PREFACE.

THE CABINET DICTIONARY is offered to the public as a compendious and handy exposition of the English language, adapted by numerous alterations and additions to present times. The vocabulary includes, in addition to all purely English words, and those which have been sanctioned by the usage of standard Authors in Prose and Poetry, such colloquial expressions as have passed into the domain of general as distinguished from local or provincial speech; many new phrases, mainly of Continental origin, now current in the daily and periodical press; and those terms in science, philosophy, and art, which are to be met with in popular essays and lectures, or in other works not purely technical or scientific.

The usefulness of a Dictionary, and its chief value to the scholar and ordinary reader, lies in the Definitions or explanations of the words; a secondary importance attaches to the Etymology as fixing the primary, and throwing light on the secondary senses in which words are employed; and a further use, as a book of general reference, depends on the correctness of the Orthography, and the soundness of the principles and rules of Pronunciation.

It has therefore been the first object in the Cabinet Dictionary to furnish a clear, accurate, and complete description of each and all the meanings which belong to the words in the Vocabulary—the disconnecting hyphens indicating the transitions and gradations of signification; and wherever it was practicable, these have been so arranged as to exhibit either the logical concatenation from the primary and fundamental idea, or the natural and historical development of it. It is confidently hoped, that precision and succinctness have not been sacrificed in the attempt to bring out the various shades of meaning which even a single word may assume, as it is applied in a literal, metaphorical, or abstract relation.

The Etymology has been prepared from comparison of the views of different lexicographers; and advantage has been taken of the labours of Max Müller, Wedgwood, Farrar, and others in the new science of Comparative Philology. Where so little space could be spared, it was incumbent to designate only one root-form, in order to show how the word assumed its present aspect, and acquired its primary meaning. In some instances more than one root-form is adduced, chiefly to indicate the origin of its secondary and accidental meanings.

The Orthography maintained, both in the entries and throughout the work, is such as is obtained from the usage of the best writers of modern English.

The proper Pronunciation of the words is clearly and unmistakably designated by reprinting them after the entry in phonetic spelling, with distinct syllabication, distributed accents, and marked vowel sounds.

Numerous Illustrations have been added of interesting objects in natural history, of mechanical contrivances, of scientific and artistic forms and productions, &c. While these serve their main design to convey a more vivid idea of the objects illustrated than can be afforded by mere verbal description, they will also form an attractive feature in the book as specimens of good engraving.

Fully furnished with the material requisite to answer the demands of the ordinary reader, the Cabinet Dictionary is specially fitted and intended for the use of students and the more advanced pupils in the classes of English language and literature; and it will form a valuable aid to parents, schoolmasters, and others employed in the instruction of the young.

The form and character of the typography, and the arrangement of the matter, is so clear and distinct as to render the finding out of an individual word a comparatively easy task; the unusual fulness of the definitions insures that the particular meaning required will be included among those attached to the word, and the precision and minute accuracy of the distinctions, facilitates the discovery of which out of the many is the one required. In the Etymology, the root-forms adduced are those which best serve to show the origin and affinity of the words, and throw the clearest light on their signification and usage, without cumbering the work and confusing the scholar with too great a number of cognate terms. And, finally, the book both in size and appearance, and in the quantity and quality of its contents, will favourably compare with similar works of a more expensive kind, and the price at which it is offered cannot fail to procure for it a speedy introduction and an increasing employment even in our common schools.

KEY TO THE PRONUNCIATION.

THE consonants employed in the Phonetic spelling, with the exception of g, retain their name sounds, and the vowels, unless marked, retain their short sounds. The diphthong au or aw represents the sound of a, as heard in all; ou or ow that of o, as in now; and oo unmarked, as in book; the short sound of oo, as in moon. The sharp sound of th is indicated by common letters, as in thin; the flat sound by small capitals, as in THEN. The syllabic sound of ble, whether terminal or incidental, is represented by bl, and the termination bly by ble. By referring to the following Key, it will be seen that the notation of long and peculiar vowel sounds is remarkably simple:—

Fâte, fâr; mē, her; mīne; nôte; tūne; mōon.

Eleet, (ē-let') v. t. [L. eligere, electum, from e, out, and legere, to choose.] To pick out; to choose from;—to designate or appoint to office by vote or other mark of preference;—to make choice of and determine, as the subjects of divine grace;—to decide in favour of; to prefer; to select;—imp. & pp. elected; ppr. electing.

Eleet, (ē-let') a. Chosen; taken by preference from among two or more;—set apart for eternal life;—chosen, but not invested with office.

Eleet, (ē-let') n. One chosen or set apart;—pl. Those who are chosen or separated for salvation.

Election, (ē-lek-shun) n. [L. electio, from eligere, to choose.] Act of choosing; choice;—the act of choosing a person to fill an office or employment;—power of choosing or selecting; voluntary preference; liberty to take or reject;—discriminating choice; distinction between;—divine choice; predetermination of God with regard to the subjects of his grace;—those who are chosen;—public choice of representatives or members;—time or day of electing members.

Electioneer, (ē-lek-shun-ēr) v. t. To make interest, or use arts for securing the election of a candidate;—imp. & pp. electioneered; ppr. electioneering.

Electioneering, (ē-lek-shun-ēr-ing) n. The arts used for securing the choice of a person to office.

Elective, (ē-let'tiv) a. Exerting the power of choice; making selection;—dependent on choice; bestowed by election.

Electively, (ē-let'tiv-le) adv. By choice or preference.

Electer, (ē-let'tgr) n. One who elects or has the right to vote in favour of a candidate for office;—one of the princes of Germany formerly entitled to choose the emperor. [election.]

Electoral, (ē-let'tgr-al) a. Pertaining to electors or Electorate, (ē-let'tgr-āt) n. The dignity of an elector; electorship;—the territory of an elector in Germany.

Electroship, (ē-let'tgr-ship) n. The office of an elector.

Electress, (ē-let'tro) n. The wife or widow of an elector in the German empire.

Electric, (ē-let'trik) n. A non-conductor of electricity.

Electrical, (ē-let'trik-al) a. Pertaining to electricity;—occasioned by, or derived from, electricity;—containing electricity.

Electrically, (ē-let'trik-al-le) adv. In the manner of electricity, or by means of it.

Electric-rod, (ē-let'trik-ād) n. An rod from three to five feet long, and able to give a violent electric shock.

Electician, (ē-let'triah-ē-an) n. One versed in the science of electricity.

Electricity, (ē-let'tris-ē-te) n. [G. elektron, amber.]

A subtle agent or power in nature, evolved in any disturbance of molecular equilibrium, whether from a chemical, physical, or mechanical cause, and exhibiting itself in a variety of ways;—the science which unfolds the phenomena and laws of the electric fluid.

Electrifiable, (ē-let'tre-fi-ā-bl) a. Capable of receiving electricity, or of being charged with it.

Electrify, (ē-let'tre-fi) v. t. [L. electrum and facere, to make.] To charge with electricity;—to give an electric shock to;—to excite suddenly; to give a sudden shock, as of surprise, admiration, delight, &c.;—imp. & pp. electrified; ppr. electrifying.

Electro-biology, (ē-let'trō-bi-ō-jō) n. [G. elektron, amber, and Eng. biology.] That phase of mesmerism in which the actions, feelings, &c., of a mesmerized person are supposed to be controlled by the will of the operator;—the science of the electrical currents developed in living organisms.

Electro-chemistry, (ē-let'trō-kem'is-tre) n. That science which treats of the agency of electricity in effecting chemical changes.

Electrode, (ē-let'trōd) n. [G. elektron, amber, and odos, a way.] Direction of the electric current;—either of the so-called poles of the voltaic circle.

Electro-gilding, (ē-let'trō-gild'ing) n. The process of gilding copper, &c., by means of voltaic electricity.

Electrology, (ē-let'trō-lō-jō) n. [G. elektron, amber, and logos, discourse.] That branch of physical science which treats of the phenomena of electricity and its properties.

Electrolysis, (ē-let'trō-lō'sis) n. [G. elektron, amber, and lysis, dissolving, from lyein, to loose.] The act or process of chemical decomposition by the action of electricity or galvanism.

Electro-magnet, (ē-let'trō-mag'net) n. A mass of soft iron rendered temporarily magnetic by being placed within a coil of wire through which a current of electricity is passing.

Electro-magnetism, (ē-let'trō-mag'net-izm) n. That science which treats of the development of magnetism by voltaic electricity.

Electrometer, (ē-let'trō-m'ē-tēr) n. G. elektron, amber, and metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the quantity or intensity of electricity;—an instrument which indicates the presence of electricity or for discharging it.

Electromotor, (ē-let'trō-m'ō-tor) n. An instrument for generating a current of electricity.

Electro-negative, (ē-let'trō-neg'ā-tiv) a. Having the property of being attracted by an electro-positive body, or a tendency to pass to the positive pole in electrolysis.

Electro-plating, (ē-let'trō-plāt'ing) n. The process of silvering, as plate, spoons, pots, &c., by voltaic electricity.

Electro-polar, (ē-let'trō-pō'lār) n. A name given to conductors, one end of which is positive and the other negative.

Electro-positive, (ē-let'trō-pos'it-iv) a. Attracted by an electro-negative body, or passing to the negative pole in electrolysis.

Electroscope, (ē-let'trō-skōp) n. [G. elektron, amber (for electricity), and skopos, to look.] An instrument for detecting changes in the electric state of bodies, or the species of electricity present.

Electrotype, (ē-let'trō-tip) n. [G. elektron, amber, and typos, an impression, from typein, to strike.] A copy or stereotype taken by electrolysis.

Electrotype, (ē-let'trō-tip) v. t. To stereotype or take copies of by electrolysis;—imp. & pp. electrotyped; ppr. electrotyping.

Electrotypy, (ē-let'trō-tip-ē) n. The process of copying medals, engravings, &c., by electro deposition.

Electuary, (ē-let'ti-ār-ē) n. [G. ekleichen, to lick up.] A medicine composed of powders made up into a confection.

Elemosynary, (el-ě-mos'in-ar-ē) a. [G. elemosynē, from eleos, pity.] Relating to charity;—given in charity or alms; founded by charity;—supported by charity.

Elemosynary, (el-ě-mos'in-ar-ē) n. One who subsists on charity.

Elegance, (el-ě-gans) n. State or quality of being elegant; beauty characterized by grace, propriety, delicacy, and refinement;—that which is elegant.
