if, though, unless, &c. prefixed to its tenses, without any variation from the foregoing inflections. This may, for distinction, be called the Conditional Potential.

Subjunctive Mode.—Present Tense.
If, though, unless, whether, suppose, admit, &c.
 I love n We love n
 { Thou lovest n { Ye love n
 You love n { You love n
 He loveth or loves n { They love n

Some authors omit the personal terminations in the second and third persons—if thou love, if he love. With this single variation, which I deem contrary to the principles of our language, the subjunctive mode differs not in the least from the indicative, and to form it the learner has only to prefix a sign of condition, as if, though, unless, &c. to the indicative, in its several tenses. With this exception, however, that in the future tense, the auxiliary may be and often is suppressed. Thus instead of

If I shall or will love We shall or will love
{ Thou shalt or will love { Ye shall or will love
{ You shall or will love { You shall or will love
He shall or will love They shall or will love

Authors write,
If, &c. I love We love
{ Thou love { Ye love
{ You love { You love
He love They love

This form is properly used, when shall or will may precede the verb, and when the verb is preceded by a command or admonition; as, "See that none render evil for evil to any man."

1 Thess. v. 15.
 In the subjunctive mode, there is a peculiarity in the tenses which should be noticed. When I say, if it rains, it is understood that I am uncertain of the fact, at the time of speaking. But when I say, "If it rained, we should be obliged to seek shelter," it is not understood that I am uncertain of the fact; on the contrary, it is understood that I am certain, it does not rain at the time of speaking. Or if I say, "if it did not rain, I would take a walk," I convey the idea that it does rain at the moment of speaking. This form of our tenses in the subjunctive mode has never been the subject of much notice, nor ever received its due explanation and arrangement. For this hypothetical verb is actually a present tense, or at least indefinite—it certainly does not belong to past time. It is further to be remarked, that a negative sentence always implies an affirmative—"if it did not rain," implies that it does rain. On the contrary, an affirmative sentence implies a negative—"if it did rain," implies that it does not.

In the past time, a similar distinction exists; for "if it rained yesterday," denotes uncertainty in the speaker's mind—but "if it had not rained yesterday," implies a certainty, that it did rain.

Indicative Mode.—Present Tense, indefinite.
 Love I n? Love we n?
 { Lovest thou n? { Love ye n?
 { Love you n? { Love you n?
 Loveth or loves he n? Love they n?
 Do I n love? Do we n love?
 { Dost thou n love? { Do ye n love?
 { Do you n love? { Do you n love?
 Does or doth he n love? Do they n love?

The foregoing form is but little used. The following is the usual mode of asking questions.

Definite.
 Am I n loving? Are we n loving?
 { Art thou n loving? { Are ye n loving?
 { Are you n loving? { Are you n loving?
 Is he n loving? Are they n loving?

Past Tense, indefinite.

 { Didst thou n love? { Did ye n love?
 { Did you n love? { Did you n love?
 Did he n love? Did they n love?

The other form of this tense, loved he? is seldom used.

Definite.
 Was I n loving? Were we n loving?
 { Wast thou n loving? { Were ye n loving?
 { Was or were you n loving? { Were you n loving?
 Was he n loving? Were they n loving?

Perfect Tense, indefinite.
 Have I n loved? Have we n loved?
 { Hast thou n loved? { Have ye n loved?
 { Have you n loved? { Have you n loved?
 Has or hath he n loved? Have they n loved?

Definite.
 Have I n been loving? Have we n been loving?
 { Hast thou n been loving? { Have ye n been loving?
 { Have you n been loving? { Have you n been loving?
 Has or hath he n been loving? Have they n been loving?

Prior-past, indefinite.
 Had I n loved? Had we n loved?
 { Hadst thou n loved? { Had ye n loved?
 { Had you n loved? { Had you n loved?
 Had he n loved? Had they n loved?

Definite.
 Had I n been loving? Had we n been loving?
 { Hadst thou n been loving? { Had ye n been loving?
 { Had you n been loving? { Had you n been loving?
 Had he n been loving? Had they n been loving?

Future Tense, indefinite.
 Shall I n love? Shall we n love?
 { Shalt or wilt thou n love? { Shall or will ye n love?
 { Shall or will you n love? { Shall or will you n love?
 Shall or will he n love? Shall or will they n love?

Definite.
 Shall I n be loving? Shall we n be loving?
 { Shalt or wilt thou n be loving? { Shall or will ye n be loving?
 { Shall or will you n be loving? { Shall or will you n be loving?

Prior-future, indefinite.
 Shall I n have loved? Shall we n have loved?
 { Shalt or wilt thou n have loved? { Shall or will ye n have loved?
 { Shall or will you n have loved? { Shall or will you n have loved?
 Shall or will he n have loved? Shall or will they n have loved?

The definite form of this tense is little used.

Will, in this tense, is not elegantly used in the first person.

The interrogative form is not used in the imperative mode; a command and a question being incompatible.

It is not necessary to exhibit this form of the verb in the potential mode. Let the learner be only instructed that in interrogative sentences, the nominative follows the verb when alone, or the first auxiliary when one or more are used; and the sign of negation not, (and generally never), immediately follows the nominative.

IRREGULAR VERBS.

All verbs whose past tense and perfect participle do not end in ed are deemed irregular. The number of these is about one hundred and seventy seven. They are of three kinds.

1. Those whose past tense, and participle of the perfect are the same as the present; as, beat, burst, cost, cut, hit, hurt, let, put, read, rent, rid, set, shed, shred, shut, slit, split, spread, thrust, sweat, wet. Wet has sometimes wetted; heat sometimes het; but the practice is not respectable. Light and quit have lit and quit in the past time and participle, but they are also regular.

2. Verbs whose past time and participle are alike, but different from the present; as, meet, met; sell, sold.

3. Verbs whose present and past tense and participle are all different; as, know, knew, known.

A few ending with ch, ck, x, p, ll, ess, though regular, suffer a contraction of ed into t; as, snatcht for snatched, checkt for checked, snapt for snapped, mixt for mixed, dwelt for dwelled, past for passed. Others have a digraph shortened; as, dream, dreamt; feel, felt; mean, meant; sleep, slept; deal, dealt. In a few, v is changed into f; as bereave, bereft; leave, left.

As some of the past tenses and participles are obsolete or obsolescent, it is deemed proper to set these in separate columns for the information of the student.

NOTE 1.—The old forms of the past tense, sang, spake, sprang, forgot, &c. are here placed among the obsolete words. They are entirely obsolete, in ordinary practice, whether popular or polite; and it seems advisable not to attempt to revive them. In addition to this reason for omitting them, there is one which is not generally understood. The sound of a in these and all other like cases, was originally the broad a or aw; which sound, in the Gothic and Saxon, as in the modern Scotch, corresponded nearly with o in spoke, swore. Spoke is therefore nearer to the original than spake, as we now pronounce the vowel a with its first or long sound, as in sake.

NOTE 2.—In the use of the past tense and participle of some of these verbs, there is a diversity of practice; some authors retaining those which others have rejected as obsolete. Many words which were in use in the days of Shakspeare and Lord Bacon are now wholly laid aside; others are used only in books; while others are obsolescent, being occasionally used; and a few of the old participles, having lost the verbal character, are used only as adjectives. Of the last mentioned species, are fraught, drunken, molten, beholden, shorn, clad, bounden, cloven. Holpen is entirely obsolete. Holden, mollen, gotten and forgotten, are nearly obsolete in common parlance. Wrought is evidently obsolescent. Stricken is used only in one phrase, stricken in age or years, which we learn from the bible; but in every other case, is inelegant and pedantic.

Bishop Lowth has attempted to revive the use of many of the obsolescent past tenses and participles, for which he has, and I think deservedly, incurred the severe animadversions of eminent critics. "Is it not surprising," says Campbell on Rhetoric, b. 2, ch. 2, "that one of Lowth's penetration should think a single person entitled to revive a form of inflection in a particular word, which had been rejected by all good writers of every denomination, for more than a hundred and fifty years." This writer declares what Lowth has advanced on the use of the past tense and participle, to be inconsistent with the very first principles of grammar. He observes justly that authority is every thing in language, and that this authority consists in reputable, national, present usage.

Independent of authority however, there are substantial reasons in the language itself for laying aside the participles ending with en, and for removing the differences between the past time and participle. In opposition to the opinion of Lowth, who regrets that our language has so few inflections, and maintains that we should preserve all we have, I think it capable of demonstration that the differences between the past time and participle of the past tense of our irregular verbs, is one of the greatest inconveniences in the language. If we used personal terminations to form our modes and tenses like the Greeks, it would be desirable that they should be carefully retained. But as we have no more than about half a dozen different terminations, and are therefore obliged to form our modes and tenses by means of auxiliaries, the combination of these forms a part of the business of learning the language, which is extremely difficult and perplexing to foreigners. Even the natives of Scotland and Ireland do not always surmount the difficulty. This difficulty is very much augmented by the difference between the past tense and the participle. To remove this difference, in words in which popular usage has given a lead, is to obviate, in a degree, this inconvenience. This is recommended by another circumstance—it will so far reduce our irregular verbs to an analogy with the regular, whose past tense and participle of the perfect are alike.

In a number of words, the dropping of n in the participle, will make a convenient distinction between the participle and the adjective; for in the latter, we always retain en—we always say, a written treatise, a spoken language, a hidden mystery—though the best authors write, a "mystery hid from ages;" "the language spoke in Bengal."

Besides, whenever we observe a tendency in a nation to contract words, we may be assured that the contraction is found to be convenient, and is therefore to be countenanced. Indeed if I mistake not, we are indebted to such contractions for many real improvements; as write from gewrite; slain from ofslegen; fastened from gefastnode; men from mannan; holy from haligan, &c. And as a general remark, we may be assured that no language ever suffers the loss of a useful word or syllable. If a word or syllable is ever laid aside in national practice, it must be because it is not wanted, or because it is harsh and inconvenient in use, and a word or syllable more consonant to the general taste of a nation or state of society, is substituted.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Such is the fact with our participles in en; the e being suppressed in pronunciation, we have the words spoken, written, holdn, in actual practice. Nothing can be more weak, inefficient and disagreeable than this nasal sound of the half vowel n; it is disagreeable in prose, feeble in verse, and in music, intolerable. Were it possible to banish every sound of this kind from the language, the change would be desirable. At any rate, when people in general have laid aside any of these sounds, writers, who value the beauties of language, should be the last to revive them.

Defective Verbs.

Verbs which want the past time or participle, are deemed defective. Of these we have very few. The auxiliaries may, can, will, shall, must, having no participle, belong to this class. Ought is used in the present and past tenses only, with the regular inflection of the second person only—I ought, thou oughtest, he ought, We, you, they ought. Quoth is wholly obsolete, except in poetry and burlesque. It has no inflection, and is used chiefly in the third person, with the nominative following it, quoth he.

Wit, to know, is obsolete, except in the infinitive, to introduce an explanation or enumeration of particulars; as, "There are seven persons, to wit, four men and three women." Wot and wist are entirely obsolete.

Adverbs or Modifiers.

Adverbs are a secondary part of speech. Their uses are to enlarge, restrain, limit, define, and in short, to modify the sense of other words.

Adverbs may be classed according to their several uses.

1. Those which qualify the actions expressed by verbs and participles; as, "a good man lives piously;" "a room is elegantly furnished." Here piously denotes the manner of living; elegantly denotes the manner of being furnished.

In this class may be ranked a number of other words, as when, soon, then, where, whence, hence, and many others, whose use is to modify verbs.

2. Another class of adverbs are words usually called prepositions, used with verbs to vary their signification; for which purpose they generally follow them in construction, as to fall on, give out, bear with, cast up; or they are prefixed and become a part of the word, as overcome, underlay. In these uses, these words modify or change the sense of the verb, and when prefixed, are united with the verb in orthography.

A few modifiers admit the terminations of comparison; as soon, sooner, soonest; often, oftener, oftenest. Most of those which end in ly, may be compared by more and most, less and least; as more justly, more excellently; less honestly, least criminally.

Prepositions.

Prepositions, so called from their being put before other words, serve to connect words and show the relation between them, or to show the condition of things. Thus a man of benevolence, denotes a man who possesses benevolence. Christ was crucified between two thieves. Receive the book from John and give it to Thomas.

The prepositions most common, are to, for, by, of, in, into, on, upon, among, between, betwixt, up, over, under, beneath, against, from, out, with, through, at, towards, before, behind, after, without, across.

We have a number of particles, which serve to vary or modify the words to which they are prefixed, and which are sometimes called inseparable prepositions, because they are never used, but as parts of other words. Such are a, be, con, mis, pre, re, sub, in abide, become, conjoin, mistake, prefix, return, subjoin, &c. These may be called prefixes.

Connectives or Conjunctions.

Connectives are words which unite words and sentences in construction, joining two or more simple sentences into one compound one, and continuing the sentence at the pleasure of the writer or speaker. They also begin sentences after a full period, manifesting some relation between sentences in the general tenor of discourse.

The connectives of most general use, are and, or, either, nor, neither, but, than. To which may be added because.

And is supposed to denote an addition; as, "The book is worth four shillings and sixpence." That is, it is worth four shillings, add sixpence, or with sixpence added. "John resides at New York, and Thomas, at Boston." That is, John resides at New York, add [and this which follows,] Thomas resides at Boston. From the great use of this connective in joining words of which the same thing is affirmed or predicated, it may be justly called the copulative by way of eminence.

The distinguishing use of the connective is to save the repetition of words; for this sentence, "John, Thomas and Peter reside at York," contains three simple sentences; "John resides at York;"—"Thomas resides at York;"—"Peter resides at York;" which are all combined into one, with a single verb and predicate, by means of the copulative.

Either and or have been already explained under the head of substitutes, for in strictness they are the representatives of sentences or words; but as or has totally lost that character, both these words will be here considered as connectives. Their use is to express an alternative, and I shall call them alternatives. Thus, "Either John or Henry will be at the Exchange." is an alternative sentence; the verb or predicate belonging to one or the other, but not to both; and whatever may be the number of names or propositions thus joined by or, the verb and predicate belong to one only.

One very common use of or, is to join to a word or sentence, something added by way of explanation or definition. Thus, "No disease of the mind can more fatally disable it from benevolence, than ill-humor or peevishness." Rambler, No. 74. Here peevishness is not intended as a distinct thing from ill-humor, but as another term for the same idea. In this case, or expresses only an alternative of words, and not of signification.

As either and or are affirmative of one or other of the particulars named, so neither and nor are negative of all the particulars. Thus, "For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor highth, nor depth, nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God." Rom. viii. 38, 39. Here neither is in fact a substitute for each of the following particulars, all of which it denies to be able to effect a certain purpose—not either of these which follow shall separate us from the love of God. It is laid down as a rule in our grammars, that nor must always answer to neither; but this is a great mistake, for the negation of neither, not either, extends to every one of the following alternatives. But nor is more generally used, and in many cases, as in the passage just recited, is far the most emphatical.

But is used for two Saxon words, originally by mistake, but now by established custom; bet or bote, the radical of our modern words better, boot, and denoting sufficiency, compensation, more, further, or something additional, by way of amendment; and buton or butan, equivalent to without or except.

In the former sense, we have the word in this sentence; "John resides at York, but Thomas resides at Bristol." The primitive sense here is, John resides at York; more, add or supply, Thomas resides at Bristol. It does not signify opposition, as is usually supposed, but some addition to the sense of what goes before.

In the latter sense, or that of butan, it is used in this passage, "He hath not grieved me, but in part." 2 Cor. ii. 5. That is, "He hath not grieved me, except in part." The first assertion is a complete negation; the word but, (butan), introduces an exception. "Nothing, but true religion, can give us peace in death." Here also is a complete negation, with a saving introduced by but. Nothing, except true religion.

These were the only primitive uses of but, until by means of a mistake, a third sense was added, which is that of only. Not knowing the origin and true meaning of but, authors omitted the negation in certain phrases where it was essential to a true construction; as in the following passages, "Our light affliction, which is but for a moment." 2 Cor. iv. "If they kill us, we shall but die." 2 Kings, vii.

The but, in these passages, is buton, be out, except; and according to the true original sense, not should precede, to give the sentence a negative turn. "Our light affliction is not, but (except) for a moment." "We shall not, but die." As they now stand, they would in strictness signify, Our light affliction is except for a moment—We can except die, which would not be sense. To correct the sense, and repair the breach made in the true English idiom, by this mistake, we must give but a new sense, equivalent to only. Thus we are obliged to patch and mend, to prevent the mischiefs of innovation.

The history of this word but should be, as Johnson expresses the idea, "a guide to reformers, and a terror to innovators." The first blunder or innovation blended two words of distinct meanings into one, in orthography and pronunciation. Then the sense and etymology being obscured, authors proceeded to a further change, and suppressed the negation, which was essential to the buton. We have now therefore one word with three different and unallied meanings; and to these may be reduced the whole of Johnson's eighteen definitions of but.

Let us however trace the mischief of this change a little further. As the word but is now used, a sentence may have the same meaning with or without the negation. For example: "he hath not grieved me, but in part," and "he hath grieved me, but in part," have, according to our present use of but, precisely the same meaning. Or compare different passages of scripture, as they now stand in our bibles.

He hath not grieved me, but in part.

Our light affliction is but for a moment.

This however is not all; for the innovation being directed neither by knowledge nor judgment, is not extended to all cases, and in a large proportion of phrases to which but belongs, it is used in its original sense with a preceding negation, especially with nothing and none. "There is none good, but one, that is God." Matt. xix. 17. This is correct—there is none good, except one, that is God. "He saw a fig-tree in the way, and found nothing thereon but leaves only." Matt. xxi. 19. This is also correct—"he found nothing, except leaves;" the only is redundant. "It amounts to no more but this." Locke, Und. b. 1. 2. This is a correct English phrase; "it amounts to no more, except this;" but it is nearly obsolete.

Hence the propriety of these phrases. "They could not, but be known before." Locke, 1. 2. "The reader may be, nay cannot choose but be very fallible in the understanding of it." Locke, 8. 9. Here but is used in its true sense. They could not, except this, be known before. That is, the contrary was not possible. The other phrase is frequently found in Shakespeare and other old writers, but is now obsolete. They cannot choose but, that is, they have no choice, power or alternative, except to be very fallible.

But is called in our grammars, a disjunctive conjunction, connecting sentences, but expressing opposition in the sense. To illustrate the use of this word which joins and disjoins at the same time, Lowth gives this example; "You and I rode to London, but Peter staid at home."—Here the Bishop supposed the but to express an opposition in the sense. But let but be omitted, and what difference will the omission make in the sense? "You and I rode to London, Peter staid at home." Is the opposition in the sense less clearly marked than when the conjunction is used? By no means. And the truth is, that the opposition in the sense, when there is any, is never expressed by the connective at all, but always by the following sentence or phrase. "They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but see not." Psalm cxv. 5. Let but be omitted. "They have mouths, they speak not; eyes have they, they see not." The omission of the connectives makes not the smallest alteration in the sense, so far as opposition or difference of idea in the members of the sentence is concerned. Indeed the Bishop is most unfortunate in the example selected to illustrate his rule; for the copulative and may be used for but, without the least alteration in the sense—"You and I rode to London, and Peter staid at home." In this sentence the opposition is as completely expressed as if but was used; which proves that the opposition in the sense has no dependence on the connective.

Nor is it true that an opposition in the sense always follows but. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God." Matt. iv. 4. Here the last clause expresses no opposition, but merely an additional fact. The true sense of but when used for bote, is supply, more, further, something additional, to complete the sense; it may be in opposition to what has preceded or in continuation only. In general, however, the word but is appropriately used before a clause of a sentence, intended to introduce a new and somewhat different idea, by way of modifying the sense of the preceding clause. This use is very naturally deduced from the original sense of the word, something further which is to make complete or qualify what has preceded.

Than is a connective of comparison; "John is taller than Peter."

Because is a mere compound of by and cause—by cause. "It is the case of some to contrive some false periods of business, because they may seem men of dispatch." Bacon on Dispatch. See also Apoth. 7. 6. This is a correct English idiom, Dr. Lowth's criticism to the contrary notwithstanding; but it is now obsolete.

Exclamations.

Exclamations are sounds uttered to express passions and emotions; usually those which are violent or sudden. They are called interjections, words thrown in between the parts of a sentence. But this is not always the fact, and the name is insignificant. The more appropriate name is, exclamations; as they are mere irregular sounds, uttered as passion dictates and not subject to rules.

A few of these sounds however become the customary modes of expressing particular passions and feelings in every nation. Thus in English, joy, surprise and grief are expressed by oh, uttered with a different tone and countenance. Alas expresses grief or great sorrow—pish, pshaw, express contempt. Sometimes verbs, names, and attributes are uttered by way of exclamation in a detached manner; as, Hail! Welcome! Bless me! Gracious heavens!

In two or three instances, exclamations are followed by names and substitutes in the nominative and objective; as, O thou, in the nominative; ah me, in the objective. Sometimes that follows O, expressing a wish; "O that the Lord would guide my ways." But in such cases, we may consider reish or some other verb to be understood.

Derivation.

However numerous may be the words in a language, the number of radical words is small. Most words are formed from others by addition of certain words or syllables, which were originally distinct words, but which have lost their distinct character, and are now used only in combination with other words. Thus er in lover, is a contraction of verer, a Saxon word denoting man, [the Latin vir]; ness denotes state or condition; ly is an abbreviation of like or liche; fy is from facio, to make, &c.

Most of the English derivatives fall under the following heads:—

1. Nouns formed from nouns, or more generally from verbs, by the addition of r, er or or, denoting an agent; as lover, hater, assignor, flatterer, from love, hate, assign, flatter. In a few instances, words thus formed are less regular; as glazier, from glass; courtier, from court; parishoner, from parish.
2. Nouns converted into verbs by the prefix to; as from water, cloud, to water, to cloud.
3. Adjectives converted into verbs in the same manner; as to lame, to cool, to warm, from lame, cool, warm.

4. Verbs formed from nouns and adjectives by the termination ize; as method, methodize; system, systemize; moral, moralize. When the primitive ends with a vowel, the consonant t is prefixed to the termination; as stigma, stigmatize.

5. Verbs formed from nouns and adjectives by the addition of en or n; as lengthen, widen, from length, wide.

6. Verbs formed by fy; as brutify, stratify, from brute, stratum.

7. Nouns formed from adjectives by ness; as goodness, from good; graciousness, from gracious.

8. Nouns formed by dom and ric, denoting jurisdiction; as kingdom, bishopric, from king and bishop. Dom and ric, are nouns denoting jurisdiction or territory.

9. Nouns formed by hood and ship, denoting state or condition; as manhood, lordship, from man, lord.

10. Nouns ending in ment and age, from the French, denoting state or act; as commandment, parentage, from command, parent.

11. Nouns in er, or and ee, used by way of opposition, the former denoting the agent, the latter the receiver or person to whom an act is performed; as assignor, assignee; indorser, indorsee.

12. Adjectives formed from nouns by the addition of y; as healthy, from health; pithy, from pith; or ly added to the noun; as stately, from state. Ly is a contraction of like.

13. Adjectives formed from nouns by the addition of ful; as hopeful, from hope.

14. Adjectives formed from nouns or verbs by ible or able; as payable, from pay; credible, from credit; compressible, from compress. Able denotes power or capacity.

15. Adjectives formed from nouns or adjectives by ish; as whitish, from white; blackish, from black; waggish, from wag.

16. Adjectives formed from nouns by less, noting destitution; as fatherless, from father.

17. Adjectives formed from nouns by ous; as famous, from fame; gracious, from grace.

18. Adjectives formed by adding some to nouns; as delightsome, from delight.

19. Adverbs formed from adjectives by ly; as sweetly, from sweet.

20. Nouns to express females formed by adding ess to the masculine gender; as heiress, from heir.

21. Nouns ending in ty, some directly from the Latin, others formed from adjectives; as responsibility, from responsible; contractility, from contractile; probity, from probitas.

22. Adjectives formed by adding al to nouns; as national, from nation.

23. Adjectives ending in ic, mostly from the Latin or French, but some of them by the addition of ic to a noun; as balsamic, from balsam; sulphuric, from sulphur.

24. Nouns formed by ate, to denote the union of substances in salts; as carbonate, in the chemical nomenclature, denotes carbonic acid combined with another body.

25. Nouns ending in ite, from other nouns, and denoting salts formed by the union of acids with other bodies; as sulphite, from sulphur.

26. Nouns ending in ret, formed from other nouns, and denoting a substance combined with an alkaline, earthy or metallic base; as sulphuret, carburet, from sulphur and carbon.

27. Nouns formed from other nouns by adding cy; as ensigncy, captaincy, from ensign, captain.

Words are also formed by prefixing certain syllables and words, some of them significant by themselves, others never used but in composition; as re, pre, con, mis, sub, super: and great numbers are formed by the union of two words; as bed-room, ink-stand, pen-knife.

Syntax.

Syntax teaches the rules to be observed in the construction of sentences.

A sentence is a number of words arranged in due order, and forming a complete affirmation or proposition. In philosophical language, a sentence consists of a subject and a predicate, connected by an affirmation. Thus, "God is omnipotent," a complete proposition or sentence, composed of God, the subject, omnipotent, the predicate or thing affirmed, connected by the verb is, which forms the affirmation.

The predicate is often included in the verb; as, "the sun shines."

A simple sentence then contains one subject and one personal verb, that is, the noun and the verb; and without these, no proposition can be formed.

A compound sentence consists of two or more simple sentences, joined by connectives. The divisions of a compound sentence may be called members or clauses.

Sentences are declaratory, as, I am writing, the wind blows—imperative, as, go, retire, be quiet—interrogative, as, where am I? who art thou?—or conditional, as, if he should arrive.

The rules for the due construction of sentences fall under three heads: First, concord or agreement—Second, government—Third, arrangement and punctuation.

In agreement, the name or noun is the controlling word, as it carries with it the verb, the substitute and the attribute. In government, the verb is the controlling word; but names and prepositions have their share of influence also.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Agreement or Concord.

RULE I.—A verb must agree with its nominative in number and person.

Examples.

In solemn style. "Thou hast loved righteousness." Heb. i. 9.
 "Thou shalt not steal." Commandment.
 "Art thou called, being a servant?" 1 Cor. vii. 21.
 "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified." 1 Cor. vi. 11.
 In familiar language. I write; John reads; Newton was the first of astronomers.

NOTE 1.—The nominative to a verb is found by young learners, by asking who or what does what is affirmed. "Eumenes, a young man of great abilities, inherited a large estate from his father. His father harassed with competitions, and perplexed with a multiplicity of business, recommended the quiet of a private station." Let the question be asked, who inherited a large estate? The answer is Eumenes, which is the nominative to the verb inherited. Who recommended the quiet of a private station? His father, which is therefore the nominative to the verb recommended.

NOTE 2.—Let the following rules be observed respecting the position of the nominative.

I. The nominative usually precedes the verb in declaratory phrases; as, "God created the world;" "the law is a rule of right." But the nominative may be separated from its verb, by a member of a period; as, "Liberty, say the fanatic favorers of popular power, can only be found in a democracy." Anarcharsis, ch. 62.

II. The nominative often follows an intransitive verb, for such a verb can have no object after it, and that position of the nominative creates no ambiguity; thus, "Above it stood the Seraphim." Is. vi. "Gradual sinks the breeze." Thomson.

III. When the verb is preceded by here, there, hence, thence, then, thus, yet, so, nor, neither, such, the same, herein, therein, wherein, and perhaps by some other words, the nominative may follow the verb, especially be; as, "here are five men;" "there was a man sent from God;" "hence arise wars;" "thence proceed our vicious habits;" "then came the scribes and pharisees;" "thus saith the Lord." "Yet required not I bread of the governor." Neh. v. 18. "So panteth my soul after thee, O Lord." Psal. xlii. "Neither hath this man sinned nor his parents." John ix. "Such were the facts;" "the same was the fact." "Herein consists the excellency of the English government." Blackstone's Comm. b. 1.

IV. When an emphatical attribute introduces a sentence, the nominative may follow the verb; as, "Great is the Lord, glorious are his works, and happy is the man who has an interest in his favor."

V. In certain phrases, which are conditional or hypothetical, the sign of the condition may be omitted, and the nominative placed after the auxiliary; as, "Did he but know my anxiety," for if he did but know—"Had I known the fact," for if I had known—"Would they consent," for if they would, &c.

VI. When the words whose, his, their, her, mine, your, &c. precede the verb with a governing word, the nominative may follow the verb; as, "Out of whose modifications have been made most complex modes." Locke, 2. 22. 10.

VII. In interrogative sentences, the nominative follows the verb when alone, or the first auxiliary; as, "Believest thou? Will he consent? Has he been promoted? The nominative also follows the verb in the imperative mode; as, go thou; "be ye warmed and filled." But after a single verb, the nominative is commonly omitted; as, arise, flee.

NOTE 3.—In poetry, the nominative is often omitted in interrogative sentences, in cases where in prose the omission would be improper; as, "Lives there who loves his pain." Milton. That is, lives there a man or person.

NOTE 4.—In the answer to a question, the whole sentence is usually omitted, except the name, which is the principal subject of the interrogation; as, "who made the chief discoveries concerning vapor? Black."

NOTE 5.—In poetry, the verb in certain phrases is omitted, chiefly such verbs as express an address or answer; as, "To whom the monarch"—that is, said or replied.

NOTE 6.—When a verb is placed between two nominatives in different numbers, it may agree with either, but generally is made to agree with the first, and this may be considered as preferable; as, "His meat was locusts and wild honey." "It [piracy] is the remains of the manners of ancient Greece." Anarch. ch. 36.

NOTE 7.—Verbs follow the connective than, without a nominative expressed; as, "Not that any thing occurs in consequence of our late loss, more afflictive than was to be expected." Life of Cowper, Let. 62.

"He felt himself addicted to philosophical speculations, with more ardor than consisted with the duties of a Roman and a senator." Murphy's Tacitus, 4. 57.

"All words that lead the mind to any other ideas, than are supposed really to exist in that thing." Locke, 2. 25.

These forms of expression seem to be elliptical; "more afflictive than that which was to be expected." That which or those which will generally supply the ellipsis.

NOTE 8.—We sometimes see a nominative introducing a sentence, the sense suddenly interrupted, and the nominative left without its intended verb; as, "The name of a procession; what a great mixture of independent ideas of persons, habits, tapers, orders, motions, sounds, does it contain," &c. Locke, 3. 5. 13. This form of expression is often very striking in animated discourse. The first words being the subject of the discourse and important, are made to usher in the sentence, to invite attention; and the mind of the speaker, in the fervor of animation, quitting the trammels of a formal arrangement, rushes forward to a description of the thing mentioned, and presents the more striking ideas in the form of exclamation.

RULE II.—A name, a nominative case, or a sentence, joined with a participle of the present tense, may stand in construction without a verb, forming the case absolute, or clause independent; as, "Jesus had conveyed himself away, a multitude being in that place." John v. 13. Here multitude, the noun, joined with being, stands without a verb.

"By memory we conceive heat or light, yellow or sweet, the object being removed." Locke, 2. 10.

"I have, notwithstanding this discouragement, attempted a dictionary of the English language." Johnson's Preface.

"Whatever substance begins to exist, it must, during its existence, necessarily be the same." Locke, 2. 27. 28.

"The penalty shall be fine and imprisonment, any law or custom to the contrary notwithstanding."

The latter phraseology is peculiar to the technical law style. In no other case, does notwithstanding follow the sentence. But this position makes no difference in the true construction, which is, "any law or custom to the contrary not opposing"—the real clause independent.

It is very common, when this participle agrees with a number of words, or a whole clause, to omit the whole except the participle; and in this use of notwithstanding, we have a striking proof of the value of abbreviations in language. For example: "Moses said, let no man leave of it till the morning. Notwithstanding, they hearkened not unto Moses." Ex. xvi. 19. 20. Here notwithstanding stands without the clause to which it belongs; to complete the sense in words, it would be necessary to repeat the whole preceding clause or the substance of it—"Moses said, let no man leave of it until the morning. Notwithstanding this command of Moses, or notwithstanding Moses said that which has been recited, they hearkened not unto Moses."

"Folly meets with success in this world; but it is true, notwithstanding, that it labors under disadvantages." Porteus, Lecture 13. This passage at length would read thus—"Folly meets with success in the world; but it is true, notwithstanding folly meets with success in the world, that it labors under disadvantages." By supplying what is really omitted, yet perfectly well understood, we learn the true construction; so that notwithstanding is a participle always agreeing with a word or clause, expressed or understood, and forming the independent clause, and by a customary ellipsis, it stands alone in the place of that clause.

Such is its general use in the translation of the Scriptures. In the following passage, the sentence is expressed—"Notwithstanding I have spoken unto you." Jer. xxxv. That is, "This fact, I have spoken unto you, not opposing or preventing." Or in other words, "In opposition to this fact."

It is also very common to use a substitute, this, that, which or what, for the whole sentence; as, "Bodies which have no taste, and no power of affecting the skin, may, notwithstanding this, [notwithstanding they have no taste, and no power to affect the skin,] act upon organs which are more delicate." Fourcroy, Translation.

I have included in hooks, the words for which this is a substitute.

"To account for the misery that men bring on themselves, notwithstanding that, they do all in earnest pursue happiness, we must consider how things come to be represented to our desires under deceitful appearances." Locke, 2. 21. 61.

Here that, a substitute, is used, and the sentence also for which it is a substitute. This is correct English, but it is usual to omit the substitute, when the sentence is expressed—"Notwithstanding they do all in earnest pursue happiness."

It is not uncommon to omit the participle of the present tense, when a participle of the perfect tense is employed. "The son of God, while clothed in flesh, was subject to all the frailties and inconveniences of human nature, sin excepted." Locke, 3. 9. That is, sin being excepted—the clause independent.

This omission is more frequent when the participle provided is used, than in any other case. "In the one case, provided the facts on which it is founded be sufficiently numerous, the conclusion is said to be morally certain." Campbell on Rhet. 1. 114. Here being is omitted, and the whole clause in italics is independent—"The facts on which it is founded are sufficiently numerous, that being provided, the conclusion is morally certain." Provided, in such cases, is equivalent to given, admitted or supposed.

"In mathematical reasoning, provided you are ascertained of the regular procedure of the mind, to affirm that the conclusion is false, implies a contradiction." Ibm. 184.

In this phrase, that may follow provided—provided that, you are ascertained, &c., as in the case of notwithstanding, before mentioned; that being a definitive substitute, pointing to the following sentence—that which follows being provided.*

It is not uncommon for authors to carry the practice of abridging discourse so far as to obscure the common regular construction. An instance frequently occurs in the omission both of the nominative and the participle in the case independent. For example: "Conscious of his own weight and importance, his conduct in parliament would be directed by nothing but the constitutional duty of a peer." Junius, Let. 19. Here is no noun expressed to which conscious can be referred. We are therefore to supply the necessary words, to complete the construction—"He being conscious"—forming the clause independent.

RULE III.—A sentence, a number of words, or a clause of a sentence may be the nominative to a verb, in which case the verb is always in the third person of the singular number; as, "All that is in a man's power in this case, is, only to observe what the ideas are which take their turns in the understanding." Locke 2. 14. Here the whole clause in italics is the nominative to is.

"To attack vices in the abstract, without touching persons, may be safe fighting indeed, but it is fighting with shadows." Pope, Let. 48.

"I deny that men's coming to the use of reason, is the time of their discovery."

"That any thing can exist without existing in space, is to my mind incomprehensible." Darwin, Zoon, sect. 14. Here the definitive substitute may be transferred to a place next before the verb—"Any thing can exist, without existing in space," that [whole proposition] is incomprehensible.

RULE IV.—The infinitive mode may be the nominative to a personal verb; as, "to see is desirable;" "to die is the inevitable lot of men." Sometimes an attribute is joined with the infinitive; as, "to be blind is calamitous." In this case the attribute has no name expressed to which it refers. The proposition is abstract, and applicable to any human being, but not applied to any.

RULE V.—In some cases the imperative verb is used without a definite nominative; as, "I will not take any thing that is thine—save only that which the young men have eaten." Gen. xiv. 23. 24.

"Israel burned none, save Hazor only." Josh. xi. 13.

"I would that all were such as I am, except these bonds." Acts xxvi. 29.

"Our ideas are movements of the nerves of sense, as of the optic nerve in recollecting visible ideas, suppose of a triangular piece of ivory."

Darwin, Zoon, sect. 39.

This use of certain verbs in the imperative is very frequent, and there is a peculiar felicity in being thus able to use a verb in its true sense and with its proper object, without specifying a nominative; for the verb is thus left applicable to the first, second or third person. I may save or except, or you may except, or we may suppose. If we examine these sentences, we shall be convinced of the propriety of the idiom; for the ideas require no application to any person whatever.

RULE VI.—When the same thing is affirmed or predicated of two or more subjects, in the singular number, the nominatives are joined by the copulative and, with a verb agreeing with them in the plural number; as, "John and Thomas and Peter reside at Oxford." In this sentence, residence at Oxford is a predicate common to three persons; and instead of three affirmations—John resides at Oxford, Thomas resides at Oxford, Peter resides at Oxford, the three names are joined by and, and one verb in the plural applied to the whole number.

"Reason and truth constitute intellectual gold, which defines destruction." Johnson. "Why are whiteness and coldness in snow?" Locke. "Your lot and mine, in this respect, have been very different." Coup. Let. 38.†

NOTE I.—The rule for the use of a plural verb with two or more names in the singular number, connected by and, is laid down by critics with too much positiveness and universality. On original principles, all the names, except the first, are in the objective case; for it is probable that and contains in it the verb add. "John and Thomas and Peter reside at York," on primitive principles must be thus resolved—"John, add Thomas, add Peter reside at York." But without resorting to first principles, which are now lost or obscured, the use of the singular verb may be justified by considering the verb to be understood after each name, and that which is expressed, agreeing only with the last; as, "Nor were the young fellows so wholly lost to a sense of right, as pride and conceit has since made them affect to be." Rambler, No. 97. That is, as pride has and as conceit has. "Their safety and welfare is most concerned." Spectator, No. 121. In our best authors the singular verb is frequent in such sentences.‡

What will the hypercritic say to this sentence, "Either sex and every age was engaged in the pursuits of industry." Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ch. 10.

* Provided that, says Johnson, is an adverbial expression, and we sometimes see provided numbered among the conjunctions, as its correspondent word is in French. What strange work has been made with Grammar!

† Is this last example an evidence that mine is in the possessive case!

‡ This was also a very common practice with the best Greek and Roman writers. Mens enim, et ratio, et consilium, in senibus est. Cicero, de Senec. ca. 19. "Sed etiam ipsius terræ vis ac natura delectat." Ibm. 15.

Is not the distributive effect of either and every, such as to demand a singular verb? So in the following: "The judicial and every other power is accountable to the legislative." Paley, Phil. 6. 8.

NOTE 2.—When names and substitutes belonging to different persons, are thus joined, the plural substitute must be of the first person in preference to the second and third, and of the second in preference to the third. I, you and he are represented by we; you and he, by you. Pope in one of his letters makes you or I to be represented by we or you. "Either you or I are not in love with the other." The sentence is an awkward one, and not to be imitated.

RULE VII.—When an affirmation or predicate refers to one subject only among a number, which are separately named in the singular number, the subjects are joined by the alternative or, or nor, with a verb, substitute and name in the singular number; as, "Either John or Peter was at the Exchange yesterday; but neither John nor Peter is there to day."

Errors.—"A circle or square are the same in idea." Locke, 2. 8.

"But whiteness or redness are not in the porphyry." Ibm.

"Neither of them [Tillotson and Temple,] are remarkable for precision." Blair.

Substitutes for sentences, whether they represent a single clause, or the parts of a compound sentence, are always in the singular number; as, "It is true indeed that many have neglected opportunities of raising themselves to honor and to wealth, and rejected the kindest offers of fortune." Rambler, No. 58. Here it and that refer to the clauses which follow—"It is true that, many have rejected the kindest offers," &c.

RULE VIII.—Collective or aggregate names, comprehending two or more individuals under a term in the singular number, have a verb or substitute to agree with them in the singular or plural; as, the council is or are unanimous; the company was or were collected; this people, or these people.

No precise rule can be given to direct, in every case, which number is to be used. Much regard is to be had to usage, and to the unity or plurality of idea. In general, modern practice inclines to the use of the plural verb and substitute; as may be seen in the daily use of clergy, nobility, court, council, commonalty, audience, enemy and the like.

"The clergy began to withdraw themselves from the temporal courts."

Blackstone's Comm. Introduction.

"Let us take a view of the principal incidents, attending the nobility, exclusive of their capacity as hereditary counselors of the crown."

Blackstone's Comm. 1. 12.

"The commonalty are divided into several degrees."

Ibm.

"The enemy were driven from their works."

Portuguese Asia, Mickle, 163.

"The chorus prepare resistance at his first approach—the chorus sings of the battle—the chorus entertains the stage." Johnson's Life of Milton.

"The nobility are the pillars to support the throne."

Blackstone's Comm. 1. 2.

Party and army, in customary language, are joined with a verb in the singular number. Constitution cannot be plural. Church may be singular or plural. Mankind is almost always plural.

The most common and palpable mistakes in the application of this rule, occur in the use of sort and kind, with a plural attribute—these sort, those kind. This fault infects the works of our best writers; but these words are strictly singular, and ought so to be used.

When a collective name is preceded by a definitive which clearly limits the sense of the word to an aggregate with an idea of unity, it requires a verb and substitute to agree with it in the singular number; as, a company of troops was detached; a troop of cavalry was raised; this people is become a great nation; that assembly was numerous; "a government established by that people."

Blackstone's Comm. 1. 2.

Yet our language seems to be averse to the use of it, as the substitute for names, even thus limited by a, this or that. "How long will this people provoke me, and how long will it be ere they will believe me for all the signs that I have shewed among them?" Num. xiv. 11. "Liberty should reach every individual of a people; as they all share one common nature." Spectator, No. 287. In these passages, it in the place of they, would not be relished by an English ear; nor is it ever used in similar cases.*

RULE IX.—When the nominative consists of several words, and the last of the names is in the plural number, the verb is commonly in the plural also; as, "A part of the exports consist of raw silk." "The number of oysters increase." Golds. Anim. Nat. vol. 4, ch. 3. "Of which seeming equality we have no other measure, but such as the train of our ideas have lodged in our memories." Locke, 2. 14. 21. "The greater part of philosophers have acknowledged the excellence of this government."

Anarch. vol. 5. 272.

RULE X.—Pronouns or substitutes must agree with the names they represent, in number, gender and person; as,

* The Romans used a greater latitude in joining plurals with collective names, than we can. "Magna pars in villis repleti cibo vinoque." Liv. 2. 26. Here is an attribute plural of the masculine gender, agreeing with a noun in the singular, of the feminine gender.

"Mine answer to them that do examine me is this." 1 Cor. ix. 13.
 "These are not the children of God." Rom. ix. 8.
 "Speak to the children of Israel and say to them, when ye come into the land whither I bring you." Numb. xv. 18.
 "This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and let us seize on his inheritance." Matt. xxi. 38.
 "Esther put on her royal apparel—she obtained favor in his sight—then the king said unto her." Esth. v.
 "A river went out of Eden to water the garden, and it was parted—" Gen. ii. 10.
 "The woman whom thou gavest to be with me." Gen. iii. 12.
 "Ignatius, who was bishop of Antioch, conversed with the apostles." Paley, Evid. sect. 3.
 "A letter, which is just received, gives us the news."
 "O thou who rulest in the heavens."
 Who and whom are exclusively the substitutes for persons; whose is of all genders, and as correctly applied to things as to persons.
 "The question whose solution I require." Dryden.
 "That forbidden fruit whose mortal taste." Milton.
 "A system whose imagined suns." Goldsmith.
 "These are the charming agonies of love, Whose miseries delight." Thomson.
 It, though neuter, is used as the substitute for infant or child; the distinction of sex in the first period of life being disregarded.
 Formerly which was used as a substitute for persons; as appears from old authors, and especially in the vulgar version of the scriptures—"mighty men which were of old." But this use of the word is entirely discarded. Which however represents persons, when a question is asked or discrimination intended; as, which of the men was it; I know not which person it was.
 Who is sometimes used as the substitute for things, but most unwarrantably. "The countries who—" Davenant on Rev. 2. 13. "The towns who—" Hume Contin. 11. ch. 10. "The faction or party who—" Equally faulty is the use of who and whom for brutes; "the birds who—"
 The use of it for a sentence, seems to have given rise to a very vague application of the word in phrases like this: How shall I contrive it to attend court? How fares it with you? But such phrases, whatever may have given rise to them, are used chiefly in familiar colloquial language, and are deemed inelegant in any other style.
 A more justifiable use of it is seen in this sentence: "But it is not this real essence that distinguishes them into species; it is men who range them into sorts." &c. Locke, 3. 6. 36.
 Here it is in the singular, though referring to men in the plural. The cause or origin of this, in our language as in others, may perhaps be found in the disposition of the mind to combine the particular agents employed in performing an act, into a single agent. The unity of the act or effect seems to predominate in idea, and control the grammatical construction of the substitute.
 RULE XI.—In compound sentences, a single substitute or relative, who, which or that, employed to introduce a new clause, is the nominative to the verb or verbs belonging to that clause, and to others connected with it; as, "The thirst after curiosities, which often draws contempt." Rambler, No. 83. "He who suffers not his faculties to lie torpid, has a chance of doing good." Ibn. "They that are after the flesh, do mind the things of the flesh." Rom. viii. 5. "Among those who are the most richly endowed by nature, and [are] accomplished by their own industry, how few are there whose virtues are not obscured by the ignorance, prejudice or envy of their beholders." Spect. No. 255.
 In a few instances, the substitute for a sentence or a clause, is introduced as the nominative to a verb, before the sentence or clause, which it represents; as, "There was therefore, which is all that we assert, a course of life pursued by them, different from that which they before led." Paley's Evid. ch. 1. Here which is the representative of the whole of the last part of the sentence, and its natural position is after that clause.
 The substitute what combines in itself the offices of two substitutes, which, if expressed, would be the nominatives to two verbs, each in distinct subsequent clauses; as, "Add to this, what, from its antiquity is but little known, has the recommendation of novelty." Hermes, pref. 19. Here what stands for that, which; and the two following verbs have no other nominative.
 This use of what is not very common. But what is very frequently used as the representative of two cases; one, the objective after a verb or preposition, and the other, the nominative to a subsequent verb. Examples:
 "I heard what was said." "He related what was seen."
 "We do not so constantly love what has done us good." Locke, 2. 20. 14.
 "Agreeable to what was afterwards directed." Black. Com. b. 2. ch. 3.
 "Agreeable to what hath been mentioned." Prideaux, p. 2, 6, 3.
 "There is something so overruling in whatever inspires us with awe." Burke on the Sublime, 304. In these sentences what includes an object after a verb or preposition, and a nominative to the following verb. "I have heard that, which was said."
 RULE XII.—When a new clause is introduced into a sentence, with two pronouns, or with one pronoun and a noun, one of them is the nominative to the verb, and the other is governed by the verb or a preposition in the objective case, or by a noun in the possessive; as, "Locke, whom there is no reason to suspect of favoring idleness, has advanced." Ramb. 89. Here reason is the nominative to is, and whom is governed by suspect.

 "Take thy only son Isaac, whom thou lovest." Gen. xxii. Here are two substitutes, one the nominative to the verb, and the other governed by it in the objective.
 "God is the sovereign of the universe, whose majesty ought to fill us with awe, to whom we owe all possible reverence, and whom we are bound to obey."
 It is not unusual to see in periods, a third clause introduced within a second, as a second is within the first, each with a distinct substitute for a nominative; as, "Those modifications of any simple idea, which, as has been said, I call simple modes, are distinct ideas." Locke, 2. 13.
 Involvement to this extent may be used with caution, without embarrassing a period; but beyond this, if ever used, it can hardly fail to occasion obscurity. Indeed the third member included in a second, must be very short, or it will perplex the reader.
 Substitutes are sometimes made to precede their principals: thus, "When a man declares in autumn, when he is eating them, or in spring when there are none, that he loves grapes—" Locke, 2. 20. But this arrangement is usually awkward and seldom allowable.
 RULE XIII.—When there are antecedents in different persons, to which a nominative substitute refers, the substitute and verb following may agree with either, though usage may sometimes offer a preference; as, "I am the Lord that make all things; that stretch forth the heavens alone; that spread abroad the earth," &c. Isa. xlv. Here I and Lord are of different persons, and that may agree with either. If it agrees with I, the verbs must be in the first person: "I am the Lord that make." If that agrees with Lord in the third person, the verb must be in the third person: "I am the Lord that maketh." But in all cases, the following verbs should all be of the same person.
 RULE XIV.—The definitive adjectives, this and that, the only attributes which are varied to express number, must agree in number with the names to which they refer; as, this city, that church; these cities, those churches.
 This and that are often used as substitutes for a name in the singular number, which is omitted, but the same name in the plural immediately follows after a connective; as in this example, "The mortality produced by this and other diseases." Life of Washington, 3. 6. That is, by this disease and other diseases. The sentence may be varied thus, by this disease and others; but the first form is the most common, and it occasions no obscurity.
 Other adjectives and participles, used as adjectives, are joined to the names which they qualify without inflection; as, a wise man, wise men; an amiable child, or amiable children; a received truth, or received truths; a shining character, or shining characters.
 Adjectives are often used as substitutes for the names of men and things which they describe by their qualities; as, few were present; the wise are respected; the bravest are not always victorious.
 In this character, adjectives take the plural form, and are qualified by other adjectives; as the goods of fortune, two finites or infinites, universals, generals, the chief good, a happy few. "The extraordinary great." Burke on the Sublime, 304. "The blue profound." Akenside.
 When nouns are joined by a copulative, an adjective preceding the first is applied to the others without being repeated; as, "From great luxury and licentiousness, converted to strict sobriety and frugality of manners." Enfield. Here great belongs to licentiousness as well as to luxury.
 RULE XV.—Adjectives are usually placed before the nouns to which they belong; as, a wise prince; an obedient subject; a pious clergyman; a brave soldier.
 Exception 1. When some word or words are dependent on an adjective, it follows the noun; as, knowledge requisite for a statesman; furniture convenient for a family.
 Exception 2. When an adjective becomes a title, or is emphatically applied to a noun, it follows it; as Charles the Great; Henry the First; Lewis the Great; Wisdom incomprehensible.
 Exception 3. Several adjectives belonging to the same noun, may precede or follow the noun to which they belong; as a learned, wise and martial prince, or a prince learned, wise and martial.
 Exception 4. The verb be often separates the noun from its adjective; as, war is expensive; gaming is ruinous.
 Exception 5. An emphatical adjective is often used to introduce a sentence, in which case it precedes the noun which it qualifies, and sometimes at a considerable distance; as, "Great is the Lord;" "auspicious will be that event; fortunate is that young man who escapes the snares of vice."
 Exception 6. The adjective all may be separated from its noun by the, which never precedes it in construction; as, "all the nations of Europe." Such and many are separated from nouns by a; as, "such a character is rare;" "many a time."
 All adjectives are separated from nouns by a, when preceded by so and as, as "so rich a dress," "as splendid a retinue;" and they are separated by a or the, when preceded by how and however, as "how distinguished an act of bravery," "how brilliant the prize," "however just the complaint."

The word soever may be interposed between the adjective and the noun; as, "how clear soever this idea of infinity;" "how remote soever it may seem."

Double is separated from its noun by the; as "double the distance"—the in such cases, never preceding double. But a precedes double, as well as other adjectives.

All and singular or every precede the before the noun in these phrases—"All and singular the articles, clauses and conditions"—"All and every of the articles"—phrases of the law style.

RULE XVI.—Adjectives belong to verbs in the infinitive mode; as, "to see is pleasant;" "to ride is more agreeable than to walk;" "to calumniate is detestable."

Sometimes the adjective belongs to the infinitive in union with another adjective or a noun; as, "to be blind is unfortunate;" "to be a coward is disgraceful." Here the attribute unfortunate is the attributive of the first clause, to be blind, &c.

RULE XVII.—Adjectives belong to sentences, or whole propositions. Examples:

"Agreeable to this, we read of names being blotted out of God's Book."
Burder's Oriental Customs, 375.

What is agreeable to this? The answer is found in the whole of the last clause of the sentence.

"Antiochus—to verify the character prophetically given of him by Daniel, acted the part of a vile and most detestable person, agreeable to what hath been aforementioned of him."
Prideaux, part 2. b. 3.

"Her majesty signified her pleasure to the admiral, that as soon as he had left a squadron for Dunkirk, agreeable to what he had proposed, he should proceed with the fleet."
Burchet's Nav. Hist. 439.

"Independent of his person, his nobility, his dignity, his relations and friends may be urged," &c.
Guthrie's Quintilian.

"No body can doubt but that these ideas of mixed modes are made by a voluntary collection of ideas put together in the mind, independent from any original patterns in nature."
Locke, 3. 5.

"Whereupon God was provoked to anger, and put them in mind how, contrary to his directions, they had spared the Canaanites."
Whiston's Josephus, b. 5. ch. 2.

"Greece, which had submitted to the arms, in her turn, subdued the understandings of the Romans, and contrary to that which in these cases commonly happens, the conquerors adopted the opinions and manners of the conquered."
Enfield, Hist. Phil. b. 3. 1.

"This letter of Pope Innocent enjoined the payment of tithes to the parsons of the respective parishes, where any man inhabited, agreeable to what was afterwards directed by the same Pope in other countries."
Blackstone's Comm. b. 2. ch. 3.

"Agreeable to this, we find some of the Anglo-Saxon ladies were admitted into their most august assemblies."
Henry, Hist. Brit. b. 2. ch. 7. and b. 4. ch. 1. sect. 4.

"As all language is composed of significant words variously combined, a knowledge of them is necessary, previous to our acquiring an adequate idea of language."
Encyc. art. Grammar.

"His empire could not be established, previous to the institution of pretentious societies."
Smellie, Phil. Nat. Hist. 339.

"Suitable to this, we find that men, speaking of mixed modes, seldom imagine, &c."
Locke, 3. 5. 11.

"No such original convention of the people was ever actually held, antecedent to the existence of civil government in that country."
Paley, Phil. b. 6. ch. 8.

NOTE.—Writers and critics, misapprehending the true construction of these and similar sentences, have supposed the attribute to belong to the verb, denoting the manner of action. But a little attention to the sense of such passages will be sufficient to detect the mistake. For instance, in the example from Enfield, the attribute contrary cannot qualify the verb adopted; for the conquerors did not adopt the opinions of the conquered in a manner contrary to what usually happens—the manner of the act is not the thing affirmed, nor does it come into consideration. The sense is this, the fact, that the conquerors adopted the opinions and manners of the conquered, was contrary to what commonly happens in like cases. The attribute belongs to the whole sentence or proposition. The same explanation is applicable to every similar sentence.

In consequence of not attending to this construction, our hypercritics, who are very apt to distrust popular practice, and substitute their own rules for customary idioms founded on common sense, have condemned this use of the attribute; and authors, suffering themselves to be led astray by these rules, often use an adverb in the place of an adjective.

"The greater part of philosophers have acknowledged the excellence of this government, which they have considered, some relatively to society, and others as it has relation to the general system of nature."
Anarch, ch. 62.

"The perceptions are exalted into a source of exquisite pleasure independently of every particular relation of interest."
Studies of Nature, 12.

In the first of these examples, relatively is used very awkwardly for as relative, or as relating, or as it relates, or in relation; for the word has a direct reference to government.

In the second example, independently is used as if it had been intended to modify the verb exalt—the perceptions are independently exalted. But the manner of exalting is not the thing described. It is not that the perceptions are exalted in an independent manner, nor in a manner independent of a relation to interest; but the fact, that the perceptions are exalted into a source of exquisite pleasure, is independent of every relation of interest. Equally faulty is the following sentence:—

"Agreeably to this law, children are bound to support their parents."
Paley, Phil.

RULE XVIII.—Adjectives are used to modify the action of verbs, and to express the qualities of things in connection with the action by which they are produced. Examples:

"Open thine hand wide."
Deut. xv. 8.

We observe in this passage, that wide, the attribute of hand, has a connection with the verb open; for it is not "open thy wide hand," but the attribute is supposed to be the effect of the act of opening. Nor can the modifier, widely, be used; for it is not simply the manner of the act which is intended, but the effect.

"Let us write slow and exact."
Guthrie's Quintilian, 2. 375.

We might perhaps substitute slowly for slow, as describing only the manner of writing; but exactly cannot be substituted for exact, for this word is intended to denote the effect of writing, in the correctness of what is written. The adjective expresses the idea with a happy precision and brevity.

As this is one of the most common, as well as most beautiful idioms of our language, which has hitherto escaped due observation, the following authorities are subjoined to illustrate and justify the rule.

"We could hear distinctly the bells—which sounded sweetly soft and pensive."
Chandler's Travels, ch. 2.

"A southerly wind succeeded blowing fresh."
Ibm. vol. 2. 3.

"His provisions were grown very short."
Burchet's Nav. Hist. 357.

"When the caloric exists ready combined with the water of solution."
Lavoisier, Trans. ch. 5.

"The purest clay is that which burns white."
Encyc. art. Chemistry.

"Bray, to pound or grind small."
Johnson's Dict.

"When death lays waste thy house."
Beattie's Minst.

"All which looks very little like the steady hand of nature."
Paley, Phil. ch. 5.

"Magnesia feels smooth; calcareous earths feel dry; lithomarga feels very greasy or at least smooth, yet some feels dry and rusty."
Kirwan, vol. 1. 12. 189.

"By this substance, crystals and glasses are colored blue."
Chaptal, Trans. 299.

"There is an apple described in Bradley's work, which is said to have one side of it a sweet fruit, which boils soft, and the other side a sour fruit, which boils hard."
Darwin, Phytol. 105.

"Drink deep or taste not the Pierian spring."
Pope.

"Heaven opened wide her ever during gates."
Milton, P. L. 7.

"The victory of the ministry cost them dear."
Hume, Contin. 11. 9.

"And just as short of reason he must fall."
Pope.

"Thick and more thick the steely circle grows."
Hoole's Tasso, b. 8.

"Ancus marched strait to Fidenæ."
Hooke, Rom. Hist. 1. 6.

"The cakes eat short and crisp."
Vicar of Wakefield.

"A steep ascent of steps which were cut close and deep into the rock."
Hampton's Polybius, 2. 265.

"It makes the plow go deep or shallow."
Encyc. art. Agriculture.

"The king's ships were getting ready."
Lusiad, l. 91.

"After growing old in attendance."
Spect. No. 282.

"The sun shineth watery."
Bacon, Apoph.

"Soft sighed the flute."
Thomson, Spring.

"I made him just and right."
Milton, 3. 98.

"He drew not nigh unheard."
Ibm. 645.

"When the vowel of the preceding syllable is pronounced short."
Murray's Grammar.

"Here grass is cut close and gravel rolled smooth. Is not that trim?"
Boswell, Johnson, 3.

"Slow tolls the village clock—deep mourns the turtle."
Beattie's Minstrel.

"If you would try to live independent."
Pope, Let.

"He obliged the Nile to run bloody for your sakes."
Whiston's Josephus, 3. 5.

"Correct the heart and all will go right."
Porteus, Lect. 3.

The poets sometimes use adjectives in this manner, when modifiers would express the idea. Sometimes they are induced to it by the measure, and not unfrequently by the obvious superiority of the adjective in expressing the idea with force and precision.

* "Cruentam etiam fluxisse aquam Albanam, quidam auctores erant."
Liv. lib. 27. 11. Some authors related that the Alban river ran bloody.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

When two qualifying words are wanted, the latter may be an adjective, though applied to a verb; as, "He beat time tolerably exact."

Goldsmith, An. Nat. ch. 12.

"The air will be found diminished in weight exactly equal to what the iron has gained."

Lavoisier, ch. 3.

"Horses are sold extremely dear."

Goldsmith.

"And greatly independent lived."

Thomson, Spring.

"This was applying a just principle very ill."

Vattel, Trans. 2. 7.

It will be remarked that we have no adverbial form of the adjective in the comparative and superlative degrees, except that of more and most, less and least, prefixed. But we use the adjectives with the regular terminations, in these degrees, to qualify verbs. Examples:

"To hands that longer shall the weapon wield."

Hoole's Tasso. 7.

"Then the pleasing force

Of nature and her kind parental care,

Worthier I'd sing."

Akenside, Pleas. of Imag. 1. 323.

"So while we taste the fragrance of the rose,

Glow not her blush the fairer?"

Ibm. 2. 77.

"When we know our strength, we shall the better know what to undertake with hopes of success."

Locke, 1. 6.

"And he that can most inform or best understand him, will certainly be welcomed."

Rambler, No. 99.

"How much nearer he approaches to his end."

"I have dwelt the longer on the discussion of this point."

Junius, Let. 17.

"The next contains a spirited command and should be pronounced much higher."

*Murray's Grammar.

"Leviathan, which God of all his works Created hugest that swim th' ocean's stream."

Milton, 1. 201.

"But mercy first and last shall brightest shine."

Ibm. 3. 134.

"Such opinions as seemed to approach nearest [to] the truth."

Enfield, Hist. Phil. 2. 59.

"Her smiles, amid the blushes, lovelier show;

Amid her smiles, her blushes lovelier glow."

Hoole's Tasso. b. 15.

Authors, misguided by Latin rules, and conceiving that every word which is used to qualify a verb, must be an adverb, have pronounced many of the passages here recited and similar ones to be incorrect; and in such as are too well established to bear censure, they call the adjective an adverb. Were it not for this influence in early education, which impresses a notion that all languages must be formed with the like idioms, we should never have received an idea that the same word may not modify a noun, an adjective and a verb.

So far are the words here used from being adverbs, that they cannot be changed into adverbs, without impairing the beauty, weakening the force, or destroying the meaning of the passages. Let the sentences be put to the test—Magnesia feels smoothly—the cakes eat shortly and crisply—the apples boil softly or hardly—glows not her blush the more fairly. Every English ear rejects this alteration at once; the sentences become nonsense. Nor can the adjective be separated from the verb—"Amid her smiles, her blushes, being lovelier, glow"—this is not the sense; nor will it answer to say, "Her lovelier blushes glow"—this is not the idea. The sense is, that the attribute expressed by lovelier, is not only a quality of blushes, but a quality derived, in a degree, from the action of the verb, glow.

Thus, clay burns white—objects may be seen double—may rise high—fall low—grow strait, or thick, or thin, or fat, or lean—one may speak loud—the sun shines clear—the finer a substance is pulverized—to grow wiser, to plunge deeper, spread wider—and similar expressions without number, constitute a well established idiom, as common as it is elegant.

RULE XIX—Some adjectives are used to modify the sense of others and of participles; as, a very clear day; red hot iron; a more or most excellent character; more pressing necessity; most grating sound. "Without coming any nearer." Locke. "A closer grained wood." Lavoisier, Trans.

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene."

Gray.

"Some deem'd him wondrous wise."

Beattie's Minstrel.

In these expressions the last attribute belongs more immediately to the noun expressing its quality; and the first attribute qualifies the second.

Not unfrequently two attributes are used to modify a third, or the principal one; as, "The manner in which external force acts upon the body is very little subject to the will."

Rambler, No. 78.

RULE XX—Adjectives are used to qualify the sense of adverbs; as, a city was very bravely defended; the soldiers were most amply rewarded; a donation more beneficially bestowed; a house less elegantly furnished; a man the least peaceably disposed.

We have a few other words which are often used to modify adjectives as well as verbs; as, a little; a great deal; a trifle. "Many letters from persons of the best sense—do not a little encourage me." Spectator, 124. "It is a great deal better;" a trifle stronger; the last of which expressions is colloquial.

RULE XXI—The adjectives each, every, either and neither, have verbs and substitutes agreeing with them in the singular number; as,

"Each one was a head of the house of his fathers."

Josh. xxii. 14.

"Every one that findeth me, shall slay me."

Gen. iv. 14.

"And take every man his censer."

Num. xvi. 17.

"Nadab and Abihu took either of them his censer."

Lev. x. 1.

"Neither of the ways of separation, real or mental, is compatible to pure space."

Locke, 2. 13.

Errors. "Let each esteem others better than themselves." It ought to be himself.

"There are bodies, each of which are so small." Locke, 2. 8. It ought to be is.

NOTE—A plural verb, which affirms something of a number of particulars, is often followed by a distributive which assigns the affirmation to the particular objects or individuals. Thus, "If metals have, each a peculiar earth." Hence we may consider each as the nominative to has understood—"If metals have, if each metal has a peculiar earth." There is no other way of resolving the phrase. This manner of expression is common, though quite useless; as the last clause, "if each metal has," is sufficient. It has not the merit of an abbreviation. This phrase, "Let us love one another," is of a similar construction, but it is not easy to find a substitute of equal brevity.

RULE XXII—Nouns of measure or dimension stand without a governing word, followed by an adjective; as, "a wall seven feet high and two feet thick;" "a carpet six yards wide;" "a line sixty fathoms long;" "a kingdom five hundred miles square;" "water ten feet deep."

"An army forty thousand strong," is a similar phrase.

NOTE—Double comparatives and superlatives, most straitest, most highest, being improper and useless, are not to be used. The few which were formerly used are obsolete. Worse, a mistake in spelling wyrsa, is obsolete; but lesser, a mistake for lessa, is still used, as well as its abbreviation, less.

The superlative form of certain attributes, which in the positive degree, contain the utmost degree of the quality, as extremest, chiefest, is improper and obsolete. But authors indulge in a most unwarrantable license of annexing comparison to attributes whose negative sense precludes increase or diminution; as in these sentences, "These are more formidable and more impassable than the mountains." Goldsmith, An. Nat. ch. 2. "This difficulty was rendered still more insurmountable by the licentious spirit of our young men." Murphy, Tacit. Orat. 35. "The contradictions of impiety are still more incomprehensible." Massillon, Sermon to the Great.

Similar to these are numerous expressions found in good authors—more impossible, more indispensable, less universal, more uncontrollable; and others, in which the sign of comparison is not only improper, but rather enfeebles the epithet; for the word itself expressing the full extent of the idea, ought to bear some emphasis, which, if a qualifying word is prefixed, will naturally be transferred to that word.

In a few instances, this usage seems to be too well established to be altered, and particularly in the use of more and most, less and least perfect. In general, it would indicate more precision of thought to apply a term of diminution to the affirmative attribute less possible, less surmountable, less controllable, rather than a term of increase to a negative attribute.

NOTE 2—In English, two nouns are frequently united to form a new noun; as earth-worm, drill-plow, ink-stand, book-case. In some cases, these compounds are by custom effectually blended into one term; in other cases, they are separated into their component parts by a hyphen. In other cases, words are united, and the first term forms a sort of occasional adjective to the second; as family-use, or family-consumption.

NOTE 3—From a disposition to abridge the number of words in discourse, we find many expressions which are not reducible to any precise rule, formed at first by accident or ellipsis. Such are, at first, at last, at best, at worst, at most, at least, at farthest, at the utmost. In these expressions there may have been an ellipsis of some noun; but they are well established, brief and significant, and may be numbered among the pinions of Mercury.

NOTE 4—We have certain adjectives which follow a verb and a noun to which they belong, but never precede the noun. Such are, adry, afraid, alone, alike, aware, akin, alive, asleep, awake, athirst, aloft, aghast, afoot, askew, ashamed, pursuant, plenty, worth; to which may be added, amiss, aground, ashore, aside, and a few others which may be used as attributes or modifiers. We say, one is adry, ashamed, alive or awake; but never an adry person, an ashamed child, &c. We say, "A proclamation was issued pursuant to advice of council." But we can in no case place pursuant before a noun.

* In remarking upon such phrases as "The vices which enter deeper or deepest into the soul," Murray says, deeper and deepest, should be more deeply, most deeply. Change the attribute in the two passages I have cited—"The vowel of the preceding syllable is pronounced shortly!"—"The next should be pronounced much more highly!" This alteration will put his rule to the test.

* This effect may proceed also from another consideration. If the adjective alone is used, its sense precludes the idea of increase or diminution—it expresses all that can be expressed. But admit comparison, and it ceases to express the utmost extent of the quality.

GRAMMAR OF THE

Worth not only follows the noun which it qualifies, but is followed by a noun denoting price or value; as, a book worth a dollar or a guinea; it is well worth the money. "It is worth observation." Beloe's Herodotus, Erato. 98. If a substitute is used after worth, it must be in the objective case. It is worth them or it.

But worthy, the derivative of worth, follows the usual construction of adjectives, and may precede the noun it qualifies; as, a worthy man.

Regimen or Government.

RULE XXIII.—One noun signifying the same thing with another, or descriptive of it, may be in apposition to it; that is, may stand in a like character or case, without an intervening verb; as, Paul, the apostle; John, the baptist; Newton, the philosopher; Chatham, the orator and statesman.

NOTE 1.—In the following sentence, a noun in the plural stands in apposition to two nouns in the singular, joined by an alternative. "The terms of our law will hardly find words that answer them in the Spanish or Italian, no scanty languages." Locke. 3. 5. 8.

NOTE 2.—Nouns are not unfrequently set in apposition to sentences; as, "Whereby if a man had a positive idea of infinite, either duration or space, he could add two infinites together; nay, make one infinite infinitely bigger than another: absurdities too gross to be confuted." Locke, 2. 17. 20. Here the absurdities are the whole preceding propositions.

"You are too humane and considerate; things few people can be charged with." Pope Let. Here things is in opposition to humane and considerate. Such a construction may be justified, when the ideas are correct, but it is not very common.

"The Dutch were formerly in possession of the coasting trade and freight of almost all other trading nations; they were also the bankers for all Europe: advantages by which they have gained immense sums." Zimmerman's Survey, 170. Here advantages is put in apposition to the two first members of the sentence.

RULE XXIV.—When two nouns are used, one denoting the possessor, the other the thing possessed, the name of the possessor precedes the other in the possessive case; as, "In my Father's house are many mansions." Men's bravery; England's fleet; a Christian's hope; Washington's prudence.

NOTE 1.—When the thing possessed is obvious, it is usual to omit the noun; as, "Let us go to St. Paul's," that is, church; "He is at the President's," that is, house.

"Nor think a lover's are but fancied woes." Couper.

That is, a lover's woes. "Whose book is this? William's."

NOTE 2.—When the possessor is described by two or more nouns, the sign of the possessive is generally annexed to the last; as, "Edward, the second of England's Queen." Bacon on Empire.

"In Edward the third's time." Blackstone's Comm. b 1, ch. 2.

"John the Baptist's head." Matt. xiv.

"A member of parliament's paying court to his constituents." Burke.

But if the thing possessed is represented as belonging to a number severally specified, the sign of the possessive is repeated with each; as, "He has the surgeon's and the physician's advice." "It was my father's, mother's, and uncle's opinion."

NOTE 3.—When of is used before the possessive case of nouns, there is a double possessive, the thing possessed not being repeated; as, "Vital air was a discovery of Priestley's." "Combustion, as now understood, was a discovery of Lavoisier's." The sense of which is, that vital air was one of the discoveries of Priestley. This idiom prevents the repetition of the same word.

NOTE 4.—The possessive may be supplied by of, before the name of the possessor; as, "the hope of a christian." But of does not always denote possession; it denotes also consisting of, or in, concerning, &c. and in these cases, its place cannot be supplied by the possessive case. Thus cloth of wool, cannot be converted into wool's cloth; nor a cup of water, into water's cup; nor an idea of an angel, into an angel's idea; nor the house of Lords, into the Lord's house.

RULE XXV.—Participles are often used for nouns, and have the like effect in governing them in the possessive case; as, "A courier arrived from Madrid, with an account of his Catholic majesty's having agreed to the neutrality." "In case of his Catholic majesty's dying without issue." "Averse to the nation's involving itself in another war." Hume, Contin. vol. 7, b. 2, ch. 1. "Who can have no notion of the same person's possessing different accomplishments." Spectator, No. 150.

This is the true idiom of the language; yet the omission of the sign of the possessive is a common fault among modern writers, who learn the language by grammar, and neglect usages which are much better authority, and the basis of correct grammar. "Pieces of iron arranged in such a way as seemed most favorable for the combustion being communicated to every part." Lavoisier, Trans.

* The contrary rule in Murray is egregiously wrong; as exemplified in this phrase, "This was my father, mother and uncle's advice." This is not English. When we say, "the king of England's throne," the three words, king of England, are one noun in effect, and can have but one sign of the possessive. But when two or three distinct nouns are used, the article possessed is described as belonging to each. "It was my father's advice, my mother's advice, and my uncle's advice." We can omit advice after the two first, but by no means, the sign of the possessive.

"There is no reason for hydrogen being an exception." Ibm. These expressions are not English.

RULE XXVI.—Transitive verbs and their participles require the objective case or the object of action to follow them; as, "In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth."

"If ye love me, keep my commandments." "O righteous father, the world hath not known thee."

Sometimes the object and often the objective case of substitutes precedes the governing verb; as, "The spirit of truth, whom the world cannot receive." "Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you."

Whom and which, when in the objective case, always precede the verb. In verse, a greater license of transposition is used, than in prose, and nouns are often placed before the governing verb.

"But through the heart

Should jealousy its venom once diffuse." Thomson.

"She with whatsoever arms his aid implores." Ibm.

A noun with whatsoever, whatsoever or whichever, preceding, is placed before the governing verb; as, "whatsoever positive ideas we have." Locke, 2. 17.

NOTE 1.—We have some verbs which govern two words in the objective case; as,

"Did I request thee, maker, from my clay

To mould me man?" Milton, 10. 744.

"God seems to have made him what he was." Life of Couper.

"Ask him his opinion." "You have asked me the news."

Will it be said that the latter phrases are elliptical, for "ask of him his opinion?" I apprehend this to be a mistake. According to the true idea of the government of a transitive verb, him must be the object in the phrase under consideration, as much as in this, "Ask him for a guinea;" or in this, "ask him to go."

This idiom is very ancient, as we often see it in the Latin. "Interrogatus sententiam." Liv. 26. 33. "Se id Scipionem orare." Ibm. 27. 17. "Auxilia regem orabant." Ibm. lib. 28. 5. The idiom in both languages had a common origin.

NOTE 2.—Some verbs were formerly used as transitive, which are no longer considered as such; as, "he repented him;"—"flee thee away;"—"he was swerved;"—"the sum was amounted," &c. which are held improper.

Cease, however, is used as a transitive verb by our best writers. "Cease this impious rage." Milton. "Her lips their music cease." Hooke's Tasso.

RULE XXVII.—Intransitive verbs are followed by the name of the act or effect, which the verb expresses in action; as, "to live a life of virtue;" "to die the death of the righteous;" "to dream dreams;" "to run a race;" "to sleep the sleep of death."

We observe, in these examples, life is the name of living supposed to be complete, as race is the name of the act of running when accomplished.

NOTE.—Nearly allied to this idiom is that of using, after verbs transitive or intransitive, certain nouns which are not the objects of the verb, nor of precisely the same sense, but which are either the names of the result of the verb's action, or closely connected with it. Examples: "A guinea weighs five penny weight, six grains;" "a crown weighs nineteen penny weight;" "a piece of cloth measures ten yards." "And on their hinges grate harsh thunder." "And rivers run potable gold." "The crippid brook ran nectar." "Groves whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm." "Grin a ghastly smile." Milton.

"Her lips blush deeper sweets." Thomson.

"To ascend or descend a flight of stairs, a ladder, or a mountain."

"To cost a guinea."

Under this rule or the following may be arranged these expressions. "Let them go their way." "When matters have been brought this length." Lavoisier, Translation. "We turn our eyes this way or that way." "Reckoning any way from ourselves, a yard, a mile, &c." Locke, 2. 17.

Similar to this idiom are the phrases, to go west or east—pointing north or south, north-west or south-east, and the like, which I find to be Saxon phrases and very ancient.

In some instances verbs of this sort are followed by two objects; as, "a ring cost the purchaser an eagle."

RULE XXVIII.—Names of certain portions of time and space, and especially words denoting continuance of time or progression, are used without a governing word; as, "Jacob said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel." "And dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life." "And he abode with

* The radical idea of weight is carry, bear or sustain, from the Saxon wæg, a balance. The idiom in question has its original in that idea—a guinea weighs five penny weights, six grains—that is, carries or sustains that weight in the scales. How much of the propriety, and even of the beauty of language is lost, by neglecting to study its primitive state and principles!

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

him the space of a month." "The tree of life yielded her fruit every month." "In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks." "Whoever shall urge thee to go a mile, go with him twain." "To walk a mile, or a league."

"Effects occurring every moment to ourselves."
"You have asked me news a hundred times." Pope.
Words expressing particular or precise points of time, are usually preceded by a preposition; as, "at that hour;" "on that day." But to both these rules there are exceptions.

RULE XXIX.—The verb be has the same case after it as before it; or two substitutes connected with be in construction are in the same case. "It is I, be not afraid." "Thou art she." "It is he." "Who was he?" "Who do men say that I am?" "Whom do they represent me to be." But "Whom do men say that I am," is incorrect.

RULE XXX.—Transitive verbs and their participles admit of a sentence, a clause or number of words as their object; as, "He is not alarmed so far, as to consider how much nearer he approaches to his end."

Consider what? The whole following clause, which is the object of the verb.

"If he escapes being banished by others, I fear he will banish himself."

Here being banished stands in the place of a noun, as the object after escapes.

"Add to this, what, from its antiquity is but little known, has from that very circumstance, the recommendation of novelty." Hermes, Preface. In this sentence the whole of the clauses in italics, is what is to be added, and is the actual object governed by the verb add.

"Suppose then the world we live in to have had a creator"—"Suppose the disposition which dictated this council to continue." Paley, Ev. 1.

"For that mortal dint, Save he who reigns above, none can resist." Milton, 2. 815.

"I wish I could give you any good reasons for your coming hither, except that, I earnestly invite you." Pope, Let.

"Lord Bathurst is too great a husbandman to like barren hills, except they are his own to improve." Pope, Let. Sept. 3, 1726.

In these and similar passages, the object of the verb is a whole proposition or statement, in a sentence or clause of a sentence. In this passage, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish," the fact excepted is affirmed in a single verb. Take away this fact "that you shall repent," and the consequence must be, you will perish. This is one of the modes of abbreviation in language which I have so frequently mentioned, and which constitutes a principal excellence of the English.

We observe, in some of the passages here cited, the pronoun that, after the verb. This is probably the true original construction; the substitute, that, pointing to the whole following clause. "He could do no mighty works there, save that, [except that single fact which follows,] he laid his hand on a few sick and healed them."

NOTE.—It may be here observed that in some of the passages cited the verb has no definitive nominative; the verbs save, except, suppose, add, &c. are in the imperative mode, but the address is not made to any particular person or persons. And this probably has led authors to class save and except among conjunctions, prepositions or adverbs, or to consider them as used adverbially; for it has been already observed that the class of adverbs has been a sort of common sink to receive all words which authors have not been able to comprehend.

Is it not strange that suppose, add, admit, allow, and other verbs, which are constantly used in the same manner, should have hitherto escaped the same doom? In the passages above cited from Paley, suppose is used precisely in the same manner, as except and save in others. Indeed nothing but the most inexcusable negligence could have led critics to this classification of save and except—for in many passages of scripture, these very words, in the sense in which they are called conjunctions or adverbs, have an object following them, like other transitive verbs; as, "Israel burned none of them, save Hazer only." Josh. xi. 13. "Ye shall not come into the land, save Caleb and Joshua." Numb. xiv. 30. "I would that all were as I am, except these bonds." Acts, xxvi.

This use of verbs without a definite nominative occasions no inconvenience; for the address is not made to any particular person, but is equally applicable to any one who will apply it. See the subject further explained under rule 38. The following passage in Locke, 2. 27. 2. contains another verb used in the same manner: "Could two bodies be in the same place at the same time, then those two parcels of matter must be one and the same, take them great or little."

The error of considering save as an adverb or conjunction, has however produced a multitude of mistakes in construction, as in these passages: "Save he who reigns above." Milton. "Which no man knoweth, saving he that receiveth it." Rev. ii. 17. The nominative he cannot be reconciled to any principle of true construction. He ought to be him, the object after the verb. Except might have been used, and this word being called a preposition, would have required after it the objective case. But both words are verbs, and ought to have the same construction.

VOL. I. K.

RULE XXXI.—The infinitive mode follows, first, another verb or participle; as, "he loves to cherish the social affections;" "be persuaded to abandon a vicious life;" "he is willing to encounter danger;" "he was proceeding to relate his adventures."

2dly. The infinitive follows a noun; as, "The next thing natural for the mind to do." Locke. "He has a task to perform."

3dly. It follows an adjective or verbal attribute; as, "a question difficult to be solved." "It is delightful to contemplate the goodness of Providence." "God is worthy to be loved and trusted." "Be prepared to receive your friend."

4thly. It follows as; thus, "an object so high as to be invisible;" "a question so obscure as to perplex the understanding."

5thly. It follows than after a comparison; as, "Nothing makes a man suspect much, more than to know little." Bacon on Suspicion.

6thly. It follows the preposition for, noting cause or motive; as, "What went ye out for to see?" Matt. xi.

This is the true original idiom, but it is usual now to omit for; as, "he went to see a reed shaken with the wind." In every phrase of this sort, for is implied in the sense; but the use of the word is vulgar.

The infinitive mode is independent, standing as a substitute for a whole phrase; as, "It is not once in ten attempts that you can find the case you seek, in any law book; to say nothing of those numerous points of conduct concerning which the law professes not to prescribe." Paley, Phil. ch. 4.

RULE XXXII.—The verbs, bid, make, see, hear, feel, let, with the auxiliaries, may, can, must, shall and will, and dare and need, when used as auxiliaries, are followed by the infinitive without the prefix to; as, "he bids me come;" "we cannot make them understand;" "let me see you write;" "we heard him relate the story;" "we felt the earth tremble." "Which they let pass." Locke. "He may go, can go, must go, shall go, will go." "I dare engage; I dare say." "He need not be anxious."

NOTE 1.—In the uses of dare and need, there are some peculiarities which deserve remark.

When dare signifies to defy or challenge, it is regular in the tenses and persons, is a transitive verb, and is followed by the infinitive with the usual prefix; as, "he dares me to enter the list." But when it is intransitive, denoting to have courage, it more generally drops the personal terminations, has an anomalous past tense, and is followed by the infinitive without to; in short it has the form of an auxiliary, and in the German, it is classed with the auxiliaries. Examples: "I dare engage." Pope's Works, Letter to Gay. "I dare not confess." Swift to Gay. "I dare say." Locke. "But my Lord, you dare not do either." Junius, Let. 28. "Durst I venture to deliver my own sentiments." Hume, Es. 7.

The past tense, when regular, is followed by the infinitive with the usual prefix. "You have dared to throw more than a suspicion upon mine." Junius, Let. 20. The same remark may be extended to the future tense. "He will not dare to attack his adversary."

In like manner, need, when a transitive verb, is regular in its inflections; as, "A man needs more prudence"—"The army needed provisions." But when intransitive, it drops the personal terminations in the present tense, is formed like an auxiliary, and is followed by a verb, without the prefix to; as, "Nobody need be afraid he shall not have scope enough." Locke, 2. 22. 9. "I need not go any farther." Ibm. "Nor need we wonder." Ibm. "The lender need be under no fear." Anarch. ch. 69. "There need be no difficulty." Beddoes, Hygeia, 1. 27. "She need dig no more." Spectator, No. 121. "A man need not be uneasy on these grounds." Boswell, 3. 41. "He need not urge to this honorable court." Judge Chase.

In the use of this verb, there is another irregularity, which is peculiar, the verb being without a nominative, expressed or implied. "Whereof here needs no account." Milton, P. L. 4. 235. "There is no evidence of the fact, and there needs none." This is an established use of need.

NOTE 2.—The infinitive mode has, in its sense and use, a near affinity to a noun and often has the construction of one. It is much employed to introduce sentences which are the nominatives to verbs, as well as the objects following them; as, "To will is present with me, but to perform that which is good I find not." Here the first infinitive is the nominative to is, and the second begins the sentence which is the object after find.

NOTE 3.—A common mistake in the use of the infinitive is, to use the perfect tense after another verb in the past time, when in fact one of the verbs in the past time would correctly express the sense; thus, "It would have been no difficult matter to have compiled a volume of such amusing precedents." Couper to Hill, Let. 29. Here the first verb states the time past when it was not difficult to compile a volume; at that time the compilation could not be past; the verb therefore should have been to compile, which is present and always indefinite.

In the following passage, we have a like use of verbs which is correct. "A free pardon was granted to the son, who was known to have offered indignities to the body of Varus." Murphy's Tacitus, 6. 1. Here the offering of indignities was a fact precedent to the time stated in the verb was known; and therefore the verb, to have offered, is well employed.

RULE XXXIII.—The infinitive signifying motive or purpose, often introduces a clause or sentence which is not the nominative or objective to any verb; as, "To see how far this reaches, and what are the causes of wrong judgment, we must remember that things are judged good or bad in a double sense." Locke, 2. 21. 61. "To present property from being too unequally distributed, no person should be allowed to dispose of his possessions to the prejudice of his lawful heirs." Anarch. ch. 62.

NOTE.—This form of sentence seems to be derived from the use of for before the verb, for to see. The modern practice is to prefix some noun, as in order to see, or "With a view to prevent."

RULE XXXIV.—In the use of the passive form, there is often an inversion of the order of the subject and object; thus, "The bishops and abbots were allowed their seats in the house of Lords."

Here the true construction would be, "Seats in the house of Lords were allowed to the bishops and abbots."

"Theresa was forbid the presence of the emperor." Murphy's Tacitus, 2. 540. NOTE.—This is a common phrase. It may be resolved thus: The presence of the emperor was forbid to Theresa—or, Theresa was forbid to approach the presence of the emperor.

RULE XXXV.—The participle of the present tense without a definitive a or the, or with any possessive attribute, usually retains the sense of its verb, and has the objective case after it; as, "The clerk is engrossing the bill." "The love we bear our friends is generally caused by our finding the same dispositions in them, which we feel in ourselves."

Pope's Letters.

"In return to your inviting me to your forest."

But when the participle is preceded by a or the, it takes the character and government of a noun, and in most cases, must be followed by of; as, "The middle station of life seems to be most advantageously situated for the gaining of wisdom. Poverty turns our thoughts too much upon the supplying of our wants, and riches, upon enjoying our superfluities."

Spectator, No. 464.

In many cases this participle becomes a noun, without a or the; as, "It is more properly talking upon paper, than writing."

Pope, Let.

NOTE.—The foregoing rule is often violated by our best writers, and to make it universal is to assume an authority much too dictatorial. "Some were employed in blowing of glass; others in wearing of linen."

Gibbon, Rom. Emp. ch. 10.

RULE XXXVI.—Participles of the present tense, either single or in union with the participle of the perfect tense, often perform, at once, the office of a verb and a noun; as, "The taking from another what is his, without his knowledge or allowance, is called stealing."

Locke, 2. 28. 16.

"By the mind's changing the object to which it compares any thing."

Locke, 2. 25.

"To save them from other people's damning them." Wycherley to Pope.

"Such a plan is not capable of being carried into execution."

Anarch. ch. 62.

"They could not avoid submitting to this influence."

Boling. on Hist. Let. 8.

NOTE 1.—The participle in ing, though strictly active in its signification, is not unfrequently used by modern authors in a passive sense; as, "More living particles are produced—than are necessary for nutrition or for the restoration of decomposing organs," that is, organs suffering decomposition. Darwin, Zoon. sect. 39. 9. "From which caloric is disengaging," that is, undergoing the process of separation. Lavoisier, Translation. "The number is augmenting daily." Ibm. "They seemed to think Cesar was slaying before their eyes rather than that he was slain." Guth. Quin. 2. 18. "The nation had cried out loudly against the crime while it was committing." Boling. on Hist. Let. 8. "My lives are re-printing." Johnson to Boswell, 1782.

Many of this kind of participles have become mere attributes; as writing paper; looking glass; spelling or pronouncing dictionary. Wanting and owing have long had the character of passive participles, with the sense of wanted, owed.

NOTE 2.—The use of two participles in the place of a noun is one of the most frequent practices of our best writers; as, "This did not prevent John's being acknowledged and solemnly inaugurated Duke of Normandy." Henry, Hist. Brit. b. 3. The participle being with an attribute, supplies the place of a noun also. "As to the difference of being more general, that makes this maxim more remote from being innate." Locke, 1. 2. 20.

RULE XXXVII.—Participles, like attributes, agree with a sentence, a part of a sentence, or a substitute for a sentence; as, "Concerning relation in general, these things may be considered."

Locke, 2. 25.

Here concerning relates to the whole of the last clause of the sentence—"These things may be considered"—all which is concerning relation in general.

"This criterion will be different, according to the nature of the object which the mind contemplates."

Enfield, Hist. Phil. 2. 15.

That is, the difference of criterion will accord with the nature of the object.

"According to Hierocles, Ammonius was induced to execute the plan of a distinct eclectic school," &c.

Ibm. p. 63.

Here the whole statement of facts in the last clause was according to Hierocles; that is, it accorded with his testimony.

"I have accepted thee, concerning this thing also."

Gen. 19.

"I speak concerning Christ and the church."

Eph. v. 32.

"Thus shalt thou do unto the Levites, touching their charge."

Num. viii. 26.

RULE XXXVIII.—Participles often stand without a noun, sentence or substitute, on which they immediately depend, being referable to either of the persons indefinitely; as, "It is not possible to act otherwise, considering the weakness of our nature."

Spectator.

NOTE.—Johnson, in his Dictionary, calls this a kind of conjunction, and adds—"It had been more grammatically written considered; tu, French; but considering is always used."

This criticism indicates an incorrect view of the subject. Considered, cannot be used without a change in the structure of the sentence—"The weakness of our nature being considered." But to make this form of expression correspondent to the other clause, that ought also to be varied, and a definite person introduced; thus, "It does not appear (to us) possible to act otherwise, the weakness of our nature being considered." But this amendment would be of no advantage.

To comprehend the use of such expressions, we should consider that men find it useful to deal in abstract propositions and lay down truths without reference to persons. This manner of discoursing is often less invidious than to apply propositions or opinions to persons. To accomplish this purpose, men have devised words and modes of speech which enable them thus to communicate their ideas. In the passage cited, the first clause contains a general abstract proposition, equally applicable to any person—"It is not possible to act otherwise." That is, it is not possible for me, for you, for him, or for her; but it might be invidious to specify persons. It is not possible for John or Thomas to act otherwise, he considering the weakness of his nature. Hence the proposition is left without application; and it follows naturally that the persons who are to consider the cause, the weakness of our nature, should be left indefinite, or unascertained. Hence considering is left without a direct application to any person.

Whatever foundation there may be for this explanation, the idiom is common and well authorized.

"Generally speaking, the heir at law is not bound by the intention of the testator."

Paley, Phil. 23.

"Supposing that electricity is actually a substance, and taking it for granted that it is different from caloric, does it not in all probability contain caloric, as well as all other bodies?"

Thomson, Chim. art. Caloric.

Here is no noun expressed or implied, to which supposing and taking can be referred; we would be most naturally understood.

"Supposing the first stratum of particles to remain in their place, after their union with caloric, we can conceive an affinity, &c." Ibm. Here supposing may be referred to we, but is this the real construction?

"For supposing parliament had a right to meet spontaneously, without being called together, it would be impossible to conceive that all the members would agree," &c.

Blackstone, Comm. B. 1. 2.

"The articles of this charge, considering by whom it was brought, were not of so high a nature as might have been expected."

Henry, Brit. B. 4. ch. 1.

"It is most reasonable to conclude that, excepting the assistance he may be supposed to have derived from his countrymen, his plan of civilization was the product of his own abilities."

Enfield, Hist. Phil. 1. ch. 9.

"None of us put off our clothes, saving that every one put them off for washing."

Neh. iv. 23.

"And he said unto them, hinder me not, seeing the Lord hath prospered my way."

Gen. xxiv. 56.

"Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds."

Col. iii. 9.

"Comparing two men, in reference to a common parent, it is easy to frame the ideas of brothers."

Locke, 2. 25.

"Granting this to be true, it would help us in the species of things no farther than the tribes of animals and vegetables."

Locke, 3. 6. 23.

RULE XXXIX.—Adverbs or Modifiers are usually placed near the words whose signification they are intended to affect.

First. They are placed before adjectives: as, truly wise; sincerely upright; unaffectedly polite.

Secondly. They usually follow a verb when single; as, he spoke eloquently; and if a verb is transitive with an object following, the adverb follows the object; as, "John received the present gratefully."

To this rule, the exceptions are very numerous, and not to be classed under general heads. "So it frequently happens." "Men often deceive themselves." Indeed, in many cases the position of the modifier makes no difference in the sense, and may be regulated entirely by the preference of sound, in the general structure of the period, provided it is not such as to mislead the reader, in the application of the word.

Thirdly. When one auxiliary and a participle are used, the modifier is usually placed between them or it follows the participle; as, "he was graciously received," or "he was received graciously." The first is the most elegant.

Fourthly. When two auxiliaries are used, the adverb is usually placed after the second; as, "We have been kindly treated." But it may follow the participle, as "We have been treated kindly;" and in some cases it may precede the auxiliaries, as "And certainly you must have known."

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Fifthly. When adverbs are emphatical, they may introduce a sentence, and be separated from the word to which they belong; as, "How completely this most amiable of human virtues had taken possession of his soul!" Port. Lect. 8. This position of the modifier is most frequent in interrogative and exclamatory phrases.

The adverb always is usually placed before a verb.

Never commonly precedes a single verb, except be, which it follows; as, "We are never absent from Church on Sunday." It is sometimes placed before an auxiliary, as "He never has been at court;" but it is more correctly and elegantly placed after the first auxiliary, as "He has never been at court," "he has never been intoxicated."

This word has a peculiar use in the phrase; "Ask me never so much dowry." Gen. xxiv. "The voice of charmers, charming never so wisely." Ps. lviii. The sense is, "Ask me so much dowry as never was asked before;" an abbreviation singularly expressive of the idea of asking to any amount or extent. Authors not understanding it, have substituted ever for never, which impairs the force, if it does not destroy the sense, of the phrase. The use of both is now common, but never is preferable. "Some agreements indeed, though never so expressly made, are deemed of so important a nature, that they ought not to rest in verbal promise only."

Blackstone, Comm. B. 3. ch. 9.

The use of here and there, in the introduction of sentences before verbs, forms an authorized idiom of the language; though the words may be considered as redundant. The practice may have originated in the use of the hand in pointing, in the early stage of society.

Here, there, and where, originally denoting place, are now used in reference to words, subjects and various ideas of which place is not predicable. "It is not so with respect to volitions and actions; here the coalescence is intimate." Hermes, ch. 8. "We feel pain, in the sensations, where we expected pleasure." Locke, 2. 7. 4.

Hence, whence, and thence, denoting the place from which a departure is stated, are used either with or without the preposition from. In strictness, the idea of from is included in the words, and it ought not to be used. These words also are used not only in reference to place, but to any argument, subject, or idea, in a discourse.

Hither, thither, and whither, denoting to a place, are obsolete in popular practice, and obsolescent in writing; being superseded by here, there, where. This change is evidently the effect of the all-controlling disposition of men to abridge speech, by dismissing useless syllables, or by substituting short words of easy pronunciation for those which are more difficult. Against this disposition and its effects, the critic remonstrates in vain; and we may rest assured that common convenience and utility are better guides in whatever respects the use of words, than the opinions of men in their closets. No word or syllable in a language, which is essential, or very useful, is ever lost.

While is a noun denoting time, and not a modifier. In this phrase, "I will go while you stay," the word is used in its primitive manner, without government, like many other names of portions of time—a month, a week.

We are accustomed to use, as modifiers, a little and a great deal. "The many letters I receive, do not a little encourage me." Spectator, No. 124. Many names are used in like manner, as modifiers of the sense of verbs. "You don't care six-pence whether he was wet or dry." Johnson.

Rule XL.—In polite and classical language, two negatives destroy the negation and express an affirmative; as, "Nor did he not perceive them," that is, he did perceive them. This phraseology is not common nor agreeable to the genius of our tongue.

The following is a common and well authorized use of negatives. "His manners are not inelegant," that is, are elegant. This manner of expression, however, when not accompanied with particular emphasis, denotes a moderate degree of the quality.

NOTE.—In popular language, two negatives are used for a negation, according to the practice of the ancient Greeks and the modern French. This idiom was primitive, and was retained in the Saxon; as, "Oc se kining Peada ne rixade nane while." Sax. Chron. p. 33. And the king Peada did not reign none while, that is, not a long time. The learned, with a view to philosophical correctness, have rejected the use of two negatives for one negation. The consequence is, we have two modes of speaking directly opposite to each other, but expressing the same thing. "He did not owe nothing," in vulgar language, "and he owed nothing," in the style of the learned, mean precisely the same thing.

Rule XLI.—Prepositions are followed by the names of objects and the objective case; as, from New York to Philadelphia; across the Delaware; over land; by water; through the air; with us; for me; to them; in you; among the people; toward us.

The preposition to is supposed to be omitted after verbs of giving, yielding, affording, and the like; as, "give them bread," instead of give bread to them. "Afford him protection;" "furnish her with books." But this idiom seems to be primitive, and not elliptical.

From is sometimes suppressed; as in this phrase, "He was banished the kingdom."

Home, after a verb denoting motion to, is always used without to; as, "We are going home."

After the attribute near, to is often omitted; as, "To bring them nearer the truth." Massillon. Also after adjoining; as, "a garden adjoining a river."

The preposition is sometimes separated from the word which governs; as, "With a longing for that state which he is charmed with," instead of with which he is charmed.

In many cases, the relative pronoun may be suppressed, as "I did not see the person he came with," that is, with whom he came; and in other cases, what is employed for the word governed, as "I know not what person he gave the present to."

This separation of the preposition from the word governed by it, and the suppression of the substitute, are most common and most allowable in colloquial and epistolary language. In the grave and elevated style, they are seldom elegant, and never to be admitted to the prejudice of perspicuity; as in the following passage, "Of a space or number, which, in a constant and endless enlarging progression, it can in thought never attain to."

Locke, 2. 17. 8.

A separation of the preposition to such a distance from the word with which it is connected in construction, is perplexing and inelegant.

NOTE.—In the use of who as an interrogative, there is an apparent deviation from a regular construction—it being used without distinction of case; as, "Who do you speak to?" "Who is she married to?" "Who is this reserved for?" "Who was it made by?" This idiom is not merely colloquial; it is found in the writings of our best authors. It is the Latin cui and quo.

RULE XLII.—Prepositions govern sentences and clauses or members of sentences; as, "Without seeking any more justifiable reasons of hostility."

Hume, 1. 5.

"Besides making an expedition into Kent."

Hume, 1. 36.

"From what has been said."

Blair, Serm.

"To the general history of these periods will be added, &c."

Enfield, Prelim.

"About the beginning of the eleventh century."

Ibm.

"By observing these rules and precautions."

Ibm.

"In comparing the proofs of questionable facts."

Ibm.

"For want of carefully attending to the preceding distinction."

Enfield, Hist. Phil. b. 2.

"After men became christians."

Paley, Evid. ch. 1.

"Before you were placed at the head of affairs."

Junius, Let. 8.

"Personal bravery is not enough to constitute the general, without he animates the whole army with courage."

Fielding's Socrates, p. 188.

"Pray, get these verses by heart against I see you."

Chesterfield, Let.

"After having made me believe that I possessed a share in your affection."

Pope, Let.

"Ambition, envy,—will take up our minds, without we can possess ourselves with sobriety."

Spectator, No. 143.

NOTE.—We observe, in the foregoing passages, the preposition has two uses. One is to precede a word to which other words are annexed as necessary to complete the sense—"about the beginning." Here the sense is not complete; the time is not designated. To define the time which is the object of the preposition about, it is necessary to add the words—"of the eleventh century"—about that time. So that the whole clause is really the object after the preposition.

The other use of the preposition is to precede nouns, verbs or other words which are not the object of the preposition, but which have a construction independent of it; as, "after men became christians." Here men is the nominative to became; yet the whole proposition is as really the object governed by after, as the word hour, in the phrase, after that hour. "Against I see you," is a phrase of like construction. No single word is an object or in the objective case after against; but the whole affirmation is the object. "Without we can possess ourselves," has a like construction, and though superseded, in a degree, by unless, a word of similar import, is a true English phrase. After [this fact] men became christians—Against [that time when] I see you—Without [this fact] we can possess ourselves.

Rule XLIII.—The modifiers of sentences, if, though, unless, and lest, may be followed by verbs in the future tense, without the usual auxiliaries, shall, will or should; as, "If his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?" "If he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent?" "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." "He shall not eat of the holy things, unless he wash his flesh with water." "Lest thou say I have made Abram rich."

Except has a like effect upon the following verb; as, "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." Whether has been numbered also among the conjunctions, which require the conditional mode, but by an egregious mistake. It is not a connective, nor does it imply a condition or hypothesis, but an alternative.

Rule XLIV.—Connectives join two or more clauses or members in a compound sentence; as, "Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile."

Here are two clauses united by and, which continues the sense and prevents the repetition of the verb keep.

"I sought the Lord, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears." Here are three clauses combined into a sentence or period by the help of and; but a new verb is introduced in each, and the second connective prevents the repetition of the substitute he only.

"A wise son heareth his father's instruction; but a scorner heareth not rebuke." Here but joins the two clauses, but a new character is the nominative to a distinct verb, in the second clause, which exhibits a contrast to the first, and no word is omitted.

GRAMMAR OF THE

RULE XLV.—Connectives join single words, which are the nominatives to the same verb, expressed or understood, or words which follow a transitive verb or a preposition in the same case. Connectives also join verbs, adjectives, and adverbs. Example:

"Peter and John went up into the Temple."

Connectives join attributes and modifiers; as, "He is wise and virtuous."

"An orator pleads eloquently and plausibly."

The connectives perform a very important office in abridging language, by enabling us to omit words which must otherwise be repeated. Thus when I say, "I esteem religion and virtue," two affirmations, "I esteem religion, I esteem virtue," are actually included in the sentence.

When several words or clauses succeed each other, it is not uncommon to omit the connective; as, "We hear nothing of causing the blind to see, the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, the lepers to be cleansed." Paley, Erid.

After the connective than, there may be and usually is an ellipsis of a verb, a noun, or other words; as, "There is none greater in this house than I." Gen. xxxix. 9. That is, than I am.

"Only in the throne will I be greater than thou." Gen. xli. That is, than thou shalt be.

"He loves his money more than his honor," that is, more than he loves his honor.

"The king of the north shall return and set forth a multitude greater than the former." Dan. xi. 13. That is, than the former multitude.

"I will pull down my barns and build greater." Luke xii. That is, greater barns.

Sometimes other words may be suppressed without obscuring the sense; as, "It is better for me to die than to live." Jonah iv. That is, better than for me to live.

Precise rules for the ellipsis of words, in all cases, cannot be given. In general, a writer will be governed by a regard to perspicuity, and omit no word, when the want of it leaves the sense obscure or ambiguous, nor when it weakens the strength of expression. But the following remarks and examples may be of use to the student.

1. When a number of words are joined in construction, the definitive may be omitted, except before the first; as the sun, moon and stars; a house and garden. So also when two or more attributes agree with the same name; as a great, wise and good prince. But when attributes or names are particularly emphatical, the definitive should be expressed before each; as the sun, the moon and the stars.

2. The repetition of names adds emphasis to ideas; as, "Christ, the power of God and the wisdom of God," is more emphatical than "Christ, the power and the wisdom of God."

3. An adjective belonging to two or more nouns joined by a connective, may be omitted except before the first; as my house and garden; good qualities and actions. "Their interest and solicitation—" Rambler, 56. Nor does it make any difference that the nouns are in different numbers, as our adjectives have no distinction of number, the same word may be applied to the singular number and the plural; as a magnificent house and gardens; his house and lands. But when a preceeds the first adjective, this construction is not elegant.

4. In compound sentences, a nominative pronoun or noun may be omitted before all the verbs except the first; as, I love, fear and respect the magistrate—instead of, I love, I fear and I respect. The substitute may sometimes be suppressed; as the man I saw, for the man whom I saw.

5. An adverb need not be repeated with every word which it qualifies, the connective and rendering it unnecessary; as, he spoke and acted gracefully. Here gracefully belongs to speaking as well as to acting.

A preposition may be omitted after a connective; as, he walked over the hills and the valleys, that is, over the valleys.

After like and near, to is usually omitted; as, "Like three distinct powers in mechanics." Blackstone's Comm. 1. 2. That is, like to three. "Such opinions as seemed to approach nearest the truth." Enfield, 2. 59. That is, nearest to the truth.

Likewise after join and adjoin, to is sometimes omitted; as, "a garden adjoining the river."

For is omitted by the poets after mourn.

"He mourn'd no recreant friend, no mistress coy."

Beattie.

PUNCTUATION.

Punctuation is the marking of the several pauses which are to be observed, in reading or speaking a sentence or continued discourse. By means of pauses, a discourse is divided into periods or complete sentences, and periods into clauses or simple sentences, and these, into phrases.

A period is a sentence complete, making perfect sense, and not connected in construction with what follows. The pause after the period is marked by a point [.] and in speaking, is distinguished by a cadence or fall of the voice.

The members of a period, or clauses and phrases, are all more or less connected in sense, and according to the nearness of the connection, are marked by a comma [,] a semicolon [;] or a colon [:].

The comma is the shortest pause, and is often used to mark the construction, where very little interruption of voice is allowable.

A simple sentence or clause contains an affirmation, a command or a question, that is, one personal verb, with its nominative and adjuncts. By adjunct, is meant any phrase or number of words added by way of modifying or qualifying the primary words. Thus when it is said, "Cicero was an orator of a diffuse style," the latter words, of a diffuse style, are the adjunct of orator, and the whole forms a complete simple sentence, with one verb or affirmation.

A phrase contains no assertion, or does not amount to a proposition.

Comma.

RULE I. In general the parts of a simple sentence or clause are not to be separated by any point whatever; as, "Hope is necessary in every condition of life." But when a simple sentence is long, or contains a distinct phrase or phrases, modifying the affirmation, it may be divided by a comma; as, "To be very active in laudable pursuits, is the distinguishing characteristic of a man of merit." "By revenging an injury, a man is but even with his enemy." In most cases, where a short pause will give distinctness to ideas, a comma is well placed after an important word; as, "To mourn without measure, is folly; not to mourn at all, insensibility." The pause after measure, in this sentence, is essential to the strength of the expression. "The idea of beauty is vague and undefined, different in different minds, and diversified by time or place." Rambler.

RULE II. When a connective is omitted between two or more words, whether names, adjectives, pronouns, verbs or modifiers, the place is supplied by a comma; as, "Love, joy, peace and blessedness are reserved for the good." "The miseries of poverty, of sickness, of captivity, would, without hope, be insupportable." Rambler. "We hear nothing of causing the blind to see, the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, the lepers to be cleansed." Paley. "He who loves, serves and obeys his maker, is a pious man." "Industry steadily, prudently and vigorously pursued, leads to wealth." "David was a brave, martial, enterprising prince." "The most innocent pleasures are the most rational, the most delightful and the most durable."

RULE III. Two or more simple sentences closely connected in sense, or dependent on each other, are separated by a comma only; as, "When our vices leave us, we flatter ourselves we leave them." "The temperate man's pleasures are durable, because they are regular." "That all the duties of morality ought to be practised, is without difficulty discoverable, because ignorance or uncertainty would immediately involve the world in confusion and distress." Rambler.

RULE IV. The sentence independent or case absolute, detached affirmations or phrases involved in sentences, and other important clauses, must be separated from the other parts of a sentence, by a comma; as, "The envoy has returned, his business being accomplished." "The envoy, having accomplished his business, has returned." "Providence has, I think, displayed a tenderness for mankind." Rambler. "The decision of patronage, who was but half a goddess, has been sometimes erroneous." Ibm. "The sciences, after a thousand indignities, retired from the palace of patronage." Ibm. "It is, in many cases, apparent." Ibm.

RULE V. A comma is often required to mark contrast, antithesis, or remarkable points in a sentence, and sometimes very properly separates words closely dependent in construction; as, "a good man will love himself too well to lose, and his neighbor too well to win, an estate by gaming." "Prosperity gains friends, and adversity tries them." "It is harder to avoid censure, than to gain applause."

"Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull."

RULE VI. A single name in apposition is not separated by a comma; as, "the Apostle Peter:" but when such name is accompanied with an adjunct, it should be separated; as, "Parmenio, a friend of Alexander's, hearing the great offers that Darius had made, said, 'Were I Alexander, I would accept them.'" "So would I," replied Alexander, "were I Parmenio."

RULE VII. Terms of address, and words of others repeated, but not introduced as a quotation, are separated by a comma; as, "Wherefore, Sirs, be of good cheer." "My son, hear the counsel of thy father." "Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." Exodus.

RULE VIII. Modifying words and phrases, as however, nay, hence, besides, in short, finally, formerly, &c. are usually separated by a comma; as, "It is, however, the task of criticism to establish principles." Rambler.

Semicolon.

The semicolon is placed between the clauses of a period, which are less closely connected than such as are separated by a comma.

First. When the first division of a sentence completes a proposition, so as to have no dependence on what follows; but the following clause has a dependence on the preceding, the two parts are separated generally by a semicolon; as, "It may be laid down as a maxim, that it is more easy to take away superfluities than to supply defects; and therefore he that is culpable, because he has passed the middle point of virtue, is always accounted a fairer object of hope, than he who fails by falling short." Rambler. In this sentence the part of the sentence preceding the semicolon is a perfect period in itself, and might have been closed with a full point; but the author has added another division, by way of inference, and this is dependent on the first division. The author proceeds—"The one has all that perfection requires, and more, but the excess may be easily retrenched; the other wants the qualities requisite to excellence." Here the first division makes a complete proposition; but the antithesis begun by the numeral one, is not complete, without the last division.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

"Economy is no disgrace; for it is better to live on a little, than to outlive a great deal."

"Be in peace with many; nevertheless, have but one counselor of a thousand."

"A friend cannot be known in prosperity; an enemy cannot be hid in adversity."

In general then, the semicolon separates the divisions of a sentence, when the latter division has a dependence on the former, whether the former has a dependence on the latter or not.

Secondly. When several members of a sentence have a dependence on each other, by means of a substitute for the same principal word, and the clauses, in other respects, constitute distinct propositions, the semicolon may be used; as, "Wisdom hath builded her house; she hath hewn out her seven pillars; she hath killed her beasts; she hath mingled her wine; she hath also furnished her table." Prov. ix.

Colon.

The Colon is used when the sense of the division of a period is complete, so as to admit of a full point, but something is added by way of illustration; as, "A brute arrives at a point of perfection that he can never pass: in a few years he has all the endowments he is capable of, and were he to live ten thousand more, would be the same thing he is at present." Spectator, No. 111.

Period.

The Period or full point marks a completion of the sense, a cadence of the voice, and the longest pause used between sentences. It closes a discourse also, or marks a completion of a subject, chapter or section.

The full point is used also after initials when used alone, as after N. S. for New Style; and after abbreviations, as Croc. Anglic. for Crocus Anglicanus.

To these may be added,

The dash [—] which marks a break in the sentence or an abrupt turn; as, "If thou art he—but O how fallen!"

The interrogation point [?] that closes a sentence which asks a question; as, "How long, ye simple ones, will ye love simplicity?"

The exclamation point [!] which is used after sudden expressions of surprise, or other emotions; as, "O happiness! Our being's end and aim!"

The parenthesis () and hooks [] include a remark or clause not essential to the sentence in construction, but useful in explaining it or introducing an important idea. They mark a moderate pause, and the clause included is read with a depressed tone of voice; as,

"Know then this truth (enough for man to know)

Virtue alone is happiness below."

Pope.

It will be readily seen that the sentence is not at all dependent on the parenthetical clause; but the converse is not true, for that clause has a dependence more or less remote on the sentence. Thus, enough for man to know, is not intelligible without connecting it with the parts of the sentence preceding and following. So in this passage; "If any one pretends to be so sceptical, as to deny his own existence (for really to doubt of it, is manifestly impossible) let him enjoy his beloved happiness." Locke, 4. 10. 2. The included clause here is connected with the preceding part of the sentence, and it is a substitute for existence.

With regard to the duration of the pauses, it may be observed that the comma, semicolon, colon and full point, may bear to each other the proportion of one, two, four and six; and the interrogation point and exclamation point may be considered each as equal in time to the colon or period. But no precise rule can be given, which shall extend to every case; the length of the pauses must depend much on the nature of the discourse, and their respective proportions may be often varied to advantage by a judicious speaker.

DIRECTIONS

FOR THE

PRONUNCIATION OF WORDS.

The principal sounds of the vowels are the first or long, and the second or short.

Examples of the first or long sound.

a in make, fate, grace.
e in me, mete, meter.
i in pine, bind, strife.
o in note, hold, port.
u in true, duty, rude.
y in dry, defy, imply.

Examples of the second or short sound.

a in mat, ban, grand.
e in bet, men, send.
i in bit, pin, miss.
o in not, boss, bond.
u in dun, must, refund.
y in pity, cycle, synonym.

The principal things to be regarded in learning the pronunciation of English words, are the accent and the sound of the vowel of the accented syllable.

RULE I. This mark ' called an accent, designates the accented syllable.

II. The accent placed immediately after a vowel indicates the vowel to have its first or long sound, either at the end or in the middle of a syllable; as in sa'cred, pre'cept, ri'ot, po'et, mu'sic, cy'press; de-gra'de, reple'te, divi'de, explo'de, intru'de.

III. A horizontal mark or point over a vowel shows it to be long, and when no accent is found in the word, this mark designates the accented syllable; as in disc^ourse, encr^oach, best^ow, enr^oll, courser, suit^oable.

IV. An accent placed immediately after a consonant, or combination of consonants in the same syllable, indicates that the vowel of that syllable, if unpointed, is short; as in hab'it, ten'et, con'duct, ul'cer, sym'bol; adapt', intend', predict', despond', abrupt'.

Exceptions.

1. A pointed vowel has the sound designated by the point or points; as in full'ness, al'terable, book'ish, convey'.
2. o before ll, ld and lk, in monosyllables or accented syllables, has its broad sound like aw; as in befall', bald'ness, walk'ing.
3. o before ll is long; as in enr^oll'.

V. An accent immediately after a diphthong, or after a syllable containing one, designates the accented syllable, but the diphthong has its proper sound; as in renew', devour', avow', appoint', annoy'.

VI. This mark ' called in Greek the grave accent, placed before a vowel, indicates that vowel to have its Italian sound, as in 'ask, b'ar, f'a-ther, m'ask. In words of two or more syllables, when no other accent is used, this designates the accented syllable; as in 'answerable, b'argain.

VII. Two accents immediately before c, t or s, indicate that c, t or s, in pronunciation, coalesces with the following vowel, and form the sound of sh or zh, which closes the syllable, and of course the preceding vowel is short. Thus, vi'cious, ambi'tion, are pronounced vish'us, ambish'on; vi'sion is pronounced vizh'un.

VIII. C before a, o and u, and in some other situations, is a close articulation, like k, and in the vocabulary of this work, whenever it is equivalent to k, it is marked thus C.

Before e, i and y, c is precisely equivalent to s, in same, this; as in cedar, civil, cypress, capacity.

IX. E final answers the following purposes.

1. It indicates that the preceding vowel is long; as in hate, mete, sire, robe, lyre; abate, recede, invite, remote, intrude.
2. It indicates that c preceding has the sound of s, as in lace, lance, and that g preceding has the sound of j, as in charge, page, challenge.
3. In proper English words, e final never forms a syllable, and in most words, in the terminating unaccented syllable, it is silent and useless. Thus, motive, genuine, examine, juvenile, reptile, granite, are pronounced moti'v, genuin, examin, juve-nil, reptil, granit.

In a few words of foreign origin, e final forms a syllable; as in syncope, simile. These are noted in their place.

X. E final is silent after l in the following terminations, ble, cle, dle, fle, gle, kle, ple, tle, zle; as in able, manacle, cradle, ruffle, mangle, wrinkle, supple, rattle, puzzle, which are pronounced a'bl, man'acl, cra'dl, rul'll, man'gl, wriu'kl, sup'pl, puz'zl.

XI. In the termination en, e is usually silent; as in token, broken, pronounced tokn, brokn.

XII. The termination ous in adjectives and their derivatives is pronounced us; as in gracious, pious, pompously.

XIII. The combinations ce, ci, ti, before a vowel, have the sound of sh; as in cetaceous, gracious, motion, partial, ingratiate, pronounced ceta-shus, gra-shus, moshon, parshal, ingrashate.

But ti after a consonant have the sound of ch; as in christian, bas-tion, mixtion, pronounced chrischan, baschan, mixchun. So in combustion, digestion.

Si after an accented vowel are pronounced like zh; as in Ephe-sian, confusion, pronounced Ephezhan, confuzhon.

When ci or ti precede similar combinations, as in pronunciation, negotiation, they may be pronounced ce, instead of she, to prevent a repetition of the latter syllable; as pronunciashon, instead of pronun-hashon.

XIV. Gh, both in the middle and at the end of words, are silent; as in caught, bought, fright, nigh, sigh; pronounced caut, baut, fite, ni, si.

Exceptions. In the following words gh are pronounced as f—cough, chough, clough, enough, hough, laugh, rough, slough, tough, trough.

XV. When wh begin a word, the aspirate h precedes w in pronunciation, as in what, whiff, whale, pronounced hwat, hwif, hwale; w having precisely the sound of oo, French ou.

In the following words, w is silent—who, whom, whose, whoop, whole, where.

XVI. H after r has no sound nor use; as in rheum, rhyme, pronounced reum, ryme.

XVII. K and g before n are silent; as in know, gnaw, pronounced no, naw.

XVIII. W before r is silent; as in wring, wreath, pronounced ring, reath.

XIX. B after m is silent; as in dumb, numb, pronounced dum, num.

XX. L before k is silent; as in baulk, walk, talk, pronounced bauk, wauk, tauk.

XXI. Ph have the sound of f; as in philosophy.

XXII. The combination ng has two sounds; one, as in sing, singer; the other, as in finger, linger, longer. The latter is the more close palatal sound; but the distinction can only be learned by the ear.

XXIII. The letters cl, answering to kl, are pronounced as if written tl; clear, clean, are pronounced tlear, tlean.

Gl are pronounced as dl; glory is pronounced dlory.

XXIV. N after m, and closing a syllable, is silent; as in hymn, condemn.

XXV. P before s and t is mute; as in psalm, pseudology, ptarmigan, pronounced sam, sudology, tarmigan.

The letter y unaccented and terminating words of more syllables than one is short, like i in pity and ability. This letter, in the plural number of nouns and in the third person singular of the present tense of verbs, is dropped, and ie substituted and followed by s. The termination thus formed is pronounced iz; as from vanity, is formed vanities, pronounced vanitiz; from the verb to pity is formed pities, pronounced pitiz.

But when y in monosyllabic verbs, and accented y in other verbs ends the word, the termination ies in the third person is pronounced ize; as in flies from fly, defies from defy. So cries, both the verb and noun, is pronounced crize.

S has two sounds; its proper sound as in see, and that of z as in his. It has its proper sound after the following consonants f, p, t, k, C, and th aspirate, whether they end the word or are followed by e final; as in chiefs, caps, streets, franks, hates, hopes, fates, flakes, breaths, wreaths. It has the sound of z, after b, c followed by e final, d, g, gh, l, m, n, n, r, s and ss; z, t, aw, ay, ew, ey, ow, oy, sh, ng, th vocal, ch, oe, ie, both in nouns and verbs, and whether these letters end the word or are followed by e final; as in robs, robes, races, rods, rides, rags, rages, toils, dreams, sighs, rains, bars, waves, roses, passes, mazes, laws, days, news, preys, vows, joys, brushes, sings, breathes, churches, foes, goes, flies.

S before e, i and y, have only the sound of the single letter s or c. Thus scene is pronounced sene; sciolist, siolist.

S before m, in the terminations, asm, esm, ism, has the sound of z; as in spasm, telemm, baptism.

The pronunciation of the word which is radical or primitive in English is to be observed in the derivatives. Thus the letter s is directed to be pronounced as z in bruise, and this direction is to be observed in all its derivatives. Earth being directed to be pronounced erth, all its derivatives and compounds are to follow the same direction. So freight is pronounced frate.

POINTED LETTERS.

A has the short sound of aw; as in alter, what.

C [ke] is the same as k; as in cape, access.

E whether by itself or followed by i or y, has the sound of a long; as in where, there, vein, survey.

I has the sound of e long, or ee; as in machine.

O has the sound of oo, or French ou; as in move.

U has the sound of short u; as in come, wonder.

Q have the short sound of oo; as in book, look.

U has the sound of oo; as above, as in full, pull.

CH have the French sound, like sh; as in chaise.

G has the sound of j.

TH have their vocal sound; as in thou, this.

U has the sound of yu; as in unite, use, pronounced yunite, yuse.

In digraphs or combinations of vowels, of which one only is pronounced, the mark over one vowel designates the sound, and the other vowel is quiescent; as in bear, boat, course, soul, blood, bow, low, crow, bestow.

The digraphs ea, ee, ei, ie have uniformly the sound of long e; as in meat, feet, seize, siege.

Before the letter r, there is a slight sound of e between the vowel and the consonant. Thus bare, parent, apparent, mere, mire, more, pure, pyre, are pronounced nearly baer, paerent, appaerent, me-er, mier, moer, puer, pyer. This pronunciation proceeds from the peculiar articulation r, and it occasions a slight change of the sound of a, which can be learned only by the ear.

The vowels in unaccented syllables are either short, or they have their first sound slightly pronounced. Thus in the words produce, domestic, o has its first sound, but pronounced rapidly and without force. In syllables which have a secondary accent, the vowel is often long, and little distinguishable from that in syllables having the primary accent; as in legislature, in which a in the third syllable has its long sound.

In syllables wholly unaccented, the sounds of the vowels are so rapidly uttered, that they cannot be designated by written characters; they are all sounded nearly alike, and any attempt at a proper notation of such evanescent sounds serves only to perplex or mislead the learner.

Words of anomalous pronunciation, not falling under the foregoing rules, are printed in an orthography which expresses their true pronunciation.

The Welsh z has the sound of the vocal th, in thou.

In the expression of the sounds of foreign words in English characters there is often an insurmountable difficulty, as there are sounds, in some languages, which English characters, according to our use of them, will not express with precision. But in regard to etymology, such exact expression of sounds is not necessary. For example, in regard to the affinity of words, it is wholly immaterial whether the Hebrew \aleph is expressed by b, v, or bh; whether \daleth is expressed by d, th, or dh; whether \mem is expressed by h or ch; and whether \pe is expressed by k, q, or qu. So in Arabic it is immaterial whether \aleph is expressed by th or ds, and \sin by g or kh.

The Arabic vowel fatha, I am informed, is differently pronounced by the Persians and Arabians; the one nation pronouncing it as the English a in mate; the other, generally, as a in fall. I have expressed it by a or aw.

It was desirable that the Russ, Saxon, Swedish, and German words should be printed with the appropriate types; but the utility would have hardly compensated for the expense of suitable fonts, and no essential inconvenience can result from the want of them; the English characters being sufficient to express the sounds of the letters, with all the exactness which etymology requires.

The Arabic vowels are only three, viz. Fatha $\underline{\text{a}}$, e. Kesra $\underline{\text{i}}$, i. Dhamma $\underline{\text{u}}$, o, u. The diacritical signs are Jesm $\underline{\text{u}}$ or quiescent Shera. Teshdid $\underline{\text{u}}$ or Dagesh forte. Hamza ء placed over Elif when radical. Nunnation or double final vowels, ن ة و , showing that they are to be pronounced an, en or in, on or un.

The Persians use the Arabic alphabet with the addition of Pe ; Che ; Ghaf ; and Zhe .

NOTE.—In the foregoing alphabets, the order of the Arabic and Ethiopic letters is conformed to that of the Chaldee and Hebrew. The reader will observe two or three defects, which are owing to the imperfection of the fonts of type.

AN AMERICAN DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A

A is the first letter of the Alphabet in most of the known languages of the earth ; in the Ethiopic however it is the thirteenth, and in the Runic the tenth. It is naturally the first letter, because it represents the first vocal sound naturally formed by the human organs : being the sound uttered with a mere opening of the mouth without constraint, and without any effort to alter the natural position or configuration of the lips. Hence this letter is found in many words first uttered by infants ; which words are the names of the objects with which infants are first concerned, as the breast, and the parents. Hence in Hebrew am, is mother, and ab, is father. In Chaldee and Syriac abba is father ; in Arabic, aba ; in Ethiopic, abi ; in Malayan and Bengalese, bappa ; in Welsh, tad, whence we retain daddy ; in Old Greek and in Gothic atta ; in Irish, athair ; in Cantabrian, aita ; in Lapponic, atki ; in Abyssinian, abba ; in Amharic, aba ; in Shillitic and Melindane, African dialects, baba ; and papa is found in many nations. Hence the Latin mamma, the breast, which is, in popular use, the name of mother ; in Swedish, amma, is a nurse. This list might be greatly extended ; but these examples prove A to be the first natural vocal sound, and entitled to the first place in alphabets. The Hebrew name of this letter, aleph, signifies an ox or a leader.

A has in English, three sounds ; the long or slender, as in place, fate ; the broad, as in wall, fall, which is shortened in salt, what ; and the open, as in father, glass, which is shortened in rather, fancy. Its primitive sound was probably aw. A is also an abbreviation of the Saxon an or ane, one, used before words beginning with an articulation ; as a table, instead of an table, or one table. This is a modern change ; for in Saxon an was used before articulations, as well as vowels, as, an tid, a time, an gear, a year [See An.]

This letter serves as a prefix to many English words, as in asleep ; awake ; afoot ; aground ; agoing. In some cases, this is a contraction of the Teutonic ge, as in asleep, aware, from the Saxon geslapan, to sleep ; gewarian, to beware ; the Dutch gewaar. Sometimes it is a corruption of the Saxon on, as again from ongean, awake from onwacian, to watch or wake. Before participles, it may be a contraction of the Celtic ag, the sign of the participle of the present tense ; as, ag-radh, saying ; a saying, a going. Or this may be a contraction of on, or what is equally probable, it may have proceeded from a mere accidental sound produced by negligent utterance. In some words, a may be a contraction of at, of, in, to, or an. In some words of Greek original, a is privative, giving to them a negative sense, as in anonymous, from a and onyma name.

Among the ancients, A was a numeral denoting 500 ; and with a dash λ 5000. In the Hebrew, Syr. Ch. Sam. and Ar. it denotes one or unity. In the Julian Calendar, A is the first of the seven dominical letters.

Among logicians, A, as an abbreviation, stands for a universal affirmative proposition. A asserts ; E denies. Thus in barbara, a thrice repeated denotes so many of the propositions to be universal.

The Romans used A to signify a negative or dissent in giving their votes ; A standing for antiquo, I oppose or object to the proposed law. Opposed to this letter were U R, uti rogas, be it as you desire—the words used to express assent to a proposition. These letters were marked on wooden ballots, and each voter had an affirmative and a negative put into his hands, one of which at pleasure he gave as his vote.—In criminal trials, A stood for absolvo, I acquit ; C for condemno, I condemn ; and N L for non liquet, it is not evident ; and the judges voted by ballots thus marked.—In inscriptions, A stands for Augustus ; or for ager, aiunt, aurum, argentum, &c.

A is also used for anno, or ante ; as in Anno Domini, the year of our Lord ; anno mundi, the year of the world ; ante meridiem, before noon ; and for arts, in artium magister, master of arts. Among the Romans, A U C stood for anno ab urbe condita, from the building of the city or Rome. In algebra, a and the first letters of the alphabet represent known quantities—the last letters are sometimes used to represent unknown quantities.

In music, A is the nominal of the sixth note in the natural diatonic scale—called by Guido la. It is also the name of one of the two natural moods ; and it is the open note of the 2d string of the violin, by which the other strings are tuned and regulated.

In pharmacy, a or aa, abbreviations of the Greek ana, signify of each separately, or that the things mentioned should be taken in quantities of the same weight or measure.

In chemistry, AA stand for amalgama, or amalgamation.

In commerce, A stands for accepted, as in case of a bill of exchange. Merchants also number their books by the letters—A, B, C, instead of figures. Public officers number their exhibits in the same manner ; as the document A, or B.

Alpha and Omega, the first and last letters of the Greek Alphabet, are used in Scripture for the beginning and end—representative of Christ.

In mathematics, letters are used as representatives of numbers, lines, angles and quantities. In arguments, letters are substituted for persons, in cases supposed, or stated for illustration, as A contracts with B to deliver property to D.—In the English phraseology "a landlord has a hundred a year," "the sum amounted to ten dollars a man," a is merely the adjective one, and this mode of expression is idiomatic; a hundred in a [one] year; ten dollars to a [one] man.

A B A

AAM, n. [Ch. אַמָּה, or אַמָּה a cubit, a measure containing 5 or 6 palms.] A measure of liquids among the Dutch equal to 288 English pints.

AARONIC, a. Pertaining to Aaron, the Jewish High Priest, or to the priesthood of which he was the head. Doddridge.

AB, In English names, is an abbreviation of Abbey or Abbot; as Abbingdon, Abbeytown, Abbeyhill, Abbot-town.

AB, a prefix to words of Latin origin, and a Latin preposition, as in abscind, is the Greek απο, and the Eng. of, Ger. ab, D. af, Sw. Dan. af, written in ancient Latin af. It denotes from, separating or departure.

AB, The Hebrew name of Father. See Abba.

AB, The eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of the ecclesiastical year, answering to a part of July, and a part of August. In the Syriac Calendar, ab is the name of the last summer month.

ABACIST, n. [from abacus.] One that casts accounts; a calculator. [Not much used.]

ABACK adv. [a and back, Sax. on bac; at, on or towards the back. See Back.]

Towards the back; on the back part; backward. In seamen's language it signifies the situation of the sails, when pressed back against the mast by the wind.

Taken aback, is when the sails are carried back suddenly by the wind.

Laid aback, is when the sails are purposely placed in that situation to give the ship sternway. Mariner's Dict.

ABACOT, n. The cap of State, formerly used by English Kings, wrought into the figure of two crowns.

ABACTOR, n. [Latin from abigo, ab and ago, to drive.]

In law, one that feloniously drives away or steals a herd or numbers of cattle at once, in distinction from one that steals a sheep or two.

ABACUS n. [L. abacus, any thing flat, as a cupboard, a bench, a slate, a table or board for games; Gr. ἀβάξ. Usually deduced from the Oriental, אַבַּק abak, dust, because the ancients used tables covered with dust for making figures and diagrams.]

1. Among the Romans, a cupboard or buffet.
2. An instrument to facilitate operations in arithmetic; on this are drawn lines; a counter on the lowest line, is one; on the next, ten; on the third, a hundred, &c. On the spaces, counters denote half the number of the line above. Other schemes are called by the same name. The name is also given to a table of numbers cast up, as an abacus of addition; and by analogy, to the art of numbering, as in Knighton's Chronicle. Encyc.

3. In architecture, a table constituting the upper member or crowning of a column and its capital. It is usually square, but sometimes its sides are arched inwards. The name is also given to a concave molding on the capital of the Tuscan pedestal; and to the plinth above the boustrophedon in the Tuscan and Doric orders. Encyc.

ABACUS PYTHAGORICUS, The multiplication table, invented by Pythagoras.

ABACUS HARMONICUS, The structure and disposition of the keys of a musical instrument.

ABACUS MAJOR, A trough used in mines, to wash ore in. Encyc.

AB'ADA, n. A wild animal of Africa, of the size of a steer, or half grown colt, having two horns on its forehead and a third on the nape of the neck. Its head and tail resemble those of an ox, but it has cloven feet, like the stag. Cyc.

ABAD'DON, n. [Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. אַבְדֹן, to be lost, or destroyed, to perish.]

1. The destroyer, or angel of the bottomless pit. Rev. ix.
2. The bottomless pit. Milton.

AB'AFT, adv. or prep. [Sax. aft or aft, again. Hence after or after, after, subsequent; Sax. aftan, behind in place; to which word be is prefixed—beaftan, behind, and this word is corrupted into abast.]

A sea-term signifying in or at the hinder part of a ship, or the parts which lie towards the stern; opposed to afore. Relatively it denotes further aft or towards the stern; as abast the mainmast. Abast the beam, is in that arch of the horizon which is between a line drawn at right angles with the keel, and the point to which the stern is directed. It is often contracted into aft. Mar. Dict.

AB'AGUN, n. The name of a fowl in Ethiopia, remarkable for its beauty and for a sort of horn, growing on its head. The word signifies stately Abbot. Crabbe.

ABASANCE, [See Obeisance.]

ABALIENATE v. t. [See Alienate, Aliene.] To transfer the title of property from one to another—a term of the civil law—rarely or never used in common law proceedings.

ABALIENATION, n. The transferring of title to property. [See Alienation.]

ABANDON, v. t. [Fr. abandonner; Sp. and Port. abandonar; It. abbandonare; said to be from ban, and donner, to give over to the ban or proscription; or from a or ab and bandum, a flag or ensign.]

1. To forsake entirely; as to abandon a hopeless enterprise.

Who to that generation by which the testimony of God shall be abandoned. Dr. Mason.

2. To renounce and forsake; to leave with a view never to return; to desert as lost or desperate; as to abandon a country; to abandon a cause or party.

3. To give up or resign without control, as when a person yields himself, without restraint, to a propensity; as to abandon one's self to intemperance. Abandoned over and abandoned of are obsolete.

4. To resign; to yield, relinquish, or give over entirely.

Verus abandoned the cares of empire to his wiser colleague. Gibbon.

ABANDON, n. One who totally forsakes or deserts. Obs.

2. A relinquishment. [Not used.] Kames.

ABANDONED, pp. Wholly forsaken or deserted.

2. Given up, as to a vice; hence, extremely wicked, or sinning without restraint; irclaimably wicked.

A B A

ABANDONER, n. One who abandons.

ABANDONING, ppr. Forsaking or deserting wholly; renouncing; yielding one's self without restraint.

ABANDONING, n. A forsaking; total desertion.

He hoped his past meritorious actions might outweigh his present abandoning the thought of future actions. Clarendon.

ABANDONMENT, n. A total desertion; a state of being forsaken.

ABANGA, n. The ady; a species of Palm-tree. [See Ady.]

ABANNI'TION, n. [Low Lat.]

A banishment for one or two years for manslaughter. [Not used.] Dict.

ABAPTISTON, n. The perforating part of the trephine, an instrument used in trepanning. Core.

ABARE, v. t. [Sax. abarian. See Bare.] To make bare; to uncover. [Not in use.]

ABARTICULATION, n. [See Articulate.]

In anatomy, that species of articulation or structure of joints, which admits of manifest or extensive motion; called also diarthrosis and dearticulation. Encyc. Core.

ABAS', n. A weight in Persia used in weighing pearls, one eighth less than the European carat. Encyc.

ABA'SE, v. t. [Fr. abaisser, from bas, low, or the bottom; W. bais; Latin and Gr. basis; Eng. base; It. Abbassare; Sp. bazo, low. See Abash.]

1. The literal sense of abase is to lower or depress, to throw or cast down, as used by Bacon, "to abase the eye." But the word is seldom used in reference to material things.

2. To cast down; to reduce low; to depress; to humble; to degrade; applied to the passions, rank, office, and condition in life.

Those that walk in pride he is able to abase. Dan. iv.

Whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased. Mat. xxiii. Job, xl. 2 Cor. xi.

ABA'SED, pp. Reduced to a low state, humbled, degraded.

In heraldry, it is used of the wings of eagles, when the tops are turned downwards towards the point of the shield; or when the wings are shut, the natural way of bearing them being spread, with the top pointing to the chief of the angle. Bailey. Chambers.

ABA'SEMENT, n. The act of humbling or bringing low; also a state of depression, degradation, or humiliation.

ABASH', v. t. [Heb. and Ch. אַבַּשׁ bosh, to be confounded, or ashamed.]

To make the spirits to fail; to cast down the countenance; to make ashamed; to confound or confound, as by exciting suddenly a consciousness of guilt, error, inferiority, &c.

They heard and were abashed. Milton.

ABASH'ED, pp. Confused with shame; confounded; put to silence; followed by at.

ABASHING, ppr. Putting to shame or confusion.

ABASHMENT, n. Confusion from shame. [Little used.]

ABA'SING, ppr. Humbling, depressing, bringing low.

ABAS'SI, or ABAS'SIS, n. A silver coin of Persia, of the value of twenty cents, about ten pence sterling. Encyc.

A B A

ABA'TABLE, a. That may or can be abated; as an abatable writ or nuisance.

ABA'TE, v. t. [Fr. abattre, to beat down; battre, to beat, to strike; Sp. bahir, abatir; Port. bater, abater; It. battere, abbattere; Heb. Ch. בטח, to beat; Syr. ܕܒܬܐ id.

Ar. ܕܒܬܐ gabata, to beat, and ܕܒܬܐ kabatha, to beat down, to prostrate. The Saxon has the participle gebatod, abated. The prefix is sunk to a in abate, and lost in beat. See Class Bd. No. 23, 33.]

1. To beat down; to pull down; to destroy in any manner; as to abate a nuisance.
2. To lessen; to diminish; to moderate; as to abate zeal; to abate pride; to abate a demand; to abate courage.
3. To lessen; to mitigate; as to abate pain or sorrow.
4. To overthrow; to cause to fail; to frustrate by judicial sentence; as to abate a writ.
5. To deject; to depress; as to abate the soul. Obs.
6. To deduct;

Nothing to add and nothing to abate. Pope.

7. To cause to fail; to annul. By the English law, a legacy to a charity is abated by a deficiency of assets.
8. In Connecticut, to remit, as to abate a tax.

ABATE, v. i. To decrease, or become less in strength or violence; as pain abates; a storm abates.

2. To fail; to be defeated, or come to naught; as a writ abates. By the civil law a legacy to a charity does not abate by deficiency of assets.
3. In law, to enter into a freehold after the death of the last occupant, and before the heir or devisee takes possession.

Blackstone.

4. In horsemanship, to perform well a downward motion. A horse is said to abate, or take down his curvets, when, working upon curvets, he puts both his hind legs to the ground at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times. Encyc.

ABATED, pp. Lessened; decreased; destroyed; mitigated; defeated; remitted; overthrown.

ABATEMENT, n. The act of abating; the state of being abated.

AB'ATTIS, } n. [from beating or pulling
AB'ATIS, } down. Fr. abattre.]

Rubbish. In fortification, piles of trees, or branches of trees sharpened, and laid with the points outward, in front of ramparts, to prevent assailants from mounting the walls. Encyc.

AB'ATURE, n. [from abate.] Grass beaten or trampled down by a stag in passing. Dict.

ABB, n. [Sax. ab or ob.] Among weavers, yarn for the warp. Hence abb-wool is wool for the abb. Encyc.

ABBA, n. In the Chaldee and Syriac, a father, and figuratively a superior. Sans. appen.

In the Syriac, Coptic and Ethiopic churches, it is a title given to the Bishops, and the Bishops bestow the title, by way of distinction, on the Bishop of Alexandria. Hence the title Baba, or Papa, Pope or great father, which the Bishop of Alexandria bore, before the Bishop of Rome.

ABBACY, n. [from abba, Low Lat. abbatia.] The dignity, rights and privileges of an abbot. It comprehends the government and revenues.

ABBATICAL, } a. Belonging to an abbey.
ABBATIAL, }

ABBE, n. Ab'by, [from abba.]

In a monastic sense, the same as an abbot; but more generally, a title, in Catholic countries, without any determinate rank, office or rights. The abbess are numerous, and generally have some literary attainments; they dress as academics or scholars, and act as instructors, in colleges and private families; or as tutors to young gentlemen on their travels; and many of them become authors.

ABBESS, n. [from abba.]

A female superior or governess of a nunnery, or convent of nuns, having the authority over the nuns which the abbots have over the Monks. [See Abbey.]

ABBEY, n. plu. abbeys, [from abba.]

A monastery or society of persons of either sex, secluded from the world and devoted to religion. The males are called monks, and governed by an abbot; the females are called nuns, and governed by an abbess. These institutions were suppressed in England by Henry VIII.; but they still exist in Catholic countries.

ABBEY-LUBBER, n. A name given to monks, in contempt for their idleness.

ABBOT, n. [formerly abbat, from abba, latinized abbas, or from Heb. plural אבות.]

The superior or governor of an abbey or monastery. Originally monasteries were founded in retired places, and the religious had no concern with secular affairs, being entirely subject to the prelates. But the abbots possessing most of the learning, in ages of ignorance, were called from their seclusion to aid the churches in opposing heresies; monasteries were founded in the vicinity of cities; the abbots became ambitious and set themselves to acquire wealth and honors; some of them assumed the miter, threw off their dependence on the bishops, and obtained seats in parliament. For many centuries, princes and noblemen bore the title of abbots. At present, in catholic countries, abbots are regular, or such as take the vow, and wear the habit of the order; and commendatory, such as are seculars, but obliged, when of suitable age, to take orders. The title is borne also by some persons, who have not the government of a monastery; as bishops, whose sees were formerly abbeyes. Encyc.

A B D

ABBOTSHIP, n. The state of an abbot.

ABBREUVOIR, n. [Fr. abreuvoir, from abreuer, to water; Sp. abrevar, id.; from Gr. βρεχω.]

Among masons, the joint between stones in a wall, to be filled with mortar. Dict.

[I know not whether it is now used.]

ABBREVIATE, v. t. [It. abbreviare; Sp. abreviar; Port. abreviar; from brevis, short; contracted from Gr. βραχυς, from the root of break, which see.]

1. To shorten; to make shorter by contracting the parts. [In this sense, not much used, nor often applied to material substances.]
2. To shorten; to abridge by the omission or defalcation of a part; to reduce to a smaller compass; as to abbreviate a writing.
3. In mathematics, to reduce fractions to the lowest terms. Wallis.

ABBREVIATED, pp. Shortened; reduced in length; abridged.

2. In botany, an abbreviated perianth is shorter than the tube of the corol. Martyn.

ABBREVIATING, pp. Shortening; contracting in length or into a smaller compass.

ABBREVIATION, n. The act of shortening or contracting.

2. A letter or a few letters used for a word; as Gen. for Genesis; U. S. A. for United States of America.
3. The reduction of fractions to the lowest terms.

ABBREVIATOR, n. One who abridges or reduces to a smaller compass.

ABBREVIATORS, a college of seventy-two persons in the chancery of Rome, whose duty is to draw up the Pope's briefs, and reduce petitions, when granted, to a due form for bulls.

ABBREVIATORY, a. Shortening, contracting.

ABBREVIATURE, n. A letter or character for shortening; an abridgment, a compend.

A. B. C. The three first letters of the alphabet, used for the whole alphabet. Also a little book for teaching the elements of reading. Shak.

AB'DALS, n. The name of certain fanatics in Persia, who, in excess of zeal, sometimes run into the streets, and attempt to kill all they meet who are of a different religion; and if they are slain for their madness, they think it meritorious to die, and by the vulgar are deemed martyrs. Encyc.

AB'DERITE, n. An inhabitant of Abdera, a maritime town in Thrace. Democritus is so called, from being a native of the place. As he was given to laughter, foolish or incessant laughter, is called abderian. Whitaker.

AB'ICANT, a. [See Aldicate.] Abdicating; renouncing.

A B D

ABDICATE, v. t. [L. abdico; ab and dico, to dedicate, to bestow, but the literal primary sense of dico is to send or thrust.]

1. In a general sense, to relinquish, renounce, or abandon. Forster.
2. To abandon an office or trust, without a formal resignation to those who conferred it, or without their consent; also to abandon a throne, without a formal surrender of the crown.

Case of King James, Blackstone.

3. To relinquish an office before the expiration of the time of service.

Case of Diocletian, Gibbon; also Case of Paul III. Core's Russ.

4. To reject; to renounce; to abandon as a right. Burke.
5. To cast away; to renounce; as to abdicate our mental faculties. [Unusual.] J. P. Smith.
6. In the civil law, to disclaim a son and expel him from the family, as a father; to disinherit during the life of the father. Encyc.

ABDICATE, v. i. To renounce; to abandon; to cast off; to relinquish, as a right, power, or trust.

Though a King may abdicate for his own person, he cannot abdicate for the monarchy. Burke.

ABDICATED, pp. Renounced; relinquished without a formal resignation; abandoned.

ABDICATING, ppr. Relinquishing without a formal resignation; abandoning.

ABDICATION, n. The act of abdicating; the abandoning of an office or trust, without a formal surrender, or before the usual or stated time of expiration.

2. A casting off; rejection.

ABDITIVE, a. [L. abdo, to hide; ab and do.] Having the power or quality of hiding. [Little used.] Dict.

ABDITORY, n. A place for secreting or preserving goods. Covel.

ABDOMEN, or ABDO'MEN, n. [L. per-haps abdo and omentum.]

1. The lower belly, or that part of the body which lies between the thorax and the bottom of the pelvis. It is lined with a membrane called peritoneum, and contains the stomach, liver, spleen, pancreas, kidneys, bladder and guts. It is separated from the breast internally by the diaphragm, and externally, by the extremities of the ribs. On its outer surface it is divided into four regions—the epigastric, the umbilical, the hypogastric and lumbar. Quincy.

2. In insects, the lower part of the animal, united to the corslet by a thread. In some species, it is covered with wings, and a case. It is divided into segments and rings, on the sides of which are small spiracles by which the insect respires. D. Nat. Hist.

ABDOM'INAL, a. Pertaining to the lower belly.

ABDOM'INAL, n. plu. abdominals. In ichthyology the abdominals are a class of fish whose ventral fins are placed behind the pectoral, and which belong to the division of bony fish. The class contains nine genera—the loche, salmon, pike, argentine, atherine, mullet, flying fish, herring and carp. Encyc.

ABDOMINAL RING, or INGUINAL RING, an oblong tendinous ring in both groins, through which pass the spermatic cord in men, and the round ligaments of the uterus in women. Med. Dict.

ABDOMINOUS, a. Pertaining to the abdomen; having a large belly. Cowper.

ABDUCE, v. t. [L. abduco, to lead away, of ab and duco, to lead. See Duke.]

To draw from; to withdraw, or draw to a different part; used chiefly in anatomy.

ABDUCENT, a. Drawing from, pulling back; used of those muscles which pull back certain parts of the body, for separating, opening, or bending them. The abducent muscles, called abductors, are opposed to the adducent muscles or adductors. Med. Dict.

ABDUCTION, n. In a general sense, the act of drawing apart, or carrying away.

2. In surgery, a species of fracture, in which the broken parts recede from each other.

3. In logic, a kind of argumentation, called by the Greeks apagoge, in which the major is evident, but the minor is not so clear, as not to require farther proof. As in this syllogism, "all whom God absolves are free from sin; God absolves all who are in Christ; therefore all who are in Christ are free from sin." Encyc.
4. In law, the taking and carrying away of a child, a ward, a wife, &c. either by fraud, persuasion, or open violence. Blackstone.

ABDUC'TOR, n. In anatomy, a muscle which serves to withdraw, or pull back a certain part of the body; as the abductor oculi, which pulls the eye outwards.

ABEAR, v. t. abäre, [Sax. abaran.] To bear; to behave. Obs. Spenser.

ABE'ARANCE, n. [from abear, now disused; from bear, to carry.] Behavior, demeanor. [Little used.] Blackstone.

ABECEDA'RIAN, n. [a word formed from the first four letters of the alphabet.] One who teaches the letters of the alphabet, or a learner of the letters.

ABECE'DARY, a. Pertaining to, or formed by the letters of the alphabet.

ABED, adv. [See Bed.] On or in bed.

ABE'LE, or ABEL-TREE, n. An obsolete name of the white poplar. [See Poplar.]

ABE'LIANS, ABELO'NIANS or ABEL-ITES, in Church history, a sect in Africa which arose in the reign of Arcadius; they married, but lived in continence, after the manner, as they pretended, of Abel, and attempted to maintain the sect by adopting the children of others. Encyc.

A'BELMOSK, n. A trivial name of a species of hibiscus, or Syrian mallow. The plant rises on a herbaceous stalk, three or four feet, sending out two or three side branches. The seeds have a musky odor, (whence its name, moschos), for which reason the Arabians mix them with coffee.

ABER'RANCE, } n. [L. aberrans, aberro, ABER'RANCY, } to wander from; of ab
and erro, to wander.]

A wandering or deviating from the right way, but rarely used in a literal sense. In a figurative sense, a deviation from truth, error, mistake; and in morals, a fault, a deviation from rectitude. Brown.

ABER'RANT, a. Wandering, straying from the right way. [Rarely used.]

ABERRATION, n. [L. aberratio.] The act of wandering from the right way; deviation from truth or moral rectitude; deviation from a strait line.

2. In astronomy, a small apparent motion of the fixed stars, occasioned by the progressive motion of light and the earth's annual motion in its orbit. By this, they sometimes appear twenty seconds distant from their true situation. Lunier.

3. In optics, a deviation in the rays of light, when inflected by a lens or speculum, by which they are prevented from uniting in the same point. It is occasioned by the figure of the glass, or by the unequal refrangibility of the rays of light. Encyc.

Crown of aberration, a luminous circle surrounding the disk of the sun, depending on the aberration of its rays, by which its apparent diameter is enlarged. Cyc.

ABER'RING, part. a. Wandering; going astray. Brown.

ABERRUN'CATE, v. t. [L. aberrunco.] To pull up by the roots; to extirpate utterly. [Not used.] Dict.

ABET, v. t. [Sax. betan, gebetan; properly to push forward, to advance; hence to amend, to revive, to restore, to make better; and applied to fire, to increase the flame, to excite, to promote. Hence to aid by encouraging or instigating. Hence in Saxon, "Na bete nan man that fyr." Let no man bet, [better, excite] the fire, LL. Ina. 78.]

1. To encourage by aid or countenance, but now used chiefly in a bad sense. "To abet an opinion," in the sense of support, is used by Bishop Cumberland; but this use is hardly allowable.

2. In law, to encourage, counsel, incite or assist in a criminal act.

ABET, n. The act of aiding or encouraging in a crime. [Not used.]

ABETMENT, n. The act of abetting.

ABETTED, pp. Incited, aided, encouraged to a crime.

ABETTING, ppr. Counselling, aiding or encouraging to a crime.

ABETTOR, n. One who abets, or incites, aids or encourages another to commit a crime. In treason, there are no abettors; all persons concerned being principals.

ABEVACUATION, n. [ab and evacuation.] In medicine, a partial evacuation of morbid humors of the body, either by nature or art. Cyc.

ABEY'ANCE, n. pron. abiyance. [Norm. abbaiaunce, or abaizance, in expectation; boyance, expectation. Qu. Fr. bayer, to gape, to look a long time with the mouth open; to stand looking in a silly manner; It. badare, to amuse one's self, to stand trifling; "tenere a bada," to keep at bay; "Star a bada," to stand trifling. If Bd are the radical letters, it seems to belong to the root of abide. See Bay.]

In expectation or contemplation of law. The fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is in abeyance, when there is no person in being in whom it can vest; so that it is in a state of expectancy or waiting until a proper person shall appear.

A B I

Thus if land is leased to a man for life, remainder to another for years, the remainder for years is in abeyance, till the death of the lessee, for life. Blackstone.

ABHOR', v. t. [L. abhorreo, of ab and horreo, to set up bristles, shiver or shake; to look terrible.]

1. To hate extremely, or with contempt; to loathe, detest or abominate. Shak.

2. To despise or neglect. Ps. xxii. 24. Amos vi. 8.

3. To cast off or reject. Ps. lxxxix. 38.

ABHOR'RED, pp. Hated extremely, detested.

ABHOR'RENCE, n. Extreme hatred, detestation, great aversion.

ABHOR'RENT, a. Hating, detesting, struck with abhorrence.

2. Contrary, odious, inconsistent with, expressive of extreme opposition, as, "Slander is abhorrent to all ideas of justice." In this sense, it should be always followed by to—abhorrent from is not agreeable to the English idiom.

ABHOR'RENTLY, adv. With abhorrence.

ABHOR'RER, n. One who abhors.

ABHOR'RING, ppr. Having great aversion, detesting. As a noun, it is used in Isaiah lxvi. for the object of hatred—"An abhorring to all flesh."

ABIB, n. [Heb. אִב, swelling, protuberant. Ch. אִב, to produce the first or early fruit; אִב, a full grown ear of corn.]

The first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, called also Nisan. It begins at the spring equinox, and answers to the latter part of March and beginning of April. Its name is derived from the full growth of wheat in Egypt, which took place anciently, as it does now, at that season.

ABIDE, v. i. pret. and part. abode. [Ar. أَبَدَ, abada, to be, or exist, to continue; W. bod, to be; Sax. bidan, abidan; Sw. bida; D. beiden; Dan. bier; Russ. bitayu, to dwell, rest, continue, stand firm, or be stationary for any time indefinitely. Class Bd. No 7.]

1. To rest, or dwell. Gen. xxix. 19.

2. To tarry or stay for a short time. Gen. xxiv. 55.

3. To continue permanently or in the same state; to be firm and immovable. Ps. cxix. 90.

4. To remain, to continue. Acts, xxvii. 31. Eccles. viii. 15.

ABIDE, v. t. To wait for; to be prepared for; to await.

Bonds and afflictions abide me. Acts, xx. 23. [For is here understood.]

2. To endure or sustain.

To abide the indignation of the Lord. Joel x.

3. To bear or endure; to bear patiently. "I cannot abide his impertinence."

This verb when intransitive, is followed by in or at before the place, and with before the person. "Abide with me—at Jerusalem or in this land." Sometimes by on, the sword shall abide on his cities; and in the sense of wait, by for, abide for me. Hosea, iii. 3. Sometimes by by, abide by the crib. Job, xxxix.

In general, abide by signifies to adhere to, maintain, defend, or stand to, as to abide by a promise, or by a friend; or to suffer the consequences, as to abide by the event, that is, to be fixed or permanent in a particular condition.

ABIDER, n. One who dwells or continues.

ABIDING, ppr. Dwelling; remaining; continuing; enduring; awaiting.

ABIDING, n. Continuance; fixed state; residence; an enduring.

ABIDINGLY, adv. In a manner to continue; permanently. Haweis.

ABILITY, n. [Fr. habileté; It. abilità; Sp. habilidad; L. habilitas, ableness, fitness, from habeo, to have or hold.]

1. Physical power, whether bodily or mental; natural or acquired; force of understanding; skill in arts or science. Ability is active power, or power to perform; as opposed to capacity, or power to receive. In the plural, abilities is much used in a like sense; and also for faculties of the mind, and acquired qualifications. Franklin.

2. Riches, wealth, substance, which are the means, or which furnish the power, of doing certain acts. They gave after their ability to the work. Ez. ii.

3. Moral power, depending on the will—a metaphysical and theological sense.

4. Civil or legal power; the power or right to do certain things, as an ability to transfer property or dispose of effects—ability to inherit. It is opposed to disability. Cyc.

ABINTESTATE, a. [L. ab and intestatus—dying without a will, from in and testor, to bear witness; W. tyst; Arm. test, witness. See Test and Testify.]

In the civil law, inheriting the estate of one dying without a will.

ABJECT', v. t. To throw away; to cast out. Obs. Spenser.

ABJECT, a. [L. abjectus, from abjicio, to throw away, from ab and jacio, to throw.]

1. Sunk to a low condition; applied to persons or things. Hence,

2. Worthless, mean, despicable, low in estimation, without hope or regard.

ABJECT, n. A person in the lowest condition and despicable. Ps. xxxv.

ABJECTEDNESS, n. A very low or despicable condition. [Little used.]

ABJECTION, n. A state of being cast away; hence a low state; meanness of spirit; baseness.

ABJECTLY, adv. In a contemptible manner; meanly; servilely.

ABJECTNESS, n. The state of being abject; meanness; servility.

ABJURATION, n. [See Abjure.]

1. The act of abjuring; a renunciation upon oath; as "an abjuration of the realm," by which a person swears to leave the country, and never to return. It is used also for the oath of renunciation. Formerly in England, felons, taking refuge in a church, and confessing their guilt, could not be arrested and tried, but might save their lives by abjuring the realm; that is, by taking an oath to quit the kingdom forever.

2. A rejection or denial with solemnity; a total abandonment; as "an abjuration of heresy."

ABJURATORY, a. Containing abjuration. Encyc.

ABJURE, v. t. [L. abjuro, to deny upon oath, from ab and juro, to swear.]

1. To renounce upon oath; to abandon; as to abjure allegiance to a prince.

2. To renounce or reject with solemnity; to reject; as to abjure errors; abjure reason.

3. To recant or retract. Shak.

4. To banish. [Not used.]

ABJURED, pp. Renounced upon oath; solemnly recanted.

ABJURER, n. One who abjures.

ABJURING, ppr. Renouncing upon oath; disclaiming with solemnity.

ABLACTATE, v. t. [L. ablacto; from ab and lac, milk.] To wean from the breast. [Little used.]

ABLACTATION, n. [L. ab and lac, milk. Lacto, to suckle.]

1. In medical authors, the weaning of a child from the breast.

2. Among ancient gardeners, a method of grafting in which the cion was not separated from the parent stock, till it was firmly united to that in which it was inserted. This is now called grafting by approach or inarching. [See Graft.] Encyc.

ABLAQUEATION, [L. ablaqueatio, from ab and laquear, a roof or covering.]

A laying bare the roots of trees to expose them to the air and water—a practice among gardeners.

ABLATION, n. [L. ab and latio, a carrying.]

A carrying away. In medicine, the taking from the body whatever is hurtful; evacuations in general. In chemistry, the removal of whatever is finished or no longer necessary.

ABLATIVE, a. [F. ablatif; It. ablativo; L. ablativus; L. ablatus, from aufero, to carry away, of ab and fero.]

A word applied to the sixth case of nouns in the Latin language, in which case are used words when the actions of carrying away, or taking from, are signified.

Ablative absolute, is when a word in that case, is independent, in construction, of the rest of the sentence.

ABLE, a. abl. [L. habilis; Norm. ablez.]

1. Having physical power sufficient; having competent power or strength, bodily or mental; as a man able to perform military service—a child is not able to reason on abstract subjects.

2. Having strong or unusual powers of mind, or intellectual qualifications; as an able minister.

Provide out of all Israel able men. Ex. xviii.

3. Having large or competent property; or simply having property, or means.

Every man shall give as he is able. Deut. xvi.

4. Having competent strength or fortitude.

He is not able to sustain such pain or affliction.

5. Having sufficient knowledge or skill.

He is able to speak French.

She is not able to play on the piano.

6. Having competent moral power or qualifications.

An illegitimate son is not able to take by inheritance.

ABLE-BODIED, a. Having a sound, strong body, or a body of competent strength for service. In marine language, it denotes skill in seamanship. Mar. Dict.

ABO'DE, v. i. To be an omen. Dryden.

ABO'DEMENT, n. [from bode.] A secret anticipation of something future. Shak.

ABO'DING, n. Presentiment; prognostication. Hall.

ABOL'ISH, v. t. [Fr. abolir; L. aboleo; from ab and oleo, olesco, to grow.]

1. To make void; to annul; to abrogate; applied chiefly and appropriately to established laws, contracts, rites, customs and institutions—as to abolish laws by a repeal, actual or virtual.

2. To destroy, or put an end to; as to abolish idols. Isa. ii. To abolish death, 2 Tim. i. This sense is not common. To abolish posterity, in the translation of Pausanias, Lib. 3. Ca. 6. is hardly allowable.

ABOL'ISHABLE, a. That may be annulled, abrogated, or destroyed, as a law, rite, custom, &c.

ABOL'ISHED, pp. Annulled; repealed; abrogated, or destroyed.

ABOL'ISHER, n. One who abolishes.

ABOL'ISHING, ppr. Making void; annulling; destroying.

ABOL'ISHMENT, n. The act of annulling; abrogation; destruction. Hooker.

ABOLI'TION, n. abolishun. The act of abolishing; or the state of being abolished; an annulling; abrogation; utter destruction; as the abolition of laws, decrees, ordinances, rites, customs, debts, &c.

The application of this word to persons and things, is now unusual or obsolete. To abolish persons, canals and senses, the language of good writers formerly, is no longer legitimate.

ABOM'INABLE, a. [See Abominate.] Very hateful; detestable; lothesome.

2. This word is applicable to whatever is odious to the mind or offensive to the senses. Milton.

3. Unclean. Levit. vii.

ABOM'INABLENESS, n. The quality or state of being very odious; hatefulness.

ABOM'INABLY, adv. Very odiously; detestably; sinfully. 1 Kings xxi.

2. In vulgar language, extremely, excessively.

ABOM'INATE, v. t. [L. abomino, supposed to be formed by ab and omen; to deprecate as ominous; may the Gods avert the evil.]

Aboriginal tribes of America.

President Smith.

ABORIG'INAL, n. An original, or primitive inhabitant. The first settlers in a country are called aboriginals; as the Celts in Europe, and Indians in America.

President Smith.

ABORIG'INES, n. plur. Aborigine— but not an English word.

It may be well to let it pass into disuse. [See Aboriginal.]

ABORSEMENT, n. abors'ment. [See Abort.] Abortion. [Not in use.]

ABORT', v. t. [L. aborto; ab and ortus, orior.] To miscarry in birth. [Not in use.]

Herbert.

ABORT', n. An abortion. [Not in use.]

Burton.

ABOR'TION, n. [L. abortio, a miscarriage; usually deduced from ab and orior.]

1. The act of miscarrying, or producing young before the natural time, or before the fetus is perfectly formed.

2. In a figurative sense, any fruit or produce that does not come to maturity, or any thing which fails in its progress, before it is matured or perfect, as a design or project.

3. The fetus brought forth before it is perfectly formed.

ABOR'TIVE, a. Brought forth in an immature state; failing, or coming to naught, before it is complete.

2. Failing in its effect; miscarrying; producing nothing; as an abortive scheme.

3. Rendering abortive; as abortive gulf, in Milton, but not legitimate.

4. Pertaining to abortion; as abortive vellum, made of the skin of an abortive calf.

Encyc.

5. In botany, an abortive flower is one which falls without producing fruit. Martyn.

ABOR'TIVE, n. That which is brought forth or born prematurely. [Little used.]

ABOR'TIVELY, adv. Immaturely; in an untimely manner.

ABOR'TIVENESS, n. The state of being abortive; a failing in the progress to perfection or maturity; a failure of producing the intended effect.

ABORT'MENT, n. An untimely birth. Bacon.

ABOUND', v. i. [L. abundo; Fr. abonder; It. abbondare; Sp. abundar. If this word is from L. unda, a wave, the latter has probably lost its first consonant. Abound may naturally be deduced from the Celtic. Arm. sonn, plenty; sonna, to abound; W. fyniar, to produce, to generate, to abound, from fin, a source, the root of fynon. L. fons, a fountain.]

A B G

1. To have or possess in great quantity; to be copiously supplied; followed by with or in; as to abound with provisions; to abound in good things.
2. To be in great plenty; to be very prevalent. Where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. Rom. v.
- ABOUND'ING, ppr. Having in great plenty; being in great plenty; being very prevalent; generally prevailing.
- ABOUND'ING, n. Increase. South.
- ABOUT', prep. [Sax. abutan, onbutan, embutan, about, around; on or emb, coinciding with Gr. αὐτός, and butan, without, [see but,] literally, around, on the outside.]
1. Around; on the exterior part or surface. Bind them about thy neck. Prov. iii. 3. Isa. i. Hence,
2. Near to in place, with the sense of circularity. Get you up from about the tabernacle. Num. xvi.
3. Near to in time. He went out about the third hour. Mat. xxi. 3.
4. Near to, in action, or near to the performance of some act. Paul was about to open his mouth. They were about to flee out of the ship. Acts, xviii. 14—xxvii. 30.
5. Near to the person; appended to the clothes. Every thing about him is in order. Is your snuff box about you?
- From nearness on all sides, the transition is easy to a concern with. Hence,
6. Concerned in, engaged in, relating to, respecting. I must be about my father's business. Luke, ii. 49. The painter is not to take so much pains about the drapery as about the face. Dryden. What is he about?
7. In compass or circumference; two yards about the trunk.
- ABOUT', adv. Near to in number or quantity. There fell that day about three thousand men. Ex. xxxii.
2. Near to in quality or degree; as about as high, or as cold.
3. Here and there; around; in one place and another. Wandering about from house to house. 1. Tim. v.
4. Round, or the longest way, opposed to across, or the shortest way. A mile about, and half a mile across. To bring about, to bring to the end; to effect or accomplish a purpose. To come about, to change or turn; to come to the desired point. In a like sense, seamen say go about, when a ship changes her course and goes on the other tack. Ready about, about ship, are orders for tacking.
- To go about, signifies to enter upon; also to prepare; to seek the means. Why go ye about to kill me. John, vii.
- ABOVE', prep. [Sax. abufan, bufan, bufon; D. boven.]
1. Literally, higher in place. The fowls that fly above the earth. Gen. i. 20.
2. Figuratively, superior in any respect. I saw a light above the brightness of the Sun, Acts, xxvi. The price of a virtuous woman is above rubies, Prov. xxxi.
3. More in number or quantity. He was seen by above five hundred brethren at once, 1. Cor. xv. 6.

A B O

- The weight is above a tun.
4. More in degree; in a greater degree. Hannaniah feared God above many. Neh. vii. 2.
- The serpent is cursed above all cattle. Gen. iii.
5. Beyond; in excess. In stripes above measure. 2. Cor. xi. God will not suffer you to be tempted above what ye are able, 1. Cor. x. 13.
6. Beyond; in a state to be unattainable; as things above comprehension.
7. Too proud for. This man is above his business.
8. Too elevated in mind or rank; having too much dignity for; as This man is above mean actions.
9. It is often used elliptically, for heaven, or the celestial regions. Let not God regard it from above, Job, iii. The powers above.
10. In a book or writing, it denotes before or in a former place, as what has been said above; supra. This mode of speaking originated in the ancient manner of writing, on a strip of parchment, beginning at one end and proceeding to the other. The beginning was the upper end.
- ABOVE', adv. Overhead; in a higher place. Bacon. Dryden.
2. Before.
3. Chief in rank or power. Deut. xxviii.
- Above all* is elliptical; above all considerations; chiefly; in preference to other things. Above board; above the board or table; in open sight; without trick, concealment or deception. This expression is said by Johnson to be borrowed from gamblers, who, when they change their cards, put their hands under the table.
- ABOVE-CITED, Cited before, in the preceding part of a book or writing.
- ABOVE-GROUND, Alive, not buried.
- ABOVE-MENTIONED, Mentioned before.
- A. Bp. Abbrev. for Archbishop.
- ABRACADABRA, The name of a deity worshipped by the Syrians: a cabalistic word. The letters of his name, written on paper, in the form of an inverted cone, were recommended by Samonicus as an antidote against certain diseases. Encyc.
- ABRA'DE, v. t. [L. abrado, to scrape, from rado.] To rub or wear off; to waste by friction; used especially to express the action of sharp, corrosive medicines, in wearing away or removing the mucus of the membranes.
- ABRA'DED, pp. Rubbed or worn off; worn; scraped.
- ABRA'DING, ppr. Rubbing off; wearing.
- ABRAHAM'IC, a. Pertaining to Abraham, the patriarch, as Abrahamic Covenant. Mason.
- ABRA'SION, n. abra'zhun. The act of wearing or rubbing off; also substance worn off by attrition. Quincy.
- ABREAST', adv. abrest', [from a and breast.]
1. Side by side; with the breasts in a line. Two men rode abreast.
2. In marine language, ships are abreast when their heads are equally advanced; and they are abreast of objects when the objects are on a line with the beam.—Hence,
3. Opposite; against; on a line with—as a ship was abreast of Montauk point.—A seaman's phrase.

A B O

- ABRIDGE', v. t. abridj', [Fr. abréger, from Gr. βραχυς, short, or its root, from the root of break or a verb of that family.]
1. To make shorter; to epitomize; to contract by using fewer words, yet retaining the sense in substance—used of writings. Justin abridged the history of Troguus Pompeius.
2. To lessen; to diminish; as to abridge labor; to abridge power or rights. Smith.
3. To deprive; to cut off from; followed by of; as to abridge one of his rights, or enjoyments. To abridge from, is now obsolete or improper.
4. In algebra, to reduce a compound quantity or equation to its more simple expression. The equation thus abridged is called a formula.
- ABRIDG'ED pp. Made shorter; epitomized; reduced to a smaller compass; lessened; deprived.
- ABRIDG'ER, n. One who abridges; one who makes a compend.
- ABRIDG'ING, ppr. Shortening; lessening; depriving; debarring.
- ABRIDG'MENT, n. An epitome; a compend, or summary of a book.
2. Diminution; contraction; reduction—as an abridgment of expenses.
3. Deprivation; a debarring or restraint—as an abridgment of pleasures.
- ABROACH, adv. [See Broach.]
- Broached; letting out or yielding liquor, or in a posture for letting out; as a cask is abroach. Figuratively used by Shakespeare for setting loose, or in a state of being diffused, "Set mischief abroach;" but this sense is unusual.
- ABROAD, adv. abrawd'. [See Broad.]
- In a general sense, at large; widely; not confined to narrow limits. Hence,
1. In the open air.
2. Beyond or out of the walls of a house, as to walk abroad.
3. Beyond the limits of a camp. Deut. xxiii. 10.
4. Beyond the bounds of a country; in foreign countries—as to go abroad for an education.—We have broils at home and enemies abroad.
5. Extensively; before the public at large. He began to blaze abroad the matter. Mark i. 45. Esther i.
6. Widely; with expansion; as a tree spreads its branches abroad.
- AB'ROGATE, v. t. [L. abrogo, to repeal from ab and rogo, to ask or propose. See the English reach. Class Rg.]
- To repeal; to annul by an authoritative act; to abolish by the authority of the maker or his successor; applied to the repeal of laws, decrees, ordinances, the abolition of established customs &c.
- AB'ROGATED pp. Repealed; annulled by an act of authority.
- AB'ROGATING, ppr. Repealing by authority; making void.
- ABROGA'TION, n. The act of abrogating; a repeal by authority of the legislative power.
- ABROOD' adv. [See Brood.] In the action of brooding. [Not in use.] Sanerost.
- ABROOD'ING, n. A sitting abroad. [Not in use.] Bassel.
- ABROOK', v. t. To brook, to endure. [Not in use. See Brook.] Shak.

not in company. It is used to denote any distance indefinitely, either in the same town, or country, or in a foreign country; and primarily supposes a prior presence. "Speak well of one in his absence."

2. Want; destitution; implying no previous presence. "In the absence of conventional law." Ch. Kent.

3. In law, non-appearance; a not being in court to answer.

4. Heedlessness; inattention to things present. Absence of mind is the attention of the mind to a subject which does not occupy the rest of the company, and which draws the mind from things or objects which are present, to others distant or foreign.

ABSENT, a. Not present; not in company; at such a distance as to prevent communication. It is used also for being in a foreign country.

A gentleman is absent on his travels.

Absent from one another. Gen. xxxi. 49.

2. Heedless; inattentive to persons present, or to subjects of conversation in company.

An absent man is uncivil to the company.

3. In familiar language, not at home; as, the master of the house is absent. In other words, he does not wish to be disturbed by company.

ABSENT¹, v. t. To depart to such a distance as to prevent intercourse; to retire or withdraw; to forbear to appear in presence; used with the reciprocal pronoun. Let a man absent himself from the company.

ABSENTEE, n. One who withdraws from his country, office or estate; one who removes to a distant place or to another country.

ABSENTER, n. One who absents himself.

ABSENTMENT, n. A state of being absent.

Barrow.

ABSINTHIAN, a. [from absinthium.] Of the nature of wormwood. Randolph.

ABSINTHATED, a. Impregnated with wormwood. Dict.

ABSINTHIUM, n. [Gr. αψινθιον; Per.

أفسينثين; the same in Chaldaic. Budeus in his commentaries on Theophrast, supposes the word composed of a priv. and ψθος, delight, so named from its bitterness. But it may be an Oriental word.]

The common wormwood; a bitter plant, used as a tonic. A species of Artemisia.

ABSIS, In astronomy. [See Apsis.]

ABSOLUTE, a. [L. absolutus. See Absolve.]

1. Literally, in a general sense, free, independent of anything extraneous. Hence,

2. Complete in itself; positive; as an absolute declaration.

3. Unconditional, as an absolute promise.

4. Existing independent of any other cause, as God is absolute.

5. Unlimited by extraneous power or control, as an absolute government or prince.

6. Not relative, as absolute space. Stillingfleet.

In grammar, the case absolute, is when a word or member of a sentence is not immediately dependent on the other parts of the sentence in government.

Absolute equation, in astronomy, is the aggregate of the optic and eccentric equations. The apparent inequality of a planet's motion in its orbit, arising from its unequal distances from the earth at different times, is called its optic equation: the eccentric inequality is caused by the uniformity of the planet's motion, in an elliptical orbit, which, for that reason, appears not to be uniform.

Absolute numbers, in algebra, are such as have no letters annexed, as $2a+36=48$. The two latter numbers are absolute or pure. Encyc.

Absolute space, in physics, is space considered without relation to any other object. Bailey.

Absolute gravity, in philosophy, is that property in bodies by which they are said to weigh so much, without regard to circumstances of modification, and this is always as the quantity of matter they contain. Bailey.

ABSOLUTELY, adv. Completely, wholly, as a thing is absolutely unintelligible.

2. Without dependence or relation; in a state unconnected.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve, either willingly to live, or forwardness to die. Hooker.

3. Without restriction or limitation; as God reigns absolutely.

4. Without condition, as God does not forgive absolutely, but upon condition of faith and repentance.

5. Positively, peremptorily, as command me absolutely not to go. Milton.

ABSOLUTENESS, n. Independence; completeness in itself.

2. Despotical authority, or that which is subject to no extraneous restriction, or control.

ABSOLUTION, n. In the civil law, an acquittal or sentence of a judge declaring an accused person innocent. In the canon law, a remission of sins pronounced by a priest in favor of a penitent. Among protestants, a sentence by which an excommunicated person is released from his liability to punishment. Ayliffe. South.

ABSOLUTORY, a. Absolving; that absolves.

ABSOLVATORY, a. [from absolve.] Containing absolution, pardon, or release; having power to absolve. Colgrave.

ABSOLVE, v. t. absolv', [L. absolvere, from ab and solvo, to loose or release; Ch. לשׁוּב, to absolve, to finish; Heb. לשׁוּב, to loose or loosen. See Solve.]

To set free or release from some obligation, debt or responsibility; or from that which subjects a person to a burden or penalty; as to absolve a person from a promise; to absolve an offender, which amounts to an acquittal and remission of his punishment. Hence, in the civil law, the word was used for acquit; and in the canon law, for forgive, or a sentence of remission. In ordinary language, its sense is to set free or release from an engagement. Formerly, good writers used the word in the sense of finish, accomplish; as to absolve work, in Milton; but in this sense, it seems to be obsolete.

ABSOLVED, pp. Released; acquitted; remitted; declared innocent.

ABSOLVER, n. One who absolves; also one that pronounces sin to be remitted.

ABSOLVING, ppr. Setting free from a debt, or charge; acquitting; remitting.
ABSONANT, a. [See Absonous.] Wide from the purpose; contrary to reason.
ABSONOUS, a. [L. absonus; ab and sonus, sound.] Unmusical, or untunable.

Fotherby.

ABSORB, v. t. [L. absorbeo, ab and sorbeo, to drink in; Ar. شرب sharaba; Eth. ስብ or ሠብ, id.; Rab. שׁוּב, to draw or drink in; whence sirup, sherbet, shrub.]

1. To drink in; to suck up; to imbibe; as a sponge, or as the lacteals of the body.
2. To drink in, swallow up, or overwhelm with water, as a body in a whirlpool.
3. To waste wholly or sink in expenses; to exhaust; as, to absorb an estate in luxury.
4. To engross or engage wholly, as, absorbed in study or the pursuit of wealth.

ABSORBABILITY, n. A state or quality of being absorbable.

ABSORBABLE, a. That may be imbibed or swallowed. Kerr's Lavoisier.

ABSORBED, or ABSORPT, pp. Imbibed; swallowed; wasted; engaged; lost in study; wholly engrossed.

ABSORBENT, a. Imbibing; swallowing.

ABSORBENT, n. In anatomy, a vessel which imbibes, as the lacteals, lymphatics, and inhaling arteries. In medicine, a testaceous powder, or other substance, which imbibes the humors of the body, as chalk or magnesia. Encyc.

ABSORBING, ppr. Imbibing; engrossing; wasting.

ABSORPTION, n. The act or process of imbibing or swallowing; either by water which overwhelms, or by substances, which drink in and retain liquids; as the absorption of a body in a whirlpool, or of water by the earth, or of the humors of the body by dry powders. It is used also to express the swallowing up of substances by the earth in chasms made by earthquakes, and the sinking of large tracts in violent commotions of the earth.

2. In chemistry, the conversion of a gaseous fluid into a liquid or solid, by union with another substance. Ure.

ABSORPTIVE, a. Having power to imbibe. Darwin.

ABSTAIN, v. i. [L. abstineo, to keep from; ab and teneo, to hold. See Tenant.]

In a general sense, to forbear, or refrain from, voluntarily; but used chiefly to denote a restraint upon the passions or appetites; to refrain from indulgence.

Abstain from meats offered to idols. Acts, xv. To abstain from the use of ardent spirits; to abstain from luxuries.

ABSTEMIOUS, a. [L. abstemius; from ab and temetum, an ancient name of strong wine, according to Fabius and Gellius. But Vossius supposes it to be from abstineo, by a change of n to m. It may be from the root of timeo, to fear, that is, to withdraw.] Sparing in diet; refraining from a free use of food and strong drinks.

Instances of longevity are chiefly among the abstemious. Arbuthnot.

2. Sparing in the enjoyment of animal pleasures of any kind. [This sense is less common, and perhaps not legitimate.]

3. Sparingly used, or used with temperance; belonging to abstinence; as an abstemious diet; an abstemious life.

ABSTEMIOUSLY, adv. Temperately; with a sparing use of meat or drink.

ABSTEMIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being temperate or sparing in the use of food and strong drinks.

This word expresses a greater degree of abstinence than temperance.

ABSTERGE, v. t. absterj. [L. abstergeo, of ab and tergeo, to wipe. Tergeo may have a common origin with the Sw. torckä, G. trocknen, D. droogen, Sax. drygan, to dry; for these Teutonic verbs signify to wipe, as well as to dry.]

To wipe or make clean by wiping; to cleanse by resolving obstructions in the body. [Used chiefly as a medical term.]

ABSTERGENT, a. Wiping; cleansing.

ABSTERGENT, n. A medicine which frees the body from obstructions, as soap; but the use of the word is nearly superseded by detergent, which see.

ABSTERSION, n. [from L. abstergeo, absterjus.] The act of wiping clean; or a cleansing by medicines which resolve obstructions. [See Deterge, Detersion.] Bacon.

ABSTERSIVE, a. Cleansing; having the quality of removing obstructions. [See Detersive.]

ABSTINENCE, n. [L. abstinentia. See Abstain.] In general, the act or practice of voluntarily refraining from, or forbearing any action. "Abstinence from every thing which can be deemed labor." Paley's Philos.

More appropriately,

2. The refraining from an indulgence of appetite, or from customary gratifications of animal propensities. It denotes a total forbearance, as in fasting, or a forbearance of the usual quantity. In the latter sense, it may coincide with temperance, but in general, it denotes a more sparing use of enjoyments than temperance. Besides, abstinence implies previous free indulgence; temperance does not.

ABSTINENT, a. Refraining from indulgence, especially in the use of food and drink.

ABSTINENTLY, adv. With abstinence.

ABSTINENTS, a sect which appeared in France and Spain in the third century, who opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Spirit in the class of created beings.

ABSTRACT, v. t. [L. abstraho, to draw from or separate; from ab and traho, which is the Eng. draw. See Draw.]

1. To draw from, or to separate; as to abstract an action from its evil effects; to abstract spirit from any substance by distillation; but in this sense extract is now more generally used.

2. To separate ideas by the operation of the mind; to consider one part of a complex object, or to have a partial idea of it in the mind. Horne.

3. To select or separate the substance of a book or writing; to epitomize or reduce to a summary. Watts.

4. In chemistry, to separate, as the more volatile parts of a substance by repeated distillation, or at least by distillation.

ABSTRACT, a. [L. abstractus.] Separate; distinct from something else. An abstract idea, in metaphysics, is an idea separated from a complex object, or from other ideas which naturally accompany it, as the solidity of marble contemplated apart from its color or figure. Encyc.

Abstract terms are those which express abstract ideas, as beauty, whiteness, roundness, without regarding any subject in which they exist; or abstract terms are the names of orders, genera, or species of things, in which there is a combination of similar qualities. Stewart.

Abstract numbers are numbers used without application to things, as, 6, 8, 10: but when applied to any thing, as 6 feet, 10 men, they become concrete.

Abstract or pure mathematics, is that which treats of magnitude or quantity, without restriction to any species of particular magnitude, as arithmetic and geometry; opposed to which is mixed mathematics, which treats of simple properties, and the relations of quantity, as applied to sensible objects, as hydrostatics, navigation, optics, &c. Encyc.

2. Separate, existing in the mind only; as an abstract subject; an abstract question; and hence difficult, abstruse.

ABSTRACT, n. A summary, or epitome, containing the substance, a general view, or the principal heads of a treatise or writing. Watts.

2. Formerly, an extract, or a smaller quantity, containing the essence of a larger.

In the abstract, in a state of separation, as a subject considered in the abstract, i. e. without reference to particular persons or things.

ABSTRACTED, pp. Separated; refined; exalted; abstruse; absent in mind. Milton. Donne.

ABSTRACTEDLY, adv. In a separate state, or in contemplation only. Dryden.

ABSTRACTEDNESS, n. The state of being abstracted. Barter.

ABTRACTER, n. One who makes an abstract, or summary.

ABTRACTING, ppr. Separating; making a summary.

ABTRACTION, n. The act of separating, or state of being separated.

2. The operation of the mind when occupied by abstract ideas; as when we contemplate some particular part, or property of a complex object, as separate from the rest. Thus, when the mind considers the branch of a tree by itself, or the color of the leaves, as separate from their size or figure, the act is called abstraction. So also, when it considers whiteness, softness, virtue, existence, as separate from any particular objects. Encyc.

The power which the understanding has of separating the combinations which are presented to it, is distinguished by logicians, by the name of abstraction. Stewart.

Abstraction is the ground-work of classification, by which things are arranged in orders, genera, and species. We separate in idea the qualities of certain objects which are of the same kind, from others which are different in each, and arrange the objects having the same properties in a class, or collected body.

3. A separation from worldly objects; a recluse life; as a hermit's abstraction.

4. Absence of mind; inattention to present objects.

5. In the process of distillation, the term is used to denote the separation of the volatile parts, which rise, come over, and are condensed in a receiver, from those which are fixed. It is chiefly used, when a fluid is repeatedly poured upon any substance in a retort, and distilled off, to change its state, or the nature of its composition. Nicholson.

ABSTRACTIVE, a. Having the power or quality of abstracting.

ABSTRACTIVE, a. Abstracted, or ABSTRACTIVIOUS, a. drawn from other substances, particularly from vegetables, without fermentation. Cyr.

ABSTRACTLY, adv. Separately; absolutely; in a state or manner unconnected with any thing else; as, matter abstractly considered.

ABSTRACTNESS, n. A separate state; a state of being in contemplation only, or not connected with any object.

ABSTRUDE, v. t. [Infra.] To thrust or pull away. [Not used.]

ABSTRUSE, a. [L. abstrusus, from abstru- do, to thrust away, to conceal; abs and trudo; Ar. أطرد tarada; Ch. טורד, to thrust;

Syr. Sam. id.; Eng. to thrust.] Hid; concealed; hence, remote from apprehension; difficult to be comprehended or understood; opposed to what is obvious. [Not used of material objects.]

Metaphysics is an abstruse science. Encyc.
ABSTRUSELY, adv. In a concealed manner; obscurely; in a manner not to be easily understood.

ABTRUSENESS, n. Obscurity of meaning; the state or quality of being difficult to be understood. Boyle.

ABSURD, a. [L. absurdus, from ab and surdus, deaf, insensible.] Opposed to manifest truth; inconsistent with reason, or the plain dictates of common sense. An ab- surd man acts contrary to the clear dictates of reason or sound judgment. An ab- surd proposition contradicts obvious truth.
An absurd practice or opinion is repugnant to the reason or common apprehension of men. It is absurd to say six and six make ten, or that plants will take root in stone.

ABSURDITY, n. The quality of being inconsistent with obvious truth, reason, or sound judgment. Want of judgment, applied to men; want of propriety, applied to things. Johnson.

2. That which is absurd; in this sense it has a plural; the absurdities of men.

ABSURDLY, adv. In a manner inconsistent with reason, or obvious propriety.

ABSURDNESS, n. The same as absurdity, and less used.

ABUNDANCE, n. [F. abondance. See Abound.] Great plenty; an overflowing quantity; ample sufficiency; in strictness applicable to quantity only; but customarily used of number, as an abundance of peasants. Addison.

In scripture, the abundance of the rich is great wealth. Eccl. v. Mark, xii. Luke, xxi.

The abundance of the seas is great plenty of fish. Deut. xxxiii.

It denotes also fullness, overflowing, as the abundance of the heart. Mat. xii. Luke, vi.

ABUNDANT, a. Plentiful; in great quantity; fully sufficient; as an abundant supply. In scripture, abounding; having in great quantity; overflowing with.

The Lord God is abundant in goodness and truth. Ex. xxxiv.

Abundant number, in arithmetic, is one, the sum of whose aliquot parts exceeds the number itself. Thus 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, the aliquot parts of 12, make the sum of 16.
This is opposed to a deficient number, as 14, whose aliquot parts are 1, 2, 7, the sum of which is 10; and to a perfect number, which is equal to the sum of its aliquot parts, as 6, whose aliquot parts are 1, 2, 3.

ABYSS, n. [Gr. ἄβυσσος, bottomless, from a priv. and βυσσος, bottom, Ion. for βυθος.
See Bottom.] A bottomless gulf; used also for a deep mass of waters, supposed by some to have encompassed the earth before the flood.

Darkness was upon the face of the deep, or abyss, as it is in the Septuagint. Gen. i. 2.
The word is also used for an immense cavern in the earth, in which God is supposed to have collected all the waters on the third day of the creation. It is used also for hell, Erebus.

2. That which is immeasurable; that in which any thing is lost.

ACA'CIA, n. [L. acacia, a thorn, from Gr.
ακν, a point.]

Egyptian thorn, a species of plant ranked by Linne under the genus mimosa, and by others, made a distinct genus. Of the flowers of one species, the Chinese make a yellow dye which bears washing in silks, and appears with elegance on paper.

Encyc.

ACACIA, in medicine, is a name given to the inspissated juice of the unripe fruit of the Mimosa Nilotica, which is brought from Egypt in roundish masses, in bladders.

Externally, it is of a deep brown color; internally, of a reddish or yellowish brown; of a firm consistence, but not very dry. It is a mild astringent. But most of the drug which passes under this name, is the inspissated juice of sloes.

Encyc.

ACACIA, among antiquaries, is a name given to something like a roll or bag, seen on medals, as in the hands of emperors and consuls. Some take it to represent a handkerchief rolled up, with which signals were given at the games; others, a roll of petitions; and some, a purple bag of earth, to remind them of their mortality.

Encyc.

ACACIANS, in Church History, were certain sects, so denominated from their leaders, Acacius, bishop of Cesarea, and Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople. Some of these maintained that the Son was only a similar, not the same, substance with the Father; others, that he was not only a distinct but a dissimilar substance.

Chemistry.

AC'CENT, n. [L. accentus, from ad and canto, cantum, to sing; W. canu; Corn. kana; Ir. canaim. See Accend.]

1. The modulation of the voice in reading or speaking, as practiced by the ancient Greeks, which rendered their rehearsal musical. More strictly, in English,
2. A particular stress or force of voice upon certain syllables of words, which distinguishes them from the others. Accent is of two kinds, primary and secondary; as in aspir'ation. In uttering this word, we observe the first and third syllables are distinguished; the third by a full sound, which constitutes the primary accent; the first, by a degree of force in the voice which is less than that of the primary accent, but evidently greater than that which falls on the second and fourth syllables.

When the full accent falls on a vowel, that vowel has its long sound, as in vo'cal; but when it falls on an articulation or consonant, the preceding vowel is short, as in hab'it. Accent alone regulates English verse.

3. A mark or character used in writing to direct the stress of the voice in pronunciation. Our ancestors borrowed from the Greek language three of these characters, the acute (´), the grave (`) and the circumflex (ˆ or ˘). In the Greek, the first shows when the voice is to be raised; the second, when it is to be depressed; and the third, when the vowel is to be uttered with an undulating sound.
4. A modulation of the voice expressive of passions or sentiments.

The tender accents of a woman's cry. Prior.

5. Manner of speaking.

A man of plain accent. Obs. Shak.

6. Poetically, words, language, or expressions in general.

Words, on your wings, to heaven her accents bear,

Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear.

Dryden.

7. In music, a swelling of sounds, for the purpose of variety or expression. The principal accent falls on the first note in the bar, but the third place in common time requires also an accent.
8. A peculiar tone or inflection of voice.

ACCENT, v. t. To express accent; to utter a syllable with a particular stress or modulation of the voice. In poetry, to utter or pronounce in general. Also to note accents by marks in writing.

Locke. Wotton.

Accept of the terms.

4. To understand; to have a particular idea of; to receive in a particular sense.

How is this phrase to be accepted?

5. In commerce, to agree or promise to pay, as a bill of exchange. [See Acceptance.]

ACCEPTABLE, a. That may be received with pleasure; hence pleasing to a receiver; gratifying; as an acceptable present.

2. Agreeable or pleasing in person; as, a man makes himself acceptable by his services or civilities.

ACCEPTABLENESS, n. The quality of ACCEPTABILITY, being agreeable to a receiver, or to a person with whom one has intercourse. [The latter word is little used, or not at all.]

ACCEPTABLY, adv. In a manner to please, or give satisfaction.

Let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably. Heb. xii.

ACCEPTANCE, n. A receiving with approbation or satisfaction; favorable reception; as work done to acceptance.

They shall come up with acceptance on my altar. Isa. lx.

2. The receiving of a bill of exchange or order, in such a manner, as to bind the acceptor to make payment. This must be by express words; and to charge the drawer with costs, in case of non payment, the acceptance must be in writing, under, across, or on the back of the bill.

Blackstone.

3. An agreeing to terms or proposals in commerce, by which a bargain is concluded and the parties bound.

4. An agreeing to the act or contract of another, by some act which binds the person in law; as, a bishop's taking rent reserved on a lease made by his predecessor, is an acceptance of the terms of the lease and binds the party.

Law.

5. In mercantile language, a bill of exchange accepted; as a merchant receives another's acceptance in payment.

6. Formerly, the sense in which a word is understood. Obs. [See Acceptation.]

ACCEPTATION, n. Kind reception; a receiving with favor or approbation.

This is a saying worthy of all acceptance. 1 Tim. i.

2. A state of being acceptable; favorable regard.

Some things are of great dignity and acceptance with God.

Hooker.

But in this sense acceptableness is more generally used.

3. The meaning or sense in which a word or expression is understood, or generally received; as, a term is to be used according to its usual acceptance.

4. Reception in general. Obs.

ACCEPTED, pp. Kindly received; regarded; agreed to; understood; received as a bill of exchange.

ACCEPTER, or ACCEPTOR, n. A person who accepts; the person who receives a bill of exchange so as to bind himself to pay it. [See Acceptance.]

ACCEPTING, ppr. Receiving favorably; agreeing to; understanding.

ACCEPTION, n. The received sense of a word. [Not now used.] Hammond.

ACCEPTIVE, a. Ready to accept. [Not used.] B. Jonson.

ACCESS, n. [L. accessus, from accedo. See Accede. Fr. accès.]

1. A coming to; near approach; admittance; admission; as to gain access to a prince.

2. Approach, or the way by which a thing may be approached; as, the access is by a neck of land. Bacon.

3. Means of approach; liberty to approach; implying previous obstacles.

By whom also we have access by faith. Rom. v.

4. Admission to sexual intercourse. During coverture, access of the husband shall be presumed, unless the contrary be shown. Blackstone.

5. Addition; increase by something added; as an access of territory; but in this sense accession is more generally used.

6. The return of a fit or paroxysm of disease, or fever. In this sense accession is generally used.

ACCESSARILY, See ACCESSORILY. ACCESSARINESS, See ACCESSORINESS.

ACCESSIBLE, a. That may be approached or reached; approachable; applied to things; as an accessible town or mountain.

2. Easy of approach; affable; used of persons.

ACCESSION, n. [L. accessio.] A coming to; an acceding to and joining; as a king's accession to a confederacy.

2. Increase by something added; that which is added; augmentation; as an accession of wealth or territory.

3. In law, a mode of acquiring property, by which the owner of a corporeal substance, which receives an addition by growth, or by labor, has a right to the thing added or the improvement; provided the thing is not changed into a different species. Thus the owner of a cow becomes the owner of her calf. Blackstone.

4. The act of arriving at a throne, an office, or dignity.

5. That which is added.

The only accession which the Roman Empire received, was the province of Britain.

Gibbon.

6. The invasion of a fit of a periodical disease, or fever. It differs from exacerbation. Accession implies a total previous intermission, as of a fever; exacerbation implies only a previous remission or abatement of violence.

ACCESSIONAL, a. Additional.

ACCESSORIAL, a. Pertaining to an accessory; as accessory agency, accessory guilt.

Burr's Trial.

ACCESSORILY, adv. [See Accessory.] In the manner of an accessory; by subordinate means, or in a secondary character; not as principal, but as a subordinate agent.

ACCESSORINESS, n. The state of being accessory, or of being or acting in a secondary character.

ACCESSORY, a. [L. Accessorius, from accessus, accedo. See Accede. This word is accented on the first syllable on account of the derivatives, which require a secondary accent on the third; but the natural accent of accessory is on the second syllable, and thus it is often pronounced by good speakers.]

1. Acceding; contributing; aiding in producing some effect, or acting in subordination to the principal agent. Usually, in a bad sense, as John was accessory to the felony.

2. Aiding in certain acts or effects in a secondary manner, as accessory sounds in music.

Encyc.

ACCESSORY, n. In law, one who is guilty of a felony, not by committing the offense in person or as principal, but by advising or commanding another to commit the crime, or by concealing the offender. There may be accessories in all felonies, but not in treason. An accessory before the fact, is one who counsels or commands another to commit a felony, and is not present when the act is executed; after the fact, when one receives and conceals the offender.

2. That which accedes or belongs to something else, as its principal.

Accessory nerves, in anatomy, a pair of nerves, which arising from the medulla in the vertebrae of the neck, ascend and enter the skull; then passing out with the par vagum, are distributed into the muscles of the neck and shoulders.

Accessory, among painters, an epithet given to parts of a history-piece which are merely ornamental, as vases, armor, &c.

ACCIDENCE, n. [See Accident.] A small book containing the rudiments of grammar.

Hall.

ACELA'IM, n. A shout of joy; acclamation.

Milton.

ACELAMA'TION, n. [L. acclamatio. See Acclaim.]

A shout of applause, uttered by a multitude. Anciently, acclamation was a form of words, uttered with vehemence, somewhat resembling a song, sometimes accompanied with applauses which were given by the hands. Acclamations were ecclesiastical, military, nuptial, senatorial, synodical, theatrical, &c.; they were musical, and rythmical; and bestowed for joy, respect, and even reproach, and often accompanied with words, repeated, five, twenty, and even sixty and eighty times. In the later ages of Rome, acclamations were performed by a chorus of music instructed for the purpose.

In modern times, acclamations are expressed by huzzas; by clapping of hands; and often by repeating vivat rex, vivat respublica, long live the king or republic, or other words expressive of joy and good wishes.

ACCLAM'ATORY, a. Expressing joy or applause by shouts, or clapping of hands.

ACCLI'MATED, a. [Ac for ad and climate.] Habituated to a foreign climate, or a climate not native; so far accustomed to a foreign climate as not to be peculiarly liable to its endemical diseases.

4. It is sometimes used in the sense of Cotyledon.

5. A species of lichen. Cyc.

AC'ETARY, n. [See Acid.] An acid pulpy substance in certain fruits, as the pear, inclosed in a congeries of small calculous bodies, towards the base of the fruit.

AC'ETATE, n. [See Acid.] In chemistry, a neutral salt formed by the union of the acetic acid, or radical vinegar, with any salifiable base, as with earths, metals, and alkalis; as the acetate of alumine, of lime, or of copper. Lavoisier.

AC'ETATED, a. [See Acid.] Combined with acetic acid, or radical vinegar.

AC'ETIC, a. [See Acid.] A term used to denote a particular acid, acetic acid, the concentrated acid of vinegar, or radical vinegar. It may be obtained by exposing common vinegar to frost—the water freezing leaves the acetic acid, in a state of purity.

AC'ETIFICATION, n. The act of making acetous or sour; or the operation of making vinegar. Cyc.

AC'ETIFY, v. t. To convert into acid or vinegar. Aikin.

AC'ETITE, n. [See Acid.] A neutral salt formed by the acetous acid, with a salifiable base; as the acetite of copper, aluminous acetite. Lavoisier.

ACETOMETER, n. [L. acetum, vinegar, and μετρον, measure.]

An instrument for ascertaining the strength of vinegar. Ure.

AC'ETOUS, a. [See Acid.] Sour; like or having the nature of vinegar. Acetous acid is the term used by chemists for distilled vinegar. This acid, in union with different bases, forms salts called acetites.

ACETUM, n. [L. See Acid.] Vinegar; a sour liquor, obtained from vegetables dissolved in boiling water, and from fermented and spirituous liquors, by exposing them to heat and air.

This is called the acid or acetous fermentation.

ACHE, v. i. ake. [Sax. ace, ece; Gr. αχew, to ache or be in pain; αχος, pain. The primary sense is to be pressed. Perhaps the oriental py to press.]

1. To suffer pain; to have or be in pain, or in continued pain; as, the head aches.

2. To suffer grief, or extreme grief; to be distressed; as, the heart aches.

ACHE, n. ake. Pain, or continued pain, in opposition to sudden twinges, or spasmodic pain. It denotes a more moderate degree of pain than pang, anguish, and torture.

Vol. I.

ACHE'AN, a. Pertaining to Achaia in Greece, and a celebrated league or confederacy established there. This State lay on the gulf of Corinth, within Peloponnesus.

ACHERN'ER, n. A star of the first magnitude in the southern extremity of the constellation Eridanus.

ACH'ERSET, n. An ancient measure of corn, supposed to be about eight bushels. Encyc.

ACHIE'VABLE, a. [See Achieve.] That may be performed. Barrow.

ACHIE'VANCE, n. Performance. Elyot.

ACHIE'VE, v. t. [Fr. achever, to finish; Arm. acchui; old Fr. chever, to come to the end, from Fr. chef, the head or end; old Eng. cheve; Sp. and Port. acabar, from cabo, end, cape. See Chief.]

1. To perform, or execute; to accomplish; to finish, or carry on to a final close. It is appropriately used for the effect of efforts made by the hand or bodily exertion, as deeds achieved by valor.

2. To gain or obtain, as the result of exertion. Show all the spoils by valiant Kings achieved. Prior.

ACHIE'VED, pp. Performed; obtained; accomplished.

ACHIE'VEMENT, n. The performance of an action.

2. A great or heroic deed; something accomplished by valor, or boldness.

3. An obtaining by exertion.

4. An escutcheon or ensigns armorial, granted for the performance of a great or honorable action. Encyc.

ACHIE'VER, n. One who accomplishes a purpose, or obtains an object by his exertions.

ACHIE'VING, ppr. Performing; executing; gaining.

A'CHING, ppr. Being in pain; suffering distress.

A'CHING, n. Pain; continued pain or distress.

A'CHIOTE, n. The anotta, a tree, and a drug used for dyeing red. The bark of the tree makes good cordage, and the wood is used to excite fire by friction. [See Anotta.] Clavigero.

A'CHOR, n. [Gr. αχος, sordes capitis.]

1. The scald head, a disease forming scaly eruptions, supposed to be a critical evacuation of acrimonious humors; a species of herpes. Hooper. Quincy.

2. In mythology, the God of flies, said to have been worshipped by the Cyreneans, to avoid being vexed by those insects. Encyc.

A'CHROMATIC, a. [Gr. a priv. and χρωμα, color.]

Destitute of color. Achromatic telescopes are formed of a combination of lenses, which separate the variously colored rays of light to equal angles of divergence, at different angles of refraction of the mean ray. In this case, the rays being made to refract towards contrary parts, the whole ray is caused to deviate from its course, without being separated into colors, and the optical aberration arising from the various colors of light, is prevented. This telescope is an invention of Dolland. Nicholson.

ACIC'ULAR, a. [L. acicula, Priscian, a needle, from Gr. αχνη, L. acies, a point. See Acid.]

In the shape of a needle; having sharp points like needles. Kirwan. Martyn.

An acicular prism is when the crystals are slender and straight. Phillips.

ACIC'ULARLY, adv. In the manner of needles, or prickles.

AC'ID, a. [L. acidus; Sax. aced, vinegar; from the root of acies, edge; Gr. αχνη; W. awg, an edge or point. See Edge.] Sour, sharp or biting to the taste, having the taste of vinegar, as acid fruits or liquors.

AC'ID, n. In chemistry, acids are a class of substances, so denominated from their taste, or the sensation of sourness which they produce on the tongue. But the name is now given to several substances, which have not this characteristic in an eminent degree. The properties, by which they are distinguished, are these:

1. When taken into the mouth, they occasion the taste of sourness. They are corrosive, unless diluted with water; and some of them are caustic.

2. They change certain vegetable blue colors to red, and restore blue colors which have been turned green, or red colors which have been turned blue by an alkali.

3. Most of them unite with water in all proportions, with a condensation of volume and evolution of heat; and many of them have so strong an attraction for water, as not to appear in the solid state.

4. They have a stronger affinity for alkalis, than these have for any other substance; and in combining with them, most of them produce effervescence.

5. They unite with earths, alkalis and metallic oxyds, forming interesting compounds, usually called salts.

6. With few exceptions, they are volatilized or decomposed by a moderate heat.

The old chimists divided acids into animal, vegetable, and mineral—a division now deemed inaccurate. They are also divided into oxygen acids, hydrogen acids, and acids destitute of these acidifiers. Another division is into acids with simple radicals, acids with double radicals, acids with triple radicals, acids with unknown radicals, compound acids, dubious acids, and acids destitute of oxygen.

Lavoisier. Thomson. Nicholson. Aikin.

ACIDIF'EROUS, a. [Acid and L. fero.] Containing acids, or an acid.

Acidiferous minerals are such as consist of an earth combined with an acid; as carbonate of lime, aluminite, &c. Phillips.

ACIDIFIABLE, a. [From Acidify.]

Capable of being converted into an acid, by union with an acidifying principle, without decomposition.

ACIDIFI'CA'TION, n. The act or process of acidifying or changing into an acid.

ACID'IFIED, pp. Made acid; converted into an acid.

ACID'IFIER, n. That which by combination forms an acid, as oxygen and hydrogen.

ACID'IFY, v. t. [Acid and L. facio.]

To make acid; but appropriately to convert into an acid, chemically so called, by combination with any substance.

ACID'IFYING, ppr. Making acid; converting into an acid; having power to change into an acid. Oxygen is called the acidifying principle or element.

- ACIDIMETER, n. [Acid and Gr. μετρον, measure.]
An instrument for ascertaining the strength of acids. Ure.
- ACIDITY, n. [Fr. acidité, from acid.]
The quality of being sour; sourness; tartness; sharpness to the taste.
- ACIDNESS, n. The quality of being sour; acidity.
- ACIDULATE, v. t. [L. acidulus, slightly sour; Fr. aciduler, to make sour. See Acid.]
To tinge with an acid; to make acid in a moderate degree. Arbuthnot.
- ACIDULATED, pp. Tinged with an acid; made slightly sour.
- ACIDULATING, ppr. Tinging with an acid.
- ACIDULE, n. In chemistry, a compound
- ACIDULUM, n. salt, in which the alkaline base is supersaturated with acid; as, tartareous acidulum; oxalic acidulum.
- ACIDULOUS, a. [L. acidulus. See Acid.]
Slightly sour; sub-acid, or having an excess of acid; as, acidulous sulphate.
- ACINACIFORM, a. [L. acinaces, a cimeter, Gr. ακινάξ, and L. forma, form.]
In botany, formed like, or resembling a cimeter. Martyn.
- ACINIFORM, a. [L. acinus, a grape stone, and forma, shape.]
Having the form of grapes; being in clusters like grapes. The uvula or posterior lamina of the iris in the eye, is called the aciniform tunic. Anatomists apply the term to many glands of a similar formation. Quincy. Hooper.
- ACINOSE, a. [From L. acinus. See ACINOUS.]
Consisting of minute granular concretions; used in mineralogy. Kirwan.
- ACINUS, n. [L.] In botany, one of the small grains, which compose the fruit of the blackberry, &c.
- ACIPENSER, a. In ichthyology, a genus of fishes, of the order of chondropterygii, having an obtuse head; the mouth under the head, retractile and without teeth. To this genus belong the sturgeon, sterlet, huso, &c. Cyc.
- ACIT'LI, n. A name of the water hare, or great crested grebe or diver. Dict. of Nat. Hist.
- ACKNOWLEDGE, v. t. Akno'l'edge, [ad and knowledge. See Know.]
1. To own, avow or admit to be true, by a declaration of assent; as to acknowledge the being of a God.
2. To own or notice with particular regard. In all thy ways acknowledge God. Prov. iii. Isa. xxxiii.
3. To own or confess, as implying a consciousness of guilt. I acknowledge my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me. Ps. li. and xxxii.
4. To own with assent; to admit or receive with approbation. He that acknowledgeth the son, hath the father also. 1 John ii. 2 Tim. ii.
5. To own with gratitude; to own as a benefit; as, to acknowledge a favor, or the receipt of a gift. They his gifts acknowledged not. Milton.
6. To own or admit to belong to; as, to acknowledge a son.
7. To receive with respect. All that see them shall acknowledge that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed. Isa. vi. 1 Cor. xvi.
8. To own, avow or assent to an act in a legal form, to give it validity; as, to acknowledge a deed before competent authority.
- ACKNOWLEDGED, pp. Owned; confessed; noticed with regard or gratitude; received with approbation; owned before authority.
- ACKNOWLEDGING, ppr. Owning; confessing; approving; grateful; but the latter sense is a gallicism, not to be used.
- ACKNOWLEDGMENT, n. The act of owning; confession; as, the acknowledgment of a fault.
2. The owning, with approbation, or in the true character; as the acknowledgment of a God, or of a public minister.
3. Concession; admission of the truth; as, of a fact, position, or principle.
4. The owning of a benefit received, accompanied with gratitude; and hence it combines the ideas of an expression of thanks. Hence, it is used also for something given or done in return for a favor.
5. A declaration or avowal of one's own act, to give it legal validity; as the acknowledgment of a deed before a proper officer.
- Acknowledgment-money, in some parts of England, is a sum paid by tenants, on the death of their landlord, as an acknowledgment of their new lords. Encyc.
- ACME, n. Ac'my. [Gr. ακμή.]
The top or highest point. It is used to denote the maturity or perfection of an animal. Among physicians, the crisis of a disease, or its utmost violence. Old medical writers divided the progress of a disease into four periods, the arche, or beginning, the anabasis, or increase, the acme, or utmost violence, and the paracme, or decline. But acme can hardly be considered as a legitimate English word.
- ACNE, n. Ac'ny. [Gr.]
A small hard pimple or tubercle on the face. Quincy.
- ACNES'TIS, n. [Gr. a priv. and ακναι, to rub or gnaw.]
That part of the spine in quadrupeds which extends from the metaphrenon, between the shoulder blades, to the loins; which the animal cannot reach to scratch. Coxe. Quincy.
- AC'O, n. A Mediterranean fish, called also sarachus.
- AC'OLIN, n. A bird of the partridge kind in Cuba. Its breast and belly are white; its back and tail of a dusky yellow brown. Dict. of Nat. Hist.
- ACOL'OTHIST, n. [Gr. ακολουθιστής.]
AC'OLYTE, n. In the ancient church, one of the subordinate officers, who lighted the lamps, prepared the elements of the sacraments, attended the bishops, &c. An officer of the like character is still employed in the Romish Church. Encyc.
- ACONITE, n. [L. aconitum; Gr. ακονίτιον.]
The herb wolf's bane, or monk's-hood, a poisonous plant; and in poetry, used for poison in general.
- ACONTIAS, n. [Gr. ακοντίας; ακοντίον, a dart, from ακων.]
1. A species of serpent, called dart-snake, or jaculum, from its manner of darting on its prey. This serpent is about three feet in length; of a light gray color with black spots, resembling eyes; the belly perfectly white. It is a native of Africa and the Mediterranean isles; is the swiftest of its kind, and coils itself upon a tree, from which it darts upon its prey.
2. A comet or meteor resembling the serpent.
- ACOP', adv. [a and cope.]
At the top. Obs. Jonson.
- A'CORN, n. [Sax. acern, from ace or ac, oak, and corn, a grain.]
1. The seed or fruit of the oak; an oval nut which grows in a rough permanent cup. The first settlers of Boston were reduced to the necessity of feeding on clams, muscles, ground nuts, and acorns. B. Trumbull.
2. In marine language, a small ornamental piece of wood, of a conical shape, fixed on the point of the spindle above the vane, on the mast head, to keep the vane from being blown off. Mar. Dict.
3. In natural history, the Lepas, a genus of shells of several species found on the British coast. The shell is multivalvular, unequal, and fixed by a stem; the valves are parallel and perpendicular, but they do not open, so that the animal performs its functions by an aperture on the top. These shells are always fixed to some solid body.
- A'CORNED, a. Furnished or loaded with acorns.
- A'CORUS, n. [L. from Gr. αζορον.]
1. Aromatic Calamus, sweet flag, or sweet rush.
2. In natural history, blue coral, which grows in the form of a tree, on a rocky bottom, in some parts of the African seas. It is brought from the Camarones and Benin. Encyc.
3. In medicine, this name is sometimes given to the great galangal. Encyc.
- ACOTYLEDON, n. [Gr. a priv. and ακωτύνω from ακωτη, a hollow.]
In botany, a plant whose seeds have no side lobes, or cotyledons. Martyn.
- ACOTYLEDONOUS, a. Having no side lobes.
- ACOUSTIC, a. [Gr. ακουστικός, from ακουω, to hear.]
Pertaining to the ears, to the sense of hearing, or to the doctrine of sounds.
- Acoustic duct, in anatomy, the meatus auditorius, or external passage of the ear.
- Acoustic vessels, in ancient theaters, were brazen tubes or vessels, shaped like a bell, used to propel the voice of the actors, so as to render them audible to a great distance; in some theaters at the distance of 400 feet. Encyc.
- Acoustic instrument, or auricular tube, called in popular language, a speaking trumpet. Encyc.
- Acoustics, or acousmatics, was a name given to such of the disciples of Pythagoras, as had not completed their five years probation.
- ACOUS'TICS, n. The science of sounds, teaching their cause, nature, and phenomena. This science is, by some writers, divided into diacoustics, which explains the properties of sounds coming directly from the sonorous body to the ear; and catacoustics, which treats of reflected sounds. But the distinction is considered of little real utility.
2. In medicine, this term is sometimes used for remedies for deafness, or imperfect hearing.

ACQUAINT, v. t. [Old Fr. acquaint, to make known; whence acquaintance, acquaintance. Qu. Per. ἁλῆς kunda, knowing, intelligent; Ger. kunde, knowledge; kund, known, public; D. kond or kunde, knowledge; Sw. känd, known; Dan. kiender, to know, to be acquainted with. These words seem to have for their primitive root the Goth. and Sax. kunnan, to know, the root of cunning; Ger. kennen; D. kennen, kan; Eng. can, and ken; which see.]

1. To make known; to make fully or intimately known; to make familiar.

A man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Isaiah lili.

2. To inform; to communicate notice to; as, a friend in the country acquaints me with his success. Of before the object, as to acquaint a man of this design, has been used, but is obsolete or improper.

3. To acquaint one's self, is to gain an intimate or particular knowledge of.

Acquaint now thyself with him and be at peace. Job xxii.

ACQUAINTANCE, n. Familiar knowledge; a state of being acquainted, or of having intimate or more than slight or superficial knowledge; as, I know the man, but have no acquaintance with him. Sometimes it denotes a more slight knowledge.

2. A person or persons well known; usually persons we have been accustomed to see and converse with; sometimes, persons more slightly known.

Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkness. Ps. lxxviii.

My acquaintance are estranged from me. Job xix.

Acquaintances, in the plural, is used, as applied to individual persons known; but more generally, acquaintance is used for one or more.

Acquaintant, in a like sense, is not used.

ACQUAINTED, pp. Known; familiarly known; informed; having personal knowledge.

ACQUAINTING, ppr. Making known to; giving notice, or information to.

ACQUEST, n. [L. acquisitus, acquirō.]

1. Acquisition; the thing gained. Bacon.

2. Conquest; a place acquired by force.

ACQUIESCE, v. i. acquiesco. [L. acquiesco, of ad and quiesco, to be quiet; quies, rest; Fr. acquiescer.]

1. To rest satisfied, or apparently satisfied, or to rest without opposition and discontent; usually implying previous opposition, uneasiness, or dislike, but ultimate compliance, or submission; as, to acquiesce in the dispensations of providence.

2. To assent to, upon conviction; as, to acquiesce in an opinion; that is, to rest satisfied of its correctness, or propriety.

Acquiesced in, in a passive sense, complied with; submitted to, without opposition; as, a measure has been acquiesced in.

ACQUIESCENCE, n. A quiet assent; a silent submission, or submission with apparent content; distinguished from avowed consent on the one hand, and on the other, from opposition or open discontent; as, an acquiescence in the decisions of a court, or in the allotments of providence.

ACQUIESCENT, a. Resting satisfied; easy; submitting; disposed to submit.

Johnson.

ACQUIESCING, ppr. Quietly submitting; resting content.

ACQUIRABLE, a. That may be acquired.

ACQUIRE, v. t. [L. acquirō, ad and quero, to seek, that is to follow, to press. to urge; acquirō signifies to pursue to the end or object; Fr. acquérir; Sp. adquirir; Ar. اكتسب, Heb. קנה to seek, to make towards, to follow. The L. quæsi, unless contracted, is probably from a different root. See class Gr. and Gs.]

To gain, by any means, something which is in a degree permanent, or which becomes vested or inherent in the possessor; as, to acquire a title, estate, learning, habits, skill, dominion, &c. Plants acquire a green color from the solar rays. A mere temporary possession is not expressed by acquire, but by gain, obtain, procure; as, to obtain [not acquire] a book on loan.

Descent is the title whereby a man, on the death of his ancestor, acquires his estate, by right of representation, as his heir at law.

Blackstone.

ACQUIRED, pp. Gained, obtained, or received from art, labor, or other means, in distinction from those things which are bestowed by nature. Thus we say, abilities, natural and acquired. It implies title, or some permanence of possession.

ACQUIREMENT, n. The act of acquiring, or that which is acquired; attainment. It is used in opposition to natural gifts; as, eloquence, and skill in music and painting, are acquirements; genius, the gift of nature. It denotes especially personal attainments, in opposition to material or external things gained, which are more usually called acquisitions; but this distinction is not always observed.

ACQUIRER, n. A person who acquires.

ACQUIRING, ppr. Gaining by labor or other means, something that has a degree of permanence in the possessor.

ACQUIRY, n. Acquisition. [Not used.]

Barrow.

ACQUISITE, a. s as z. Gained. [Not used.]

Burton.

ACQUISITION, n. [L. acquisitio, from acquisitus, acquiescivi, which are given as the part. and pret. of acquirō; but quæsi is probably from a different root; W. ceisiaw;

Eth. ሐሠሠ chasas, chas; Ar. كسب kassa, to seek. Class Gs.]

1. The act of acquiring; as, a man takes pleasure in the acquisition of property, as well as in the possession.

2. The thing acquired, or gained; as, learning is an acquisition. It is used for intellectual attainments, as well as for external things, property, or dominion; and in a good sense, denoting something estimable.

ACQUISITIVE, a. That is acquired; acquired; [but improper.]

Wallon.

ACQUISITIVELY, adv. Noting acquirement, with to or for following.

Lilly's Grammar.

ACQUIST, n. See Acquest. [Not used.]

Milton.

ACQUIT, v. t. [Fr. acquitter; W. gadaw, gadaw; L. cedo; Arm. kitat, or quytat, to leave, or forsake; Fr. quitter, to forsake; Sp. quitar; Port. quitar; It. quitare, to remit, forgive, remove; D. kuyten; Ger. quittiren.]

To set free; to release or discharge from an obligation, accusation, guilt, censure, suspicion, or whatever lies upon a person as a charge or duty; as, the jury acquitted the prisoner; we acquit a man of evil intentions. It is followed by of before the object; to acquit from is obsolete. In a reciprocal sense, as, the soldier acquitted himself well in battle, the word has a like sense, implying the discharge of a duty or obligation. Hence its use in expressing excellence in performance; as the orator acquitted himself well, that is, in a manner that his situation and public expectation demanded.

ACQUITMENT, n. The act of acquitting, or state of being acquitted. South.

[This word is superseded by acquittal.]

ACQUIT'TAL, n. A judicial setting free, or deliverance from the charge of an offense; as, by verdict of a jury, or sentence of a court.

The acquittal of a principal operates as an acquittal of the accessories.

ACQUIT'TANCE, n. A discharge or release from a debt.

2. The writing, which is evidence of a discharge; a receipt in full, which bars a further demand.

ACQUIT'TED, pp. Set free, or judicially discharged from an accusation; released from a debt, duty, obligation, charge, or suspicion of guilt.

ACQUIT'TING, ppr. Setting free from accusation; releasing from a charge, obligation, or suspicion of guilt.

ACRA'SE, } v. t. To make crazy; to in-

ACRA'ZE, } fatuate. [Not in use.] [See Crazy.]

2. To impair; to destroy. [Not in use.]

ACRASY, n. [Gr. ακρασία, from a priv. and κρασις, constitution or temperament.]

In medical authors, an excess or predominancy of one quality above another, in mixture, or in the human constitution. Bailey.

ACRE, n. a'ker. [Sax. acer, acera, or æcer; Ger. acker; D. akker; Sw. acker; Dan. ager; W. eg; Ir. acra; Gr. αγρος; Lat. ager. In these languages, the word retains its primitive sense, an open, plowed, or sowed field. In Eng. it retained its original signification, that of any open field, until it was limited to a definite quantity by statutes 31. Ed. 35. Ed. 1. 24. H. 8.

Cowel.

1. A quantity of land, containing 160 square rods or perches, or 4840 square yards. This is the English statute acre. The acre of Scotland contains 6150 2-5 square yards. The French arpent is nearly equal to the Scottish acre, about a fifth larger than the English. The Roman juger was 3200 square yards.

2. In the Mogul's dominions, acre is the same as lack, or 100,000 rupees, equal to £12,500 sterling, or $55,500.

Acre-fight, a sort of duel in the open field,

ACT

ACRONICALLY, adv. In an acronical manner; at the rising or setting of the sun.

ACROSPIRE, n. [Gr. ακρος, highest, and σπείρα, a spire, or spiral line.]

A shoot, or sprout of a seed; the plume, or plumule, so called from its spiral form.

Mortimer.

ACROSPIRED, a. Having a sprout, or having sprouted at both ends.

Mortimer.

ACROSS, prep. akraus. [a and cross. See Cross.]

1. From side to side, opposed to along, which is in the direction of the length; athwart; quite over; as, a bridge is laid across a river.

2. Intersecting; passing over at any angle; as a line passing across another.

ACROSTIC, n. [Gr. ακροα, extremity or beginning, and στίχος, order, or verse.]

A composition in verse, in which the first letters of the lines, taken in order, form the name of a person, kingdom, city, &c., which is the subject of the composition, or some title or motto.

ACROS'TIC, a. That relates to, or contains an acrostic.

ACROS'TICALLY, adv. In the manner of an acrostic.

ACROTELEU'TIC, n. [Gr. ακρος, extreme, and τελευτη, end.]

Among ecclesiastical writers, an appellation given to any thing added to the end of a psalm, or hymn; as a doxology.

ACROTHER, n. [Gr. ακροτηρ, a summit.]

In architecture, a small pedestal, usually without a base, anciently placed at the two extremes, or in the middle of pediments or frontispieces, serving to support the statues, &c. It also signifies the figures placed as ornaments on the tops of churches, and the sharp pinnacles that stand in ranges about flat buildings with rails and balusters. Anciently the word signified the extremities of the body, as the head, hands, and feet.

Encyc.

ACROTHYM'ION, n. [Gr. ακρος, extreme, and θυμος, thyme.]

Among physicians, a species of wart, with a narrow basis and broad top, having the color of thyme. It is called Thymus.

Celsus.

ACT, v. i. [Gr. αγω, Lat. ago, to urge, drive, lead, bring, do, perform, or in general, to move, to exert force; Cantabrian, eg, force; W. egni; Ir. eigean, force; Ir. aige, to act or carry on; eachdam, to do or act; actaim, to ordain; eacht, acht, deed, act, condition; F. agir; It. agire, to do or act.]

1. To exert power; as, the stomach acts upon food; the will acts upon the body in producing motion.

2. To be in action or motion; to move.

He hangs between in doubt to act or rest.

Pope.

3. To behave, demean, or conduct, as in morals, private duties, or public offices; as, we know not why a minister has acted in this manner. But in this sense, it is most frequent in popular language; as, how the man acts or has acted.

To act up to, is to equal in action; to fulfil, or perform a correspondent action; as, he has acted up to his engagement or his advantages.

ACT

ACT, v. t. To perform; to represent a character on the stage.

Act well your part, there all the honor lies.

2. To feign or counterfeit. Obs. or improper. With acted fear the villain thus pursued.

Dryden.

3. To put in motion; to actuate; to regulate movements.

Most people in the world are acted by levity.

South. Locke.

[In this latter sense, obsolete and superseded by actuate, which see.]

ACT, n. The exertion of power; the effect, of which power exerted is the cause; as, the act of giving or receiving. In this sense, it denotes an operation of the mind. Thus, to discern is an act of the understanding; to judge is an act of the will.

2. That which is done; a deed, exploit, or achievement, whether good or ill.

And his miracles and his acts which he did in the midst of Egypt. Deut. xi.

3. Action; performance; production of effects; as, an act of charity. But this sense is closely allied to the foregoing.

4. A state of reality or real existence, as opposed to a possibility.

The seeds of plants are not at first in act, but in possibility, what they afterwards grow to be.

Hooker.

5. In general, act denotes action completed; but preceded by in, it denotes incomplete action.

She was taken in the very act. John viii.

In act is used also to signify incipient action, or a state of preparation to exert power; as, "In act to strike," a poetical use.

6. A part or division of a play, to be performed without interruption; after which the action is suspended to give respite to the performers. Acts are divided into smaller portions, called scenes.

7. The result of public deliberation, or the decision of a prince, legislative body, council, court of justice, or magistrate; a decree, edict, law, judgment, resolve, award, determination; as an act of parliament, or of congress. The term is also transferred to the book, record, or writing, containing the laws and determinations. Also, any instrument in writing to verify facts.

In the sense of agency, or power to produce effects, as in the passage cited by Johnson, from Shakespeare, the use is improper.

To try the vigor of them and apply Allayments to their act.

Act, in English Universities, is a thesis maintained in public, by a candidate for a degree, or to show the proficiency of a student. At Oxford, the time when masters and doctors complete their degrees is also called the act, which is held with great solemnity. At Cambridge, as in the United States, it is called commencement. Encyc.

Act of faith, auto da fe, in Catholic countries, is a solemn day held by the Inquisition, for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of accused persons found innocent; or it is the sentence of the Inquisition.

Acts of the Apostles, the title of a book in the New Testament, containing a history of the transactions of the Apostles.

Acta Diurna, among the Romans, a sort of

ACT

Gazette, containing an authorized account of transactions in Rome, nearly similar to our newspapers.

Acta populi, or acta publica, the Roman registers of assemblies, trials, executions, buildings, births, marriages, and deaths of illustrious persons, &c.

Acta Senatus, minutes of what passed in the Roman senate, called also commentarii, commentaries.

ACT'ED, pp. Done; performed; represented on the stage.

ACTIAN, a. Relating to Actium, a town and promontory of Epirus, as Actian games, which were instituted by Augustus, to celebrate his naval victory over Anthony, near that town, Sep. 2, B. C. 31. They were celebrated every five years. Hence, Actian years, reckoned from that era. Encyc.

ACTING, ppr. Doing; performing; behaving; representing the character of another.

ACTING, n. Action; act of performing a part of a play. Shak. Churchill.

ACTINOLITE, n. [Gr. actin, a ray, and lithos, a stone.]

A mineral, called, by Werner, strahlstein, ray-stone, nearly allied to hornblend. It occurs in prismatic crystals, which are long, and incomplete, and sometimes extremely minute and even fibrous. Its prevailing color is green of different shades, or shaded with yellow or brown. There are several varieties, as the common, the massive, the acicular, the glassy, and the fibrous.

Werner. Kirwan. Cleaveland.

Actinolite is crystalized, asbestiform, and glassy. Phillips.

ACTINOLITIC, a. Like or pertaining to actinolite.

ACT'ION, n. [L. actio. See Act.]

1. Literally, a driving; hence, the state of acting or moving; exertion of power or force, as when one body acts on another; or action is the effect of power exerted on one body by another; motion produced. Hence, action is opposed to rest. Action, when produced by one body on another, is mechanical; when produced by the will of a living being, spontaneous or voluntary. [See Def. 3.]

2. An act or thing done; a deed.

The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him are actions weighed. 1. Sam. ii.

3. In mechanics, agency; operation; driving impulse; effort of one body upon another; as, the action of wind upon a ship's sails. Also the effect of such action.

4. In ethics, the external signs or expression of the sentiments of a moral agent; conduct; behavior; demeanor; that is, motion or movement, with respect to a rule or propriety.

5. In poetry, a series of events, called also the subject or fable; this is of two kinds; the principal action which is more strictly the fable, and the incidental action or episode. Encyc.

6. In oratory, gesture or gesticulation; the external deportment of the speaker, or the accommodation of his attitude, voice, gestures, and countenance to the subject, or to the thoughts and feelings of the mind. Encyc.

7. In physiology, the motions or functions of the body, vital, animal, and natural; vital and involuntary, as the action of the heart and lungs; animal, as muscular, and all voluntary motions; natural, as mastication, deglutition, and digestion. Encyc.

8. In law, literally, an urging for right; a suit or process, by which a demand is made of a right; a claim made before a tribunal. Actions are real, personal or mixed; real, or feudal, when the demandant claims a title to real estate; personal, when a man demands a debt, personal duty, or damages in lieu of it, or satisfaction for an injury to person or property; and mixed, when real estate is demanded, with damages for a wrong sustained. Actions are also civil or penal; civil, when instituted solely in behalf of private persons, to recover debts or damages; penal, when instituted to recover a penalty, imposed by way of punishment. The word is also used for a right of action; as, the law gives an action for every claim. Blackstone.

A chose in action, is a right to a thing, in opposition to the possession. A bond or note is a chose in action [Fr. chose, a thing,] and gives the owner a right to prosecute his claim to the money, as he has an absolute property in a right, as well as in a thing, in possession.

9. In some countries of Europe, action is a share in the capital stock of a company, or in the public funds, equivalent to our term share; and consequently, in a more general sense, to stocks. The word is also used for movable effects.

10. In painting and sculpture, the attitude or position of the several parts of the body, by which they seem to be actuated by passions; as, the arm extended, to represent the act of giving or receiving.

11. Battle; fight; engagement between troops in war, whether on land or water, or by a greater or smaller number of combatants. This and the 8th definition exhibit the literal meaning of action—a driving or urging.

Quantity of action, in physics, the product of the mass of a body by the space it runs through and its velocity. Encyc.

In many cases action and act are synonymous: but some distinction between them is observable. Action seems to have more relation to the power that acts, and its operation and process of acting; and act, more relation to the effect or operation complete. Action is also more generally used for ordinary transactions; and act, for such as are remarkable, or dignified; as, all our actions should be regulated by prudence; a prince is distinguished by acts of heroism or humanity. Encyc.

Action taking, in Shakespeare, is used for litigious.

ACT'IONABLE, a. That will bear a suit, or for which an action at law may be sustained; as, to call a man a thief is actionable.

ACT'IONABLY, adv. In a manner that subjects to legal process.

ACT'IONARY or ACT'IONIST, n. In Europe, a proprietor of stock in a trading company; one who owns actions or shares of stock.

ACTIVE, a. [L. activus; Fr. actif.] That has the power or quality of acting; that contains the principle of action, independent of any visible external force; as, attraction is an active power: or it may be defined, that communicates action or motion, opposed to passive, that receives action; as, the active powers of the mind.

2. Having the power of quick motion, or disposition to move with speed; nimble; lively; brisk; agile; as an active animal. Hence,

3. Busy; constantly engaged in action; pursuing business with vigor and assiduity; opposed to dull, slow, or indolent; as an active officer. It is also opposed to sedentary, as an active life.

4. Requiring action or exertion; practical; operative; producing real effects; opposed to speculative; as, the active duties of life.

5. In grammar, active verbs are those which not only signify action, but have a noun or name following them, denoting the object of the action or impression; called also transitive, as they imply the passing of the action expressed by the verb to the object; as, a professor instructs his pupils.

6. Active capital, or wealth, is money, or property that may readily be converted into money, and used in commerce or other employment for profit. Hamilton.

7. Active commerce, the commerce in which a nation carries its own productions and foreign commodities in its own ships, or which is prosecuted by its own citizens; as contradistinguished from passive commerce, in which the productions of one country are transported by the people of another country.

The commerce of Great Britain and of the United States is active; that of China is passive.

It may be the interest of foreign nations to deprive us, as far as possible, of an active commerce in our own bottoms.

Federalist, Hamilton.

ACTIVELY, adv. In an active manner; by action; nimbly; briskly; also in an active signification, as a word is used actively.

ACTIVENESS, n. The quality of being active; the faculty of acting; nimbleness; quickness of motion; less used than activity.

ACTIVITY, n. The quality of being active; the active faculty; nimbleness; agility; also the habit of diligent and vigorous pursuit of business; as, a man of activity. It is applied to persons or things.

Sphere of activity, is the whole space in which the virtue, power, or influence of any object, is exerted.

To put in activity, a French phrase, for putting in action or employment.

ACT'OR, n. He that acts or performs; an active agent.

2. He that represents a character or acts a part in a play; a stage player.

3. Among civilians, an advocate or proctor in civil courts or causes.

ACTRESS, n. A female who acts or performs, and especially, on the stage, or in a play.

ACTUAL, a. [Fr. actuel. See Act.]

Real or effective, or that exists truly and absolutely; as, actual heat, opposed to that, which is virtual or potential; actual cautery, or the burning by a red-hot iron, opposed to a cautery or caustic application.

7. In botany, ending in an acute angle, as a leaf or perianth. Martyn.

ACUTELY, adv. Sharply; keenly; with nice discrimination.

ACUTENESS, n. Sharpness; but seldom used in this literal sense, as applied to material things.

2. Figuratively, the faculty of nice discernment or perception; applied to the senses, or the understanding. By an acuteness of feeling, we perceive small objects or slight impressions; by an acuteness of intellect, we discern nice distinctions.

3. Sharpness, or elevation of sound, in rhetoric or music. Boyle.

4. Violence of a disease, which brings it speedily to a crisis.

ACUTIATOR, n. In the middle ages, a person whose office was to sharpen instruments. Before the invention of fire-arms, such officers attended armies, to sharpen their instruments. Encyc.

AD. A Latin preposition, signifying to. It is probably from Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. Eth.

אד, Ar. آد, to come near, to approach; from which root we may also deduce at. In composition, the last letter is usually changed into the first letter of the word to which it is prefixed. Thus for adclamo, the Romans wrote acclamo; for adgredior, aggredior; for adfirmo, affirmo; for allego, allego; for adpono, appono; for adripio, arripio; for adscribo, ascribo; for adlineo, attineo. The reason of this change is found in the ease of pronunciation, and agreeableness of the sounds.

Ad hominem, to the man, in logic, an argument, adapted to touch the prejudices of the person addressed.

Ad inquirendum, in law, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made.

Ad libitum, [L.] at pleasure.

Ad valorem, according to the value, in commerce and finance, terms used to denote duties or charges laid upon goods, at a certain rate per cent. upon their value, as stated in their invoices; in opposition to a specific sum upon a given quantity or number.

ADAGE, n. [L. adagium, or adagio; It. adagio.]

A proverb; an old saying, which has obtained credit by long use; a wise observation handed down from antiquity.

ADAGIO, n. [It. adagio, a compound of ad and agio, leisure; Sp. and Port. ocio; L. otium; Fr. aise; Eng. ease.]

In music, a slow movement. As an adverb, slowly, leisurely, and with grace. When repeated, adagio, adagio, it directs the movement to be very slow.

ADAM, n. In Heb. Ch. Syr. Eth. Ar., Man; primarily, the name of the human species, mankind; appropriately, the first Man, the progenitor of the human race. The word signifies form, shape, or suitable form; hence, species. As a verb, the word signifies, in Ethiopic, to please or be agreeable; in Arabic, to join, unite, or be accordant, to agree. It is evidently connected with דמם damah, Heb. Ch. Syr., to be like or equal, to form an image, to assimilate. Whence the sense of likeness, image, form, shape; Gr. δευας, a body, like. [See Man.]

Adam's apple, a species of citron, [see Citron]; also the prominent part of the throat.

Adam's needle, the popular name of the yucca, a plant of four species, cultivated in gardens. Of the roots, the Indians make a kind of bread. [See Yucca.]

ADAMANT, n. [Gr. αδαμας; L. adamans; a word of Celtic origin; W. chedraen, a load stone, from ched, to fly or move, and raen, or maen, a stone. Chaucer uses adamant for the load stone. Romaunt of the Rose, L. 1182. Ger. diamant, is adamant and diamond; Sp. diamante; Sw. damant; Fr. aimant, load-stone. See Diamond.]

A very hard or impenetrable stone; a name given to the diamond and other substances of extreme hardness. The name has often been given to the load stone; but in modern mineralogy, it has no technical signification.

ADAMANTE'AN, a. Hard as adamant. Milton.

ADAMANT'INE, a. Made of adamant; having the qualities of adamant; that cannot be broken, dissolved, or penetrated; as adamantine bonds, or chains.

Adamantine Spar, a genus of earths, of three varieties. The color of the first is gray, with shades of brown or green; the form when regular, a hexangular prism, two sides large and four small, without a pyramid; its surface striated, and with a thin covering of white mica, interspersed with particles of red felspar; its fracture, foliaceous and sparry. The second variety is whiter, and the texture more foliaceous. The third variety is of a reddish brown color. This stone is very hard, and of difficult fusion. Encyc.

A variety of corundum. Cleveland.

ADAMIC, a. Pertaining to Adam. Adamic earth, is the term given to common red clay, so called by means of a mistaken opinion that Adam means red earth.

AD'AMITES, in Church history, a sect of visionaries, who pretended to establish a state of innocence, and like Adam, went naked. They abhorred marriage, holding it to be the effect of sin. Several attempts have been made to revive this sect; one as late as the 15th century. Encyc.

ADAMIT'IC, a. Like the Adamites. Taylor.

ADANSO'NIA, n. Ethiopian sour gourd, monkey's bread, or African calabash-tree. It is a tree of one species, called baobab, a native of Africa, and the largest of the vegetable kingdom. The stem rises not above twelve or fifteen feet, but is from sixty-five to seventy-eight feet in circumference. The branches shoot horizontally to the length of sixty feet, the ends bending to the ground. The fruit is oblong, pointed at both ends, ten inches in length, and covered with a greenish down, under which is a hard ligneous rind. It hangs to the tree by a pedicle two feet long, and contains a white spongy substance. The leaves and bark, dried and powdered, are used by the negroes, as pepper, on their food, to promote perspiration. The tree is named from M. Adanson, who has given a description of it.

ADAPT', v. t. [Sp. adaptar; It. adattare; L. ad. and apto, to fit; Gr. ἀρτω.]

The adipose vein spreads itself on the coat and fat that covers the kidneys. The adipose ducts are the bags and ducts which contain the fat.

Quincy. Core.

ADIT, n. [L. aditus, from adeo, aditum, to approach, ad and eo, to go.]

An entrance or passage; a term in mining, used to denote the opening by which a mine is entered, or by which water and ores are carried away. It is usually made in the side of a hill. The word is sometimes used for air-shaft, but not with strict propriety. Encyc.

ADJACENCY, n. [L. adjaceo, to lie contiguous, from ad and jaceo, to lie.]

The state of lying close or contiguous; a bordering upon, or lying next to; as the adjacency of lands or buildings. In the sense of that which is adjacent, as used by Brown, it is not legitimate.

ADJACENT, a. Lying near, close, or contiguous; bordering upon; as, a field adjacent to the highway.

ADJACENT, n. That which is next to or contiguous. [Little used.] Locke.

ADJECT, v. t. [L. adjicio, of ad and jacio, to throw.]

To add or put, as one thing to another.

Macknight.

ADJECTION, n. The act of adding, or thing added. [Little used.] Brown.

ADJECTIVIOUS, a. Added.

Parkhurst, Gram.

ADJECTIVE, n. In grammar, a word used with a noun, to express a quality of the thing named, or something attributed to it, or to limit or define it, or to specify or describe a thing, as distinct from something else. It is called also an attributive or attribute. Thus, in the phrase, a wise ruler, wise is the adjective or attribute, expressing a particular property of ruler.

ADJECTIVELY, adv. In the manner of an adjective; as, a word is used adjectively.

ADJOIN, v. t. [Fr. adjoindre; L. adjungo, ad and jungo. See Join.]

To join or unite to; to put to, by placing in contact; to unite, by fastening together with a joint, mortise, or knot. But in these transitive senses, it is rarely used. [See Join.]

ADJOIN, v. i. To lie or be next to, or in contact; to be contiguous; as, a farm adjoining to the highway. This is the common use of the word, and to is often omitted; as, adjoining the highway.

ADJOINANT, a. Contiguous to. [Not used.] Carew.

ADJOINED, pp. Joined to; united.

ADJOINING, ppr. Joining to; adjacent; contiguous.

ADJOURN, v. t. Adjurn. [Fr. ajourner, from journée, a day, or day's work, or journey; It. giorno. See Journal, Journey.] Laterally, to put off, or defer to another day; but now used to denote a formal intermission of business, a putting off to any future meeting of the same body, and appropriately used of public bodies or private commissioners, entrusted with business; as, the court adjourned the consideration of the question.

ADJOURN, v. i. To suspend business for a time; as, from one day to another, or for a longer period, usually public business, as of legislatures and courts, for repose or refreshment; as, congress adjourned at four o'clock. It is also used for the act of closing the session of a public body; as, the court adjourned without day.

It was moved that parliament should adjourn for six weeks. Select Speeches, Vol. v. 403.

ADJOURNED, pp. Put off, delayed, or deferred for a limited time.

2. As an adjective, existing or held by adjournment, as an adjourned session of a court, opposed to stated or regular.

ADJOURNING, ppr. Deferring; suspending for a time; closing a session.

ADJOURNMENT, n. The act of adjourning; as, in legislatures, the adjournment of one house is not an adjournment of the other.

2. The putting off till another day or time specified, or without day; that is, the closing of a session of a public or official body.

3. The time or interval during which a public body defers business; as, during an adjournment. But a suspension of business, between the forming of a house and an adjournment for refreshment, is called a recess. In Great Britain, the close of a session of parliament is called a prorogation; as the close of a parliament is a dissolution. But in Great Britain, as well as in the United States, adjournment is now used for an intermission of business, for any indefinite time; as, an adjournment of parliament for six weeks.

Select Speeches, Vol. v. 404.

ADJUDGE, v. t. [Fr. adjuer, from juge, judge. See Judge.]

To decide, or determine, in the case of a controverted question; to decree by a judicial opinion; used appropriately of courts of law and equity.

The case was adjudged in Hilary term.

The prize was adjudged to the victor; a criminal was adjudged to suffer death.

Encyc.
- ADMINISTRATIVE, a. That administers, or by which one administers.
- ADMINISTRATOR, n. A man who, by virtue of a commission from the Ordinary, Surrogate, Court of Probate, or other proper authority, has the charge of the goods and estate of one dying without a will.
2. One who administers, or who directs, manages, distributes, or dispenses laws and rites, either in civil, judicial, political, or ecclesiastical affairs.
3. In Scots law, a tutor, curator or guardian, having the care of one who is incapable of acting for himself. The term is usually applied to a father who has power over his children and their estate, during their minority.
Encyc.
- ADMINISTRATORSHIP, n. The office of an administrator.
- ADMINISTRATRIX, n. A female who administers upon the estate of an intestate; also a female who administers government.
- ADMIRABLE, a. [L. admirabilis.] To be admired; worthy of admiration; having qualities to excite wonder, with approbation, esteem or reverence; used of persons or things; as, the admirable structure of the body, or of the universe.
- ADMIRABLENESS, n. The quality of being admirable; the power of exciting admiration.
- ADMIRABLY, adv. In a manner to excite wonder, mingled with approbation, esteem or veneration.
- ADMIRAL, n. [In the Latin of the middle ages, Amira, Amiras, Admiralis, an Emir; Sp. almirante; Port. id.; It. ammiraglio; Fr. amiral; from Ar. amara, to command, amara, a commander; Sans. amara; Heb. Ch. Syr. Sam. amara, to speak. The terminating syllable of admiral may be from amara, the sea. This word is said to have been introduced into Europe by the Turks, Genoese or Venetians, in the 12th or 13th century.]
- A marine commander in chief; the commander of a fleet or navy.
1. The Lord High Admiral, in Great Britain, is an officer who superintends all maritime affairs, and has the government of the navy. He has also jurisdiction over all maritime causes, and commissions the naval officers.
2. The Admiral of the fleet, the highest officer under the admiralty. When he embarks on an expedition, the union flag is displayed at the main top gallant mast head.
3. The Vice Admiral, an officer next in rank and command to the Admiral, has command of the second squadron. He carries his flag at the fore top gallant mast head. This name is given also to certain officers who have power to hold courts of vice-admiralty, in various parts of the British dominions.
4. The Rear Admiral, next in rank to the Vice Admiral, has command of the third squadron, and carries his flag at the mizen top gallant mast head.
5. The commander of any single fleet, or in general any flag officer.
6. The ship which carries the admiral; also the most considerable ship of a fleet of merchantmen, or of fishing vessels.
Encyc.
7. In zoology, a species of shell-fish. [See Voluta.]
2. Also a butterfly, which lays her eggs on the great stinging nettle, and delights in brambles.
Encyc.
- ADMIRALSHIP, n. The office or power of an admiral. [Little used.]
- ADMIRALTY, n. In Great Britain, the office of Lord High Admiral. This office is discharged by one person, or by Commissioners, called Lords of the Admiralty; usually seven in number.
- The admiralty court, or court of admiralty, is the supreme court for the trial of maritime causes, held before the Lord High Admiral, or Lords of the admiralty.

In general, a court of admiralty is a court for the trial of causes arising on the high seas, as prize causes and the like. In the United States, there is no admiralty court, distinct from others; but the district courts, established in the several states by Congress, are invested with admiralty powers.

ADMIRATION, n. Wonder mingled with pleasing emotions, as approbation, esteem, love or veneration; a compound emotion excited by something novel, rare, great, or excellent; applied to persons and their works. It often includes a slight degree of surprise. Thus, we view the solar system with admiration.

Very near to admiration is the wish to admire.
Anon.

It has been sometimes used in an ill sense, denoting wonder with disapprobation.

Your boldness I with admiration see.

Dryden.

When I saw her I wondered with great admiration. Luke xvii.

ADMIRATIVE, n. A note of admiration, thus! [Not used.]
Cotgrave.

ADMIRE, v. t. [L. admiror, ad and miror, to wonder; Sp. and Port. admirar; Fr. admirer; It. ammirare; Fr. mire, to look, to take aim; Corn. miras, to look, see or face; Arm. miret, to stop, hold, keep; W. mir, visage; also fair, comely; and maer, one that looks after, keeps or guards, a mayor, or bailiff; Russ. zamirayti, to be astonished or stupified; za, a prefix, and mir, peace; miryu, to pacify; zamirayti, to make peace. The primary sense is to hold, to stop, or strain. Ch. and Syr. mir; L. demiror. See Moor and Mar.]

1. To regard with wonder or surprise, mingled with approbation, esteem, reverence or affection.

When he shall come to be glorified in his saints and be admired in all them that love him. 2 Thes. i.

This word has been used in an ill sense, but seems now correctly restricted to the sense here given, and implying something great, rare or excellent, in the object admired.

2. To regard with affection; a familiar term for to love greatly.

ADMIRE, v. i. To wonder; to be affected with slight surprise; sometimes with at; as, to admire at his own contrivance. Ray. To admire at sometimes implies disapprobation.

ADMIRED, pp. Regarded with wonder, mingled with pleasurable sensations, as esteem, love or reverence.

ADMIRER, n. One who admires; one who esteems or loves greatly.

ADMIRING, ppr. Regarding with wonder united with love or esteem.

ADM

- admission of aliens into our country; also the state of being admitted.
2. Admittance; power or permission to enter; entrance; access; power to approach; as, our laws give to foreigners easy admission to the rights of citizens; the admission of a clerk to a benefice.
 3. Allowance; grant of an argument or position not fully proved.
- ADMIT', v. t. [L. admitto, from ad and mitto, to send, Fr. mettre.]
1. To suffer to enter; to grant entrance; whether into a place, or an office, or into the mind, or consideration; as to admit a student into college; to admit a serious thought into the mind.
 2. To give right of entrance; as, a ticket admits one into a play house.
 3. To allow; to receive as true; as, the argument or fact is admitted.
 4. To permit, grant or allow, or to be capable of; as, the words do not admit of such a construction. In this sense, of may be used after the verb, or omitted.
- ADMIT'TABLE, a. That may be admitted or allowed.
- ADMIT'TANCE, n. The act of admitting; allowance. More usually,
2. Permission to enter; the power or right of entrance; and hence, actual entrance; as, he gained admittance into the church.
 3. Concession; admission; allowance; as the admittance of an argument. [Not used.]
 4. Shakespeare uses the word for the custom or prerogative of being admitted; "Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance": but the license is unwarrantable.
- ADMIT'TED, pp. Permitted to enter or approach; allowed; granted; conceded.
- ADMIT'TER, n. He that admits.
- ADMIT'TING, ppr. Permitting to enter or approach; allowing; conceding.
- ADMIX', v. t. To mingle with something else. [See Mix.]
- ADMIX'TION, n. admix'chun, [L. admixtio, or admistio; of ad and misceo, to mix. See Mix.]
- A mingling of bodies; a union by mixing different substances together. It differs from composition or chymical combination; for admixtion does not alter the nature of the substances mixed, but merely blends them together; whereas in composition, the particles unite by affinity, lose their former properties, and form new compounds, with different properties.
- ADMIX'TURE, n. [From admix.]
- The substance mingled with another; sometimes the act of mixture. We say, an admixture of sulphur with alum, or the admixture of different bodies.
- ADMON'ISH, v. t. [L. admoneo, ad and mo-neo, to teach, warn, admonish; Fr. admon-ter; Norm. amonestar; Sp. amonestar; Port. amoestar, or admoestar; It. ammonire; G. mahnen, ermahnen; D. maanen, to dun, vermaanen, to admonish; Sw. mana, for-mana; Dan. maner, formaner; Sax. manan, to mean.]

- ADO'NIS, n. In mythology, the favorite of Venus, said to be the son of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. He was fond of hunting, and received a mortal wound from the tusk of a wild boar. Venus lamented his death, and changed him into the flower, anemone.
- ADO'NIS, in botany, bird's eye or pheasant's eye.
- ADO'NISTS, n. [Heb. Ch. and Syr. אָדוֹן adon, Lord, a scriptural title of the Supreme Being.]
- Among critics, a sect or party who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah, are not the natural points belonging to that word, and that they do not express the true pronunciation of it; but that they are vowel points belonging to the words, Adonai and Elohim, applied to the ineffable name Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to utter, and the true pronunciation of which was lost; they were therefore always to pronounce the word Adonai, instead of Jehovah. Encyc.
- ADOPT', v. t. [L. adopto, of ad and opto, to desire or choose. See Option.]
1. To take a stranger into one's family, as son and heir; to take one who is not a child, and treat him as one, giving him a title to the privileges and rights of a child.
 2. In a spiritual sense, to receive the sinful children of men into the invisible church, and into God's favor and protection, by which they become heirs of salvation by Christ. Brown.
 3. To take or receive as one's own, that which is not naturally so; as, to adopt the opinions of another; or to receive that which is new; as, to adopt a particular mode of husbandry.
 4. To select and take; as, which mode will you adopt?
- ADOPT'ED, pp. Taken as one's own; received as son and heir; selected for use.
- ADOPT'EDLY, adv. In the manner of something adopted.
- ADOPT'ER, n. One who adopts.
2. In chemistry, a large round receiver, with two necks, diametrically opposite to each other, one of which admits the neck of a retort, and the other is joined to another receiver. It is used in distillations, to give more space to elastic vapors, or to increase the length of the neck of a retort.
- ADOPT'ING, ppr. Taking a stranger as a son; taking as one's own.
- ADOP'TION, n. [L. adoptio.]
1. The act of adopting, or the state of being adopted; the taking and treating of a stranger as one's own child.

2. The receiving as one's own, what is new or not natural.
3. God's taking the sinful children of men into his favor and protection. Eph. iv.
- Adoption by arms, an ancient ceremony of presenting arms to one for his merit or valor, which laid the person under an obligation to defend the giver.
- Adoption by baptism is the spiritual affinity which is contracted by god-fathers and god-children, in the ceremony of baptism. It was introduced into the Greek church, and afterwards among the ancient Franks. This affinity was supposed to entitle the god-child to a share of the god-father's estate. Encyc.
- Adoption by hair was performed by cutting off the hair of a person and giving it to the adoptive father. Thus Pope John VIII adopted Boson, king of Arles.
- Adoption by matrimony is the taking the children of a wife or husband, by a former marriage, into the condition of natural children. This is a practice peculiar to the Germans; but is not so properly adoption as affiliation. Encyc.
- Adoption by testament is the appointing of a person to be heir, by will, on condition of his taking the name, arms, &c. of the adopter. Encyc.
- In Europe, adoption is used for many kinds of admission to a more intimate relation, and is nearly equivalent to reception; as, the admission of persons into hospitals, or monasteries, or of one society into another. Encyc.
- ADOPTIVE, a. [L. adoptivus.] That adopts, as an adoptive father; or that is adopted, as an adoptive son.
- ADOPTIVE, n. A person or thing adopted.
- ADOPTABLE, a. That ought to be adopted; worthy of divine honors. In popular use, worthy of the utmost love or respect.
- ADORABLENESS, n. The quality of being adorable, or worthy of adoration.
- ADORABLY, adv. In a manner worthy of adoration.
- ADORA'TION, n. The act of paying honors to a divine being; the worship paid to God; the act of addressing as a God. Adoration consists in external homage, accompanied with the highest reverence. It is used for the act of praying, or preferring requests or thanksgiving, to the Supreme Being.
2. Homage paid to one in high esteem; profound reverence.
- Adoration, among the Jews, was performed by bowing, kneeling and prostration. Among the Romans, the devotee, with his head uncovered, applied his right hand to his lips, bowing and turning himself from left to right. The Persians fell on the face, striking the forehead against the earth, and kissing the ground. The adoration paid to the Grecian and Roman emperors, consisted in bowing and kneeling at the feet of the prince, laying hold of his robe, then withdrawing the hand and clapping it to the lips. In modern times, adoration is paid to the pope by kissing his feet, and to princes, by kneeling and kissing the hand. This word was used by the Romans for acclamation or great applause, given to public performers; and the election of a pope is sometimes by adoration, that is, by sudden acclamation without scrutiny. Encyc.
- ADO'RE, v. t. [L. adoro. In Ch. and Heb. רָדַד, to honor, reverence or glorify, to adorn; Heb. רָדַד, to be magnificent or glorious, to magnify, to glorify. This word is usually referred to the Latin adorare, to carry to one's mouth; ad and oro, as, in order to kiss one's hand, the hand is carried to one's mouth. See Calmet, ad verbum, who cites, in confirmation of this opinion, the ancient practice of kissing the hand. See Job. xxxi. 1 Kings, xix. Ps. ii. Gen. xli. Ainsworth supposes the word to be a compound of ad and oro, to pray; and if the word is compound, as I suspect, this opinion is most probably correct.]
1. To worship with profound reverence; to address with exalted thoughts, by prayer and thanksgiving; to pay divine honors to; to honor as a god or as divine. Dryden.
 2. To love in the highest degree; to regard with the utmost esteem, affection and respect; as, the people adore their prince. Tatler.
- ADO'RED, pp. Worshipped as divine; highly revered; greatly beloved.
- ADO'RER, n. One who worships, or honors as divine; in popular language, an admiring lover.
- ADO'RING, pp. or a. Honoring or addressing as divine; regarding with great love or reverence.
- ADORN', v. t. [L. adorno, ad and orno, to deck, or beautify, to dress, set off, extol, furnish; Fr. ornier; Sp. Port. ornar; It. ornare; Arm. aourna. Orno is probably the Saxon hrinan, gerenian, gerinan, gehrinan, to touch, to strike, to adorn, that is, to put on.]
1. To deck or decorate; to make beautiful; to add to beauty by dress; to deck with external ornaments. A bride adorneth herself with jewels. Isa. vi.

ADULT'ERY, n. [L. adulterium. See Adulterate.]

1. Violation of the marriage bed; a crime, or a civil injury, which introduces, or may introduce, into a family, a spurious offspring.

By the laws of Connecticut, the sexual intercourse of any man, with a married woman, is the crime of adultery in both: such intercourse of a married man, with an unmarried woman, is fornication in both, and adultery of the man, within the meaning of the law respecting divorce; but not a felonious adultery in either, or the crime of adultery at common law, or by statute. This latter offense is, in England, proceeded with only in the ecclesiastical courts.

In common usage, adultery means the unfaithfulness of any married person to the marriage bed. In England, Parliament grant absolute divorces, for infidelity to the marriage bed in either party; and the spiritual courts divorce a mensa et thoro.

2. In a scriptural sense, all manner of lewdness or unchastity, as in the seventh commandment.

3. In scripture, idolatry, or apostasy from the true God. Jer. iii.

2. Judicial pleading; law-suit. Chaucer.

ADVOCATE, n. [L. advocatus, from advoco, to call for, to plead for; of ad and voco, to call. See Vocal.]

1. Advocate, in its primary sense, signifies, one who pleads the cause of another in a court of civil law. Hence,

2. One who pleads the cause of another before any tribunal or judicial court, as a barrister in the English courts. We say, a man is a learned lawyer and an able advocate.

In Europe, advocates have different titles, according to their particular duties.

Consistorial advocates, in Rome, appear before the Consistory, in opposition to the disposal of benefices.

Elective advocates are chosen by a bishop, abbot, or chapter, with license from the prince.

Feudal advocates were of a military kind, and to attach them to the church, had grants of land, with power to lead the vassals of the church to war.

Fiscal advocates, in ancient Rome, defended causes in which the public revenue was concerned.

Juridical advocates became judges, in consequence of their attending causes in the earl's court.

Matricular advocates defended the cathedral churches.

Military advocates were employed by the church to defend it by arms, when force gave law to Europe.

Some advocates were called nominative, from their being nominated by the pope or king; some regular, from their being qualified by a proper course of study. Some were supreme; others, subordinate.

Advocate, in the German polity, is a magistrate, appointed in the emperor's name, to administer justice.

Faculty of advocates, in Scotland, is a society of eminent lawyers, who practice in the highest courts, and who are admitted members only upon the severest examination, at three different times. It consists of about two hundred members, and from this body are vacancies on the bench usually supplied.

Lord advocate, in Scotland, the principal crown lawyer, or prosecutor of crimes.

Judge advocate, in courts martial, a person who manages the prosecution.

In English and American courts, advocates are the same as counsel, or counselors. In England, they are of two degrees, barristers and serjeants; the former, being apprentices or learners, cannot, by ancient custom, be admitted serjeants, till of sixteen years standing. Blackstone. Encyc.

3. One who defends, vindicates, or espouses a cause, by argument; one who is friendly to; as, an advocate for peace, or for the oppressed.

In scripture, Christ is called an advocate for his people.

We have an advocate with the father. 1 John, ii.

ADVOCATE, v. t. To plead in favor of; to defend by argument, before a tribunal; to support or vindicate.

Those who advocate a discrimination. Hamilton's Report on public debt.

The Duke of York advocated the amendment. Debates on the Regency in the House of Lords, Dec. 27, 1810.

The Earl of Buckingham advocated the original resolution. Ibid.

The idea of a legislature, consisting of a single branch, though advocated by some, was generally reprobated. Ramsay, Hist. Carolina.

How little claim persons, who advocate this sentiment, really possess to be considered calvinists, will appear from the following quotation. Mackenzie's Life of Calvin.

The most eminent orators were engaged to advocate his cause. Mitford.

A part only of the body, whose cause he advocates, coincide with him in judgment. Chris. Obs. xi. 434. Scott.

ADVOCATED, pp. Defended by argument; vindicated.

ADVOU'TRY, n. Adultery. [Little used.] Bacon.

ADVOWEE', n. He that has the right of advowson. Cowel.

2. The advocate of a church or religious house. Cyc.

ADVOW'SON, n. s as z. [Fr. avouerie, from avouer, to avow; Norm. avoerie, or avoeson. But the word was latinized, advocatio, from advoco, and avow is from advoco.]

In English law, a right of presentation to a vacant benefice; or in other words, a right of nominating a person to officiate in a vacant church. The name is derived from advocatio, because the right was first obtained by such as were founders, benefactors or strenuous defenders, advocates, of the church. Those who have this right are styled patrons. Advowsons are of three kinds, presentative, collative, and donative; presentative, when the patron presents his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted; collative, when the bishop is the patron, and institutes, or collates his clerk, by a single act; donative, when a church is founded by the king, and assigned to the patron, without being subject to the ordinary, so that the patron confers the benefice on his clerk, without presentation, institution, or induction.

Advowsons are also appendant, that is, annexed to a manor; or, in gross, that is, annexed to the person of the patron. Blackstone.

ADVOY'ER, or Avoy'er, [Old Fr. advoes.]

A chief magistrate of a town or canton in Switzerland.

An iron instrument with an arching edge, across the line of the handle, and ground from a base on its inside to the outer edge; used for chipping a horizontal surface of timber. Encyc.

Æ, a diphthong in the Latin language; used also by the Saxon writers. It answers to the Gr. α. The Sax. æ has been changed into e or ea. In derivatives from the learned languages, it is mostly superseded by e, and convenience seems to require it to be wholly rejected in anglicized words. For such words as may be found with this initial combination, the reader will therefore search under the letter E.

ÆD, ed, ead, syllables found in names from the Saxon, signify happy; as, Eadric, happy kingdom; Eadrig, happy victory; Edward, prosperous watch; Edgar, successful weapon. Gibson. Lye.

ÆDILE, n. [Lat.] In ancient Rome, an officer or magistrate, who had the care of the public buildings, [ædes,] streets, highways, public spectacles, &c.

Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh.

1 Kings iii.

2. Agreement; relation; conformity; resemblance; connection; as, the affinity of sounds, of colors, or of languages.

3. In chemistry, attraction; elective attraction, or that tendency which different species of matter have to unite, and combine with certain other bodies, and the power that disposes them to continue in combination. There are two kinds of affinity.

1. Affinity of aggregation, which is the power that causes two homogeneous bodies to tend towards each other, unite and cohere, as two drops of water, which unite in one. 2. Affinity of composition, which is the tendency of bodies of different kinds to unite and form new combinations of bodies with different properties. Such is the affinity which unites acids and alkalis, the results of which combination are neutral salts.

The operations of this principle are various. When heterogeneous bodies have mutually an equal attraction, it is called compound affinity. When one substance decomposes a combination of others, unites with one of them and precipitates the other, the power is called the affinity of decomposition. When bodies will not unite, but by means of a third, which enables them to combine, this is affinity by means of a medium.

Double affinity is when by means of four bodies, two decompositions and two new combinations are effected.

Fourcroy. Hooper.

AFRAID, a. [The participle of affray.]

Impressed with fear or apprehension; fearful. This word expresses a less degree of fear than terrified or frightened. It is followed by of before the object of fear; as, to be afraid of death.

Joseph was afraid to sin against God.

AFRESH', adv. [a and fresh.]

Anew; again; recently; after intermission. They crucify the son of God afresh. Heb. vi.

AFRICA, n. [Qu. L. a neg. and frigus, cold.]

A F T

A F T

A G A

One of the four quarters or largest divisions of the globe; a continent separated from Europe by the Mediterranean sea.

AFRIC, } a. Pertaining to Africa.

AFRICAN, } n. A native of Africa.

This name is given also to the African marygold.

AFRONT', adv. In front.

AFT, a. or adv. [Sax. aft, eft, after, behind.]

In seaman's language, a word used to denote the stern or what pertains to the stern of a ship; as, the aft part of the ship; haul aft the main sheet, that is, further towards the stern. Fore and aft is the whole length of a ship. Right aft is in a direct line with the stern.

AFTER, a. [The comparative degree of aft. But in some Teutonic dialects it is written with g; D. agter; Dan. agters. The Eng. corresponds with the Sax. after, Sw. efter, Goth. aftero, Dan. efter.]

1. In marine language, more aft, or towards the stern of the ship; as, the after sails; after hatchway.

2. In common language, later in time; as, an after period of life.

In this sense, the word is often combined with the following noun; as in afternoon.

AFTER, prep. Behind in place; as, men placed in a line one after another.

2. Later in time; as, after supper. This word often precedes a sentence, as a governing preposition.

After I have arisen, I will go before you into Galilee. Math. xxvi.

3. In pursuit of, that is, moving behind, following; in search of.

After whom is the king of Israel come out? 1 Sam. xxiv.

Ye shall not go after other Gods. Deut. vi.

4. In imitation of; as, to make a thing after a model.

5. According to; as, consider a thing after its intrinsic value.

6. According to the direction and influence of.

To walk after the flesh; to live after the flesh. Rom. viii.

To judge after the sight of the eye. Is. xi.

To inquire after is to seek by asking; to ask concerning.

To follow after, in scripture, is to pursue, or imitate; to serve, or worship.

AFTER, adv. Posterior; later in time; as, it was about the space of three hours after.

In this sense, the word, however, is really a preposition, the object being understood; about three hours after the time or fact before specified.

After is prefixed to many words, forming compounds, but retaining its genuine signification. Some of the following words are of this kind, but in some of them after seems rather to be a separate word.

AGAIN, adv. agen'. [Sax. gean, agen, agean, ongean; D. with a different prefix, tegen; G. dagegen, gegen; Sw. igen; Dan. igen; qu. L. con, whence contra; Fr. coïnné, opposite, a meeting. Hence Sax. togeanes, togegnes, against; but placed after its object; as, "hi comen heom togeanes," they come them against. D. tegens, against; jegens, towards; G. entgegen, dagegen, against; begegnen, to meet or encounter. The primary sense is to turn, or to meet in front; or the name of the face, front or forepart. So in Dan. and Sw. mod, imod, emot, against, is our word meet.]

1. A second time; once more.

I will not again curse the ground. Gen. viii.

2. It notes something further, or additional to one or more particulars.

For to which of the angels said he at any time, thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee? and again, I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son? and again, let all the angels of God worship him. Heb. i.

All the uses of this word carry in them the ideas of return or repetition; as in these phrases; give it back again; give him as much again, that is, the same quantity once more or repeated.

There is not, in the world again, such a commerce as in London.

Who art thou that answerest again?

Bring us word again.

Again and again, often; with frequent repetition.

AG'ARIC, n. [Gr. αγαρικον. Qu. from Agaria, in Sarmatia. Dioscorides.]

In botany, mushroom, a genus of funguses, containing numerous species. Mushrooms grow on trees, or spring from the earth; of the latter species some are valued as articles of food; others are poisonous. The name was originally given to a fungus growing on the larch. This species is now frequent in the shops, and distinguished by the name of female agaric. From this fungus is extracted a turpentine, of which three fourths of its weight is a resinous substance; the rest, a slimy, mucilaginous, earthy matter, tenacious and almost insoluble in water. It is used in dyeing, but is little esteemed in medicine. Theoph. Macquer. Quincy. The Agaric of the oak is called touch-wood, from its readiness to take fire. Boletus Ignarius, Linne.

Agaric mineral, a calcarious earth, or carbonate of lime, resembling a fungus in color and texture; found in fissures of rocks, and on the roofs of caverns. It is sometimes used as an astringent in fluxes, and a styptic in hemorrhages. It occurs in a loose semi-indurated form, white or whitish red, or yellow, light and friable. Kirwan mentions three varieties.

Gower.

AG'ATE, n. [Fr. agate; L. achates, gagates; Gr. γαγατης; so called, says Pliny, 37, 10, because found near a river of that name in Sicily. So also Solinus and Isidore. But Bochart, with more probability, deduces it from the Punic and Hebrew קק, and with a different prefix קק, spotted. The word is used, Gen. xxx. and xxxi., to describe the speckled and spotted cattle of Laban and Jacob.]

A class of siliceous, semi-pellucid gems of many varieties, consisting of quartz-crystal, flint, horn-stone, chalcedony, amethyst, jasper, cornelian, heliotrope, and jade, in various combinations, variegated with dots, zones, filaments, ramifications, arborizations, and various figures. Agates seem to have been formed by successive layers of siliceous earth, on the sides of cavities which they now fill entirely or in part. They are esteemed the least valuable of the precious stones. Even in Pliny's time, they were in little estimation. They are found in rocks, in the form of fragments, in nodules, in small rounded lumps, rarely in stalactites. Their colors are various. They are used for rings, seals, cups, beads, boxes and handles of small utensils. Kirwan. Encyc. Cleaveland.

AG'ATE, n. An instrument used by gold-wire drawers, so called from the agate in the middle of it.

AG'ATINE, a. Pertaining to agate.

AGGRA'CE, n. Kindness; favor. [Not used.] Spenser.

AGGRANDIZA'TION, n. The act of aggrandizing. [Not used.] Waterhouse.

AG'GRANDIZE, v. t. [Fr. agrandir, of L. ad and grandis. See Grand.]

1. To make great or greater in power, rank or honor; to exalt; as, to aggrandize a family.

2. To enlarge, applied to things; as, to aggrandize our conceptions. It seems to be never applied to the bulk or dimensions of material bodies.

AG'GRANDIZED, pp. Made great or greater; exalted; enlarged.

AGGRAND'IZEMENT, n. The act of aggrandizing; the state of being exalted in power, rank or honor; exaltation; enlargement.

The Emperor seeks only the aggrandizement of his own family.

AG'GRANDIZER, n. One that aggrandizes or exalts in power, rank or honor.

AG'GRANDIZING, ppr. Making great; exalting; enlarging.

AGGRA'TE, v. t. [It.] To please. [Not used.] Spenser.

AG'GRAVATE, v. t. [L. aggravo, of ad and gravis, heavy. See Grave, Gravity.]

1. To make heavy, but not used in this literal sense. Figuratively, to make worse, more severe, or less tolerable; as, to aggravate the evils of life; to aggravate pain or punishment.

2. To make more enormous, or less excusable; as, to aggravate a crime.

3. To exaggerate.

4. To give coloring in description; to give an exaggerated representation; as, to aggravate a charge against an offender; to aggravate circumstances.

Guthrie, Quint. Paley.

Actions and motives maliciously aggravated. Washington's Life.

The propriety of the word in the latter passage is questionable. Aggravate is generally used in reference to evils, or something improper or unnatural.

AG'GRAVATED, pp. Increased in severity or enormity; made worse; exaggerated.

AG'GRAVATING, ppr. Increasing in severity, enormity, or degree, as evils, misfortunes, pain, punishment, crimes, guilt, &c.; exaggerating.

AGGRAVATION, n. The act of making worse, used of evils, natural or moral; the act of increasing severity or hainousness; addition to that which is evil or improper; as, an aggravation of pain or grief.

2. Exaggerated representation, or heightened description of any thing wrong, improper, or unnatural; as, an aggravation of features in a caricature. Paley. Addison.

AG'GREGATE, v. t. [L. aggrego, to collect in troops; of ad and grex, a herd or band. See Gregarious.]

To bring together; to collect particulars into a sum, mass or body.

AG'GREGATE, a. Formed by a collection of particulars into a whole mass or sum; as, the aggregate amount of charges.

Aggregate flowers, in botany, are such as are composed of florets united by means of the receptacle or calyx. Milne.

Aggregate corporation, in law, is one which consists of two or more persons united, whose existence is preserved by a succession of new members. Blackstone.

AG'GREGATE, n. A sum, mass or assemblage of particulars; as, a house is an aggregate of stones, bricks, timber, &c. It differs from a compound in this, that the particulars of an aggregate are less intimately mixed than in a compound.

AG'GREGATED, pp. Collected into a sum, mass or system.

AG'GREGATELY, adv. Collectively; taken in a sum or mass.

AG'GREGATING, ppr. Collecting into a sum or mass.

AGGREGA'TION, n. The act of aggregating; the state of being collected into a sum or mass; a collection of particulars; an aggregate.

2. In chemistry, the affinity of aggregation, is the power which causes homogeneous bodies to tend towards each other, and to cohere, when united. The aggregate, in this case, differs from a heap, whose parts do not cohere; and from a mixture, which consists of parts dissimilar in their nature. The word is used of solid, fluid, or aeriform bodies.

3. The union and coherence of bodies of the same nature.

AG'GREGATIVE, a. Taken together; collective.

AG'GREGATOR, n. He that collects into a whole or mass. Burton.

AGGRESS', v. t. [L. aggredior, aggressus, of ad and gradior, to go. See Grade.]

To make a first attack; to commit the first act of hostility or offense; to begin a quarrel or controversy; to assault first or invade. Prior.

AGGRESS'ING, ppr. Commencing hostility first; making the first attack.

AGGRESSION, n. The first attack, or act of hostility; the first act of injury, or first act leading to war or controversy. L'Estrange.

AGGRESS'IVE, a. Tending to aggress; making the first attack. Clarkson.

AGGRESS'OR, n. The person who first attacks; he who first commences hostility or a quarrel; an assaulter; an invader. Dryden.

The insolence of the aggressor is usually proportioned to the tameness of the sufferer. Ames.

AGGRIE'VANCE, n. [See Aggrieve.]

Oppression; hardship; injury. But grievance is more generally used.

AGGRIE'VE, v. t. [of ad and grieve, from grief. Perhaps the word is borrowed directly from the Sp. agraviar, to injure; Fr. grever. See Grief and Grave.]

To give pain or sorrow; to afflict. In this sense, it is nearly superseded by grieve.

2. To bear hard upon; to oppress or injure, in one's rights; to vex or harass by civil or political injustice.

AGGRIE'VE, v. i. To mourn; to lament. [Not used. See Grieve.]

- AGGRIE'VED, pp. Pained; afflicted; civilly or politically oppressed.
- AGGRIE'VING, ppr. Afflicting; imposing hardships on; oppressing.

1. In commerce, the difference between bank notes and current coin. In Holland, the agio is three or four per cent.; in Rome, from fifteen to twenty-five per cent.; in Venice, twenty per cent.: but the agio is subject to variation. Encyc.
2. Premium; sum given above the nominal value. Lunier.
- AGIST, v. t. [If the primary sense is to lie, or to rest, this is from Fr. gesir; Norm. agiser, to be levant and couchant, from giser, to lay or throw down; whence gist, cast; gistance, a casting. Class Gs. No. 18. If the primary signification is to feed, see Nos. 5, 6, 10, 12, and 56. Ch. Class Gs.]
In law, to take the cattle of others to graze, at a certain sum; to feed or pasture the cattle of others; used originally for the feeding of cattle in the king's forest. Cowel. Blackstone.
- AGIST'MENT, n. The taking and feeding other men's cattle in the king's forest, or on one's own land; also, the price paid for such feeding. It denotes also a burden, charge or tax. [In canon law, a modus, or composition. Johnson, Qu.]
- AGIST'OR, or AGISTA'TOR, n. An officer of the king's forest, who has the care of cattle agisted, and collects the money for the same; hence called gist-taker, which in England is corrupted into guest-taker. Encyc.
- AG'ITABLE, a. [See Agitate.] That may be agitated, shaken or discussed.
- AG'ITATE, v. t. [L. agito, from ago. See Act.]
1. To stir violently; to move back and forth with a quick motion; to shake or move briskly; as, to agitate water in a vessel.
2. To move or force into violent irregular action; as, the wind agitates the sea.
3. To disturb, or excite into tumult; as, to agitate the mind or passions.
4. To discuss; to debate; to controvert; as, to agitate a question.
5. To consider on all sides; to revolve in the mind, or view in all its aspects; to contrive by mental deliberation; as, politicians agitate desperate designs. King Charles.
6. To move or actuate. [Not used.] Blackmore.
- AG'ITATED, pp. Tossed from side to side; shaken; moved violently and irregularly; disturbed; discussed; considered.
- AG'ITATING, ppr. Shaking; moving with violence; disturbing; disputing; contriving.
- AGITATION, n. The act of shaking; the state of being moved with violence, or with irregular action; commotion; as, the sea after a storm is in agitation. Bacon.
2. Disturbance of tranquility in the mind; perturbation; excitement of passion.
3. Discussion; examination of a subject in controversy. L'Estrange.
4. A state of being deliberated upon, with a view to contrivance, or plan to be adopted; as, a scheme is in agitation.
- AGITA'TO, in music, denotes a broken style of performance, adapted to awaken surprise or perturbation. Dict. of Music.
- AG'ITATOR, n. One who agitates; also, an insurgent; one who excites sedition or revolt. In antiquity, a chariotteer, that is, a driver. In Cromwell's time, certain officers appointed by the army to manage their concerns, were called agitators. Hume.
- AG'LET, } n. [Fr. aiguillette, a point, from A'IGLET, } aiguille, a needle, from aigu, sharp. See Acid.]
1. A tag of a point curved into the representation of an animal, generally of a man; a small plate of metal.
2. In botany, a pendant at the ends of the chives of flowers, as in the rose and tulip.
- AG'LET-BABY, n. A small image on the top of a lace. Shak.
- AG'MINAL, a. [L. agmen, a troop or body of men arrayed, from ago.]
Pertaining to an army or troop. [Little used.]
- AG'NAIL, n. [ad and nail, or Sax. ange, pain, and nail. See Nail.]
A disease of the nail; a whitlow; an inflammation round the nail. Bailey.
- AG'NATE, a. [L. agnatus.] Related or akin by the father's side.
- AG'NATE, n. [L. agnatus, adnascor, of ad and nascor, to be born. See Nature.]
Any male relation by the father's side. Encyc.
- AGNAT'IC, a. Pertaining to descent by the male line of ancestors. Blackstone.
- AGNA'TION, n. Relation by the father's side only, or descent in the male line, distinct from cognation, which includes descent in the male and female lines.
- AG'NEL, n. [From agnus, a lamb, the figure struck on the coin.]
An ancient French coin, value twelve sols, six deniers. It was called also mouton d'or and agnel d'or. Encyc.
- AGNI'TION, n. [L. agnitio, agnosco.]
Acknowledgment. [Little used.] Pearson.
- AGNI'ZE, v. t. To acknowledge. [Not in use.] Shak.
- AGNOM'INATE, v. t. [L. agnomino; ad and nomino, nomen, name.]
To name. [Little used.]
- AGNOMINA'TION, n. [L. agnomen, a surname, of ad and nomen. See Name.]
1. An additional name, or title; a name added to another, as expressive of some act, achievement, &c.; a surname. Camden. Encyc.
2. Allusion of one word to another by sound.
- AGNUS CASTUS. A species of vitex, so called from the Gr. ayos, chaste, or from a negative, and ynos, seed, from its imagined virtue of preserving chastity. The Athenian ladies reposed on the leaves of this plant at the feast of Ceres. The Latin Castus, chaste, now added to the name, forms a duplication of the sense. Encyc.
- AGNUS DEI. [Lamb of God.]
In the Romish Church, a cake of wax stamped with the figure of a lamb, supporting the banner of the cross. It is supposed to possess great virtues in preserving those who carry it, in faith and from accidents, &c. Also a part of the mass in which these words are repeated by the priest. Encyc.
- AGNUS SCYTHICUS. [Scythian Lamb.]
A name applied to the roots of a species of fern, Aspidium Barometz, covered with brown woolly scales, and, in shape, resembling a lamb; found in Russia and Tartary.
- AGO, adv. or a. [Sax. agan, or geond, the participle of gan, to go; contracted from agone. See Go.]
Past; gone; as, a year ago.
- AGOG, adv. [Fr. agogo; vivre à gogo, to live in clover.]
In a state of desire; highly excited by eagerness after an object.
The gaudy gossip when she's set agog. Dryden.
- AGO'ING. [The participle of go, with the prefix a.]
In motion, as to set a mill agoing; or about to go; ready to go; as, he is agoing immediately. The latter use is vulgar.
- A'GON, n. [Gr.]
The contest for the prize. [Not used.] Sanctroft.
- AGONE, pp. agawn', [See Ago and Gone.]
Ago; past; since. [Nearly Obs.]
- AGONISM, n. [Gr. agonismos.]
Contention for a prize. Dict.
- AGONIST, n. One who contends for the prize in public games. Milton has used Agonistes in this sense, and so called his tragedy, from the similitude of Sampson's exertions, in slaying the Philistines, to prize fighting. In church history, the disciples of Donatus are called agonistics.
- AGONIST'IC, } a. Pertaining to prize-AGONIST'ICAL, } fighting, contests of strength, or athletic combats. Enfield.
- AGONIST'ICALLY, adv. In an agonistic manner; like prize-fighting.
- AG'ONIZE, v. t. [Gr. agonizein, to strive. See Agony.]
To writhe with extreme pain; to suffer violent anguish.
To smart and agonize at every pore. Pope.

AG'ONIZE, v. t. To distress with extreme pain; to torture. Pape.

AG'ONIZING, ppr. Suffering severe pain; writhing with torture.

AG'ONIZINGLY, adv. With extreme anguish.

AG'ONY, n. [Gr. αγών, a contest with bodily exertion; a word used to denote the athletic games, in Greece; whence αγώνια, anguish, solicitude; from αγώ, L. ago. In Lr. agh, is a battle, conflict; Gr. αγωνίζω, to strive. See Act.]

1. In strictness, pain so extreme as to cause writhing or contortions of the body, similar to those made in the athletic contests in Greece. Hence,

2. Extreme pain of body or mind; anguish; appropriately, the pangs of death, and the sufferings of our Savior in the garden of Gethsemane. Luke xxii.

3. Violent contest or striving. More.

AGOOD', adv. In earnest. [Not used.] Shak.

AGOUTY, n. [Qu. Sp. agudo, sharp; L. acutus.]

A quadruped of the order Rodentia; arranged by naturalists in the genus Cavia. It is of the size of a rabbit. The upper part of the body is brownish, with a mixture of red and black; the belly yellowish. Three varieties are mentioned, all peculiar to South America and the West Indies. It burrows in the ground, or in hollow trees; lives on vegetables; is voracious like a pig, and makes a similar grunting noise. It holds its meat in its fore paws, like a squirrel. When scared or angry, its hair is erect, and it strikes the ground with its hind feet. Its flesh is white and well tasted. Encyc.

AGRA'RIAN, a. [L. agrarius, from ager, a field.]

Relating to lands. Appropriately, denoting or pertaining to an equal division of lands; as, the agrarian laws of Rome, which distributed the conquered and other public lands equally among all the citizens, limiting the quantity which each might enjoy. Authors sometimes use the word as a noun; an agrarian, for agrarian law.

Burke.

An agrarian distribution of land or property, would make the rich, poor, but would not make the poor, rich.

AGREE', v. i. [Fr. agréer, from gre', will, accord. This is contracted from Sp. agradar, Port. id., to please, to gratify, whence agradable, agreeable; from the root of L. gratia, W. rhad, grace, favor, that comes freely. The primary sense is advancing, from the same root as L. gradior; W. rhaz, [rhath]; Syr. ;; radah, to go.]

1. To be of one mind; to harmonize in opinion.

In the expediency of the law, all the parties agree.

2. To live in concord, or without contention; as, parents and children agree well together.

3. To yield assent; to approve or admit; followed by to; as, to agree to an offer, or to an opinion.

4. To settle by stipulation, the minds of parties being agreed, as to the terms; as, Didst thou not agree with me for a penny a day? Mat. xx.

To agree on articles of partnership.

Vol. I.

5. To come to a compromise of differences; to be reconciled.

Agree with thy adversary quickly. Mat. v.

6. To come to one opinion or mind; to concur; as, to agree on a place of meeting.

This sense differs not essentially from the fourth, and it often implies a resolving to do an act. John ix.

7. To be consistent; to harmonize; not to contradict, or be repugnant.

Their witness agreed not together. Mark xiv.

This story agrees with what has been related by others.

8. To resemble; to be similar; as, the picture does not agree with the original.

9. To suit; to be accommodated or adapted to; as, the same food does not agree with every constitution.

AGREE', v. t. To admit, or come to one mind concerning; as, to agree the fact. Also, to reconcile or make friends; to put an end to variance; but these senses are unusual and hardly legitimate. Let the parties agree the fact, is really elliptical; let them agree on the fact.

AGREEABILITY, n. Easiness of disposition. [Not used.] Chaucer.

AGREEABLE, a. Suitable; conformable; correspondent; consistent with; as, the practice of virtue is agreeable to the law of God and our own nature.

2. In pursuance of; in conformity with; as, agreeable to the order of the day, the house took up the report of the committee. It is not correctly followed by with. In this sense, some writers use agreeably, for agreeable, but in violation of the true principles of construction; for the word is an adjective or attribute, in agreement with the last clause of the sentence. The house took up the report of a committee, (which taking up was) agreeable to the order of the day. The use of agreeably in this sentence would pervert the sense.

3. Pleasing, either to the mind or senses; as, agreeable manners; fruit agreeable to the taste.

AGREEABLENESS, n. Suitableness; conformity; consistency; as, the agreeableness of virtue to the laws of God.

2. The quality of pleasing; that quality which gives satisfaction or moderate pleasure to the mind or senses; as, an agreeableness of manners; there is an agreeableness in the taste of certain fruits. This is the usual sense of the word.

3. Resemblance; likeness; with to or between; as,

The agreeableness between man and other parts of creation. Obs. Grew.

AGREEABLY, adv. Pleasingly; in an agreeable manner; in a manner to give pleasure; as, to be agreeably entertained with a discourse.

2. Suitably; consistently; conformably;

The effect of which is, that marriages grow less frequent, agreeably to the maxim above laid down. Paley.

This is a gross error, proceeding from mistake. Agreeably signifies, in an agreeable manner; but this is not the sense, nor does the word modify the verb grow. The sense is, marriages grow less frequent, which [fact, or whole member of the sentence, or proposition] is agreeable to the maxim above laid down. This use of agreeably is common, but grossly erroneous.

3. Alike; in the same manner.

Both armed agreeably. Obs. Spenser.

AGREE'D, pp. Being in concord or harmony of opinion; of one mind.

Can two walk together except they be agreed? Amos. iii.

2. Assented to; admitted; as, a proposition is agreed to.

3. Settled by consent; implying bargain or contract; as, the terms were agreed to, or agreed upon.

AGREE'ING, ppr. Living in concord; concurring; assenting; settling by consent.

AGREE'INGLY, adv. In conformity to. [Little used.]

AGREE'MENT, n. Concord; harmony; conformity.

What agreement hath the temple of God with idols? 2 Cor. vi.

2. Union of opinions or sentiments; as, a good agreement subsists among the members of the council.

3. Resemblance; conformity; similitude. Expansion and duration have this farther agreement. Locke.

4. Union of minds in regard to a transfer of interest; bargain; compact; contract; stipulation.

Make an agreement with me by a present. 2 Kings xviii.

He made an agreement for the purchase of a house.

AGRES'TIC, } a. [L. agrestis; Fr. a-
AGRES'TICAL, } a. greste; from L. ager, a field, or the same root.]

Rural; rustic; pertaining to fields or the country, in opposition to the city; unpolished. Gregory.

AGRICULTOR, n. [L. ager, a field, and cultor, a cultivator.]

One whose occupation is to till the ground; a farmer; a husbandman; one skilled in husbandry.

AGRICULTURAL, a. Pertaining to husbandry, tillage, or the culture of the earth.

AGRICULTURE, n. [L. ager, a field, and cultura, cultivation. See Acres and Culture.]

In a general sense, the cultivation of the ground, for the purpose of producing vegetables, and fruits, for the use of man and beast; or the art of preparing the soil, sowing and planting seeds, dressing the plants, and removing the crops. In this sense, the word includes gardening, or horticulture, and also the raising and feeding of cattle, or stock. But in a more common and appropriate sense, it is used to signify that species of cultivation which is intended to raise grain and other crops for man and beast. It is equivalent to husbandry. Agriculture is the most general occupation of man.

AGRICULTURISM, n. The art or science of agriculture. [Little used.]

AGRICULTURIST, n. One skilled in the art of cultivating the ground; a skilful husbandman.

AGRIMONY, n. [L. argemonia, from the Gr. Thus it is written by Pliny. But in lower Latin it is written agrimonia. Said to be from Gr. αργεμα, the web or pearl of the eye, from αργος, white, which this plant was supposed to cure. See Theoph. 887.] A genus of plants, of several species. Of these, the eupatoria or common agrimony, and the odorata or sweet scented, are the most useful. Encyc.

AGRIPPINIANS, n. In Church history, the followers of Agrippinus, bishop of Carthage, in the third century, who first taught and defended the doctrine of rebaptization. Encyc.

AGRISE, v. i. [Sax. agrisan.]

AGRISE, v. t. To terrify; also, to make frightful. [Not in use.] Spenser.

AGROM, n. A disease frequent in Bengal, and other parts of the E. Indies, in which the tongue chaps and cleaves, becomes rough and sometimes covered with white spots. The remedy is some chalybeate liquor, or the juice of mint. Encyc.

AGROSTEMMA, n. A genus of plants of several species, containing the common corn cockle, wild lychnis or campion, &c.

AGROS'TIS, n. [Gr. αγρως.]

Bent grass; a genus of many species.

AGROUND, adv. [Of a, at or on, and ground.]

1. On the ground; a marine term, signifying that the bottom of a ship rests on the ground, for want of sufficient depth of water. When the ground is near the shore, the ship is said to be ashore or stranded.

2. Figuratively, stopped; impeded by insuperable obstacles.

AGUAPECA'CA, n. The Jacana, a Brazilian bird, about the size of a pigeon. In the extremity of each wing, it has a sharp prickle which is used for defense. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

A'GUE, n. a'gu, [Sax. age, oga, or hoga, fear, horror; Arm. hegea, to shake; Goth. agis, fear, agyan or ogan, to fear; Ir. agh, fear, agha or aghaim, to fear. The radical idea is a shaking or shivering similar to that occasioned by terror.]

1. The cold fit which precedes a fever, or a paroxysm of fever in intermittents. It is accompanied with shivering.

2. Chilliness; a chill, or state of shaking with cold, though in health.

3. It is used for a periodical fever, an intermittent, whether quotidian, tertian, or quartan. In this case, the word, which signifies the preceding cold fit, is used for the disease.

A'GUE, v. t. To cause a shivering in; to strike with a cold fit. Haywood.

A'GUE-CAKE, n. A hard tumor on the left side of the belly, lower than the false ribs; supposed to be the effect of intermittent fevers. Encyc.

A'GUED, a. Chilly; having a fit of ague; shivering with cold or fear. Shak.

A'GUE-FIT, n. A paroxysm of cold, or shivering; chilliness.

A'GUE-PROOF, n. Able to resist agues; proof against agues.

AGUER'RY, v. t. [Fr. aguerrir; from guerre, war.]

To inure to the hardships of war; to instruct in the art of war. [Not in use.] Lyttleton.

A'GUE-SPELL, n. A charm or spell to cure or prevent ague. Gay.

A'GUE-STRUCK, a. Struck with ague. Heuyt.

A'GUE-TREE, n. A name sometimes applied to sassafras, on account of its febrifuge qualities. Encyc.

AGUISE, v. t. [See Guise.] To dress; to adorn. [Not in use.] Spenser.

AGUISE, n. Dress. [Not in use.] More.

A'GUISH, a. Chilly; somewhat cold or shivering; also, having the qualities of an ague.

Her aguish love now glows and burns.

A'GUISHNESS, n. Chilliness; the quality of being aguish. Granville.

AGUILLANEUF, n. [From a, to, gui, misleto, and Pan neuf, the new year.]

A form of rejoicing among the ancient Franks, on the first day of the year; derived from the druidical custom of cutting misleto, which was held sacred by the druids, and on the first day of the year, consecrating it by crying, aguillaneuf, the year to the misleto. This cry is said to be still observed in some parts of France; and the term came to signify also a begging of New Year's gifts. Encyc.

A'GUL, n. A species of the hedysarum.

AH, An exclamation, expressive of surprise, pity, complaint, contempt, dislike, joy, exultation, &c., according to the manner of utterance.

AH'A. An exclamation expressing triumph, contempt, or simple surprise; but the senses are distinguished by very different modes of utterance, and different modifications of features.

2. A sunk fence, not visible, without near approach. Mason.

AHAN'IGER, n. A name of the gar-fish.

AHEAD, adv. Ahed', [a and head, or at head.]

1. Further forward than another thing; in front; originally a sea term, denoting further forward than another ship, or on the point to which the stem is directed, in opposition to astern. Mar. Dict.

A'IA, n. A Brazilian fowl of the spoon-bill kind, and resembling that bird in form and size. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

AICURUS, n. A large and beautiful species of parrot, found in Brazil; its head beautifully variegated with yellow, red and violet colors; its body green; the tips of its wings red, and its tail long and yellow. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

AID, v. t. [Fr. aider, to help; It. aiutare, which seems to be contracted from L. ad- juto. In Ar. ايد or ايد signifies to assist or strengthen, and ايد and ايد to help.

In Welsh, ced is a benefit, and the word was used to denote the aids of feudal tenants.]

To help; to assist; to support, either by furnishing strength or means to effect a purpose, or to prevent or remove evil.

AID, n. Help; succor; support; assistance. Watts.

2. The person who aids or yields support; a helper; an auxiliary; also the thing that aids or yields succor.

3. In English law, a subsidy or tax granted by parliament, and making a part of the king's revenue.

In France, aids are equivalent to customs, or duties on imports and exports. Encyc.

4. In England, a tax paid by a tenant to his lord; originally a mere gift, which afterwards became a right demandable by the lord. The aids of this kind were chiefly three. 1. To ransom the lord when a prisoner. 2. To make the lord's eldest son a knight. 3. To marry the lord's eldest daughter. Blackstone.

5. An aiddecamp, so called by abbreviation.

6. To pray in aid, in law, is to call in a person interested in a title, to assist in defending it. Thus a tenant for life may pray in the aid of him in remainder or reversion; that is, he may pray or petition that he may be joined in the suit to aid or help maintain the title. This act or petition is called aid-prayer. Cowell. Blackstone.

Court of aids, in France, is a court which has cognizance of causes respecting duties or customs. Encyc.

A'IDANCE, n. Aid; help; assistance. [Little used.] Shak.

A'IDANT, a. Helping; helpful; supplying aid. [Not used.]

A'IDDECAMP, n. plur. Aiddecamps. [Fr., but naturalized, and here Anglicized.]

In military affairs, an officer whose duty is to receive and communicate the orders of a general officer. [The pronunciation should be English, according to the orthography, not aid de cong.]

A'IDED, pp. Assisted; supported; furnished with succor.

A'IDER, n. One who helps; an assistant, or auxiliary.

A'IDING, ppr. Helping; assisting.

A'IDLESS, a. Helpless; without aid; unsupported; undefended. Shak.

A point or tag, as at the ends of fringes.

A'IKRAW, n. A popular name of a species of lichen, or moss. Fam. of Plants.

AII, v. t. [Sax. eghian, to be troubled, to be irksome; egle, trouble, grief. In the Saxon, it is impersonal.]

To trouble; to affect with uneasiness, either of body or mind; used to express some uneasiness or affection, whose cause is unknown; as, what aills the man? I know not what aills him.

What aileth thee, Hagar? Gen. xxi.

It is never used to express a specific disease. We never say, he aills a pleurisy; but it is usual to say, he aills something; he aills nothing; nothing aills him.

AIL, n. Indisposition, or morbid affection.

A'ILING, ppr. Diseased; indisposed; full of complaints.

A'ILMENT, n. Disease; indisposition; morbid affection of the body; but the word is not applied ordinarily to acute diseases.

AIM, v. i. [Qu. Ir. oigham, to eye. Skinner refers this word to the old Fr. esmer. If this was the orthography, I know not its affinities.]

To point at, with a missive weapon; to direct the intention or purpose; to attempt to reach, or accomplish; to tend towards; to endeavor; followed by at before the object; as, a man aims at distinction; or aims to be rich.

AIM, v. t. To direct or point as a weapon; to direct to a particular object; as, to aim a musket or an arrow, the fist or a blow; to aim a satire or a reflection at some person or vice.

AIM, n. The pointing or direction of a missile weapon; the direction of any thing to a particular point or object, with a view to strike or affect it; as a spear, a blow, a discourse or remark.

2. The point intended to be hit, or object intended to be affected; as, a man missed his aim.

3. Figuratively, a purpose; intention; design; scheme; as, men are often disappointed of their aim.

4. Conjecture; guess.
It is impossible, by aim, to tell it. [Not used.]
Spenser on Ireland.

A'IMED, pp. Pointed; directed; intended to strike or affect.

A'IMER, n. One that aims.

A'IMING, ppr. Pointing a weapon at an object; directing any thing to an object; intending; purposing.

AIR, n. [Fr. air; L. aer; Gr. aēr; It. aria; Sp. aere; Port. ar; Arm. ear, eer; Ir. aer; W. awyr; Ch. 𐤀𐤓; Syr. ܐܝܪ; Eth. ለየረ]

Ar. ܐܝܪ. This word, in the Shemitic languages, falls under the root איר Heb. and Ch., to shine. The radical sense is to open, expand; whence clear; or to flow, to shoot, to radiate.]

1. The fluid which we breathe. Air is inodorous, invisible, insipid, colorless, elastic, possessed of gravity, easily moved, rarefied, and condensed.

Atmospheric air is a compound fluid, consisting of oxygen gas, and nitrogen or azote; the proportion of each is stated by chemists differently; some experiments making the oxygen a twenty-eighth part of a hundred; others, not more than a twenty-third, or something less. The latter is probably the true proportion.

Oxygen gas is called vital air. The body of air surrounding the earth is called the atmosphere. The specific gravity of air is to that of water, nearly as 1 to 828. Air is necessary to life; being inhaled into the lungs, the oxygenous part is separated from the azotic, and it is supposed to furnish the body with heat and animation. It is the medium of sounds and necessary to combustion.

2. Air in motion; a light breeze.

Let vernal airs through trembling osiers play. Pope.

3. Vent; utterance abroad; publication; publicity; as, a story has taken air.
You gave it air before me. Dryden.

Wind is used in like manner.

4. A tune; a short song or piece of music adapted to words; also, the peculiar modulation of the notes, which gives music its character; as, a soft air. A song or piece of poetry for singing; also, the leading part of a tune, or that which is intended to exhibit the greatest variety of melody.

5. The peculiar look, appearance, manner or mien of a person; as, a heavy air; the air of youth; a graceful air; a lofty air. It is applied to manners or gestures, as well as to features.

6. Airs, in the plural, is used to denote an affected manner, show of pride, haughtiness; as, when it is said of a person, he puts on airs. The word is used also to express the artificial motions or carriage of a horse.

7. In painting, that which expresses the life of action; manner; gesture; attitude.

8. Any thing light or uncertain; that is light as air.

Who builds his hope in air of your fair looks. Shak.

Qu. Obs.

9. Advice; intelligence; information. Obs. Bacon.

10. Different states of air are characterized by different epithets; as, good air, foul air, morning air, evening air; and sometimes airs may have been used for ill-scent or vapor, but the use is not legitimate.

To take the air, is to go abroad; to walk or ride a little distance.

To take air, is to be divulged; to be made public.

AIR, v. t. To expose to the air; to give access to the open air; to ventilate; as, to air clothes; to air a room.

2. To expose to heat; to warm; as, to air liquors.

3. To dry by a fire; to expel dampness; as, to air linen.

A'IRA, n. Hair grass, a genus of plants.

A'IR-BALLOON. [See Balloon.]

ALDERMAN, n. plu. Aldermen. [Sax. ald or eald, old, comp. alder, older, and man; G. alt; D. oud.]

1. Among our Saxon Ancestors, a senior or superior. The title was applied to princes, dukes, earls, senators and presiding magistrates; also to archbishops and bishops, implying superior wisdom or authority. Thus, Ethelstan, duke of the East-Anglians, was called alderman of all England; and there were aldermen of cities, counties, and castles, who had jurisdiction within their respective districts.

2. In present usage, a magistrate or officer of a town corporate, next in rank below the mayor. The number of aldermen is different in different cities. In London the number is twenty-six, one in each ward, and the office is held for life.

Spelman. Cowel. Encyc.

In the United States, the number of aldermen depends on the charters of incorporation. In general, aldermen have the powers of a justice of the peace, and, with the mayor, they constitute the court of the corporation. In most of our cities, they are annually elected by the citizens.

ALDERMANLY, a. Pertaining to or like an alderman. Swift.

A'LIAS, n. A second writ, or execution, issued when the first has failed to enforce the judgment.

AL'IBI, n. [L.] Elsewhere; in another place; a law term. When a person is charged with an offense, and he proves that he could not have committed it, because he was, at the time, in another place, he is said to prove an alibi. The part of a plea or allegation, which avers the party to have been in another place, is also called an alibi.

A'LIEN, a. alien, [L. alienus, from alius, another; Ir. aile, eile, oile, another; W. all, other, and ail, second; Arm. eel, all, eguite; Corn. gele; Gr. αλλος. Hence, L. alieno, to alienate; alter, another; whence Fr. alterer, to alter; L. alternus, to alter, to alternate, and alterco, altercor, to altercate.

Eth. ἁλλῶ kalea, to alter, to change; whence alius, another, the second; the first letter being lost, except in the Cornish and Armoric, as it is in all. See Class Gl. No. 36, and Ludolf, 387.]

1. Foreign; not belonging to the same country, land or government.

2. Belonging to one who is not a citizen.

3. Estranged; foreign; not allied; adverse to; as, principles alien from our religion.

A'LIEN, n. alien. A foreigner; one born in, or belonging to, another country; one who is not a denizen, or entitled to the privileges of a citizen.

2. In scripture, one who is a stranger to the church of Christ, or to the covenant of grace.

At that time, ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. Eph. ii.

In France, a child born of residents who are not citizens, is an alien. In Great Britain, the children of aliens born in that country, are mostly natural born subjects; and the children of British subjects, owing allegiance to the crown of England, though born in other countries, are natural subjects, and entitled to the privileges of resident citizens. Blackstone.

Alien-duty, a tax upon goods imported by aliens, beyond the duty on the like goods imported by citizens; a discriminating duty on the tonnage of ships belonging to aliens, or any extra duties imposed by laws or edicts on aliens.

5. Exhibiting motion or moving bodies in great numbers.

The city was all alive, when the General entered.

6. In a scriptural sense, regenerated; born again.

For this my son was dead and is alive. Luke xv.

[This adjective always follows the noun which it qualifies.]

ALKAHEST, n. [Arab.]

A universal dissolvent; a menstruum capable of dissolving every body, which Paracelsus and Van Helmont pretended they possessed. This pretense no longer imposes on the credulity of any man.

The word is sometimes used for fixed salts volatilized. Encyc.

ALKALES/CENCY, n. [See Alkali.]

A tendency to become alkaline; or a tendency to the properties of an alkali; or the state of a substance in which alkaline properties begin to be developed, or to be predominant. Ure.

A L K

ALKALES/CENT, a. Tending to the properties of an alkali; slightly alkaline.

AL/KALI, n. plu. Alkalies. [Ar. الكالى ka-li, with the common prefix, the plant called glass wort, from its use in the manufacture of glass; or the ashes of the plant, which seems to be its primitive sense, for the verb signifies to fry.]

In chemistry, a term applied to all bodies which possess the following properties: 1. a caustic taste; 2. volatilizable by heat; 3. capability of combining with acids, and of destroying their acidity; 4. solubility in water, even when combined with carbonic acid; 5. capability of converting vegetable blues to green. Thomson.

The term was formerly confined to three substances: 1. potash or vegetable fixed alkali, generally obtained from the ashes of wood; 2. soda or mineral fixed alkali, which is found in the earth and procured from marine plants; and 3. ammonia or volatile alkali, an animal product. Modern chemistry has discovered many new substances to which the term is now extended.

The alkalies were formerly considered as elementary substances; but it is now ascertained that they are all compounds.

The alkalies are used in the manufacture of glass and soap, in bleaching and in medicine.

AL/KALIFY, v. t. To form, or to convert into an alkali.

AL/KALIFY, v. i. To become an alkali.

ALKERVA, n. An Arabic name of the Palma Christi.

Quincy.

AL/KORAN, n. [Arab. al, the, and koran, book. The book by way of eminence, as we say the Bible. See Koran. It is pronounced, I believe, by orientalists, alkorawn.]

The book which contains the Mohammedan doctrines of faith and practice. It was written by Mohammed, in the dialect of the Koreish, which is the purest Arabic; but the Arabian language has suffered such changes, since it was written, that the language of the Alkoran is not now intelligible to the Arabians themselves, without being learnt like other dead languages.

Niebuhr. Encyc.

AL/KORANIST, n. One who adheres strictly to the letter of the Alkoran, rejecting all comments. The Persians are generally Alkoranists; the Turks, Arabs, and Tartars admit a multitude of traditions.

ALKUSSA, n. A fish of the Silurus kind, with one beard only under the chin.

Dict. of Nat. Hist.

ALL, a. awl. [Sax. eal; Dan. al; G. all; Sw. all; W. oll or holl; Arm. oll; Ir.

uile; Gr. ωλ; Shemitic כל, from כלה calah, to be ended or completed, to perfect. The Welsh retains the first radical letter. This is radically the same word as heal; for in Sw. hel, and in Dan. hele, signify all, and these words are from the root of heal. See Call, Heal and Whole.]

1. Every one, or the whole number of particulars.

2. The whole quantity, extent, duration, amount, quality, or degree; as, all the wheat; all the land; all the year; all the strength. This word signifies then, the whole or entire thing, or all the parts or particulars which compose it. It always precedes the definitive adjectives, the, my, thy, his, our, your, their; as, all the cattle; all my labor; all thy goods; all his wealth; all our families; all your citizens; all their property.

This word, not only in popular language, but in the scriptures, often signifies, indefinitely, a large portion or number, or a great part. Thus, all the cattle in Egypt died; all Judea and all the region round about Jordan; all men held John as a prophet; are not to be understood in a literal sense, but as including a large part or very great numbers.

This word is prefixed to many other words, to enlarge their signification; as already, always, all-prevailing.

ALL, adv. Wholly; completely; entirely; as all along; all bedewed; all over; my friend is all for amusement; I love my father all. In the ancient phrases, all too dear, all so long, this word retains its appropriate sense; as, "he thought them sixpence all too dear," that is, he thought them too dear by the sum of sixpence. In the sense of although, as "all were it as the rest," and in the sense of just, or at the moment, as "all as his straying flock he fed," it is obsolete, or restricted to poetry. It is all one is a phrase equivalent to the same thing in effect; that is, it is wholly the same thing.

All the better is equivalent to wholly the better; that is, better by the whole difference.

ALL, n. The whole number; as, all have not the same disposition; that is, all men.

2. The whole; the entire thing; the aggregate amount; as, our all is at stake.

And Laban said, all that thou seest is mine. Gen. xxxi.

This adjective is much used as a noun, and applied to persons or things.

All in all is a phrase which signifies, all things to a person, or every thing desired.

Thou shalt be all in all, and I in thee, Forever. Milton.

When the words, and all, close an enumeration of particulars, the word all is either intensive, or is added as a general term to express what is not enumerated; as, a tree fell, nest, eagles and all. L'Estrange.

At all is a phrase much used by way of enforcement or emphasis, usually in negative or interrogative sentences. He has no ambition at all; that is, not in the least degree. Has he any property at all?

All and some, in Spenser, Mason interprets, one and all. But from Lye's Saxon Dictionary, it appears that the phrase is a corruption of the Sax. ealle at somme, all together, all at once, from some, together, at once. See Lye under Some.

All in the wind, in seamen's language, is a phrase denoting that the sails are parallel with the course of the wind, so as to shake. Mar. Dict.

All is well is a watchman's phrase, expressing a state of safety.

All, in composition, enlarges the meaning, or adds force to a word; and it is generally more emphatical than most. In some instances, all is incorporated into words, as in almighty, already, always; but in most instances, it is an adjective prefixed to other words, but separated by a hyphen.

ALLATRATE, v. t. [L. allatro.] To bark, as a dog. [Not used.] Stubbes.

ALLA'Y, v. t. [Sax. alegan, alegan, to lay, to set, to depress, leggan, to lay, to cast or strike down; G. legen, D. leggen, to lay;

Gr. αγγω. The Fr. allier, to alloy, Sp. ligar, seems to be directly from the L. ligo, to bind; but this may be the same word differently applied, that is, to set, to fix, to make fast, to unite. Allay and alloy were formerly used indifferently; but I have recognized an entire distinction between them, applying alloy to metals.]

1. To make quiet; to pacify, or appease; as, to allay the tumult of the passions, or to allay civil commotions.

2. To abate, mitigate, subdue or destroy; as, to allay grief or pain.

Females, who soften and allay the bitterness of adversity. Rawle.

3. To obtund or repress as acrimony; as, to allay the acrid qualities of a substance.

4. Formerly, to reduce the purity of; as, to allay metals. But, in this sense, alloy is now exclusively used. [See Alloy.]

ALLA'Y, n. Formerly, a baser metal mixed with a finer; but in this sense it is now written alloy, which see.

2. That which allays, or abates the predominant qualities; as, the allay of colors. Newton.

Also, abatement; diminution by means of some mixture; as, joy without allay. But alloy is now more generally used.

ALLA'YED, pp. Layed at rest; quieted; tranquilized; abated; [reduced by mixture. Obs.]

ALLA'YER, n. He, or that, which allays.

ALLA'YING, ppr. Quietening; reducing to tranquillity; abating; [reducing by mixture. Obs.]

ALLA'YMENT, n. The act of quieting, or a state of tranquillity; a state of rest after disturbance; abatement; ease; as, the allayment of grief. Shak.

ALL'LE, n. ally. The little auk, or black and white diver.

ALLEC'TIVE, a. Alluring. [Not used.] Chaucer.

ALLEC'TIVE, n. Allurement. [Not used.] Eliot.

ALLEDGE' v. t. [L. allego, ad and lego, to send; Fr. alleguer; Sp. alegar; Port. allegar; It. allegare. This is only a modified application of the Eng. lay; L. loco, to set, or throw. See Class L g.]

1. To declare; to affirm; to assert; to pronounce with positiveness; as, to alledge a fact.

2. To produce as an argument, plea or excuse; to cite or quote; as, to alledge the authority of a judge.

ALLEDG'ED, pp. Affirmed; asserted, whether as a charge or a plea.

ALLEG'EMENT, n. Allegation. [Not in use.]

ALLEGHA'NEAN, a. Pertaining to the mountains called Alleghany, or Allegheny.

ALLEGHA'NY, n. The chief ridge of the great chains of mountains which run from N. East to S. West through the middle and southern states of North America; but, more appropriately, the main or unbroken ridge, which casts all the waters on one side to the east, and on the other side to the west. This ridge runs from Pennsylvania to Georgia, and chains extend through the U. States.

This name is given also to the river Ohio, above its confluence with the Monongahela; but improperly, as the Indian name of the river to its source is Ohio.

ALLEG'ANCE, n. [Old Fr. from L. allego, of ad and ligo, to bind. See Liege and League.]

The tie or obligation of a subject to his Prince or government; the duty of fidelity to a king, government or state. Every native or citizen owes allegiance to the government under which he is born. This is called natural or implied allegiance, which arises from the connection of a person with the society in which he is born, and his duty to be a faithful subject, independent of any express promise. Express allegiance, is that obligation which proceeds from an express promise, or oath of fidelity.

Local or temporary allegiance is due from an alien to the government or state in which he resides. Blackstone.

ALLEG'ANT, a. Loyal. [Not used.] Shak.

ALLEGOR'IC, a. In the manner of allegorical; } legory; figurative; describing by resemblances.

ALLEGOR'ICALLY, adv. In a figurative manner; by way of allegory.

ALLEGOR'ICALNESS, n. The quality of being allegorical.

ALLEGORIZE, v. t. To form an allegory; to turn into allegory; as, to allegorize the history of a people. Campbell.

2. To understand in an allegorical sense; as, when a passage in a writer may be understood literally or figuratively, he who gives it a figurative sense is said to allegorize it.

ALLEGORIZE, v. i. To use allegory; as, a man may allegorize, to please his fancy.

ALLEGORIZED, pp. Turned into allegory, or understood allegorically.

ALLEGORIZING, pp. Turning into allegory, or understanding in an allegorical sense.

ALLEGORY, n. [Gr. αλληγορία, of αλλος, other, and αγορεύω, to speak, from αγορα, a forum, an oration.]

A figurative sentence or discourse, in which the principal subject is described by another subject resembling it in its properties and circumstances. The principal subject is thus kept out of view, and we are left to collect the intentions of the writer or speaker, by the resemblance of the secondary to the primary subject. Allegory is in words what hieroglyphics are in painting. We have a fine example of an allegory in the eightieth psalm, in which God's chosen people are represented by a vineyard. The distinction in scripture between a parable and an allegory, is said to be that a parable is a supposed history, and an allegory, a figurative description of real facts. An allegory is called a continued metaphor. The following line in Virgil is an example of an allegory.

Claudite jam rivos, pueri, sat prata biberunt.
Stop the currents, young men, the meadows have drank sufficiently; that is, let your music cease, our ears have been sufficiently delighted. Encyc.

ALLEGRET'TO, [from allegro,] denotes, in music, a movement or time quicker than andante, but not so quick as allegro.

Rousseau. Busby.
ALLE'GRO. [It. merry, cheerful; It. leg-giere; Sp. ligero; Fr. léger, light, nimble.
See Light.]

In music, a word denoting a brisk movement; a sprightly part or strain; the quickest except presto. Piu allegro is a still quicker movement. Rousseau. Encyc.

ALLELU'IAH, n. [Heb. הלל-יהוה, praise to Jah.]

Praise to Jehovah; a word used to denote pious joy and exultation, chiefly in hymns and anthems. The Greeks retained the word in their Εὐχαριστία, praise to Io; probably a corruption of Jah. The Romans retained the latter word in their Io triumphe.

ALLEMAND', n. A slow air in common time, or grave, solemn music, with a slow movement. Also a brisk dance, or a figure in dancing. Dict. of Music.

ALLEMAN'NIC, a. Belonging to the Alemanni, ancient Germans, and to Alemannia, their country. The word is generally supposed to be composed of all and manni, all men. Cluver, p. 68. This is probably an error. The word is more probably composed of the Celtic all, other, the root of Latin alius and man, place; one of another place, a stranger. The Welsh all-man is thus rendered, and this seems to be the original word. Owen, Welsh Dict.

The name, Alemanni, seems to have been first given to the Germans who invaded Gaul in the reign of Augustus.

Cluver, Germ. Antiq.

ALLER'ION, n. In heraldry, an eagle without beak or feet, with expanded wings; denoting Imperialists vanquished and disarmed. Encyc.

ALLEVEUR, n. A small Swedish coin, value about a cent. Encyc.

ALLE'VIATE, v. t. [Low L. allevio; ad and levo, to raise, levis, light; Fr. lever; It. levare, to raise; Sp. llevar, to carry, levantar, to raise, and levante, a rising, and the eastern coasts of the Mediterranean, the east, so called from the rising of the sun, like oriental, from orior, to rise; Sax. hlifian, to be eminent. See Lift.]

1. To make light; but always in a figurative sense, as it is not applied to material objects. To remove in part; to lessen, mitigate, or make easier to be endured; applied to evils; as, to alleviate sorrow, pain, care, punishment, a burden, &c.; opposed to aggravate.

2. To make less by representation; to lessen the magnitude or criminality; to extenuate; applied to moral conduct; as, to alle- viate an offense. [This sense of the word is rare.]

ALLE'VIATED, pp. Made lighter; mitigated; eased; extenuated.

ALLE'VIATING, ppr. Making lighter, or more tolerable; extenuating.

ALLEVIA'TION, n. The act of lightening, allaying, or extenuating; a lessening or mitigation.

2. That which lessens, mitigates or makes more tolerable; as, the sympathy of a friend is an alleviation of grief.

I have not wanted such alleviations of life, as friendship could supply. Dr. Johnson's letter to Mr. Hector. Boswell.

This use of alleviation is hardly legitimate without supplying some word expressing evil, as trouble, sorrow, &c.

Without such alleviations of the cares or troubles of life.

ALLE'VIATIVE, n. That which mitigates.

[Not in use.]

AL'LEY, n. al'ly. [Fr. allée, a passage, from aller to go; Ir. alladh. Literally, a passing or going.]

Pertaining to allium, or garlic; having the properties of garlic. Barton.

ALLI'ANCE, n. [Fr. alliance, from allier, lier, to tie or unite, from L. ligo, Gr. λινωω;
Sp. alianza; Port. aliança; It. alleanza; from the same root as liege, league, al-
ligance; class L. g.]

1. The relation or union between families, contracted by marriage. Dryden.

2. The union between nations, contracted by compact, treaty or league.

3. The treaty, league, or compact, which is the instrument of confederacy; sometimes perhaps the act of confederating.

4. Any union or connection of interests between persons, families, states or corporations; as, an alliance between church and state.

5. The persons or parties allied; as, men or states may secure any alliances in their power. Addison.

ALLI'ANT, n. An ally. [Not used.]

Wotton.

ALLI'CIENCY, n. [Lat. allicito, ad and lacio; G. locken; D. lokken; Sw. locka;
Dan. lokke; L. allecto, elicio. Class
L. g.]

The power of attracting any thing; attraction; magnetism. [Little used.] Glanville.

ALLI'CIENT, n. That which attracts. [Not used.]

ALLI'ED, pp. Connected by marriage, treaty or similitude. [See Ally.]

AL'LIGATE, v. t. [L. alligo, ad and ligo, to bind. See Allegiance, Liege, League.]

To tie together; to unite by some tie.

ALLIGA'TION, n. The act of tying together; the state of being tied. [Little used.]

2. A rule of arithmetic, for finding the price or value of compounds consisting of ingredients of different values. Thus if a quantity of sugar, worth eight cents the pound, and another quantity worth ten cents, are mixed, the question to be solved by alliga- tion is, what is the value of the mixture by the pound. Alligation is of two kinds, medial and alternate; medial, when the rate of a mixture is sought from the rates and quantities of the simples; alternate, when the quantities of the simples are sought from the rates of the simples, and the rate of the mixture.

ALLIGATOR, n. [Properly allagarto, from the Spanish and Portuguese lagarto, a lizard; L. lacerta. The Latin word seems to be connected with lacertus, the arm; and the animal may be named from the resemblance of his legs to arms.]

The American crocodile. This animal is of the lizard genus, having a long naked body, four feet, with five toes on the fore feet, and four on the hind, armed with claws, and a serrated tail. The mouth is very large, and furnished with sharp teeth; the skin is brown, tough, and, on the sides, covered with tubercles. The largest of these animals grow to the length of seventeen or eighteen feet. They live in and about the rivers in warm climates, eat fish, and sometimes catch hogs, on the shore, or dogs which are swimming. In winter, they burrow in the earth, which they enter under water and work upwards, lying torpid till spring. The female lays a great number of eggs, which are deposited in the sand, and left to be hatched by the heat of the sun. Encyc.

ALLIGATOR-PEAR, n. A West India fruit, resembling a pear in shape, from one to two pounds in weight, (Laurus Persea, Linne.) It contains within its rind a yellow butyraceous substance, which, when the fruit is perfectly ripe, constitutes an agreeable food. Encyc.

ALLIGATURE, n. See Ligature, which is the word in use.

A reducing to a line or to a square; a state of being in squares, in a line, or on a level; a line; a row. Asiat. Res. Columbiad.

ALLIOTH, n. A star in the tail of the great bear, much used for finding the latitude at sea. Encyc.

ALLISION, n. allizh'un. [L. alido, to dash or strike against, of ad and lædo, to hurt by striking; Ir. leas, a sore; D. leed, a hurt; D. beleedigen; Ger. beleidigen, to hurt; Fr. blesser, to hurt. Lædo forms its participle læsus. Class. L d. L s.]

A striking against; as, the allision of the sea against the shore. Woodward.

ALLITERATION, n. [L. ad and littera, a letter.

The repetition of the same letter at the beginning of two or more words immediately succeeding each other, or at short intervals; as f and g in the following line:
Fields ever fresh, and groves forever green.

ALLITERATIVE, a. Pertaining to, or consisting in, alliteration.

ALLOCATION, n. [L. ad and locatio, a placing, from locus, place. See Local.]

The act of putting one thing to another; hence its usual sense is the admission of an article of account, or an allowance made upon an account; a term used in the English Exchequer. [See Allow.]

ALLOCHROITE, n. An amorphous, massive, opaque mineral, of a grayish, yellowish or reddish color, found in Norway; considered as a variety of garnet. Its name is said to be given to it, as expressive of its changes of color before the blowpipe; Gr. αλλος, other, and χρως, color. Cleveland.

ALLOCU'TION, n. [L. allocutio, of ad and loquor, to speak. See Eloquence.]

1. The act or manner of speaking to, or of addressing in words.

2. An address; a formal address; as, of a General to his troops; a Roman term, rarely used in English. Addison. Encyc.

ALLO'DIAL, a. Pertaining to allodium; freehold; free of rent or service; held independent of a lord paramount; opposed to feudal. Blackstone.

ALLODIAN is sometimes used, but is not well authorized. Cowel.

ALLO'DIUM, n. [Fr. alleu, contr. word. According to O'Brien, in his Focaloir, or Dictionary of the Irish, this word is the Celtic allod, ancient. According to Pontoppidan, it is composed of all and odh, all-property, or whole estate.]

Freehold estate; land which is the absolute property of the owner; real estate held in absolute independence, without being subject to any rent, service, or acknowledgment to a superior. It is thus opposed to feud. In England, there is no allodial land, all land being held of the king; but in the United States, most lands are allodial.

ALLONGE', n. allunji'. [Fr. allonger, to lengthen, to thrust, allongé, lengthened, of ad and long.]

1. A pass with a sword; a thrust made by stepping forward and extending the arm; a term used in fencing, often contracted into lunge.

2. A long rein, when a horse is trotted in the hand. Johnson.

ALLOO', v. t. or i. To incite dogs by a call. Phillips.

[See the correct word, Halloo.]

AL'LOPHANE, n. [Gr. αλλος, other, and φωσφω, to appear.]

A mineral of a blue, and sometimes of a green or brown color, which occurs massive, or in imitative shapes. It gelatinizes in acids. Ure.

Allophane is a variety of clay, occurring in amorphous, botryoidal or reniform masses. Cleveland.

ALLOT', v. t. [of ad and lot; Sax. hlōt. See Lot.]

1. To divide or distribute by lot.

2. To distribute, or parcel out in parts or portions; or to distribute a share to each individual concerned.

3. To grant, as a portion; to give, assign or appoint in general.

Let every man be contented with that which providence allots to him.

ALLOT'MENT, n. That which is allotted; a share, part, or portion granted or distributed; that which is assigned by lot, or by the act of God.

2. A part, portion or place appropriated. In a field, there is an allotment for olives. Broome.

ALLOT'TED, pp. Distributed by lot; granted; assigned.

ALLOT'TERY is used by Shakespeare for allotment; but is not authorized by usage.

ALLOT'TING, ppr. Distributing by lot; giving as portions; assigning.

Ye allow the deeds of your fathers.

Luke xi. Rom. vii.

5. To afford, or grant as a compensation; as, to allow a dollar a day for wages.

6. To abate or deduct; as, to allow a sum for tare or leakage.

7. To permit; to grant license to; as, to allow a son to be absent.

ALLOW'ABLE, a. That may be permitted as lawful, or admitted as true and proper; not forbid; not unlawful or improper; as, a certain degree of freedom is allowable among friends.

ALLOW'ABLENESS, n. The quality of being allowable; lawfulness; exemption from prohibition, or impropriety. South.

ALLOW'ABLY, adv. In an allowable manner; with propriety. Louth.

ALLOW'ANCE, n. The act of allowing or admitting.

2. Permission; license; approbation; sanction; usually slight approbation.

Locke. Shak.

3. Admission; assent to a fact or state of things; a granting. Hooker.

4. Freedom from restraint; indulgence.

5. That which is allowed; a portion appointed; a stated quantity, as of food or drink; hence, in seamen's language, a limited quantity of meat and drink, when provisions fall short.

6. Abatement; deduction; as, to make an allowance for the inexperience of youth.

7. Established character; reputation; as, a pilot of approved allowance. Obs. Shak.

ALLOW'ANCE, v. t. To put upon allowance; to restrain or limit to a certain quantity of provisions or drink.

ALLOW'ED, pp. Granted; permitted; assented to; admitted; approved; indulged; appointed; abated.

ALLOW'ING, ppr. Granting; permitting; admitting; approving; indulging; deducting.

ALLOY', v. t. [Fr. allier, to unite or mix; L. alligo, ad and ligo, to bind; Gr. λυγω; Sp. ligar, to tie or bind, to alloy or mix base metals with gold or silver, to league or confederate; Port. id.; It. legare. We observe that alloy and league, alliance, ally, are from the same root. Class L g.]

1. To reduce the purity of a metal, by mixing with it a portion of one less valuable; as, to alloy gold with silver, or silver with copper.

2. To mix metals. Lavoisier.

3. To reduce or abate by mixture; as, to alloy pleasure with misfortunes.

ALLOY', n. A baser metal mixed with a finer.

2. The mixture of different metals; any metallic compound; this is its common signification in chemistry.

3. Evil mixed with good; as, no happiness is without alloy.

ALLOY'AGE, n. [Fr. alliage, from allier.]

1. The act of alloying metals, or the mixture of a baser metal with a finer, to reduce its purity; the act of mixing metals.

2. The mixture of different metals.

Lavoisier.

ALLOY'ED, pp. Mixed; reduced in purity; debased; abated by foreign mixture.

ALLOY'ING, pp. Mixing a baser metal with a finer, to reduce its purity; abating by foreign mixture.

ALL'SPICE. [See under the compounds of all.]

ALLUDE, v. i. [L. alludo, to smile upon or make sport with, of ad and ludo, to play; Sp. Port. aludir; It. alludere. Class L d.]

To refer to something not directly mentioned; to have reference; to hint at by remote suggestions; as, that story alludes to a recent transaction.

ALLU'DING, pp. Having reference; hinting at.

ALLU'MINOR, n. [Fr. allumer, to light. See limer.]

One who colors or paints upon paper or parchment, giving light and ornament to letters and figures. Cowel. Encyc.

This is now written limner.

ALLURE, v. t. [Fr. leurrer, to decoy, from leurre, a lure.]

To attempt to draw to; to tempt by the offer of some good, real or apparent; to invite by something flattering or acceptable; as, rewards allure men to brave danger. Sometimes used in a bad sense, to allure to evil; but in this sense entice is more common. In Hosea, ii. 14, allure is used in its genuine sense; in 2 Peter, ii. 18, in the sense of entice.

ALLURED, pp. Tempted; drawn, or invited, by something that appears desirable.

ALLUREMENT, n. That which allures; any real or apparent good held forth, or operating, as a motive to action; temptation; enticement; as, the allurements of pleasure, or of honor.

ALLY', v. t. [Fr. allier; reciprocal verb, s'allier, to match or confederate; from ad and lier, to tie or unite. L. ligo.]

1. To unite, or form a relation, as between families by marriage, or between princes and states by treaty, league or confederacy.

2. To form a relation by similitude, resemblance or friendship. Note. This word is more generally used in the passive form, as families are allied by blood; or reciprocally, as princes ally themselves to powerful states.

ALLY' n. A prince or state united by treaty or league; a confederate.

The allies of Rome were slaves. Ames.

2. One related by marriage or other tie; but seldom applied to individuals, except to princes in their public capacity.

ALLY'ING, pp. Uniting by marriage or treaty.

ALMACANTAR, n. [See Almucantar.]

ALMADIE, n. A bark canoe used by the Africans; also a long boat used at Calicut, in India, eighty feet long, and six or seven broad; called also calhuri. Encyc.

ALMAGEST, n. [al and mayest, greatest.]

A book or collection of problems in astronomy and geometry, drawn up by Ptolemy. The same title has been given to other works of the like kind. Encyc.

ALMA'GRA, n. A fine deep red ocher, with an admixture of purple, very heavy, dense but friable, with a rough dusty surface. It is the sil atticum of the ancients. It is austere to the taste, astringent, melting in the mouth and staining the skin. It is used as a paint and as a medicine. Encyc.

AL'MANACK, n. [Ar. al and manach, manack, a calendar, or diary.]

A small book or table, containing a calendar of days, weeks and months, with the times of the rising of the sun and moon, changes of the moon, eclipses, hours of full tide, stated festivals of churches, stated terms of courts, observations on the weather, &c. for the year ensuing. This calendar is sometimes published on one side of a single sheet, and called a sheet-almanack. The Baltic nations formerly engraved their calendars on pieces of wood, on swords, helms of axes, and various other utensils, and especially on walking sticks. Many of these are preserved in the cabinets of the curious. They are called by different nations, rimstocks, primstaries, runstocks, runstuffs, dags, &c.

The characters used are generally the Runic or Gothic.

Junius. Encyc. Tooke's Russia.

ALMANACK-MAKER, n. A maker of almanacks.

ALMOND-FURNACE, among refiners, is a furnace in which the slags of litharge, left in refining silver, are reduced to lead, by the help of charcoal; that is, according to modern chemistry, in which the oxyd of lead is deoxydized, and the metal revived.

ALMOND-TREE, n. The tree which produces the almond. The leaves and flowers resemble those of the peach, but the fruit is longer and more compressed, the green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged. Miller.

ALMOND-WILLOW, n. A tree with leaves of a light green on both sides.

Mason from Shenstone.

AL'MONER, n. [See Alms.]

An officer whose duty is to distribute charity or alms. By the ancient canons, every monastery was to dispose of a tenth of its income in alms to the poor, and all bishops were obliged to keep an almoner. This title is sometimes given to a chaplain; as, the almoner of a ship or regiment.

The Lord Almoner, or Lord High Almoner, in England, is an ecclesiastical officer, generally a bishop, who has the forfeiture of all deodands, and the goods of self-murderers, which he is to distribute to the poor.

The Grand Almoner, in France, is the first ecclesiastical dignitary, and has the superintendence of hospitals. Encyc.

ALMONRY, n. [Corrupted into ambry, aumbry, or aumery.]

The place where the almoner resides, or where the alms are distributed.

ALMOST, adv. [all and most. The Saxon order of writing was thus: "all most who were present." Sax. Chron. p. 225. We now use a duplication, almost all who were present.]

Nearly; well nigh; for the greatest part.

Almost thou persuadest me to be a christian. Acts xxvi.

ALMS, n. amz. [Sax. almes; old Eng. almesse; Norm. almoignes; Fr. aumônes; D. aalmoes; Sw. almosa; Dan. almisse; G. almosen; L. eleemosyna; Gr. ἐλεημοσύνη. The first syllables appear to be from ἐλεειν, to pity.]

Any thing given gratuitously to relieve the poor, as money, food, or clothing, otherwise called charity.

A lame man was laid daily to ask an alm. Acts iii.

Cornelius gave much alms to the people. Acts x.

Tenure by free alms, or frank-almoign, in England, is that by which the possessor is bound to pray for the soul of the donor, whether dead or alive; a tenure by which most of the ancient monasteries and religious houses in England held their lands, as do the parochial clergy, and many ecclesiastical and eleemosynary establishments at this day. Land thus held was free from all rent or other service. Blackstone.

teen degrees, used to take observations of the sun, about the time of its rising or setting, to find the amplitude and the variations of the compass. Encyc. Chambers.

ALMUDE, n. A wine measure in Portugal, of which twenty-six make a pipe. Port. Dict.

ALMUG, } n. In scripture, a tree or wood
ALGUM, } about which the learned are not agreed. The most probable conjecture is that the word denotes gummy or resinous wood in general.

The Vulgate translates it ligna thyina, and the Septuagint, wrought-wood; others, ebony, bravil or pine, and the Rabbins render it coral. It was used for musical instruments, stair cases, &c.

The thyinum is the citron tree, from Mauritania, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty. The almug, almugin, or algumim, or simply gummim, is most probably a gummy wood, and perhaps may be the Shittim, often mentioned in Scripture. See 1 Kings, x. 11. Calmel. Encyc.

ALNAGE, n. [Fr. aulnage, now softened into awnage; L. ulna; Gr. αὐλή, an arm, a cubit; W. elin; Ir. uelen, wile, or uilean, an elbow, a nook, or corner. See Ell.]

A measuring by the ell.

ALNAGER, or ALNAGAR, n. A measurer by the ell; a sworn officer, whose duty was to inspect and measure woollen cloth, and fix upon it a seal. This office was abolished by Statute, 11. and 12. Will. 3. No duty or office of this kind exists in the United States.

ALNIGHT, n. A cake of wax with the wick in the midst. Bacon.

ALOE, n. al'o, plu. aloes, pronounced aloze, and popularly al'oez, in three syllables, according to the Latin. [L. aloe; Gr. αλόη; Sp. Port. It. Fr. aloe; Heb. plu. אֵלֶּיךָ aloe-trees.]

In botany, a genus of monogynian hexanders, of many species; all natives of warm climates, and most of them, of the southern part of Africa.

Among the Mohammedans, the aloe is a symbolic plant, especially in Egypt; and every one who returns from a pilgrimage to Mecca, hangs it over his street door, as a token that he has performed the journey.

In Africa, the leaves of the Guinea aloe are made into durable ropes. Of one species are made fishing lines, bow strings, stockings and hammocks. The leaves of another species hold rain water.

ALOES, in medicine, is the inspissated juice of the aloe. The juice is collected from the leaves, which are cut and put in a tub, and when a large quantity is procured, it is boiled to a suitable consistence; or it is exposed to the sun, till all the fluid part is exhaled. There are several kinds sold in the shops; as the socotrine aloes from Socotora, an isle in the Indian ocean; the hepatic or common Barbadoes aloes; and the fetid or caballine aloes.

Aloes is a stimulating stomachic purgative; when taken in small doses, it is useful for people of a lax habit and sedentary life. Encyc.

ALO'NE, a. [all and one; Germ. allein; D. alleen; Sw. allena; Dan. allene.]

1. Single; solitary; without the presence of another; applied to a person or thing.

It is not good that man should be alone. Gen. ii.

[This adjective follows its noun.]

2. It is applied to two or more persons or things, when separate from others, in a place or condition by themselves; without company.

And when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples. Mark, iv.

3. Only.

Thou whose name alone is Jehovah. Ps. lxxxiii.

This sense at first appears to be adverbial, but really is not; whose name single, solitary, without another, is Jehovah.

To let alone is to suffer to rest; to forbear molesting or meddling with; to suffer to remain in its present state. Alone, in this phrase, is an adjective, the word to which it refers being omitted; let me alone; let them alone; let it alone; that is, suffer it to be unmolested, or to remain as it is, or let it remain by itself.

ALO'NE, adv. Separately; by itself.

ALO'NELY, a. or adv. Only; merely; singly. [Not used.] Gower.

ALO'SA, n. A fish of passage, called the shad, or mother of herrings, a species of Clupea. It is an abdominal, and some naturalists allege it to be a different species from the shad. Encyc. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

ALOUD', adv. [a and loud; Sax. gehtyd, clamor. See Loud.]

Loudly; with a loud voice, or great noise. Cry aloud, spare not. Isa. lviii.

ALP, ALPS, n. [Qu. Gr. αλπος, white; L. albus. The Celts called all high mountains alpes or olbe. Cluver. Thucydides mentions a castle, in the territory of Argos, situated on a hill and called Olpas or Olpa. Lib. 3. Ca. 105. Pelloutier, Hist. des Celtes, Liv. 1. 15. The derivation of the word from αλπος, white, is therefore doubtful. In Ir. or Gaelic, ailp is a huge mass or lump.]

A high mountain. The name, it is supposed, was originally given to mountains whose tops were covered with snow, and hence appropriately applied to the mountains of Switzerland; so that by Alps is generally understood the latter mountains. But geographers apply the name to any high mountains. Pinkerton.

ALPAG'NA, n. An animal of Peru, used as a beast of burden; the Camelus Paco of Linne, and the Pacos of Pennant.

AL'TERN'ATELY, adv. In reciprocal succession; by turns, so that each is succeeded by that which it succeeds, as night follows day and day follows night.

AL'TERNATENESS, n. The quality of being alternate, or of following in succession.

AL'TERNATING, ppr. Performing or following by turns.

AL'TERNATION, n. The reciprocal succession of things, in time or place; the act of following and being followed in succession; as, we observe the alternation of day and night, cold and heat, summer and winter.

2. The different changes or alterations of orders, in numbers. Thus, if it is required to know how many changes can be rung on six bells, multiply the numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, continually into one another, and the last product is the number required. This is called permutation.

3. The answer of the congregation speaking alternately with the minister.

4. Alternate performance, in the choral sense.

Mason.

AL'TERN'ATIVE, a. [Fr. alternatif.]

Offering a choice of two things.

AL'TERN'ATIVE, n. That which may be chosen or omitted; a choice of two things, so that if one is taken, the other must be left. Thus, when two things offer a choice of one only, the two things are called alternatives. In strictness, then, the word can not be applied to more than two things, and when one thing only is offered for choice, it is said there is no alternative.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground.

Cranch.

AL'TERN'ATIVELY, adv. In the manner of alternatives; in a manner that admits the choice of one out of two things.

AL'TERN'ATIVENESS, n. The quality or state of being alternative.

AL'TERN'ITY, n. Succession by turns; alternation.

AL'THE'A, n. [Gr. αλθαία, from αλθεω, or αλθαίνω, to heal.]

In botany, a genus of polyandrian monadelphs, of several species; called in English marsh-mallows.

The common species has a perennial root, and an annual stalk rising four or five feet. It abounds with mucilage, and is used as an emollient.

AL'THOUGH, altho', obs. verb, or used only in the Imperative. [all and though; from Sax. thah, or theah; Ir. daighim, to give; Ger. doch; D. dog; Sw. doch, and endoch; Dan. dog, though. See Though.]

Grant all this; be it so; allow all; suppose that; admit all that; as, "although the fig-tree shall not blossom." Hab. iii. That is, grant, admit or suppose what follows—"the fig-tree shall not blossom." It is a transitive verb, and admits after it the definitive that—although that the fig-tree shall not blossom; but this use of the verb, has been long obsolete. The word may be defined by notwithstanding, non obstante; as not opposing may be equivalent to admitting or supposing.

AL'TIL'OUENCE, n. [L. altus, high, and loquor, loquens, speaking.]

Lofty speech; pompous language.

AL/UM. n. [L. alumen.]

A triple sulphate of alumina and potassa. This substance is white, transparent and very astringent; but seldom found pure or crystallized. This salt is usually prepared by roasting and lixiviating certain clays containing pyrites, and to the lye adding a certain quantity of potassa; the salt is then obtained by crystallization. Alum is of great use in medicine and the arts. In medicine, it is used as an astringent; internally, in hemoptoe, diarrhea, and dysentery; externally, as a styptic applied to bleeding vessels, and as an escharotic. In the arts, it is used in dyeing to fix colors; in making candles, for hardening the tallow; in tanning, for restoring the cohesion of skins. Encyc. Fourcroy. Webster's Manual.

ALUM-EARTH. n. A massive mineral, of a blackish brown color, a dull luster, and soft consistence. Ure.

AL/UMIN. n. An earth, or earthy substance, which has been considered to be elementary, and called pure clay; but recently, chemical experiments have given reason to believe it to be a metallic oxyd, to the base of which has been given the name aluminum. This metallic base however has not been obtained in such a state as to make its properties susceptible of examination. Alumina is destitute of taste and smell. When moistened with water, it forms a cohesive and ductile mass, susceptible of being kneaded into regular forms. Davy. Cyc. Webster's Manual.

AL/UMINIFORM. a. Having the form of alumina. Chaptal.

AMA'ZE, v. t. [Qu. Ar. أماز to perplex or confuse; or from maze.]

To confound with fear, sudden surprise, or wonder; to astonish.

They shall be afraid; they shall be amazed at one another. Is. xiii.

They were all amazed and glorified God.

This word implies astonishment or perplexity, arising from something extraordinary, unexpected, unaccountable, or frightful.

AMA'ZE, n. Astonishment; confusion; perplexity, arising from fear, surprise or wonder. It is chiefly used in poetry, and is nearly synonymous with amazement.

AMA'ZED, pp. Astonished; confounded with fear, surprise or wonder.

AMA'ZEDLY, adv. With amazement; in a manner to confound. [Little used.]

AMA'ZEDNESS, n. The state of being confounded with fear, surprise or wonder; astonishment; great wonder.

AMA'ZEMENT, n. Astonishment; confusion or perplexity, from a sudden impression of fear, surprise or wonder. It is sometimes accompanied with fear or terror; sometimes merely extreme wonder or admiration at some great, sudden or unexpected event, at an unusual sight, or at the narration of extraordinary events.

AMA'ZING, ppr. Confounding with fear, surprise or wonder.

2. a. Very wonderful; exciting astonishment, or perplexity.

AMA'ZINGLY, adv. In an astonishing degree; in a manner to excite astonishment, or to perplex, confound or terrify.

AM'AZON, n. [This is said to be formed of a neg. and μαζος, breast. History informs us, that the Amazons cut off their right breast, that it might not incommode them in shooting and hurling the javelin. This is doubtless a fable.]

1. The Amazons are said by historians, to have been a race of female warriors, who founded an empire on the river Thermodon, in Asia Minor, on the coast of the Euxine. They are said to have excluded men from their society; and by their warlike enterprises, to have conquered and alarmed surrounding nations. Some writers treat these accounts as fables.

2. By analogy, a warlike or masculine woman; a virago.

3. This name has been given to some American females, on the banks of the largest river in the world, who joined their husbands in attacking the Spaniards that first visited the country. This trivial occurrence gave the name Amazon to that river, whose real name is Maranon.

Garcilasso, p. 606.

AMAZO'NIAN, a. Pertaining to or resembling an Amazon. Applied to females, bold; of masculine manners; warlike.

2. Belonging to the river Maranon in South America, or to Amazonia, the country lying on that river.

Literally, a brim; but in surgery, an instrument for reducing dislocated shoulders, so called from the jutting of its extremity. Also the mango tree.

Quincy. Encyc. Coxe.

AM'BER, n. [Fr. ambre; Sp. ambar; Port. id; It. ambra; an oriental word; Pers.

آنبار anbar or anabar; Ar. آنبار anbaron. In 1 Kings x. 2. 10, the Arabic is rendered spices. The Arabic word is rendered by Castle, amber, a marine fish, a shield made of skins, crocus and fumus. In Eth.

ዐንበረ anbar is rendered a whale, and the word is used in Jonah, ii. 1. and Math. xii. 40. This word is placed by Castle under آنبار to produce grapes, and آنبار signifies grapes, Ch. and Heb. גפן. The Chaldee verb signifies to join or connect, and the sense of this word, applied to grapes, is a cluster, like grape in English. It signifies also in Ch. a tumor, a pustule, a mountain, the sense of which is a lump or mass collected; and this may be the sense of amber. In German, Dutch, Swedish and Danish, it has the name of burnstone.]

A hard semi-pellucid substance, tasteless and without smell, except when pounded or heated, when it emits a fragrant odor. It is found in alluvial soils, or on the sea shore, in many places; particularly on the shores of the Baltic, in Europe, and at Cape Sable, in Maryland, in the U. States.

The ancient opinion of its vegetable origin seems now to be established, and it is believed or known to be a fossil resin. It yields by distillation an empyreumatic oil, and the succinic acid, which sublimes in small white needles. Its color usually presents some tinge of yellow. It is highly electrical, and is the basis of a varnish.

Journal of Science. Encyc. Chambers.

AM'BER, a. Consisting of, or resembling amber.

AM'BER, v. t. To scent with amber.

AM'BER-DRINK, n. A drink resembling amber in color.

Milton.

AM'BER-SEED, n. Musk-seed, resembling millet. It is of a bitterish taste, and brought from Egypt and the W. Indies.

Chambers.

AM'BER-TREE, n. The English name of a species of Anthospermum, a shrub, with evergreen leaves, which, when bruised, emit a fragrant odor.

Miller.

AM'BERGRIS, n. [amber and Fr. gris, gray; gray amber.]

A solid, opaque, ash-colored inflammable substance, variegated like marble, remarkably light, rugged on its surface, and when heated, it has a fragrant odor. It does not effervesce with acids; it melts easily into a kind of yellow resin, and is highly soluble in spirit of wine. Various opinions have been entertained respecting its origin; but it is well ascertained, that it is indurated fecal matter, discharged by the spermaceti whale, a species of physeter. It has been found in that species of whale, but usually is found floating on the surface of the ocean, in regions frequented by whales; sometimes in masses of from 60 to 225 lbs. weight. In this substance are found the beaks of the cuttle fish, on which that whale is known to feed. It is highly valued as a material in perfumery.

A M B

Encyc.

AM'BIDEXTER, n. [L. ambo, both, and dexter, the right hand.]

AMBI'TION, n. [L. ambitio, from ambio, to go about, or to seek by making interest, of amb, about, and eo, to go. See Ambages.] This word had its origin in the practice of Roman candidates for office, who went about the city to solicit votes.]

A desire of preferment, or of honor; a desire of excellence or superiority. It is used in a good sense; as, emulation may spring from a laudable ambition. It denotes also an inordinate desire of power, or eminence, often accompanied with illegal means to obtain the object. It is sometimes followed by of; as, a man has an ambition of wit. Milton has used the word in the Latin sense of going about, or attempting; but this sense is hardly legitimate.

AMBI'TION, v. t. [Fr. ambitionner.]

Ambitiously to seek after. [Little used.]

King.

AMBI'TIOUS, a. Desirous of power, honor, office, superiority or excellence; aspiring; eager for fame; followed by of before a noun; as, ambitious of glory.

2. Showy; adapted to command notice or praise; as, ambitious ornaments.

3. Figuratively, eager to swell or rise higher; as, the ambitious ocean.

Shak.

AMBI'TIOUSLY, adv. In an ambitious manner; with an eager desire after preferment, or superiority.

AMBI'TIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being ambitious; ambition. Being nearly synonymous with ambition, it is not often used.

AM'BLE, v. i. [Fr. ambler, from L. ambulo, to walk; Qu. amb, about, and the root of Fr. aller.]

1. To move with a certain peculiar pace, as a horse, first lifting his two legs on one side, and then changing to the other.

Edin. Encyc.

2. To move easy, without hard shocks.

Him time ambles withal.

Shak.

3. In a ludicrous sense, to move with submission, or by direction, or to move affectedly.

Johnson.

AM'BLE, n. A peculiar pace of a horse.

AM'BROSIN, n. In the middle ages, a coin struck by the dukes of Milan, on which St. Ambrose was represented on horseback, with a whip in his right hand.

Encyc.

AM'BRY, n. [contracted from Fr. aumonerie, almonry, from old Fr. almoigne, alms.]

1. An almonry; a place where alms are deposited for distribution to the poor. In ancient abbeys and priories there was an office of this name, in which the almoner lived.

2. A place in which are deposited the utensils for house keeping; also a cupboard; a place for cold victuals.

AMBS'-ACE, n. [L. ambo, both, and ace.]

A double ace, as when two dice turn up the ace.

Johnson.

AM'BULANT, a. [L. ambulans, from ambulo.]

Walking; moving from place to place.

Encyc.

Ambulant brokers, in Amsterdam, are exchange-brokers, or agents, who are not sworn, and whose testimony is not received in courts of justice.

Encyc.

AMBULA'TION, n. [L. ambulatio.] A walking about; the act of walking.

AM'BULATOR, n. In entomology, a species of Lamia, whose thorax is armed on each side with two spines; a Cerambyx of Linne.

Cyc.

AM'BULATORY, a. That has the power or faculty of walking; as, an animal is ambulatory.

2. Pertaining to a walk; as, an ambulatory view.

3. Moving from place to place; not stationary; as, an ambulatory court, which exercises its jurisdiction in different places.

Johnson.

AM'BULATORY, n. A species of ichneirmon, with a yellowish scutellum and spotted thorax. Cyc.

AM'BURY, or AN'BURY, n. [Qu. L. umbo, the navel; Gr. αμβων.]

Among farriers, a tumor, wart or swelling on a horse, full of blood and soft to the touch. Encyc.

AM'BUSCADE, n. [Fr. embuscade; Sp. Port. emboscada; It. imboscata; from It. imboscare, Sp. emboscar, to lie in bushes, or concealed; in and bosco, bosque, a wood; Eng. bush.]

1. Laterally, a lying in a wood, concealed for the purpose of attacking an enemy by surprise: hence, a lying in wait, and concealed in any situation, for a like purpose.

2. A private station in which troops lie concealed with a view to attack their enemy by surprise; ambush.

AM'BUSCADE, v. t. To lie in wait for, or to attack from a concealed position.

AM'BUSCADED, pp. Having an ambush laid against, or attacked from a private station; as, his troops were ambuscaded.

AM'BUSCADING, ppr. Lying in wait for; attacking from a secret station.

AM'BUSH, n. [Fr. embûche, of in and bush; Dan. busk; D. bosch; Germ. busch; Fr. bosquet, boscage, bocage, bois. See Bush.]

1. A private or concealed station, where troops lie in wait to attack their enemy by surprise.

2. The state of lying concealed, for the purpose of attacking by surprise; a lying in wait.

3. The troops posted in a concealed place for attacking by surprise.

Lay thee an ambush for the city. Josh. viii.

AM'BUSH, v. t. To lie in wait for; to surprise, by assailing unexpectedly from a concealed place.

AM'BUSH, v. i. To lie in wait, for the purpose of attacking by surprise.

Nor saw the snake, that ambush'd for his prey. Trumbull.

AM'BUSHED, pp. Lain in wait for; suddenly attacked from a concealed station.

AM'BUSHING, ppr. Lying in wait for; attacking from a concealed station.

AM'BUSHMENT, n. An ambush; which see.

AMBUS'TION, n. [L. ambustio, from amburo, to burn or scorch, of amb, about, and uro, to burn.]

Among physicians, a burning; a burn or scald.

AMEI'VA, n. A species of lizard, found in Brazil. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

AM'EL, n. [Fr. email.] The matter with which metallic bodies are overlaid; but its use is superseded by enamel; which see. Boyle.

AME'LIORATE, v. t. [Fr. ameliorer, from L. melior, better.]

To make better; to improve; to meliorate. S. S. Smith. Christ. Obs. Buchanan.

AME'LIORATE, v. i. To grow better; to meliorate.

AME'LIORA'TION, n. A making or becoming better; improvement; melioration.

AMEN'. This word, with slight differences of orthography, is in all the dialects of the Assyrian stock. As a verb, it signifies to confirm, establish, verify; to trust, or give confidence; as a noun, truth, firmness, trust, confidence; as an adjective, firm, stable. In English, after the oriental manner, it is used at the beginning, but more generally at the end of declarations and prayers, in the sense of, be it firm, be it established.

And let all the people say amen. Ps. cvi.

The word is used also as a noun.

"All the promises of God are amen in Christ;" that is, firmness, stability, constancy.

AMEN'ABLE, a. [It. menare; Fr. mener, amener; Norm. amesner, to lead, to bring; Fr. amener, It. ammalnare, in marine language, to strike sail.]

1. In old law, easy to be led; governable, as a woman by her husband. [This sense is obsolete.]

2. Liable to answer; responsible; answerable; liable to be called to account; as, every man is amenable to the laws.

We retain this idiom in the popular phrase, to bring in, to make answerable; as, a man is brought in to pay the debt of another.

AM'ENAGE, v. t. To manage. Obs. Spenser.

AM'ENANCE, n. Conduct, behavior. Obs. Spenser.

AMEND', v. t. [Fr. amender; L. emendo, of e neg, and menda, mendum, a fault; W. mann, a spot or blemish; Sp. Port. emendar; It. ammendare. See Mend.]

1. To correct; to rectify by expunging a mistake; as, to amend a law.

2. To reform, by quitting bad habits; to make better in a moral sense; as, to amend our ways or our conduct.

3. To correct; to supply a defect; to improve or make better, by some addition of what is wanted, as well as by expunging what is wrong, as to amend a bill before a legislature. Hence it is applied to the correction of authors, by restoring passages which had been omitted, or restoring the true reading.

AMEND', v. i. To grow or become better, by reformation, or rectifying something wrong in manners or morals. It differs from improve, in this, that to amend implies something previously wrong; to improve, does not.

AMEND', n. [Fr.] A pecuniary punishment, or fine. The amende honorable, in France, is an infamous punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides and sacrilegious persons. The offender, being led into court with a rope about his neck, begs pardon of his God, the court, &c. These words denote also a recantation in open court, or in presence of the injured person. Encyc.

AMEND'ABLE, a. That may be amended; capable of correction; as, an amendable writ or error.

AMEND'ATORY, a. That amends; supplying amendment; corrective.

AMEND'ED, pp. Corrected; rectified; reformed; improved, or altered for the better.

AMEND'ER, n. The person that amends.

AMEND'ING, ppr. Correcting; reforming; altering for the better.

AMEND'MENT, n. An alteration or change for the better; correction of a fault or faults; reformation of life, by quitting vices.

2. A word, clause or paragraph, added or proposed to be added to a bill before a legislature.

3. In law, the correction of an error in a writ or process.

Shakespeare uses it for the recovery of health, but this sense is unusual.

AMENDS', n. plu. [Fr. amende.]

Compensation for an injury; recompense; satisfaction; equivalent; as, the happiness of a future life will more than make amends for the miseries of this.

AMEN'ITY, n. [L. aménitas; Fr. aménité; L. aménus; W. amyn, good, kind.]

Pleasantness; agreeableness of situation; that which delights the eye; used of places and prospects. Brown.

AM'ENT, n. [L. amentum, a thong, or strap.]

In botany, a species of inflorescence, from a common, chaffy receptacle; or consisting of many scales, ranged along a stalk or slender axis, which is the common receptacle; as in birch, oak, chesnut. Martyn.

AMENTA'CEOUS, a. Growing in an ament; resembling a thong; as, the chesnut has an amentaceous inflorescence. Martyn.

AMERCE, v. t. amers'. [A verb formed from a for on or at, and Fr. merci, mercy, or from L. merces, reward.]

1. To inflict a penalty at mercy; to punish by a pecuniary penalty, the amount of which is not fixed by law, but left to the discretion or mercy of the court; as, the court amerced the criminal in the sum of one hundred dollars.

2. To inflict a pecuniary penalty; to punish in general. Milton uses of after amerce: "Millions of spirits amerced of heaven;" but this use seems to be a poetic license.

AMER'CED, pp. Fined at the discretion of a court.

AMERCEMENT, n. amers'ment. A pecuniary penalty inflicted on an offender at the discretion of the court. It differs from a fine, in that the latter is, or was originally, a fixed and certain sum prescribed by statute for an offense; but an amercement is arbitrary. Hence the practice of affearing. [See Affeer.] But in America, the word fine is now used for a pecuniary penalty which is uncertain; and it is common in statutes, to enact that an offender shall be fined, at the discretion of the court. In England also, fines are now usually discretionary. Thus the word fine has, in a measure, superseded the use of amercement. This word, in old books, is written amerciament.

Amercement royal is a penalty imposed on an officer for a misdemeanor in his office.

AMER'CER, n. One who sets a fine at discretion, upon an offender.

AMER'ICA, n. [from Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine, who pretended to have first discovered the western continent.]

One of the great continents, first discovered by Sebastian Cabot, June 11, O. S. 1498, and by Columbus, or Christoval Colon, Aug. 1, the same year. It extends from the eightieth degree of North, to the fifty-fourth degree of South Latitude; and from the thirty-fifth to the one hundred and fifty-sixth degree of Longitude West from Greenwich, being about nine thousand miles in length. Its breadth at Darien is narrowed to about forty-five miles, but at the northern extremity is nearly four thousand miles. From Darien to the North, the continent is called North America, and to the South, it is called South America.

AMERICAN, a. Pertaining to America.

AMERICAN, n. A native of America; originally applied to the aboriginals, or copper-colored races, found here by the Europeans; but now applied to the descendants of Europeans born in America.

The name American must always exalt the pride of patriotism.

AMERICANISM, n. The love which American citizens have to their own country, or the preference of its interests. Analogically, an American idiom.

AMERICANIZE, v. t. To render American; to naturalize in America.

AMERICANICIM, n. A species of lizard in South America, not more than two inches in length, and the third of an inch in diameter. Its legs are of the size of a hog's bristle. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

AMETHODIST, n. A quack. [Not used.]

AMETHYST, n. [L. amethystus; Gr. αμethystος, which the Greeks supposed to be formed from a neg. and μethystos, to inebriate, from some supposed quality in the stone of resisting intoxication. Plin. xxxvii. 9, mentions an opinion that it takes its name from its color approaching that of wine, but not reaching it.]

A sub-species of quartz, of a violet blue color, of different degrees of intensity. It generally occurs crystallized in hexahedral prisms or pyramids; also in rolled fragments, composed of imperfect prismatic crystals. Its fracture is conchoidal or splintery. It is wrought into various articles of jewelry. Cleveland. Encyc.

AMETHYST, in heraldry, signifies a purple color. It is the same, in a nobleman's escutcheon, as purple, in a gentleman's, and mercury, in that of a prince. Encyc.

AMETHYSTINE, a. Pertaining to or resembling amethyst; anciently applied to a garment of the color of amethyst, as distinguished from the Tyrian and hyacinthine purple.

AMIA, n. A genus of fish, of the abdominal order, found in the rivers of Carolina. Pennant.

AMIALE, a. [Fr. amiable; L. amabilis; from amo, to love.]

1. Lovely; worthy of love; deserving of affection; applied usually to persons. But in Ps. lxxxiv. 1, there is an exception, "How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord."

2. Pretending or showing love.

Lay amiable siege to the honesty of this Ford's wife. Shak.

But this use is not legitimate.

AMIALENESS, n. The quality of deserving love; loveliness.

AMIALELY, adv. In an amiable manner; in a manner to excite or attract love.

AMIANTH, n. [Gr. αμιανθος, of a neg. and μαιωω, to pollute, or vitiate; so called from its incombustibility. Plin. 36. 19.]

Earth-flax, or mountain flax; a mineral substance somewhat resembling flax; usually grayish, or of a greenish white; sometimes of a yellowish or silvery white, olive or mountain green, of a pale flesh red or other color. It is composed of delicate filaments, very flexible and somewhat elastic, often long and resembling threads of silk. It is incombustible, and has sometimes been wrought into cloth and paper. Kirwan. Encyc. Cleveland.

AMIANTHIFORM, a. [Amianth and form.] Having the form or likeness of amianth.

Amianthiform arsenate of copper. Phillips.

AMIANTHINITE, n. A species of amorphous mineral, a variety of actinolite; its color ash, greenish or yellowish gray, often mixed with yellow or red; its fracture confusedly foliated and fibrous. Kirwan.

AMIANTHOID, n. [Amianth and Gr. ειδος, form.]

A mineral which occurs in tufts, composed of long capillary filaments, flexible and very elastic; more flexible than the fibers of asbestos, but stiffer and more elastic than those of amianth. The color is olive green, or greenish white. Hauy. Cleveland.

AMIANTHOID, a. Resembling amianth in form.

AMICABLE, a. [L. amicabilis, from amicus, a friend, from amo, to love.]

1. Friendly; peaceable; harmonious in social or mutual transactions; usually applied to the dispositions of men who have business with each other, or to their intercourse and transactions; as, nations or men have come to an amicable adjustment of their differences.

2. Disposed to peace and friendship; as, an amicable temper. [But rarely applied to a single person.]

AMICABLENESS, n. The quality of being peaceable, friendly, or disposed to peace; friendliness; a disposition to preserve peace and friendship.

AMICABLY, adv. In a friendly manner; with harmony or good will; without controversy; as, the dispute was amicably adjusted.

AMICE, n. [L. amictus from amicior, to clothe; Fr. amict; Sp. amito; Port. amicto.]

A square linen cloth that a Catholic priest ties about his neck, hanging down behind under the alb, when he officiates at mass. Sp. and Port. Dict.

AMID, prep. [of a and Sax. mid, the middle, L. medius.]

AMIDST, prep. the middle, L. medius. Amidst is the superlative degree middest, a contraction of Sax. mid-mesta, mid-most. See Middle and Midst.]

1. In the midst or middle.

2. Among; mingled with; as, a shepherd amidst his flock.

3. Surrounded, encompassed, or enveloped with; as, amidst the shade; amidst the waves. Amid is used mostly in poetry.

AMIDSHIPS, in marine language, the middle of a ship, with regard to her length and breadth.

AMLOT, n. A white fish in the Mexican lakes, more than a foot in length, and much esteemed at the table. Clavigero.

AMISS, a. [a and miss. See Miss.]

1. Wrong; faulty; out of order; improper; as, it may not be amiss to ask advice. [This adjective always follows its noun.]

2. adv. In a faulty manner; contrary to propriety, truth, law or morality.

Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss. James, iv.

Applied to the body, it signifies indisposed;

as, I am somewhat amiss to day.

AMITY, n. [Fr. amitié; It. amistà, amistade; Sp. amistad, from amistar, to reconcile; Port. amizade; Norm. amistee, friendship, umex, friends, amets, ametz, beloved. Qu. L. amio, amicilia.]

Friendship, in a general sense, between individuals, societies or nations; harmony; good understanding; as, our nation is in amity with all the world; a treaty of amity and commerce.

AMMA, n. [Heb. אמא mother.]

1. An abbess or spiritual mother.

2. A girdle or truss used in ruptures. [Gr. αμμος.] Coze.

AMMAN, n. [G. amtmann; D. amptman; Dan. amtmænd; a compound of ampt, Sax. ambaht or embeht, office, duty, charge, and man. See Embassador.]

In some European nations, a judge who has cognizance of civil causes. In France, a notary or officer who draws deeds and other writings. Encyc.

AMMITE or HAMMITE, n. [Gr. αμμος, sand.]

A sand-stone or free-stone, of a pale brown color, very heavy, of a lax texture, composed of small round granules, cemented by an earthy sparry matter. The grit or granules are small stalagmites, composed of crusts or coats including one another. It is the roe-stone or oolite of recent authors. Da Costa. Plin. 37. 10.

AMMOCETE, n. An obsolete name of the ammodyte. In Cuvier, the name of a genus of fish, including the lampern, Petromyzon branchialis, Linne.

AMMOCHRYSE, n. am'mokris, [Gr. αμμος, sand, and χρυσος, gold.]

A yellow soft stone, found in Germany, consisting of glossy yellow particles. When rubbed or ground, it is used to strew over writing, like black sand with us. Qu. yellow mica. Plin. 37. 11. Encyc.

AMMODYTE, n. [Gr. αμμος, sand, and δω, to enter.]

The sand eel, a genus of fish, of the apodal order, about a foot in length, with a compressed head, a long slender body, and scales hardly perceptible. There is but one species, the tobianus or lance. It buries itself in the sand, and is found also in the stomach of the porpoise, which indicates that the latter fish roots up the sand like a hog. Encyc.

This name is also given to a serpent of the size of a viper, and of a yellowish color, found in Africa; also to a large serpent of Ceylon, of a whitish ash color, and very venomous. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

AMMONIA, n. [The real origin of this word is not ascertained.

Some authors suppose it to be from Ammon, a title of Jupiter, near whose temple in upper Egypt, it was generated. Others suppose it to be from Ammonia, a Cyrenaic territory; and others deduce it from αμμος, sand, as it was found in sandy ground. Anglicized, this forms an elegant word, ammony.]

Volatile alkali; a substance, which, in its purest form, exists in a state of gas. It is composed of hydrogen and nitrogen. Combined with the muriatic acid, it forms the muriate of ammonia, called also sal ammoniac and hydro-chlorate of ammonia. Native muriate of ammonium is found in Egypt, where it is said to be generated in large inns and caravanseras, from the excrements of camels and other beasts. It occurs also massive and crystalized in the vicinity of volcanoes. Ammonium, popularly called hartshorn, is extremely pungent and acrid, but when diluted, is an agreeable stimulant. It extinguishes flame, and is fatal to animal life. It combines with acids, and produces a class of salts, which, with few exceptions, are soluble in water. Nicholson. Thompson. Webster's Manual.

A M N

AMMONIAC, } Pertaining to ammonia, or possessing its properties.
AMMONIACAL, }

AMMONIAC, or AMMONIAC GUM, n. [See Ammonia.]

A gum resin, from Africa and the East, brought in large masses, composed of tears, internally white and externally yellow; supposed to be an exudation from an umbelliferous plant. It has a fetid smell, and a nauseous sweet taste, followed by a bitter one. It is inflammable, soluble in water and spirit of wine, and is used in medicine, as a deobstruent, and resolvent. Encyc.

AMMONIAN, a. Relating to Ammonius, surnamed Saccas, of Alexandria, who flourished at the end of the second century, and was the founder of the eclectic system of Philosophy; or rather, he completed the establishment of the sect, which originated with Potamo. Enfield.

AMMONITE, n. [Cornu ammonis, from Jupiter Ammon, whose statues were represented with ram's horns.]

Serpent-stone, or cornu ammonis, a fossil shell, curved into a spiral, like a ram's horn; of various sizes, from the smallest grains to three feet in diameter. This fossil is found in strata of limestone and clay, and in argillaceous iron ore. It is smooth or ridged; the ridges strait, crooked or undulated. Cyc. Encyc. Plin. 37. 10.

AMMONIUM, n. A name given to the supposed metallic basis of ammonia. If mercury, at the negative pole of a galvanic battery, is placed in contact with a solution of ammonia, and the circuit is completed, an amalgam is formed, which, at the temperature of 70° or 80° of Fahrenheit, is of the consistence of butter, but at the freezing point is a firm and crystalized mass. This amalgam is supposed to be formed by the metallic basis, ammonium. Davy. Thomson.

AMMONIURET, n. The solution of a substance in ammonia. Ed. Encyc.

AMMUNITION, n. [L. ad and munitio, from munio, to fortify.]

Military stores, or provisions for attack or defense. In modern usage, the signification is confined to the articles which are used in the discharge of fire-arms and ordnance of all kinds; as powder, balls, bombs, various kinds of shot, &c.

Ammunition-bread, bread or other provisions to supply troops.

AMNESTY, n. [Gr. ἀμνηστία, of a neg. and μνησθαι, memory, from the root of mens, mind. See Mind.]

An act of oblivion; a general pardon of the offenses of subjects against the government, or the proclamation of such pardon. AMNIO or AMNION, n. [Gr. ἀμνιον, a vessel or membrane.]

A M O

The innermost membrane surrounding the fetus in the womb. It is thin, transparent, soft and smooth on the inside, but rough on the outside. Encyc.

AMNIOTIC, a. Obtained from the liquor of the amnios, as the amniotic acid. Ure.

AMOBAN, a. Alternately answering. Warton.

AMOBUM, n. [Gr. ἀμωβιον, alternate; ἀμωβη, change.]

A poem in which persons are represented as speaking alternately, as the third and seventh eclogues of Virgil. Encyc.

AMOMUM, n. [Gr. ἀμωμον; Ar. لعل] hamauma, from hamma, to warm or heat; the heating plant.]

A genus of plants; all natives of warm climates, and remarkable for their pungency and aromatic properties. It includes the common ginger or zingiber, the zerbumbet, zedoary, cardamom, and granum paradisi or grains of paradise. The roots of the three former, and the seeds of the two latter, are used in medicine as carminatives and stimulants, and in cookery as condiments. They are important articles of commerce. Cyc.

True amomum is a round fruit, from the East, of the size of a grape, containing, under a membranous cover, a number of angular seeds of a dark brown color, in three cells. Of this fruit, ten or twelve grow in a cluster, adhering, without a pedicle, to a woody stalk. It is of a pungent taste and aromatic smell, and was formerly much used in medicine, but is now a stranger to the shops. Plin. 12. 13. Encyc.

AMONG, } prep. Amung, } [Sax. on- AMONGST, } prep. Amungst, } mang, on- gemang, among; gemangan, to mingle; D. and Ger. mengen; Sw. mangia; Dan. mænger, to mingle; Gr. μυγναι. See Mingle.]

1. In a general or primitive sense, mixed or mingled with; as tares among wheat.

2. Conjoined or associated with, or making part of the number.

Blessed art thou among women. Luke, i.
3. Of the number; as, there is not one among a thousand, possessing the like qualities.

AMO'NIAN, a. [from Amon or Hamon, a title of Jupiter, or rather of the sun; Ar. Heb. and Ch. am, mon, Ham or Camah, which, as a verb, signifies to heat or warm, and as a noun, heat or the sun; and in Arabic, the supreme God.]

Pertaining to Jupiter Amon, or to his temple and worship in upper Egypt. Bryant.

AMORA'DO, n. [L. amor, love, amo, to love. But the word is ill formed.]

A lover. See Inamorato, which is chiefly used. Ch. Rel. Appeal.

AMORE, n. A name given by Marcgrave, to a tribe of fish, of three species, the pixuma, guacu, and tinga. They are found about the shores of South America, and are used for food. Cyc. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

AMORE'ANS, n. A sect of Gemaric doctors or commentators on the Jerusalem Talmud. The Amoreans were followed by the Mishnic doctors, and these by the Sebureans.

A M O

AMORET', n. [L. amor, love; Fr. amour-ette.]

A lover; an amorous woman; also a love knot or a trifling love affair.

Good's Sacred Idyls. Chaucer.

AMORIST, n. [L. amor, love.]

A lover; a gallant; an innamorato. Boyle.

AMORO'SO, n. [It. from amor, love.]

A lover; a man enamored.

AMOROUS, a. [Fr. amoureux; It. amoroso; from L. amor, love.]

1. Inclined to love; having a propensity to love, or to sexual enjoyment; loving; fond.

2. In love; enamored. Shak.

3. Pertaining or relating to love; produced by love; indicating love; as, amorous delight; amorous airs. Milton. Waller.

AMOROUSLY, adv. In an amorous manner; fondly; lovingly.

AMOROUSNESS, n. The quality of being inclined to love, or to sexual pleasure; fondness; lovingness. Sidney.

AMORPH'A, n. [Gr. a neg. and μορφη, form.] False or bastard indigo. The plant is a native of Carolina, constituting a genus. It rises, with many irregular stems, to the height of twelve or fourteen feet; the leaves, beautifully pinnated, are of an admired green color, and its purple flowers grow in spikes of seven or eight inches long. Of this plant has been made a coarse kind of indigo. Encyc.

AMORPH'OUS, a. [Gr. a neg. and μορφη, form.]

Having no determinate form; of irregular shape; not of any regular figure. Kirwan.

AMORPH'Y, n. Irregularity of form; deviation from a determinate shape. Swift.

AMORT', adv. [L. mors, mortuus.] In the state of the dead. Shak.

AMORTIZATION or AMORTIZEMENT, n. The act or right of alienating lands or tenements to a corporation, which was considered formerly as transferring them to dead hands, as such alienations were mostly made to religious houses for superstitious uses. Blackstone.

AMORTIZE, v. t. [Norm. amortizer, amortir; Sp. amortizar, to sell in mortmain; It. ammortire, to extinguish, from morte, L. mors, death. See Mortmain.]

In English law, to alienate in mortmain, that is, to sell to a corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal, and their successors. This was considered as selling to dead hands. This cannot be done without the king's license. [See Mortmain.] Blackstone. Cowel.

AMOTION, n. [L. amotio; amoveo.] Removal. Warton.

AMOUNT, v. i. [Fr. monter, to ascend; Norm. amont, upwards; Sp. Port. montar; It. montare; from L. mons, a mountain, or its root; W. mynyz.]

1. To rise to or reach, by an accumulation of particulars, into an aggregate whole; to compose in the whole; as, the interest on the several sums amounts to fifty dollars.

2. To rise, reach, or extend to, in effect, or substance; to result in, by consequence, when all things are considered; as, the testimony of these witnesses amounts to very little. Bacon.

AMOUNT', n. The sum total of two or more particular sums or quantities; as, the amount of 7 and 9 is 16.

2. The effect, substance or result; the sum; as, the amount of the testimony is this.

AMOUNT'ING, ppr. Rising to, by accumulation or addition; coming or increasing to; resulting in effect or substance.

AMOUR', n. [Fr., from L. amor, love.] An unlawful connection in love; a love intrigue; an affair of gallantry. South.

AMOVE', v. t. [L. amoveo, a and moveo, to move.] To remove. [Not used.] Hall. Spenser.

AMP'ELITE, n. [Gr. αμπελος, a vine. The name of an earth used to kill worms on vines. Pliny says it is like bitumen. Lib. 35, 16.]

Cannel coal, or candle coal; an inflammable substance of a black color, compact texture, and resinous luster, and sufficiently hard to be cut and polished. It burns with a bright flame, of a short duration; and gives but a moderate heat. It is used like jet for making toys. It is found in France and England, where husbandmen smear vines with it to kill vermin. Encyc. Cleaveland.

AMPHIB'IAL, AMPHIB'IA, n. [Gr. αμφι, both or about, and βιος, life.] In zoology, amphibials are a class of animals, so formed as to live on land, and for a long time under water. Their heart has but one ventricle; their blood is red and cold; and they have such command of the lungs, as for a considerable time, to suspend respiration. This class of animals is divided into two orders, the Reptiles and the Serpents. To the first belong the testudo, or tortoise, the draco or dragon, the lacerta or lizard, and the rana or frog; to the second, the crotalus, boa, coluber, anguis, amphisbena, and cecilia. Linne.

The term has also been applied to such quadrupeds, as frequent the water, particularly the marine quadrupeds, such as the seal, walrus and lamantin. Encyc.

AMPHIB'IOHITE, n. [Gr. αμφιβιος, amphibious, and λιθος, stone.] A fragment of a petrified amphibious animal. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

AMPHIBIOLOG'ICAL, a. [Infra.] Pertaining to amphibiology.

AMPHIBIOL'OGY, n. [Gr. αμφι, on both sides, βιος, life, and λογος, discourse.] A discourse or treatise on amphibious animals, or the history and description of such animals.

AMPHIBIOUS, a. [See Amphibial.]

1. Having the power of living in two elements, air and water, as frogs, crocodiles, beavers, and the like.

2. Of a mixed nature; partaking of two natures; as, an amphibious breed.

AMPHIBIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being able to live in two elements, or of partaking of two natures.

AMPHIBITUM, n. That which lives in two elements, as in air and water.

AM'PHIBOLE, n. [Gr. αμφιβολος, equivocal; αμφι and βαλλω.] A name given by Hady to a species of minerals, including the Tremolite, Hornblende, and Actinolite. Its primitive form is an oblique rhombic prism. Cleaveland.

AMPHIBOL'IC, a. Pertaining to amphibole; resembling amphibole, or partaking of its nature and characters. Cooper.

AMPHIBOLOG'ICAL, a. Doubtful; of doubtful meaning.

AMPHIBOLOG'ICALLY, adv. With a doubtful meaning.

AMPHIBOL'OGY, n. [Gr. αμφι, βαλλω and λογος, speech, αμφιβολογια.]

A phrase or discourse, susceptible of two interpretations; and hence, a phrase of uncertain meaning. Amphibology arises from the order of the phrase, rather than from the ambiguous meaning of a word, which is called equivocation. We have an example in the answer of the oracle to Pyrrhus. "Aio te Romanos vincere posse." Here te and Romanos, may either of them precede or follow vincere posse, and the sense may be either, you may conquer the Romans, or the Romans may conquer you. The English language seldom admits of amphibology. Encyc. Johnson.

AMPHIB'OLOUS, a. [Gr. αμφιβολος, αμφι and βαλλω, to strike.]

Tossed from one to another; striking each way, with mutual blows. [Little used.]

AMPHIB'OLY, n. [Gr. αμφιβολια, αμφι, both ways, and βαλλω, to strike.]

Ambiguity of meaning. [Rarely used.]

AM'PHIBRACH, n. [Gr. αμφι, and βραχυς, short.]

In poetry, a foot of three syllables, the middle one long, the first and last short; as hāberē, in Latin. In English verse, it is used as the last foot, when a syllable is added to the usual number forming a double rhyme; as,

The piece, you think, is incorrect, why take it?
Pope. Trumbull.

AM'PHICOME, n. [Gr. αμφι and κομη, hair.]

A kind of figured stone, of a round shape, but rugged and beset with eminences; called Erotylos, on account of its supposed power of exciting love. Anciently, it was used in divination; but it is little known to the moderns. Encyc.

AMPHICTYON'IC, a. Pertaining to the august council of Amphictyons.

AMPHIC'TYONS, n. In Grecian history, an assembly or council of deputies from the different states of Greece, supposed to be so called from Amphictyon, the son of Deucalion, but this opinion is probably a fable. Ten or twelve states were represented in this assembly, which sat at Thermopylæ, but ordinarily at Delphi. Each city sent two deputies, one called Hieromnemon and the other Pylagoras. The former inspected the sacrifices and ceremonies of religion; the latter, had the charge of deciding causes and differences between private persons. The former was elected by lot; the latter by a plurality of voices. They had an equal right to deliberate and vote in all matters relating to the common interests of Greece. Paus. Plin. Strabo. Encyc.

AM'PHIGENE, n. [Gr. αμφι and γενος.]

In mineralogy, another name of the leucite or Vesuvian.

AMPHIHEXAHE'DRAL, a. [Gr. αμφι, and hexahedral.]

In crystallography, when the faces of the crystal, counted in two different directions, give two hexahedral outlines, or are found to be six in number. Cleaveland.

AMPHIM'ACER, n. [Gr. αμφιμακρος, long on both sides.]

In ancient poetry, a foot of three syllables, the middle one short and the others long, as in cāstītās.

AMPHIS'BEN, } n. [Gr. αμφισβαννα, of αμφι and βαννα, to go; indicating that the animal moves with either end foremost.]

A genus of serpents, with the head small, smooth and blunt; the nostrils small, the eyes minute and blackish, and the mouth furnished with small teeth. The body is cylindrical, destitute of scales, and divided into numerous annular segments; the tail obtuse, and scarcely to be distinguished from the head, whence the belief that it moved equally well with either end foremost. There are two species; the fuliginosa, black with white spots, found in Africa and America; and the alba, or white species, found in both the Indies, and generally in ant-hillocks. They feed on ants and earth-worms, and were formerly deemed poisonous; but this opinion is exploded. Plin. 8. 23. Encyc. Cyc.

The aquatic amphisben, Gordius aquaticus, Linne, is an animal resembling a horse hair, found in water, and moving with either end foremost. The vulgar opinion that this is an animated horse-hair is found to be an error. This hair worm is generated in the common black beetle, in which the parent worm lays its eggs; and is sometimes found in the earth and on the leaves of trees.

Lister, Phil. Trans. No. 83.

AMPHIS'CII, } n. [Gr. αμφι, on both sides, and σκια, shadow.]

In geography, the inhabitants of the tropics, whose shadows, in one part of the year, are cast to the north, and in the other, to the south, according as the sun is in the southern or northern signs.

AM'PHITANE, n. A name given by ancient naturalists to a fossil, called by Dr. Hill pyricubium. Pliny describes it as of a square figure and a gold color. Qu. Cubic pyrites. Pliny, 37. 10. Encyc.

AMPHITHE'ATER, n. [Gr. αμφιθεατρον, of αμφι, about, and θεατρον, theater, from θεαομαι, to see or look.]

1. An edifice in an oval or circular form, having its area encompassed with rows of seats, rising higher as they recede from the area, on which people used to sit to view the combats of gladiators and of wild beasts, and other sports. The ancient theater was a semicircle, but exceeding it by a fourth part of its diameter; the amphitheater was a double theater, and its longest diameter was to its shortest as 1 1-2 to 1. It was at first of wood, but in the reign of Augustus one was erected of stone. The area or cavea being covered with sand was called arena. Kennet.

2. In gardening, a disposition of shrubs and trees in the form of an amphitheater, on a slope, or forming a slope, by placing the lowest in front. An amphitheater may also be formed of turf only. Encyc.

AMPHITHEATRICAL, a. Resembling an amphitheater. Tooke.

AMPHITHEATRICAL, a. Pertaining to or exhibited in an amphitheater. Warton.

AMPHITRITE, n. [Gr. ἀμφιτρίτη, a goddess of the sea.]

A genus of marine animals, of the Linnean order, Mollusca.

AMPHOR, or AMPHORA, n. [L. amphora; Gr. ἀμφορεύς, or ἀμφιφορεύς; ἀμφι and φορεύς.]

Among the Greeks and Romans, a liquid measure. The amphora of the Romans contained about forty-eight sextaries, equal to seven gallons and a pint, English wine measure. The Grecian or Attic amphor contained about a third more. This was also, among the Romans, a dry measure of about three bushels. Among the Venetians, it is a liquid measure of sixteen quarts.

This name was formerly used in England; but the capacity of the Sax. ambra is not certainly known.

LL. Ina. Cap. 70. Wilkins, Pref. LL. Ethelstan. Spelman. Encyc.

AMPLE, a. [Fr. ample; L. amplus.]

1. Large; wide; spacious; extended; as ample room. This word carries with it the sense of room or space fully sufficient for the use intended.

2. Great in bulk, or size; as an ample tear. Shak.

3. Liberal; unrestrained; without parsimony; fully sufficient; as, ample provision for the table; ample justice.

4. Liberal; magnificent; as ample promises.

5. Diffusive; not brief or contracted; as an ample narrative.

AMPLENESS, n. Largeness; spaciousness; sufficiency; abundance.

AMPLEXICAUL, a. [L. amplexor, to embrace, of amb about, and plico, plexus, to fold, and caulis, καλός, a stem.]

In botany, surrounding or embracing the stem, as the base of a leaf.

AMPLIATE, v. t. [L. amplio. See Ample.]

To enlarge; to make greater; to extend. [Little used.]

AMPLIATION, n. Enlargement; amplification; diffuseness. [Little used.]

2. In Roman antiquity, a deferring to pass sentence; a postponement of a decision, to obtain further evidence. Encyc.

AMPLIFICATION, n. [L. amplificatio.]

1. Enlargement; extension.

2. In rhetoric, diffusive description or discussion; exaggerated representation; copious argument, intended to present the subject in every view or in the strongest light; diffuse narrative, or a dilating upon all the particulars of a subject; a description given in more words than are necessary, or an illustration by various examples and proofs.

AMPLIFIED, pp. Enlarged; extended; diffusively treated.

AMPLIFIER, n. One who amplifies or enlarges; one who treats a subject diffusively, to exhibit it in the strongest light. Sidney.

AMPLIFY, v. t. [Fr. amplifier; L. amplifico; of amplus and facio, to make large.]

1. To enlarge; to augment; to increase or extend, in a general sense; applied to material or immaterial things.

A M U

2. In rhetoric, to enlarge in discussion or by representation; to treat copiously, so as to present the subject in every view and in the strongest lights.

3. To enlarge by addition; to improve or extend; as, to amplify the sense of an author by a paraphrase.

AMPLIFY, v. t. To speak largely or copiously; to be diffuse in argument or description; to dilate upon; often followed by on; as, to amplify on the several topics of discourse. Watts.

2. To exaggerate; to enlarge by representation or description; as,

Homer amplifies—not invents. Pope.

AMPLIFYING, ppr. Enlarging; exaggerating; diffusively treating.

AMPLITUDE, n. [L. amplitudo, from amplus, large.]

1. Largeness; extent, applied to bodies; as, the amplitude of the earth.

2. Largeness; extent of capacity or intellectual powers; as, amplitude of mind.

3. Extent of means or power; abundance; sufficiency. Watts.

Amplitude, in astronomy, is an arch of the horizon intercepted between the east and west point, and the center of the sun or star at its rising or setting. At the rising of a star, the amplitude is eastern or ortive; at the setting, it is western, occiduous, or occasive. It is also northern or southern, when north or south of the equator. Johnson. Encyc.

Amplitude of the range, in projectiles, is the horizontal line subtending the path of a body thrown, or the line which measures the distance it has moved. Johnson. Chambers.

Magnetical amplitude is the arch of the horizon between the sun or a star, at rising or setting, and the east or west point of the horizon, by the compass. The difference between this and the true amplitude is the variation of the compass. Encyc.

AMPLIFY, adv. Largely; liberally; fully; sufficiently; copiously; in a diffusive manner.

AMPUTATE, v. t. [L. amputo, of amb, about, and puto, to prune.]

1. To prune branches of trees or vines; to cut off.

2. To cut off a limb or other part of an animal body; a term of surgery.

AMPUTATED, pp. Cut off; separated from the body.

AMPUTATING, ppr. Cutting off a limb or part of the body.

AMPUTATION, n. [L. amputatio.]

The act or operation of cutting off a limb or some part of the body.

AMULET, n. [L. amuletum; Fr. amulette; Sp. amuleto; from Lat. amolior, amolitius, to remove.]

Something worn as a remedy or preservative against evils or mischief, such as diseases and witchcraft. Amulets, in days of ignorance, were common. They consisted of certain stones, metals or plants; sometimes of words, characters or sentences, arranged in a particular order. They were appended to the neck or body. Among some nations, they are still in use. Encyc.

AMUSE, v. t. s as z. [Fr. amuser, to stop or keep at bay, to detain; from muser, to loiter, or trifle; It. musare, to gaze or stand idle; Ger. mässig, idle. Qu. Gr. μύω; Lat. musso.]

1. To entertain the mind agreeably; to occupy or detain attention with agreeable objects, whether by singing, conversation, or a show of curiosities. Dr. Johnson remarks, that amuse implies something less lively than divert, and less important than please. Hence it is often said, we are amused with trifles.

2. To detain; to engage the attention by hope or expectation; as, to amuse one by flattering promises.

AMUSED, pp. s as z. Agreeably entertained; having the mind engaged by something pleasing.

AMUSEMENT, n. s as z. That which amuses, detains or engages the mind; entertainment of the mind; pastime; a pleasurable occupation of the senses, or that which furnishes it, as dancing, sports or music.

AMUSER, n. s as z. One who amuses, or affords an agreeable entertainment to the mind.

AMUSING, ppr. or a. s as z. Entertaining; giving moderate pleasure to the mind, so as to engage it; pleasing.

AMUSINGLY, adv. s as z. In an amusing manner.

AMUSIVE, a. That has the power to amuse or entertain the mind.

AMYGDALATE, a. [L. amygdalus, an almond.] Made of almonds.

AMYGDALATE, n. An emulsion made of almonds; milk of almonds. Bailey. Cox.

AMYGDALINE, a. Pertaining to or resembling the almond.

AMYGDALITE, n. A plant; a species of spurge, with leaves resembling those of the almond. Ash.

AMYGDALOID, n. [Gr. amygdala, an almond, and ειδος, form; G. mandelstein, almond-stone.]

Toad-stone; a compound rock, consisting of a basis of basalt, greenstone or some other variety of trap, imbedding nodules of various minerals, particularly calcareous spar, quartz, agate, zeolite, chlorite, &c. When the imbedded minerals are detached, it is porous, like lava. Cleveland.

AMYGDALOIDAL, a. Pertaining to amygdaloid.

AMYLACEOUS, a. [L. amylum, starch, of a priv. and μύα, a mill, being formerly made without grinding. Plin. 18. vii.]

Pertaining to starch, or the farinaceous part of grain; resembling starch.

AMYLIN, n. [L. amylum; Gr. αμύλον, unground, α and μύα, mill.]

A farinaceous substance between gum and starch. Webster's Manual.

AMYRALDISM, n. In church history, the doctrine of universal grace, as explained by Amyraldus, or Amyraut, of France, in the seventeenth century. He taught that God desires the happiness of all men, and that none are excluded by a divine decree, but that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance to improve this power.

AMYZ'TLI, n. A Mexican name of the sea-lion, an amphibious quadruped, inhabiting the shores and rivers of America, on the Pacific ocean. Its body is three feet in length, and its tail, two feet. It has a long snout, short legs and crooked nails. Its skin is valued for the length and softness of its hair.

AN, a. [Sax. an, ane, one; D. een; Ger. ein; Sw. and Dan. en; Fr. on, un, une; Sp. un, uno; It. uno, una; L. unus, una, unum; Gr. iv; Ir. ein, eam, aon; W. un, yn; Corn. unyyn; Arm. yman.]

One; noting an individual, either definitely, known, certain, specified, or understood; or indefinitely, not certain, known, or specified. Definitely, as "Noah built an ark of Gopher wood." "Paul was an eminent apostle." Indefinitely, as "Bring me an orange." Before a consonant the letter n is dropped, as a man; but our ancestors wrote an man, an king. This letter represents an definitely, or indefinitely. Definitely, as "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God." Ex. vi. Indefinitely, as "the province of a judge is to decide controversies." An being the same word as one, should not be used with it; "such an one" is tautology; the true phrase is such one. Although an, a and one, are the same word, and always have the same sense, yet by custom, an and a are used exclusively as a definitive adjective, and one is used in numbering. Where our ancestors wrote an, twa, thry, we now use one, two, three. So an and a are never used except with a noun; but one like other adjectives, is sometimes used without its noun, and as a substitute for it; "one is at a loss to assign a reason for such conduct."

AN, in old English authors, signifies if; as, "an it please your honor." So in Gr. an or an, Ar. an, Sam. and L. an, if or whether; Ir. an, Ch. an or an, if, whether. It is probably an imperative, like if; grif, give. Qu. Sax. annan, or anan, to give.

ANA, ad, or a. [Gr. ana.] In medical prescriptions, it signifies an equal quantity of the several ingredients; as, wine and honey, ana, ad or a $\frac{3}{4}$ ii. that is, of wine and honey each two ounces.

ANA, as a termination, is annexed to the names of authors to denote a collection of their memorable sayings. Thus, Scaligerana, is a book containing the sayings of Scaliger. It was used by the Romans, as in Collectanea, collected, gathered.

ANABAPTISM, n. [See Anabaptist.] The doctrine of the Anabaptists.

ANABAPTIST, n. [Gr. ana, again, and baptizō, a baptist.]

One who holds the doctrine of the baptism of adults, or of the invalidity of infant baptism, and the necessity of rebaptization in an adult age. One who maintains that baptism ought always to be performed by immersion.

ANABAPTIST'IC, } a. Relating to the ANABAPTIST'ICAL, } Anabaptists, or to their doctrines.

Vol. I.

ANABAPTISTRY, n. The sect of Anabaptists.

ANABAPTIZE, v. t. To rebaptize. [Not used.]

ANACA, n. A species of parakeet, about the size of a lark; the crown of the head is a dark red, the upper part of the neck, sides, back and wings are green.

ANACAMP'TIC, a. [Gr. ana and καμπτεω, to bend.]

1. Reflecting or reflected; a word formerly applied to that part of optics, which treats of reflection; the same as what is now called catoptric. [See Catoptrics.]

2. Anacamp'tic sounds, among the Greeks, were sounds produced by reflection, as in echoes; or such as proceeded downwards from acute to grave.

ANACAMP'TICS, n. The doctrine of reflected light. [See Catoptrics.]

ANACARDIUM, n. The cashew-nut, or marking nut, which produces a thickish, red, caustic, inflammable liquor, which, when used in marking, turns black, and is very durable.

ANACATHAR'TIC, a. [Gr. ana, upward, and καθαρις, a purging. See Cathartic.] Throwing upwards; cleansing by exciting vomiting, expectoration, &c.

ANACATHAR'TIC, n. A medicine which excites discharges by the mouth, or nose, as expectorants, emetics, sternutories and masticatories.

ANACHORET. [See Anchoret.]

ANACHRONISM, n. [Gr. ana, and χρονος, time.]

An error in computing time; any error in chronology, by which events are misplaced.

ANACHRONIS'TIC, a. Erroneous in date; containing an anachronism.

ANACLAS'TIC, a. [Gr. ana and κλασις, a breaking, from κλωω, to break.]

Refracting; breaking the rectilinear course of light.

Anaclastic glasses, sonorous glasses or phials, which are flexible, and emit a vehement noise by means of the human breath; called also veering glasses, from the fright which their resilience occasions. They are low phials with flat bellies, like inverted tunnels, and with very thin convex bottoms. By drawing out a little air, the bottom springs into a concave form with a smart crack; and by breathing or blowing into them, the bottom, with a like noise, springs into its former convex form.

ANACLAS'TICS, n. That part of optics which treats of the refraction of light, commonly called dioptrics, which see.

ANACENO'SIS, n. [Gr. ανακαινισμις; ana and καινος, common.]

A figure of rhetoric, by which a speaker applies to his opponents for their opinion on the point in debate.

ANACONDA, n. A name given in Ceylon to a large snake, a species of Boa, which is said to devour travelers. Its flesh is excellent food.

ANACREON'TIC, a. Pertaining to Anacreon, a Greek poet, whose odes and epigrams are celebrated for their delicate, easy and graceful air, and for their exact imitation of nature. His verse consists of three feet and a half, usually spondee and iambuses, sometimes anapests; as in this line of Horace.

"Lydia, dic per omnes." Encyc.
ANACREON'TIC, n. A poem composed in the manner of Anacreon.

AN'ADEME, n. [Gr. αναδημα.] A chaplet or crown of flowers.

ANADIPLO'SIS, n. [Gr. ana, again, and διπλος, double.]

Duplication, a figure in rhetoric and poetry, consisting in the repetition of the last word or words in a line or clause of a sentence, in the beginning of the next; as, "he retained his virtues amidst all his misfortunes, misfortunes which no prudence could foresee or prevent."

ANAD'ROMOUS, a. [Gr. ana, upward, and δρομος, course.]

Ascending; a word applied to such fish as pass from the sea into fresh waters, at stated seasons.

AN'AGLYPH, n. [Gr. ana, and γλυφα, to engrave.]

An ornament made by sculpture.

ANAGLYP'TIC, a. Relating to the art of carving, engraving, enchasing or embossing plate.

AN'AGOGÉ, } n. [Gr. αναγωγή, of ana, up-AN'AGOGY, } ward, and αγωγή, a leading, from αγω.]

An elevation of mind to things celestial; the spiritual meaning or application of words; also the application of the types and allegories of the old testament to subjects of the new.

ANAGOG'ICAL, a. Mysterious; elevated; spiritual; as, the rest of the sabbath, in an anagogical sense, signifies the repose of the saints in heaven.

ANAGOG'ICALLY, adv. In a mysterious sense; with religious elevation.

ANAGOG'ICS, n. Mysterious considerations.

AN'AGRAM, n. [Gr. ana, and γραμμα, a letter.]

A transposition of the letters of a name, by which a new word is formed. Thus Galenus becomes angelus; William Noy, (attorney general to Charles I., a laborious man,) may be turned into I moyl in law.

ANAGRAMMAT'IC, } a. Making an ANAGRAMMAT'ICAL, } anagram.

ANAGRAMMAT'ICALLY, adv. In the manner of an anagram.

ANAGRAM'MATISM, n. The act or practice of making anagrams.

ANAGRAM'MATIST, n. A maker of anagrams.

ANAGRAM'MATIZE, v. i. To make anagrams.

AN'AGROS, n. A measure of grain in Spain, containing something less than two bushels.

AN'AL, a. [L. anus.] Pertaining to the anus; as, the anal fig.

ANAL'CIM, } n. Cubic zeolite, found in ANAL'CIME, } aggregated or cubic crystals.

This mineral is generally crystalized, but is also found amorphous, and in reniform, mammillary, laminated or radiated masses.

es. By friction, it acquires a weak electricity; hence its name, Gr. αναλεις, weak.

Cleveland.

AN/ALECTS, n. [Gr. ανα and λεγω, to collect.] A collection of short essays, or remarks.

Encyc.

AN/ALEMMMA, n. [Gr. αναλημμα, altitude.]

1. In geometry, a projection of the sphere on the plane of the meridian, orthographically made by straight lines, circles and ellipses, the eye being supposed at an infinite distance, and in the east or west points of the horizon. Also,

2. An instrument of wood or brass on which this kind of projection is drawn, with a horizon and cursor fitted to it, in which the solstitial colure, and all circles parallel to it, will be concentric circles; all circles oblique to the eye will be ellipses; and all circles whose planes pass through the eye, will be right lines. Encyc. Ash.

ANALEP/SIS, n. [Gr. αναληψις, from αναλαμβάνω, to receive again.]

The augmentation or nutrition of an emaciated body; recovery of strength after a disease. Quincy.

ANALEP/TIC, a. Corroborating; invigorating; giving strength after disease.

ANALEP/TIC, n. A medicine which gives strength, and aids in restoring a body to health after sickness; a restorative.

ANAL/OGAL, a. Analogous. [Not used.]

Hale.

ANALOG/ICAL, a. Having analogy; used by way of analogy; bearing some relation. Thus analogical reasoning is reasoning from some similitude which things known bear to things unknown. An analogical word is one which carries with it some relation to the original idea. Thus the word firm primarily denotes solidity or compactness in a material body; and by analogy, when used of the mind, it conveys the idea of qualities having a similitude to the solidity of bodies, that is, fixedness or immovability. Watts.

ANALOG/ICALLY, adv. In an analogical manner; by way of similitude, relation or agreement. Thus to reason analogically is to deduce inferences from some agreement or relation which things bear to each other.

ANALOG/ICALNESS, n. The quality of being analogical; fitness to be applied for the illustration of some analogy. Johnson.

ANAL/OGISM, n. [Gr. αναλογισμος.]

An argument from the cause to the effect. Johnson.

Investigation of things by the analogy they bear to each other. Crabbe.

ANAL/OGIST, n. One who adheres to analogy.

ANAL/OGIZE, v. t. To explain by analogy; to form some resemblance between different things; to consider a thing with regard to its analogy to something else. Cheyne.

ANAL/OGOUS, a. Having analogy; bearing some resemblance or proportion; followed by to; as, there is something in the exercise of the mind analogous to that of the body.

ANAL/OGY, n. [Gr. αναλογια, of ανα, and λογος, ratio, proportion.]

1. An agreement or likeness between things in some circumstances or effects, when the things are otherwise entirely different.

Thus a plant is said to have life, because its growth resembles in some degree, that of an animal. In life and growth, then, there is an analogy between a plant and an animal. Learning enlightens the mind, because it is to the mind, what light is to the eye, enabling it to discover things before hidden. When the things which have an analogy follow a preposition, that preposition must be between or betwixt; as there is an analogy between plants and animals, or between customs. When one of the things precedes a verb, and the other follows, the preposition used must be to or with; as, a plant has some analogy to or with an animal.

2. With grammarians, analogy is a conformity of words to the genius, structure or general rules of a language. Thus the general rule in English is that the plural of a noun ends in s; therefore all nouns which have that plural termination have an analogy, or are formed in analogy with other words of a like kind. Johnson. Encyc.

ANALYSIS, n. [Gr. αναλυσις, of ανα and λυσις, a loosing, or resolving, from λυω, to loosen. See Loose.]

1. The separation of a compound body into its constituent parts; a resolving; as, an analysis of water, air or oil, to discover its elements.

2. A consideration of any thing in its separate parts; an examination of the different parts of a subject, each separately; as the words which compose a sentence, the notes of a tune, or the simple propositions which enter into an argument. It is opposed to synthesis.

In mathematics, analysis is the resolving of problems by algebraic equations. The analysis of finite quantities is otherwise called algebra, or specious arithmetic. The analysis of infinites is the method of fluxions, or the differential calculus. Encyc.

In logic, analysis is the tracing of things to their source, and the resolving of knowledge into its original principles.

3. A syllabus, or table of the principal heads of a continued discourse, disposed in their natural order.

4. A brief, methodical illustration of the principles of a science. In this sense, it is nearly synonymous with synopsis.

AN/ALYST, n. One who analyzes, or is versed in analysis. Kirwan.

ANALYTIC, a. Pertaining to analysis; that resolves into first principles; that separates into parts or original principles; that resolves a compound body or subject; as, an analytical experiment in chemistry, or an analytical investigation. It is opposed to synthetic.

ANALYTICALLY, adv. In the manner of analysis; by way of separating a body into its constituent parts, or a subject, into its principles.

ANALYTICS, n. The science of analysis. [See Analysis.]

AN/ALYZE, v. t. [Gr. αναλυω. See Analysis.]

To resolve a body into its elements; to separate a compound subject into its parts or propositions, for the purpose of an examination of each separately; as, to analyze a fossil substance; to analyze an action to ascertain its morality.

AN/ALYZED, pp. Resolved into its constituent parts or principles, for examination.

AN/ALYZER, n. One who analyzes; that which analyzes or has the power to analyze.

AN/ALYZING, ppr. Resolving into elements, constituent parts, or first principles.

ANAMORPH/OSIS, n. [Gr. ανα, and μορφησις, formation.]

In perspective drawings, a deformed or distorted portrait or figure, which, in one point of view, is confused or unintelligible, and in another, is an exact and regular representation; or confused to the naked eye, but reflected from a plain or curved mirror, appearing regular, and in right proportion. Johnson. Encyc.

ANA/NAS, n. The name of a species of Bromelia, the pine-apple. Encyc.

AN/APEST, n. [Gr. ανα, and παω, to strike. Bailey.]

In poetry, a foot, consisting of three syllables, the two first short, the last long; the reverse of the dactyl; as,

Can ā bōsōm sō gēntle rēmain

Unmoved when her Corydon sighs?

Shensstone.

ANAPEST/IC, n. The anapestic measure. Bentley.

ANAPEST/IC, a. Pertaining to an anapest; consisting of anapestic feet.

ANAPH/ORA, n. [Gr. from αναφωρεω.]

1. A figure in rhetoric, when the same word or words are repeated at the beginning of two or more succeeding verses or clauses of a sentence; as, "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?" Johnson.

2. Among physicians, the discharge of blood or purulent matter by the mouth. Encyc. Coxe.

ANAPLEROT/IC, a. [Gr. αναπληρωω, to fill.] Filling up; supplying or renovating flesh.

ANAPLEROT/IC, n. A medicine which renews flesh or wasted parts. Encyc. Coxe.

AN/ARCH, n. [See Anarchy.] The author of confusion; one who excites revolt. Milton.

ANARCH/IC, a. Without rule or government; in a state of confusion; applied to a state or society. Fielding uses anarchial, a word of less difficult pronunciation.

AN/ARCHIST, n. An anarch; one who excites revolt, or promotes disorder in a state. Stephens.

AN/ARCHY, n. [Gr. αναρχια, of a priv. and αρχη, rule.]

Want of government; a state of society, when there is no law or supreme power, or when the laws are not efficient, and individuals do what they please with impunity; political confusion.

ANAR/HICHAS, n. The sea wolf; a genus of ravenous fish, of the order of Apodala, found in the northern seas.

AN/NAS, n. [L.] A genus of water fowl of the order Anseres; including the swans, geese, and ducks. The species are very numerous.

ANAS/ARCA, n. [Gr. ανα, in or between, and αρκα, flesh.]

A species of dropsy, from a serous humor spread between the skin and flesh; or an accumulation of lymph in the cellular membrane, occasioning a soft, pale, inelastic swelling of the skin. Quincy. Coxe.

ANAS'ARCOUS, a. Belonging to anasarca, or dropsy; dropsical.

ANASTOMOSE, v. i. s. as z. [Gr. ana, and stoma, mouth.]

To inoculate; to unite the mouth of one vessel with another, as the arteries with the veins. Darwin. Encyc.

ANASTOMO'SY, } The inoculation of ANASTOMO'SIS, } vessels, or the opening of one vessel into another, as an artery into a vein; a relaxation or dilatation of the mouths of vessels; also the communication of two vessels, as a vein with a vein. Quincy. Encyc. Coxe.

ANASTOMOT'IC, a. Opening the mouths of vessels, or removing obstructions.

ANASTOMOT'IC, n. A medicine supposed to have the power of opening the mouths of vessels, and promoting circulation, such as cathartics, deobstruents and sudorifics. Encyc.

ANASTROPHE, } [Gr. anastrophe, a con-
ANASTROPHY, } version or inversion.]

In rhetoric and grammar, an inversion of the natural order of words; as saxa per et scopulos, for per saxa et scopulos. Encyc.

ANATASE, n. [Gr. anataxis, extension, so named from the length of its crystals.]

Octahedrite; octahedral oxyd of titanium; a mineral that shows a variety of colors by reflected light, from indigo blue to reddish brown. It is usually crystalized in acute, elongated, pyramidal octahedrons. Ure. Cleveland.

ANATHEMA, n. [Gr. anathema, from anathemi, to place behind, backward or at a distance, to separate.]

1. Excommunication with curses. Hence, a curse or denunciation by ecclesiastical authority, accompanying excommunication. This species of excommunication was practiced in the ancient churches, against notorious offenders; all churches were warned not to receive them; all magistrates and private persons were admonished not to harbor or maintain them, and priests were enjoined not to converse with them, or attend their funeral.

There are two kinds of anathemas, judicial and abjunctory. The former is pronounced by a council, pope or bishop; the latter is the act of a convert who anathematizes the heresy which he abjures.

2. In heathen mythology, an offering, or present made to some deity and hung up in a temple. Whenever a person quitted his employment, he set apart, or dedicated his tools to his patron-deity. Persons who had escaped danger remarkably, or been otherwise very fortunate, testified their gratitude by some offering to their deity. Encyc.

ANATHEMATICAL, a. Pertaining to anathema.

ANATHEMATICALLY, adv. In the manner of anathema.

ANATHEMATIZATION, n. The act of anathematizing. Encyc.

ANATHEMATIZE, v. t. To excommuni-cate with a denunciation of curses; to pronounce an anathema against. Hammond.

ANATH'EMATIZED, pp. Excommunicated with curses.

ANATH'EMATIZING, ppr. Pronouncing an anathema.

ANATIF'EROUS, a. [L. anas, a duck, and fero, to produce.] Producing ducks. Brown.

ANAT'OCISM, n. [L. anatocismus, from Gr. ana, again, and tokos, usury.]

Interest upon interest; the taking of compound interest; or the contract by which such interest is secured. [Rarely used.] Johnson. Cicero.

ANATOMICAL, a. Belonging to anatomy or dissection; produced by or according to the principles of anatomy, or natural structure of the body; relating to the parts of the body when dissected or separated.

ANATOMICALLY, adv. In an anatomical manner; by means of dissection; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

ANATOMIST, n. One who dissects bodies; more generally, one who is skilled in the art of dissection, or versed in the doctrine and principles of anatomy.

ANATOMIZE, v. t. To dissect an animal; to divide into the constituent parts, for the purpose of examining each by itself; to lay open the interior structure of the parts of a body or subject; as, to anatomize an animal or plant; to anatomize an argument.

ANATOMIZED, pp. Dissected, as an animal body.

ANATOMIZING, ppr. Dissecting.

ANATOMY, n. [Gr. anatomia, of ana, through, and temno, to cut.]

1. The art of dissecting, or artificially separating the different parts of an animal body, to discover their situation, structure and economy.

2. The doctrine of the structure of the body, learned by dissection; as, a physician understands anatomy.

3. The act of dividing any thing, corporeal or intellectual, for the purpose of examining its parts; as, the anatomy of a plant, or of a discourse.

4. The body stripped of its integuments; a skeleton, or the corporeal frame of bones entire, without the skin, flesh and vessels; an improper use of the word, and vulgar.

5. Ironically, a meager person.

ANATREP'TIC, a. [Gr. anatrepto, to overturn.]

Overthrowing; defeating; prostrating; a word applied to the dialogues of Plato, which represent a complete defeat in the gymnastic exercises. Enfield.

AN'ATRON, n. [from Gr. nitron, niter.]

1. Soda or mineral fixed alkali.

2. Spume or glass gall, a scum which rises upon melted glass, in the furnace, and when taken off, dissolves in the air, and then coagulates into common salt.

3. The salt which collects on the walls of vaults. Johnson. Coxe.

AN'BURY, n. A disease in turneps, or an injury occasioned by a fly.

ANCESTOR, n. [Fr. ancestres, ancetres; L. antecessor, of ante, before, and cedo, to go.]

One from whom a person descends, either by the father or mother, at any distance of time, in the tenth or hundredth generation. An ancestor precedes in the order of nature or blood; a predecessor, in the order of office.

ANCES'TRAL, a. Relating or belonging to ancestors; claimed or descending from ancestors; as, an ancestral estate.

ANCESTRY, n. A series of ancestors, or progenitors; lineage, or those who compose the line of natural descent. Hence, birth or honorable descent. Addison.

AN'CHILOPS, n. [Gr. anichlos, from an, a goat, and ochlos, an eye. Qu.]

The goat's eye; an abscess in the inner angle of the eye; an incipient fistula lachrymalis. Encyc. Coxe.

AN'CHOR, n. [L. anchora; Gr. anchora; It. and Port. ancora; Sp. anda; D. G. Dan. anker; Sw. anchare; Ir. ankaire, ancoir or ingir; Corn. ankar; Ar. ankar; Pers. anghar; Russ. iacor; Fr. ancre; Arm. ancor.]

1. An iron instrument for holding a ship or other vessel at rest in water. It is a strong shank, with a ring at one end, to which a cable may be fastened; and with two arms and flukes at the other end, forming a suitable angle with the shank to enter the ground.

In seamen's language, the anchor comes home, when it is dislodged from its bed, so as to drag by the violence of the wind, sea or current.

Foul anchor is when the anchor hooks or is entangled with another anchor, or with a wreck or cable, or when the slack cable is entangled.

The anchor a cock bill, is when it is suspended perpendicularly from the cat head, ready to be let go.

The anchor a peek, is when it is drawn in so tight as to bring the ship directly over it. The anchor is a trip, or a weigh, when it is just drawn out of the ground, in a perpendicular direction, either by the cable or the buoy-rope.

To back an anchor is to lay down a small anchor ahead of that by which the ship rides, with the cable fastened to the crown of the latter to prevent its coming home.

At anchor is when a ship rides by her anchor. Hence, to lie or ride at anchor.

To cast anchor, or to anchor, is to let go an anchor, to keep a ship at rest.

To weigh anchor is to heave or raise the anchor out of the ground.

Anchors are of different sizes. The principal, and that on which most dependence is placed, is the sheet anchor. Then come the best bower, the small bower, the spare anchor, the stream anchor, and the kedg anchor, which is the smallest. Mar. Dict.

2. In a figurative sense, that which gives stability or security; that on which we place dependence for safety.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast. Heb. vi.

3. In architecture, anchors are carved work, somewhat resembling an anchor. It is commonly a part of the ornaments of the bouldins of capitals in the Tuscan, Doric and Ionic orders, and on the moldings of cornices.

In heraldry, anchors are emblems of hope. Encyc.

AN'CHOR, v. t. To place at anchor; to moor; as to anchor a ship.

2. To fix or fasten on; to fix in a stable condition.

AN'CHOR, v. i. To cast anchor; to come to anchor; as, our ship anchored off the isle of Wight.

2. To stop; to fix or rest on.

AN'CHORABLE, a. Fit for anchorage. [Not used.] Herbert.

AN'CHORAGE, n. Anchor-ground; a place where a ship can anchor, where the ground is not too rocky, nor the water too deep nor too shallow.

2. The hold of a ship at anchor, or rather the anchor and all the necessary tackle for anchoring.

3. A duty imposed on ships for anchoring in a harbor.

AN'CHORED, pp. Lying or riding at anchor; held by an anchor; moored; fixed in safety.

AN'CHORESS, n. A female anchoress.

AN'CHORET, or AN'CHORITE, n. [Gr. αγκυρετης, from αγκυρα, to retire, of ανα, and χωμα, to go. Written by some authors, anachoret.]

A hermit; a recluse; one who retires from society into a desert or solitary place, to avoid the temptations of the world and devote himself to religious duties. Also a monk, who, with the leave of the abbot, retires to a cave or cell, with an allowance from the monastery, to live in solitude. Encyc.

AN'CHOR-GROUND, n. Ground suitable for anchoring.

AN'CHOR-HOLD, n. The hold or fastness of an anchor; security.

AN'CHORING, pp. Mooring; coming to anchor; casting anchor.

AN'CHOR-SMITH, n. The maker or forger of anchors, or one whose occupation is to make anchors.

ANCHO'VY, } [Port. and Sp. anchova;
AN'CHOVY, } Fr. anchois; It. acciuga;
G. anchore.]

A small fish, about three inches in length, of the genus Clupea, found and caught, in vast numbers, in the Mediterranean, and pickled for exportation. It is used as a sauce or seasoning.

ANCHO'VY-PEAR, n. A fruit of Jamaica, constituting the genus Grias. It is large, contains a stone, and is esculent.

AN'CIENT, a. Usually pronounced most anomalously, ancient. The pronunciation of the first vowel ought to accord with that in antiquity, anger, anchor, &c. [Fr. ancien; It. anziano, anzi; from L. ante, antiquus.]

1. Old; that happened or existed in former times, usually at a great distance of time; as, ancient authors, ancient days. Old, says Johnson, relates to the duration of the thing itself, as an old coat; and ancient, to time in general, as an ancient dress. But this distinction is not always observed. We say, in old times, as well as ancient times; old customs, &c. In general, however, ancient is opposed to modern, and old to new, fresh or recent. When we speak of a thing that existed formerly, which has ceased to exist, we commonly use ancient, as ancient republics, ancient heroes, and not old republics, old heroes. But when the thing which began or existed in former times, is still in existence, we use either ancient or old; as, ancient statues or paintings, or old statues or paintings; ancient authors, or old authors, meaning books. But in these examples ancient seems the most correct, or best authorized. Some persons apply ancient to men advanced in years still living; but this use is not common in modern practice, though found in scripture.

With the ancient is wisdom. Job.
2. Old; that has been of long duration; as, an ancient forest; an ancient city.

3. Known from ancient times; as the ancient continent, opposed to the new continent. Robertson.

AN'CIENT, n. [Supra.] Generally used in the plural, ancients. Those who lived in former ages, opposed to moderns.

In scripture, very old men. Also, governors, rulers, political and ecclesiastical.

The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people. Isa. lii. Jer. xix.

God is called the Ancient of days from his eternal existence. Dan. vii.

Hooker uses the word for seniors, "They were his ancients," but the use is not authorized.

2. Ancient is also used for a flag or streamer, in a ship of war; and for an ensign or the bearer of a flag, as in Shakespeare. Cowel supposes the word, when used for a flag, to be a corruption of end-sheet, a flag at the stern. It is probably the Fr. enseigne. Johnson. Cowel. Encyc.

Ancient demain, in English Law, is a tenure by which all manors belonging to the crown, in the reign of William the Conqueror, were held. The numbers, names, &c. of these were all entered in a book called Domes-day Book. Cowel. Blackstone.

AN'CIENTLY, adv. In old times; in times long since past; as Rome was anciently more populous than at present.

AN'CIENTNESS, n. The state of being ancient; antiquity; existence from old times.

AN'CIENTRY, n. Dignity of birth; the honor of ancient lineage.

Spenser on Ireland. Shak.

AN'CIENTY, n. Age; antiquity. [Not in use.] Martin.

AN'CIENTY, n. In some old English statutes and authors, eldership or seniority. 14. Hen. III.

AN'CILLARY, a. [L. ancilla, a female servant.]

Pertaining to a maid servant, or female service; subservient as a maid servant. Blackstone.

ANCIP'ITAL, a. [L. anceps.]

Doubtful, or double; double-faced or double-formed; applied to the stem of a plant, it signifies a two edged stem, compressed and forming two opposite angles. Barton's Elem. of Botany. Lec.

AN'COME, n. A small ulcerous swelling coming suddenly. Boucher.

AN'CON, n. [L. ancon; Gr. αγκων, the elbow.]

The olecranon, the upper end of the ulna, or elbow. Coze.

AN'CON, n. [Lat. ancon, Gr. αγκων.] In architecture, the corner of a wall, cross-beam or rafter. Encyc.

AN'CONY, n. [Probably from αγκων, the cubit, from its resemblance to the arm.]

In iron works, a piece of half wrought iron, in the shape of a bar in the middle, but rude and unwrought at the ends. A piece of cast iron is melted off and hammered at a forge, into a mass of two feet long and square, which is called a bloom; then, carried to a finery, and worked into an ancony; it is then sent to a chafery, where the ends are wrought into the shape of the middle, and the whole is made into a bar. Encyc.

AND, conj. [Sax. and; Ger. und; D. ende or en; and.]

And is a conjunction, connective or conjoining word. It signifies that a word or part of a sentence is to be added to what precedes. Thus, give me an apple and an orange; that is, give me an apple, add or give in addition to that, an orange. John and Peter and James rode to New-York, that is, John rode to New-York; add or further, Peter rode to New-York; add James rode to New-York.

AN'DALUSITE, n. A massive mineral, of a flesh or rose red color; sometimes found crystalized in imperfect four-sided prisms, nearly or quite rectangular. Its hardness is nearly equal to that of Corundum, and it is infusible by the blow pipe. It has its name from Andalusia, in Spain, where it was first discovered. Werner. Brongniart.

ANDANTE, [It. from andare, to go; Eng. to wend, to wander.]

In music, a word used to direct to a movement moderately slow, between largo and allegro. Encyc.

AN'DARAC, n. Red orpiment. Coze.

AN'DEAN, a. Pertaining to the Andes, the great chain of mountains extending through S. America. Columbiad, 3, 138.

ANDI'RA, n. A species of bat in Brazil, nearly as large as a pigeon. Dict. Nat. Hist.

AND'IRON, n. [Teutonic, andena, or andela. In Sax. the corresponding word is brand-isen, brand or fire iron; D. brand-izer. The Fr. landier, Arm. lander, Junius thinks, is our and-iron, with the French l prefixed.]

An iron utensil used, in Great Britain, where coal is the common fuel, to support the ends of a spit; but in America, used to support the wood in fire places.

ANDORIN'HA, n. The Brazilian swallow. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

ANDRANAT'OMY, n. [Gr. αντρον, ανδρος, a man, and αντομη, dissection.]

The dissection of a human body, especially of a male. Coze. Quincy.

AN'DREOLITE, n. A mineral, the hariontome, or cross-stone. Ure.

ANDROG'YNAL, } a. [Gr. ανδρ, a man,
ANDROG'YNOUS, } and γυνη, woman.]

Having two sexes; being male and female; hermaphroditical.

In botany, the word is applied to plants which bear both male and female flowers, from the same root, as birch, walnut, oak, chesnut, mulberry, &c. These plants constitute the monecian class in Linne's system, and frequently have an amentum, thong or catkin, for a calyx. Milne.

ANDROG'YNALLY, adv. With the parts of both sexes.

ANDROG'YNUS, n. A hermaphrodite. Johnson.

AN'DROID, n. [Gr. ανδρ, man, and ειδος, form.]

A machine, in the human form, which, by certain springs, performs some of the natural motions of a living man. One of these machines, invented by M. Vaucanson, appeared at Paris in 1738, representing a flute player.

ANDROMEDA, n. A northern constellation, behind Pegasus, Cassiopeia and Perseus, representing the figure of a woman chained. The stars in this constellation, in Ptolemy's catalogue, are 23; in Tycho's, 22; in Bayer's, 27; in Flamsteed's, 84.

2. The name of a celebrated tragedy of Euripides, now lost.

ANDROPHAGI, n. [Gr. ανθρωπος, man, and φαγω, to eat.]

Man-eaters; but the word is little used, being superseded by anthropophagi, which see. Herodotus mentions people of this character.

ANÆAR, prep. Near.

ANÆCOTE, n. [Gr. αἰνῶς, priv. and αἰνῶς, to publish, part. αἰνῶς, given out.]

In its original sense, secret history, or facts not generally known. But in more common usage, a particular or detached incident or fact of an interesting nature; a biographical incident; a single passage of private life. Procopius gave the title of anecdotes to a book he published against Justinian and his wife Theodora; and similar collections of incidents in the lives of eminent men are now common.

ANÆCOTICAL, a. Pertaining to anecdotes.

ANÆLE, v. t. [Sax. ell, oil.]

To give extreme unction. [Not used.]

ANEMOGRAPHY, n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and γραφη, description.]

A description of the winds.

ANEMOLOGY, n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and λογος, discourse.]

The doctrine of winds, or a treatise on the subject.

ANEMOMETER, n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and μετρον, to measure.]

An instrument or machine for measuring the force and velocity of the wind.

ANEMONE, n. [Gr. ανημωνη, from ανεμος, wind, and ωνη, wind. It was by the ancient Greeks written ανημωνια. Theoph. Lib. 6. Ca. 7. Plin. 21, 23. Venus is said to have changed her Adonis into an anemone. Ovid. Metam. Lib. 10, 735.]

Wind-flower; a genus of plants of numerous species. Some of the species are cultivated in gardens, of which their double flowers are among the most elegant ornaments.

See Anemone. See Animal Flower.

ANEMOSCOPE, n. [Gr. ανεμος, wind, and σκοπος, to view.]

A machine which shows the course or velocity of the wind.

ANENT, prep. About; concerning; over against; a Scottish word. Qu. Gr. εναντιον.

ANÆURISM, n. [Gr. ανω, and ευρισκω, to dilate, from ευρος, broad.]

A preternatural dilatation or rupture of the coats of an artery. This is encysted or diffused. The encysted aneurism is when the coats of the artery being only dilated, the blood is confined to its proper coat. Of this kind is the varicose. The diffused aneurism includes all those in which, from an aperture in the artery, the blood is spread about in the cellular membrane, out of its proper course. Quincy. Coxe.

ANÆURIS'MAL, a. Pertaining to an aneurism.

ANEW, adv. [a and new.]

Over again; another time; in a new form; as, to arm anew; to create anew.

ANFRAC'TUOUS, a. [L. anfractus, of amb, about, and fractus, broken. See Break.]

Winding; full of windings and turnings; written less correctly, anfractuose. Ray.

ANFRAC'TUOUSNESS, n. A state of being full of windings and turnings.

ANGARIA'TION, n. [L. angario; Gr. αγγαρειναι, to compel; a word of Persian origin.]

Compulsion; exertion. [Not used.]

ANGEIO'TOMY, n. See Angiotomy.

ANG'EL, n. Usually pronounced angel, but most anomalously. [L. angelus, Gr. αγγελος, a messenger, from αγγελω, to tell or announce; Ir. agalla, agallaim, to speak or tell; from the root of call, or of Ar.

to say, to tell. Sax. angel; Ir. aingeal, or aingiol; D. G. Sw. Dan. engel; Sp. angel; It. angelo; Port. anjo; Fr. ange; Russ. angel.]

1. Literally, a messenger; one employed to communicate news or information from one person to another at a distance. But appropriately,

2. A spirit, or a spiritual intelligent being employed by God to communicate his will to man. Hence angels are ministers of God, and ministering spirits. Heb. 1.

3. In a bad sense, an evil spirit; as, the angel of the bottomless pit. Math. xxv. 1 Cor. vi. Rev. ix.

4. Christ, the mediator and head of the church. Rev. x.

5. A minister of the gospel, who is an ambassador of God. Rev. ii. and iii.

6. Any being whom God employs to execute his judgments. Rev. xvi. Cruden.

7. In the style of love, a very beautiful person. Shak.

ANG'EL, n. A fish found on the coast of Carolina, of the thoracic order and genus Chaetodon. It has a small projecting mouth; the lamens above the gills are armed with cerulean spines; the body, a foot in length, appears as if cut off, and waved, and covered with large green scales. Pennant from Catesby.

ANG'EL, n. A gold coin formerly current in England, bearing the figure of an angel. Skinner says, this device was impressed upon it in allusion to an observation of Pope Gregory the Great, who, seeing some beautiful English youths, in the market at Rome, asked who they were; being told they were Angli, English, he replied, they ought rather to be called angeli, angels. This coin had different values under different princes; but is now an imaginary sum or money of account, implying ten shillings sterling. Encyc.

ANG'EL, a. Resembling angels; angelic; as, angel whiteness. Shak.

ANGEL-AGE, n. The existence or state of angels. Beaumont, &c.

ANG'EL-FISH, n. A species of shark, the squalus squatina. It is from six to eight feet long, with a large head, teeth broad at the base, but slender and sharp above, disposed in five rows, all round the jaws. The fish takes its name from its pectoral fins, which are very large and extend horizontally, like wings when spread. This fish connects the genus of rays, with that of sharks, partaking of the characters of both; but it differs from both in this, that its mouth is placed at the extremity of the head. Encyc.

ANGEL'IC, } a. [L. angelicus.] Resem-

ANGEL'ICAL, } bling angels; belonging to angels, or partaking of their nature; suiting the nature and dignity of angels.

ANGEL'ICA, n. A genus of digynian pentandrous, containing several species. The common sort is cultivated for medicinal uses. It grows naturally in northern climates, and has large umbels of a globose figure. The roots have a fragrant aromatic smell, and are used in the aromatic sweetmeat. The stalks make an agreeable sweetmeat. Encyc.

ANGEL'ICALLY, adv. Like an angel.

ANGEL'ICALNESS, n. The quality of being angelic; excellence more than human.

ANG'ELITES, in Church history, so called from Angelicum in Alexandria, where they held their first meetings, a sect of heretics near the close of the 5th century, who held the persons of the trinity not to be the same, nor to exist by their own nature; but each to be a God, existing by participating of a deity common to them all. They are called also Severites, from Severus, their head; and Theodosians, from one Theodosius, whom they made their Pope. Encyc.

ANG'EL-LIKE, a. Resembling or having the manners of angels.

ANGELOL'OGY, n. [Angel and λογος.]

A discourse on angels; or the doctrine of angelic beings. Ch. Spectator.

ANG'ELLOT, n. [Fr. anche, the reed of a hautboy or other instrument of music.]

1. An instrument of music, somewhat resembling a lute. Johnson.

2. An ancient English coin struck at Paris while under the dominion of England; so called from the figure of an angel supporting the escutcheon of the arms of England and France. Also, a small rich sort of cheese made in Normandy. Encyc.

ANG'EL-SHOT, n. [Fr. ange, a chain-shot.]

Chain-shot, being two halves of a cannon ball fastened to the ends of a chain.

ANG'EL-WINGED, a. Winged like angels. Thomson.

ANG'EL-WORSHIP, n. The worshipping of angels. Trapp.

ANG'ER, n. ang'ger. [L. ango, to choke, strangle, vex; whence angor, vexation, anguish, the quinsy, angina. Gr. αγγω, to strangle, to strain or draw together, to vex. The primary sense is to press, squeeze, make narrow; Gr. αγγω, near; Sax. enge; G. enge; D. Dan. eng, narrow, strait; W. ing. This word may be connected in origin with the Ar.

حَنَّان hanika, to be angry, and حَنَّان chanaka, to strangle; Heb. Ch. Syr. Eth.

פָּרַח, to strangle. In Sax. ange signifies angulo; It. angolo. The German has angeln, for angling with a hook; but in D. hengel is the rod, and hengelen, to angle. Qu. hinge and hang.]

A popular language, the point where two lines meet, or the meeting of two lines in a point; a corner.

In geometry, the space comprised between two straight lines that meet in a point, or between two straight converging lines which, if extended, would meet; or the quantity by which two straight lines, departing from a point, diverge from each other. The point of meeting is the vertex of the angle, and the lines, containing the angle, are its sides or legs.

In optics, the angle of incidence is the angle, which a ray of light makes with a perpendicular to the surface, or to that point of the surface on which it falls.

The angle of refraction is the angle which a ray of light refracted makes with the surface of the refracting medium; or rather with a perpendicular to that point of the surface on which it falls. Encyc.

A right angle, is one formed by a right line falling on another perpendicularly, or an angle of 90 degrees, making the quarter of a circle.

An obtuse angle is greater than a right angle, or more than 90 degrees.

An acute angle is less than a right angle or less than 90 degrees.

A rectilineal or right-lined angle, is formed by two right lines.

A curvilineal angle, is formed by two curved lines.

A mixed angle is formed by a right line with a curved line.

Adjacent or contiguous angles are such as have one leg common to both angles, and both together are equal to two right angles.

External angles are angles of any right-lined figure without it, when the sides are produced or lengthened.

Internal angles are those which are within any right-lined figure.

Oblique angles are either acute or obtuse, in opposition to right angles.

A solid angle is the meeting of three or more plain angles at one point.

A spherical angle is one made by the meeting of two arches of great circles, which mutually cut one another on the surface of the globe or sphere. Bailey.

AN'GLE, n. A hook; an instrument to take fish, consisting of a rod, a line and a hook, or a line and hook.

AN'GLE, v. i. To fish with an angle, or with line and hook.

2. v. t. or i. To fish for; to try to gain by some bait or insinuation, as men angle for fish; as, to angle for the hearts of people, or to angle hearts. Shak. Sidney.

AN'GLED, a. Having angles—used only in compounds.

AN'GLER, n. One that fishes with an angle; also a fish, a species of lophius.

AN'GLE-ROD, n. The rod or pole to which a line and hook are fastened.

AN'GLIC, } a. [From Angles, Sax. ing.

AN'GLICAN, } a plain or meadow, and lic, like, or æcos, like, which is the root of the L. icius, in publicus, and all similar adjectives. From ing, was formed Angles, the English, to which is added this common affix, ic. The Angles, were the Ingevoones, of Tacitus, ing-wonens, dwellers on the plain or level land, near the Elbe and Weser. [See English and Went.] Ing is annexed to many English names, as Reading, Basing, Killing, towns situated on flat land.]

In astronomy, a cluster of stars in the form of a man holding a serpent; Serpentarius, one of the twelve signs of the zodiac. Ash.

ANGUIL'LA, n. [L. an eel.]

In zoology, an eel; also the name of a Mediterranean fish used for food, called also hospetus and atherina. Qu. Atherina Hepsetus, Linne. Dict. Nat. Hist.

ANGUIL'LIFORM, a. [L. anguilla, an eel, and forma, shape.]

In the form of an eel, or of a serpent; resembling an eel or serpent.

ANGUISH, n. [Fr. angoisse; It. angoscia; Sp. angia; Port. angustia, showing the direct derivation of this word from L. angustia, narrowness, from pressure; D. and G. angst; Dan. angest. This and a numerous class of words are from the root ang, eng, denoting narrow, from pressure. See Anger.]

Extreme pain, either of body or mind. As bodily pain, it may differ from agony, which is such distress of the whole body as to cause contortion, whereas anguish may be a local pain as of an ulcer, or gout. But anguish and agony are nearly synonymous. As pain of the mind, it signifies any keen distress from sorrow, remorse, despair and the kindred passions. And they hearkened not to Moses, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage. Ex. vi.

ANGUISH, v. t. To distress with extreme pain or grief. Temple.

ANGUISHED, pp. Extremely pained; tortured; deeply distressed.

ANGULAR, a. Having an angle, angles or corners; pointed; as an angular figure.

ANGUSTATION, n. [L. angustus, narrow. See Anger.]

The act of making narrow; a straightening, or being made narrow. Wiseman.

ANGUSTICLAVE, n. [L. angustus, narrow, and clavus, a knob or stud.]

A robe or tunic embroidered with purple studs or knobs, or by purple stripes, worn by Roman knights. The laticlave, with broader studs, was worn by senators.

ANGUSTILIAN, n. Kennet.

ANHELATION, n. [L. anhelo, to pant or breathe with difficulty; from halo, to breathe.]

Shortness of breath; a panting; difficult respiration, without fever, or with a sense of suffocation. Encyc. Core.

ANHELOSE, a. Out of breath; panting; breathing with difficulty. [Little used.] Dict.

ANHIMA, n. A Brazilian aquatic fowl, larger than a swan, somewhat like a crane. Its head is small, its bill black, the toes armed with long claws. But what is remarkable, is a horn growing from its forehead; and the second joint of the wing is armed with two straight triangular spurs, an inch in length. The fidelity between the male and female is so great, that when one dies, the other remains by the carcase, till it expires. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

ANHYDRITE, n. [See Anhydrous.]

A species of sulphate of lime, anhydrous gypsum, of which there are several varieties; compact, granular, fibrous, radiated, sparry, siliciferous or vulpinite, and convoluted. Jameson. Ure.

ANHYDROUS, a. [Gr. anōpos, dry; a priv. and vdw, water.]

Destitute of water. Anhydrite is so called, because it is destitute of the water of crystallization. Cleaveland.

ANILITY, n. [L. anilis, anilitas, from anus, an old woman; Celtic, hen, old.]

The state of being an old woman; the old age of a woman; dotage.

ANIMADVERSION, n. [L. animadversio.]

Remarks by way of censure or criticism; reproof; blame. It may sometimes be used for punishment, or punishment may be implied in the word, but this is not common. In an ecclesiastical sense, it differs from censure, says Ayliffe; censure, respecting spiritual punishment, and animadversion, a temporal one. Glanville uses the word in the sense of perception, but this use is not authorized.

ANIMADVERSIVE, a. That has the power of perceiving. Obs. Glanville.

ANIMADVERT, v. i. [L. animadverto, of animus, mind, and adverto, to turn to.]

1. To turn the mind to; to consider.

ANIMADVERTER, n. One who animadverts or makes remarks by way of censure.

ANIMADVERTING, ppr. Considering; remarking by way of criticism or censure.

ANIMAL, n. [L. animal, from anima, air, breath, soul; Gaelic anam, breath. The W. has eniv, en, a being, soul, spirit, and mil, a beast; Arm. aneval. Qu. Dan. aande, Sw. anda, breath.]

An organized body, endowed with life and the power of voluntary motion; a living, sensitive, locomotive body; as, man is an intelligent animal. Animals are essentially distinguished from plants by the property of sensation. The contractile property of some plants, as the mimosa, has the appearance of the effect of sensation, but it may be merely the effect of irritability.

The distinction here made between animals and vegetables, may not be philosophically accurate; for we cannot perhaps ascertain the precise limit between the two kinds of beings, but this is sufficiently correct for common practical purposes.

The history of animals is called zoology.

By way of contempt, a dull person is called a stupid animal.

ANIMAL, a. That belongs or relates to animals; as animal functions.

Animal is distinguished from intellectual; as animal appetites, the appetites of the body, as hunger and thirst.

The animal functions, are touch, taste, motion, &c.

Animal life is opposed to vegetable life.

Animal is opposed also to spiritual or rational, which respects the soul and reasoning faculties; as animal nature, spiritual nature, rational nature.

Animal food may signify that food which nourishes animals; but it usually denotes food consisting of animal flesh.

Animal economy is the system of laws by which the bodies of animals are governed and depending on their organic structure.

Animal spirit is a name given to the nervous fluid.

Animal spirits in the plural, life, vigor, energy.

Animal system, or animal kingdom denotes the whole class of beings endowed with animal life. Encyc. Johnson.

ANIMALCULE, n. [L. animalculum, animalcula.]

A little animal; but appropriately, an animal whose figure cannot be discerned without the aid of a magnifying glass; such as are invisible to the naked eye. Encyc.

ANIMAL-FLOWER, n. In zoology, sea-anemone, sea-nettle or urtica marina, the name of several species of animals belonging to the genus actinia. They are called sea-nettle from their supposed property of stinging, and sea-anemone from the resemblance of their claws or tentacles, to the petals of some flowers. These are disposed in regular circles, and tinged with various bright colors. Some of these animals are hemispherical, others cylindrical; others are shaped like a fig. Some are stiff and gelatinous; others, fleshy and muscular; but all can alter their figure by extending their claws in search of food. These animals can move slowly, but are generally fixed by one end to rocks or stones in the sand. On the other extremity, is the mouth in the center, which is surrounded by rows of fleshy claws and capable of great dilatation. They are very voracious, and will swallow a muscle, or crab, as large as a hen's egg. Encyc.

The term, Animal Flower, is also extended to many other marine animals, from their resemblance to flowers. They belong to the Holothurias, which with the Actinias, were ranged under the Molluscas, by Linne; and to the Tubularias and Hydras, which were classed with the Zoophytes. They are all arranged under the Zoophytes, by Cuvier. Cyc.

ANIMALIZATION, n. The act of giving animal life, or endowing with the properties of an animal. Ure. Med. Repos.

ANIMALIZE, v. t. To give animal life to; to endow with the properties of animals.

ANIMALIZED, pp. Endowed with animal life.

ANIMALIZING, ppr. Giving animal life to.

ANIMATE, v. t. [L. animare. See Animal.]

1. To give natural life to; to quicken; to make alive; as, the soul animates the body.

2. To give powers to, or to heighten the ANK'LE-BONE, n. The bone of the ankle.

ANNALIST, n. [See Annals.]

A writer of annals.

ANNALIZE, v. t. To record; to write annals. [Not much used.] Encyc.

ANNALS, n. plu. [L. annales, annalis, from annus, a year, the root of which may be the Celtic an, ain, a great circle. Varro says the word annus signifies a great circle.]

1. A species of history digested in order of time, or a relation of events in chronological order, each event being recorded under the year in which it happened. Annals differ from history, in merely relating events, without observations on the motives, causes and consequences, which, in history, are more diffusively illustrated.

2. The books containing annals, as the annals of Tacitus.

ANNATS, n. [L. annus.]

A year's income of a spiritual living; the first fruits, originally given to the Pope, upon the decease of a bishop, abbot or parish clerk, and paid by his successor. In England, they were, at the reformation, vested in the king, and in the reign of Queen Anne, restored to the church, and appropriated to the augmentation of poor livings. Encyc.

ANNE'AL, v. t. [Sax. analan, on-alan, to kindle or inflame, to heat; from alan, to kindle, to heat or bake, and to anoint with oil. Sax. al, oil. Hence it may be inferred that oil is named from inflaming or burning.]

1. To heat; to heat, as glass and iron for the purpose of rendering them less brittle, or to fix colors; vulgarly called nealing. This is done by heating the metal nearly to fluidity, in an oven or furnace, and suffering it to cool gradually. Metals made hard and brittle by hammering, by this process recover their malleability. The word is applied also to the baking of tiles. Encyc. Bailey. Ash.

2. To temper by heat; and Shenstone uses it for tempering by cold.

ANNE'AL'D, pp. Heated; tempered; made malleable and less brittle by heat.

ANNE'ALING, ppr. Heating; tempering by heat.

ANNEX', v. t. [L. annecto, annexum; Fr. annexer; of ad and necto, to tie, or connect.]

1. To unite at the end; as to annex a codicil to a will. To subjoin, to affix.

2. To unite, as a smaller thing to a greater; as to annex a province to a kingdom.

3. To unite to something preceding, as the main object; to connect with; as to an- nex a penalty to a prohibition, or punishment to guilt.

ANNEX', v. i. To join; to be united.

Tooke.

ANNEXA'TION, n. The act of annexing, or uniting at the end; conjunction; addition; the act of connecting; union. In English law, the uniting of lands or rents to the crown.

ANNEX'ED, pp. Joined at the end; connected with; affixed.

ANNEX'ING, ppr. Uniting at the end; affixing.

ANNEX'ION, n. The act of annexing; annexation; addition. [Little used.]

ANNEX'MENT, n. The act of annexing; the thing annexed. Shak.

ANNI'HILABLE, a. That may be annihilated.

ANNI'HILATE, v. t. [L. ad and nihilum, nothing, of ne, not, and hilum, a trifle.]

1. To reduce to nothing; to destroy the existence of.

No human power can annihilate matter.

2. To destroy the form or peculiar distinctive properties, so that the specific thing no longer exists; as, to annihilate a forest by cutting and carrying away the trees, though the timber may still exist; to annihilate a house by demolishing the structure.

ANNI'HILATED, pp. Reduced to nothing; destroyed.

ANNI'HILATING, ppr. Reducing to nothing; destroying the specific form of.

ANNI'HILA'TION, n. The act of reducing to nothing or non-existence; or the act of destroying the form or combination of parts under which a thing exists, so that the name can no longer be applied to it, as the annihilation of a corporation.

2. The state of being reduced to nothing.

ANNIVERS'ARILY, adv. Annually. Hall.

ANNIVERS'ARY, a. [L. anniversarius, of annus, year, and verto, to turn.]

Returning with the year, at a stated time; annual; yearly; as an anniversary feast.

ANNIVERS'ARY, n. A stated day returning with the revolution of the year. The term is applied to a day on which some remarkable event is annually celebrated, or a day on which an interesting event is commemorated by solemnities of religion, or exhibitions of respect. In the Romish church, a day in which an office is yearly performed for the souls of the deceased.

2. The act of celebration; performance in honor of an event. Dryden.

ANNO DOMINI. [L.] In the year of our Lord, noting the time from our Savior's incarnation; as, Anno Domini, or A. D. 1800.

This was written Anno Domini, 1809, and revised A. D. 1825 and 1827. W.

ANNOMINA'TION, n. [L. ad and nominatio, from nominare, to name, from nomen.]

1. A pun; the use of words nearly alike in sound, but of different meanings; a paronomasy. Encyc.

2. Alliteration, or the use of two or more words successively beginning with the same letter. Tyrwhitt.

2. Pertaining to the answers.

AN'SERS, n. In Linne's system, the third order of aves or fowls, whose characteristics are a smooth bill, broadest at the point, covered with a smooth skin, and furnished with teeth. The tongue is fleshy, and the toes are webbed or palmated. It includes all the web-footed water fowls, with legs and feet adapted to swimming.

AN SLAUGHT, n. [See Slay.] An attack; an affray. [Not in use.]

ANSWER, v. t. ansur. [Sax. andswarian, of anti, against, and Sax. swaran, or swarian or swerigan, Goth. swaran, to swear.]

The primitive sense of swear was merely to speak or affirm, and hence, originally, oath was used after it, to swear an oath, which is not a pleonasm, as Lye supposes, but the primitive form of expression retained. The sense of answer is an opposite, a returned word or speech. Hence we observe the Saxon has andwyrð, anti-word, an answer; Goth. andawaurd; D.

anticoord; Ger. antwort.]

1. To speak in return to a call or question, or to a speech, declaration or argument of another person : as, " I have called and ye have not answered." " He answered the question or the argument." This may be in agreement and confirmation of what was said, or in opposition to it.

2. To be equivalent to; to be adequate to, or sufficient to accomplish the object. "Money answereth all things," noting, primarily, return.

3. To comply with, fulfill, pay or satisfy ; as, he answered my order ; to answer a debt.

4. To act in return, or opposition ; as, the enemy answered our fire by a shower of grape-shot.

5. To bear a due proportion to ; to be equal or adequate ; to suit ; as, a weapon does not answer the size and strength of the man using it ; the success does not answer our expectation.

6. To perform what was intended; to accomplish; as, the measure does not answer its end; it does not answer the purpose.

7. To be opposite to; to face; as, fire answers fire. Shak.
8. To write in reply; to reply to another

9. To solve, as a proposition or problem in writing, by way of explanation, refutation or justification ; as, to answer a pamphlet.

This word may be applied to a great variety of objects, expressing the idea of a return; as the notes, or sounds of birds, and other animals; an echo, &c.

ANSWER, v. i. To reply; to speak by way

ANSWER-JOBBER, n. One who makes a business of writing answers. Swift.

ANT, in old authors, is a contraction of ant, that is, if it. [See An.]

ANT, in our vulgar dialect, as in the phrases, I ant, you ant, he ant, we ant, &c., is undoubtedly a contraction of the Danish er, ere, the substantive verb, in the present tense of the Indicative Mode, and not, I er-not, we ere-not, he er-not, or of the Swedish ar, the same verb, Infinitive vara, to be. These phrases are doubtless legitimate remains of the Gothic dialect.

ANT, n. [Sax. æmet, emmet, contracted into ant; Germ. ameise.]

An emmet; a pismire. Ants constitute a genus of insects of the hymenopterous order, of which the characteristics are; a small scale between the breast and belly, with a joint so deep that the animal appears as if almost cut in two. The females, and the neuter or working ants, which have no sexual characteristics, are furnished with a hidden sting; and both males and females have wings, but the neuters have none. These insects meet together in companies, and maintain a sort of republic. They raise hillocks of earth, in which they live. In these there are paths, leading to the repositories of their provisions. The large black ants, in the warm climates of America, to avoid the effects of great rains, build large nests on trees, of light earth, roundish and plastered smooth. Encyc.

ANT-BEAR or ANT-EATER, n. A quadruped that feeds upon ants. This animal has no teeth, but a snout or muzzle, with a long cylindrical tongue. The body is covered with long hair. There are several species, constituting the genus, myrmecophaga, ant eaters. Encyc.

ANT-EGGS, n. Little white balls found in the hillocks of ants, usually supposed to be their eggs, but found on examination to be the young brood, in their first state. They are vermicules, wrapped in a film, composed of a silky substance spun like a spider's web. Encyc.

ANT-HILL, n. A little tumulus or hillock, formed by ants, for their habitation.

ANT/TA, n. In ancient architecture, a square column, at the corner of a building; a pilaster; written also ante.

ANTIMONY, n. [Fr. antimoine; Low L. antimonium; It. antimonio; Sp. id. This by some writers is supposed to be composed of anti and Fr. moine, monk, from the fact that certain monks were poisoned by it. This story, reported by Furetiere, is treated by Morin, as fabulous, and by him it is said to be composed of Gr. anti, against, and monos, alone, and so named because it is not found alone. The real truth is not ascertained.]

Primarily, a metallic ore consisting of sulphur combined with a metal; the sulphuret of Antimony, the stibium of the Romans and the στυμ, of the Greeks. It is a blackish mineral, which stains the hands, hard, brittle, full of long, shining, needle-like striae. It is found in the mines of Bohemia, and Hungary; in France and England, and in America. This word is also used for the pure metal or regulus of antimony, a metal of a grayish or silvery white, very brittle, and of a plated or scaly texture, and of moderate specific gravity. By exposure to air, its surface becomes tarnished, but does not rust. It is used as an ingredient in concave mirrors, giving them a finer texture. In bells, it renders the sound more clear; it renders tin more hard, white and sonorous, and gives to printing types more firmness and smoothness. It is also useful in promoting the fusion of metals, and especially in casting cannon balls. In its crude state, it is harmless to the human constitution; but many of its preparations act violently as emetics and cathartics. It has also a peculiar efficacy in promoting the secretions, particularly as a sudorific.

ANTIPATHY, n. [Gr. anti, against, and pathos, feeling.]

Natural aversion; instinctive contrariety or opposition in feeling; an aversion felt at the presence, real or ideal, of a particular object. This word literally denotes a natural aversion, which may be of different degrees, and in some cases may excite terror or horror at the presence of an object. Such is the aversion of animals for their natural enemies, as the antipathy of a mouse to a cat, or a weasel. Sometimes persons have an insuperable constitutional antipathy to certain kinds of food.

The word is applied also to aversion contracted by experience or habit; as when a person has suffered an injury from some food, or from an animal, which before was not an object of hatred; or when a particular kind of food or medicine is taken into a sickly stomach, and which nauseates it; the effect is antipathy, which is often of long continuance.

Antipathy however is often affected, as when persons pretend a great aversion to things from false delicacy.

2. In ethics, antipathy is hatred, aversion or repugnancy; hatred to persons; aversion to persons or things; repugnancy to actions. Of these hatred is most voluntary. Aversion, and antipathy, in its true sense, depend more on the constitution; repugnancy may depend on reason or education. Encyc.

Inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments to others, are to be avoided. Washington.

3. In physics, a contrariety in the properties or affections of matter, as of oil and water, which will not mix.

Antipathy is regularly followed by to, sometimes by against; and is opposed to sympathy.

ANTIPATRIOTIC, a. Not patriotic; opposing the interests of one's country. Johnson.

Antipatriotic prejudices.

ANTIPEDOBAPTIST, n. [Gr. anti, against, παις, παιδος, a child, and βαπτίζω, to baptize.]

One who is opposed to the baptism of infants. Buck.

ANTIPERISTALTIC, a. [See Peristaltic.] Opposed to peristaltic; retroverted, as in vomiting; as, the antiperistaltic motion of the intestines. Cyc.

ANTIPERISTASIS, n. [Gr. anti, against, and περιστας, a standing around.]

The opposition of a contrary quality, by which the quality opposed acquires strength; or the action by which a body attacked collects force by opposition; or the intension of the activity of one quality by the opposition of another. Thus quick-lime is set on fire, or sensible heat is excited in it, by mixture with water; and cold applied to the human body may increase its heat. Johnson. Dryden. Quincy.

ANTIPERISTATIC, a. Pertaining to antiperistasis. Ash.

ANTIPESTILENTIAL, a. [anti and pestilential, which see.]

Counteracting contagion or infection; having the quality of opposing or destroying pestilential diseases.

ANTIPHLOGISTIAN, n. [anti and phlogiston, which see.]

An opposer of the theory of phlogiston.

ANTIPHLOGISTIC, a. Counteracting heat or inflammation; tending to reduce arterial action; opposed to the doctrine of phlogiston. Nicholson.

ANTIPHLOGISTIC, n. Any medicine or diet which tends to reduce inflammation or the activity of the vital power. Hooper. Coxe.

ANTIPHON, n. [See Antiphony.]

The chant or alternate singing in choirs of cathedrals.

ANTIQUÉ, a. antee'k. [Fr. from L. anti- quus, probably from ante.]

1. Old; ancient; of genuine antiquity; in this sense it usually refers to the flourishing ages of Greece and Rome; as an antique statue.

2. Old, as it respects the present age, or a modern period of time; of old fashion, as an antique robe.

3. Odd; wild; fanciful; more generally written antic.

ANTIQUÉ, n. antee'k. In general, any thing very old; but in a more limited sense, the remains of ancient artists, as busts, statues, paintings and vases, the works of Grecian and Roman antiquity.

ANTIQUENESS, n. antee'kness. The quality of being ancient; an appearance of ancient origin and workmanship. Addison.

ANTIQUITY, n. [L. antiquitas].

1. Ancient times; former ages; times long since past; a very indefinite term; as, Cicero was the most eloquent orator of antiquity.

2. The ancients; the people of ancient times; as, the fact is admitted by all antiquity.

Meaning that mankind are inclined to verify the predictions of antiquity. T. Davies.

3. Ancientness; great age; the quality of being ancient; as, a statue of remarkable antiquity; a family of great antiquity.

4. Old age; a ludicrous sense used by Shak.

5. The remains of ancient times. In this sense it is usually or always plural. Antiquities comprehend all the remains of ancient times; all the monuments, coins, inscriptions, edifices, history and fragments of literature, offices, habiliments, weapons, manners, ceremonies; in short, whatever respects any of the ancient nations of the earth.

ANTIREVOLU'TIONARY, a. [See Revolution].

Opposed to a revolution; opposed to an entire change in the form of government.

Burke.

ANTIREVOLU'TIONIST, n. One who is opposed to a revolution in government.

ANTISABBATA'RIAN, n. [anti and sabbath].

One of a sect who oppose the observance of the Christian sabbath; maintaining that the Jewish sabbath was only of ceremonial, not of moral obligation, and was consequently abolished by Christ. Encyc.

In oratory, the defense of an action from the consideration that if it had been omitted, something worse would have happened.

Encyc.

ANTIS'TES, n. [L.]

The chief priest or prelate.

Milton.

ANTIS'TROPHE, } n. [Gr. anti, opposite,
ANTIS'TROPHY, } and sigma, a turning.]

In grammar, the changing of things mutually depending on each other; reciprocal conversion; as, the master of the servant, the servant of the master.

2. Among the ancients, that part of a song or dance, before the altar, which was performed by turning from west to east, in opposition to the strophy. The ancient odes consisted of stanzas called strophies and antistrophies, to which was often added the epode. These were sung by a choir, which turned or changed places when they repeated the different parts of the ode. The epode was sung, as the chorus stood still. [See Ode.]

West's pref. to his Pindar.

ANTISTRUMAT'IC, a. [anti and struma, a scrophulous swelling.]

Good against scrophulous disorders.

Johnson. Wiseman.

ANTITH'ESIS, n. [Gr. antithesis, of anti and thesis, from tithemi, to place.]

In rhetoric, an opposition of words or sentiments; contrast; as, "When our vices leave us, we flatter ourselves we leave them." "The prodigal robs his heir, the miser robs himself." "Excess of ceremony shows want of breeding." "Liberty without laws, and government without oppression."

2. Opposition of opinions; controversy.

ANTITHETIC, } Encyc.
ANTITHETICAL, } ^a Pertaining to anti-thesis, or opposition of words and sentiments; containing or abounding with antithesis.

ANTITRINITARIAN, n. [anti and trinitarian, which see.]

One who denies the trinity or the existence of three persons in the Godhead.

ANTITRINITARIAN, a. Opposing the trinity.

ANTITRINITARIANISM, n. A denial of the trinity.

ANTITYPE, n. [Gr. antitupos, of anti, against, and typos, a type, or pattern.]

A figure corresponding to another figure; that of which the type is the pattern or representation. Thus the paschal lamb, in scripture, is the type, of which Christ is the antitype. An antitype then, is something which is formed according to a model or pattern, and bearing strong features of resemblance to it.

In the Greek liturgy, the sacramental bread and wine are called antitypes, that is, figures, similitudes; and the Greek fathers used the word in a like sense.

ANTITYPICAL, a. Pertaining to an antitype; explaining the type.

ANTIVARIOLOUS, a. [anti and variolous, which see.]

Opposing the small pox.

ANTIVENEREAL, a. [anti and veneréal, which see.]

Resisting venereal poison.

ANTLER, n. [From the root of ante, before; Fr. andouiller. See Ante.]

A start or branch of a horn, especially of the horns of the cervine animals, as of the stag or moose. The branch next to the head is called the brow-antler, and the branch next above, the bes-antler.

ANTLERED, a. Furnished with antlers.

ANTONIAN, a. Noting certain medicinal waters in Germany, at or near Tonsstein.

ANTONOMASIA, } Encyc.
ANTONOMASY, } n. [Gr. anti, and onoma, name.]

The use of the name of some office, dignity, profession, science or trade, instead of the true name of the person; as when his majesty is used for a king, lordship for a nobleman. Thus instead of Aristotle, we say, the philosopher; a grave man is called a Cato; an eminent orator, a Cicero; a wise man, a Solomon. In the latter examples, a proper name is used for an appellative; the application being supported by a resemblance in character.

ANTOSIAN, n. One of a sect of rigid Lutherans, so denominated from their opposing the doctrines of Osiander. This sect deny that man is made just, but is only imputatively just, that is, pronounced so.

ANVIL, n. [Sax. anfilt, anfilt; D. aanbeeld; Old Eng. anvelt. The first syllable seems to be the preposition on, from the Belgic dialect aan. The last syllable is from the verb build; in Germ. bilden, to form or shape, and bild, an image or form, which in Dutch is beeld. To build is to shape, to form, and anvil, that is, on build, is that on which things are shaped. The Latin word incus, incudis, is formed by a like analogy from in and cudo, to hammer, or shape; and the same ideas are connected in the Celtic; W. cingion; Ir. inneon, anvil, and inneonam, to strike.]

An iron block with a smooth face, on which smiths hammer and shape their work. Figuratively, any thing on which blows are laid.

To be on the anvil, is to be in a state of discussion, formation or preparation; as when a scheme or measure is forming, but not matured. This figure bears an analogy to that of discussion, a shaking or beating.

ANXIETY, n. angzi'ety. [L. anxietas, from anxius, solicitous; L. ango. See Anger.]

1. Concern or solicitude respecting some event, future or uncertain, which disturbs the mind, and keeps it in a state of painful uneasiness. It expresses more than uneasiness or disturbance, and even more than trouble or solicitude. It usually springs from fear or serious apprehension of evil, and involves a suspense respecting an event, and often, a perplexity of mind, to know how to shape our conduct.

2. In medical language, uneasiness; unceasing restlessness in sickness.

ANXIOUS, a. ank'shus. Greatly concerned or solicitous, respecting something future or unknown; being in painful suspense; applied to persons; as, to be anxious for the issue of a battle.

2. Full of solicitude; unquiet; applied to things; as anxious thoughts or labor.

3. Very careful; solicitous; as, anxious to please; anxious to commit no mistake. It is followed by for or about, before the object.

ANXIOUSLY, adv. In an anxious manner; solicitously; with painful uncertainty; carefully; unquietly.

ANXIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being anxious; great solicitude.

ANY, a. en'ny. [Sax. anig, anig; D. eenig; Ger. einig. This word is a compound of an, one, and ig, which, in the Teutonic dialects, is the ic of the Latins, mus-ic-us. Any is unic-us, one-like.]

1. One indefinitely.

Nor knoweth any man the Father, save the Son. Math xi.

If a soul shall sin against any of the commandments. Lev. iv.

2. Some; an indefinite number, plurally; for though the word is formed from one, it often refers to many. Are there any witnesses present? The sense seems to be a small, uncertain number.

3. Some; an indefinite quantity; a small portion.

Who will show us any good? Ps. iv.

4. It is often used as a substitute, the person or thing being understood.

And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any. Mark xi.

If any lack wisdom, let him ask it of God. James i.

It is used in opposition to none. Have you any wheat to sell? I have none.

ANY-WISE is sometimes used adverbially, but the two words may be separated, and used with a preposition, in any wise.

AO'NIAN, a. [From Aonia, a part of Bœotia, in Greece.]

Pertaining to the muses, or to Aonia, in Bœotia. The Aonian fount was Aganippe, at the foot of mount Helicon, not far from Thebes, and sacred to the muses. Hence the muses were called Aonides. Dryden, Virg. Eclogue. 10. 12. But in truth, Aonia itself is formed from the Celtic aon, a spring or fountain, [the fabled son of Neptune,] and this word gave name to Aonia. As the muses were fond of springs, the word was applied to the muses, and to mountains which were their favorite residence, as to Parnassus.

AORIST, n. [Gr. aoristos, indefinite, of a priv. and oros, limit.]

The name of certain tenses in the grammar of the Greek language, which express time indeterminate, that is, either past, present or future.

AORISTIC, a. Indefinite; pertaining to an aorist, or indefinite tense.

AORTA, n. [Gr. aortē, the great artery; also an ark or chest.]

The great artery, or trunk of the arterial system; proceeding from the left ventricle of the heart, and giving origin to all the arteries, except the pulmonary arteries. It first rises, when it is called the ascending aorta; then makes a great curve, when it gives off branches to the head, and upper extremities; then proceeds downwards, called the descending aorta, when it gives off branches to the trunk; and finally divides into the two iliacs, which supply the pelvis and lower extremities. Cyc. Parr.

AORTAL, a. Pertaining to the aorta, or great artery.

AOUTA, n. The paper-mulberry tree in Otaheite, from whose bark is manufactured a cloth worn by the inhabitants.

APACE, adv. [a and pace.]

With a quick pace; quick; fast; speedily; with haste; hastily; applied to things in motion or progression; as, birds fly apace; weeds grow apace.

AP'AGOGÉ, } Encyc.
AP'AGOGY, } n. [Gr. from apagao, to draw aside, of apo, from, and agao, to drive.]

1. In logic, abduction; a kind of argument, wherein the greater extreme is evidently contained in the medium, but the medium not so evidently in the lesser extreme, as not to require further proof. Thus, "All whom God absolves are free from sin; but God absolves all who are in Christ; therefore all who are in Christ are free from sin." The first proposition is evident; but the second may require further proof, as that God received full satisfaction for sin, by the suffering of Christ.

2. In mathematics, a progress or passage from one proposition to another, when the first, having been demonstrated, is employed in proving others.

3. In the Athenian law, the carrying a criminal, taken in the fact, to a magistrate.

APAGOGICAL, a. An apagogical demonstration is an indirect way of proof, by showing the absurdity or impossibility of the contrary.

APALACHIAN, a. Pertaining to the Apalaches, a tribe of Indians, in the western part of Georgia. Hence the word is applied to the mountains in or near their country, which are in fact the southern extremity of the Alleghanean ridges.

APAN'THROPY, n. [Gr. απο, from, and ανθρωπος, man.]

An aversion to the company of men; a love of solitude. Encyc.

APARITH/MESIS, n. [Gr.] In rhetoric, enumeration.

APART, adv. [a and part; Fr. aparté. See Part.]

1. Separately; at a distance; in a state of separation, as to place.

Jesus departed thence into a desert place apart. Math. xiv.

2. In a state of distinction, as to purpose, use or character.

The Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself. Ps. iv.

3. Distinctly; separately; as, consider the two propositions apart.

4. Aside; in exclusion of; as, apart from all regard to his morals, he is not qualified, in other respects, for the office he holds.

APARTMENT, n. [Fr. appartement, or apartement, of ab or a, from, and partir, to depart. See Part.]

A room in a building; a division in a house, separated from others by partitions; a place separated by inclosure.

APATHETIC, a. Void of feeling; free from passion; insensible. Harris.

APATHY, n. [Gr. α priv. and παθος, passion.]

Want of feeling; an utter privation of passion, or insensibility to pain; applied either to the body or the mind. As applied to the mind, it is stoicism, a calmness of mind incapable of being ruffled by pleasure, pain or passion. In the first ages of the church, the christians adopted the term to express a contempt of earthly concerns.

Quietism is apathy disguised under the appearance of devotion. Encyc.

APATITE, n. [from Gr. απαταω, to deceive; it having been often mistaken for other minerals.]

A variety of phosphate of lime; generally crystallized in low, flat, hexahedral prisms, sometimes even tabular. Its powder phosphoresces on burning coals.

The phosphorite of Werner includes the massive and earthy varieties of the phosphate, which are distinguished from the apatite, by their containing a small portion of fluororic acid. Cleveland.

APE, n. [D. aap; Dan. abe; Sax. Sw. and Ir. apa; Ice. ape; Germ. affe; W. ab, or epa, so named from the celerity of its motions.]

1. A genus of quadrupeds, found in the torrid zone of both continents, of a great variety of species. In common use, the word extends to all the tribe of monkeys and baboons; but in zoology, ape is limited to such of these animals as have no tails; while those with short tails are called baboons, and those with long ones, monkeys. These animals have four cutting teeth in each jaw, and two canine teeth, with obtuse grinders. The feet are formed like hands, with four fingers and a thumb, and flat nails. Apes are lively, full of frolic and chatter, generally untamable, thieving and mischievous. They inhabit the forests, and live on fruits, leaves and insects. Encyc.

2. One who imitates servilely, in allusion to the manners of the ape; a silly fellow.

APE, v. t. To imitate servilely; to mimic, as an ape imitates human actions. Weak persons are always prone to ape foreigners.

APEAK, adv. [a and peak, a point. See Peak.]

1. On the point; in a posture to pierce. Johnson.

2. In seamen's language, perpendicular. The anchor is apeak, when the cable is drawn so as to bring the ship directly over it. Mar. Dict.

APENNINE, a. [L. apenninus; ad and penninus, an epithet applied to a peak or ridge of the Alps. Livy. Celtic pen or ben, the peak of a mountain, or in general, a mountain.]

Pertaining to or designating a chain of mountains, which extend from the plains of Piedmont, round the gulf of Genoa, to the center of Italy, and thence south east to the extremity.

APENNINE, } The mountains above

APENNINES, } n. described.

APEPSY, n. [Gr. α priv. and πεπσω, to digest.]

Defective digestion; indigestion. [Little used.] Core. Encyc.

A'PER, n. One who apes. In zoology, the wild boar.

APERIENT, a. [L. aperiens, aperio; Sp. Port. abrir; It. aprire; Fr. ouvrir.]

Opening; that has the quality of opening; deobstruent; laxative.

APERIENT, n. A medicine which promotes the circulation of the fluids, by removing obstructions; a laxative; a deobstruent; as, smallage, fennel, asparagus, parsley, and butcher's broom. Encyc.

APERITIVE, a. Opening; deobstruent; aperient. Harvey. Fotherby.

APERT', a. [L. apertus.] Open; evident; undisguised. [Not used.]

APERTION, n. The act of opening; the state of being opened; an opening; a gap, aperture, or passage. [Little used.] Wiseman. Wotton.

APERTLY, adv. Openly. [Little used.] Bale.

APERTNESS, n. [L. apertus.] Openness. [Rarely used.] Holder.

APERTOR, n. A muscle that raises the upper eye lid. Quincy.

APERTURE, n. The act of opening; more generally, an opening; a gap, cleft or chasm; a passage perforated; a hole through any solid substance. Holder. Newton.

2. An opening of meaning; explanation. [Not used.] Taylor.

3. In geometry, the space between two right lines, forming an angle. Encyc.

APET'ALOUS, a. [Gr. α neg. and πεταλον, a flower-leaf or petal.]

In botany, having no petals, or flower-leaves; having no corol. Martyn.

APET'ALOUSNESS, n. A state of being without petals.

The tip, point or summit of any thing. In antiquity, the cap of a flamen or priest; the crest of a helmet. In grammar, the mark of a long syllable. In botany, the anther of flowers, or tops of the stamens, like knobs. Martyn.

APH'ANITE, n. [Gr. α priv. and φανω, to appear.]

In mineralogy, compact amphibole in a particular state. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

APHE'LION, n. [Gr. απο, from, and ηλιος, the sun.]

That point of a planet's orbit which is most distant from the sun; opposed to perihelion.

APHERE'SIS, n. [Gr. απο, from, and αιρω, to take.]

1. The taking of a letter or syllable from the beginning of a word. Thus by an aphe-resis, omittere is written, mittere. Encyc.

2. In the healing art, the removal of any thing noxious. In surgery, amputation. Quincy.

APHIDIV'OROUS, a. [of aphis, the puce-ron or vine fretter, and voro, to eat.]

Eating, devouring, or subsisting on the aphids, or plant-louse. Darwin.

APHILAN'THROPY, n. [of α neg. and φιλανθρωπια, of φιλω, to love, and ανθρωπος, man.]

Want of love to mankind. In medicine, the first stage of melancholy, when solitude is preferred to society. Core.

A'PHIS, n. In zoology, the puce-ron, vine fretter, or plant-louse; a genus of insects, belonging to the order of hemipters. The aphid is furnished with an infected beak, and with feelers longer than the thorax.

In the same species, some individuals have four erect wings, and others are entirely without wings. The feet are of the ambulatory kind, and the belly usually ends in two horns, from which is ejected the substance called honey-dew. The species are very numerous. Encyc.

APHLOGIS'TIC, a. [Gr. α priv. and φλογος, inflammable.]

Flameless; as an aphlogistic lamp, in which a coil of wire is kept in a state of continued ignition by alcohol, without flame. Comstock.

APH'ONY, n. [Gr. α priv. and φωνη, voice.]

A loss of voice; a palsy of the tongue; dumbness; catalepsy. Johnson. Core.

APH'ORISM, n. [Gr. αφορισμος, determination, distinction; from αφοριζω, to separate.]

A maxim; a precept, or principle expressed in few words; a detached sentence containing some important truth; as, the aphorisms of Hippocrates, or of the civil law. Encyc.

APHORISM'ER, n. A dealer in aphorisms. Milton.

APHORIS'TIC, } In the form of an

APHORIS'TICAL, } a. aphorism; in the form of short unconnected sentences; as an aphoristic style.

- A/PIS, n. In mythology, an ox, worshiped in ancient Egypt, or a divinity or idol in the figure of an ox.
- A/PIS, n. [L.] In zoology, the bee, a genus of insects, of the order of hymenoptera. The mouth has two jaws, and a proboscis infolded in a double sheath; the wings are four, the two foremost covering the hinder ones when at rest. The females and working bees have a sting. Encyc.
- A/PISH, a. [See Ape.] Having the qualities of an ape; inclined to imitate in a servile manner; hence, foolish, foppish, affected, trifling, insignificant; as, an apish fellow; apish manners.
- A/PISHLY, adv. In an apish manner; with servile imitation; foppishly.
- A/PISHNESS, n. The quality of being apish; mimicry; foppery.
- APIT/PAT, With quick beating or palpitation; a word formed from the sound, pit and pat, or from beat.
- APLANAT/IC, a. [Gr. α neg. and πλανω, to wander.]
- An aplanatic telescope is one which entirely corrects the aberration of the rays of light. It is thus distinguished from the achromatic, which only partially corrects the aberration. Ed. Encyc.
- APLO/ME, n. [Gr. απλος, simple.] A mineral closely allied to garnet. It is considered by Jameson, as crystalized common garnet. It is a rare mineral, found in dodecahedrons, with rhombic faces, supposed to be derived from the cube, by one of the most simple laws of decrement, that of a single range of particles, parallel to all the edges of a cube. Haily. Cleveland.
- APLUS/TER, } n. [L. from Gr. απλος, the summit of the poop of a ship.]
- APLUS/TRE, } n. [L. from Gr. απλος, the summit of the poop of a ship.]
- An ensign, or ornament carried by ancient ships. It was shaped like a plume of feathers, fastened on the neck of a goose or swan, and to this was attached a party-colored ribbin, to indicate the course of the wind. Addison. Encyc.

- APOGEE, n. [apogeeon, apogeeum; Gr. απο, from, and γη, the earth.]
- That point in the orbit of a planet, which is at the greatest distance from the earth. The ancients regarded the earth as fixed in the center of the system, and therefore assigned to the sun, with the planets, an apogee; but the moderns, considering the sun as the center, use the terms perihelion and aphelion, to denote the least and greatest distance of the planets from that orb. The sun's apogee therefore is in strictness, the earth's aphelion. Apogee is properly applicable to the moon. Encyc. Johnson.
- APOGON, n. A fish of the Mediterranean, the summit of whose head is elevated.
- APOGRAPH, n. [Gr. απογραφον; απογραφω] An exemplar; a copy or transcript. Ash.
- APOLLINARIAN, a. [From Apollo.]
- The Apollinarian games, in Roman antiquity, were celebrated in honor of Apollo; instituted A. R. 542. after the battle of Cannæ. They were merely scenical, with exhibitions of music, dances and various mountebank tricks. Encyc.
- APOLLINARIANS, in Church history, a sect, deriving their name from Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea, in the 4th Century, who denied the proper humanity of Christ; maintaining that his body was endowed with a sensitive, and not with a rational soul; and that the divine nature supplied the place of the intellectual principle in man. Encyc. Hooker.
- Apollo-Belvidere*, an ancient statue of the first class in excellence.
- APOL/LYON, n. [Gr. απολλων, destroying.]
- The destroyer; a name used Rev. ix. 11, for the angel of the bottomless pit, answering to the Hebrew Abaddon.

APOPHLEGMATIZANT, n. An apoplegmic.

AP'OPHTHEGM, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and φθημα, word. It would be eligible to reduce this harsh word to apothem.]

AP'OTHEM, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and φθημα, word. It would be eligible to reduce this harsh word to apothem.]

A remarkable saying; a short, sententious, instructive remark, uttered on a particular occasion, or by a distinguished character; as that of Cyrus, "He is unworthy to be a magistrate, who is not better than his subjects;" or that of Cato, "Homines nihil agendo, discunt male agere;" men by doing nothing, soon learn to do mischief.

APOPH'YGE, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and φυγω, flight.]

APOPH'YGY, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and φυγω, flight.]

1. In architecture, the part of a column, where it springs out of its base; originally a ring or ferrel to bind the extremities of columns, and keep them from splitting; afterwards imitated in stone pillars. It is sometimes called the spring of the column.

2. A concave part or ring of a column, lying above or below the flat member, called by the French le congé d'en bas, or d'en haut; by the Italians, cavo di basso, or di sopra; also, il vivo di basso.

APOPH'YLLITE, n. [Gr. απο, from, and φυλλον, a leaf; so called because of its tendency to exfoliate.]

A mineral occurring in laminated masses or in regular prismatic crystals, having a strong and peculiar pearly luster. Its structure is foliated, and when a fragment is forcibly rubbed against a hard body, it separates into thin lamens, like selenite. It exfoliates also before the flame of a lamp. From its peculiar luster, it is sometimes called by the harsh name, ichthyophthalmite, fish-eye stone.

APOPH'YSIS, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and φωσις, growth.]

APOPH'YSY, } n. [Gr. απο, from, and φωσις, growth.]

The projecting soft end or protuberance of a bone; a process of a bone.

APOPLEC'TIC, } a. [See apoplexy.]

APOPLEC'TIC, n. A person affected by apoplexy.

AP'OPLEXED, a. Affected with apoplexy.

AP'OPLEXY, n. [Gr. αποπληξια, of απο, from, and πλησσω, to strike.]

A sudden deprivation of all sense and voluntary motion, occasioned by repletion or whatever interrupts the action of the nerves upon the muscles.

Dryden, for the sake of measure, uses apoplex, for apoplexy.

AP'ORON, } [See Apory.] A problem

AP'ORIME, } n. [See Apory.] A problem difficult to be resolved.

AP'ORY, } n. [Gr. απορια, from απορος, inops concilli, of a and πορος, way or passage.]

1. In rhetoric, a doubting or being at a loss where to begin, or what to say, on account of the variety of matter.

2. In the medical art, febrile anxiety; uneasiness; restlessness, from obstructed perspiration, or the stoppage of any natural secretion.

APOSIOPE'SIS, } n. [Gr. αποσιωπησις, of απο, and σιωπησις, to be silent.]

Reticency or suppression; as when a speaker for some cause, as fear, sorrow, or anger, suddenly breaks off his discourse, before it is ended; or speaks of a thing, when he makes a show as if he would say nothing on the subject; or aggravates what he pretends to conceal, by uttering a part and leaving the remainder to be understood.

APOS'TASY, n. [Gr. αποστασις, a defection, of αποστημι, to depart, απο and στημι.]

1. An abandonment of what one has professed; a total desertion, or departure from one's faith or religion.

2. The desertion from a party to which one has adhered.

3. Among physicians, the throwing off of exfoliated or fractured bone, or the various solution of disease.

4. An abscess.

APOS'TATE, n. [Gr. αποστατης.]

One who has forsaken the church, sect or profession to which he before adhered. In its original sense, applied to one who has abandoned his religion; but correctly applied also to one who abandons a political or other party.

APOS'TATE, a. False; traitorous.

APOSTAT'ICAL, a. After the manner of an apostate.

APOSTAT'IZE, v. i. To abandon one's profession or church; to forsake principles or faith which one has professed; or the party to which one has been attached.

APOSTAT'IZING, ppr. Abandoning a church, profession, sect or party.

An abscess; a swelling filled with purulent matter; written also corruptly impostume.

A-POSTERIORI, [L. posterior, after.]

Arguments a posteriori, are drawn from effects, consequences or facts; in opposition to reasoning a priori, or from causes previously known.

APOS'TLE, n. apos'tl. [L. apostolus; Gr. αποστολος, from αποστέλλω, to send away, of απο, and στέλλω, to send; G. stellen, to set.]

A person deputed to execute some important business; but appropriately, a disciple of Christ commissioned to preach the gospel. Twelve persons were selected by Christ for this purpose; and Judas, one of the number, proving an apostate, his place was supplied by Matthias. Acts i.

The title of apostle is applied to Christ himself, Heb. 3. In the primitive ages of the church, other ministers were called apostles, Rom. xvi; as were persons sent to carry alms from one church to another, Philip. ii. This title was also given to persons who first planted the Christian faith. Thus Dionysius of Corinth is called the apostle of France; and the Jesuit Missionaries are called apostles.

Among the Jews, the title was given to officers who were sent into distant provinces, as visitors or commissioners, to see the laws observed.

Apostle, in the Greek liturgy, is a book containing the epistles of St. Paul, printed in the order in which they are to be read in churches, through the year. Encyc.

APOSTLE-SHIP, n. The office or dignity of an apostle.

APOSTOLATE, n. A mission; the dignity or office of an apostle. Ancient writers use it for the office of a bishop; but it is now restricted to the dignity of the pope, whose see is called the Apostolic See. Encyc.

APOSTOLIC, a. Pertaining or relating to the apostles, as the apostolic age.

2. According to the doctrines of the apostles; delivered or taught by the apostles; as apostolic faith or practice.

Apostolic constitutions, a collection of regulations attributed to the apostles, but generally supposed to be spurious. They appeared in the 4th century; are divided into eight books, and consist of rules and precepts relating to the duties of Christians, and particularly, to the ceremonies and discipline of the church.

Apostolic Fathers, an appellation given to the Christian writers of the first century.

APOSTOLICALLY, adv. In the manner of the apostles.

APOSTOLICALNESS, n. The quality of being apostolical, or according to the doctrines of the apostles.

APOSTOLICS, n. Certain sects so called from their pretending to imitate the practice of the apostles, abstaining from marriage, from wine, flesh, pecuniary reward &c., and wandering about clothed in white, with long beards, and bare heads. Sagarelli, the founder of one of these sects, was burnt at Parma in 1300. Encyc.

APOSTROPHE, n. [Gr. apo, from, and trope, a turning.]

In rhetoric, a diversion of speech; a digressive address; a changing the course of a speech, and addressing a person who is dead or absent, as if present; or a short address introduced into a discourse, directed to some person, different from the party to which the main discourse is directed; as when an advocate, in an argument to the jury, turns and addresses a few remarks to the court. Encyc. Smith.

2. In grammar, the contraction of a word by the omission of a letter or letters, which omission is marked by a comma, as call'd for called. The comma used for this purpose may also be called an apostrophe.

APOSTROPHIC, a. Pertaining to an apostrophe; noting the contraction of a word. Murray.

APOSTROPHIZE, v. i. or t. To make an apostrophe, or short detached address in speaking; to address by apostrophe.

2. v. t. To contract a word by omitting a letter or letters.

3. To mark with a comma, indicating the omission of a letter.

APOS'TROPHIZED, pp. Addressed by way of digression; contracted by the omission of a letter or letters; marked by an apostrophe.

APPE/LATE, a. Pertaining to appeals; having cognizance of appeals; as "appellate jurisdiction." Const. of the U. States. Appellate judges. Burke, Rev. in France.

APPE/LATION, n. [L. appellatio. See Appeal.]

Name; the word by which a thing is called and known. Spenser uses it for appeal.

APPE/LATIVE, a. Pertaining to a common name; noting the common name of a species.

APPE/LATIVE, n. A common name in distinction from a proper name. A common name or appellative stands for a whole class, genus or species of beings, or for universal ideas. Thus man is the name of the whole human race, and fowl of all winged animals. Tree is the name of all plants of a particular class; plant and vegetable are names of things that grow out of the earth. A proper name, on the other hand, stands for a single thing, as, London, Philadelphia, Washington, Boston.

APPE/LATIVELY, adv. According to the manner of nouns appellative; in a manner to express whole classes or species; as, Hercules is sometimes used appellatively, that is, as a common name to signify a strong man. Johnson.

APPE/LATORY, a. Containing an appeal.

APPE/LEE, n. The defendant in an appeal.

2. The person who is appealed, or prosecuted by a private man for a crime. Blackstone.

APPE/LOR, n. The person who institutes an appeal, or prosecutes another for a crime. Blackstone.

This word is rarely or never used for the plaintiff in appeal from a lower court, who is called the appellant. Appellee is opposed both to appellant and appellor.

APPEND, v. t. [L. appendo, of ad and pendo, to hang.]

1. To hang or attach to, as by a string, so that the thing is suspended; as, a seal appended to a record.

2. To add, as an accessory to the principal thing. Johnson.

APPEND/AGE, n. Something added to a principal or greater thing, though not necessary to it, as a portico to a house.

Modesty is the appendage of sobriety. Taylor.

APPEND/ANCE, } Something annexed.
APPEND/ENCE, } n. [Not used.] Bp. Hall.

APPEND/ANT, a. Hanging to; annexed; belonging to something; attached; as, a seal appendant to a paper.

2. In law, common appendant, is a right, belonging to the owners or occupiers of land, to put commonable beasts upon the lord's waste, and upon the lands of other persons within the same manor. An advowson appendant, is the right of patronage or presentation, annexed to the possession of a manor. So also a common of fishing may be appendant to a freehold. Blackstone. Cowell.

APPEND/ANT, n. That which belongs to another thing, as incidental or subordinate to it.

APPEND/ED, pp. Annexed; attached.

APPEND/ICATE, v. t. To append; to add to. Obs. Hale.

APPEND/ICATION, n. An appendage or adjunct. Obs. Hale.

APPEND/ICLE, n. A small appendage.

APPEND/ING, n. That which is by right annexed. Spelman.

APPEND/IX, n. plu. appendices, [L. The Latin plural is appendices. See Append.]

1. Something appended or added. Normandy became an appendix to England. Hale.

2. An adjunct, concomitant, or appendage. Watts.

3. More generally, a supplement or short treatise added to a book.

APPER/CEIVE, v. t. [Fr. apercevoir.] To comprehend. Obs. Chaucer.

APPER/CEPTION, n. [ad and perception.] Perception that reflects upon itself; consciousness. Leibnitz. Reid.

APPER/IL, n. Peril; danger. [Not in use.] Shak.

APPERTA/IN, v. i. [Fr. appartenir; It. appartenere; L. ad and pertineo, to pertain, of per and teneo, to hold. Pertineo is to reach to, to extend to, hence to belong. See Tenant.]

To belong, whether by right, nature or appointment.

Give it to him to whom it appertaineth. Lev. vi.

[See Pertain.]

APPERTA/INING, pp. Belonging.

APPERTA/INMENT, n. That which belongs. Shak.

APPER/TENENCE, n. [See Appurtenance.]

APPER/TINENT, a. Belonging; now written appurtenant. Shak.

APPER/TINENT, n. That which belongs to something else. Obs. Shak.

[See Appurtenance.]

AP/PETENCE, } [L. appetentia, appetens,
AP/PETENCY, } n. from appeto, to desire;
of ad and peto, to ask, supplicate or seek;

Ch. פִּתְּחָה; Eth. ተገባ to desire, to intreat; Dan. beder; D. bidden; Ger. bitten; Arm. pidi; Eng. bid; Sax. bidan; Sw. bedja;

L. invito, compound. The primary sense is to strain, to urge or press, or to advance. See Bid. Class Bd.]

1. In a general sense, desire; but especially, carnal desire; sensual appetite.

2. The disposition of organized bodies to select and imbibe such portions of matter as serve to support and nourish them, or such particles as are designed, through their agency, to carry on the animal or vegetable economy.

These lacteals have mouths, and by animal selection or appetency, they absorb such part of the fluid as is agreeable to their palate. Darwin.

3. An inclination or propensity in animals to perform certain actions, as in the young to suck, in aquatic fowls to enter into water and to swim.

4. According to Darwin, animal appetency is synonymous with irritability or sensibility; as the appetency of the eye for light, of the paps to secrete milk, &c.

5. Attraction, or the tendency in bodies to move toward each other and unite. Copernicus.

AP/PETENT, a. Desiring; very desirous. Buck.

APPETIBIL/ITY, n. The quality of being desirable for gratification.

AP/PETIBLE, a. [Low L. appetibilis, from appeto.] Desirable; that may be the object of sensual desire.

AP/PETITE, n. [L. appetitus, from appeto. See Appetence.]

1. The natural desire of pleasure or good; the desire of gratification, either of the body or of the mind. Appetites are passions directed to general objects, as the appetite for fame, glory or riches; in distinction from passions directed to some particular objects, which retain their proper name, as the passion of love, envy or gratitude. Passion does not exist without an object; natural appetites exist first, and are then directed to objects. Encyc.

2. A desire of food or drink; a painful sensation occasioned by hunger or thirst.

3. Strong desire; eagerness or longing. Clarendon.

4. The thing desired. Power being the natural appetite of princes. Swift.

Appetites are natural or artificial. Hunger and thirst are natural appetites; the appetites for olives, tobacco, snuff, &c. are artificial.

In old authors, appetite is followed by to, but regularly it should be followed by for before the object, as an appetite for pleasure.

To be given to appetite, is to be voracious or gluttonous. Prov. xxiii. 2.

APPETI/TION, n. [L. appetitio.] Desire. [Rarely used.]

AP/PETITIVE, a. That desires; that has the quality of desiring gratification; as appetitive power or faculty. Hale.

AP/PIAN, a. Designating something that belongs to Appius, particularly a way from Rome through Capua to Brundisium, now Brindisi, constructed by Appius Claudius, A. R. 441. It is more than 330 miles in length, formed of hard stone squared, and so wide as to admit two carriages abreast. Livy. Lempriere.

APPLAUD', v. t. [L. applaudo; ad and plaudo, to make a noise by clapping the hands; Sp. aplaudir; It. applaudire; Fr. applaudir. This word is formed on the root of laus, laudo; Eng. loud; W. clod, praise, from llod, what is forcibly uttered; llodi, to reach out; from llaud, that shoots out. It coincides also with W. bloez, a shout, or outcry; bloeziau, to shout; bloezest, applause, acclamation. Ir. blaadh, a shout; blath, praise. These may all be of one family. Class L. d. See Loud.]

1. To praise by clapping the hands, acclamation, or other significant sign.

2. To praise by words, actions or other means; to express approbation of; to commend; used in a general sense. Pope.

APPLAUD'ED, pp. Praised by acclamation, or other means; commended.

APPLAUD'ER, n. One who praises or commends.

APPLAUD'ING, ppr. Praising by acclamation; commending.

APPLAUSE', n. s as z. [L. applausus.]

A shout of approbation; approbation and praise, expressed by clapping the hands, acclamation or huzzas; approbation expressed. In antiquity, applause differed from acclamation; applause was expressed by the hands, and acclamation by the voice. There were three species of applause, the bombus, a confused din made by the hands or mouth; the imbrices and testæ, made by beating a sort of sounding vessels in the theaters. Persons were appointed for the purpose of applauding, and masters were employed to teach the art. The applauders were divided into choruses, and placed opposite to each other, like the choristers in a cathedral. Encyc.

APPLAUS'IVE, a. Applauding; containing applause. Jonson.

AP'PLE, n. [Sax. appl, appil; D. appel; Ger. apfel; Dan. æble; Sw. äple; W. aval; Ir. abhal or ubhal; Arm. aval; Russ. iabloko, or yabloko. This word primarily signifies fruit in general, especially of a round form. In Pers. the same word

آبل, pronounced ubhal, signifies the fruit or berries of the savin or juniper. Castle. In Welsh, it signifies not only the apple, but the plum and other fruits. Lhuyd. Aval melynkhir, a lemon; aval euraid, an orange. Owen.]

1. The fruit of the apple tree, [pyrus malus], from which cider is made.

2. The apple of the eye is the pupil.

Apple of love, or love apple, the tomato, or lycopersicum, a species of Solanum. The stalk is herbaceous, with oval, pinnated leaves, and small yellow flowers. The berry is smooth, soft, of a yellow or reddish color, of the size of a plum. It is used in soups and broths. Encyc.

1. To like; to be pleased with; to admit the propriety of; as, we approve the measures of administration. This word may include, with the assent of the mind to the propriety, a commendation to others.

2. To prove; to show to be true; to justify. Wouldst thou approve thy constancy? Approve first thy wisdom. Milton.

[This sense, though common a century or two ago, is now rare.]

3. To experience; to prove by trial. [Not used. See Prove.] Shak.

4. To make or show to be worthy of approbation; to commend.

Jesus, a man approved of God. Acts ii.

This word seems to include the idea of Christ's real office, as the Messiah, and of God's love and approbation of him in that character. Brown's Dict.

5. To like and sustain as right; to commend.

Yet their posterity approve their sayings.

Psa. xlix.

This word, when it signifies to be pleased, is often followed by of, in which use, it is intransitive; as, I approve of the measure.

But the tendency of modern usage is to omit of. "I approve the measure."

6. To improve. Blackstone.

APPROVED, pp. Liked; commended; shown or proved to be worthy of approbation; having the approbation and support of.

Study to show thyself approved to God. 2 Tim. ii.

Not he that commendeth himself is approved.

2 Cor. x.

APPROVE/MENT, n. Approbation; liking. Hayward.

2. In law, when a person indicted for felony or treason, and arraigned, confesses the fact before plea pleaded, and appeals or accuses his accomplices of the same crime, to obtain his pardon, this confession and accusation are called approvement, and the person an approver. Blackstone.

3. Improvement of common lands, by inclosing and converting them to the uses of husbandry. Blackstone.

APPROVER, n. One who approves. Formerly one who proves or makes trial.

2. In law, one who confesses a crime and accuses another. [See Approvement.] Also, formerly, one who had the letting of the king's domains, in small manors. In Stat. 1. Edw. 3. C. 8, sheriffs are called approvers. A bailiff or steward of a manor. Encyc.

Water; a word much used in pharmacy, and the old chemistry.

Aqua fortis, in the old chemistry, is now called nitric acid.

Aqua marina, a name which jewelers give to the beryl, on account of its color.

Aqua regia, in the old chemistry, is now called nitro-muriatic acid.

Aqua vite, brandy, or spirit of wine.

AQUARIAN, n. One of a sect of christians, in the primitive church, who consecrated water in the eucharist instead of wine; either under a pretense of abstinence, or because it was unlawful to drink wine. Encyc.

AQUARIUS, n. [L.] The water bearer; a sign in the zodiac which the sun enters about the 21st of January; so called from the rains which prevail at that season, in Italy and the East. The stars in this constellation, according to Ptolemy, are 45; according to Tycho Brahe, 41; according to Hevelius, 47; and according to Flamstead, 108.

AQUATIC, a. [L. aquaticus. See Aqua.] Pertaining to water; applied to animals which live in water, as fishes; or to such as frequent it, as aquatic fowls; applied to plants, it denotes such as grow in water. Aquatic is rarely used.

AQUATIC, n. A plant which grows in water, as the flag.

AQUATILE, a. That inhabits the water. [Rarely used.] Brown.

AQUATINTA, n. [aqua, water, and It. tinta, dye. See Tincture.]

A method of etching on copper, by which a beautiful effect is produced, resembling a fine drawing in water colors or Indian ink. This is performed with a powder of asphalt and fine transparent rosin sifted on the plate, which is a little greased; the loose powder being shaken off, the plate is heated over a chafing dish; and when cool, the light places on the plate are covered with a hair pencil, dipped in turpentine varnish mixed with ivory black. A rim is then raised with bees wax, and reduced nitrous acid is poured on, and suffered to stand five minutes; then poured off, and the plate dried. This process with the pencil and the aqua fortis is to be repeated till the darkest shades are produced. Encyc.

AQUEDUCT, n. [L. aqua, water, and ductus, a pipe or canal, from duco, to lead. See Duke.]

A structure made for conveying water from one place to another over uneven ground; either above or under the surface. It may be either a pipe or a channel. It may be constructed above ground of stone or wood; carried through hills by piercing them, and over valleys, by a structure supported by props or arches. Some have been formed with three conduits on the same line, elevated one above another. Encyc.

AQUITA'NIAN, a. Pertaining to Aquitania, one of the great divisions of Gaul, which, according to Cesar, lay between the Garonne, the Pyrenees and the Ocean. In modern days, it has been called Gascony. The inhabitants, in Cesar's time, spoke a different dialect from that of the proper Celts, between the Garonne and Seine. This dialect bore an affinity to the Basque, in Biscay, to which they were contiguous; and some remains of it still exist in the Gascon. Aquitania is the country of the Aqui; from the name of the people, with tan, a Celtic word, signifying region or country. The Romans, either from their general usage, or from not understanding the Celtic tan, annexed another termination signifying country, ia, the Ir. ai or aot, Heb. Wai, a settlement or habitation; Gr. aea, land, country; Hindu, eya, the same.

Cesar, Com. Lib. i. 1. D'Anville.

AR'IL, } n. The exterior coat or covering of a seed, fixed to it at the base only, investing it wholly or partially, and falling off spontaneously; by some writers called, from the Greek, Calyptra. It is either succulent, or cartilaginous; colored, elastic, rough or knotted. Linne. Milne. Martyn. Smith.

AR'ILLATED, } a. Having an exterior covering or aril, as coffee. Encyc. Eaton.

AR'IMAN, } n. [Per. ahriman. Sans. ari, a foe.]

The evil genius or demon of the Persians; opposed to yezad, yezdan, ormozd, or hormizda, the good demon. The ancient magi held, that there are two deities or principles; one the author of all good, eternally absorbed in light; the other, the author of all evil, forever buried in darkness; or the one represented by light; the other by darkness. The latter answers to the loke of the Scandinavians, whose Celtic name, lock, signifies darkness. Originally, the Persians held these demons or principles to be equal, and from all eternity; but the moderns maintain that the evil principle is an inferior being. So the devil is called the prince of darkness. Encyc. Gibbon. As. Researches.

ARIOLA'TION or } n. [L. ariolus or hario, a soothsayer.]

HARIOLA'TION, } A soothsaying; a foretelling. Brown.

ARISTOCRATICNESS, n. The quality of being aristocratical.

ARISTOTELIAN, a. Pertaining to Aristotle, a celebrated philosopher, who was born at Stagira, in Macedon, about 384 years before Christ. The Aristotelian philosophy is otherwise called peripatetic.

ARISTOTELIAN, n. A follower of Aristotle, who was a disciple of Plato, and founded the sect of peripatetics. [See Peripatetic.]

ARISTOTELIANISM, n. The philosophy or doctrines of Aristotle.

ARISTOTELIC, a. Pertaining to Aristotle or to his philosophy.

The pernicious effects of the Aristotelic system. Schlegel, Trans.

ARITHMANCY, n. [Gr. arithmos, number, and μαντεια, divination.]

Divination or the foretelling of future events by the use or observation of numbers.

ARITHMETIC, n. [Gr. arithmos, to number, arithmetike, the art of numbering, from arithmos, number; from ρυθμος, number, rhythm, order, agreement.]

The science of numbers, or the art of computation. The various operations of arithmetic are performed by addition, subtraction, multiplication and division.

ARITHMETIC, a. Pertaining to arithmetic.

ARITHMETICALLY, adv. According to the rules, principles or method of arithmetic.

ARITHMETICIAN, n. One skilled in arithmetic, or versed in the science of numbers.

ARK, n. [Fr. arche; L. arca; Sp. Port. It. arca, a chest or coffer; Ir. airg, airk; Sax. erc or erk; G. arche; D. arke; Ch. ark.]

1. A small close vessel, chest or coffer, such as that which was the repository of the tables of the covenant among the Jews. This was about three feet nine inches in length. The lid was the propitiatory, or mercy seat, over which were the cherubs. The vessel in which Moses was set afloat upon the Nile was an ark of bulrushes.

2. The large floating vessel, in which Noah and his family were preserved, during the deluge.

3. A depository.

Arise, O Lord, into thy rest, thou and the ark of thy strength. Ps. cxxxii.

4. A large boat used on American rivers, to transport produce to market.

ARM, n. [Sax. arm, earm; D. G. Sw. Dan. arm; L. armus, an arm, a shoulder, a wing. In Russ. a shoulder is ramo, which may be the same word as the L. armus. If so, this word belongs to the root, Rm, coinciding with L. ramus, a branch, that is, a shoot, like the Celtic braich, L. brachium. But if the L. armus is directly from the Gr. apros, a joint, it would seem to be formed from Gr. apw, to fit.]

1. The limb of the human body, which extends from the shoulder to the hand.

2. The branch of a tree, or the slender part of a machine, projecting from a trunk or axis. The limbs of animals are also sometimes called arms.

3. A narrow inlet of water from the sea.

4. Figuratively, power, might, strength; as the secular arm. In this sense the word is often used in the scriptures.

To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed. Isa. liii.

ARM, v. t. [L. armo; Fr. armer; Sp. armar; It. armare; from L. arma.]

1. To furnish or equip with weapons of offense, or defense; as, to arm the militia.

2. To cover with a plate, or with whatever will add strength, force, or security; as, to arm the hilt of a sword.

3. To furnish with means of defense; to prepare for resistance; to fortify.

Arm yourselves with the same mind. 1 Pet. iv.

ARM, v. i. To provide with arms, weapons, or means of attack or resistance; to take arms; as, the nations arm for war.

This verb is not really intransitive in this use, but reciprocal, the pronoun being omitted. The nations arm—for, the nations arm themselves.

ARMA'DA, n. [Sp. from arma.]

A fleet of armed ships; a squadron. The term is usually applied to the Spanish fleet, called the Invincible Armada, consisting of 130 ships, intended to act against England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, A. D. 1588.

ARMADILLO, n. [Sp.; so called from being armed with a bony shell.]

A quadruped peculiar to America, called also tatoo, and in zoology, the dasypus. This animal has neither fore-teeth, nor dog-teeth; it is covered with a hard, bony shell, divided into movable belts, except on the forehead, shoulders and haunches, where it is not movable. The belts are connected by a membrane, which enables the animal to roll itself up like a hedge hog. These animals burrow in the earth, where they lie during the day time, seldom going abroad except at night. They are of different sizes; the largest 3 feet in length, without the tail. They subsist chiefly on fruits and roots; sometimes on insects and flesh. When attacked, they roll themselves into a ball, presenting their armor on all sides to any assailant; but they are inoffensive, and their flesh is esteemed good food. Encyc.

2. A hole for the arm in a garment.

ARMIG'EROUS, a. [L. armiger; arma and geru.]

Literally, bearing arms. But in present usage, armiger is a title of dignity next in degree to a knight. In times of chivalry, it signified an attendant on a knight, or other person of rank, who bore his shield and rendered him other military services. So in antiquity, Abimilech, Saul, &c. had their armor bearers. Judg. ix. 1 Sam. xvi. As had Hector and Achilles. Homer. This title, under the French princes, in England, was exchanged, in common usage, for esquire, Fr. ecuyer, a word of similar import, from ecu, L. scutum, a shield. Armiger is still retained with us, as a title of respect, being the Latin word equivalent to esquire, which see. Spelman.

ARMILLARY, a. [L. armilla, a bracelet, from armus, the arm.]

Resembling a bracelet, or ring; consisting of rings or circles. It is chiefly applied to an artificial sphere, composed of a number of circles of the mundane sphere, put together in their natural order, to assist in giving a just conception of the constitution of the heavens, and the motions of the celestial bodies. This artificial sphere revolves upon its axis within a horizon, divided into degrees, and movable every way upon a brass supporter. Encyc.

ARMING, ppr. Equipping with arms; providing with the means of defense or attack; also, preparing for resistance in a moral sense.

ARMINGS, n. The same as waist-clothes, hung about a ship's upper works. Chambers.

ARMIN'IAN, a. Pertaining to Arminius, or designating his principles.

ARMIN'IAN, n. One of a sect or party of Christians, so called from Arminius, or Harmansen, of Holland, who flourished at the close of the 16th century, and beginning of the 17th. The Arminian doctrines are, 1. Conditional election and reprobation, in opposition to absolute predestination. 2. Universal redemption, or that the atonement was made by Christ for all mankind, though none but believers can be partakers of the benefit. 3. That man, in order to exercise true faith, must be regenerated and renewed by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God; but that this grace is not irresistible and may be lost; so that men may relapse from a state of grace and die in their sins. Encyc.

ARRA'IGN, v. t. arra'ne. [Norm. arraner, arraisoner, and aresner, to put to answer, to arraign. The usual derivation of this word, from Sax. wreogan, gewreogan, to accuse, is probably incorrect. It appears to be of Norman origin, and if s is radical, it coincides in origin with L. reus, contracted from the root of res.]

1. To call or set a prisoner at the bar of a court, to answer to the matter charged against him in an indictment or information. When called, the indictment is read to him, and he is put to plead, guilty or not guilty, and to elect by whom he will be tried. Blackstone.

2. According to Law writers, to set in order; to fit for trial; as, to arraign a writ of novel disseisin. To arraign the assize, is to cause the tenant to be called to make the plaint, and set the cause in order, that the tenant may be brought to answer. Cowel.

3. To accuse; to charge with faults. Johnson. More correctly, to call before the bar of reason, or taste; to call in question, for faults, before any tribunal.

They will not arraign you for want of knowledge. Dryden.

ARRA'IGN, n. arra'ne. Arraignment; as, clerk of the arraigns. Blackstone.

ARRA'IGNED, pp. Called before a tribunal to answer, and elect triers; accused; called in question.

ARRA'IGNING, ppr. Calling before a court or tribunal; accusing.

1. To obstruct; to stop; to check or hinder motion; as, to arrest the current of a river; to arrest the senses.

2. To take, seize or apprehend by virtue of a warrant from authority; as, to arrest one for debt or for a crime.

3. To seize and fix; as, to arrest the eyes or attention.

The appearance of such a person in the world, and at such a period, ought to arrest the consideration of every thinking mind. Buckminster.

4. To hinder, or restrain; as, to arrest the course of justice.

ARREST', n. The taking or apprehending of a person by virtue of a warrant from authority. An arrest is made by seizing or touching the body.

A R R

2. Any seizure, or taking by power, physical or moral.

3. A stop, hindrance or restraint.

4. In law, an arrest of judgment is the staying or stopping of a judgment after verdict, for causes assigned. Courts have power to arrest judgment for intrinsic causes appearing upon the face of the record; as when the declaration varies from the original writ; when the verdict differs materially from the pleadings; or when the case laid in the declaration is not sufficient in point of law, to found an action upon. The motion for this purpose is called a motion in arrest of judgment. Blackstone.

5. A mangy humor between the ham and pastern of the hind legs of a horse. Johnson.

ARSENIAC or ARSENICAL ACID. Arsenic combined with a greater proportion of oxygen, than in the arsenious acid. It is called arsenic acid by most authors.

ARSENIATE, n. A neutral salt, formed by arsenical acid combined with any metallic, earthy or saline base.

Lavoisier. Fourcroy.

ARSENIC, n. [Ar. زرنق zirnakon; Syr.

ܙܪܢܩ zarnika; Gr. αρσενικον; L. arsenicum; Sp. arsenico; Fr. arsenic.]

Arsenic, as it is usually seen in the shops, is not a metal, but an oxyd, from which the metal may be easily obtained by mixing it with half its weight of black flux, and introducing the mixture into a Florence flask, gradually raised to a red heat, in a sand bath. A brilliant metallic sublimate of pure arsenic collects in the upper part of the flask. Arsenic is of a steel blue color, quite brittle, and the metal with all its compounds, is a virulent poison, vulgarly called rats-bane. It forms alloys with most of the metals. Combined with sulphur it forms orpiment or realgar, which are the yellow and red sulphurets of arsenic. Orpiment is the true arsenicum of the ancients. Plin. 34, 18. Native orpiment appears in yellow, brilliant, and seemingly talcky masses of various sizes; realgar is red, of different shades, and often crystalized in needles. Arsenic is also found as a mineralizer in cobalt, antimony, copper, iron and silver ores. It is brought chiefly from the cobalt works in Saxony, where zaffer is made. Webster's Manual.

Fourcroy. Nicholson. Cyc.

ARSENICAL, a. Belonging to arsenic: consisting of or containing arsenic.

ARSENICATE, v. t. To combine with arsenic.

ARSENICATED, a. Combined with arsenic.

ARSENIUS, a. Pertaining to, or containing arsenic. The arsenious acid, or white oxyd of arsenic, is a combination of arsenic with a less proportion of oxygen than in the arseniac acid.

ARSENITE, n. A salt formed by the arsenious acid, with a base.

ARSHINE, n. A Russian measure of two feet, four inches and 242 decimals. This seems to be the Chinese arschin, of which four make three yards English.

Tooke's Russia. Encyc.

ARSON, n. arsn. [Norm. Fr. arsine, arseun; from L. ardeo, arsum, to burn.]

In law, the malicious burning of a dwelling house or outhouse of another man, which by the common law is felony. The definition of this crime is varied by statutes in different countries and states. In Connecticut, the burning not only of a dwelling house or contiguous building, but of a ship or other vessel, is declared to be arson, if human life is thereby destroyed or put to hazard.

ART. The second person, indicative mode, present tense, of the substantive verb am; but from were, Sw. vara, Dan. verer.

ART, n. [L. ars, artis; probably contracted from the root of W. cerz, Ir. ceard. The radical sense is strength, from stretching, straining, the primary sense of strength and power, and hence of skill. See an analogy in can.]

1. The disposition or modification of things by human skill, to answer the purpose intended. In this sense art stands opposed to nature. Bacon. Encyc.

2. A system of rules, serving to facilitate the performance of certain actions; opposed to science, or to speculative principles; as the art of building or engraving. Arts are divided into useful or mechanic, and liberal or polite. The mechanic arts are those in which the hands and body are more concerned than the mind; as in making clothes, and utensils. These arts are called trades. The liberal or polite arts are those in which the mind or imagination is chiefly concerned; as poetry, music and painting.

In America, literature and the elegant arts must grow up side by side with the coarser plants of daily necessity. Irving.

3. Skill, dexterity, or the power of performing certain actions, acquired by experience, study or observation; as, a man has the art of managing his business to advantage.

ARTEMISIA, n. Mug-wort, southern-wood, and wormwood; a genus of plants of numerous species. Of these, the absinthium or common wormwood is well known.

ARTERIAL, a. [See Artery.] Pertaining to an artery or the arteries; as arterial action.

2. Contained in an artery; as arterial blood.
ARTERIOTOMY, n. [Gr. arteria, an artery, and tomē, a cutting.]

The opening of an artery by the lancet, for the purpose of letting blood.

ARTERY, n. [Gr. arteria, from arp, air, and tereo, to preserve or contain; so called, from the opinion of the ancients, that the arteries contained or circulated air. The term was also applied to the trachea or wind pipe, arteria aspera. In Ger. Luft-ader, air-vein, is the name for artery; in Dutch, slag-ader, stroke-vein; in Swed. puls-ader, pulse-vein; Dan. puls-aare, pulse vein, that is, the beating vein.]

A cylindrical vessel or tube, which conveys the blood from the heart to all parts of the body. There are two principal arteries; the aorta, which rises from the left ventricle and ramifies through the whole body; and the pulmonary artery, which conveys the blood from the right ventricle to the lungs, to undergo respiration. An artery is composed of three coats; the outer consists of condensed cellular membrane, and is supplied with numerous blood vessels and nerves; the middle coat consists of circular fibers, generally supposed to be muscular; the inner coat, thin, smooth, and dense, confines the blood within its canal, and facilitates its motion.

Parr. Cyc.

ARTFUL, a. [See Art.] Performed with art or skill.

ARTIC. This word is by mistake used by some authors for artic.

ARTICHOKE, n. [Qu. the first syllable of Gr. artichoxa. Fr. artichaut; Arm. artichauden; Sp. alcachofa; Port. alcachofra; It. carciofo, carciofano, or carciofalo. The first syllable is probably the L. carduus, chard, thistle, corrupted. D. artichok; G. artischoke; Dan. artiskok.]

A plant somewhat resembling a thistle, with a dilated, imbricated and prickly calyx. The head is large, rough and scaly, on an upright stalk. It is composed of numerous, oval scales, inclosing the florets, sitting on a broad receptacle, which, with the fleshy base of the scales, is the eatable part of the plant.

Encyc. Miller.

The Jerusalem artichoke is a species of sun-flower or helianthus.

ARTICLE, n. [L. articulus, a joint, from artus; Gr. arthron.]

1. A single clause in a contract, account, system of regulations, treaty, or other writing; a particular separate charge or item, in an account; a term, condition, or stipulation, in a contract. In short, a distinct part of a writing, instrument or discourse, consisting of two or more particulars; as, articles of agreement; an account consisting of many articles.

2. A point of faith; a doctrinal point or proposition in theology; as the thirty-nine articles.

3. A distinct part.

Upon each article of human duty. Paley.

4. A particular commodity, or substance; as, an article of merchandize; salt is a necessary article. In common usage, this word is applied to almost every separate substance or material.

The articles which compose the blood. Darwin.

5. A point of time. [Not in use.] Clarendon.

6. In botany, that part of a stalk or stem, which is between two joints. Milne.

7. In grammar, an adjective used before nouns, to limit or define their application; as hic, ille, ipse, in Latin; ο, η, το, in Greek; the, this, that, in English; le, la, les, in French; il, la, lo, in Italian. The primary use of these adjectives was to convert an indeterminate name into a determinate one; or to limit the application of a common name, to a specific, known, or certain individual. But article being an improper term to express the true signification, I make use of definitive, which see.

ARTICLE, v. t. To draw up in distinct particulars; as, to article the errors or follies of a man. Taylor.

2. To accuse or charge by an exhibition of articles. "He shall be articled against in the High Court of admiralty." Stat. 33. George III.

ARTICLED, pp. Drawn up in particulars; accused or bound by articles.

ARTICULAR, a. [L. articularis.]

Belonging to the joints; as, the gout is an articular disease.

ARTICULATE, a. [L. articulatus, jointed, distinct.]

Formed by jointing or articulation of the organs of speech; applied to sound. An articulate sound is made by closing and opening the organs of speech. The junction or closing of the organs forms a joint or articulation, as in the syllables ab, ad, ap; in passing from one articulation to another, the organs are, or may be opened, and a vowel is uttered, as in attune; and the different articulations, with the intervening vocal sounds, form what is called articulate sounds; sounds distinct, separate, and modified by articulation or jointing. This articulation constitutes the prominent difference between the human voice and that of brutes. Brutes open the mouth and make vocal sounds, but have, either not at all, or very imperfectly, the power of articulation.

2. Expressed in articles, or in separate particulars. [Not used.] Brown.

3. Jointed; formed with joints. Botany.

ARTICULATE, v. t. To utter articulate sounds; to utter distinct syllables or words.

2. To draw up or write in separate particulars. [Not used.] Shak.

3. To treat, stipulate or make terms. [Not used.] Shak.

4. To joint. Smith.

ARTICULATED, pp. Uttered distinctly in syllables or words.

2. Jointed; having joints, as a plant.

ARTICULATELY, adv. With distinct utterance of syllables or words.

2. Article by article; in detail. Paley.

ARTICULATENESS, n. The quality of being articulate.

ARTICULATING, ppr. Uttering in distinct syllables or words.

ARTICULATION, n. In anatomy, the joining or juncture of the bones. This is of three kinds: 1st, diarthrosis, or a movable connection, including enarthrosis, or the ball and socket joint; arthrodia, which is the same, but more superficial; ginglymus, or hinge-like joint; and trochoid, or the wheel and axle: 2d, synarthrosis, immovable connection, as by suture, or junction by serrated margins; harmony, or union by straight margins; and gomphosis, like a nail driven in a board, as the teeth in their sockets: 3d, symphysis, or union by means of another substance; as synchondrosis, union by a cartilage; syssarcosis, union by muscular fibres; synneurosis, union by a tendon; syndesmosis, union by ligaments; and synostosis, union by a bony substance.

Quincy. Coze.

2. In botany, the connection of the parts of a plant by joints; also the nodes or joints, as in cane and maize. Encyc.

3. The forming of words; a distinct utterance of syllables and words by the human voice, by means of closing and opening the organs.

4. A consonant; a letter noting a jointing or closing of the organs.

ARTIFICE, n. [L. artificium, from ars, art, and facio, to make.]

2. Feigned; fictitious; not genuine or natural; as artificial tears.
3. Contrived with skill or art.
4. Cultivated; not indigenous; not being of spontaneous growth; as artificial grasses. Gibbon.

Artificial arguments, in rhetoric, are arguments invented by the speaker, in distinction from laws, authorities and the like, which are called inartificial arguments or proofs. Johnson.

Artificial lines, on a sector or scale, are lines so contrived as to represent the logarithmic sines and tangents, which, by the help of the line of numbers, solve, with tolerable exactness, questions in trigonometry, navigation, &c.

Artificial numbers, the same with logarithms. Chambers. Encyc.

ARTIFICIALITY, n. The quality of being artificial; appearance of art. Shenstone.

ARTIFICIALLY, adv. By art, or human skill and contrivance; hence, with good contrivance; with art or ingenuity.

ARTIFICIALNESS, n. The quality of being artificial.

ARTILLERY, n. This word has no plural. [Fr. artillerie; It. artiglieria; Sp. artilleria. In Fr. artilleur, artillier, is a matross; Sp. artillar, to mount cannon. In Armoric, artillery is artilhery, and an artist is artilher. In Norm. Fr. artillery is written artilclerie. The Armoric unites this word with art, artist, indicating that the primary sense is, instruments, things formed by art or rather prepared by art, preparations.]

1. In a general sense, offensive weapons of war. Hence it was formerly used for bows and arrows.

And Jonathan gave his artillery to his lad. 1 Sam. xx.

But in present usage, appropriately,

2. Cannon; great guns; ordnance, including guns, mortars and grenades, with their furniture of carriages, balls, bombs and shot of all kinds.

3. In a more extended sense, the word includes powder, cartridges, matches, utensils, machines of all kinds, and horses that belong to a train of artillery.

4. The men who manage cannon and mortars, including matrosses, gunners, bombardiers, cannoniers, or by whatever name they are called, with the officers, engineers and persons who supply the artillery with implements and materials. Encyc.

2. A skilful man; not a novice.
3. In an academical sense, a proficient in the faculty of arts; a philosopher. Encyc.
4. One skilled in the fine arts; as a painter, sculptor, architect, &c.

ARTLESS, a. Unskilful; wanting art, knowledge or skill. Dryden.

2. Free from guile, art, craft or stratagem; simple; sincere; unaffected; undesigning; as an artless mind.
3. Contrived without skill or art; as an artless tale.

ARTLESSLY, adv. Without art or skill; in an artless manner.

2. Without guile; naturally; sincerely; unaffectedly. Pope.

ARTLESSNESS, n. The quality of being void of art or guile; simplicity; sincerity; unaffectedness.

AR TOTYRITE, n. [of Gr. apros, bread, and typos, cheese.]

One of a sect of heretics, in the primitive church, who celebrated the eucharist with bread and cheese, alledging that the first oblations of men were not only the fruit of the earth, but of their flocks. They admitted females to the priesthood and episcopacy. Encyc.

ARTS-MAN, n. A learned man. Obs.

ARUNDELIAN, a. Pertaining to Arundel, as Arundelian marbles. The Arundelian marbles are ancient stones, containing a chronological detail of the principal events of Greece, from Cecrops, who lived about 1582 years before Christ, to the archonship of Diognetus, before Christ 264. The engraving was done in Paros, and the chronology is called the Parian Chronicle. These stones are called Arundelian from the Earl of Arundel, who employed William Petty to procure relics of antiquity in the East, in 1624. These, with other curiosities, were purchased, and by the Earl's grandson presented to the University of Oxford. Their antiquity and even their authenticity has been questioned. Encyc.

ARUNDINACEOUS, a. [L. arundo, a reed.] Pertaining to a reed; resembling the reed or cane.

ARUNDINEOUS, a. Abounding with reeds.

ARURA, n. [Gr. aroura.] Literally, as authors suppose, a plowed field. According to Herodotus, and Suidas, the arura of Egypt, was a piece of ground fifty feet square. Others make it a square of 100 cubits; others of 100 feet. The Grecian aroura was a square measure of half the plethron. [See Aroura.]

Encyc. Herod. Euterpe.

ARUSPEX, n. [L.] A soothsayer. Dryden.

ARUSPICE, n. written also haruspice. [L. arusper, or haruspex, a soothsayer, or diviner, who attempted to foretell events by consulting the entrails of beasts slain in sacrifice. Qu. Teut. orf, yrf; Eth. አገዮ arwe, cattle, and L. specio, to view.]

ASB

A priest, in ancient Rome, whose business was to inspect the entrails of victims, killed in sacrifice, and by them to foretell future events.

ARUSPICY, n. The act of prognosticating by inspection of the entrails of beasts, slain in sacrifice. Butler.

AS, adv. az. [Pers. asa, like, similar, as; Gr. ως. Qu. Fr. aussi. But more probably the English word is contracted from als, G. and D. It corresponds in sense with the Persian.]

1. Literally, like; even; similar. "Ye shall be as Gods, knowing good and evil." "As far as we can see," that is, like far, equally far. Hence it may be explained by in like manner; as, do as you are commanded.

2. It was formerly used where we now use that. Obs.

The relations are so uncertain as they require a great deal of examination. Bacon.

3. It was formerly used for as if. Obs.

He lies, as he his bliss did know. Waller.

4. While; during; at the same time. "He trembled as he spoke." But in most of its uses, it is resolvable into like, equal, even, or equally, in like manner. In some phrases, it must be considered a nominative word, or other words must be supplied. "Appoint to office such men as deserve public confidence." This phrase may be elliptical for "such men as those who deserve public confidence."

As seems, in some cases, to imply the sense of proportion. "In general, men are more happy, as they are less involved in public concerns."

As, in a subsequent part of a sentence, answers to such; give us such things as you please; and in a preceding part of a sentence, has so to answer to it; as with the people, so with the priest.

AS, n. [L.] A Roman weight of 12 ounces, answering to the libra or pound.

2. A Roman coin, originally of a pound weight; but reduced, after the first Punic war, to two ounces; in the second Punic war, to one ounce; and by the Papirian law, to half an ounce. It was originally stamped with the figure of a sheep, sow, or ox; and afterwards with a Janus, on one side, and on the reverse, a rostrum or prow of a ship.

3. An integer; a whole or single thing. Hence the English acc. Hence the Romans used the word for the whole inheritance; hæres ex asse, an heir to the whole estate. Encyc.

ASA, a corruption of lasar, an ancient name of a gum. [See Ooze.]

ASA-DULCIS, the same as benzoin.

ASA-FETIDA, n. [Asa, gum, and L. fetidus, fetid.]

ASBESTINE, a. [See Asbestos.]

Pertaining to asbestos, or partaking of its nature and qualities; incombustible.

ASBESTINITE, n. [See Asbestos.] The actinolite or strahlstein. Kirwan.
Calcareous asbestinite; a variety of steatite.

ASBESTUS, } [Gr. ασbestos, inextinguish-
ASBESTOS, } n. able; of a neg. and σβεννυμι, to extinguish.]

A mineral, which has frequently the appearance of a vegetable substance. It is always fibrous, and its fibers sometimes appear to be prismatic crystals. They are sometimes delicate, flexible, and elastic; at other times, stiff and brittle. Its powder is soft to the touch; its colors are some shade of white, gray or green, passing into brown, red or black. It is incombustible, and has been wrought into a soft, flexible cloth, which was formerly used as a shroud for dead bodies. It has been also manufactured into incombustible paper, and wicks for lamps.

Kirwan. Encyc. Cleaveland.
Ligniform asbestos is a variety of a brown color, of a splintery fracture, and if broken across, presents an irregular filamentous structure, like wood. Kirwan.

ASCARIS, n. plu. ascarides. [Gr.]
In zoology, a genus of intestinal worms. The body is cylindrical, and tapering at the ends. It includes two of the most common worms in the human intestines, the ascarides, and the lumbricoides.

ASCEND, v. i. [L. ascendo, from scando, to mount or climb; W. esgyn, to rise; cyn, first, chief. It has the same elements as begin.]

1. To move upwards; to mount; to go up; to rise, whether in air or water, or upon a material object.
2. To rise, in a figurative sense; to proceed from an inferior to a superior degree, from mean to noble objects, from particulars to generals, &c.
3. To proceed from modern to ancient times; to recur to former ages; as, our inquiries ascend to the remotest antiquity.

4. In a corresponding sense, to proceed in a line towards ancestors; as, to ascend to our first progenitors.
5. To rise as a star; to proceed or come above the horizon.
6. In music, to rise in vocal utterance; to pass from any note to one more acute.

ASCEND, v. t. To go or move upwards upon, as to ascend a hill or ladder; or to climb, as to ascend a tree.

ASCENDABLE, a. That may be ascended.

ASCENDANT, n. Superiority or commanding influence; as, one man has the ascendancy over another.

2. An ancestor, or one who precedes in genealogy, or degrees of kindred; opposed to descendant.

3. Highth; elevation. [Little used.] Temple.

4. In astrology, that degree of the ecliptic which rises above the horizon at the time of one's birth. That part of the ecliptic at any particular time above the horizon, supposed to have influence on a person's life and fortune. Johnson. Encyc.

ASCENDING, a. Superior; predominant; surpassing.

2. In astrology, above the horizon.

ASCENDED, pp. or a. Risen; mounted up; gone to heaven.

ASCENDENCY, n. Power; governing or controlling influence.

Custom has an ascendancy over the understanding. Watts.

ASCENDING, ppr. Rising; moving upwards; proceeding from the less to the greater; proceeding from modern to ancient, from grave to more acute. A star is said to be ascending, when rising above the horizon, in any parallel of the equator.

Ascending latitude is the latitude of a planet, when moving towards the North pole.

Ascending node is that point of a planet's orbit, wherein it passes the ecliptic to proceed northward. It is also called the northern node.

Ascending vessels, in anatomy, are those which carry the blood upward or toward the superior parts of the body.

ASCENSION, n. [L. ascensio.]

1. The act of ascending; a rising. It is frequently applied to the visible elevation of our Savior to Heaven.

2. The thing rising, or ascending. [Not authorized.]

3. In astronomy, ascension is either right or oblique. Right ascension of the sun or of a star, is that degree of the equinoctial, counted from the beginning of Aries, which rises with the sun or star, in a right sphere. Oblique ascension is an arch of the equator, intercepted between the first point of Aries, and that point of the equator which rises together with a star, in an oblique sphere. Johnson.

ASCENSION-DAY, n. A festival of some christian churches, held ten days or on the Thursday but one, before Whitsuntide, which is called Holy Thursday, in commemoration of our Savior's ascension into heaven, after his resurrection.

Ascensional difference is the difference between the right and oblique ascension of the same point on the surface of the sphere. Chambers.

ASCENSIVE, a. Rising; tending to rise, or causing to rise. Journ. of Science.

ASCENT, n. [L. ascensus.]

1. The act of rising; motion upwards, whether in air, water or other fluid, or on elevated objects; rise; a mounting upwards; as the ascent of vapors from the earth.

2. The way by which one ascends; the means of ascending. Bacon.

3. An eminence, hill or high place. Addison.

4. The degree of elevation of an object, or the angle it makes with a horizontal line; as, a road has an ascent of five degrees.

5. Acclivity; the rise of a hill; as a steep ascent.

ASCERTAIN, v. t. [from the L. ad certum, to a certainty.]

1. To make certain; to define or reduce to precision, by removing obscurity or ambiguity. The divine law ascertains the truth. Hooker.

2. To make certain, by trial, examination or experiment, so as to know what was before unknown; as, to ascertain the weight of a commodity, or the purity of a metal.

3. To make sure by previous measures.

The ministry, in order to ascertain a majority in the house of lords, persuaded the queen to create twelve new peers. Smollett.

4. To make certain or confident, followed by a pronoun; as, to ascertain us of the goodness of our work. [Unusual.] Dryden.

5. To fix; to establish with certainty; to render invariable, and not subject to will. The mildness and precision of their laws ascertained the rule and measure of taxation. Gibbon.

ASCERTAINABLE, a. That may be made certain in fact, or certain to the mind; that may be certainly known or reduced to a certainty. Kerr's Lavoisier.

ASCERTAINED, pp. Made certain; defined; established; reduced to a certainty.

ASCERTAINER, n. The person who ascertains or makes certain.

ASCERTAINING, ppr. Making certain; fixing; establishing; reducing to a certainty; obtaining certain knowledge.

ASCERTAINMENT, n. The act of ascertaining; a reducing to certainty; certainty; fixed rule. Swift. Burke.

ACCESSANCY, } [See Accessency, Accessant, } cent.

ASCETIC, a. [Gr. ασκητος, exercised, hardened; from ασκω, to exercise.]

Retired from the world; rigid; severe; austere; employed in devotions and mortifications.

ASCETIC, n. One who retires from the customary business of life, and devotes himself to the duties of piety and devotion; a hermit; a recluse.

2. The title of certain books, on devout exercises; as the ascetics of St. Basil.

ASCIAN, n. [L. ascii, from Gr. a priv. and σκια, a shadow.]

A person, who, at certain times of the year, has no shadow at noon. Such are the inhabitants of the torrid zone, who have, at times, a vertical sun. Bailey.

ASCITANS, n. [Gr. ασκος, a bag or bottle of skin.]

A sect or branch of Montanists, who appeared in the second century. They introduced into their assemblies, certain bacchanals, who danced around a bag or skin distended with air, in allusion to the bottles filled with new wine. Math ix. Encyc.

ASCITES, n. [Gr. ασκος, a bladder.]
A dropsy or tense elastic swelling of the belly, with fluctuation, from a collection of water. Coze. Quincy.

ASCITIC, } a. Belonging to an ascites;
ASCITIC, } a. dropsical; hydropical.

ASCITIOUS, a. [L. ascitus; Low L. ascititius; from ascisco, to take to or associate.]

Homer has been reckoned an ascititious name. Pope.

ASCLEPIAD, n. In ancient poetry, a verse of four feet, the first of which is a spondee, the second, a choriamb, and the last two, dactyls; or of four feet and a cesura, the first, a spondee, the second, a dactyl, then the cesura, followed by two dactyls; as, Mæcenas atque vis edite regibus. Encyc.

ASCRIBABLE, a. [See Ascribe.] That may be ascribed or attributed.

ASCRIBE, v. t. [L. ascribo, of ad and scribo, to write.]

1. To attribute, impute, or set to, as to a cause; to assign, as effect to a cause; as, losses are often to be ascribed to imprudence.

I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes.
Job xlii.

ASH-FIRE, n. A low fire used in chymical operations.

ASH-HOLE, n. A repository for ashes; the lower part of a furnace.

ASH/LAR, n. Common or free stones, as they come from the quarry, of different lengths, breadths and thicknesses.

ASH/LERING, n. Quartering for lathing to, in garrets, two or three feet high, perpendicular to the floor, and reaching to the under side of the rafters.

ASHORE, adv. [a, at or on, and shore. See Shore.]

1. On shore; on the land adjacent to water; to the shore; as, bring the goods ashore.

2. On land, opposed to aboard; as, the captain of the ship remained ashore.

3. On the ground; as, the ship was driven ashore.

ASHWEDNESDAY, n. The first day of Lent; supposed to be so called from a custom in the Romish Church of sprinkling ashes, that day, on the heads of penitents, then admitted to penance.

ASH-WEED, n. A plant, the small wild angelica, gout-wort, goats-foot, or herb-gerard.

ASH/Y, a. Belonging to ashes; ash-colored; pale; inclining to a whitish gray.

ASHY-PALE, a. Pale as ashes.

ASIAN, a. [from Asia, a name originally given to Asia Minor or some part of it; perhaps from the Asses, Ases or Osses, about Mount Taurus. Mallet, North. Ant. i. 60. Plin. 6. 17.]

Pertaining to Asia.

ASIARCH, n. [Asia and αρχος, chief.] A chief or pontiff of Asia; one who had the superintendence of the public games.

ASIATIC, a. Belonging to Asia, a quarter of the globe which extends from the strait of Constantinople and the Arabian gulf, to the Pacific ocean on the east. It is probable, the name was originally appropriated to what is now Asia Minor or rather a part of it.

ASIATIC, n. A native of Asia.

ASIATICISM, n. Imitation of the Asiatic manner.

ASIDE, adv. [a and side. See Side.]

1. On or to one side; out of a perpendicular or straight direction.

2. At a little distance from the main part or body.

Thou shalt set aside that which is full. 2 Kings iv.

3. From the body; as, to put or lay aside a garment. John xiii.

4. From the company; at a small distance or in private; as when speakers utter something by themselves, upon the stage.

5. Separate from the person, mind or attention; in a state of abandonment.

Let us lay aside every weight. Heb. xii.

6. Out of the line of rectitude or propriety, in a moral view.

They are all gone aside. Ps. xiv.

7. In a state of separation to a particular use; as, to set aside a thing for a future day.

To set aside, in judicial proceedings, is to defeat the effect or operation of, by a subsequent decision of a superior tribunal; as, to set aside a verdict or a judgment.

ASINE/GO, n. [Sp. asnico, a little ass.] A foolish fellow.

AS/ININE, rarely AS/INARY, a. [L. asinus; W. asyn, the ass; which see.]

Belonging to the ass; having the qualities of the ass.

ASK, v. t. [Sax. ascian, acsian, or arian; D. cischen; G. heischen; Ir. ascain; Gr. αἰσχω. Qu. Eth. ἄντη to pray or beseech.

In former times, the English word was pronounced ax, as in the royal style of assenting to bills in Parliament. "Be it as it is axed." In Calmuc, asoc signifies to inquire. The sense is to urge or press.]

1. To request; to seek to obtain by words; to petition; with of before the person to whom the request is made.

Ask counsel of God. Judges xviii.

2. To require, expect or claim.

To whom men have committed much, of him they will ask the more. Luke xii.

3. To interrogate, or inquire; to put a question, with a view to an answer.

He is of age, ask him. John ix.

4. To require, or make claim.

Ask me never so much dowry. Gen. xxix.

5. To claim, require or demand, as the price or value of a commodity; to set a price; as, what price do you ask?

6. To require, as physically necessary.

The exigence of a state asks a much longer time to conduct the design to maturity.

This sense is nearly or entirely obsolete; ask being superseded by require and demand.

7. To invite; as, to ask guests to a wedding or entertainment; ask my friend to step into the house.

ASK, v. i. To request or petition, followed by for; as, ask for bread; or without for.

Ask and it shall be given you. Mat. vii.

2. To inquire, or seek by request; sometimes followed by after.

Wherefore dost thou ask after my name? Gen. xxxii.

This verb can hardly be considered as strictly intransitive, for some person or object is always understood.

Ask is not equivalent to demand, claim, and require, at least, in modern usage; much less, is it equivalent to beg and beseech.

The first three words, demand, claim, require, imply a right or supposed right in the person asking, to the thing requested; and beseech implies more urgency, than ask.

Ask and request imply no right, but suppose the thing desired to be a favor. The French demandeur is correctly rendered by ask, rather than by demand.

ASK'ANCE, } adv. [D. schuins, sloping.]

ASK'ANT, } Sideways; obliquely; towards one corner of the eye. Dryden.

ASKED, pp. Requested; petitioned; questioned; interrogated.

ASKER, n. One who asks; a petitioner; an inquirer.

2. A water newt.

ASKEW' adv. [G. schief; Dan. skiev; D. schief, awry, crooked, oblique.]

With a wry look; aside; askant; sometimes indicating scorn, or contempt, or envy.

Spenser.

ASKING, ppr. Requesting; petitioning; interrogating; inquiring.

2. Silently expressing request or desire.

Explain the asking eye.

Pope.

ASLA'KE, v. t. [Sax. aslacian. See Slack.] To remit; to slacken. [Not in use.] Spenser.

ASLA'NI, n. A silver coin worth from 115 to 120 aspers.

Encyc.

ASL'ANT, a. or adv. [a and slant. See Slant.]

On one side; obliquely; not perpendicularly or with a right angle.

The shaft drove through his neck aslant.

Dryden.

ASLEEP, a. or adv. [a and sleep, or Sax. gyslapan, to sleep.]

1. Sleeping; in a state of sleep; at rest.

Sisera was fast asleep. Judges iv.

2. To a state of sleep; as to fall asleep.

3. Dead; in a state of death.

Concerning them who are asleep, sorrow not.

1 Thes. iv.

4. To death.

ASLO'PE, a. or adv. [a and slope. See Slope.]

With leaning or inclination; obliquely; with declivity or descent, as a hill; declining from an upright direction.

Set them not upright, but aslope. Bacon.

ASLUG', adv. In a sluggish manner. [Not used.] Fotherby.

ASMONE'AN, a. Pertaining to Asmoneus, the father of Simon, and chief of the Asmoneans, a family that reigned over the Jews 126 years.

ASMONE'AN, n. One of the family of Asmoneus.

ASOMATOUS, a. [Gr. a priv. and σωμα, body.]

Without a material body; incorporeal. [Not used.] Todd.

ASP, n. [L. aspis; Gr. ασπις, a round shield and an asp; supposed to be from Heb. and Ch. asph, to gather in, or collect; from the coil of this serpent, with his head elevated in the center, like the boss of a buckler.]

A small poisonous serpent of Egypt and Libya, whose bite occasions inevitable death, but without pain. It is said that the celebrated Cleopatra, rather than be carried a captive to Rome by Augustus, suffered death by the bite of the asp; but the fact has been questioned. Authors are not agreed, as to what species the asp of the ancients should be referred. Bruce thinks it the coluber cerastes, Linne.

ASPARATHUS, n. A plant.

ASPARAGIN, n. White transparent crystals of a peculiar vegetable principle, which spontaneously form in asparagus juice evaporated to the consistence of sirup. They are in the form of rhomboidal prisms.

Ure.

ASPARAGUS, n. [L. and Gr.; probably from ασπαρσσω, to tear, from its lacerated appearance, or from the root of ασπαραγος, a spire, from its stem.]

Sparagus: sperage; vulgarly, sparrow-grass; a genus of plants. That which is cultivated in gardens, has an upright herbaceous stalk, bristly leaves, and equal stipulas. The roots have a bitterish mucilaginous taste; and the stalk is, in some degree, aperient and deobstruent, but not very efficacious.

Encyc.

ASPECT, n. [L. aspectus, from aspicio, to look on, of ad and specio, to see or look.]

1. Look; view; appearance to the eye or the mind; as, to present an object or a subject in its true aspect, or under a double aspect. So we say, public affairs have a favorable aspect.

2. Countenance; look, or particular appearance of the face; as a mild or severe aspect.

3. View; sight; act of seeing. [This sense is now unusual.]

4. Position or situation with regard to seeing, or that position which enables one to look in a particular direction; as, a house has a southern aspect, that is, a position which faces or looks to the south.

5. In astronomy, the situation of one planet with respect to another. The aspects are five; sextile, when the planets are 60° distant; quartile, or quadrate, when their distance is 90°, or the quarter of a circle; trine, when the distance is 120°; opposition, when the distance is 180°, or half a circle; and conjunction, when they are in the same degree.

ASPECT', v. t. To behold. [Not used.] Temple.

ASPECT'ABLE, a. That may be seen. [Not used.] Raleigh.

ASPECT'ED, a. Having an aspect. [Not used.] B. Jonson.

ASPECT'ION, n. The act of viewing. [Not used.] Brown.

ASP'EN or ASP, n. [D. esp; G. aspe, aspe; Sax. aspe; Sw. asp; Dan. asp; Qu. from the Ar. خشفا gashafa, to be agitated.]

A species of the poplar, so called from the trembling of its leaves, which move with the slightest impulse of the air. Its leaves are roundish, smooth, and stand on long slender foot-stalks.

ASP'EN, a. Pertaining to the aspen, or resembling it; made of aspen wood.

Nor aspen leaves confess the gentlest breeze.

Gay.

AS'PER, a. [L. See Asperate.] Rough; rugged. [Little used.] Bacon.

AS'PER, n. [L. aspiro, to breathe.]

In grammar, the Greek accent', importing that the letter over which it is placed ought to be aspirated, or pronounced as if the letter h preceded it.

Encyc.

AS'PER, n. A Turkish coin, of which three make a medine. Its value is about a cent and 12 decimals.

AS'PERATE, v. t. [L. aspero, from asper, rough.]

To make rough or uneven.

Boyle.

ASPERA'TION, n. A making rough.

ASPERIFO'LIATE, a. [L. asper, rough, and folium, a leaf.]

Having rough leaves. Plants of this kind are, by some authors, classified according to this character. They constitute the forty-first order of Linne's fragments of a natural method. In the methods of Herman, Boerhave, and Ray, this class consists of plants which have four naked seeds. Their leaves stand alternately on the stalks, and the flower is monopetalous in five divisions.

Encyc. Milne.

ASPERIFO'LIOS, a. Having leaves rough to the touch. [See the preceding word.]

ASPER'ITY, n. [L. asperitas, from asper, rough.]

1. Roughness of surface; unevenness; opposed to smoothness.

Boyle.

2. Roughness of sound; that quality which grates the ear; harshness of pronunciation.

Warton.

3. Roughness to the taste; sourness.

4. Roughness or ruggedness of temper; moroseness; sourness; crabbedness.

Rogers.

5. Sharpness.

Berkeley.

ASPEROUS, a. [L. asper, rough.] Rough; uneven.

Boyle.

ASPERSE, v. t. aspers'. [L. aspergo, asper- sus, of ad and spargo, to scatter; Ar. رشح to split, divide, scatter. See Class Brg.]

1. To bespatter with foul reports or false and injurious charges; to tarnish in point of reputation, or good name; to slander or calumniate; as, to asperse a poet or his writings; to asperse a character.

Bp. Hall.

ASPHALT', n. [Gr. ασφαλτος.] Bitumen

ASPHALT'UM, n. [Judaicum, Jew's pitch; a smooth, hard, brittle, black or brown substance, which breaks with a polish, melts easily when heated, and when pure, burns without leaving any ashes. It has little taste, and scarcely any smell, unless heated, when it emits a strong smell of pitch. It is found in a soft or liquid state on the surface of the Dead Sea, which, from this substance, is called Asphaltite, or the Asphaltic Lake. It is found also in the earth, in many parts of Asia, Europe and America. Formerly, it was used for embalming dead bodies; the solid asphalt is still employed in Arabia, Egypt, and Persia, instead of pitch for ships; and the fluid asphalt is used for varnishing, and for burning in lamps. A species found in Neufchatel is found excellent as a cement for walls and pavements; very durable in air, and not penetrable by water. A composition of asphalt, lamp black and oil is used for drawing black figures on dial-plates.

Encyc. Nicholson.

ASPHALT'IC, a. Pertaining to asphalt, or containing it; bituminous.

Milton.

ASPHALT'ITE, a. Pertaining to or containing asphalt.

ASSAS'SINOUS, a. Murderous. [Not used.]

ASSAS'SINS, n. In Syria, a tribe or clan called Ismaelians, Batanists or Batenians.

They originated in Persia about the year 1090; whence a colony migrated and settled on the mountains of Lebanon, and were remarkable for their assassinations.

Their religion was a compound of magic, judaism, and christianity. One article of their creed was, that the Holy Spirit resided in their Chief, and that his orders proceeded from God himself.

He was called Scheik, and is better known by the denomination of Old man of the mountain.

This barbarous chieftain and his followers spread terror among nations far and near, for almost two centuries, when the tribe was subdued by Sultan Bibaris. Encyc.

ASSA'TION, n. [Fr. from L. assatus.] A roasting. [Not used.]

ASSAULT', n. [Fr. assault, now assaut; It. Port. assalto; Sp. asalto; from L. assulto, of ad and salto, to leap, formed on salio, or its root. See Assail. We have the same root in insult and result.]

1. An attack or violent onset, whether by an individual, a company, or an army. An assault by private persons may be made with or without weapons.

An assault by an army is a violent hostile attack; and when made upon a fort or fortified place is called a storm, as opposed to sap or siege.

2. An attack by hostile words or measures; as, an assault upon the prerogatives of a prince, or upon a constitution of government.

3. In Law, an unlawful setting upon one's person; an attempt or offer to beat another, without touching his person; as by

7. An assemblage. [Not in use.]
- ASSEMBLY-ROOM, n. A room in which persons assemble.
- ASSENT, n. [L. assensus, from assentior, to assent, of ad and sentio, to think; Eth. ἵλη sena or sana, concord, and its derivative, to agree, to harmonize; Sw. sinne, mind, sense; D. zin, mind; zinnen, to feel or mind; G. sinn, sense; sinnen, to think or consider. The Danes preserve the final consonant, sind, mind, sense, inclination; W. syn, sense; syniau, to perceive.]
1. The act of the mind in admitting, or agreeing to, the truth of a proposition. Faith is the assent to any proposition, on the credit of the proposer. Locke.
2. Consent; agreement to a proposal, respecting some right or interest; as, the bill before the house has the assent of a great majority of the members.
- The distinction between assent and consent seems to be this: assent is the agreement to an abstract proposition. We assent to a statement, but we do not consent to it. Consent is an agreement to some proposal or measure which affects the rights or interest of the consenter. We consent to a proposal of marriage. This distinction however is not always observed. [See Consent.]

3. Accord; agreement. 2 Chron. xviii.

ASSENT, v. i. To admit as true; to agree, yield or concede, or rather to express an agreement of the mind to what is alledged, or proposed.

The Jews also assented, saying these things are so. Acts xxiv.

It is sometimes used for consent, or an agreement to something affecting the rights or interest of the person assenting. But to assent to the marriage of a daughter is less correct than to consent.

ASSENTA'TION, n. [L. assentatio, from assentor, to comply.]

Compliance with the opinion of another, from flattery or dissimulation. Chesterfield.

ASSENTA'TOR, n. A flatterer.

ASSETS', n. plu. [Fr. assez, enough; It. assa, enough, or many; Ir. sath, sufficiency; sasadh, satisfaction; L. sat, satis, enough.]

Goods or estate of a deceased person, sufficient to pay the debts of the deceased. But the word sufficient, though expressing the original signification of assets, is not with us necessary to the definition. In present usage, assets are the money, goods or estate of a deceased person, subject by law to the payment of his debts and legacies. Assets are real or personal; real assets are lands which descend to the heir, subject to the fulfilment of the obligations of the ancestor; personal assets are the money or goods of the deceased, or debts due to him, which come into the hands of the executor or administrator, or which he is bound to collect and convert into money.

Blackstone.

ASSEVER, } v. t. [L. assevero, from

ASSEVERATE, } ad, and the Teutonic swear; Sax. swarian; Goth. swaran, to swear, to affirm positively.]

To affirm or aver positively, or with solemnity.

Fotherby.

ASSEVERA'TION, n. Positive affirmation or assertion; solemn declaration. This word is not, generally, if ever, used for a declaration under an official oath, but for a declaration accompanied with solemnity.

ASS-HEAD, n. [ass and head.] One dull, like the ass; one slow of apprehension; a blockhead.

ASSIDE/ANS or CHASIDE/ANS. [Heb. צדקנים.]

A sect of Jews who resorted to Mattathias to fight for the laws of their God and the liberties of their country. They were men of great zeal, and observed the traditions of the elders. From these sprung the Pharisees and Essenes.

Encyc.

AS/SIDENT, a. [L. assideo, assidens, of ad and sedeo, to sit.]

ASYMPTOTE, n. [Gr. α priv., συν, with, and πτωω, to fall; not meeting or coinciding.]

A line which approaches nearer and nearer to some curve, but though infinitely extended, would never meet it. This may be conceived as a tangent to a curve at an infinite distance. Chambers.

ASYMPTOTICAL, a. Belonging to an asymptote. Asymptotical lines or curves are such as continually approach, when extended, but never meet.

ASYN'DETON, n. [Gr. α priv. and συνδεω, to bind together.]

In grammar, a figure which omits the connective; as, veni, vidi, vici. It stands opposed to polysyndeton, which is a multiplication of connectives. Campbell.

ATE

AT, prep. [Sax. at; Goth. at; L. ad. At, ad and to, if not radically the same word, often coincide in signification. In W. at is to, and in Danish it is the sign of the infinitive mode; in Amh. od, or ud, is towards. The word at is doubtless the oriental את, את, Ch. and Heb. to come, to approach. Hence it primarily denotes presence, meeting, nearness, direction towards.]

In general, at denotes nearness, or presence; as at the ninth hour, at the house; but it is less definite than in or on; at the house, may be in or near the house. It denotes also towards, versus; as, to aim an arrow at a mark.

From this original import are derived all the various uses of at. At the sight, is with, present, or coming the sight; at this news, present the news, on or with the approach or arrival of this news. At peace, at war, in a state of peace or war, peace or war existing, being present; at ease, at play, at a loss, &c. convey the like idea. At arms, furnished with arms, bearing arms, present with arms; at hand, within reach of the hand, and therefore near; at my cost, with my cost; at his suit, by or with his suit; at this declaration, he rose from his seat, that is, present, or coming this declaration; whence results the idea in consequence of it. At his command, is either under his command, that is, literally, coming or being come his command, in the power of, or in consequence of it. He is good at engraving, at husbandry; that is, in performing that business. He deserves well at our hands, that is, from us. The peculiar phrases in which this word occurs, with appropriate significations, are numerous. At first, at last, at least, at best, at the worst, at the highest or lowest, are phrases in which some noun is implied; as, at the first time or beginning; at the last time, or point of time; at the least or best degree, &c.; all denoting an extreme point or superlative degree. At all, is in any manner or degree.

At is sometimes used for to, or towards, noting progression or direction; as, he aims at perfection; he makes or runs at him, or points at him. In this phrase, he longs to be at him, at has its general sense of approaching, or present, or with, in contest or attack.

2. The ultimate or smallest component part of a body. Chemistry.
3. Any thing extremely small. Shak.

ATOMIC, } Pertaining to atoms; con-
ATOMICAL, } sisting of atoms; extreme- ly minute.

The atomical philosophy, said to be broached by Moschus, before the Trojan war, and cultivated by Epicurus, teaches that atoms are endued with gravity and motion, by which all things were formed, without the aid of a supreme intelligent Being.

The atomic theory, in chemistry, or the doctrine of definite proportions, teaches that all chymical combinations take place between the ultimate particles or atoms of bodies, and that these unite either atom with atom, or in proportions expressed by some simple multiple of the number of atoms. Dalton.

ATOMISM, n. The doctrine of atoms.

ATOMIST, n. One who holds to the atomical philosophy.

ATOM-LIKE, a. Resembling atoms.

Brown.

ATOMY, n. A word used by Shakspeare for atom; also an abbreviation of anatomy.

ATONE, adv. [at and one.] At one; together. Spenser.

ATONE, v. i. [*Supposed to be compounded of at and one.*] The Spanish has adunar, to unite or join, and the Ital. adunare, to assemble; from L. ad and unus, unio. In Welsh, dyunaw, signifies united, accordant, agreeing; dyunaw, to unite or agree; from un, one, and dy, a prefix denoting iteration.]

1. To agree; to be in accordance; to accord.

He and Aufidius can no more atone,
Than violentest contrariety. Shak.

[This sense is obsolete.]

2. To stand as an equivalent; to make reparation, amends or satisfaction for an offense or a crime, by which reconciliation is procured between the offended and offending parties.

The murderer fell and blood atoned for blood. Pope.

By what propitiation shall I atone for my former gravity. Rambler, No. 10.

The life of a slave was deemed to be of so little value, that a very slight compensation atoned for taking it away.

Robertson, Charles V.

3. To atone for, to make compensation or amends.

This evil was atoned for by the good effects of the study of the practical physics of Aristotle. Schlegel, Trans.

ATRABILA'RIOUSNESS, n. The state of being melancholy, or affected with disordered bile.

ATRAMENT'AL, } [L. atramentum, ink, from ater, black.]

ATRAMENT'OUS, } a. [L. atramentum, ink, from ater, black.]

Inky; black like ink.

ATRAMENTA'RIOUS, a. Like ink; suitable for making ink. The sulphate of iron, or green copperas, is called atramentarius, as being the material of ink.

Fourcroy.

ATRIP', adv. [a and trip. See Trip.]

In nautical language, the anchor is atrip, when drawn out of the ground in a perpendicular direction. The topsails are atrip, when they are hoisted to the top of the mast, or as high as possible. Mar. Dict.

ATRO'CIOUS, a. [L. atrox, trux, fierce, cruel.]

Extremely hainous, criminal or cruel; enormous; outrageous; as atrocious guilt or offense.

ATRO'CIOUSLY, adv. In an atrocious manner; with enormous cruelty or guilt.

ATRO'CIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being enormously criminal or cruel.

ATROC'ITY, n. Enormous wickedness; extreme hainousness or cruelty; as the atrociousness of murder.

ATROPHY, n. [Gr. α. priv. and τροφω, to nourish.]

A consumption or wasting of the flesh, with loss of strength, without any sensible cause or hectic fever; a wasting from defect of nourishment.

Encyc. Coxe.

ATROPIA, n. A new vegetable alkali extracted from the atropa belladonna, or deadly nightshade. It is white, brilliant and crystalizes in long needles. Ure.

ATTACH', v. t. [Fr. attacher, to tie or fasten, to apply, to engage, to stick; Arm. staga; It. attaccare; Norm. attacher, to attack; tache, tied, fixed, tacked together; Port. Sp. atacar. It seems to be allied to attach, and the sense is to put, throw or fall on, hence to seize, and stop, coinciding with the Eng. take; Sw. taga; Dan.

tager; Sax. taecan; Gr. δεχομαι; L. tango, for tago; Eng. tack; &c. Class, Dg. See Attack and Tack.]

1. To take by legal authority; to arrest the person by writ, to answer for a debt; applied to a taking of the person by a civil process; being never used for the arrest of a criminal. It is applied also to the taking of goods and real estate by an officer, by virtue of a writ or precept, to hold the same to satisfy a judgment to be rendered in the suit.

2. To take, seize and lay hold on, by moral force, as by affection or interest; to win the heart; to fasten or bind by moral influence; as, attached to a friend; attaching others to us by wealth or flattery.

3. To make to adhere; to tie, bind or fasten; as, to attach substances by any glutinous matter; to attach one thing to another by a string.

ATTACH'ABLE, a. That may be legally attached; liable to be taken by writ or precept.

ATTACH'ED, pp. Taken by writ or precept; drawn to and fixed, or united by affection or interest.

ATTACH'ING, ppr. Taking or seizing by commandment or writ; drawing to, and fixing by influence; winning the affections.

ATTACH'MENT, n. A taking of the person, goods or estate by a writ or precept in a civil action, to secure a debt or demand.

2. A writ directing the person or estate of a person to be taken, to secure his appearance before a court. In England, the first notice to appear in court is by summons; and if the defendant disobeys this monition, a writ of attachment issues, commanding the sheriff to attach him, by taking gage, or security in goods, which he forfeits by non-appearance, or by making him find safe pledges or sureties for his appearance. But in trespasses, an attachment is the first process. In this country, attachment is more generally the first process, and in some states, the writ of attachment issues at first against the property or person of the defendant. In Connecticut, this writ issues against the person, goods or land, in the first instance, commanding to take the goods and estate of the defendant, if to be found; or otherwise, to take his body. In England, witnesses not appearing upon a summons, may be taken by attachment; a process called with us a capias. Attachments also issue against persons for contempt of court. The court of attachments, in England, is held before the verderors of the forest, to attach and try offenders against vert and venison.

Foreign attachment is the taking of the money or goods of a debtor in the hands of a stranger; as when the debtor is not within the jurisdiction of the court or has absconded. Any person who has goods or effects of a debtor, is considered in law as the agent, attorney, factor or trustee of the debtor; and an attachment served on such person binds the property in his hands to respond the judgment against the debtor.

3. Close adherence or affection; fidelity; regard; any passion or affection that binds a person; as, an attachment to a friend, or to a party.

ATTACK', v. t. [Fr. attaquer; Arm. attacqi; It. attaccare, to fasten, to engage in battle; attacco, a sticking; Sp. atacar, to assault, to fasten or make close, to cram; Port. atacar, to attack, to seize, to fasten; Heb. and Ch. ppr., to thrust, to drive, to strike.

It seems to be allied to attach; but the latter verb agrees better with the Eth.

(1) $\odot \Phi$ to press, whence $\Lambda \Phi \odot \Phi$ to press, to make close; and the Ch. $\rho\omega$, to accuse, to unite. Class Dg.]

1. To assault; to fall upon with force; to assail, as with force and arms. It is the appropriate word for the commencing act of hostility between armies and navies.

2. To fall upon, with unfriendly words or writing; to begin a controversy with; to attempt to overthrow or bring into disrepute, by satire, calumny or criticism; as, to attack a man or his opinions in a pamphlet.

ATTACK', n. An onset; first invasion; a falling on, with force or violence, or with calumny, satire or criticism.

ATTACK'ED, pp. Assaulted; invaded; fallen on by force or enmity.

ATTACK'ER, n. One who assaults or invades.

ATTACK'ING, ppr. Assaulting; invading; falling on with force, calumny or criticism.

ATTACOT'TIC, a. Pertaining to the Attacotti, a tribe of ancient Britons, allies of the Scots. Pinkerton.

ATTAGEN, n. A beautiful fowl, resembling the pheasant, with a short black bill and a fine crest of yellow feathers, variegated with black and white spots, found in the mountains of Sicily.

Dict. of Nat. Hist.

ATTAIN, v. i. [Fr. and Norm. atteindre; L. attingo, to reach, come to or overtake; ad and tango, to touch, reach or strike; that is, to thrust, urge or push to. It has no connection with L. attineo. See Class, Dg.]

1. To reach; to come to or arrive at, by motion, bodily exertion, or efforts towards a place or object.

If by any means they might attain to Phenice. Acts xxvii.

2. To reach; to come to or arrive at, by an effort of mind.

Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high; I cannot attain to it. Ps. cxxxix.

Regularly this verb should be always followed by to; the omission of to, and the use of the verb, in a transitive sense, may have originated in mistake, from the opinion that the verb is from the L. attineo, and equivalent to obtain.

ATTAIN, v. t. To gain; to compass; to achieve or accomplish, that is, to reach by efforts; without to following.

Is he wise who hopes to attain the end without the means? Tillotson.

This use of the verb is now established; but in strictness to is here implied; attain to the end. The real sense, as in the intransitive use of the verb, is, to reach or come to the end or purpose in view. This word always implies an effort towards an object. Hence it is not synonymous with obtain.

and procure, which do not necessarily imply such effort. We procure or obtain a thing by purchase or loan, and we obtain by inheritance, but we do not attain it by such means. An inattention to this distinction has led good authors into great mistakes in the use of this word.

2. To reach or come to a place or object by progression or motion.

But ere such tidings shall his ears attain.

Hoole's Tasso.

Canan he now attains.

Milton.

3. To reach in excellence or degree; to equal.

Bacon.

ATTA'INABLE, a. That may be attained; that may be reached by efforts of the mind or body; that may be compassed or accomplished by efforts directed to the object; as, perfection is not attainable in this life. From an inattention to the true sense of this word, as explained under attain, authors have very improperly used this word for obtainable, procurable; as in the following passages. "The kind and quality of food and liquor; the species of habitation, furniture and clothing to which the common people of each country are habituated, must be attainable with ease and certainty." Paley, Phil. B. 6. Ch. 11. "Gen. Howe would not permit them to be purchased in Philadelphia, and they (clothes and blankets) were not attainable in the country." Marshall's Life of Washington, 3, 428. Each of these words should be obtainable.

ATTA'INABLENESS, n. The quality of being attainable.

ATTA'INDER, n. [Norm. Fr. atteindre, to corrupt, attain; also conviction; L. ad and ingo, to stain; Gr. τεγγω. Class Dg. See Tinge.]

1. Literally a staining, corruption, or rendering impure; a corruption of blood. Hence,

2. The judgment of death, or sentence of a competent tribunal upon a person convicted of treason or felony, which judgment attaints, taints or corrupts his blood, so that he can no longer inherit lands. The consequences of this judgment are, forfeiture of lands, tenements and hereditaments, loss of reputation, and disqualification to be a witness in any court of law. A statute of Parliament attainting a criminal, is called an act of attainder.

Upon the thorough demonstration of which guilt by legal attainder, the feudal covenant is broken.

Blackstone.

3. The act of attainting.

An act was made for the attainder of several persons.

Encyc.

Note. By the constitution of the United States, no crime works an attainder.

ATTAINMENT, n. The act of attaining; the act of arriving at or reaching; hence the act of obtaining by efforts; as the attainment of excellence.

2. That which is attained to, or obtained by exertion; acquisition; as, a man of great attainments.

ATTA'INT, v. t. [See Attainder.]

1. To taint or corrupt; to extinguish the pure or inheritable blood of a person found guilty of treason or felony, by confession, battle, or verdict, and consequent sentence of death, or by special act of Parliament.

No person shall be attainted of high treason where corruption of blood is incurred, but by the oath of two witnesses, &c. Stat. 7 and 8. W. 3.

2. To taint, as the credit of jurors, convicted of giving a false verdict. This is done by special writ of attaint. The conviction of such a crime attaints the reputation of jurors, and renders them infamous.

3. To disgrace; to cloud with infamy; to stain.

Spenser.

4. To taint or corrupt.

Shak.

ATTA'INT, n. A stain, spot or taint. Shak. [See Taint.]

2. Any thing injurious; that which impairs.

Obs. Shak.

3. A blow or wound on the hinder feet of a horse.

Farriery.

4. A writ which lies after judgment against a jury for giving a false verdict in any court of record.

ATTA'INTED, pp. Stained; corrupted; rendered infamous; rendered incapable of inheriting.

ATTA'INTING, ppr. Staining; corrupting; rendering infamous by judicial act; depriving of inheritable blood.

ATTA'INTMENT, n. The being attainted.

ATTA'INTURE, n. A staining or rendering infamous; reproach; imputation.

ATTASK', v. t. To task; to tax. [Not used. See Task.] Shak.

ATTA'STE, v. t. To taste. [Not used. See Taste.]

ATTEM'PER, v. t. [L. attempero, of ad and tempero, to temper, mix, or moderate. See Temper.]

1. To reduce, modify or moderate by mixture; as, to attemper heat by a cooling mixture, or spirit by diluting it with water.

2. To soften, mollify or moderate; as, to attemper rigid justice with clemency.

3. To mix in just proportion; to regulate; as, a mind well attempered with kindness and justice.

4. To accommodate; to fit or make suitable.

Arts attempered to the lyre. Pope.

ATTEM'PERANCE, n. Temperance. [Not used.] Chaucer.

ATTEM'PERATE, a. [L. attemperatus.]

Tempered; proportioned; suited.

Hope must be proportioned and attemperate to the promise. Hammond.

ATTEM'PERATE, v. t. To attemper. [Not in use.] Hammond.

ATTEM'PERED, pp. Reduced in quality; moderated; softened; well mixed; suited.

ATTEM'PERING, ppr. Moderating in quality; softening; mixing in due proportion; making suitable.

ATTEM'PERLY, adv. In a temperate manner. [Not in use.] Chaucer.

ATTEMPT', v. t. [Fr. attenter, from L. attento, to attempt, of ad and tento, to try; Arm. attemphi. The L. tento is from the same root as tendo, to strain; Gr. τενω. Hence, the literal sense is to strain, urge, stretch.]

1. To make an effort to effect some object; to make trial or experiment; to try; to endeavor; to use exertion for any purpose; as, to attempt to sing; to attempt a bold flight.

2. To attack; to make an effort upon; as, to attempt the enemy's camp.

This verb is not always followed by an object, and appears to be intransitive; but some object is understood, or a verb in the infinitive follows in the place of an object; as, he attempted to speak.

ATTEMPT', n. An essay, trial or endeavor; an attack; or an effort to gain a point.

Bacon.

ATTEMPT'ABLE, a. That may be attempted, tried or attacked; liable to an attempt, or attack. Shak.

ATTEMPT'ED, pp. Essayed; tried; attacked.

ATTEMPT'ER, n. One who attempts, or attacks. Milton.

ATTEMPT'ING, ppr. Trying; essaying; making an effort to gain a point; attacking.

ATTEND', v. t. [L. attendo; Fr. attendre, to wait, stay, hold, expect; Sp. atender; It. attendere; L. ad and tendo, to stretch, to tend. See Tend.]

1. To go with, or accompany, as a companion, minister or servant.

Dryden.

10. To regard; to fix the mind upon.

The pilot doth not attend the unskilful words of the passenger. Sidney.

This is not now a legitimate sense. To express this idea, we now use the verb intransitively, with to, attend to.

11. To expect. [Not in use.] Raleigh.

ATTEND' v. i. To listen; to regard with attention; followed by to.

Attend to the voice of my supplication. Ps. lxxxvi.

Hence much used in the imperative, attend!

2. To regard with observation, and correspondent practice.

My son, attend to my words.

Hence, to regard with compliance.

He hath attended to the voice of my prayer.

Ps. lxvi.

3. To fix the attention upon, as an object of pursuit; to be busy or engaged in; as, to attend to the study of the scriptures.

4. To wait on; to accompany or be present, in pursuance of duty; with on or upon; as, to attend upon a committee; to attend upon business. Hence,

5. To wait on, in service or worship; to serve.

That ye may attend upon the Lord without distraction. 1 Cor. vii.

6. To stay; to delay. Obs.

For this perfection she must yet attend,
Till to her maker she espoused be.

Darvies.

7. To wait; to be within call.

Spenser.

ATTENT'ION, n. The act of attending or heeding; the due application of the ear to sounds, or of the mind to objects presented to its contemplation. [Literally, a stretching towards.]

They say the tongues of dying men

Enforce attention like deep harmony.

Shak.

2. Act of civility, or courtesy; as attention to a stranger.

ATTENT'IVE, a. [Fr. attentif.]

Heedful; intent; observant; regarding with care. It is applied to the senses of hearing and seeing, as an attentive ear or eye; to the application of the mind, as in contemplation; or to the application of the mind, together with the senses abovementioned, as when a person is attentive to the words, the manner and matter of a speaker at the same time.

ATTENT'IVELY, adv. Heedfully; carefully; with fixed attention.

ATTENT'IVENESS, n. The state of being attentive; heedfulness; attention.

ATTEN'UANT, a. [See Attenuate.]

Making thin, as fluids; diluting; rendering less dense and viscid.

ATTEN'UANT, n. A medicine which thins the humors, subtilizes their parts, dissolves viscosity, and disposes the fluids to motion, circulation and secretion; a diluent.

Core.

ATTEN'UATE, v. t. [L. attenuo, of ad and tenuo, to make thin; L. tenuis; W. tenau; Ir. tana or tanaidhe; Eng. thin, which see.]

1. To make thin or less consistent; to subtilize or break the humors of the body into finer parts; to render less viscid; opposed to condense, incrassate or thicken.

2. To comminute; to break or wear solid substances into finer or very minute parts. This uninterrupted motion must attenuate and wear away the hardest rocks.

Trans. of Chaptal's Chimistry.

3. To make slender; to reduce in thickness.

ATTEN'UATE, a. Made thin, or less viscid; made slender.

Bacon.

ATTEN'UATED, pp. Made thin or less viscid; comminuted; made slender. In botany, growing slender towards the point.

ATTEN'UATING, ppr. Making thin, as fluids; making fine, as solid substances; making slender or lean.

ATTENUATION, n. The act of making thin, as fluids; as the attenuation of the humors.

2. The act of making fine, by comminution, or attrition.

The action of the air facilitates the attenuation of these rocks.

Trans. Chaptal.

3. The act or process of making slender, thin or lean.

Ray.

ATT'EST, v. t. [Fr. attester; L. attestor; of ad and testor, to affirm or bear witness, from testis. See Testify.]

1. To bear witness to; to certify; to affirm to be true or genuine; to make a solemn declaration in words or writing, to support a fact; appropriately used for the affirmation of persons in their official capacity; as, to attest the truth of a writing; to attest a copy of record. Persons also attest writings by subscribing their names.

2. To bear witness, or support the truth of a fact, by other evidence than words; as, the ruins of Palmyra attest its ancient magnificence.

3. To call to witness; to invoke as conscious.

The sacred streams which heaven's imperial state
Attests in oaths, and fears to violate.

Dryden.

ATT'EST, n. Witness; testimony; attestation. [Little used.]

ATTESTATION, n. Testimony; witness; a solemn or official declaration, verbal or written, in support of a fact; evidence. The truth appears from the attestation of witnesses, or of the proper officer. The subscription of a name to a writing is an attestation.

ATTESTED, pp. Proved or supported by testimony, solemn or official; witnessed; supported by evidence.

ATTESTING, ppr. Witnessing; calling to witness; affirming in support of.

ATTESTOR, n. One who attests.

ATTIC, a. [L. Atticus; Gr. Ἀττικός.]

Pertaining to Attica in Greece, or to its principal city, Athens. Thus, Attic wit, Attic salt, a poignant, delicate wit, peculiar to the Athenians; Attic faith, inviolable faith. Attic base, a peculiar base used by the ancient architects in the Ionic order, or column; and by Palladio and others, in the Doric.

Encyc.

Attic order, an order of small square pillars at the uppermost extremity of a building. This had its origin in Athens, and was intended to conceal the roof. These pillars should never exceed one third of the length of the order on which they are placed, nor be less than one quarter of it.

Encyc.

Attic story, a story in the upper part of a house, where the windows usually are square.

Encyc.

ATTIC, n. A small square pillar with its cornice on the uppermost part of a building. Attics properly form the crown of the building, or a finishing for the other orders, when they are used in the structure.

Encyc.

2. An Athenian; an Athenian author.

Jones' Gr. Grammar.

ATTICISM, n. The peculiar style and idiom of the Greek language, used by the Athenians; refined and elegant Greek; concise and elegant expression.

Encyc. Art. Philos.

2. A particular attachment to the Athenians.

Mitford.

ATTICIZE, v. t. To conform or make conformable to the language or idiom of Attica. Adjectives in os, when atticized, become us.

Jones' Gr. Grammar.

ATTICIZE, v. i. To use atticisms, or the idiom of the Athenians.

ATTICS, n. plu. The title of a book in Pausanias, which treats of Attica.

Trans. of Paus. B. 1.

ATTIRE, v. t. [Norm. attirer, to provide; Fr. atours, dress, attire; atourner, to dress a bride, to attire; atourneresse, a tire woman; Arm. atourm, female ornaments; G. ziere, to adorn. We retain tire, the simple word, applied to the band of a wheel, and this word, in the D. toer, coincides with tour. See Class Dr.]

To dress; to array; to adorn with elegant or splendid garments.

With the linen mitre shall Aaron be attired.

Lev. xvi.

ATTIRE, n. Dress; clothes; habit; but appropriately, ornamental dress.

Can a bride forget her attire. Jer. ii.

2. The horns of a deer.

3. In botany, the generative parts of plants. Florid attire, called thrums or suits, as in the flowers of marygold or tansy, consists of two or three parts, of which the outer part is the floret. Semiform attire consists of the chives and apexes. This language is now obsolete.

A T T

ATTIRED, pp. Dressed; decked with ornaments or attire.

ATTIRER, n. One who dresses or adorns with attire.

ATTIRING, pp. Dressing; adorning with dress or attire.

ATTITLE, v. t. To entitle. [Not in use.]

Gower.

ATTITUDE, n. [Fr. attitude, posture; Sp. actitud, from L. actus, ago. The Italian attitudine is posture and fitness; attitude and aptitude being united in the same word.]

1. In painting and sculpture, the posture or action in which a figure or statue is placed; the gesture of a figure or statue; such a disposition of the parts as serves to express the action and sentiments of the person represented. Johnson. Encyc.

2. Posture; position of things or persons; as, in times of trouble let the prince or a nation preserve a firm attitude.

Washington's Farewell Address.

Hamilton. Gov. Smith. N. H.

ATTOL/LENT, a. [L. attolens, attollo, of ad and tollo, to lift.]

Lifting up; raising; as an attolent muscle. Derham.

ATTOL/LENT, n. A muscle which raises some part, as the ear, the tip of the nose, or the upper eye lid; otherwise called levator or delevator. Quincy. Coxe.

ATTORN, v. t. [L. ad and torno; Fr. tourner; Arm. twirna, turnein, to turn; Sp. tornar; Port. id.; It. attornare, turniare. Hence turnamento, a tournament; Sp. torneo. See Turn.]

In the feudal law, to turn, or transfer homage and service from one lord to another. This is the act of feodatories, vassals or tenants, upon the alienation of the estate. Blackstone. Encyc.

ATTORNEY, n. plu. attorneys. [Norm. at-tournon; torne, id.; from tour, tourn, turn, change. One who takes the turn or place of another. See Attorn and Turn.]

One who is appointed or admitted in the place of another, to manage his matters in law. The word formerly signified any person who did business for another; but its sense is now chiefly or wholly restricted to persons who act as substitutes for the persons concerned, in prosecuting and defending actions before courts of justice, or in transacting other business in which legal rights are involved. The word answers to the procurator, (proctor), of the civilians.

Attorneys are not admitted to practice in courts, until examined, approved, licensed and sworn, by direction of some court; after which they are proper officers of the court.

In G. Britain, and in some of the U. States, attorneys are not permitted to be advocates or counsel in the higher courts; this privilege being confined to counsellors and serjeants. In other states, there is no distinction of rank, and attorneys practice in all the courts. And in a general sense, the word attorney comprehends counsellors, barristers and serjeants.

A T T

In Virginia, the duties of attorney, counsellor, conveyancer and advocate, are all performed by the same individual. Wirt.

An attorney may have general powers to transact business for another; or his powers may be special, or limited to a particular act or acts.

Attorney General is an officer appointed to manage business for the king, the state or public; and his duty, in particular, is to prosecute persons guilty of crimes.

A letter or warrant of attorney is a written authority from one person empowering another to transact business for him.

ATTORN'EY, v. t. To perform by proxy; to employ as a proxy. [Not in use.]

Shak.

ATTORN'EYSHIP, n. The office of an attorney; agency for another. Shak.

ATTORN'ING, pp. Acknowledging a new lord, or transferring homage and fealty to the purchaser of an estate.

ATTORN'MENT, n. The act of a feodatory, vassal or tenant, by which he consents, upon the alienation of an estate, to receive a new lord or superior, and transfers to him his homage and service. Encyc. Blackstone.

ATTRACT', v. t. [L. attraho, attractus, of ad and traho, to draw. See Drag and Draw.]

1. To draw to; to cause to move towards, and unite with; as, electrical bodies attract straws, and light substances, by physical laws.

2. To draw to or incline to unite with, though some cause may prevent the union; as, the sun is supposed to attract the planets.

3. To draw by influence of a moral kind; to invite or allure; as, to attract admirers.

4. To engage; as, to attract attention.

ATTRACT', n. Attraction. [Not in use.]

Hudibras.

ATTRACTABIL'ITY, n. The quality of being attractable, or of being subject to the law of attraction. Asiat. Researches.

ATTRACT'ABLE, a. That may be attracted; subject to attraction. Lavoisier by Kerr.

ATTRACT'ED, pp. Drawn towards; invited; allured; engaged.

ATTRACT'IC, a. Having power to attract.

ATTRACT'ICAL, a. draw to. [Not used.]

Ray.

ATTRACT'ILE, a. That has power to attract. Med. Rep.

ATTRACT'ING, pp. Drawing to or towards; inviting; alluring; engaging.

ATTRACT'INGLY, adv. In an attracting manner.

ATTRAC'TION, n. The power in bodies which is supposed to draw them together; or the tendency or principle which inclines them to unite or cohere; called by Copernicus, appetence. Encyc.

This power, principle or tendency in bodies to unite, is distinguished by philosophers into attraction of gravity or gravitation, which extends to a sensible distance, such as the tendency of the planets to the sun, or of a stone, when raised in the air, to fall to the earth, and of which kind is the attraction of magnetism, and of electricity; and into attraction of cohesion, or that tendency which is manifested between small particles of matter, at insensible distances, or near the point of contact, to unite them in coherence.

The attraction of gravity is supposed to be the great principle which confines the planets in their orbits. Its power or force is directly as the quantity of matter in a body, and inversely as the square of the distances of the attracting bodies. Newton. Encyc.

2. The act of attracting; the effect of the principle of attraction.

Attraction may be performed by impulse or other means. Newton's Optics.

3. The power or act of alluring, drawing to, inviting or engaging; as the attraction of beauty or eloquence.

Contiguous attraction is that which is exerted between minute particles or atoms, at insensible distances. When this principle unites particles of the same kind, it is called affinity of aggregation, cohesive affinity or cohesion. When it operates on dissimilar particles, producing union, it is distinguished as heterogeneous, and called chemical attraction or affinity. Webster's Manual.

Elective attraction, in chemistry, is otherwise called affinity. It is that power in substances, which elects or selects from a mixture those elements with which they have the strongest tendency to combine.

ATTRACT'IVE, a. [Fr. attractif.]

1. Having the quality of attracting; drawing to; as the attractive force of bodies.

2. Drawing to by moral influence; alluring; inviting; engaging; as the attractive graces.

An attractive undertaking. Roscoe.

ATTRACT'IVENESS, n. The quality of being attractive, or engaging.

ATTRACT'OR, n. The person or thing that attracts.

ATTRAH'ENT, a. [L. attrahens.] Drawing to; or as a noun, that which draws to. Glanville.

ATTRAP', v. t. [Qu. Fr. drap, cloth.] To clothe; to dress. [Not in use.]

ATTRECA'TION, n. [L. attractatio.] Frequent handling. Dict.

ATTRIB'UTABLE, a. [See Attribute.]

That may be ascribed, imputed or attributed; ascribable; imputable; as, the fault is not attributable to the author.

ATTRIB'UTE, v. t. [L. attribuo; ad and tribuo, to divide, to bestow, to assign; tribus, a tribe, division or ward; Fr. attribuer; Sp. atribuir, tribuir; It. attribuire. See Tribe.]

1. To allot or attach, in contemplation; to ascribe; to consider as belonging.

We attribute nothing to God, that contains a contradiction. Tillotson.

2. To give as due; to yield as an act of the mind; as, to attribute to God all the glory of redemption.

3. To impute, as to a cause; as, our misfortunes are generally to be attributed to our follies or imprudence.

AT'TRIBUTE, n. That which is attributed; that which is considered as belonging to, or inherent in; as, power and wisdom are attributes of the Supreme Being; or a quality determining something to be after

AUC

- a certain manner; as, extension is an attribute of body. Encyc.
2. Quality; characteristic disposition; as bravery and generosity in men. Bacon.
3. A thing belonging to another; an appendant; as the arms of a warrior. In painting and sculpture, a symbol of office or character, added to the principal figure; as a club is the attribute of Hercules. Encyc.
4. Reputation; honor. Shak.
[Not a proper sense of this word.]

1. Very bold or daring; impudent; contemning the restraints of law, religion or decorum; used for bold in wickedness; applied to persons; as an audacious wretch.
2. Committed with, or proceeding from, daring effrontery, or contempt of law; as an audacious crime.
3. Bold; spirited. Jonson.
- AUDACIOUSLY, adv. In an impudent manner; with excess of boldness. Shak.
- AUDACIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being audacious; impudence; audacity. Sandys.
- AUDACITY, n. Boldness, sometimes in a good sense; daring spirit, resolution or confidence.
2. Audaciousness; impudence; in a bad sense; implying a contempt of law or moral restraint.
- AUDEANISM, n. Anthropomorphism; or the doctrine of Audeus, who maintained that God has a human shape; from Gen. i. 26. Encyc.
- AUDIBLE, a. [L. audibilis, from audio, to hear. This word is evidently connected with the name of the ear; Gr. οας, οαρος; Vulg. Gr. αυδια. The verb is contracted into Sp. oir; Port. ouir; Fr. ouir, to hear. Hence in law oyer, and from the French oyez, hear ye, the barbarous O yes, of our courts.]
- That may be heard; perceivable by the ear; loud enough to be heard; as an audible voice or whisper.
- AUDIBLENESS, n. The quality of being audible.
- AUDIBLY, adv. In an audible manner; in a manner so as to be heard.

- AUDITRESS, n. A female hearer. Milton.
- AUF, n. A fool; a simpleton. [See Oaf.]
- AUGEAN, a. The Augean stable, in Grecian mythology, is represented as belonging to Augeus or Augias, one of the Argonauts, and afterwards king of Elis. This prince kept a great number of oxen, in a stable which was never cleansed, until Hercules undertook the task; a task which it seemed impracticable to execute. Hence the Augean stable came to represent what is deemed impracticable, or a place which has not, for a long time, been cleansed. Lempriere.
- AUGER, n. [D. avegaar. The Saxon word is nase-gar or naue-gar, from nafa, the nave of a wheel, and gar, a tool or a borer. It is probable that the real word is naugar, corrupted.]
- An instrument for boring large holes, chiefly used by carpenters, joiners, cabinet makers, wheelwrights and shipwrights. It consists of an iron blade, ending in a steel bit, with a handle placed at right angles with the blade. Augers, made with a straight channel or groove, in some places, are called pod-augers; the modern augers, with spiral channels, are called screw-augers.

AUGER-HOLE, n. A hole made by an auger.

AUGHT, n. aut. [Sax. awiht, ah, or owiht, ahwt, ah, from wiht, wight, a creature, animal, thing, any thing. This wiht seems to be our wight and whit; and I suspect the L. qui, quæ, quod, quid, what, to be the same word varied in orthography. This word should not be written ought.]

1. Any thing, indefinitely.

But go, my son, and see if ought be wanting.

Addison.

2. Any part, the smallest; a jot or tittle.

There failed not ought of any good thing which the Lord had spoken. Josh. xxi.

AUGITE, n. [Gr. αυγη, brightness. Plin. 37, 10.]

A mineral called by Haüy, pyroxene; often found in distinct crystals. Its secondary forms are all six or eight-sided prisms. Sometimes it appears in hemitrope crystals. It has a foliated structure, and is harder than hornblende. The varieties are common augite, sahlite, fassaite, and coccolite. The omphacite of Werner appears also to be a variety; and the common augite, found near the lake Baikal, has been called Baikalite. Cleaveland.

Werner divides augite into four sub-species; granular, foliated, conchoidal, and common; and there is a variety called slaggy augite.

AUGITIC, a. Pertaining to augite; resembling augite, or partaking of its nature and characters. Cooper.

AUGMENT, v. t. [Fr. augmenter; L. augmento, augmentum, from augeo, auri, to increase; Gr. αὔω, αὔω. It seems to be the Eng. to war, or to eke; Sax. eacan.]

1. To increase; to enlarge in size or extent; to swell; to make bigger; as, to augment an army, by reinforcement; rain augments a stream.

2. To increase or swell the degree, amount or magnitude; as, impatience augments an evil.

AUGMENT, v. i. To increase; to grow larger; as, a stream augments by rain.

AUGMENT, n. Increase; enlargement by addition; state of increase.

2. In philology, a syllable prefixed to a word; or an increase of the quantity of the initial vowel.

AUGURY, n. [L. augurium.] The art or practice of foretelling events by the flight or chattering of birds.

2. An omen; prediction; prognostication. Shak. Dryden.

AUGUST, a. [L. augustus. The first syllable of this word is probably from the root of augeo, or of awe.]

Grand; magnificent; majestic; impressing awe; inspiring reverence.

The Trojan chief appeared, august in visage. Dryden.

It is related that this epithet was first conferred by the Roman senate upon Octavius, after confirming him in the sovereign power.

AUGUST, n. The eighth month of the year, containing thirty-one days. The old Roman name was Septilis, the sixth month from March, the month in which the primitive Romans, as well as Jews, began the year. The name was changed to August in honor of the Emperor Octavius Augustus, on account of his victories, and his entering on his first consulate in that month. Gebelin.

AUGUST'AN, a. Pertaining to Augustus; as the Augustan age.

2. The Augustan confession, drawn up at Augusta or Augsburg, by Luther and Melancthon, in 1530, contains the principles of the protestants, and their reasons for separating from the Romish church. Encyc.

AUGUSTIN'IAN, n. Those divines, who from St. Augustin, maintain that grace is effectual from its nature, absolutely and morally, not relatively and gradually. Encyc.

AUGUST'INS, } An order of monks,
AUGUSTIN'IAN, } n. so called from St. Augustin. They originally were hermits, and called Austin friars. They were congregated into one body by Pope Alexander IV., under Lanfranc, in 1256. They clothe in black, and make one of the four orders of mendicants. Encyc.

J. of Science.

AURO'RA, n. [L. aurora; Sans. arus; Ch. and Heb. אור light, and רָא to raise.]

1. The rising light of the morning; the dawn of day, or morning twilight.

2. The goddess of the morning, or twilight deified by fancy. The poets represented her as rising out of the ocean, in a chariot, with rosy fingers dropping gentle dew.

3. A species of crowfoot.

Johnson.

Aurora Borealis, or lumen boreale; northern twilight. This species of light usually appears in streams, ascending towards the zenith from a dusky line a few degrees above the horizon. Sometimes it assumes a wavy appearance, as in America, in March 1782, when it overspread the whole hemisphere. Sometimes it appears in detached places; at other times, it almost covers the hemisphere. As the streams of light have a tremulous motion, they are called, in the Shetland isles, merry dancers. They assume all shapes, and a variety of colors, from a pale red or yellow to a deep red or blood color; and in the northern latitudes, serve to illuminate the earth and cheer the gloom of long winter nights. This light is sometimes near the earth. It is said to have been seen between the spectator and a distant mountain.

AURO'RAL, a. Belonging to the aurora, or to the northern lights; resembling the twilight.

E. Goodrich.

AU'RUM, n. [L. See Aurate.] Gold.

Aurum fulminans, fulminating gold, is gold dissolved in aqua-regia or nitro-muriatic acid, and precipitated by volatile alkali. This precipitate is of a brown yellow, or orange color, and when exposed to a moderate heat, detonizes with considerable noise. It is a compound of the oxyd of gold and ammonia.

Fourcroy.

Aurum mosaicum, or musivum, a sparkling gold-colored substance, from an amalgam of quick-silver and tin, mixed with sulphur and sal ammoniac, set to sublime. The mercury and part of the sulphur unite into a cinnabar, which sublimes with the sal-ammoniac, and leaves the aurum mosaicum at the bottom. It is a sulphuret of tin, and is used as a pigment.

Encyc. Nicholson.

AUSCULTA'TION, n. [L. from antiq. ausc, Gr. ous, ouas, the ear, and cultus, from colo, to use or exercise.]

1. The act of listening, or hearkening to.

2. In medicine, a method of distinguishing diseases, particularly in the thorax, by observing the sounds in the part, generally by means of a tube applied to the surface.

AVAIL, v. i. To be of use, or advantage; to answer the purpose; as, strength without judgment will rarely avail. Generally, it signifies to have strength, force or efficacy sufficient to accomplish the object; as, the plea in bar must avail, that is, be sufficient to defeat the suit; this scheme will not avail; medicines will not avail to check the disease; suppositions, without proof, will not avail.

AVAIL, n. Profit; advantage towards success; benefit; as, labor without economy is of little avail. It seems usually to convey the idea of efficacious aid or strength.

AVAILABLE, a. Profitable; advantageous; having efficacy; as, a measure is more or less available. Atterbury.

2. Having sufficient power, force, or efficacy, for the object; valid; as an available plea. Laws are available by consent. Hooker.

AVAILABLENESS, n. Power or efficacy, in promoting an end in view.

2. Competent power; legal force; validity; as the availableness of a title.

AVAILABLY, adv. Powerfully; profitably; advantageously; validly; efficaciously.

AVAILING, pp. Turning to profit: using to advantage or effect.

AVAILMENT, n. Profit; efficacy; successful issue. [Little used.]

AVAILS, n. plu. Profits or proceeds. It is used in New-England, for the proceeds of goods sold, or for rents, issues or profits.

AVALANCHE, n. [Fr. from aval, to fall.]

A snow-slip; a vast body of snow sliding down a mountain.

AVANT, n. The front of an army. [Not used.] [See Van.]

AVANTGUARD, n. The van or advanced body of an army. [See Vanguard.]

AVANTURINE, n. A variety of quartz rock containing spangles. Ure.

AVARICE, n. [L. avaritia, from avarus, from areo, to covet.]

An inordinate desire of gaining and possessing wealth; covetousness; greediness or insatiable desire of gain. Shak.

Avarice sheds a blasting influence over the finest affections and sweetest comforts of mankind. Buckminster.

AVARICIOUS, a. Covetous; greedy of gain; immoderately desirous of accumulating property.

AVARICIOUSLY, adv. Covetously; with inordinate desire of gaining wealth. Goldsmith.

AVARICIOUSNESS, n. The quality of being avaricious; insatiable or inordinate passion for property.

AVAROUS, a. Covetous. [Not used.]

AVAST, exclam. [Ger. basta, stop; bastant, sufficient; from It. basta, enough; Per. bas, enough.]

In seamen's language, cease; stop; stay.

AVAUNT, excl. [W. ibant, begone.]

Begone; depart; a word of contempt or abhorrence, equivalent to the phrase, "Get thee behind me."

AVE MARY, n. [from the first words of Gabriel's salutation to the Virgin Mary; L. ave, hail.]

A form of devotion in the Romish Church. Their chaplets and rosaries are divided into a certain number of ave-marys and paternosters.

AVENACEOUS, a. [L. avenaceus, from avena, oats; Fr. avoine.]

Belonging to, or partaking of the nature of oats.

AVENAGE, n. [Fr.] A certain quantity of oats paid by a tenant to a landlord in lieu of rent or other duty. Spelman.

AVENER, n. [Norm. French.]

AVENOR, n. [Norm. French.]

In English feudal law, an officer of the king's stable whose duty was to provide oats.

AVENGE, v. t. avenj'. [Fr. venger; Sp. vingar; Port. vingar; L. vinde. In Sax. winnan, to contend, to gain, to win.]

1. To take satisfaction for an injury by punishing the injuring party; to vindicate by inflicting pain or evil on the wrong doer. Shall not God avenge his own elect. Luke xviii.

Avenge me of my adversary. Id. v. 3.

In these examples, avenge implies that the evil inflicted on the injuring party is a satisfaction or justice done to the injured, and the party vindicated is the object of the verb.

2. To take satisfaction for, by pain or punishment inflicted on the injuring party.

He will avenge the blood of his servants. Deut. xxxii.

Here the thing for which satisfaction is taken is the object of the verb.

3. To revenge. To avenge and revenge, radically, are synonymous. But modern usage inclines to make a valuable distinction in the use of these words, restricting avenge to the taking of just punishment, and revenge to the infliction of pain or evil, maliciously, in an illegal manner.

4. In the passive form, this verb signifies to have or receive just satisfaction, by the punishment of the offender.

Shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this? Jer. 5.

AVENGANCE, n. Punishment. [Not used.] [See Vengeance.]

AVENGED, pp. Satisfied by the punishment of the offender; vindicated; punished.

AVENGEMENT, n. Vengeance; punishment; the act of taking satisfaction for an injury by inflicting pain or evil on the offender; satisfaction taken; revenge.

AVENGER, n. One who avenges or vindicates; a vindicator; a revenger.

AVENGERESS, n. A female avenger. Spenser.

AVENGING, ppr. Executing vengeance; taking satisfaction for an injury by the punishment of the offender; vindicating.

AVENS, n. The herb bennet. Miller.

AVENTINE, a. Pertaining to Mons Aventinus, one of the seven hills on which Rome stood. Bryant.

ADVENTURE, n. [Fr. aventure, from L. venio, to come.]

A mischance causing a person's death without felony; as by drowning, or falling from a house. [See Adventure.] Cowet.

AVENUE, n. [Fr. from venir, to come or go; L. venio.]

1. A passage; a way or opening for entrance into a place; any opening or passage by which a thing is or may be introduced.
2. An alley, or walk in a garden, planted with trees, and leading to a house, gate, wood, &c., and generally terminated by some distant object. The trees may be in rows on the sides, or, according to the more modern practice, in clumps at some distance from each other. Encyc.
3. A wide street, as in Washington, Columbia.

AVER' v. t. [Fr. averer; It. averare, to aver or verify; Arm. quiryra, from the root of verus, true; Ir. feor, or fir; W. gwir; Corn. wir; Ger. wahr; D. waar. See Verify.]

To affirm with confidence; to declare in a positive or peremptory manner, as in confidence of asserting the truth. Prior.

AVERAGE, n. [Norm. aver, avers, cattle, money, goods, Sp. averio, from aver or haber, Fr. avoir, to have or possess. In ancient law, a duty or service which a tenant was bound to render to his lord, by his beasts and carriages or instruments of husbandry. Spelman. But averagium signifies also the loss of goods in transportation; Sp. averia, damage sustained by goods or ships; Port. avaria, an allowance out of freight to the master of a ship, for damage sustained; contribution by insurers, to make good a loss; It. avaria; Dan. haveri, damage of a ship or waste of goods, extraordinary charges during a voyage. If avaria signifies damage, and is from aver or haber, Spanish, to have, the sense of the word is probably that which happens or falls, a misfortune, for the verb have and happen are radically the same word; Spanish, haber, to have, and to happen or befall; also fortune, property. This would give the sense of damage, or of proportion, lot, share, that which falls to each of a number. But the primary sense is not very obvious.]

1. In commerce, a contribution to a general loss. When for the safety of a ship in distress, any destruction of property is incurred, either by cutting away the masts, throwing goods overboard, or other means, all persons who have goods on board, or property in the ship, contribute to the loss according to their average, that is, the goods of each on board. This principle, introduced into the commerce of Europe, from the Rhodian laws, and recognized by the regulations of Wisby, is now an established rule in the maritime laws of Europe; for it is most reasonable, that when one man's property is sacrificed to save a ship, all persons whose property is saved, or in like hazard, should bear their proportion of the loss.

Spelman. Park. Beaves.

2. From the practice of contributing to bear losses, in proportion to each man's property, this word has obtained the present popular sense, which is, that of a mean proportion, medial sum or quantity, made out of unequal sums or quantities. Thus, if A loses 5 dollars, B 9 and C 16, the sum is 30, and the average, 10.

3. A small duty payable by the shippers of goods, to the master of the ship, over and above the freight, for his care of the goods.

Hence the expression in bills of lading, "paying so much freight, with primage and average accustomed." Cowel. Encyc.

4. In England, the breaking up of cornfields, eddish or roughings. Ash. Spelman.

Upon, or on an average, is taking the mean of unequal numbers or quantities.

AVERAGE, a. Medial; containing a mean proportion. Price. Beddoes. Kirwan. Edwards' W. Indies.

AVERAGE, v. t. To find the mean of unequal sums or quantities; to reduce to a medium; to divide among a number, according to a given proportion; as, to average a loss.

AVERAGE, v. i. To form a mean or medial sum or quantity; as, the losses of the owners will average 25 dollars each. These spars average 10 feet in length. Belknap.

Ch. Obs. x. 522. xi. 302.

AVERAGED, pp. Reduced or formed into a mean proportion, or into shares proportioned to each man's property. Jefferson.

AVERAGING, ppr. Forming a mean proportion out of unequal sums or quantities, or reducing to just shares according to each man's property.

AVERMENT, n. [See Aver.] Affirmation; positive assertion; the act of averring.

2. Verification; establishment by evidence. Bacon.

3. In pleading, an offer of either party to justify or prove what he alleges. In any stage of pleadings, when either party advances new matter, he avers it to be true, and concludes with these words, "and this he is ready to verify." This is called an averment. Blackstone.

AVER/NAT, n. A sort of grape. Ash. Johnson.

AVER/NIAN, a. Pertaining to Avernus, a lake of Campania in Italy, famous for its poisonous qualities, which the poets represent as so malignant, as to kill fowls flying over. Hence, as authors tell us, its name, averos, without birds. Virgil. Mela. Strabo.

AVERPENNY, n. Money paid towards the king's carriages by land, instead of service by the beasts in kind. Burn.

AVERRED, pp. Affirmed; laid with an averment.

AVERRING, ppr. Affirming; declaring positively; offering to justify or verify.

AVERROIST, n. One of a sect of peripatetic philosophers, who were so denominated from Averroes, a celebrated Arabian author. They held the soul to be mortal, though they pretended to submit to the christian theology. Encyc.

AVERRUN/ATE, v. t. [L. averrunco, of ab and erunco, from runco, to weed, or rake away.]

To root up; to scrape or tear away by the roots. Hudibras.

AVERRUNCA/TION, n. The act of tearing up or raking away by the roots.

AVERSA/TION, n. [L. aversor. See Avert.]

A turning from with disgust or dislike; aversion; hatred; disinclination. South.

It is nearly superseded by aversion.

AVERSE, a. avers' [See Avert.] The literal sense of this word is, turned from, in manifestation of dislike. Hence the real sense is,

1. Disliking; unwilling; having a repugnance of mind.

Averse alike to flatter or offend. Popc.

2. Unfavorable; indisposed; malign. And Pallas now averse refused her aid. Dryden.

This word and its derivatives ought to be followed by to, and never by from. This word includes the idea of from; but the literal meaning being lost, the affection of the mind signified by the word, is exerted towards the object of dislike, and like its kindred terms, hatred, dislike, contrary, repugnant, &c., should be followed by to. Indeed it is absurd to speak of an affection of the mind exerted from an object. Averse expresses a less degree of opposition in the mind, than detesting and abhorring.

Milton once uses averse in its literal sense, with from, but it is not according to the English idiom:

AVERSELY, adv. avers'ly. With repugnance; unwillingly. Brown.

AVERSENESS, n. avers'ness. Opposition of mind; dislike; unwillingness; backwardness. Herbert.

AVER'SION, n. [Fr. aversion, from L. averto.]

1. Opposition or repugnance of mind; dislike; disinclination; reluctance; hatred. Usually this word expresses moderate hatred, or opposition of mind, not amounting to abhorrence or detestation. It ought generally to be followed by to before the object. [See Averse.] Sometimes it admits of for.

A freeholder is bred with an aversion to subjection. Addison.

2. Opposition or contrariety of nature; applied to inanimate substances.

Magnesia, notwithstanding this aversion to solution, forms a kind of paste with water. Fourcroy, Trans.

3. The cause of dislike. Pain their aversion, pleasure their desire. Pope.

AVERT', v. t. [L. averto, a, from, and verto, to turn, anciently, vorto; hence vertex, vortex, averto; probably allied to L. vario; Eng. veer; Sp. birar; Eth. ΩZP bari. Class Br.]

1. To turn from; to turn off or away; as, to avert the eyes from an object. Shak.

2. To keep off, divert or prevent; as, to avert an approaching calamity. Hooker.

3. To cause to dislike. Hooker. But this sense seems to be improper, except when heart or some equivalent word is used; as, to avert the heart or affections, which may signify to alienate the affections. Thomson.

AVERT', v. i. To turn away. Thomson.

AVERT'ER, n. One that turns away; that which turns away.

AVERT'ING, ppr. Turning from; turning away.

A'VIARY, n. [L. aviarium, from avis, a fowl.]

A bird cage; an inclosure for keeping birds confined. Wotton.

AVID'IOUSLY, adv. [See Avidity.] Eagerly; with greediness. Bale.

AVID'ITY, n. [L. aviditas, from avidus, and this from aveo, to desire, to have appetite; Heb. and Ch. רָצָה , to desire, or covet.]

1. Greediness; strong appetite; applied to the senses..

2. Eagerness; intenseness of desire; applied to the mind.

AVIGATO, } n. The Persea, or alligator-pear, a species ranked under the genus Laurus, a native of the W. Indies. The tree has a straight trunk, long oval pointed leaves, and flowers of six petals disposed like a star, produced in clusters, on the extremities of the branches. The fruit is insipid.

Encyc. Miller.

Avignon-berry, the fruit of a species of lycium, so called from the city, Avignon, in France. The berry is less than a pea, of a yellowish green color, and bitter astringent taste; used by dyers and painters for staining yellow.

Encyc.

To call off, or away. [Not used.] Boyle.

AVOCATION, n. [See Vocation, Voice, Vocal.]

1. The act of calling aside, or diverting from some employment; as an avocation from sin or from business.

2. The business which calls aside. The word is generally used for the smaller affairs of life, or occasional calls which summon a person to leave his ordinary or principal business. The use of this word for vocation is very improper.

AVOCATIVE, a. Calling off. [Not used.]

AVOID, v. t. [Fr. vider, or vider; ruide, void, empty; Eng. wide, void, widow; L. vidua. See Void. It coincides also with L. vito, evito; Fr. eviter. See Class Btl.]

1. To shun; to keep at a distance from; that is, literally, to go or be wide from; as, to avoid the company of gamblers.

2. To shift off, or clear off; as, to avoid expense.

3. To quit; to evacuate; to shun by leaving; as, to avoid the house.

4. To escape; as, to avoid danger. Shak.

5. To emit or throw out; as, to avoid excretions. For this, void is now generally used.

6. To make void; to annul or vacate. The grant cannot be avoided without injustice to the grantee. Anon.

7. In pleading, to set up some new matter or distinction, which shall avoid, that is, defeat or evade the allegation of the other party. Thus, in a replication, the plaintiff may deny the defendant's plea, or confess it, and avoid it by stating new matter. Blackstone.

AVOID, v. i. To retire; to withdraw. David avoided out of his presence. 1 Sam. xviii. [Improper.]

2. To become void, vacant or empty. A benefice avoids by common law. Ayliffe.

AVOIDABLE, a. That may be avoided, left at a distance, shunned or escaped.

2. That may be vacated; liable to be annulled.

AVOIDANCE, n. The act of avoiding, or shunning.

2. The act of vacating, or the state of being vacant. It is appropriately used for the state of a benefice becoming void, by the death, deprivation, or resignation of the incumbent. Covel. Encyc.

3. The act of annulling.

4. The course by which any thing is carried off. Bacon.

AVOIDED, pp. Shunned; evaded; made void; ejected.

AVOIDER, n. One who avoids, shuns or escapes.

2. The person who carries any thing away; the vessel in which things are carried away. Johnson.

AWARE, v. i. To beware; to be cautious. [Not legitimate.] Milton.

AWARN, v. t. To warn, which see. Spenser.

AWAT'CHA, n. A bird of Kamtchatka, enumerated by Pennant, among the warblers. The upper parts of the body are of a deep brown color; the throat and breast white, with black spots.

AWAY, adv. [Sax. aweg, absent, a and weg, way; also onweg, away, and awegan, to avert. See Way.]

1. Absent; at a distance; as, the master is away from home.

Have me away, for I am wounded. 2 Chron. xxxv.

2. It is much used with words signifying moving or going from; as, go away, send away, run away, &c.; all signifying departure, or separation to a distance. Sometimes without the verb; as, whither away so fast. Shak.

Love hath wings and will away. Waller.

3. As an exclamation, it is a command or invitation to depart; away, that is, be gone, or let us go. "Away with him." Take him away.

4. With verbs, it serves to modify their sense and form peculiar phrases; as,

To throw away, to cast from, to give up, dissipate or foolishly destroy.

To trifle away, to lose or expend in trifles, or in idleness.

To drink away, to squander away, &c., to dissipate in drinking or extravagance.

To make away, is to kill or destroy.

5. Away with has a peculiar signification in the phrase, "I cannot away with it." Isa. i. The sense is, "I cannot bear or endure it."

AWE, n. aw. [Dan. awe, fear, awe, chastisement, discipline; aver, to chastise or correct; Gr. ayua, to be astonished. Qu. Ir. agh; Sax. ege, or oga, fear; Goth. agjan, or ogan, to dread. It would appear that the primary sense of the Dan. is to strike, or check.]

1. Fear mingled with admiration or reverence; reverential fear.

Stand in awe and sin not. Ps. iv.

2. Fear; dread inspired by something great, or terrific.

AWE, v. t. To strike with fear and reverence; to influence by fear, terror or respect; as, his majesty awed them into silence.

or go towards; سما, (L. semita), a way or path; with a prefix.]

1. In astronomy, an arch of the horizon intercepted between the meridian of the place, and the azimuth or vertical circle, passing through the center of the object.

2. Magnetical azimuth, an arch of the horizon, intercepted between the azimuth or vertical circle, passing through the center of any heavenly body, and the magnetic meridian. This is found by observing the object with an azimuth compass.

3. Azimuth compass, an instrument for finding either the magnetic azimuth or amplitude of an heavenly object.

4. Azimuth dial, a dial whose stile or gnomon is at right angles to the plane of the horizon.

5. Azimuths or vertical circles, are great circles intersecting each other in the zenith and nadir, and cutting the horizon at right angles.

Encyc. Chambers. Bailey. Johnson.

On charts, these azimuths are represented by rhumbs, and on the globe, by the quadrant of altitude, when screwed in the zenith.

AZ/OTE, n. [Gr. α priv. and ζωη, life, or ζωωτος, vital.]

A species of gas, called also mephitic air, and atmospheric mephitic, on account of its fatal effects upon animal life. It is tasteless, and inodorous: it exists in common air, mixed with oxygen, and constitutes about seventy-nine hundredth parts of atmospheric air. It may be obtained, in large quantities, from the muscular fibers of animals. Combined with hydrogen, it forms volatile alkali; and it enters into the composition of most animal substances. It is the radical of nitric acid, and is now called nitrogen gas, or nitrogen.

Unleavened; unfermented; as sea-biscuit. Encyc. Ash.

B.

B is the second letter, and the first articulation, or consonant, in the English, as in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and most other alphabets. In the Ethiopic, it is the ninth letter, and its shape is that of a hut. Perhaps from this or other like figure, it received its Hebrew name, beth, a house. It is a mute and a labial, being formed by pressing the whole length of the lips together, as in pronouncing eb. It is less perfectly mute than p, as may be perceived by pronouncing the syllables ab and ap. It is convertible, 1st, with p, as in the Celtic, ben or pen, a mountain; in the English, beak and peak, beck and peck; 2d, with v, as in the German, silber for silver; and in Spanish, b and v are used indifferently; 3d, with f, as in bore and perforo; Eng. bear, L. fero; in the Celtic bun, bunadh, bunail, stock, origin, foundation; English, found; L. fundamentum; with the Gr. φ, as Bilis, for pauros; 4th, with v and w; as, Ir. for, L. verus; fear, vir; Ir. buac, the wick of a candle.

The Greek B is always pronounced like the English V, and the Russian B corresponds with the Greek.

In composition, the letter B is changed into p before the letter p; as in oppugno, from ob and premo; oppono, from ob and pono; into f, before f, as in offero, from ob and fero; into c before c, as in occido, from ob and cado, and cedo.

As a numeral, B was used by the Hebrews and Greeks, as now by the Arabians, for 2; by the Romans for 300, and with a dash over it thus B, for 3000. B is used also as an abbreviation; thus B. A. stand for bachelor of arts; B. L. for bachelor of laws; B. D. for bachelor of divinity; B. F. before the decrees of the old Romans, for bonum factum. In music, B stands for the tone above A; Bb, for B flat, or the semitone major above A. B also stands for base, and B. C. for basso continuo, or thorough base.

BAA, n. The cry or appropriate bleating of sheep.

BAG'PIPE, n. [bag and pipe.]

A musical wind instrument, used chiefly in Scotland and Ireland. It consists of a leathern bag, which receives the air by a tube, which is stopped by a valve; and pipes, into which the air is pressed by the performer. The base-pipe is called the drone, and the tenor or treble is called the chanter. The pipes have eight holes like those of a flute, which the performer stops and opens at pleasure. There are several species of bag-pipes, as the soft and melodious Irish bag-pipe, with two short drones and a long one; the Highland bagpipe, with two short drones, the music of which is very loud; the Scot's Lowland bag-pipe, which is played with a bellows and is also a loud instrument. There is also a small pipe, with a chanter about eight inches in length. Encyc.

BAIL, v. t. [Fr. and Norm. bailler, to deliver, to lease; Arm. bahailhat; Ar. ba;

bahala; Eth. በልህ baleah, to deliver, free, liberate, permit to go.]

1. To set free, deliver, or liberate from arrest and imprisonment, upon security given that the person bailed shall appear and answer in court. The word is applied to the magistrate, or the surety. The magistrate bails a man, when he liberates him from arrest or imprisonment, upon bond given with sureties. The surety bails a person, when he procures his release from arrest, by giving bond for his appearance.

Blackstone.

2. To deliver goods in trust, upon a contract, expressed or implied, that the trust shall be faithfully executed on the part of the bailee or person entrusted; as, to bail cloth to a tailor to be made into a garment, or to bail goods to a carrier. Blackstone.

3. To free from water, as to bail a boat.
This word is improperly written bale.
The word is probably the same as bail in law, to free, or liberate, and signifies to throw out water, as with a bucket or shovel.

BAIL, n. The person or persons who procure the release of a prisoner from custody, by becoming surety for his appearance in court.

The bail must be real substantial bondsmen.

Blackstone.

B and B were bail to the arrest in a suit at law.

Kent.

Bail is not used with a plural termination.

2. The security given for the release of a prisoner from custody; as, the man is out upon bail.

Excessive bail ought not to be required.

Blackstone.

Bail is common or special. Common bail are imaginary persons, who are pledges for the plaintiff's prosecution; as John Doe and Richard Roe.

Special bail must be men of real substance, sufficient to pay their bond or recognizance. To perfect or justify bail is to prove by the oath of the person that he is worth the sum for which he is surety beyond his debts. To admit to bail, is to release upon security given by bondsmen.

3. The handle of a kettle or other vessel.

4. In England, a certain limit within a forest.

BAL'ANCE, n. [Fr. balance; Sp. balanza; It. bilancia; L. bilanx, bis, twice, and lanx, a dish, the double dish.]

1. A pair of scales, for weighing commodities. It consists of a beam or lever suspended exactly in the middle, with a scale or basin hung to each extremity, of precisely equal weight. The Roman balance, our steel-yard, consists of a lever or beam, movable on a center, and suspended near one of its extremities. Hence,

2. One of the simple powers in mechanics, used for determining the equality or difference of weight in heavy bodies, and consequently their masses or quantity of matter. Encyc.

3. Figuratively, an impartial state of the mind, in deliberating; or a just estimate of the reasons and arguments on both sides of a question, which gives to each its due weight, or force and importance.

4. As balance signifies equal weight, or equality, it is by custom used for the weight or sum necessary to make two unequal weights or sums equal; that which is necessary to bring them to a balance or equipoise. Hence, in accounts, balance is the difference of two sums; as upon an adjustment of accounts, a balance was found against A, in favor of B. Hence, to pay a balance, is to pay the difference and make the two accounts equal.

5. Balance of trade is an equal exportation of domestic productions, and importation of foreign. But, usually, the term is applied to the difference between the amount or value of the commodities exported and imported. Hence the common expression, the balance of trade is against or in favor of a country.

BAN/IAN, n. A man's undress or morning gown, as worn by the Banians in the E. Indies. Johnson.

2. A Gentoo servant, employed as an agent in commerce. Herbert.

3. A tree in India. Milton.

Banian days, in seamen's language, are three days in a week, in which the sailors have no flesh meat served out to them. This use of the term seems to be borrowed from the Banians in Asia, who, believing in a metempsychosis, will eat no flesh, nor even kill noxious animals.

BAN/ISH, v. t. [Fr. bannir, bannissant; whence bannissement, banishment; Arm. embanna, to publish; forbana and forbani-za, to banish; It. bandire; D. bannen; G. verbannen, ausbannen. See Ban.]

1. To condemn to exile, or compel to leave one's country, by authority of the prince or government, either for life or for a limited time. It is common for Russians to be banished to Siberia.

2. To drive away; to compel to depart; as, to banish sorrow.

3. To quit one's country voluntarily, and with a view to reside abroad; as, he banished himself.

BAN/ISHED, pp. Compelled to leave one's country; driven away.

BANK, n. [Sax. banec; D. and G. bank; Sw. bank; Dan. banke; It. banco; Sp. Port. banca, banco; Fr. banq, banque; W. banq; Arm. bancoq; Ar. بنك, bank, a bench.]

Bank and bench are radically the same word. The sense is, that which is set, laid or extended. Applied to a mass of earth, it is a collection, that which is thrown or laid together.]

1. A mound, pile or ridge of earth, raised above the surrounding plain, either as a defense or for other purposes. 2 Sam. xx. 15.

2. Any steep acclivity, whether rising from a river, a lake, or the sea, or forming the side of a ravine, or the steep side of a hill-lock on a plain. When we speak of the earth in general adjoining a lake or the sea, we use the word shore; but a particular steep acclivity on the side of a lake, river or the sea, is called a bank.

3. A bench, or a bench of rowers, in a galley; so called from their seat.

Placed on their banks, the lusty Trojans sweep. Waller.

4. By analogy, a collection or stock of money, deposited, by a number of persons, for a particular use; that is, an aggregate of particulars, or a fund; as, to establish a bank, that is a joint fund.

5. The place where a collection of money is deposited; a common repository of the money of individuals or of companies; also a house used for a bank.

6. A company of persons concerned in a bank, whether a private association, or an incorporated company; the stockholders of a bank, or their representatives, the directors, acting in their corporate capacity.

7. An elevation, or rising ground, in the sea; called also flats, shoals, shelves or shallows. These may rise to the surface of the water or near to it; but the word bank signifies also elevated ground at the bottom of the sea, when many fathoms below the surface, as the banks of Newfoundland.

BANK, v. t. To raise a mound or dyke; to inclose, defend or fortify with a bank; as, to bank a house.

2. To pass by the banks of. Shak.

As I have bank'd their towns. Shak.

[Not in use.]

3. To lay up or deposit money in a bank. Johnson.

[Little used.]

BANK/ABLE, a. Receivable at a bank, as bills; or discountable, as notes. [Of recent origin.]

BANK-BILL, } n. A promissory note, is-

BANK-NOTE, } n. sued by a banking company, signed by their President and countersigned by the Cashier, payable to the bearer in gold or silver at the bank, on demand. If payable to order, the note is called a post-note.

BANK/ED, pp. Raised in a ridge or mound of earth; inclosed, or fortified with a bank.

BANK/ER, n. One who keeps a bank; one who trafficks in money, receives and remits money, negotiates bills of exchange, &c.

2. A vessel employed in the codfishery on the banks of Newfoundland. Mar. Dict.

BANK/ING, ppr. Raising a mound or bank; inclosing with a bank. When we speak of restraining water, we usually call it banking; when we speak of defending the land, we call it imbanking. Encyc.

BANK/ING, n. The business or employment of a banker; the business of establishing a common fund for lending money, discounting notes, issuing bills, receiving deposits, collecting the money on notes deposited, negotiating bills of exchange, &c.

BANK/RUPT, n. [Fr. banqueroute; Sp. bancarotta, bankruptcy, bank and Sp. roto, Port. roto, It. rotto, broken; Eng. ruin, defeat. This may signify bench-broken, or bank-broken; most probably the latter, referring to the fund or stock. The last syllable is the Latin ruptus contracted; Norm. roupt, rous, broken.]

1. A trader who secretes himself, or does certain other acts tending to defraud his creditors. Blackstone.

2. In a less technical sense, a trader who fails or becomes unable to pay his just debts; an insolvent trader. In strictness, no person but a trader can be a bankrupt. Bankruptcy is applied to merchants and traders; insolvency, to other persons.

B A N

BANKRUPT, a. Having committed acts of bankruptcy; unable to pay just debts; insolvent.

BANKRUPT, v. t. To break one in trade; to make insolvent.

BANKRUPTCY, n. The state of being a bankrupt, or insolvent; inability to pay all debts.

2. The act of becoming a bankrupt; the act of rendering one's self a bankrupt, as by absconding, or otherwise; failure in trade.

BANKRUPTED, pp. Rendered insolvent.

BANKRUPTING, ppr. Breaking in trade; rendering insolvent.

BANKRUPT-LAW, n. A law, which, upon a bankrupt's surrendering all his property to commissioners for the benefit of his creditors, discharges him from the payment of his debts, and all liability to arrest or suit for the same, and secures his future acquired property from a liability to the payment of his past debts.

BANKRUPT-SYSTEM, n. A system of laws and legal proceedings in regard to bankrupts and their property.

BANK-STOCK, n. A share or shares in the capital stock of a bank.

BAN'NER, n. [Fr. banniere; W. baner; It. bandiera; Sp. bandera; G. fahne and panier; D. vaan and vaandel; from Goth. fana, cloth; Sax. fana; L. pannus; Ir. fuan, cloth.]

1. A square flag; a military ensign; the principal standard of a prince or state. Encyc.

BAN'NERED, a. Furnished with or bearing banners. Milton.

Shield the strong foes, and rake the bannered shore. Barlow.

BAN'NERET, n. [Fr. from banner.] A knight made in the field. Bannerets formerly constituted an order of knights or feudal lords, who led their vassals to battle under their own flags. On the day of battle, the candidates presented their flags to the king or general, who cut off the train or skirt, and made it square. They were then called knights of the square flag. They were a middle order between barons and simple knights. Spelman. Encyc.

BAN'NEROL. [See Bandrol.]

BAN'NOCK, n. [Ir. boinneog.] A cake made of oatmeal or peas-meal, baked on an iron plate over the fire; used in Scotland, and the northern counties of England. Johnson.

BAN'OY, n. A species of hawk, somewhat larger than the English sparrow hawk; the back and wings yellow; and the belly white; a native of the Philippine isles. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

BANQUET, n. [Fr. banquet; Arm. banqed, or banvez; It. banchetto, a little seat, a feast; Sp. banqueta, a stool with three legs; banquete, a banquet. From these words, it would appear that banquet is a sitting and hence a feast, and not, as supposed, from the oriental pan, فان to feed or bring up delicately.]

B A P

A feast; a rich entertainment of meat and drink. Ether v. Job xli. Amos vi.

BANQUET, v. t. To treat with a feast, or rich entertainment. Shak.

BAN'SHÉE or BEN'SHI, n. An Irish fairy. Todd.

BANSTICKLE, n. A small fish, called also stickle-back. This fish falls under the genus Gasterosteus.

BAN'TER, v. t. [Gr. φωβώ, whence φωβώζω, to mock, or deride.]

To play upon in words and in good humor; to rally; to joke, or jest with. Banter hardly amounts to ridicule, much less to derision. It consists in being pleasant and witty with the actions of another, and raising a humorous laugh at his expense, often attended with some degree of sarcasm.

BAN'TER, n. A joking or jesting; railery; wit or humor; pleasantry.

BAN'TERED, pp. Rallied; laughed at in good humor.

BAN'TERER, n. One who banters, or laughs at with pleasantry.

BAN'TERING, ppr. Joking; laughing at with good humor.

BANT'LING, n. [G. bankart. Qu.] A young child; an infant.

BAPTISM, n. [Gr. βαπτισμα, from βαπτίζω, from βαπτο, to baptize; Sp. bautizar; It. battezzare; Port. bautizar, or baptizar. These seem to be from the Greek, by contraction. But the Arm. badeza, badein, may be from bath, bad, water.]

1. The application of water to a person, as a sacrament or religious ceremony, by which he is initiated into the visible church of Christ. This is usually performed by sprinkling or immersion.

2. The sufferings of Christ. Matt. xx. 22. 23.

3. So much of the gospel as was preached by John, the Baptist. Acts xviii. Cruden.

BAPTIS'MAL, a. Pertaining to baptism; as a baptismal vow.

BAPTIST, n. One who administers baptism. This appellation is appropriately given to John, the forerunner of Christ.

B A R

2. As a contraction of Anabaptist, one who denies the doctrine of infant baptism, and maintains that baptism ought to be administered only to adults by immersing the body in water.

BAPTISTERY, n. [L. baptisterium.] A place where the sacrament of baptism is administered. Primitively, baptisteries were in buildings separate from the church; but in the sixth century, they were taken into the church-porch, and afterwards into the church itself. Encyc.

BAPTIS'TIC, a. Pertaining to baptism. Bramhall.

BAPTIS'TICAL, a. tism.

BAPTIZE, v. t. [See Baptism.] To administer the sacrament of baptism to; to christen. By some denominations of christians, baptism is performed by plunging, or immersing the whole body in water, and this is done to none but adults. More generally the ceremony is performed by sprinkling water on the face of a person, whether an infant or an adult, and in the case of an infant, by giving him a name, in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, which is called Christening.

BAPTIZED, pp. Having received baptism; christened.

BAPTIZER, n. One who christens, or administers baptism.

BAPTIZING, ppr. Administering baptism to; christening.

BAR, n. [W. bar; Ir. barra; Fr. barre; Sp. barra; Port. id; It. barra, sbarra; Arm. barren, sparl; Heb. בַּר; Ch. בַּר. If these words are the Eng. bar, the sense is a shoot, that which shoots, passes or is driven.]

1. A piece of wood, iron or other solid matter, long in proportion to its diameter, used for various purposes, but especially for a hindrance or obstruction; as the bars of a fence or gate; the bar of a door or hatchway. Numb. iii. 36. Ex. xxvi. 26.

2. Any obstacle which obstructs, hinders or defends; an obstruction; a fortification. Amos i.

Must I new bars to my own joy create. Dryden.

3. The shore of the sea, which restrains its waters. Job xxxviii.

4. The railing that incloses the place which counsel occupy in courts of justice. Hence the phrase, at the bar of the court, signifies in open court. Hence also licensed lawyers are called barristers; and hence the whole body of lawyers licensed in a court, are customarily called the bar. A trial at bar, in England, is a trial in the courts of Westminster, opposed to a trial at Nisi Prius, in the circuits.

5. Figuratively, any tribunal; as the bar of public opinion. Thus the final trial of men is called the bar of God.

6. The inclosed place of a tavern, inn or coffee house, where the landlord or his servant delivers out liquors, and waits upon customers. Addison.

7. A bank of sand, gravel or earth, forming a shoal at the mouth of a river or harbor, obstructing entrance, or rendering it difficult.

8. A rock in the sea, according to Brown; or any thing by which structure is held together, according to Johnson; used in Job ii.

9. Any thing laid across another, as bars in heraldry, stripes in color, and the like.

10. In the menage, the highest part of the place in a horse's mouth between the grinders and tusks, so that the part of the mouth which lies under and at the side of the bars, retains the name of the gum. Encyc. The upper part of the gums, which bears no teeth, and to which the bit is applied. Johnson.

11. In music, bars are lines drawn perpendicularly across the lines of the staff, including between each two, a certain quantity of time, or number of beats.

12. In law, a peremptory exception sufficient to destroy the plaintiff's action. It is divided into a bar to common intentment, and bar special; bar temporary and bar perpetual. Bar to common intentment is an ordinary or general bar, which disables the declaration of the plaintiff. A special bar is more than ordinary, as a fine, release, or justification. A temporary bar is that which is good for a time, but may afterwards cease. A perpetual bar overthrows the action of the plaintiff forever. Blackstone. Cowel.

13. A bar of gold or silver, is an ingot, lump or wedge, from the mines, run in a mold, and unwrought. A bar of iron is a long piece, wrought in the forge and hammered from a pig.

14. Among printers, the iron with a wooden handle, by which the screw of the press is turned.

15. In the African trade, a denomination of price; payment formerly being made to the Africans in iron bars. Johnson.

BAR, v. t. To fasten with a bar; as, to bar a door, or gate.

2. To hinder; to obstruct, or prevent; as, to bar the entrance of evil.

3. To prevent; to exclude; to hinder; to make impracticable; as, the distance between us bars our intercourse. In this sense, the phrase is often varied, thus: the distance bars me from his aid, or bars him from my aid.

4. To prohibit; to restrain or exclude by express or implied prohibition; as, the statute bars my right; the law bars the use of poisoned weapons.

5. To obstruct, prevent or hinder by any moral obstacle; as, the right is barred by time, or by statute; a release bars the plaintiff's recovery.

6. To except; to exclude by exception; as, I bar to night. Shak.

7. To cross with stripes of a different color.

8. To bar a vein, in farriery, is an operation upon the legs of a horse, or other parts, to stop malignant humors. This is done by opening the skin above a vein, disengaging it and tying it both above and below, and striking between the two ligatures. Johnson.

9. To adorn with trappings; a contraction of barb. [See Barb.] Drayton. Haywood.

BARB, n. [L. barba; W. barv; Corn. bar; Arm. baro.] This is beard, with a different ending. The sense may be, that which shoots out.]

1. Beard, or that which resembles it, or grows in the place of it; as the barb of a fish, the smaller claws of the polypus, &c. Johnson. Core.

2. The down, or pubes, covering the surface of some plants; or rather, a tuft or bunch of strong hairs terminating leaves. Linne. Milne.

3. Anciently, armor for horses; formerly, barbe or barde. Hayward.

4. A common name of the barbary pigeon, a bird of a black or dun color. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

5. A horse from Barbary, of which it seems to be a contraction.

6. The points that stand backward in an arrow, fish-hook or other instrument for piercing, intended to prevent its being extracted.

7. In botany, a straight process armed with teeth pointing backward like the sting of a bee. This is one sort of pubescence. Martyn.

BARB, v. t. To shave; to dress the beard. Obs. Shak.

2. To furnish with barbs, as an arrow, fish hook, spear, or other instrument.

3. To put armor on a horse. Milton.

BARBACAN, n. [Fr. barbacane; Sp. barbacana; It. barbacane. Qu. a projecting work.]

1. A fortification or outer defense to a city or castle, consisting of an elevation of earth about three feet high, along the foot of the rampart. Encyc. Johnson. Sp. Dict.

2. A fortress at the end of a bridge, or at the outlet of a city, having a double wall with towers. Encyc.

3. An opening in the wall of a fortress through which guns are leveled and fired upon an enemy. Johnson. Encyc.

The French use the word also for an aperture in a wall to let in or drain off water; and the Spaniards, for a low wall round a church yard. Fr. and Sp. Dict.

BARBA'DOES-CHERRY, n. The Malpighia, a tree growing in the W. Indies, fifteen feet high and producing a pleasant tart fruit. Johnson.

BARBA'DOES TAR, n. A mineral fluid, of the nature of the thicker fluid bitumens, of a nauseous bitterish taste, a very strong disagreeable smell, viscid, of a brown, black or reddish color; it easily melts, and burns with much smoke, but is not soluble in ardent spirits. It contains a portion of acid of amber. It trickles down the sides of mountains in some parts of America, and sometimes is found on the surface of the waters. It is recommended in coughs and disorders of the breast and lungs. Encyc. Nicholson.

BARBARIAN, n. [L. barbarus; Gr. βάρβαρος; Ir. barba, or beorb; Russ. varvar; Ch. בָּרְבָר. See Class Br. No. 3 and 7. The sense is, foreign, wild, fierce.]

1. A man in his rude, savage state; an uncivilized person. Denham.

2. A cruel, savage, brutal man; one destitute of pity or humanity. Philips.

3. A foreigner. The Greeks and Romans denominated most foreign nations barbarians; and many of these were less civilized than themselves, or unacquainted with their language, laws and manners. But with them the word was less reproachful than with us.

BARBARIAN, a. Belonging to savages; rude; uncivilized. Pope.

2. Cruel; inhuman.

BARBARIC, a. [L. barbaricus. See Barbarian.] The Romans applied this word to designate things foreign; Barbaricum aurum, gold from Asia, Virg. Aen. 2. 504; Barbaricæ vestes, embroidered garments from foreign nations. English writers use the word in a like sense.]

Foreign; imported from foreign nations. Milton. Pope.

BARBARISM, n. [L. barbarismus. See Barbarian.]

1. An offense against purity of style or language; any form of speech contrary to the pure idioms of a particular language. Dryden.

2. Ignorance of arts; want of learning. Shak. Dryden.

3. Rudeness of manners; savagism; incivility; ferociousness; a savage state of society. Spenser. Davies.

4. Brutality; cruelty; barbarity. [In this sense little used, being superseded by barbarity.]

BARBARITY, n. [See Barbarian.]

The manners of a barbarian; savageness; cruelty; ferociousness; inhumanity. Clarendon.

2. Barbarism; impurity of speech. Dryden. Swift.

[The use of the word in this sense, is now superseded by barbarism.]

BARBARIZE, v. t. To make barbarous.

Hideous changes have barbarized France. Burke.

BA'RELY, adv. Nakedly; poorly; indigently; without decoration; merely; only; without any thing more; as a prince barely in title. Barret. Hooker.

BA'RENECKED, a. Having the neck uncovered; exposed. Shak.

BA'RENESS, n. Nakedness; leanness; poverty; indigence; defect of clothes, or the usual covering. Shak. South.

BA'REPICKED, a. Picked to the bone. Shak.

BA'RERIBBED, a. Lean. Shak.

B'ARGAIN, n. [Fr. barguigner, to haggle, to hum and haw; Arm. barguignour, a baggler; It. bargagnare, to cavil, contend, bargain; Ir. braghean, debate. It seems to accord with It. briga, Sp. brega, Fr. brigue.]

An agreement between parties concerning the sale of property; or a contract by which one party binds himself to transfer the right to some property, for a consideration, and the other party binds himself to receive the property and pay the consideration.

2. Stipulation: interested dealing.

3. Purchase or the thing purchased. Locke.

4. In popular language, final event; upshot. We must make the best of a bad bargain.

To sell bargains, is a vulgar phrase.

To strike a bargain, is to ratify an agreement, originally by striking, or shaking hands. The Latin ferire fedus, may represent a like ceremony, unless it refers to the practice of killing a victim, at the solemn ratification of oaths.

Bargain and sale, in law, a species of conveyance, by which the bargainer contracts to convey the lands to the bargainee, and becomes by such contract a trustee for and seised to the use of the bargainee. The statute then completes the purchase; that is, the bargain vests the use, and the statute vests the possession. Blackstone.

B'ARGAIN, v. i. To make a contract or conclusive agreement, for the transfer of property; often with for before the thing purchased; as, to bargain for a house. A bargain with B for his farm.

B'ARGAIN, v. t. To sell; to transfer for a consideration; as, A bargained away his farm; a popular use of the word.

BARGAINEE, n. The party in a contract who receives or agrees to receive the property sold. Blackstone.

BARGAINER, n. The party in a contract who stipulates to sell and convey property to another. Blackstone.

B'ARGE, n. barj. [D. bargie; It. and Sp. barca; Ir. barc. Barge, and bark or barque, a ship, are radically one word.]

1. A pleasure boat; a vessel or boat of state, furnished with elegant apartments, canopies and cushions, equipped with a band of rowers, and decorated with flags and streamers; used by officers and magistrates. Encyc.

2. A flat-bottomed vessel of burthen, for loading and unloading ships. Mar. Dict.

B'ARGE-COUPLES, n. In architecture, a beam mortised into another, to strengthen the building. Encyc.

B'ARGE-COURSE, n. In bricklaying, a part of the tiling which projects beyond the principal rafters, in buildings where there is a gable, or kirkhead. Encyc.

BAR

BARGE, n. The man who manages a barge.

BARGE, n. The proprietor of a barge, conveying goods for hire.

Blackstone.

BARGER, n. The manager of a barge.

BARILLA, n. [Sp.] A plant cultivated in Spain for its ashes, from which the purest kind of mineral alkali is obtained; used in making glass and soap, and in bleaching linen. The plant is cut and laid in heaps, and burnt, the salts running into a hole in the ground where they form a vitrified lump. Encyc.

2. The alkali procured from this plant.

BARITONE, [See Barytone.]

BARIUM, n. The metallic basis of baryte or baryta, which is an oxyd of barium.

Davy.

BARK, n. [Dan. bark; Sw. bark; G. berke; probably from stripping, separating.]

1. The rind or exterior covering of a tree, corresponding to the skin of an animal. This is composed of the cuticle or epidermis, the outer bark or cortex, and the inner bark or liber. The rough broken matter on bark is, by the common people of New-England, called ross.

2. By way of distinction, Peruvian Bark.

BARK, v. t. To peel; to strip off bark. Also to cover or inclose with bark.

BARK, n. [Ir. barr; Fr. barque; Russ. barque; It. and Sp. barca.]

A small ship; but appropriately, a ship which carries three masts without a mizen top sail. The English mariners, in the coal trade, apply this name to a broad-sterned ship without a figure-head.

Encyc. Mar. Dict.

Water-barks, in Holland, are small vessels, for conveying fresh water from place to place, the hold of which is filled with water. Encyc.

BARK, v. i. [Sax. beorcan, byrcan, to bark.]

1. To make the noise of dogs, when they threaten or pursue.

2. To clamor at; to pursue with unreasonable clamor or reproach. It is followed by at.

To bark at sleeping fame. Spenser.

BARK-BARED, a. Stripped of the bark. Mortimer.

BARK-BOUND, a. Having the bark too firm or close, as with trees. This disease is cured by slitting the bark. Encyc.

BARKED, pp. Stripped of the bark; peeled; also covered with bark.

BARKER, n. One who barks, or clamors unreasonably; one who strips trees of their bark.

BARK-GALLED, a. Having the bark galled, as with thorns. This defect is cured by binding on clay. Encyc.

BARKING, pp. Stripping off bark; making the noise of dogs; clamoring; covering with bark.

BARKY, a. Consisting of bark; containing bark. Shak.

BARLEY, n. [W. barys; Sax. bere. Qu. L. far, Gr. σποβ, Heb. בָּר bar, corn. In the Saxon chronicle, An. 1124, it is written barlie. Owen renders it bread-corn, from bere, bread.]

BAR

A species of valuable grain, used especially for making malt, from which are distilled liquors of extensive use, as beer, ale and porter. It is of the genus hordeum, consisting of several species. Those principally cultivated in England, are the common spring barley, the long eared barley, the winter or square barley, by some called big, and the sprat or battledore barley. This grain is used in medicine, as possessing emollient, diluent, and expectorant qualities. Encyc. Miller. Arbuthnot.

BARLEY-BRAKE, n. A rural play; a trial of swiftness. Sidney.

BARLEY-BROTH, n. A low word for strong beer. Shak.

BARLEY-CORN, n. [See Corn.] A grain of barley; the third part of an inch in length; hence originated our measures of length. Johnson.

BARLEY-MOW, n. A mow of barley, or the place where barley is deposited. Gay.

BARLEY-SUGAR, n. Sugar boiled till it is brittle, formerly with a decoction of barley.

BARLEY-WATER, n. A decoction of barley, which is reputed soft and lubricating, and much used in medicine.

French barley and pearl barley are used for making decoctions. These are made by separating the grain from its coat. The pearl barley is reduced to the size of a small shot.

BARM, n. [Sax. beorm. Qu. L. fermentum, from ferveo; or beer-rahm, beer cream; or W. berwi, to boil.]

Yeast; the scum rising upon beer, or other malt liquors, when fermenting, and used as leaven in bread to make it swell, causing it to be softer, lighter, and more delicate. It may be used in liquors to make them ferment or work. Johnson. Encyc.

BARMY, a. Containing barm, or yeast. Bacon. Shak.

BARN, n. [Sax. berern, from bere, barley, and ærn, or ern, a close place or repository.]

A covered building for securing grain, hay, flax, and other productions of the earth. In the northern states of America, the farmers generally use barns for stabling their horses and cattle; so that among them, a barn is both a cornhouse or grange, and a stable.

BARNACLE, n. [Port. bernaca, the Solan goose; Fr. barnacle or barnaque; L. perna, a shell-fish.]

1. A shell which is often found on the bottoms of ships, rocks and timber, below the surface of the sea.

2. A species of goose, found in the northern seas, but visiting more southern climates in winter. The forehead and cheeks are white, but the upper part of the body and neck is black. Formerly, a strange notion prevailed, that these birds grew out of wood, or rather out of the barnacles attached to wood in the sea. Hence the name. It is written also Bernacle. Pennant.

3. In the plural, an instrument consisting of two branches joined at one end with a hinge, to put upon a horse's nose, to confine him, for shoeing, bleeding, or dressing. Encyc.

BAR

BAR/OLITE, n. [Gr. βαρος, weight, and λίθος, a stone.]

Carbonate of baryte. Its color is usually a light yellowish gray; sometimes whitish, or with a tinge of green. It is strongly translucent. It usually occurs in small masses, which have a fibrous structure; sometimes in distinct crystals.

This mineral is called also Witherite, from Dr. Withering, the discoverer. Cleveland. Kirwan. Ure.

BAROMETER, n. [Gr. βαρος, weight, and μετρον, measure.]

An instrument for measuring the weight or pressure of the atmosphere, consisting of a glass tube, hermetically sealed at one end, filled with quicksilver, well defecated and purged of air, and inverted in a basin of quicksilver. A column of quicksilver is then supported in the tube, of equal weight with the incumbent atmosphere. This instrument was invented by Torricelli, of Florence, in 1643. Its uses are to indicate changes of weather, and to determine the altitude of mountains, by the falling and rising of the mercury. For this purpose, the tube is fixed to a graduated scale, so that the smallest variation in the column is visible. Encyc. Johnson.

BAROMETRICAL, a. Pertaining or relating to the barometer; made by a barometer; as barometrical experiments.

BAROMETRICALLY, adv. By means of a barometer. Pinkerton.

BARON, n. [Fr. baron; Sp. baron or varon; It. barone; Sans. bareru, bhartu, a husband. This word, in the middle ages, was written bar, ber, var, baro, paro, viro, virro, viron. It is the vir of the Latins; Sax. wer; Ir. fir, fear; W. gwr, for guir, gevir. See Spelman's Glossary, and Hirt. Pansa. De Bell. Alex. 42: Hicks' Sax. Grammar, 113, 146. The Sax. wer, L. vir, is doubtless the Shemitic בָּר, a man, so named from strength.]

1. In Great Britain, a title or degree of nobility; a lord; a peer; one who holds the rank of nobility next below that of a viscount, and above that of a knight or baronet. Originally, the barons, being the feudatories of princes, were the proprietors of land held by honorable service. Hence, in ancient records, the word barons comprehends all the nobility. All such in England had, in early times, a right to sit in parliament. As a baron was the proprietor of a manor, and each manor had its court-baron; hence the barons claimed, and to this day enjoy, the right of judging in the last resort; a right pertaining to the house of lords, or peers, as the representatives of the ancient barons, land-holders, manor-holders.

Anciently, barons were greater, or such as held their lands of the king in capite; or lesser, such as held their lands of the greater barons by military service in capite.

The title of baron is no longer attached to the possession of a manor, but given by the king's letters patent, or writ of summons to parliament; that is, the dignity is personal, and not territorial.

The radical word, vir, fr, a man, is Celtic, as well as Teutonic; but the word baron was not known in the British isles, till introduced from the continent under the Norman princes.

Spelman. Blackstone. Encyc. Cowel.

2. Baron is a title of certain officers, as barons of the exchequer, who are the four judges who try cases between the king and his subjects, relating to the revenue. Barons of the Cinque Ports are members of the House of Commons, elected by the seven Cinque Ports, two for each port. These ports are Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, Hythe, Winchelsea, and Rye.

Blackstone.

3. In law, a husband; as baron and feme, husband and wife.

BAR/ONAGE, n. The whole body of barons or peers.

2. The dignity of a baron.

3. The land which gives title to a baron.

Johnson.

BAR/ONESS, n. A baron's wife or lady.

BAR/ONET, n. [Fr. dimin of baron.]

A dignity or degree of honor, next below a baron, and above a knight; having precedence of all knights except those of the garter, and being the only knighthood that is hereditary. The order was founded by James I. in 1611, and is given by patent.

Johnson. Blackstone.

BAR/ONIAL, a. Pertaining to a baron.

Encyc.

BAR/ONY, n. The lordship, honor, or fee of a baron, whether spiritual or temporal. This lordship is held in chief of the king, and gives title to the possessor, or baron.

Johnson. Encyc.

BAR/OSCOPE, n. [Gr. βαρος, weight, and σκοπεω, to view.]

An instrument to show the weight of the atmosphere; superseded by the Barometer.

AROSCOP/IC, a. Pertaining to or determined by the baroscope.

BAROSEL/ENITE, n. [Gr. βαρος, weight, or βαρυς, heavy, and selenite.]

A mineral; sulphate of baryte; heavy spar.

Kirwan. Cleaveland.

BAR/RA, n. In Portugal and Spain, a long measure for cloths. In Valencia, 13 baras make 12½ yards English; in Castile, 7 are equal to 6½ yards; in Arragon, 3 make 2½ yards.

Encyc.

BARRACA/DA, n. A fish, about fifteen inches in length, of a dusky color on the back, and a white belly, with small black spots.

Dict. of Nat. Hist.

BAR/RACAN, n. [It. baracane; Sp. barragan; Fr. bouacan.]

A thick, strong stuff, something like camelot; used for cloaks, surtouts, and other outer garments.

BAR/RACK, n. [Sp. barraca; Fr. baraque. It seems to be formed like Sax. parruc, a park, an inclosure.]

A hut or house for soldiers, especially in garrison. In Spain, a hut or cabin for fishermen.

BAR/RACK-MASTER, n. The officer who superintends the barracks of soldiers.

Swift.

BARRACU/DA, n. A species of fish of the pike kind, found in the seas about the Bahamas and W. Indies, of ten feet in length. The color is deep brown, and the fish is very voracious. The flesh is disagreeable and sometimes poisonous.

Catesby. Pennant.

BAR/RATOR, n. [Old Fr. barat, strife, deceit; Cimbric, baratton; Ice. and Scandinavian, baratta, contest; It. baratta, strife, quarrel; barattare, to barter, to cheat; Sp. barato, fraud, deceit; baratar, to barter, to deceive. The radical sense is to turn, wind and twist, whence to strive; L. verto; Eng. barter. See Barter.]

1. One who frequently excites suits at law; a common mover and maintainer of suits and controversies; an encourager of litigation.

Coke. Blackstone.

2. The master of a ship, who commits any fraud, in the management of the ship, or in relation to his duties as master, by which the owner or insurers are injured.

BAR/RATRY, n. The practice of exciting and encouraging lawsuits and quarrels.

Coke. Blackstone.

BARRED, pp. Fastened with a bar; hindered; restrained; excluded; forbid; striped; checkered.

BAR/REL, n. [W. Fr. baril; Sp. barril; It. barile; Arm. baraz.]

1. A vessel or cask, of more length than breadth, round and bulging in the middle, made of staves and heading, and bound with hoops.

2. The quantity which a barrel contains. Of wine measure, the English barrel contains 31½ gallons; of beer measure, 36 gallons; of ale, 32 gallons; and of beer-vingar, 34 gallons.

Of weight, a barrel of Essex butter is 106 pounds; of Suffolk butter, 256; a barrel of herring should contain 32 gallons wine measure, and hold 1000 herrings; a barrel of salmon should contain 42 gallons; a barrel of soap should weigh 256 lbs.

Johnson. Encyc.

In America, the contents of a barrel are regulated by statutes.

In Connecticut, the barrel for liquors must contain 31½ gallons, each gallon to contain 231 cubic inches. In New-York, a barrel of flour by statute must contain either 196 lb. or 228 lb. nett weight. The barrel of beef and pork in New-York and Connecticut, is 200 lbs. In general, the contents of barrels, as defined by statute, in this country, must be from 28 to 31½ gallons.

3. Any thing hollow and long, as the barrel of a gun; a tube.

4. A cylinder; as the barrel of a watch, within which the spring is coiled, and round which is wound the chain.

5. A cavity behind the tympanum of the ear is called the barrel of the ear. It is four or five lines deep, and five or six wide, and covered with a fine membrane. It is more usually called the cavity of the tympanum.

Encyc. Johnson.

BAR/REL, v. t. To put in a barrel; to pack in a barrel with salt for preservation, as to barrel beef, pork or fish.

BAR/ROW, n. [Sax. beorg, a hill or hillock; byrgen, a tomb; G. and D. bergen, to conceal, to save.]

A hillock or mound of earth, intended as a repository of the dead. Such barrows are found in England, in the North of the European continent, and in America. They sometimes were formed of stones, and in England called cairns. The barrow answers to the tumulus of the Latins. [See Tomb.]

BAR/SE, n. An English name for the common perch. Dict. of Nat. Hist.

BAR/SHOT, n. [See Bar and Shoot.]

Double headed shot, consisting of a bar, with a half ball or round head at each end; used for destroying the masts and rigging in naval combat. Mar. Dict.

BARTER, v. t. [Sp. baratar; It. barattare, to exchange. The primary sense is probably to turn or change, and this gives the sense of deceiving, barratry, as well as of bartering. L. vario, verto. Class Br.]

BAS

To traffic or trade, by exchanging one commodity for another, in distinction from a sale and purchase, in which money is paid for the commodities transferred.

BARTER, v. t. To give one thing for another in commerce. It is sometimes followed by away; as, to barter away goods or honor.

BARTER, n. The act or practice of trafficking by exchange of commodities; sometimes, perhaps, the thing given in exchange.

BARTERED, pp. Given in exchange.

BARTERER, n. One who trafficks by exchange of commodities.

BARTERING, ppr. Trafficking or trading by an exchange of commodities.

BARTERY, n. Exchange of commodities in trade. [Not used.] Camden.

BARTON, n. [Sax. bere-ton, barley-town.] The deman lands of a manor; the manor itself; and sometimes the out-houses. Johnson. Blount.

BARTRAM, n. [L. pyrethrum; Gr. rup, fire.]

BARYSTRONTIANITE, n. [Gr. basus, heavy, and strontian.]

A mineral, called also stromnite, from Stromness, in Orkney. It has been found in masses of a grayish white color internally, but externally of a yellowish white.

Trail. Cleaveland. Phillips.

BARYTA, } [Gr. basus, heavy; basus, weight.]

BARYTE, } n. weight.]

Ponderous earth; so called from its great weight, it being the heaviest of the earths. Spec. grav. about 4. Recent discoveries have shown that baryte is an oxyd, the basis of which is a metallic substance called barium. It is generally found in combination with the sulphuric and carbonic acids, forming the sulphate and carbonate of baryte, the former of which is called heavy spar. Cleaveland. Thomson.

BARYTIC, a. Pertaining to baryte; formed of baryte, or containing it. Kirwan.

BARYTO-CALCITE, n. [baryte and calc. See Calc.]

A mixture of carbonate of lime with sulphate of baryte, of a dark or light gray color, of various forms. Kirwan.

BARYTONE, a. [Gr. basus, heavy, and tonos, tone.]

Pertaining to or noting a grave deep sound, or male voice. Walker. Arbuthnot.

BARYTONE, n. In music, a male voice, the compass of which partakes of the common base and the tenor, but which does not descend so low as the one, nor rise as high as the other.

2. In Greek Grammar, a verb which has no accent marked on the last syllable, the grave accent being understood.

BASAL, a. Pertaining to the base; constituting the base. Say.

BASALT, n. basalt. [Pliny informs us that the Egyptians found in Ethiopia, a species of marble, called basaltis, of an iron color and hardness, whence it received its name. Nat. Hist. Lib. 36. Ca. 7. But according to Da Costa, that stone was not the same which now bears the name of basalt. Hist. of Fossils. p. 263. If named from its color, it may be allied to the Fr. basané, tawny. Lünier refers it to the Ethiopic basalt, iron, a word I cannot find.]

BAS

A dark, grayish black mineral or stone, sometimes bluish or brownish black, and when withered, the surface is grayish or reddish brown. It is amorphous, columnar, tabular or globular. The columnar form is straight or curved, perpendicular or inclined, sometimes nearly horizontal; the diameter of the columns from three inches to three feet, sometimes with transverse semi-spherical joints, in which the convex part of one is inserted in the concavity of another. The forms of the columns generally are pentagonal, hexagonal, or octagonal. It is sometimes found also in rounded masses, either spherical, or compressed and lenticular. These rounded masses are sometimes composed of concentric layers, with a nucleus, and sometimes of prisms radiating from a center. It is heavy and hard. The pillars of the Giant's causey in Ireland, composed of this stone and exposed to the roughest sea for ages, have their angles as perfect as those at a distance from the waves. The English miners call it cockle; the German, short, or shert. It is called by Kirwan, Figurate Trap, from its prismatic forms. Kirwan. Jameson. Cleaveland.

BASALTIC, a. Pertaining to basalt; formed of or containing basalt.

BASALTIFORM, a. In the form of basalt; columnar.

BASALTINE, n. Basaltic Hornblend; a variety of common hornblend, so called from its being often found in Basalt. It is also found in lavas and volcanic scoriae. It is generally in distinct crystals, and its color is a pure black, or slightly tinged with green. It is more foliated than the other varieties, and has been mistaken for mica. Kirwan. Cleaveland.

2. A column of basalt. Kirwan.

BASANITE, n. s as z. [Gr. basanos, the trier. Plin. Lib. 36. Ca. 22. See Basalt.]

Lydian stone, or black jasper; a variety of siliceous or flinty slate. Its color is a grayish or bluish black, interspersed with veins of quartz. It is employed to test the purity of gold. Kirwan. Ure. Cleaveland.

BASE, a. [Fr. bas, low; W. bas; It. basso; Sp. bazo, low; W. basu, to fall, or lower. See Abase.]

1. Low in place. Obs. Spenser.

2. Mean; vile; worthless; that is, low in value or estimation; used of things.

3. Of low station; of mean account; without rank, dignity or estimation among men; used of persons.

The base shall behave proudly against the honorable. Is. iii.

4. Of mean spirit; disingenuous; illiberal; low; without dignity of sentiment; as a base and abject multitude.

5. Of little comparative value; applied to metals, and perhaps to all metals, except gold and silver.

6. Deep; grave; applied to sounds; as the base sounds of a viol. Bacon.

7. Of illegitimate birth; born out of wedlock. Shak.

8. Not held by honorable tenure. A base estate is an estate held by services not honorable, not in capite, or by villenage.

Such a tenure is called base, or low, and the tenant, a base tenant. So writers on the laws of England use the terms, a base fee, a base court. Encyc.

BASE, n. [Gr. basis; L. basis; It. basa, base; Sp. basa; Fr. base; that which is set, the foundation or bottom.]

1. The bottom of any thing, considered as its support or the part of a thing on which it stands or rests; as the base of a column, the pedestal of a statue, the foundation of a house, &c.

In architecture, the base of a pillar properly is that part which is between the top of a pedestal and the bottom of the shaft; but when there is no pedestal, it is the part between the bottom of the column and the plinth. Usually it consists of certain spires or circles. The pedestal also has its base. Encyc.

2. In fortification, the exterior side of the polygon, or that imaginary line which is drawn from the flanked angle of a bastion to the angle opposite to it.

3. In gunnery, the least sort of ordnance, the diameter of whose bore is 1 1-4 inch. Encyc.

4. The part of any ornament which hangs down, as housings. Sidney.

5. The broad part of any thing, as the bottom of a cone.

6. In old authors, stockings; armor for the legs. Hudibras.

7. The place from which racers or tilers start; the bottom of the field; the career or starting post. Dryden.

9. The lowest or gravest part in music; improperly written bass.

10. A rustic play, called also bays, or prison bars. Shak.

11. In geometry, the lowest side of the perimeter of a figure. Any side of a triangle may be called its base, but this term most properly belongs to the side which is parallel to the horizon. In rectangled triangles, the base, properly, is the side opposite to the right angle. The base of a solid figure is that on which it stands. The base of a conic section is a right line in the hyperbola and parabola, arising from the common intersection of the secant plane and the base of the cone. Encyc.

12. In chemistry, any body which is dissolved by another body, which it receives and fixes. Thus any alkaline, earthy or metallic substance, combining with an acid, forms a compound or neutral salt, of which it is the base. Such salts are called salts with alkaline, earthy or metallic bases. Encyc.

13. Thorough base, in music, is the part performed with base viols or theorbos, while the voices sing and other instruments perform their parts, or during the intervals when the other parts stop. It is distinguished by figures over the notes.

Counter base is a second or double base, when there are several in the same concert. Encyc.

BASE, v. t. To embase; to reduce the value by the admixture of meaner metals. [Lit. used.] Bacon.

2. To found; to lay the base or foundation. To base and build the commonwealth of man. Columbiad.

BA'SE-BORN, a. [base and born.] Born out of wedlock. Gay.

2. Born of low parentage. Milton.

BA'SENET, n. A helmet. Spenser.

BA'SE-STRING, n. The lowest note. Shak.

BA'SE-VIOL, n. [See Viol.] A musical instrument, used for playing the base or gravest part.

BASH, v. t. [Heb. בש, bosh, to be cast down, or confounded. Qu. D. verbaazen, to confound. See Abash.] To be ashamed; to be confounded with shame. Spenser.

BASHAW, n. [Ar. باشا, basha; Pers. pasha; Sp. baza; It. bascia; Turk. basch, the head. Qu. D. baas, master, and the bassus of the Alemanni and Longobards, in the middle ages. This word is often written most absurdly pasha, both by the English and Americans. It should be written and pronounced pashaw.]

1. A title of honor in the Turkish dominions; appropriately, the title of the prime vicer, but given to viceroys or governors of provinces, and to generals and other men of distinction. The Turkish bashaws exercise an oppressive authority in their provinces. Hence,

2. A proud, tyrannical, overbearing man.

BASH'FUL, a. [See Bash and Abash.]

1. Properly, having a downcast look; hence very modest.

2. Modest to excess; sheepish. Shak.

3. Exciting shame.

BASH'FULLY, adv. Very modestly; in a timorous manner.

BASH'FULNESS, n. Excessive or extreme modesty; a quality of mind often visible in external appearance, as in blushing, a downcast look, confusion, &c.

2. Vicious or rustic shame. Sidney.

BASH'LESS, a. Shameless; unblushing. Spenser.

BAS'IL, n. s as z. The slope or angle of a tool or instrument, as of a chisel or plane; usually of 12 degrees, but for hard wood, 18 degrees. Encyc.

BAS'IL, v. t. To grind or form the edge of a tool to an angle. Moxon.

BAS'IL, n. s as z. [Fr. basilic; It. basilico.]

1. A plant of the genus Ocimum, of which there are many species, all natives of warm climates. They are fragrant aromatic plants, and one species, the sweet basil, is much used in cookery, especially in France.

BAS'IL, n. [Orient. باس to strip.] The skin of a sheep tanned; written also basan.

BAS'IL-WEED, n. Wild basil, a plant of the genus Clinopodium. Muhlenburg.

BAS'ILAR, a. s as z. [See Basilic.]

BAS'ILARY, a. s as z. Chief; an anatomical term applied to several bones, and to an artery of the brain. Cozz.

Basilian monks, monks of the order of St. Basil, who founded the order in Pontus. The order still exists, but has less power and celebrity than formerly. Encyc.

BAS'ILIC, n. s as z. [Gr. βασίλειον; L. basilica; Gr. βασίλειον, a king.]

Anciently, a public hall or court of judicature, where princes and magistrates sat to administer justice. It was a large hall, with aisles, porticoes, tribunals, and tribunals. The bankers also had a part allotted for their residence. These edifices, at first, were the palaces of princes, afterwards courts of justice, and finally converted into churches. Hence basilic now signifies a church, chapel, cathedral or royal palace. Encyc. Sp. and It. Dict.

BAS'ILIC, n. [See Basil.] The middle vein of the arm, or the interior branch of the axillary vein, so called by way of eminence. Encyc. Quincy.

BAS'ILIC, a. Belonging to the middle

BAS'ILICAL, a. vein of the arm.

2. Noting a particular nut, the walnut, basilica nux.

BAS'ILICON, n. s as z. [Gr. βασίλειον, royal.]

An ointment. This name is given to several compositions in ancient medical writers. At present it is confined to three official ointments, distinguished into black, yellow and green basilicon. Encyc.

BAS'ILISK, n. s as z. [Gr. βασίλισκος; L. basiliscus.]

1. A fabulous serpent, called a cockatrice, and said to be produced from a cock's egg brooded by a serpent. The ancients alleged that its hissing would drive away all other serpents, and that its breath and even its look was fatal. Some writers suppose that a real serpent exists under this name.

2. In military affairs, a large piece of ordnance, so called from its supposed resemblance to the serpent of that name, or from its size. This cannon carried a ball of 200 pounds weight, but is not now used. Modern writers give this name to cannon of a smaller size, which the Dutch make 15 feet long, and the French 10, carrying a 48 pound ball. Encyc.

BA'SIN, n. basin. [Fr. basin; It. basin; Arm. basin; It. bacino, or bacile; Port.

bacia. If the last radical is primarily a palatal letter, this is the German becken; D. becken.]

1. A hollow vessel or dish, to hold water for washing, and for various other uses.
2. In hydraulics, any reservoir of water.
3. That which resembles a basin in containing water, as a pond, a dock for ships, a hollow place for liquids, or an inclosed part of water, forming a broad space within a strait or narrow entrance; a little bay.

4. Among glass grinders, a concave piece of metal by which convex glasses are formed.

5. Among hatters, a large shell or case, usually of iron, placed over a furnace, in which the hat is molded into due shape.

6. In anatomy, a round cavity between the anterior ventricles of the brain.

7. The scale of a balance, when hollow and round.

8. In Jewish antiquities, the laver of the tabernacle.

BASIS, n. plu. bases. [L. and Gr.; the same as base, which see.]

1. The foundation of any thing; that on which a thing stands or lies; the bottom or foot of the thing itself, or that on which it rests. See a full explanation under base.
2. The ground work or first principle; that which supports.

3. Foundation; support.

The basis of public credit is good faith.

Hamilton.

The basis of all excellence is truth.

Johnson.

4. Basis, in chemistry. See Base. No. 12.

B'ASK, v. t. [The origin of this word is not obvious. Qu. Ir. basgain, to rest or repose.]

To lie in warmth; to be exposed to genial heat; to be at ease and thriving under benign influences; as, to bask in the blaze of day; to bask in the sunshine of royal favor. The word includes the idea of some continuance of exposure.

B'ASK, v. t. To warm by continued exposure to heat; to warm with genial heat.

Dryden.

B'ASKED, pp. Exposed to warmth, or genial heat.

B'ASKET, n. [W. basged, or basgaed; Ir. bascaid; probably from weaving or texture; W. basg, a netting or plaiting of splinters.]

1. A domestic vessel made of twigs, rushes, splinters or other flexible things interwoven. The forms and sizes of baskets are very various, as well as the uses to which they are applied; as corn-baskets, clothes-baskets, fruit-baskets, and work-baskets.
2. The contents of a basket; as much as a basket will contain; as, a basket of medals is two bushels. But in general, this quantity is indefinite.

In military affairs, baskets of earth sometimes are used on the parapet of a trench, between which the soldiers fire. They serve for defense against small shot.

Encyc.

B'ASKET, v. t. To put in a basket.

Cowper.

B'ASKET-FISH, n. A species of sea-star, or star-fish, of the genus Asterias, and otherwise called the Magellanic star-fish.

It has five rays issuing from an angular body, and dividing into innumerable branches. These when extended form a circle of three feet diameter. [See Asterias.] Encyc.

B'ASKET-HILT, n. [See Hilt.] A hilt which covers the hand, and defends it from injury, as of a sword. Hudibras.

B'ASKET-HILTED, a. Having a hilt of basket-work. Warton.

B'ASKET-SALT, n. Salt made from salt-springs, which is purer, whiter and finer, than common brine salt. Encyc.

B'ASKET-WOMAN, n. A woman who carries a basket, to and from market.

B'ASKING, ppr. Exposing or lying exposed to the continued action of heat or genial warmth.

B'ASKING-SHARK, n. The sun-fish of the Irish; a species of squalus or shark. This fish is from three to twelve yards in length, or even longer. The upper jaw is much longer than the lower one; the tail is large and the upper part much longer than the lower; the skin is rough, of a deep leaden color on the back, and white on the belly. The fish weighs more than a thousand pounds, and affords a great quantity of oil, which is used for lamps, and to cure bruises, burns, and rheumatic complaints. It is viviparous, and frequents the northern seas. [See Squalus.] Pennant. Encyc.

B'ASQUISH, a. baskish. Pertaining to the people or language of Biscay. Brown.

B'ASS, n. [It has no plural.] The name of several species of fish. In England, this name is given to a species of perch, called by some the sea-wolf, from its voracity, and resembling, in a degree, the trout in shape, but having a larger head. It weighs about fifteen pounds. In the northern states of America, this name is given to a striped fish which grows to the weight of 25 or 30 pounds, and which enters the rivers; the perca ocellata.

A species of striped fish, of a darker color, with a large head, is called sea-bass, as it is never found in fresh water. This fish grows to two or three pounds weight. Both species are well tasted, but the proper bass is a very white and delicious food.

Prince. Belknap.

B'ASS, n. The linden, lime or tiel tree; called also bass-wood. [See Bast.]

2. [pron. bas.] A mat to kneel on in churches.

BASS, n. In music, the base; the deepest or gravest part of a tune. This word is thus written in imitation of the Italian basso, which is the Eng. base, low; yet with the pronunciation of base and plural bases, a gross error that ought to be corrected; as the word used in pronunciation is the English word base.

BASS, v. t. To sound in a deep tone.

Shak.

BASS-RELIEF, n. In English, base-relief. [From It. basso, low, and rilevare, to raise; whence rilievo, raised work. See Left and Relief.]

Sculpture, whose figures do not stand out far from the ground or plane on which they are formed. When figures do not protrude so as to exhibit the entire body, they are said to be done in relief; and when they are low, flat or little raised from the plane, the work is said to be in low relief. When the figures are so raised as to be well distinguished, they are said to be bold, strong, or high, alto rilievo. [See Relief.] Encyc.

BASS-VIOL, n. [See Base-viol.]

BAS/SA. [See Bashaw.]

BAS/SET, n. [Fr. bassette.] A game at cards, said to have been invented at Venice, by a nobleman, who was banished for the invention. The game being introduced into France by the Venetian ambassador, Justiniani, in 1674, it was prohibited by severe edicts. Encyc.

BAS/SET, v. t. [See Basil.] Among coal diggers, to incline upwards. Thus a vein of coal bassets, when it takes a direction towards the surface of the earth. This is called cropping, and is opposed to dipping. Encyc.

BAS/SETTING, ppr. Having a direction upwards.

BAS/SETTING, n. The upward direction of a vein in a coal mine.

BASSO-CONCERTANTE, in music, is the base of the little chorus, or that which plays throughout the whole piece. Bailey.

BASSO-CONTINUO, thorough base, which see under base. Bailey.

BASSO-REPIENO, is the base of the grand chorus, which plays only occasionally, or in particular parts. Bailey.

BASSO-RELIEVO. [See Bass-relief.]

BASSO-VIOLINO, is the base of the base-viol. Bailey.

BAS/SOCK, n. The same as bass, a mat.

BASSOON, n. [Fr. basson; It. bassone, from basso, low.]

A musical wind instrument, blown with a reed, and furnished with eleven holes, which are stopped, as in other large flutes. Its compass comprehends three octaves. Its diameter at bottom is nine inches, and for convenience of carriage it is divided into two parts; whence it is called also a fagot. It serves for the base in a concert of hautboys, flutes, &c.

Johnson. Encyc. Busby.

BASSOON/IST, n. A performer on the bassoon. Busby.

B'AST, n. [Qu. D. and Dan. bast, bark, or from twisting.]

A rope or cord, made of the bark of the lime tree, bass-wood or linden; or the bark made into ropes and mats. Ash. Bailey.

B'ASTARD, n. [Arm. bastard; Ir. basdard; Fr. batard; D. bastard; G. bastart; It. and Sp. bastardo; W. bastarz; basu, to fall, whence base, and tarz, growth, issue, a sprout.]

A natural child; a child begotten and born out of wedlock; an illegitimate or spurious child. By the civil and canon laws, a bastard becomes a legitimate child, by the intermarriage of the parents, at any future time. But by the laws of this country, as by those of England, a child, to be legitimate, must at least be born after the lawful marriage. Blackstone.

Bastard eigne', or bastard elder, in law, is when a man has a bastard son, and afterward marries the mother, and has a legitimate son, called mulier puise, or younger. Blackstone.

B'ASTARD, n. A kind of sweet wine. [Not in use.] Shak.

B'ASTARD, a. Begotten and born out of lawful matrimony; illegitimate.

2. Spurious; not genuine; false; supposititious; adulterate. In this sense, it is applied to things which resemble those which are genuine, but are really not genuine; as a bastard hope, bastard honors.

Shak. Temple.

In military affairs, bastard is applied to pieces of artillery which are of an unusual make or proportion, whether longer or shorter, as the double culverin extraordinary, half or quarter culverin extraordinary.

Encyc.

Bastard-Flower-fence, a plant, a species of Adenantha.

Bastard-hemp, a plant, a species of Datisca, false hemp.

Bastard-Rocket, dyers-weed, or wild woad, a species of Reseda.

Bastard-Star of Bethlehem, a plant, a species of Albica.

Bastard-Scarlet, a red color dyed with bale-madder.

B'ASTARD, v. t. To make or determine to be a bastard. Bacon.

B'ASTARDISM, n. The state of a bastard.

B'ASTARDIZE, v. t. To make or prove to be a bastard; to convict of being a bastard; to declare legally, or decide a person to be illegitimate.

The law is so indulgent as not to bastardize the child, if born, though not begotten, in lawful wedlock. Blackstone.

2. To beget a bastard. Shak.

B'ASTARDLY, adv. In the manner of a bastard; spuriiously. Donne.

B'ASTARDS, an appellation given to a faction or troop of bandits, who ravaged Guienne in France in the 14th century; supposed to have been headed by the illegitimate sons of noblemen, who were excluded from the rights of inheritance.

Mezeray.

B'ASTARDY, n. A state of being a bastard, or begotten and born out of lawful wedlock, which condition disables the person from inheriting an estate. Blackstone.

BASTARN'IC, a. Pertaining to the Bastarnæ, ancient inhabitants of the Carpathian mountains. D'Anville.

Bastarnic Alps, the Carpathian mountains, between Poland, Hungary and Transylvania; so called from the ancient inhabitants, the Bastarnæ. D'Anville.

1. To beat with a stick.

2. To drip butter or fat upon meat, as it turns upon the spit, in roasting; to moisten with fat or other liquid. Swift.

BASTE, v. t. [Sp. bastear; It. imbastire, to baste; It. bastia, a long stitch.]

To sew with long stitches; to sew slightly.

BASTED, pp. Beat with a stick; moistened with fat or other matter in roasting; sewed together with long stitches, or slightly.

BAS'TILE, n. [Fr., from bâtir, bastir, to build.]

An old castle in Paris, built between 1369 and 1383, used as a state prison, and converted to the purpose of confining men for life, who happened to incur the resentment or jealousy of the French monarchs.

It was demolished by the enraged populace in 1789.

BASTINA'DE, } [Fr. bastonnade; Sp. bastonada; It. bastonata, from bastone, a stick or staff. See Baste.]

A sound beating with a stick or cudgel; the blows given with a stick or staff. This name is given to a punishment in use among the Turks, of beating an offender on the soles of his feet.

BASTINA'DE, } v. t. To beat with a stick

BASTINA'DO, } or cudgel.

BASTING, ppr. Beating with a stick; moistening with dripping; sewing together with long stitches.

BASTING, n. A beating with a stick; a moistening with dripping; a sewing together slightly with long stitches.

BAS'TION, n. bas'chun. [Fr. and Sp. bastion; It. bastione; probably from bastir, bâtir, to build, to set or found.]

A huge mass of earth, usually faced with sods, sometimes with brick, or stones, standing out from a rampart, of which it is a principal part; formerly called a bulwark. Bastions are solid or hollow. A flat bastion is made in the middle of the curtain, when it is too long to be defended by the bastions in its extremes. A cut bastion has its point cut off and instead of it a re-entering angle, or an angle inwards, with two points outward. A composed bastion has two sides of the interior polygon unequal, which makes the gorges unequal. A demibastion is composed of one face only, with one flank and a demigorge. A double bastion is one raised on the plane of another. Encyc.

BAS'TO, n. The ace of clubs at quadrille.

BAS'TON, or BATOON', n. [Sp. See Baste.]

In architecture, a round molding in the base of a column; called also a torus. Encyc.

BAT, n. [Sax. bat; Ir. bat, bata; Russ. bat; allied to beat.]

1. A heavy stick or club; a piece of wood with one end thicker or broader than the other.

2. Bat or bate, a small copper coin of Germany, with a small mixture of silver, worth four cruzers. Also a coin of Switzerland, worth five livres. Encyc.

3. A term given by miners to shale or bituminous shale. Kirwan.

BAT, v. t. To manage a bat, or play with one. Mason.

BAT, n. [Rab. and Tal. בַּאֲטָה, or בַּאֲטָה, Buxtorf. I have not found this word in any European language, except in English.]

A race of quadrupeds, technically called Vespertilio, of the order primates, in Linne's system. The fore feet have the toes connected by a membrane, expanded into a kind of wings, by means of which the animals fly. The species are numerous. Of these, the vampire or Ternate bat inhabits Africa and the Oriental Isles. These animals fly in flocks from isle to isle, obscuring the sun by their numbers. Their wings when extended measure five or six feet. They live on fruits; but are said sometimes to draw blood from persons when asleep. The bats of the northern latitudes are small; they are viviparous and suckle their young. Their skin resembles that of a mouse. They enter houses in pleasant summer evenings, feed upon moths, flies, flesh, and oily substances, and are torpid during the winter.

Encyc.

BAT'-FOWLER, n. One who practices, or is pleased with bat-fowling. Barrington.

BAT'-FOWLING, n. A mode of catching birds at night, by holding a torch or other light, and beating the bush or perch where they roost. The birds flying to the light are caught with nets or otherwise.

Cowel. Encyc.

BA'TABLE, a. [See Bate and Debate.] Disputable. The land between England and Scotland, which, when the kingdoms were distinct, was a subject of contention, was called batable ground. Cowel. Encyc.

BATA'TAS, n. A species of tick or mite, found on the potatoes of Surinam. Also the Peruvian name of the sweet potato.

Encyc.

BATA'VIAN, a. [from Batavi, the people who inhabited the isle.]

Pertaining to the isle of Betaw in Holland, between the Rhine and the Waal. But more generally, the word denotes what appertains to Holland in general.

BATA'VIAN, n. A native of Betaw, or of the Low Countries.

BATCH, n. [D. bakzel; G. gebäck; from bake.]

1. The quantity of bread baked at one time; a baking of bread.

2. Any quantity of a thing made at once, or so united as to have like qualities. B. Jonson.

BATE, n. [Sax. bate, contention. It is probably from the root of beat. See Debate.]

Strife; contention; retained in make-bate.

BATE, v. t. [Fr. battre, to beat, to batter; but perhaps from abattre, to beat down. The literal sense is, to beat, strike, thrust; to force down. See Beat.]

To lessen by retrenching, deducting or reducing; as, to bate the wages of the laborer; to bate good cheer. Locke. Dryden.

[We now use abate.]

BATE, v. i. To grow or become less; to remit or retrench a part; with of.

Abate thy speed and I will bate of mine. Dryden.

Spenser uses bate in the sense of sinking, driving in, penetrating; a sense regularly deducible from that of beat, to thrust.

Yet there the steel staid not, but inly bate Deep in the flesh, and open'd wide a red flood gate.

BATEAU, n. batto'. [Fr. from L. batillum.]

A light boat, long in proportion to its breadth, and wider in the middle than at the ends.

B A T

BAT'ENITES, BAT'ENISTS, or BATE'NIANS, n. A sect of apostates from Mohammedism, who professed the abominable practices of the Ismaelians and Kirmatians. The word signifies esoteric, or persons of inward light. [See Assassins.]

BAT'FUL, a. [See Batten.] Rich, fertile, as land. [Not in use.] Mason.

BATH, n. [Sax. bath, batho, a bath; bathian, to bathe; W. badh, or baz; D. G. Sw. Dan. bad, a bath; Ir. bath, the sea; Old Phrygian bedu, water. Qu. W. bozi, to immerse.]

1. A place for bathing; a convenient vat or receptacle of water for persons to plunge or wash their bodies in. Baths are warm or tepid, hot or cold, more generally called warm and cold. They are also natural or artificial. Natural baths are those which consist of spring water, either hot or cold, which is often impregnated with iron, and called chalybeate, or with sulphur, carbonic acid, and other mineral qualities. These waters are often very efficacious in scorbutic, bilious, dyspeptic and other complaints.

2. A place in which heat is applied to a body immersed in some substance. Thus, A dry bath is made of hot sand, ashes, salt, or other matter, for the purpose of applying heat to a body immersed in them. A vapor bath is formed by filling an apartment with hot steam or vapor, in which the body sweats copiously, as in Russia; or the term is used for the application of hot steam to a diseased part of the body. Encyc. Tooke.

A metalline bath is water impregnated with iron or other metallic substance, and applied to a diseased part. Encyc. In chemistry, a wet bath is formed by hot water in which is placed a vessel containing the matter which requires a softer heat than the naked fire.

In medicine, the animal bath is made by wrapping the part affected in a warm skin just taken from an animal. Coze.

3. A house for bathing. In some eastern countries, baths are very magnificent edifices.

4. A Hebrew measure containing the tenth of a homer, or seven gallons and four pints, as a measure for liquids; and three pecks and three pints, as a dry measure. Calmet.

BATH-ROOM, n. An apartment for bathing. Tooke.

BATHE, v. t. [Sax. bathian, to wash. See Bath. Qu. W. bozi, to immerse.]

1. To wash the body, or some part of it, by immersion, as in a bath; it often differs from ordinary washing in a longer application of water, to the body or to a particular part, as for the purpose of cleansing or stimulating the skin.

2. To wash or moisten, for the purpose of making soft and supple, or for cleansing, as a wound.

3. To moisten or suffuse with a liquid; as, to bathe in tears or blood.

BATHE, v. i. To be or lie in a bath; to be in water, or in other liquid, or to be immersed in a fluid, as in a bath; as, to bathe in fiery floods. Shak.

BAT'HED, pp. Washed as in a bath; moistened with a liquid; bedewed.

B A T

BATHER, n. One who bathes; one who immerses himself in water, or who applies a liquid to himself or to another. Tooke.

BAT'HING, ppr. Washing by immersion, or by applying a liquid; moistening; fomenting.

BAT'HING, n. The act of bathing, or washing the body in water. Mason.

BAT'HING-TUB, n. A vessel for bathing, usually made either of wood or tin. In the Royal Library at Paris, I saw a bathing-tub of porphyry, of beautiful form and exquisite workmanship.

BATHOS, n. [Gr. βαθος; allied to Eng. bottom, and perhaps to W. bozi, to immerse.]

The art of sinking in poetry. Arbuthnot.

BAT'ING, ppr. [from bate.] Abating; taking away; deducting; excepting.

Children have few ideas, bating some faint ideas of hunger and thirst. Locke.

BAT'INIST. [See Batenites.]

BAT'IST, n. A fine linen cloth made in Flanders and Picardy, of three different kinds or thicknesses. Encyc.

BAT'LET, n. [from bat.] A small bat, or square piece of wood with a handle, for beating linen when taken out of the buck. Johnson.

BAT'MAN, n. A weight used in Smyrna, of six oke, each of 400 drams; equal to 16 lbs. 6 oz. 15 dr. English.

BATOON or BAT'ON, n. [Fr. bâton from baston. See Baste.]

A staff or club; a marshal's staff; a truncheon; a badge of military honors. Johnson.

BAT'RACHITE, n. [Gr. βατραχος, a frog.] A fossil or stone in color resembling a frog. Ash.

BAT'RACHOMYOM'ACHY, n. [Gr. βατραχος, a frog, μυς, a mouse, and μαχη, a battle.]

The battle between the frogs and mice; a burlesque poem ascribed to Homer.

BATRA'CIAN, a. [Gr. βατραχος, a frog.] Pertaining to frogs; an epithet designating an order of animals, including frogs, toads and similar animals. Barnes.

BATRA'CIAN, n. An animal of the order above mentioned.

BAT'TABLE, a. Capable of cultivation. [Not in use.] Burton.

BAT'TAILANT, n. [See Battle.] A combatant. [Not used.] Shelton.

BAT'TAILOUS, a. [See Battle.] Warlike; having the form or appearance of an army arrayed for battle; marshaled, as for an attack. Milton. Fairfax.

BATTAL'IA, n. [Sp. batalla; It. battaglia, battle. See Battle.]

1. The order of battle; troops arrayed in their proper brigades, regiments, battalions, &c., as for action.

2. The main body of an army in array, distinguished from the wings. Johnson.

BATTAL'ION, n. [Fr. bataillon. See Battle.]

A body of infantry, consisting of from 500 to 800 men; so called from being originally a body of men arrayed for battle. A battalion is generally a body of troops next below a regiment. Sometimes a battalion composes a regiment; more generally a regiment consists of two or more battalions. Johnson. Encyc.

B A T

Shakspeare uses the word for an army. BATTAL'IONED, a. Formed into battalions. Barlow.

BAT'TEL, n. [See Battle.]

In law, wager of battle, a species of trial for the decision of causes between parties. This species of trial is of high antiquity, among the rude military people of Europe. It was introduced into England, by William, the Norman Conqueror, and used in three cases only; in the court martial, or court of chivalry or honor; in appeals of felony; and in issues joined upon a writ of right. The contest was had before the judges, on a piece of ground inclosed, and the combatants were bound to fight till the stars appeared, unless the death of one party or victory sooner decided the contest. It is no longer in use. Blackstone.

BAT'TEL, v. i. To grow fat. [Not in use.] [See batten.]

2. To stand indebted in the college books at Oxford, for provisions and drink, from the buttery. Hence a batteler answers to a sixer at Cambridge.

BAT'TEL, n. An account of the expenses of a student at Oxford.

BAT'TEL, a. [See Batten.] Fertile; fruitful. [Not used.] Hooker.

BAT'TELER, n. A student at Oxford.

BAT'TLEMENT, n. [Fr.] A beating; striking; impulse. [Not in use.] Darwin. Zoon.

BAT'TEN, v. t. bat'n. [Russ. botiayn. Qu. Ar. بَدَن badana, to be fat; or بَدَن faddana, to fatten. See Fat.]

1. To fatten; to make fat; to make plump by plenteous feeding. Milton.
2. To fertilize or enrich land. Philips.

BAT'TEN, v. i. To grow or become fat; to live in luxury, or to grow fat in ease and luxury. Dryden.
The pampered monarch battening in ease. Garth.

BAT'TEN, n. A piece of board or scantling, of a few inches in breadth, used in making doors and windows. It is not as broad as a pannel. Encyc.

BAT'TEN, v. t. To form with battens.

BAT'TER, v. t. [Fr. battre; Sp. batir; It. battere; L. batuo, to beat. See Beat.]

1. To beat with successive blows; to beat with violence, so as to bruise, shake, or demolish; as, to batter a wall.

2. To wear or impair with beating; as a battered pavement; a battered jade. Dryden. Pope.

3. To attack with a battering ram.

4. To attack with heavy artillery, for the purpose of making a breach in a wall or rampart.

BAT'TER, v. i. To swell, bulge or stand out, as a timber or side of a wall from its foundation. Moxon.

BAT'TER, n. [from beat or batter.]

A mixture of several ingredients, as flour, eggs, salt, &c., beaten together with some liquor, used in cookery. King.

BAT'TERED, pp. Beaten; bruised, broken, impaired by beating or wearing.

BAT'TERER, n. One who batters or beats.

BAT'TERING, ppr. Beating; dashing against; bruising or demolishing by beating.

BAT

BATTERING-RAM, n. In antiquity, a military engine used to beat down the walls of besieged places. It was a large beam, with a head of iron somewhat resembling the head of a ram, whence its name. It was suspended by ropes in the middle to a beam which was supported by posts, and balanced so as to swing backwards and forwards, and was impelled by men against the wall. It was sometimes mounted on wheels.

BATTERY, n. [Fr. batterie; Sp. bateria; It. batteria. See Beat.]

1. The act of battering, or beating.
2. The instrument of battering.
3. In the military art, a parapet thrown up to cover the gunners and others employed about them, from the enemy's shot, with the guns employed. Thus, to erect a battery, is to form the parapet and mount the guns. The term is applied also to a number of guns ranged in order for battering, and to mortars used for a like purpose. Cross batteries are two batteries which play athwart each other, forming an angle upon the object battered.

Battery d'enfilade, is one which scours or sweeps the whole line or length.

Battery en echarpe, is that which plays obliquely.

Battery de revers, is that which plays upon the enemy's back.

Camerade battery, is when several guns play at the same time upon one place.

Encyc.

1. In law, the unlawful beating of another. The least violence or the touching of another in anger is a battery. Blackstone.
5. In electrical apparatus and experiments, a number of coated jars placed in such a manner, that they may be charged at the same time, and discharged in the same manner. This is called an electrical battery.
6. Galvanic battery, a pile or series of plates of copper and zinc, or of any substances susceptible of galvanic action.

BAT'TING, n. The management of a bat play. Mason.

BAT'TISH, a. [from bat, an animal.] Resembling a bat; as a battish humor. Vernon.

BAT'TLE, n. [Fr. bataille; W. batel, a drawing of the bow, a battle; Sp. batala; It. battaglia, from beating. See Beat.] Owen supposes the Welsh batel, to be from tel, tight, stretched, compact, and the word primarily to have expressed the drawing of the bow. This is probably an error. The first battles of men were with clubs, or some weapons used in beating, striking. Hence the club of Hercules. And although the moderns use different weapons, still a battle is some mode of beating or striking.]

1. A fight, or encounter between enemies, or opposing armies; an engagement. It is usually applied to armies or large bodies of men; but in popular language, the word is applied to an encounter between small bodies, between individuals, or inferior animals. It is also more generally applied to the encounters of land forces than of ships; the encounters of the latter being called engagements. But battle is applicable to any combat of enemies.

BAU

2. A body of forces, or division of an army. Becon.

The main body, as distinct from the van and rear. Obs. Hayward.

To give battle, is to attack an enemy; to join battle, is properly to meet the attack; but perhaps this distinction is not always observed.

A pitched battle is one in which the armies are previously drawn up in form, with a regular disposition of the forces.

To turn the battle to the gate, is to fight valiantly, and drive the enemy, who hath entered the city, back to the gate. Is. xxviii.

BAT'TLE, v. i. [Fr. batailler; Sp. batallar.] To join in battle; to contend in fight; sometimes with it; as, to battle it. Addison.

BAT'TLE, v. t. To cover with armed force. Fairfax.

BATTLE-ARRA'Y, n. [battle and array.] Array or order of battle; the disposition of forces preparatory to a battle.

BAT'TLE-AX, n. An ax anciently used as a weapon of war.

BAT'TLE-AXE, n. It has been used till of late years by the highlanders in Scotland; and is still used by the city guards in Edinburg, in quelling mobs, &c. Encyc.

BAT'TLE-DOOR, n. bat'tl-dore. An instrument of play, with a handle and a flat board or palm, used to strike a ball or shuttle-cock; a racket. Locke.

2. A child's horn book. [Not in use in U. S.]

BAT'TLEMENT, n. [This is said to have been bastillement, from bastille, a fortification, from Fr. batir, bastir, to build. Qu.] A wall raised on a building with openings or embrasures, or the embrasure itself. Encyc.

BAT'TLEMENTED, a. Secured by battlements. Herbert.

BAT'TLING, n. Conflict. Thomson.

BATTOL'OGIST, n. [See Battology.] One that repeats the same thing in speaking or writing. [Little used.] Whitlock.

BATTOL'OGIZE, v. t. To repeat needlessly the same thing. [Little used.] Herbert.

BATTOL'OGY, n. [Gr. βαττολογία, from βαττος, a garrulous person, and λογος, discourse.] A needless repetition of words in speaking. Ash. Encyc.

BAT'TON, n. [from bat.] In commerce, pieces of wood or deal for flooring, or other purposes. Encyc.

BAT'TORY, n. Among the Hans-Towns, a factory or magazine which the merchants have in foreign countries. Encyc.

BAT'TULATE, v. t. To interdict commerce. [A word used by the Levant company.] Eton.

BATTULA'TION, n. A prohibition of commerce. Eton.

BAT'TY, a. [from bat, an animal.] Belonging to a bat. Shak.

BATZ, n. A small copper coin with a mixture of silver, current in some parts of Germany and Switzerland. Encyc.

BAUBEE, n. [Qu. Fr. bas-billon.] In Scotland and the North of England, a half penny. Johnson.

BAV'IN, n. A stick like those bound up in faggots; a piece of waste wood. In war, brush, faggots. Johnson. Encyc.

BAW'BLE, n. [Fr. babiole, a toy, or baby-thing; according to Spelman, baubella are gems or jewels.]

A trifling piece of finery; a gew-gaw; that which is gay or showy without real value. Dryden.

BAWBL'ING, a. Trifling; contemptible. Shak.

BAW'-COCK, n. A fine fellow. [Qu. beau-cock.] Shak.

BAWD, n. [I know not the origin of this word; but in French, baudir is a term in hunting, signifying to excite or encourage dogs to the chase; formed, according to Lunier, from the Low Latin, baldire, or exbaldire, to enliven, to quicken; which, from the Italian, baldo, balanza, appears to be from the root of Eng. bold, the primary sense of which is, to project, to push or rush forward. In W. puad is what tends to allure. But one author quotes Hesychius, as giving Gr. βοδός, a procurer or procuress.]

A procurer or procuress. A person who keeps a house of prostitution, and conducts criminal intrigues. [Usually applied to females.]

BAWD, v. i. To procure; to provide women for lewd purposes.

2. To foul or dirty. [Not in use.] Skellton.

BAWD'-BORN, a. Descended from a bawd. Shak.

BAWD'ILY, adv. Obscenely; lewdly.

BAWD'INESS, n. Obscenity; lewdness.

BAWD'RICK, n. [See Baldrick.] A belt. Chapman.

BAWD'RY, n. [See Bawd.] The abominable practice of procuring women for the gratification of lust.

2. Obscenity; filthy, unchaste language.

BAWD'Y, a. Obscene; filthy; unchaste; applied to language.

BAWD'Y-HOUSE, a. A house of lewdness and prostitution.

BAWL, v. i. [Sax. bellan; Sw. bola, to low or bellow; W. ballaw; G. bellen, to bark; D. balderen, to roar; L. balo, to bleat; Fr. piailer, to bawl, to pule; Heb. בָּלַל, the blast of a trumpet; Per. bala, a cry or clamor; and Ar. and Heb. בָּלַל, to weep, to wail. These all coincide in elements with L. pello, appello, Eng. peal, and the primary sense is the same.]

1. To cry out with a loud full sound; to hoot; to cry with vehemence, as in calling, or in pain or exultation.

2. To cry loud, as a child from pain or vexation.

BAWL, v. t. To proclaim by outcry, as a common crier. Swift.

BAW'SIN, n. A badger. B. Jonson.

B A Y

BAXTERIAN, a. Pertaining to Baxter, a celebrated English divine; as the Baxterian scheme. Encyc.

BAY, a. [Fr. baie or baie; It. baio; Sp. bayo; L. baduus. Class Bd.]

Red, or reddish, inclining to a chestnut color; applied to the color of horses. The shades of this color are called light bay, dark bay, dappled bay, gilded bay, chestnut bay. In popular language, in England, all bay horses are called brown. Johnson. Encyc.

BAY, n. [Fr. baie; Sp. Port. bahia; It. baia; D. baai; contracted from the root of Sax. byge, an angle, bygan, D. boogen, to bend, whence bow.]

1. An arm of the sea, extending into the land, not of any definite form, but smaller than a gulf, and larger than a creek. The name however is not used with much precision, and is often applied to large tracts of water, around which the land forms a curve, as Hudson's Bay. Nor is the name restricted to tracts of water with a narrow entrance, but used for any recess or inlet between capes or head lands, as the bay of Biscay.

2. A pond-head, or a pond formed by a dam, for the purpose of driving mill-wheels. [I believe not used in U. S.]

3. In a barn, a place between the floor and the end of the building, or a low inclosed place, for depositing hay.

In England, says Johnson, if a barn consists of a floor and two heads, where they lay corn, they call it a barn of two bays. These bays are from 14 to 20 feet long, and floors from 10 to 12 feet broad, and usually 20 feet long, which is the breadth of the barn. Builder's Dict.

4. In ships of war, that part on each side between decks which lies between the bits. Mar. Dict.

5. Any kind of opening in walls. Chambers.

BAY, n. [Qu. Gr. baion, a branch of the palm tree. In Sp. bayia is a berry, the fruit of the laurel.]

1. The laurel tree. Hence,
2. Bays, in the plural, an honorary garland or crown, bestowed as a prize for victory or excellence, anciently made or consisting of branches of the laurel.

The patriot's honors, and the poet's bays. Trumbull.

3. In some parts of the U. States, a tract of land covered with bay trees. Drayton, S. Carolina.

BAY, n. [Goth. beidan, to expect; It. bada; "tenere a bada," to keep at bay; "star a bada," to stand trifling; badare, to stand trifling, to amuse one's self, to take care, to watch, to covet; abbadare, to mind; Fr. bayer, to gape or stand gaping. Qu. abayer.]

A state of expectation, watching or looking for; as, to keep a man at bay. So a stag at bay is when he turns his head against the dogs. Whence abeyance, in law, or a state of expectancy.

BAY, v. i. [Fr. abayer; It. baiare, to bark.]

1. To bark, as a dog at his game. Spenser.

2. To encompass, or inclose, from bay. We now use embay. Shak.

BAY, v. t. To bark at; to follow with barking. Shak.

B E

BAY-SALT, is salt which crystalizes or receives its consistence from the heat of the sun or action of the air. It forms in pits or basins, and from this circumstance receives its denomination. It appears first in a slight incrustation upon the surface of the water, which may be sea water, or any other water in which salt is dissolved. This crust thickens and hardens, till the crystalization is perfected, which takes place, in eight, ten or fifteen days. Encyc. Chambers.

BAY-WINDOW, n. A window jutting out from the wall, as in shops.

BAY-YARN, n. A denomination sometimes used promiscuously with woolen yarn. Chambers.

BA'YARD, n. [bay and ard, kind.]

1. A bay horse. Philips.

2. An unmannerly beholder. B. Jonson.

BA'YARDLY, a. Blind; stupid. Taylor.

BA'YED, a. Having bays, as a building.

BA'YONET, n. [Fr. baionette; Sp. bayoneta; It. baionetta; so called, it is said, because the first bayonets were made at Bayonne. Vieyra's Portuguese Dict.]

A short pointed instrument of iron or broad dagger, formerly with a handle fitted to the bore of a gun, where it was inserted for use, after the soldier had fired; but now made with an iron handle and ring which go over the muzzle of the piece, so that the soldier fires with his bayonet fixed. Encyc.

BA'YONET, v. t. To stab with a bayonet.

2. To compel or drive by the bayonet. Burke.

BAYS, or BAYZE. [See Baize.]

BAZ'AR, n. [Pers. بازار bazar; Russ. bazari, a market.]

Among the Turks and Persians, an exchange, market-place, or place where goods are exposed to sale. Some bazars are open, others are covered with lofty ceilings or domes, pierced to give light. The bazar at Tauris will contain 30,000 men. Encyc.

BAZ'AT, } n. A long, fine spun cotton from BAZ'A, } n. Jerusalem, whence it is called Jerusalem cotton. Encyc.

BDEL'LIUM, n. dell'yum. [L.; Gr. βδέλλιον; Syr. Ch. Heb. כרלון. Bochart and Parkhurst translate it, pearl. Gen. ii. But it is doubtful whether the bdellium of the scriptures is that now used.]

A gummy resinous juice, produced by a tree in the East Indies, of which we have no satisfactory account. It is brought from the E. Indies and from Arabia, in pieces of different sizes and figures, externally of a dark reddish brown, internally, clear and not unlike to glue. To the taste, it is slightly bitterish and pungent; its odor is agreeable. In the mouth, it becomes soft and sticks to the teeth; on a red hot iron, it readily catches flame and burns with a crackling noise. It is used as a perfume and a medicine, being a weak deobstruent. Encyc.

BE, v. i. substantive; ppr. being; pp. been. [Sax. beon, to be. G. bin, bist; D. ben;

Indic. pres. tense. Qu. Pers. بودن bodan, to be, and W. bod, byzu, bydiaw.

B E A

The sense is to stand, remain or be fixed; hence to continue. This verb is defective, and its defects are supplied by verbs from other roots, am, is, was, were, which have no radical connection with be. The case is the same with the substantive verb in most languages.]

1. To be fixed; to exist; to have a real state or existence, for a longer or shorter time.

Let this mind be in you, which was in Christ Jesus. Phil. ii.

To be, contents his natural desire. Pope.

2. To be made to be; to become.

And they twain shall be one flesh. Math.

xix. Jer. xxxii.

3. To remain. Let the garment be as it was made.

4. To be present in a place. Where was I at the time? When will you be at my house?

5. To have a particular manner of being or happening; as, how is this affair? how was it? what were the circumstances?

This verb is used as an auxiliary in forming the tenses of other verbs, and particularly in giving to them the passive form; as, he has been disturbed. It forms, with the infinitive, a particular future tense, which often expresses duty, necessity or purpose; as, government is to be supported; we are to pay our just debts.

Let be is to omit, or leave untouched; to let alone.

Let be, said he, my prey. Dryden.

BE, a prefix, as in because, before, beset, bedeck, is the same word as by; Sax. be, big; Goth. bi. It is common to the English, Saxon, Gothic, German, Dutch, Danish and Swedish languages. It occurs probably in the Russian, but is written po, as it is in possideo and a few other words in the Latin. It denotes nearness, closeness, about, on, at, from some root signifying to pass or to press. [See By.]

That this word is the Shemitic ב, used as a prefix, is certain, not only from its general applications, which may be seen by comparing the uses of the word, in the Heb. for instance, with those in the Saxon; but from its use in particular phrases, particularly in its use before the name of the Supreme being in swearing. Hence we find that ב is not from בה nor from בית, as Parkhurst supposes, but is a contraction of big, which is used in the Saxon, big-spell, a proverb, a by-word; bigstandan, to stand by.

BEACH, n. [Qu. Russ. bok, coast.]

The shore of the sea, or of a lake, which is washed by the tide and waves; the strand. It may be sometimes used for the shore of large rivers.

BE'ACHED, a. Exposed to the waves; washed by the tide and waves. Shak.

BE'ACHY, a. Having a beach or beaches. Shak.

BE'ACON, n. beekn. [W. pigron, a beacon, cone, or turret, from pig, a point. See Pike. Sax. beacen, becen, a signal; D. baak, baaken; Ger. bake.]

1. A signal erected on a long pole, upon an eminence, consisting of a pitch barrel, or some combustible matter, to be fired at night, or to cause a smoke by day, to notify the approach of an enemy.

2. A light-house; a house erected on a point of land, or other place on the sea-coast, with lamps which burn at night, to direct navigators, and preserve vessels from running upon rocks, sand banks, or the shore. In general, a beacon may be any light or mark intended for direction and security against danger.

3. Figuratively, that which gives notice of danger.

BE/ACONAGE, n. Money paid for the maintenance of a beacon. Encyc. Ash.

BEAD, n. [Ger. bethe, a bead; supposed from beten, biddan, to pray, from the use of beads in Catholic countries; Sax. bead, a praying. In Spanish and Portuguese, the word answering to count is used for a bead.]

1. A little perforated ball, to be strung on a thread, and worn about the neck, for ornament. A string of beads is called a necklace. Beads are made of gold, pearl, amber, steel, garnet, coral, diamond, crystal, pastes, glasses, &c. The Romanists use strings of beads in rehearsing their prayers. Hence the phrase, to tell beads, and to be at one's beads, is to be at prayer. Encyc. Johnson.

2. Any small globular body; hence the glass globules, used in traffick with savages, and sold in strings, are called beads; also a bubble on spirit.

3. In architecture, a round molding, commonly made upon the edge of a piece of stuff, in the Corinthian and Roman orders, cut or carved in short embossments, like beads in necklaces. Encyc.

Bidding of beads, is a charge given by a priest to his parishioners, to repeat certain pater-nosters upon their beads for a departed soul. Bailey.

BE/AD-MAKER, n. One who makes beads. In French, paternostrier is one who makes, strings, and sells beads. In Paris are three companies of paternostriers; one that works in glass or crystal; one, in wood and horn; a third, in amber, coral, &c. Encyc.

BE/AD-PROOF, a. Spirit is bead-proof, when, after being shaken, a crown of bubbles will stand, for some time after, on the surface, manifesting a certain standard of strength. Encyc.

BE/AD-ROLL, n. Among Catholics, a list or catalogue of persons, for the rest of whose souls, they are to repeat a certain number of prayers, which they count by their beads. Encyc.

BE/AD-TREE, n. The azedarach, a species of Melia, a native of the Indies, growing about 20 feet high, adorned with large pinnated or winged leaves, and clusters of pentapetalous flowers. Encyc.

BE/ADS-MAN, n. A man employed in praying, generally in praying for another. Johnson.

BE/ADS-WOMAN, n. A praying woman; a woman who resides in an alms-house. Ash.

BE/ADLE, n. [Sax. bydel, or badel; Fr. bedeau; Sp. bedel; It. bidello; Ger. büttel, pedell; Sw. bodel, a beadle, or lictor; from the root of bid, Sax. beodan, to order or command. See Bid.]

1. A messenger or crier of a court; a servitor; one who cites persons to appear and answer; called also an apparitor or summoner. Encyc.

2. An officer in a university, whose chief business is to walk with a mace, before the masters, in a public procession; or as in America, before the president, trustees, faculty and students of a college, in a procession, at public commencements. Encyc.

3. A parish officer, whose business is to punish petty offenders. Johnson.

BE/ADLESHIP, n. The office of a beadle. Wood.

BE/AGLE, n. [Fr. bagle, so named from littleness; W. bac, little; Ir. pig; It. piccolo. We have from the same root boy, and the Danes pige, a little girl, and probably pug is the same word. Qu. Gr. πυγμαίος, a pygmy.]

A small hound, or hunting dog. Beagles are of different sorts; as the southern beagle, shorter and less, but thicker, than the deep-mouthed hound; the fleet northern, or cat beagle, smaller, and of a finer shape than the southern. From these species united, is bred a third, still preferable; and a smaller sort is little larger than the lap-dog. Encyc.

BEAK, n. [D. bek; W. pig; Ir. peac; Arm. bek; Fr. bec; Sp. pico; It. becco; Dan. pig, pik; Sw. pigg, pik; Sax. piic; Fr. pique; Eng. peak, pique, &c. The sense is, a shoot, or a point, from thrusting; and this word is connected with a numerous family. See Class Bg.]

1. The bill, or nib of a bird, consisting of a horny substance, either straight or curving, and ending in a point.

2. A pointed piece of wood, fortified with brass, resembling a beak, fastened to the end of ancient galleys; intended to pierce the vessels of an enemy. In modern ships, the beak-head is a name given to the forepart of a ship, whose fore-castle is square, or oblong; a circumstance common to all ships of war, which have two or more tiers of guns. Mar. Dict.

Beak or beak-head, that part of a ship, before the fore-castle, which is fastened to the stem, and supported by the main knee. Encyc.

3. In farriery, a little shoe, at the toe, about an inch long, turned up and fastened in upon the fore part of the hoof. Farrier's Dict.

4. Any thing ending in a point, like a beak. This in America is more generally pronounced peak.

BEAK, v. t. Among cock fighters, to take hold with the beak. Ash.

BE/AKED, a. Having a beak; ending in a point, like a beak.

BEAM, n. [Goth. bagms, a tree; Sax. beam; G. baum; D. boom, a tree; Dan. bom, a bar or rail; Ir. beim, a beam. We see by the Gothic, that the word belongs to Class

Bg. It properly signifies the stock or stem of a tree; that is, the fixed, firm part.]

1. The largest, or a principal piece in a building, that lies across the walls, and serves to support the principal rafters. Encyc.

2. Any large piece of timber, long in proportion to its thickness, and squared, or hewed for use.

3. The part of a balance, from the ends of which the scales are suspended; sometimes used for the whole apparatus for weighing. Encyc.

4. The part on the head of a stag, which bears the antlers, royals and tops.

5. The pole of a carriage, which runs between the horses. Dryden.

6. A cylinder of wood, making part of a loom, on which weavers wind the warp before weaving; and this name is given also to the cylinder on which the cloth is rolled, as it is wove.

7. The straight part or shank of an anchor.

8. In ships, a great main cross timber, which holds the sides of a ship from falling together. The beams support the decks and orlops. The main beam is next the mainmast. Mar. Dict.

9. The main piece of a plow, in which the plow-tails are fixed, and by which it is drawn.

10. Beam compass, an instrument consisting of a square wooden or brass beam, having sliding sockets, that carry steel or pencil points; used for describing large circles, and in large projections for drawing the furniture on wall-dials. Encyc. Johnson.

On the beam, in navigation, signifies any distance from the ship, on a line with the beams, or at right angles with the keel. Mar. Dict.

Before the beam, is an arch of the horizon between a line that crosses the ship at right angles, or the line of the beam, and that point of the compass which she steers. Mar. Dict.

Beam ends. A vessel is said to be on her beam ends, when she inclines so much on one side that her beams approach a vertical position. Mar. Dict.

Beam-feathers, in falconry, the long feathers of a hawk's wing. Bailey.

BEAR, v. t. pret. bore; pp. born, borne. [Sax. beran, beran, beoran, byran, gebaran, gebran, gebyran, aberan, aberan, to bear, carry, bring, sustain, produce, bring forth; gebyrian, gebyrgan, to pertain to, to belong to, to happen, to become, or be suitable; answering to the Latin fero, porto, pario and oporto. Hence, probably, Sax. barn, bearn, a son, coinciding with born. Goth. beiran, to bear, or carry; gabairan, to bear; G. führen, to carry, and gebären, to bring forth; D. beuren, to lift; voeren, to carry or bear; baeren, to bring forth; Sw. bära, to carry; bära fram, to bring forth; barn, a son; Dan. bærer, to carry, bear, produce; L. fero, pario, porto; Gr. φέρω, φορῶ; Sp. Port. parir, to bring forth; portar, to carry; It. portare, to carry; Ir. beairadh, beirim, to bear or bring forth, to tell or relate, whence Fr. parler; Russ. beru, to take, to carry; Sans. bharadi, to bear. This verb I suppose to be radically the same as the Shemitic בָּרַא to produce; L. pario. The primary sense is to throw out, to bring forth, or in general, to thrust or drive along. It includes the proper significations, both of L. fero and pario; Shemitic בָּרַא and בָּרַא. Hence, probably, Gr. ἄπορ, ἄπορ, and a great family of words. See Class Br. No. 15, 22, 33, 35.]

1. To support; to sustain; as, to bear a weight or burden.

2. To carry; to convey; to support and remove from place to place; as, "they bear him upon the shoulder;" "the eagle beareth them on her wings." Isaiah. Deuteronomy.

3. To wear; to bear as a mark of authority or distinction; as, to bear a sword, a badge, a name; to bear arms in a coat.

4. To keep afloat; as, the water bears a ship.

5. To support or sustain without sinking or yielding; to endure; as, a man can bear severe pain or calamity; or to sustain with proportionate strength, and without injury; as, a man may bear stronger food or drink.

6. To entertain; to carry in the mind; as, to bear a great love for a friend; to bear inveterate hatred to gaming.

7. To suffer; to undergo; as, to bear punishment.

8. To suffer without resentment, or interference to prevent; to have patience; as, to bear neglect or indignities.

9. To admit or be capable of; that is, to suffer or sustain without violence, injury, or change; as, to give words the most favorable interpretation they will bear.

10. To bring forth or produce, as the fruit of plants, or the young of animals; as, to bear apples; to bear children.

11. To give birth to, or be the native place of. Here dwelt the man divine whom Samos bore. Dryden.

12. To possess and use as power; to exercise; as, to bear sway.

13. To gain or win. Some think to bear it by speaking a great word. Bacon.

[Not now used. The phrase now used is, to bear away.]

14. To carry on, or maintain; to have; as, to bear a part in conversation.

15. To show or exhibit; to relate; as, to bear testimony or witness. This seems to imply utterance, like the Latin fero, to relate or utter.

16. To sustain the effect, or be answerable for; as, to bear the blame.

17. To sustain, as expense; to supply the means of paying; as, to bear the charges, that is, to pay the expenses.

18. To be the object of. Let me but bear your love, and I'll bear your cares. [Unusual.] Shak.

19. To behave; to act in any character; as, "hath he borne himself penitent?" [Not usual.] Shak.

20. To remove, or to endure the effects of; and hence to give satisfaction for.

He shall bear their iniquities. Is. liii. Heb. ix.

To bear the infirmities of the weak, to bear one another's burdens, is to be charitable towards their faults, to sympathize with them, and to aid them in distress. Brown.

To bear off, is to restrain; to keep from approach; and in seamanship, to remove to a distance; to keep clear from rubbing against any thing; as, to bear off a blow; to bear off a boat; also, to carry away; as, to bear off stolen goods.

To bear down, is to impel or urge; to overthrow or crush by force; as, to bear down an enemy.

To bear down upon, to press to overtake; to make all sail to come up with.

To bear hard, is to press or urge. Cesar doth bear me hard. Shak.

To bear on, is to press against; also to carry forward, to press, incite or animate. Confidence hath borne thee on. Milton.

To bear through, is to conduct or manage; as, "to bear through the consulship." B. Jonson. Also, to maintain or support to the end; as, religion will bear us through the evils of life.

To bear out, is to maintain and support to the end; to defend to the last. Company only can bear a man out in an ill thing. South.

To bear up, to support; to keep from falling. Religious hope bears up the mind under sufferings. Addison.

To bear up, to keep afloat.

To bear a body. A color is said to bear a body in painting, when it is capable of being ground so fine, and mixed so entirely with the oil, as to seem only a very thick oil of the same color. Johnson.

To bear date, is to have the mark of time when written or executed; as, a letter or bond bears date, Jan. 6, 1811.

To bear a price, is to have a certain price. In common mercantile language, it often signifies or implies, to bear a good or high price.

To bear in hand, to amuse with false pretences; to deceive. Bacon. South. Shak.

I believe this phrase is obsolete, or never used in America.

To bear a hand, in seamanship, is to make haste, be quick.

BEAR, v. i. To suffer, as with pain.

But man is born to bear. Pope.

This is unusual in prose; and though admissible, is rendered intransitive, merely by the omission of pain, or other word expressive of evil.

2. To be patient; to endure. I cannot, cannot bear. Dryden.

This also seems to be elliptical.

3. To produce, as fruit; to be fruitful, in opposition to barrenness.

This age to blossom, and the next to bear. Dryden.

Here fruit must be understood.

4. To take effect; to succeed; as, to bring matters to bear. Guardian.

5. To act in any character. Instruct me how I may bear like a true friar [Unusual.] Shak.

6. To be situated as to the point of compass, with respect to something else; as, the land bore E. N. E. from the ship.

7. To bear away, in navigation, is to change the course of a ship, when close hauled, or sailing with a side wind, and make her run before the wind. To bear up, is used in a like sense, from the act of bearing up the helm to the windward. Mar. Dict.

Hence, perhaps, in other cases, the expression may be used to denote tending or moving from.

8. To bear down, is to drive or tend to; to approach with a fair wind; as, the fleet bore down upon the enemy.

9. To bear in, is to run or tend towards; as, a ship bears in with the land; opposed to bear off, or keeping at a greater distance.

10. To bear up, is to tend or move towards; as, to bear up to one another: also, to be supported; to have fortitude; to be firm; not to sink; as, to bear up under afflictions.

11. To bear upon, or against, is to lean upon or against; to act on as weight or force, in any direction, as a column upon its base, or the sides of two inclining objects against each other.

12. To bear against, to approach for attack or seizure; as, "a lion bears against his prey." Dryden.

13. To bear upon, to act upon; as, the artillery bore upon the center: or to be pointed or situated so as to affect; as, to bring or plant guns so as to bear upon a fort, or a ship.

14. To bear with, to endure what is unpleasant; to be indulgent; to forbear to resent, oppose, or punish.
