gested by a similar usage among the ancient Greeks. (See gamut.) The series ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la (derived from the initial syllables of the lines of a hymn to St. John, beginning "Ut queant laxis") was applied to the tones of each of the hexachords then recognized. (See hexachord.) When a melody exceeded the limits of a single hexachord, a change from one series of syllables to another was made, which was called a mutation or modulation. Early in the sixteenth century, when the modern octave scale became established, the syllable si (probably taken from the initials of the last line of the above hymn) was added for the seventh or leading tone. Somewhat later do was substituted in Italy and Germany for ut, on account of its greater sonority. The series thus formed is still in use, though other systems have been proposed. Such other systems are doceidization (do, ce, di, ga, lo, ma, ni), also called doceidization; bebization (la, be, ce, de, me, fe, ge); and damenization (da, me, ni, po, tu, la, be). In England and America, from before the middle of the seventeenth century to the beginning of the nineteenth, an abbreviated system was used, including only mi, fa, sol, la. The ideal application of solmization involves calling whatever tone is taken as the key-note do, irrespective of its pitch, and adjusting the other syllables accordingly, so that the scale-tones shall always be named by the same syllables respectively, and the various intervals by the same combination of syllables. This system is often called that of the movable do, since the pitch of do is variable. What is called the fixed-do system has also had considerable currency in Italy, France, and England, according to which the tone C is always called do, D re, E mi, etc., and this too when the pitch of these tones is chromatically altered, the system therefore following the arbitrary features of the keyboard and the staff notation. This system is regarded by many musicians as contrary to the historic and logical idea of solmization, and its use in England and America is decreasing. The most important special application of solmization in musical study is that of the tonic sol-fa system (which see, under tonic), the syllables of which are doh, ray, me, fah, soh, lah, le. In the movable-do system the sharp of any tone is indicated by a syllable beginning with the same consonant as that of the tone, and using the vowel i: as, di for dog, fi for fat, etc.; and similarly the flat of any tone is indicated by a syllable using the vowel e: as, me for mi, le for la, etc. The minor scale is solmized in two ways: either beginning with la, and using the same syllables as in the major scale; or beginning with do, and using such modified syllables as may be needed (do, re, me, etc.). The great utility of solmization lies in its offering an abstract vocal notation of musical facts, whereby they may be named, remembered, and studied. Also solmization, solmization, solfeggio, and sol-faing.

solo (sō'-lō), a. and n. [It. solo, alone, < L. solus, sole: see sole.] 1. a. In music, alone; not combined with other voices or instruments of equal importance; not concerted. A solo passage may be accompanied, however, by voices or instruments of less importance.—Solo organ, in organ-building, a partial organ introduced into large instruments, containing stops of special power or effectiveness, such as are used in producing striking solo effects. Its keyboard is usually the upper one when there are four, or the lower when there are three. Its stops are often connected with a special bellows, which is weighted with extra weights; they are then said to be "on a heavy wind." The choir-organ is also sometimes loosely called the solo organ. See organ.—Solo pitch, in music, a special pitch or accordatura (scordatura) adopted by a solo performer upon a violin or other solo instrument, so as to produce peculiar and startling effects.—Solo stop, in organ-building, a stop either of special quality or placed on a heavy wind, so as to be fitted for the performance of solo. Such stops often occur in each of the usual partial organs, but in large instruments the most important of them are gathered into a separate partial organ called the solo organ (see above).

II. n.; It. pl. sol (-li), E. pl. solos (-lōz).

1. A melody, movement, or work intended for or performed by a single performer, vocal or instrumental, with or without accompaniment. Opposed to concerted piece, whether chorus, duet, trio, or for a number of instruments.—2. A game of cards, played usually by four persons, with a euchre pack. That player who bids highest—that is, offers to take the greatest number of tricks alone, or in a variety of the game, aided by a partner—plays against the rest. If he takes five or more tricks, he receives a payment from them; if not, he makes a payment to them.

solograph (sol'-ō-grāf), n. [L. sol, the sun, + Gr. γράφειν, write.] A picture on paper taken by the talbotype or calotype process. Simmonds.

soloist (sō'-lō-ist), n. [< solo + -ist.] In music, a performer of solos, vocal or instrumental. Also solist.

Solomonic (sol'-ō-mon'ik), a. [< Solomon (see def.) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to Solomon, son of David and his successor as king of Israel: as, Solomonic wisdom.

Solomon's hyssop, Porch, servants. See hyssop, porch, servant.

Solomon's-seal (sol'-ō-monz-sē'), n. 1. A plant of the genus Polygonatum. The common Solomon's-seal in England is P. multiflorum, a plant with erect or curving stems 2 feet high, and flowers from one to eight in a cluster.

1. The upper part of the flowering stem of Solomon's-seal (Polygonatum giganteum). 2. The lower part of the stem with the rhizome. a, a flower; b, a fruit.

A smaller Old World species is P. officinale, whose root (like that of P. multiflorum) is emetic, cathartic, etc., and was formerly much applied to bruises. In America P. giganteum is the great Solomon's-seal, a species 2 to 7 feet high, with leaves 3 to 8 inches long, and two to eight flowers in a cluster; and P. biflorum is the smaller Solomon's-seal, growing 1 to 3 feet high, with the peduncles commonly two-flowered. The larger species are rather striking plants; P. multiflorum has been much cultivated. See also cut under rhizome.

2. A symbol formed of two triangles interlaced or superposed, presenting a six-rayed figure,  Compare pentacle.—False Solomon's-seal. (a) See Smilacina. (b) See Maianthemum.

so-long (sō-lōng'), interj. [Prob. a sailors' perversion of salaam.] Good-by. Also so long. [Slang.]

Solonian (sō-lō'-ni-an), a. [L. Solon, < Gr. Σόλων, Solon, + -ian.] Of or pertaining to Solon, a famous lawgiver of Athens (about 594 B. C.): as, the Solonian Constitutions; Solonian legislation.

Solonic (sō-lon'ik), a. [L. Solon (see Solonian) + -ic.] Same as Solonian: as, the Solonic talents.

Solon porcelain. See porcelain.

Solpuga (sol-pū'-gā), n. [NL. (Herbst), < L. solpuga, salpuga, solipuga, solipugna (as if < sol, sun, + pugnare, fight), solifuga (as if < sol, sun, + fugere, flee), a kind of venomous insect, an ant or spider.] 1. The name-giving genus of Solpugidae, having the tarsi more than three-jointed. See Galeodes.—2. [I. c.] A member of this genus; a solifuge or weasel-spider.

Solpugida (sol-pū'-ji-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Solpuga + -ida.] An order of arachnids. They have tracheal respiration, the cephalothorax and abdomen distinct (the former segmented into a large cephalic and small thoracic part), the abdomen annulated, the cheliceres one-jointed and chelate, the palpi long and slender, extending forward, the first pair of legs paliform and porrect, the other legs ending in pairs of claws, and the eyes two in number. The whole body and the limbs are clothed with hairs. These arachnids resemble large hairy spiders externally, but are more nearly related to scorpions. The head is largely made up of the massive chelate falces. The only or the leading family is Galeodidae or Solpugidae. Also Solpugida, Solpugides, and in later variant form Solifuge. Galeodea is a synonym.

Solpugidae (sol-pū'-ji-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solpuga + -idae.] A family of arachnidans, named from the genus Solpuga: synonymous with Galeodidae.

Solpugidea (sol-pū'-ji-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Solpuga + -idea.] Same as Solpugida. Also called Galeodea.

solstead (sol'-stēd), n. [L. sol, sun, + E. stead. Cf. sunstead and solstice.] Same as solstice. [Rare.]

If it be gathered about the summer solstead. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxvi. 5.

solstice (sol'-stis), n. [Formerly also solsticy; < ME. solstice, < OF. (and F.) solstice = Sp. Pg. solsticio = It. solstizio, < L. solstitium, the solstice, a point in the ecliptic at which the sun seems to stand still, < sol, the sun, + -stitium, < status, pp. of sistere, make to stand still, a reduplicated form of stare = E. stand: see sol, stand, and sist. Cf. armistice.] 1. In astron.: (a) The time at which the sun is at its greatest distance from the equator, and when its diurnal motion in declination ceases, which happens about June 21st, when it enters Cancer (the summer solstice), and about December 22d, when it enters Capricorn (the winter solstice). (b) A solstitial point. Hence.—2. Figuratively, culmination or turning-point; furthest limit.

He died before his time, perhaps, not yet come to the solstice of his age. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 373.

3. A stopping or standing still of the sun.

The supernatural solstices of the sun in the days of Joshua. Sir T. Browne.

solsticion, n. [ME. solsticion, also solstacion, < OF. solsticion*, < L. solstitium, the solstice: see solstice.] A solstitial point.

In this heved of Cancer is the grettest declinacoun northward of the sonne, and therfor is he cleped the solsticion of Somer. Chaucer, Astrolabe, l. 17.

solsticity, n. [L. solstitium, solstice: see solstice.] Same as solstice.

The high-heated year
Is in her solsticity.

Middleton and Rowley, World Tost at Tennis, Ind.

solstitial (sol-stish'al), a. [F. solstitial, solsticial = Sp. Pg. solsticial = It. solstiziale, L. solstitialis, < solstitium, solstice: see solstice.]

1. Of or pertaining to a solstice: as, a solstitial point.—2. Happening at a solstice—especially, with reference to the northern hemisphere, at the summer solstice, or midsummer.

The sun
Had . . . from the south to bring

Solstitial armil. See armil. 1.—Solstitial point, one of the two points in the ecliptic which are furthest from the equator, and at which the sun arrives at the time of the solstices. They are diametrically opposite to each other, and the distance of each from the equator is equal to the obliquity of the ecliptic.

solubility (sol-'u-bil'i-ti), n. [= F. solubilité = Sp. solubilidad = Pg. solubidade = It. solubilità; *< NL. solubilita(t)-s, L. solubilis, soluble: see soluble.] 1. The property of being soluble; that property of a body which renders it susceptible of solution; susceptibility of being dissolved in a fluid.—2. In bot., a capability of separating easily into parts, as that of certain legumes to divide transversely into parts or joints.—3. Capability of being solved, resolved, answered, cleared up, or disentangled, as a problem, a question, or a doubt.

soluble (sol-'u-bl), a. [< F. soluble = Sp. soluble = Pg. solubl = It. solubile, L. solubilis, dissolvable, < solvere, solve, dissolve: see solve.] 1. Capable of being dissolved in a fluid; capable of solution; dissolvable.—2. Figuratively, capable of being solved or resolved, as an algebraical equation; capable of being disentangled, cleared up, unfolded, or settled by explanation, as a doubt, question, etc.; solvable.

Had he denounced it as a fruitless question, and (to understanding) soluble by none, the world might have been spared a large library of resultless disputation.

Sir W. Hamilton.

More soluble is this knot
By gentleness than war. Tennyson, Princess, v. 34. Relaxed; loose; open.

Alc is their eating and their drinking, surely, which keeps their bodies clear and soluble.

Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, iv. 1.

And then, if Balaam's ass hath but an audible voice and a soluble purse, he shall be preferred before his master, were he ten prophets. Rev. T. Adams, Works, l. 469.

Soluble blue, cotton, glass, indigo. See the nouns.—Soluble bougie, a bougie composed of substances which melt at the body-temperature: used for the purpose of administering medicament to the urethral mucous membrane.—Soluble guncotton. Same as dinitrocellulose.—Soluble oil. See castor-oil.—Soluble soap. See soap, 1.

solubleness (sol-'u-bl-ness), n. Soluble character or property; solubility.

solum (sō-'lum), n. [L., the ground, the earth, a region: see soil, soil.] In Scots law, ground; a piece of ground.

solund-goose (sō-'lund-gōs), n. Same as solan-goose.

solus (sō-'lus), a. [L.: see sol.] Alone: used chiefly in dramatic directions: as, enter the king solus. The feminine form is sol.

solute (sō-lūt'), a. [< ME. solute, < L. solutus, pp. of solvere, loose, release, set free: see solve.] 1. Loose; free.

Solute or sondy landes that require,
So that aboute or under hem be do
A certayne of fatte lande as thai desire.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 193.

As to the interpretation of the Scriptures solute and at large, there have been divers kinds introduced and devised, some of them rather curious and unsafe than sober and warranted. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

2. Relaxed; hence, joyous; merry.
Bacchus, purple god of joyous wit,
A brow solute, and ever-laughing eye.

Young, Night Thoughts, ll. 579.

3. In bot., free; not adhering: opposed to adnate: as, a solute stipule.—4. Soluble: as, a solute salt.

solute (sō-lūt'), v. t. [< L. solutus, pp. of solvere, loosen, solve: see solute, solute, a.] To dissolve; also, to resolve; answer; absolve.

What will not boldness bid a man say, when he hath made an argument against himself which he cannot solute?

Sp. Ridley, In Bradford's Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 393.

solution (sō-lū-'shon), n. [< ME. solucion, < OF. solution, solucion, F. solution = Fr. solution = Sp. solucion = Pg. solução = It. soluzione, < L. solu- tio(n)-, a loosing, dissolving, < solvere, pp. solutus, loose, resolve, dissolve: see solve.] 1. The act of separating the parts of any body; disruption; rupture; fracture; breach: as, a solution of continuity (see below).—2. The transformation of matter from a solid or gaseous state to the liquid state by means of a liquid called the solvent or menstruum; the state of being dissolved. The nature of the phenomenon depends upon whether chemical action is or is not present. Solution in the physical sense—the common and proper use of the word—is illustrated by dissolving sugar or salt in water, or silver in mercury; here, and in similar cases, when by the removal of the liquid (as by evaporation) the original solid is obtained, the process is essentially a change of molecular state, from the solid to the liquid, and hence accompanied by the absorption of heat; this is strikingly seen in freezing-mixtures. The word is not infrequently used, however, when the phenomenon is one of chemical combination only, as when silver dissolves in nitric acid, forming a new substance, silver nitrate; this, as is generally true of chemical union, is accompanied by the evolution of heat. The two phenomena, physical and chemical, may both be present in solution at the same time, and the line between them often cannot be sharply drawn; glacial acetic acid dissolves in water and at the same time combines with it, the liberation of heat of the chemical part of the process overbalancing the absorption of heat in the physical. The solution of a gas in a liquid, as of ammonia gas in water (also called absorption), is essentially the physical process of the change of the gas to the liquid, and hence is accompanied with the evolution of heat. The term solution is also sometimes applied to the absorption of gases by solids, as when palladium absorbs or dissolves hydrogen gas, forming a true alloy with it. The solubility of any solid is constant at a given temperature, and may be accurately determined by experiment. It may be increased or diminished by the presence of other substances in solution. The solubility of any gas also is constant under the same conditions. It varies with the temperature, the pressure, the nature of the liquid, and the matters in solution in it. In a mixture of gases, each is dissolved in the same quantity as if it were present alone under the same tension as in the mixture.

3. The liquid produced as a result of the process or action above described; the preparation made by dissolving a solid in a liquid: as, a solution of salt, soda, or alum; solution of iron, etc.—4. A liquid or dissolved state or condition; unsettled state; suspense.

His [Lessing's] was a mind always in solution, which the divine order of things, as it is called, could not precipitate into any of the traditional forms of crystallization, and in which the time to come was already fermenting.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 313.

5. The act of solving, working out, explaining, clearing up, or settling, or the state of being solved, explained, cleared up, or settled; resolution; explanation: as, the solution of a difficult problem or of a doubt in casuistry.

It is according to nature no man to do that whereby he should take . . . a praye of a nother mannes ignorance. Of this matter Tulli writeth many propre examples and quick solutions. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ill. 4.

In his singular "Ode inscribed to W. H. Channing" there is a hint of a possible solution of the slavery problem. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, viii.

6. A method of solving or finally clearing up or settling something. Specifically.—7. The answer to a problem or puzzle of any kind, together with the proof that that answer is correct.

—8. Dissolution; a dissolving.

Easy and frequent solutions of conjugal society.

Locke, Civil Government, § 80.

9. Release; deliverance; discharge. Imp. Dict.—10. In med., the termination of a disease, especially when accompanied by critical symptoms; the crisis of a disease.—11. In civil law, payment; satisfaction of a creditor.—Alcoholic solution. See tincture.—Algebraic solution of an equation, a solution by means of an algebraic formula, especially by radicals.—Aqueous solution, a solution whose solvent or menstruum is water.—Barreswill's solution, a test for sugar similar to Fehling's solution.—Burnett's solution. See Burnett's liquid, under liquid.—Burrow's solution, a solution of aluminum subacetate, used as a local astringent in skin-affections.—Cardan's solution, the ordinary algebraic solution of a cubic. See cubic.—Cayley's solution. (a) A solution of the general cubic. Let $U = 0$ be the cubic, D its discriminant, and J its cubicovariant, then the solution follows from

$$\sqrt{U} \sqrt{D+J} + \sqrt{U} \sqrt{D-J}.$$

These cube roots can always be extracted. (b) A solution of the general quartic, due to Professor Cayley. Let $U = 0$ be the quartic, H its Hessian, S its quadrinvariant, T its cubinvariant or catalecticant, and c_1, c_2, c_3 the roots of the cubic $c^3 - Sc + T = 0$, then the solution follows from

$$(c_2 - c_3) \sqrt{H - c_1 U} + (c_3 - c_1) \sqrt{H - c_2 U} \\ + (c_1 - c_2) \sqrt{H - c_3 U} = 0.$$

The square roots can always be extracted.—Chemical solution, the solution of a solid body in a liquid which is caused by or accompanied with a chemical reaction between the solid and the solution, as of zinc in dilute sulphuric acid.—Clemens's solution, a solution of arsenic bromide, used in the treatment of diabetes.—Compound solution of iodine. Same as Lugol's solution.—Compound solution of sodium borate. Same as Dobell's solution.—Descartes's solution, an algebraical solution of the general biquadratic equation, differing from Ferrari's only in the method of investigation.—Dobell's solution, a solution containing sodium borate 120 grains, sodium bicarbonate 120 grains, crystallized carbonic acid 24 grains, glycerin 4 fluidounces, water to make 16 fluidounces.—Donovan's solution, a solution of arsenic iodide 1, red iodide of mercury 1, water 98 parts: alterative. Also called solution of iodide of arsenic and mercury.—Ethereal solution, a solution whose solvent or menstruum is an ether, usually sulphuric ether.—Euler's solution, a solution of a biquadratic after the second term has been got rid of. It differs little from Ferrari's solution.—Fehling's solution, an aqueous solution of copper sulphate, Rochelle salts, and sodium hydrate. When heated with any reducing sugar, as dextrose, copper suboxide is deposited from it. It is used in the analysis of saccharine bodies, and as a qualitative test of the presence of sugar.—Ferrari's solution, a solution of the general biquadratic. See biquadratic equation, under equation.—Fowler's solution, a solution of arsenious acid 1, potassium bicarbonate 1, compound tincture of lavender 3, water 95 parts: one of the best vehicles for administering arsenic. Also called liquor potassii arsenitis, solution of arsenite of potassium, and ague-drop.—General solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Goadby's solution, a preparation for preserving animal substances, made with bay-salt, corrosive sublimate or arsenious acid, and water. Thomas, Med. Diet.—Hall's solution of strychnine, a solution of strychnine acetate 16 grains, dilute acetic acid 4 fluidounces, alcohol 4 fluidounces, compound tincture of cardamom 60 minims, water to make 16 fluidounces.—Heavy solution, in mineral, a liquid of high density, as a solution of mercuric iodide in potassium iodide (called the Sonstadt or Thoulet solution), having a maximum specific gravity of 3.2, or of borotungstate of cadmium (Klein solution), specific gravity 3.6, used as a gravity-solution (which see).—Improper solution, a function which solves a given differential equation, but also solves an equation either of lower order or of the same order but of lower degree.—Javelle's solution, potassium carbonate 58, chlorinated lime 80, water 862 parts. Also called solution of chlorinated potassa.—Labarraque's solution. Same as Labarraque's fluid (which see, under fluid).—Löffler's solution, a saturated alcoholic solution of methyl blue 30 parts, and 100 parts of a 1:10,000 aqueous solution of potassium hydrate: used in staining bacteria.—Lugol's solution, a solution of iodine 5, potassium iodide 10, water 85 parts. Also called compound solution of iodine.—Magendie's solution of morphine, morphine sulphate 16 grains, water 1 fluidounce: used to administer morphine hypodermically.—Mechanical solution, the mere union of a solid with a liquid in such a manner that its aggregate form is changed without any alteration of the chemical properties of either the solid or its solvent: thus, sugar dissolves in water without either undergoing any chemical change.—Mechanical solution of a problem. See mechanical.—Mineral solution. See mineral.—Nessler's solution. Same as Nessler's reagent (which see, under reagent).—Numerical solution, a solution of an equation by means of numerical approximation.—Particular solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Pasteur's solution, in bot., a liquid holding in solution a small percentage of certain inorganic salts and a larger percentage of certain organic substances, employed in the cultivation of the lower forms of vegetable life, such as bacteria, yeast-cells, and fungi, for purposes of study. The composition is—potassium phosphate 20 parts, calcium phosphate 2 parts, magnesium sulphate 2 parts, ammonium tartrate 100 parts, cane-sugar 1,500 parts, distilled water 8,376 parts.—Pearson's arsenical solution, crystallized sodium arseniate 1, water 599 parts.—Pierlot's solution, an aqueous solution of ammonium valerianate to which is added some of the alcoholic extract of valerian.—Proper solution, a function which satisfies a differential equation, and no equation of lower order nor of the same order but of lower degree.—Saturated solution, a solution which at the given temperature cannot be made to contain more of the given substance than it already contains, the adhesion of the liquid to the substance being just balanced by the cohesion of the particles of the solid body in contact with it.—Simpson's solution. Same as Ferrari's solution.—Singular solution. See differential equation, under equation.—Solution of acetate of ammonia, in phar., a solution composed of dilute acetic acid 100 parts, ammonium carbonate added to the point of neutralization: a valuable diaphoretic and diuretic. Also called spirit of Mindererus.—Solution of albumen, a test solution consisting of the white of one egg triturated with four ounces of water, and filtered: used in pharmaceutical work.—Solution of an equation. See equation.—Solution of continuity, in surg., the separation of parts normally continuous, as by a fracture, laceration, etc.—Solution of lime, a clean saturated solution of slaked lime in water, useful as an antacid, astringent, and tonic. Commonly called lime-water.—Solution of potassa, in phar., an aqueous solution of potassium hydrate, KHO , containing 5 per cent. of the hydrate: an antacid, diuretic, and antilithic. Also called liquor potassæ.—Solution of soda, in phar., an aqueous solution containing 5 per cent. of sodium hydrate.—Solution of sodium carbonate, in phar., crystals of carbonic acid 30, sodium hydrate 2, water 28 parts. Also called phenol sodique.—Solution of subacetate of lead, a solution composed of lead acetate 170, lead oxide 120, water 1,710 parts: a useful astringent and sedative for external use. Also called Goulard's extract.—Sonstadt solution, a solution of mercury iodide in potassium iodide. See specific gravity, under gravity.—Standardized solution, a solution whose strength or composition has been accurately determined, and which is used as a standard of comparison.—Thompson's solution of phosphorus, a solution containing phosphorus, absolute alcohol, spirit of pepper-mint, and glycerin.—Trigonometrical solution, a solution of an equation by means of trigonometric functions. For an example, see cubic equation, under equation.—Van Swieten's solution, a solution of mercury perchloride.—Vlemingh's solution, a solution composed of lime 1, sulphur 2, water 20 parts boiled down to 12 parts.

solutive (sol-'u-tiv), a. [< solute + -ive.] 1. Tending to dissolve; loosening; laxative.

Absterive, and opening, and solvative as mead.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 848.

2. Capable of being dissolved or loosened. Imp. Dict.

solvability (sol'va-bil'i-ti), n. [< solvable + -ity (see -bility).] 1. Capability of being solved; solubility: as, the solvability of an equation.—2. Ability to pay all just debts; solvency.

solvable (sol'va-bl), a. [< F. solvable, payable; as solve + -able.] 1. Payable.

Some of those corridors (where the property was altered into a set summe of money) was solvable out of the exchequer. Fuller, Ch. Hist., VI. 326. (Davies.)

2. Solvent.

Was this well done of him [David, at Adullam], to be protector-general of outlaws, thereby defying justice, defrauding creditors, defeating God's command, which provided that the debtor, if not solvable, should be sold for satisfaction? Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. xiii. 32.

3. Capable of being solved, resolved, or explained: as, equations above the fourth degree are not solvable by means of radicals.

Also soluble.

solvableness (sol'va-bl-nes), n. Solvability.

Solvay process. See soda, 1.

solve (solv), v. t.; pret. and pp. solved, ppr. solving. [< ME. solven, < OF. solver, vernacularly soudre, F. soudre = Sp. Hence ult. (< L. solvere) E. solvable, solvent, soluble, solute, solution, etc., absolute, absolute, assol, dissolve, dissolve, resolve, resolute, etc.] 1. To loosen; disentangle; unravel; hence, to explain or clear up the difficulties in; resolve; explain; make clear; remove perplexity from: as, to solve a difficulty, a puzzle, or a problem.

If her wretched captives could not solve and interpret these riddles, she with great cruelty fell upon them in their hesitation and confusion, and tore them to pieces. Bacon, Physical Fables, x.

The most subtle and powerful intellects have been labouring for centuries to solve these difficulties. Macauley, Sadler's Law of Population.

2. To determine; put an end to; settle.

He . . . would . . . solve high dispute

With conjugal caresses. Milton, P. L., viii. 66.

Centuries elapsed before the attempt to solve the great schism of the East and West by a Council. Fusey, Eireicon, p. 91.

3. To determine or work out by rule; operate on by calculation or mathematical processes, so as to bring out the required result: as, to solve a problem in mathematics.—4. To dissolve; melt. [Rare.]

Under the influence of the acid, which partly destroys, partly solves the membranes. Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 351.

solvēt (solv), n. [< solve, v.] Solution.

But why thy odour matcheth not thy show,

The solvēt is this, that thou dost common grow. Shak., Sonnets, lxi.

solvency (sol'ven-si), n. [< solven(t) + -cy.] The state of being solvent; ability to pay all just debts or just claims.

Our speech . . . was of tithes and creeds, of beeves and grain, of commodities wet and dry, and the solvency of the retail dealers. Scott, Rob Roy, iii.

solvend (sol'vend), n. [< L. solvendum, fut. pass. part. of solvere, loosen, dissolve: see solve.] A substance to be dissolved.

Solutions differ from chemical compounds in retaining the properties both of the solvent and of the solvend. C. Tomlinson.

solvent (sol'vent), a. and n. [= Sp. It. solvente, < L. solven(t)-s, ppr. of solvere, loosen, dissolve: see solve.] 1. a. 1. Having the power of dissolving: as, a solvent body.—2. Able or sufficient to pay all just debts: as, a solvent person or estate. Specifically—(a) Able to pay one's debts as they become due in the ordinary course of business. (b) Having property in such amount and situation that all one's debts can be collected out of it by legal process. See insolvency. (c) Of sufficient value to pay all just debts: as, the estate is solvent.

II. n. Any fluid or substance that dissolves or renders other bodies liquid; a menstruum. Water is of all solvents the most common and most useful. Alcohol is the solvent of resinous bodies and of some other similarly constituted substances; naphtha, oil of turpentine, and ether are solvents of caoutchouc; chlorin and aqua regia, or nitromuriatic acid, are solvents of gold.

The universal solvent sought by the alchemists.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 315.

solver (sol'ver), n. [< solve + -er.] One who solves, in any sense of the verb.

solvable (sol'vi-bl), a. See solvable.

solyt, adv. An obsolete form of solely.

som¹†. An old spelling of some, sum².

som², n. [Russ. somū, the silure.] The sheat-fish, Silurus glanis.

It [silnglass] is a Russian kind, obtained from the bladders of the som fish. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 133.

soma¹ (sō'mā), n.; pl. somata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα, the body, a dead body, body as opposed to spirit, material substance, mass, etc., also a person, body, human being.] Body. Specifically—(a) In anat. and zool., the entire axial part of the body of an animal; the corpus, minus the membra; the head, neck, trunk, and tail, without the limbs. (b) In theol., the body as distinguished from the psyche or soul, and the pneuma or spirit.

soma² (sō'mā), n. [< Skt. soma (= Zend hao-ma), juice, < √ su, press out. Cf. Gr. σῶς, juice, sap (see opium), L. succus, succus, juice (see succulent).] 1. In ancient India, a drink having intoxicating properties, expressed from the stems of a certain plant, and playing an important part in sacrifices, being offered especially to the god Indra. It was personified and deified, and worshiped as a god.—2. An East Indian plant, the probable source of the beverage soma. It is believed to be of the milkweed family and of the species now classed as Sarcocolla brevistigma (the Asclepias acida of Roxburgh). This is a twining plant, with jointed woody stems of the size of a quill, and numerous succulent branches which are pendulous when unsupported. The flowers are small, greenish-white, and fragrant, in elegant small umbel-like cymes at the ends of the branchlets. The plant yields a mild acidulous milky juice, which appears to have formed the basis of the drink called soma (see def. 1). The juice of more than one species may have been thus used. The plant grows in dry rocky places in India and Burma. Also called moom-plant (from mythological associations) and swallowwort.

3. In luter Hind. myth., the moon, or [cap.] the deity of the moon.

somacule (sō'mā-kūl), n. [*< NL. somaculum, dim. of soma, < Gr. σῶμα, body: see soma¹.] The smallest portion of protoplasm which can retain its physiological properties—that is, the chemical molecule of protoplasm. Foster.

Somaj (so-māj'), n. [< Hind. somāj, a church, an assembly, < Skt. samāja, assembly, < sam, together, + √ aj, drive. Cf. Brahmo-Somaj.] See Brahmo-Somaj.

soma-plant (sō'mā-plant), n. Same as soma, 2.

Somaschan (sō-mas'ki-an), n. [< Somascha (see def.) + -ian.] A member of a Roman Catholic congregation, founded at Somascha, near Milan, in Italy, in the first half of the sixteenth century: it adopted the rules of St. Augustine.

Somateria (sō-mā-tē'ri-ā), n. [NL. (Leach, 1819), so called in allusion to the down on the body; < Gr. σῶμα(-r-), body, + ἔριον, wool.] A genus of Anatidæ of the subfamily Fuligulinae, including various marine ducks of large size, with copious down on the under parts, with which the female lines the nest, and large, diversified, variously feathered or gibbous bill; the eiders or eider-ducks. The common eider is S. mollissima; the king-duck is S. spectabilis; the spectacled eider is S. fischeri; Steller's eider is S. stellieri. The genus is often dismembered into Somateria proper, Brionetta, Lampronetta, and Heniconetta (or Polyictida), respectively represented by the four species named. They inhabit arctic and northern regions, and are related to the scoters (Eidemia). See Polyictida, and cut under eider-duck.

somatic (sō-mat'ik), a. [= F. somatique, < Gr. σωματικός, pertaining to the body, bodily, < σῶμα, the body: see soma¹.] 1. Of or pertaining to the body or material organism, as distinguished from the soul, spirit, or mind; physical; corporeal; bodily.

It was shown that in the British official nosology mental diseases were classified as disorders of the intellect, the idea of somatic disease as associated with insanity being studiously ignored. Dr. Tukey.

We need here to call to mind the continuity of our presentations, and especially the existence of a background of organic sensations or somatic consciousness, as it is variously termed. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 68.

2. Of or pertaining to the soma: as, the longitudinal somatic axis lies in the meson.—3. Of or pertaining to the cavity or interior hollow of the body of an animal, and especially to the body-walls of such cavity; parietal, as distinguished from visceral or splanchnic; celomatic; somatopleural.—4. Pertaining to mass.—Somatic anthropology, that division of anthropology which deals with anatomical points.—Somatic cavity, the celomatic cavity, body-cavity, or celom: distinguished from enteric cavity, from which it is usually shut off completely. The interiors of the thorax and abdomen are somatic cavities. See cuts under Actinozoa, Campanularia, and Hydrozoa.

In the Cœlenterata, the somatic cavity, or enterocœle, is in free communication with the digestive cavity. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 56.

Somatic cells, in bot., cells forming a part of the body of the individual, not specifically modified for any other purpose: said sometimes of those cells of plants which take part in vegetative reproduction.—Somatic death, death of the body as a whole: contrasted with death of any of its parts.—Somatic musculature, the muscles of the somatopleure; that one of the two chief layers of muscles which is subjacent to the dermic or outer epithelium: contrasted with splanchnic musculature.—Somatic velocity, the mass of matter through which a disturbance is propagated in a unit of time while advancing along a prism of unit sectional area; mass-velocity. Rankine.

somatics (sō-mat'iks), n. [Pl. of somatic (see -ics).] Same as somatology, 1.

somatism (sō'mā-tizm), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -ism.] Materialism.

somatist (sō'mā-tist), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -ist.] One who admits the existence of corporeal or material beings only; one who denies the existence of spiritual substances; a materialist.

And so our unnatural somatists know none of the most excellent substances, which actuate all the rest, but only the more base and gross, which are actuated by them. Baxter, Dying Thoughts.

somato-etiological (sō'mā-tō-ē'ti-ō-loy'i-kal), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), body, + ἔτιολογία + -ic-al.] Pertaining to or regarding the body as a cause (as of disease). E. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 51.

somatocyst (sō'mā-tō-sist), n. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] The inflated stem or body of some siphonophorans, or oceanic hydrozoans, serving as a pneumatocyst or air-sac to float or buoy these organisms, as in the case of the Portuguese man-of-war. See Calyptophora, *Siphonophora*², and cuts under Diphyidæ and Physalia.

somatocystic (sō'mā-tō-sis'tik), a. [< somatocyst + -ic.] Vesicular or cystic, as the body-cavity of a siphonophorous hydrozoan; of or pertaining to a somatocyst.

somatogenic (sō'mā-tō-jen'ik), a. [< Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -γενής, produced: see -genous.] Originating in the soma, body, or physical organism in consequence of its conditions of environment: noting those modifications or biological characters which an organism acquires in reacting upon its material surroundings.

He [Prof. Weismann] uses the term somatogenic to express those characters which first appear in the body itself, and which follow from the reaction of the soma under direct external influences. Nature, XL. 531.

somatologic (sō'mā-tō-loy'ik), a. [< somatolog-y + -ic.] Same as somatomological.

somatological (sō'mā-tō-loy'i-kal), a. [< somatolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to somatology in any sense, especially to somatology as a department of anthropology; physical; corporeal; material.

somatologically (sō'mā-tō-loy'i-kal-i), adv. As regards physique or bodily frame; physically; from the point of view of somatology. Science, XII. 227.

somatology (sō-mā-tol'ō-ji), n. [= F. somatologie; < Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of living or organized bodies, considered with regard only to their physical nature or structure. It includes natural history in the usual sense, as embracing zoology, botany, anatomy, and physiology, and differs from biology only in taking no account of mental or psychological phenomena. Also somatics.

2. More broadly, physics; the doctrine of material bodies or substances.—3. Specifically, the doctrine of the human body, as a department of anthropology; human anatomy and physiology; also, a treatise on this subject.—Anthropurgic somatology. See anthropurgic.

somatome (sō'mā-tōm), n. [*For somatotome, < Gr. σῶμα(-r-), the body, + -τομος, < τέμνειν, ταμείν, cut.] An ideal section or segment of the body; one of the structural parts into which a body, especially a vertebrate body, is theoretically divisible. When actually so divided, the somatomes are the somites, metameres, arthromeres, diarthromeres, etc., which may exist in any given case. See somite.

somatonic (sō-mā-tom'ik), a. [< somatome + -ic.] Having the nature, quality, or character of a somatome; dividing or segmenting a body into theoretic or actual somites; somitic; metameric.

somatopagus (sō-mā-top'a-gus), n.; pl. somatopagi (-ji). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + πάγος, that which is fixed, < πηγιναί (γ' παγ), fix.] In teratol., a double monster with separate trunks.

somatoparallelus (sō'mā-tō-par-a-lē'lus), n.; pl. somatoparalleli (-li). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + παράλληλος, beside one another: see parallel.] In teratol., a somatopagus with the axes of the two bodies parallel.

somatoplasm (sō'mā-tō-plazm), n. [< Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded: see plasm.] Somatic plasma; the substance of the body.

My germ-plasm or idiolplasm of the first ontogenetic grade is not modified into the somatoplasm of Prof. Vinia. Nature, XLII. 320.

somatopleura (sō'mā-tō-plō'rī), n.; pl. somatopleurae (-rē). [NL.: see somatopleure.] Same as somatopleure.

The villousities of connective and vascular tissue, partly formed by the somatopleura. Micros. Sci., N. 8., XXX. 352.

somatopleural (sō'mā-tō-plō'rāl), a. [< somatopleure + -al.] Of or pertaining to the somatopleure; forming or formed by the somatopleure: as, the somatopleural layer or division of mesoderm. Also somatopleuric.

somatopleure (sō'mā-tō-plō'r), n. [< NL. somatopleura, < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + πλευρά, the side.] The outer one of two divisions of the mesoderm of a four-layered germ, the inner one being the splanchnopleure. A germ that is three-layered—that is, consists of an ectoderm and an endoderm, with mesoderm between them—in most animals becomes four-layered by a splitting of the mesoderm into two layers, the outer or somatopleural and the inner or splanchnopleural, separated by a space which is the body-cavity or coelom. The somatopleure thus constitutes usually the great mass of the body, or the "flesh and bones" of ordinary language, together with its vessels, nerves, and other special structures—not, however, including the cerebrospinal axis of a vertebrate, which is derived from an inversion of ectoderm—while the splanchnopleure forms a portion of the substance of the intestinal tract and its annexes. Also somatopleura.

somatopleuric (sō'mā-tō-plō'rīk), a. [< somatopleure + -ic.] Same as somatopleural. Foster, Elem. of Embryol., p. 39.

somatopneustic (sō'mā-tō-splang-kō-plō'rīk), a. [< Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + πνεύμων, the inward parts, + πλευρά, the side.] Common to the somatopleure and the splanchnopleure. Micros. Sci., XXVIII. 117.

somatotomy (sō-mā-tōt'ō-mī), n. [< Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμείν, cut.] The anatomy of the human body; anthropotomy; hominisection.

somatotridymus (sō'mā-tōt'rid'i-mus), n.; pl. somatotridymi (-mī). [NL., < Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + τριδύμος, threefold.] In teratol., a monster having three bodies.

somatotropic (sō'mā-tō-trop'ik), a. [< Gr. σῶμα (-τ-), the body, + τροπος, < τρέπειν, turn, + -ic.] In bot., exhibiting or characterized by somatotropism.

somatotropism (sō-mā-tōt'rō-pizm), n. [< somatotropic + -ism.] In bot., a directive influence exerted upon growing organs by the mass of the substratum upon which they grow. This influence is not wholly due to the mere physical attraction between them, but is the result of a stimulating effect on what has been called the nerve-motility of the organ. Growing organs may be divided, according to their response to this influence, into two classes, the positively somatotropic, or those which tend to grow perpendicularly inward into the substratum, and negatively somatotropic, or those which tend to grow perpendicularly outward from the substratum.

somber, sombre (som'bēr), a. [= D. somber, formerly also sommer, < F. sombre = Sp. sombrio (= Pg. sombrio), shady, gloomy, < sombra (= Pg. sombra), shade, dark part of a picture, also a ghost (cf. asombrar, frighten); cf. OF. essombre, a shady place; prob. *< L. exumbrare, < ex, out, + umbra, shade (or, according to some, the Sp. Pg. forms are, like Pr. sotzumbrar, shade, *< L. subumbrare, < sub, under, + umbra, shade): see umbra.] 1. Dark; dull; dusky; gloomy: as, a somber hue; somber clouds.

Sombre, old, colonnaded aisles. Tennyson, The Daisy.

2. Dismal; melancholy; dull: opposed to cheerful.

Whatever was poetical in the lives of the early New-Englanders had something shy, if not sombre, about it.

Lovell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 232.

=Syn. 1. Darksome, cloudy, murky.

somber, sombre (som'bēr), v. t.; pret. and pp. sombered, sombred, ppr. sombering, sombring. [< somber, sombre, a.] To make somber, dark, or gloomy; shade.

somberly, sombrely (som'bēr-li), adv. In a somber manner; darkly; gloomily.

somberness, sombreness (som'bēr-nes), n. Somber character, appearance, or state; darkness; gloominess.

The intense gloom which follows in the track of ennui deepened the natural sombreness of all men's thoughts.

C. F. Keary, Prim. Belief, p. 508.

sombre, etc. See somber, etc.

sombrero (som-brā'rō), n. [< Sombrero (see def.) + -ite².] An earthy mineral consisting chiefly of calcium phosphate with impurities, as alumina, etc. It forms a large part of some small islands in the Antilles, especially of Sombrero, and has been used as an artificial manure and for the manufacture of phosphorus. It is supposed to be derived from the decayed bones of turtles and other marine animals. Also called Sombrero guano.

sombrero (som-brā'rō), n. [< Sp. sombrero, a broad-brimmed hat, also a sounding-board, < sombra, shade: see somber.] A broad-brimmed felt hat, of Spanish origin, but now widely used throughout the continent of America.

They rowe too and fro, and have all their marchandizes in their boats, with a great Sombrero or shadow over their heads to keepe the sunne from them, which is as broad as a great cart wheele. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 258.

Both were dressed in the costume of the country—flannel shirts, with handkerchiefs loosely knotted round their necks, thick trousers and boots, and large sombreros.

The Century, XXXIX. 525.

Sombrero guano. Same as sombrerite.

sombrous (som'brus), a. [< somber + -ous.] Somber; gloomy. [Poetical.]

A certain uniform strain of sombrous gravity.

T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 171.

Webster, Duchess of Malf.

Let her who has no Hair, or has but some,

Plant Centinels before her Dressing-Room.

Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, iii.

3. In logic, at least one, perhaps all; but a few logicians sometimes employ a semidefinite some which implies a part, but not all. As commonly used in logic, a statement about some of a class, say that "some S is P," means that it is possible so to select an S that it shall be P; while "every S is P" means that whatever S be taken, it will be P. But when some and every occur in the same statement, it makes a difference which is chosen first. Thus, "every man knows some fact" may mean (1) that, first choosing any man, a fact may then be found which that man knows (which may be expressed by saying that every man knows some fact or other); or it may mean (2) that a fact may be first selected such that, then, taking any man, he will know that fact (which may be expressed by saying that all men know some certain fact). When several *some*s and *all*s occur in the same statement, ordinary syntax fails to express the meaning with precision, and logicians resort to a special notation.

4. A certain indefinite or indeterminate number of: used before plural substantives: as, some years ago.

They hurried us aboard a bark,

Bore us some leagues to sea.

Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 145.

The Lights at Paris, for 5 Months in the year only, cost 50000L. Sterling. This way of Lighting the Streets is in use also in some other Cities in France.

Lister, Journey to Paris (1698), p. 24.

Hence—5. A certain number of, stated approximately: in a quasi-adverbial use before a numeral or other word of number: as, a place some seventy miles distant; some four or five of us will be there.

I would detain you here some month or two.

Shak., M. of V., iii. 2. 9.

Some dozen Romans of us and your lord

... have mingled sums

To buy a present for the emperor.

Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 185.

II. pron. 1†. A certain person; one.

Som man desireth for to have riches,

That cause is of his northre or gret seeknesse,

And som wolde out of his prison fayn,

That in his hous is of his mayne slayn.

Chaucer, Knights Tale, i. 397.

2. A certain quantity, part, or number, as distinguished from the rest: as, some of them are dead; we ate some of our provisions, and gave away the rest.

Loo! he that soweth, goth out to sowe his seed. And the while he soweth, sum felden byside the weye.

Wyclif, Mat. xiii. 4.

Though some report they (elephants) cannot kneele nor lye downe, they can doe both.

Capt. John Smith, True Travels, i. 49.

That he might, if possible, allure that Blessed One to cheapen and buy some of his vanities.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, i. Vanity Fair.

In this sense some is very commonly repeated, some . . . some (or, formerly, other some, as in Acts xvii. 18) meaning 'a number . . . others,' or 'the rest.'

Somewhither would she have thee go with her.

Shak., Tit. And., iv. 1. 11.

somital (sô'mi-tal), a. [< somite + -al.] Same as somitic.

somite (sô'mit), n. [< Gr. σῶμα, body, + -ite².] An actual somatome; any one morphological segment of an articulated body, such a body being viewed as composed of a longitudinal series of somites; an arthromere or metamere of an articulate invertebrate or a diarthromere of a vertebrate; such a segment considered with or without the appendages it may possess; in the latter restricted sense, a metamere minus its appendages, or a segment of the soma or trunk without the limbs it may bear. The term sometimes extends to ideal somatomes, or to the metameres of which an organism is theoretically assumed to consist; but it is especially applied to the actual segments of such invertebrates as insects, crustaceans, and worms, whose body-rings are usually evident, though some or other of them may coalesce, as into a cephalothorax, etc. In such cases the primitive or morphological somites are usually recognized and reckoned by their respective pairs of appendages. Separate somites, continued throughout the body, are evident in the rings of earthworms and other annelids. In arthropods the typical number of somites is supposed to be twenty or twenty-one, numbers often actually recognizable. In insects the head is assumed to have six or seven somites, the thorax has normally three (see prothorax, mesothorax, and metathorax), and the abdomen is supposed to have ten or eleven. Each of these somites is invested and indicated by a body-ring or crust of integument, primitively or typically composed of eight sclerites, which may variously coalesce with one another, or with pieces of another somite, or both. Those sclerites which ordinarily remain distinct, and thus can be identified, take special names, as tergite, pleurite, sternite, scutum, præscutum, etc., epimeron, epipleuron, etc. Appendages of somites are limbs in the broadest sense, under whatever modifications; and these modifications are usually greatest at the cephalic and caudal ends of the body, as into eyes, stalks, antennæ, palpi, mandibles, maxillæ, maxillipeds or gnathopodites, etc., of the head, and stings, claspers, or other anal armature. Intermediate somitic appendages are ordinary legs and wings, as of the thorax of insects, and the pereopoda, pleopoda, chelæ, rhipidura, telson, etc., of the thorax and abdomen of crustaceans. In worms such appendages chiefly occur in the form of parapodia (neuropodia and notopodia). See sclerite, and cuts under Amphithoe, Apus, Buthus, Scorpionidae, Blattidae, and Cockroach.

somitic (sô'mit-ik), a. [< somite + -ic.] Having the character of a somite; somatonic; metameric; of or pertaining to somites: as, the somitic divisions of the body; a somitic ring or joint; a somitic appendage.

These septa are metamerically arranged, one for each somitic constriction.

Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 243.

somnambulator (som-nam'bū-lā-tor), n. [< somnambulate + -or¹.] Same as somnambulist. Imp. Dict.

somnambule (som-nam'būl), n. [< F. somnambule = Sp. somnambulo, sonambulo = Pg. somnambulo = It. sonnambolo, somnambulo, < L. somnus, sleep, + ambulare, walk: see amble, ambulate.] A somnambulist.

The owner of a ring was unhesitatingly found out from amongst a company of twelve, the ring having been withdrawn from the finger before the somnambule was introduced.

Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, I, 241.

somnambulic (som-nam'bū-lik), a. [< somnambule + -ic.] Of or pertaining to somnambulism or somnambulists.

I have, however, lately met with well-marked cases of it in two of my own acquaintance, who gave descriptions of their somnambulic experiences.

E. Gurney, in Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II, 68.

somnambulism (som-nam'bū-lizm), n. [= F. somnambulisme = Sp. somnambulismo, sonambulismo = Pg. somnambulismo = It. sonnambulismo; as somnambule + -ism.] The act of walking about, with the performance of apparently purposive acts, while in a state intermediate between sleep and waking. The sleeping condition is shown by the absence of the usual reaction to sense-impressions, and usually by the failure to recall what has been done during the somnambulistic period. With many recent writers, however, the word is used, quite independently of any consideration of movements which the somnambulist may or does execute, as nearly synonymous with trance, mesmerization, or hypnotism, and exactly so with somnolence. It is generally considered under the two main conditions of the idiopathic, spontaneous, or self-induced and the artificial or induced. Compare somnolence. Also called, rarely, noctambulism.

In somnambulism, natural or induced, there is often a great display of intellectual activity, followed by complete oblivion of all that has passed.

W. James, Prin. of Psychology, I, 201.

Somnambulism is, as a rule, a decidedly deeper state than the lighter stage of hypnotism.

E. Gurney, in Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, II, 68.

Manderville, Travels, p. 30.

A black bull, the son of a black cow. Darwin.

2. A male descendant, however distant; hence, in the plural, descendants in general.

Adam's sons are my brethren. Shak., Much Ado, II. 1. 66.

3. One adopted into a family; any young male dependent; any person in whom the relation of a son to a parent is perceived or imagined. Often used as a term of address by an old man to a young one, by a confessor to a penitent, etc.

The child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. Ex. II. 10.

Be plain, good son, and homely in thy drift.
Shak., R. and J., II. 3. 55.

4. A person or thing born or produced, in relation to the producing soil, country, or the like.

To this her glorious son Great Britain is indebted for the happy conduct of her arms. Steele, Tatler, No. 6.

Perhaps e'en Britain's utmost shore
Shall cease to blush with strangers' gore,
See arts her savage sons control.
Pope, Chorus to Brutus, I.

Her [the earth's] tall sons, the cedar, oak, and pine.
Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, vi.

5. A person whose character partakes so much of some quality or characteristic as to suggest the relationship of son and parent: as, sons of light; sons of pride; the son of perdition.

They are villains, and the sons of darkness.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., II. 4. 191.

Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial. Milton, P. L., I. 501.

Every mother's son. See mother.—Favorite son, a statesman or politician assumed to be the especial choice of the people of his State for some high office, especially that of President. [Political slang, U. S.]

son², n. An original spelling of sound.

-son. A form of the termination -tion, in some words derived through Old French, as in benison, malison, renison, reason, season, treason, etc. See -tion.

sonabile (sō-nāb'ē-le), a. [It., < sonare, sound: see sonata.] In music, resonant; sounding.

sonance (sō'nāns), n. [= OIt. sonanza, a sounding, ringing; as sonan(t) + -ce.] 1. A sound; a tune; a call.

Let the trumpets sound
The tucket sonance and the note to mount.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 2. 35.

2. Sonancy.
sonancy (sō'nān-si), n. [As sonance (see -cy).] The property or quality of having sound, or of being sonant; sonant character; sound.

A concise description of voice, then, is this: it is the audible result of a column of air emitted by the lungs, impressed with sonancy and variety of pitch by the larynx, and individualized by the mouth-organs.

Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., iv.

sonant (sō'nant), a. and n. [= F. sonnant = Sp. Pg. It. sonante, < L. sonan(t)-s, ppr. of sonare, sound, make a noise, < sonus, a sound: see sound. Cf. assonant, consonant, dissonant, resonant.] 1. a. 1. Pertaining to or having sound; sounding.—2. In pron., noting certain alphabetic sounds, as the vowels, semi-vowels, nasals, and voiced mutes and fricatives, the utterance of which includes the element of tone, or a vibration of the vocal chords, as a, i, n, b, z, v (the last three as opposed to p, s, f, which are similar utterances without tone); voiced, vocal, intonated (soft and flat are also sometimes used in the same sense).—3. In entom., same as sonorific, 2.

II. n. In pron., a sonant letter.
sonata (sō-nā'tā), n. [= F. sonate (> D. G. Dan. sonate = Sw. sonat) = Sp. Pg. sonata, < It. sonata, a sonata, < sonata, fem. pp. of sonare, sound, < L. sonare, sound: see sound. Cf. sonnet.] 1. In music, in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, any composition for instruments: opposed to cantata. These old sonatas were usually in more than one movement. The character of their themes and their structure varied widely, those called church sonatas tending to grave themes and a contrapuntal treatment, and the chamber sonatas resembling the canzona and the suite.

2. In recent music, an instrumental work, especially for the pianoforte, made up of three or four movements in contrasted rhythms but related keys, one or more of which are written in sonata form. The movements usually include an allegro with or without an introduction, a slow movement (usually adagio, largo, or andante), a minuet or scherzo with or without a trio appended, and a final allegro or presto, which is often a rondo. A certain unity of sentiment or style is properly traceable between the successive movements. The sonata is the most important form of homophonic composition for a single instrument. A sonata for a string quartet is called a quartet, and one for a full orchestra is called a symphony.—Double sonata, a sonata for two solo instruments.—Sonata form, in music, a form or method of composition in which two themes or subjects are developed according to a plan more or less like the following: (a) exposition, containing the first subject, followed by the second, properly in the key of the dominant or in the relative major (if the first be minor); (b) development or working out, consisting of a somewhat free treatment of the two subjects or parts of them, either singly or in conjunction; (c) restatement, containing the two subjects in succession, both in the original key, with a conclusion. The succession of sections and the relations of keys are open to considerable variation, and episodes often occur. The sonata form is distinctive of at least one movement of a sonata or symphony, and usually of the first and last; it also appears in many overtures.

sonatina (sō-nā-tē'nā), n. [It., dim. of sonata: see sonata.] In music, a short or simplified sonata.—Sonatina form, in music, a form or method of composition resembling the sonata form, but on a smaller scale, and usually lacking the development section.

sonation (sō-nā'shon), n. [= It. sonazione; < ML. sonatio(n)-, a sounding, < L. sonare, sound: see sound, v., sonate.] The giving forth of a sound; sounding. [Rare.]

But when what has the faculty of hearing, on the one hand, operates, and what has the faculty of sounding, on the other hand, sounds, then the actual hearing and the actual sounding take place conjointly; and of these the one may be called audition, the other sonation.
Sir W. Hamilton, tr. from Aristotle, Reid's Works, Note D.

Sonchus (song'kus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. sonchus, < Gr. σῶγχος, the sow-thistle.] A genus of composite plants, of the tribe Cichoriaceæ and subtribe Lactuceæ. It is characterized by flower-heads commonly dilated at the base in fruit, with numerous compressed beakless achenes having from ten to twenty ribs and bearing a soft snowy-white pappus which is deciduous in a ring. There are about 30 species, widely diffused throughout the Old World and in Australasia; four species are naturalized as weeds in the United States, two of which are now almost cosmopolitan. They are annual or perennial herbs, having spreading radical leaves and upright stems clad with coarse clasping leaves which are often toothed with soft or rigid spines. The yellow heads are irregularly clustered at the summits of the few branches. The species are fond of barn-yards and moist rich soil, whence the name sow-thistle. S. tenerrimus is eaten as a salad in Italy, and S. oleraceus was once so used in various parts of Europe. (See hare's-lettuce.) The genus is reputed a galactagogue. One or two species with handsome leaves and flowers, from Madeira and the Canaries, are sometimes cultivated under glass. See sow-thistle.

sondryt, a. A Middle English form of sundry.

sonet, adv. An old spelling of soon.

soneri (son'ér-i), n. [Hind. sunahrī, sunahrī, of gold, < sonā, gold.] Cloth of gold: an Indian term adopted as the name of native stuffs interwoven with gold.

song¹ (sōng), n. [Sc. also sang; < ME. song, sang, < AS. sang, song, singing, song, a song, poem, poetry, = OS. sang = OFries. song, sang = MD. sang, D. sang = MLG. sank, LG. sang = OHG. sang, MHG. sanc, G. gesang = Icel. söng = Sw. sång = Dan. sang = Goth. saggws, song; also collectively, OHG. gasang*, kisanch, MHG. gesanc, G. gesang, song; from the verb, AS. singan (pret. sang), etc., sing: see sing.] 1. Singing; vocal music in general; utterance in tones of musical quality and succession, with or without words: opposed to speech and to instrumental music.

For the tired slave Song lifts the languid ear.
Wordsworth, Power of Sound, iv.

2. The musical cry of some birds (see singing bird, under sing) and, by extension, of some other animals.

Trees, branches, birds, and songs were framed fit
For to allure fraile mind to careless ease.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 13.

3. A short poem intended for singing, or set to music; a ballad or lyric. A song is properly distinguished by brevity, free use of rhythmic accent and rime, more or less division into stanzas or strophes, often with a refrain or burden, comparative directness and simplicity of sentiment, and a decidedly lyrical manner throughout.

Out on you, owls! nothing but songs of death?
Shak., Rich. III., iv. 4. 509.

The bard who first adorn'd our native tongue
Tun'd to his British lyre this ancient song.
Dryden, To the Duchess of Ormond with Pal. and Arc.

Perhaps it may turn out a sang,
Perhaps turn out a sermon.
Burns, Epistle to a Young Friend.

4. A particular melody or musical setting for such a poem, for either one or several voices (in the latter case usually called a part-song or glee). Songs are generally written in song form, but are often irregular also. They usually contain but a single movement, and have an accompaniment of a varying amount of elaboration. They are classified as folk-songs, which spring up more or less unconsciously among the common people, or art-songs, which are deliberately composed by musicians (see lied); as strophic, when made up of a movement repeated for the several strophes, or composed through, when the music varies with the successive strophes; or they are named by reference to their general subject or style, as rustic, patriotic, national, martial, naval, nuptial, hunting, bacchanalian, etc.

5. Poetry; poetical composition; verse.

This subject for heroic song
Pleased me. Milton, P. L., ix. 25.

6. A mere trifle; something of little or no value: as, I bought it for a song. [Colloq.]—Comic, Gregorian, melismatic, nuptial, old song. See the adjectives.—Master of song, master of the song. See master.—Song form, in music, a form or method of composition consisting in general of three sections, the first and last being nearly the same, and the second being contrasted with the first.—Song of degrees. See degree.

—Song of Solomon, Song of Songs. Canticles (see canticle).—Song of the Three Holy Children. an addition to the book of Daniel, found in the Septuagint and in the Apocrypha, purporting to be the prayer and song of the three Hebrews in the fiery furnace. A part of it is used in Christian liturgies under the above title, in the Western Church usually under the title Benedicite. See canticle.—Syllabic song. See melismatic song.—To sing another song. See sing. (See also even-song, plain-song.)

song-bird (sông'berd), n. A bird that sings; a singing bird, or songster.

song-book (sông'bûk), n. [*< ME. songbok, < AS. sangbôc, a song-book, music-book, a book of canticles and hymns (= D. zangboek = MLG. sankbok = G. gesangbuch = Icel. söngbók = Sw. sångbok = Dan. sangbog, a song-book), < sang, song, + bôc, book.] 1. A collection of songs or other vocal music forming a book or volume; specifically, a hymn-book.—2. In the Anglo-Saxon church, the portass or breviary.

The song-book corresponded with the Salisbury portous and the Roman breviary.

Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 20.

song-craft (sông'kräft), n. [A mod. revived form of AS. sangcræft, the art of singing, the art of poetry, < sang, song, + cræft, art, craft.] The art of composing songs; skill in versification.

Written with little skill of song-craft.

Longfellow, Hiawatha, Int.

songert, n. [< ME. songere, < AS. sangere (= D. zanger = OHG. sangari, MHG. senger, G. sänger = Icel. söngvari = Dan. sanger = Sw. sångare), a singer, psalmist, < sang, song: see song¹. Cf. singer¹ and songster.] A singer.

songewarlet, n. [ME., *< OF. songewarie, observation of dreams, < songe (< L. somnium), dream, + warir, guard, keep: see ware¹.] The observation or interpretation of dreams.

Ac I haue no sauoure in songewarie, for I see it ofte faille.
Piers Plowman (B), vii. 148.

songful (sông'fûl), a. [< song¹ + -ful.] Disposed or able to sing; melodious. Savage. [Rare.]

songish (sông'ish), a. [< song¹ + -ish¹.] Consisting of or containing songs. [Rare.]

The other, which, for want of a proper English word, I must call the songish part, must abound in the softness and variety of numbers, its principal intention being to please the hearing. Dryden, Albion and Albanians, Pref.

songle (sông'gl), n. [Formerly also songal, songow; a var. of single¹, in same sense.] A handful of gleanings. [Prov. Eng.]

I have just this last week obtained a goodly songle of S. Staffordshire words.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 363.

songless (sông'les), a. [< song¹ + -less.] 1. Without song; not singing.

Silent rows the songless gondoller.

Byron, Child Harold, iv. 3.

2. In ornith.: (a) Not singing; unable to sing; not a singer: as, the female mocking-bird is songless; most birds are songless in winter. (b) Having no singing-apparatus, and consequently unable to sing; not a song-bird; non-oscine; clamatorial or mesomyodian, as a passerine bird: as, the Mesomyodi, or songless Passeres.

songman (sông'man), n.; pl. songmen (-men). 1. A singer, especially a singer of songs; a gleeman.

She hath made me four and twenty nosegays for the shearers, three-man song-men all, and very good ones.
Shak., W. T., iv. 3. 45.

2. A lay vicar. See lay⁴.

song-muscle (sông'mus'f), n. In ornith., any muscle of the syrinx or lower larynx of a bird concerned in the act of singing, by the operation of which the voice is modulated; any muscle of vocalization. These syringeal muscles reach their highest development in number and complexity of arrangement in the Oscines, Polymyodi, or Acronyodi, in which group of birds there are normally five pairs—the tensor posterior longus, tensor anterior longus, tensor posterior brevis, tensor anterior brevis, and sternotrachealis.

There is no question of its being by the action of the syringeal muscles . . . that the expansion of the bronchi, both as to length and diameter, is controlled, and, as thereby the sounds uttered by the bird are modified, they are properly called the Sony-muscles.

A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 29.

song-sparrow (sông'spar'ô), n. 1. The hedge-sparrow, Acceptor modularis. See cut under Acceptor. [Eng.]—2. A small fringilline bird of North America, of the genus Melospiza, a sweet songster, with a streaked brown, gray, and white plumage without any yellow. The best-known is M. fasciata, one of the most familiar birds of the eastern half of the country; there are several other species or varieties in the west, the most distinct of which is the Kodiak song-sparrow, M. cinerea. The common species is 6½ inches long and 3½ in extent of wings, and the markings of the breast are gathered into a characteristic pectoral spot.

It nests on the ground, and lays four or five spotted and clouded eggs. Its song is remarkably sweet and hearty, and the plain little bird is deservedly a great favorite. It is also called silver-tongue.—Oregon song-sparrow, Melospiza fasciata guttata, a western variety of the common song-sparrow.

songster (sông'stêr), n. [*< ME. songstre (f), *< AS. sangestre, sangistre, sangestre, a female singer, < sang, song, + fem. suffix -estre, E. -ster. Cf. songer.] 1. One who or that which sings or is skilled in singing.

Every songster had sung out his fit.

B. Jonson, Neptune's Triumph.

Specifically, in ornith.: (a) A singer; a singing bird. (b) pl. Specifically, singing birds: the Oscines, Cantores, Cantatores, Acronyodi, or Polymyodi. 2. A writer of songs or poems.

Silk will draw some sneaking songster thither.

It is a rhyming age, and verses swarm songstress (sông'stres), n. [< songster + -ess.] A female singer; also, a female singing bird.

At every stall. B. Jonson, An Elegy (Underwoods, Ixi).

The trill . . .

Of that shy songstress, whose love-tale

Might tempt an angel to descend,

While hovering o'er the moonlight vale.

Wordsworth, Power of Sound.

song-thrush (sông'thrush), n. One of the common thrushes of Europe, Turdus musicus; the mavis or throistle, closely related to the mistle-thrush, redwing, and fieldfare. It is 9 inches in length, and 14 in extent of wings. The upper parts are yellowish-brown, reddening on the head; the wing-coverts are tipped with reddish-yellow; the fore neck and breast are yellowish, with brownish-black arrow-heads; the lower wing-coverts are reddish-yellow; and the belly is white. See cut under thrush.

sonification (son-i-fak'shon), n. [< L. sonus, sound, + factio (n-), < facere, produce.] The production of sound; a noise-making; especially, the stridulation of insects, as distinguished from vocalization: as, the sonification of the cicada or katydid.

A mode of sonification . . . similar to that where a boy runs along a fence pushing a stick against the pickets.

Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 307.

sonifer (son-i-fer), n. [< L. sonus, sound, + ferre = E. bear¹.] An acoustic instrument for collecting sound and conveying it to the ear of a partially deaf person. It is a bell or receiver of metal, from which the sound-waves are conducted to the ear by a flexible pipe. E. H. Knight.

soniferous (sô-nif'e-rus), a. [< L. sonus, sound, + ferre = E. bear¹.] Conveying or producing sound.

son-in-law (sun'in-lâ'), n. [< ME. sone in lawe: see son¹ and law¹.] The husband of one's daughter.

sonless (sun'les), a. [< son¹ + -less.] Having no son; without a son.

If the Emperor die son-lesse, a successor is chosen, of such a spirit as their present affairs do require.

Sandys, Travels, p. 133.

sonnet, n. A Middle English form of sun¹.

sonnekin, n. [Early mod. E., later sonkin*, < son¹ + -kin.] A little son. [Nonce-word.]

radiow, sonnekin, or little sonne.

Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 233, note.

Sonneratia (son-e-râ'shi-â), n. [NL. (Linnaeus filius, 1781), named after P. Sonnerat (1745–1814), a French traveler and naturalist.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Lythra-riæ and tribe Lythreæ. It is characterized by flowers having a bell-shaped calyx with from four to eight lobes, as many small petals or sometimes none, numerous stamens, and a many-celled ovary which becomes a roundish berry stipitate in the calyx and filled with a granular pulp. It includes 5 or 6 species, natives of tropical shores, chiefly in eastern Africa and Asia, also in Madagascar and Australia. They are smooth-branched trees or shrubs, with opposite coriaceous oblong entire and almost veinless leaves, and large bractless flowers in terminal clusters of three each or solitary in the axilla. S. apetalâ, a tree of 40 feet, growing in Indian mangrove-swamps flooded by the tide, has the name of kambala (which see). S. acida, with a height of 15 feet, grows in large masses in similar situations ranging further east; its leaves are the food of a silkworm, and its acid and slightly bitter fruit is used as a condiment.

sonnet (son'et), n. [Early mod. E. also sonette; = D. sonnet, < F. sonnet, OF. sonet, a song, =

Song-sparrow (Melospiza fasciata).

Sp. Pg. soneto = It. sonetto, < Pr. sonet, a song (> G. Sw. sonett = Dan. sonet, a sonnet, canzonet), dim. of son, sound, tune, song, < L. sonus, a sound: see sound⁵.] 1. A song; a ballad; a short poem.

I have a sonnet that will serve the turn.

Shak., T. G. of V., III. 2. 93.

Teach me some melodious sonnet,

Sung by flaming tongues above.

R. Robinson, Come, Thou Fount of Every Blessing.

Specifically—2. A short poem in fixed form, limited to fourteen lines with a prescribed disposition of rhymes. The form is of Italian origin. A sonnet is generally written in decasyllabic or five-foot measure; but it may be written in octosyllabics. It consists of two divisions or groups of lines—(1) a major group of eight lines or two quatrains, and (2) a minor group of six lines or two tercets. The quatrains are arranged thus: a, b, b, a; a, b, b, a; the tercets, either c, d, c, d, c, d, or c, d, e, c, d, e. In modern French examples the order of the tercets is generally c, c, d, e, d, e. There are various deviations from the sonnet as thus described; but by purists the above is regarded as the orthodox form, established by long practice and prescription, all others being ranked simply as quatorzains, or what Lamb called fourteeners. With regard to the material of the poem, it is generally considered that it should be the expression of a single thought, idea, or sentiment.

I can best allow to call those Sonnets which are of fourtene lynes, eury line conteyning tenne syllables.

Gascoigne, Notes on Eng. Verse (ed. Arber), § 14.

Cf. sophomore.] A false argumentation devised for the exercise of one's ingenuity or for the purpose of deceit; sometimes, a logically false argumentation; a fallacy. The word is especially applied to certain ancient tricks of reasoning, which before the systematization of logic and grammar had a real value, and were treated as important secrets. For the various kinds of sophism, see fallacy.

This day ne herde I of your tonge a word,

I trowe ye studie aboute som sophyme.

Chaucer, Prol. to Clerk's Tale, l. 5.

Some other reasons there are . . . which seem to have been objected . . . for the exercise of men's wits in dissolving sophisms.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, viii. 4.

The litigious sophism. See litigious. = Syn. A sophism is an argument known to be unsound by him who uses it; a paralogism is an unsound argument used without knowledge of its unsoundness. Paralogism is a strictly technical word of logic; sophism is not. Sophistry applies to reasoning as sophism to a single argument. See fallacy.

sophist (sof'ist), n. [In ME. sophister, q. v.; < F. sophiste = Pr. sophista = Sp. sòfista = Pg. sophista, sòfista = It. sòfista = D. sòfist = G. sophist = Sw. Dan. sòfist, < LL. sophista, a sophist, < Gr. σοφιστής, a master of one's craft, a wise or prudent man, a teacher of arts and sciences for money, a sophist (see def. 2), < σοφίζω, make wise, instruct, in pass. be or become wise, dep. deal or argue subtly, be a sophist, < σοφός, skilled, intelligent, learned, clever, wise; cf. σοφός, clear; perhaps akin to L. sapere, taste, > sapiens, wise: see sapient.] 1. One who is skilled or versed in a thing; a specialist.—2. An ancient Greek philosophic and rhetorical teacher who took pay for teaching virtue, the management of a household or the government of a state, and all that pertains to wise action or speech. Sophists taught before the development of logic and grammar, when skill in reasoning and in disputation could not be accurately distinguished, and thus they came to attach great value to quibbles, which soon brought them into contempt.

Love teacheth a man to carry himself better than the sophist or preceptor.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

The Sophists did not profess to teach a man his duty as distinct from his interest, or his interest as distinct from his duty, but Good conduct conceived as duty and interest identified.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 94.

Hence—3. A captious or fallacious reasoner; a quibbler.

Dark-brow'd sophist, come not anear;

All the place is holy ground;

Hollow smile and frozen sneer

Come not here.

Tennyson, The Poet's Mind.

He is rattling over the streets of London, and pursuing all the sophisticated joys which succeed to supply the place where nature is relinquished.

V. Knox, Essays, vii.

5. To alter without authority and without notice, whether to deceive the reader or hearer, or to make a fancied improvement or correction; alter, as a text or the spelling of a word, in order to support a preconceived opinion of what it was or should be.

How many . . . turn articles of piety to particles of policy, and sophisticate old singleness into new singularity!

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 178.

As to demarcation, following Dr. Webster, they take the liberty of sophisticating Burke, in making him write demarcation.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 298.

II. intrans. To use sophistry; deal sophistically.

We may occasionally see some man of deep conscientiousness, and subtle and refined understanding, who spends a life in sophisticating with an intellect which he cannot silence.

J. S. Mill, Liberty, II.

Some verbose Fourth of July oration, or some sophomorical newspaper declamation.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 435.

Sophora (sɒf'ɒ-rā), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < Ar. sofāra, a yellow plant (applied to one faded), < asfar, yellow: see saffron.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the suborder Papilionaceæ, type of the tribe Sophoreæ. It is characterized by flowers with a broadly obovate or orbicular banner-petal and oblong wings and keel, grouped in terminal racemes or panicles, and followed by thick or roundish or four-winged pods which are constricted into a succession of necklace-like joints (see cut under moniliform), and are usually indehiscent. There are about 30 species, natives of warm regions of both hemispheres. They are trees and shrubs, rarely perennial herbs, and bear odd-pinnate leaves, usually with very numerous small leaflets, but sometimes only a few, and then large and rigid. The flowers are white, yellow, or violet, and highly ornamental. Three species occur within the United States: S. secundiflora, the coral-bean of Texas (see frigoito); S. affinis, a small tree of Arkansas and Texas, with hard, heavy, coarse-grained, yellow and finally red wood, and resinous pods, from which a domestic ink is made; and S. tomentosa, a shrub of the Florida coast, with showy yellow flowers, also widely distributed along tropical shores of America, Africa, and Australia, and abundant on Fiji Island seabeaches, where it is known as kau-ni-aleira, or women's tree. S. tetraptera of New Zealand is there known as la-burnum or kourhai (for its variety Macnabiana, see petu). S. Japonica is the Chinese or Japanese pagoda-tree or yenzu, a very handsome quick-growing tree reaching 60 feet in height, with dark-green younger branches and deep blue-green leaves, sometimes cultivated, especially for its large panicles of small whitish autumnal flowers. Its hard compact wood is valued for turners' work; all parts are purgative; the austere pulp of the pods dyes yellow; and the flowers (called in Chinese scat-fa) furnish a yellow dye greatly valued in China. For this the tree is cultivated in several provinces, from which the dried flowers are exported in small sacks and used to dye blue cloth green, and to dye yellow the silk garments of the mandarins and the rush-mats which form the Chinese sails, beds, bags, and floor-matting.

Sophoreæ (sô-fô-rê-ê), n. pl. [NL. (Sprengel, 1802), < Sophora + -æ.] A tribe of leguminous plants, characterized by a commonly arboreous or high-climbing habit, pinnate leaves of five or numerous leaflets or of a single large leaflet, and flowers with ten free stamens. It contains about 34 genera, of which Sophora is the type, natives chiefly of the tropics, and largely of the southern hemisphere in America and Africa. For other important genera, see Myrozydon and Cladrastis. The latter is the chief genus represented in the United States; another, Camoensia, a lofty-climbing African shrub with handsome and gigantic flowers, is an exception in its trifoliate leaves. See cut under yellow-wood.

sophrosyne (sô-fros'i-nê), n. [Gr. σωφροσύνη, discretion, temperance, < σωφρων, earlier σαφρων, of sound mind, temperate, < σῶς, orig. "σῶς, sound, whole, safe, + φρον, mind.] The quality of wise moderation; sound-mindedness; discreet good sense: referring especially to Greek art and philosophy.

He is much offended that you do stickle and keep on foot such questions, which may be better sopited and silenced than maintained and drawn into sidings and par-takings. Wood, Athenæ Oxon., II. 332.

What could a woman desire in a match, more than the sopiting of a very dangerous claim, and the alliance of a son-in-law, noble, brave, well-gifted, and highly connected? Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xviii.

sopition (sô-pish'on), n. [< sopite + -ion.] The act of sopiting, or putting to sleep; also, the state of being put to sleep; deep slumber; dormancy; lethargy.

As for demutation, sopition of reason, and the diviner particle, from drink, though American religion approve, and Pagan piety of old hath practised it, . . . Christian morality and the doctrine of Christ will not allow it. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., v. 23.

sopor (sô'por), n. [= F. sopor, sopcur = Sp. Pg. sopor = It. sopore, < L. sopor, deep sleep, orig. scapor*, akin to sonnuus, orig. sonnus*, scap-nus*, sleep, = Gr. πνός, sleep: see somnolent, sweren.] A deep, unnatural sleep; lethargy; stupor.

To awaken the Christian world out of this deep sopor or lethargy. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Iniquity, II, Pref. (Encyc. Dict.) soporatè (sô'por-ät), v. t. [L. soporatus, pp. of soporare, put to sleep, stupefy, < sopor, deep sleep: see sopor.] To stupefy; make sleepy.

It would be but a resurrection to another sleep: the soul seeming not to be thoroughly awake here, but as it were soporatèd, with the dull steams and opiate vapours of this gross body. Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 795.

soporiferous (sô-pô-rif'e-rus), a. [= F. soporifère = Sp. soporifero = Pg. It. soporifero, < L. soporifer, sleep-bringing, < sopor, deep sleep, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. Causing or tending to cause sleep; soporific.

The soporiferous medicines . . . are henbane, hemlock, mandrake, moonshade, tobacco, opium. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 975.

2t. Sleepy; somnolent.

Hark! you sluggish soporiferous villains! there's knaves abroad when you are a-bed. Middleton, Phenix, iii. 1.

soporiferously (sô-pô-rif'e-rus-li), adv. In a soporiferous manner; so as to produce sleep. Imp. Dict.

soporiferousness (sô-pô-rif'e-rus-nes), n. The quality of being soporiferous; the property of causing sleep.

soporific (sô-pô-rif'ik), a. and n. [= F. soporifique = Sp. soporifico = Pg. It. soporifico, < L. soporificus*, < sopor, deep sleep, + facere, make.] 1. a. Tending to produce sleep.

The colour and taste of opium are, as well as its soporific or anodyne virtues, mere powers depending on its primary qualities, whereby it is fitted to produce different operations on different parts of our bodies.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiil.

II. n. Anything which causes sleep, as certain medicines.

Nor has rhubarb always proved a purge, or opium a soporific, to every one who has taken these medicines. Hume, Inquiry Concerning Human Understanding, vi.

soporose (sô'pô-rôs), a. [L. sopor, deep sleep, + -ose.] Same as soporous. Imp. Dict.

soporous (sô'pô-rus), a. [L. sopor, deep sleep, + -ous.] Causing deep sleep.

In small synopses it may perhaps rouse the spirits a little, but in soporous diseases it is commonly an uncertain and ineffectual remedy. Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 58.

sopper (sop'ër), n. [< sop + -er.] One who sops or dips in liquor something to be eaten. Imp. Dict.

sopping (sop'ing), a. [< sop, v.] Soaking, soaked, or drenched, as with rain.

soppy (sop'i), a. [< sop + -y.] Wet; soaked; abounding in moisture: as, a soppy day.

It [Yarmouth] looked rather spongy and soppy, I thought. Dickens, David Copperfield, iii.

How damp and cheerless the houses . . . looked in the soppy hollows where the lush meadows were richest! Harper's Mag., LXIX. 339.

soprani, n. Italian plural of soprano.

soprani (sô-prä'nist), n. [< soprano + -ist.] A soprano or treble singer: sometimes used attributively.

Senesino, . . . one of the most famous of the soprani singers who flourished in the last century. Grove, Dict. Music, III. 461.

soprano (sô-prä'nô), n. and a. [= F. soprano = Sp. soprano = D. sopran = G. Sw. Dan. sopran, < It. soprano, the treble in music, lit. high, identical with soprano, sorrano, supreme, sovereign, = Sp. Pg. soberano = F. souverain, > E. sovereign: see sovereign, sorran.] 1. n.; It. pl. soprani (sô-prä'ni), E. pl. sopranos (-noz). 1. In music, the highest variety of the female voice; treble. It ranges easily from about middle C upward two octaves or more, and is characterized by a comparatively thin and incisive quality, usually combined with marked flexibility. Soprano is also the higher voice of boys, and is sometimes accidentally or artificially preserved among men. It is the most important and effective voice for all kinds of solo singing, and is that to which is assigned the chief melody in modern choral music. A voice whose compass and quality are intermediate between soprano and alto is called mezzo-soprano.

2. A singer with such a voice.

Soprano, basso, even the contra-alto, Wish'd him five fathoms under the Rialto.

Byron, Beppo, xxxil.

3. A voice-part for or sung by such a voice.—Natural soprano, a male singer who produces tones of soprano pitch and quality by means of an unusually developed falsetto.—Soprano sfogato. See sfogato.

sora (sô'ri), n. [Also soree.] A crane; a small short-billed rail, of the subfamily Rallinæ and genus Porzana. Specifically, in the United States, P. carolina, the Carolina rail, sora-rail, or soree, which thrives on the marshes of the Atlantic coast in the autumn, furnishes fine sport, and is highly esteemed for the table. It is olive-brown above, varied with black and with many sharp white streaks and spots; the belly is whitish; the vent is rufescent; the lining of the wings is barred with black and white. In the fall the throat and breast are plain brownish, but in breeding-dress these parts are slate-colored, and the face and throat are black. The length is 8 or 9 inches, the extent of wings 12 or 13. Sometimes misnamed ortolan (which see). See cut under Porzana.

sorager, n. [Also sorrage and sorage (as if < sore + age); < F. sorage*, saurage, the first year of a falcon before it has molted, < sor, saur, sore, sorrel: see sore.] 1. In falconry, the period from the time when a hawk is taken from the airy until she mews her feathers.

Sorbonne (sôr-bon'), n. [F. Sorbonne, so named from Robert de Sorbon, its founder.] A celebrated house founded in the University of Paris about 1250 by Robert de Sorbon, chaplain and confessor of Louis IX. The college of the Sorbonne became one of the four constituent parts, and the predominant one, of the faculty of theology in the university. It exercised a high influence in ecclesiastical affairs and on the public mind, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. It was suppressed during the revolution and deprived of its endowments. At the reconstruction of the university under Napoleon I. the building erected for it by Richelieu, and still called the Sorbonne, was given to the theological faculty in connection with the faculties of science and belles-lettres.

sorb-tree (sôr'b-trê), n. Same as sorb, 1.

In lichenol., bearing or producing soredia.

sorediferous (sō-rē'dif'ē-rus), a. [< NL. sore- dium + L. ferre = E. bear¹.] In lichenol., sore- diate; bearing soredia.

soredium (sō-rē'di-um), n.; pl. soredia (-i-ā).
[NL., < Gr. σωρός, a heap, + -edion, for Gr. -idiōn, a dim. suffix.] In lichenol., a single algal cell or a group of algal cells wrapped in more or less hyphal tissue, which serves the purpose of ve-getative propagation: commonly in the plural.
Such cells form little heaps or cushion-like masses breaking through the surface of the thallus, and when set free from the thallus are able to grow at once into new thalli. Usually one species of alga furnishes all the algal cells of a lichen; more rarely two, and then one prevails in abundance over the other. The same species of alga, however, may be found in consortium with different species of fungus, and taking part in the composition, therefore, of differently formed thalli—that is, different lichens. See Lichenes.
Also sorede and brood-bud.

2. Having orbital caruncles, as if sores: as, the sore-eyed pigeon. See cut under sheathbill.

sore-falcon (sō'r-fā'kn), n. [Formerly also soar- falcon, soare faulcon; < sore² + falcon, tr. OF.
faucon sor.] A falcon of the first year; a young falcon. See sore², 1.

Of the soare faulcon so I learne to fly,

That flags awhile her fluttering wings beneath,

Till she her selfe for stronger flight can breath.

Spenser, Hymn of Heavenly Beauty, l. 26.

sore-hawk (sō'r'hāk), n. Same as sore-falcon.

sorehead (sō'r'hed), n. 1. One whose head is sore. Hence.—2. An irritable, discontented person; one who has a real or fancied grievance; in political use, a person who is dissatisfied through lack of recognition or reward for party services. [Slang, U. S.]

Every sore-head and bolter in the Majority voted with his party.

The American, X. 35.

Southwest. C. D. Warner, Little Journey in the World, xv.

soreheaded (sō'r'hed'ed), a. Having the character of a sorehead; discontented; having a grievance. [Slang, U. S.]

sorehont (sō'r'hon), n. [Said to be an Ir. corrupted form equiv. to Sc. sorn, a contracted form of ME. sojorne, a sojourn, as a verb sojourn: see sojourn, sorn.] In Ireland, a tax formerly imposed upon tenants for the maintenance of their lord or his men: a custom which required a tenant to maintain his chieftain gratuitously. See the second quotation.

Yea, and the verve wilde Irish exactions, as Colngnye, Livery, Sorehon, and such like, by which they pole and utterly undoe the poore tenants and free-holders.

Spenser, State of Ireland (ed. Todd).

Sorehon was a tax laide upon the free-holders for certain dayes in each quarter of a yeare, to finde vintnalls, and lodging, and to pay certaine stipends to the kerne, gallo-glasses, and horsemen.

Sir J. Ware, Note in Todd's Spenser.

Sorex (sō'reks), n. [NL., < L. sorex = Gr. ῥαξ, a shrew, shrew-mouse. Cf. Hyrax.] The typical genus of the family Soricidæ and subfamily Soricinæ, containing numerous small terrestrial shrews of both hemispheres. They have from 28 to 32 colored teeth, moderately long well-haired tail and ears, and feet not oared. The typical dentition of Sorex in the most restricted sense is 32 teeth, of which the upper incisors are 8, the (unspecialized canines and) upper premolars 6, the upper molars 6, and the total of the lower teeth 12 (as nearly constant throughout the family). S.
vulgaris is the common shrew of Europe, and S. platyrhri- nus is a common one in North America. See shrew².

sorgho (sō'r'gō), n. Same as sorghum, l. Also sorgo.

sorghum (sō'r'gum), n. [Formerly also sorgum, also sometimes sorgo, sorgho, F. sorgho, < Sp.
Pg. sorgo = It. sorgo, surgo; < NL. sorgum, sor- ghum, < ML. surgum, surcum, suricum, Indian millet, sorghum; prob. of E. Ind. origin.] 1.
A plant of the former genus Sorghum, commonly the cultivated saccharine plant once known as Sorghum (or Holcus) saccharatum, lately considered a variety of S. vulgare, but now classified as Andropogon Sorghum, var. saccharatus.
It is a cane-like grass, with the stature and habit of broom-corn, or of the taller varieties of Indian corn, but more slender than the latter, without ears, and of a glaucous hue. Sorghum is cultivated throughout Africa, in forms called imphoe, chiefly for the sweet juice of the cane. In the United States it has been employed for many years to make syrup, for which purpose it is more or less grown in every State. It has also been the subject of much experiment in sugar-making, and according to Wiley is now practically available for this purpose. The name is also applied to the var. Halepense, and possibly to others of the same species. See def. 2. Also called Chinese sugar- cane.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Micheli, 1729).] A former genus of grasses, of the tribe Andropogoneæ, now included as a subgenus in Andropogon (Edouard Hackel, 1889). Like the rest of the genus, it has one-flowered spikelets disposed in pairs at the joints of a rachis, one of each pair pedicelled, one sessile. The sessile spikelet is in all the pairs alike: the flower is fertile, and in the pedicelled spike-lets male, neutral, or abortive. The rachis is fragile, or in culture tenacious; its joints and the pedicels are filiform, and convex on the back or flat without furrow. The sessile spikelet and grain are somewhat compressed on the back, or in cultivation sometimes nearly globose.
The species are most often tall and flatleaved grasses, diffused through the tropics and here and there in the temperate zone—one, A. (Chrysopogon) nutans, the Indian grass or wood-grass, in the southern United States. The last is widely distributed in many forms; it is a nutritious grass, 6 feet high, with a graceful panicle, sometimes named wild oats. The one important species is A. Sorghum (Sorghum vulgare, etc.), a polymorphous much-cultivated species, of which some varieties have been regarded as distinct.
Hackel divides it into the subspecies—(a) Halepense, including with other varieties the ornamental Aleppo grass and the Johnson or Means grass cultivated in the southern United States, and (b) sativus, which includes the broom-corn (var. technicus), the sorghum (var. saccharatus: see def. 1), the durra (vars. cernuus and Durra), the so-called Indian or African millet (covering perhaps the last and the var. vulgaris), and the guinea-corn or Kafir-corn, if it is different from the durra. The Johnson grass is of considerable utility as fodder, but is difficult to extirpate: also called Egyptian, Cuba, or Guinea grass, Australian or Morocco millet, etc., and sorghum. The durra has been somewhat cultivated in the United States, some forms of it being called Millo maize. See broom-corn, durra, and In- Indian millet (under millet).

sorgo (sō'r'gō), n. Same as sorghum.

sori, n. Plural of sorus.

Soricidæ (sō-ris'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Soric-) + -idæ.] A family of small insectivorous mammals, the shrews. They are of terrestrial, sometimes natatorial, habits, with a long and narrow skull without zygomatic arches or postorbital processes, annular tympanic bones, no symphysis pubis, the fore limbs not specially modified as in the moles, the tibia and fibula united, and the lower teeth 12 (in one genus 12

Sorghum (Andropogon Sorghum).
1, wild form; 2, panicle of same; a, spikelets of cultivated form.

or 14). The lower incisors are long, proclivous, and usually notched; in the upper teeth the median incisors are large, and have a basal snag or cusp, appearing as if double (but see soricident); no canines are specialized, and the molars are variable; the molars are large and multicuspitate. The total number of the teeth varies from twenty-six to thirty-two. The family is well marked, with little range of variation, though the species are so numerous. The shrews are all small animals, some being the smallest known mammals, and have the general appearance of mice, though with more pointed snout. The rather numerous (about 12) genera fall in two groups or subfamilies, Soricinae and Crocidurinae.

soricident (sō-ris'i-dent), a. [L. soric- (soric-), a shrew, + dent (-is) = E. tooth.] Having or noting a dentition like that of shrews. This dentition is unique in some respects. It consists of the four kinds of teeth usual among diphodont mammals, but no canines are specialized as such, and the median pair of incisors both above and below are remarkable in presenting two or more cusps, besides being of great size. These peculiarities, together with the speedy and complete obliteration of the maxillo-premaxillary suture, have caused the median incisors alone to be so named, and have occasioned great uncertainty in the dental formulae of the several genera of shrews. Determination of the position of the suture has shown, however, that several other pairs of teeth besides the specialized median upper pair are inserted in the premaxillary, and are therefore incisors; that the foremost pair of maxillary teeth (technically canines) are never specialized, and always small, and that these are followed by one or two pairs of premolars, constantly succeeded by three pairs of true molars. The constancy in number of the under teeth (twelve, with some anomalous exceptions) is also remarkable, and the total variation is only from twenty-six to thirty-two among all the genera. The eight upper incisors of several genera are a number unique among placental mammals; and the soricident dentition is, on the whole, in proportion to the size of the animals, the most formidable known among mammals, of greater relative power than that of any carnivore. See Soricidae.

Soricident Teeth of Common Shrew (Sorex vulgaris), enlarged seven times.

mx, large two-pronged anterior upper incisor; *mx*¹, *mx*², succeeding upper incisors, to *mx*⁴, line of obliterated maxillo-premaxillary suture; c, first maxillary tooth, technically a canine, unspecialized and resembling the preceding incisor; *pm*¹, minute first premolar; *pm*², large sectorial premolar. In the lower jaw, i, very large serrated anterior incisor; *i*², *i*³, *i*⁴, following teeth to the one opposite *pm*¹; other teeth omitted.

Soricinae (sor-i-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Soric-) + -inae.] The typical subfamily of Soricidae, containing those shrews of both the Old and the New World which have the teeth brown or red: contrasted with Crocidurinae. The genera usually admitted are Sorex, Neosorex, Notiosorex, Soriculus, Blarina, and Crossopus. See Sorex, and cuts under Blarina, shrew, and son-deli.

soricine (sor'i-sin), a. [L. soricinus, of or belonging to a shrew, < sorex (soric-), shrew: see Sorex.] Resembling or related to a shrew or shrew-mouse; of or pertaining to the Soricinae or Soricidae; soricoid in a narrow sense.—Soricine bat, Glossophaga soricina, a small South American species of bat.

soricoid (sor'i-i-koid), a. and n. [L. soric- (soric-), shrew, + -oid.] I. a. Soricine in the broadest sense; of or pertaining to the Soricidae.

II. n. A member of the Soricoidea, as a shrew, shrew-mole, or mole.

Soricoidea (sor-i-koi'dē-ō), n. pl. [NL., < Sorex (Soric-) + -oidea.] A superfamily of mammals of the order Insectivora, containing the two families Soricidae and Talpidae, the shrews and the moles.

soriferous (sō-rif'e-rus), a. [Gr. σωρός, a heap, + φέρω = E. bear.] In bot., bearing sori.

sorites (sō-rī'tēz), n.; pl. sorites. [NL., < L. sorites, < Gr. σωρείτης, σωρείτης, a logical sophism formed by an accumulation of arguments, lit. 'heaper,' < σωρεύω, heap, < σωρός, a heap. In def. 2 first used by Laurentius Valla (died 1457).] 1. A kind of sophism invented by Chrysippus in the third century before Christ, by which a person is led by gradual steps from maintaining what is manifestly false. For example: One grain of sand cannot make a heap; then, if one grain be added to a grain, the one added grain cannot make a heap which was not a heap before; and so on, until it is shown that a million or more grains of sand cannot make a heap.

2. A chain-syllogism, or argument having a number of premises and one conclusion, the argumentation being capable of analysis into a number of syllogisms, the conclusion of each of which is a premise of the next. A sorites may be categorical or hypothetical, like a syllogism, and either variety may be progressive or regressive.—Progressive or Aristotelian sorites. See Aristotelian.—Regressive or Goodenian sorites. See Goodenian.

soritical (sō-rī'tī-kal), a. [LL. soriticus, < LGr. σωρικτός, < σωρείτης, σωρείτης, a sorites.] Pertaining to or resembling a sorites.

sormounter, v. An obsolete variant of surmount.

sorn (sörn), v. t. [Said to be contr. < ME. sojourn, sojourn: see sojourn. Cf. sorehon.] To obtrude one's self on another for bed and board; be an uninvited and unwelcome guest; sponge. [Scotch.]

Lang-legged Hieland gillies that will neither work nor want, and maun gang thiggng and sornng about on their acquaintance. Scott, Rob Roy, xvii.

sornar (sörn'är), n. Same as sorner.

sorner (sörn'är), n. [sorn + -er; ult. a contraction of sojourner.] One who sorns; one who obtrudes himself on another for bed and board; in Scots law, one who takes lodging and food from others by force or menaces without paying for it. This offense was formerly so prevalent in Scotland that the severest penalties were enacted against it, and at one period it was punishable with death.

sorophore (sō-rō-för), n. [*NL. sorophorum, neut. of sorophorus*: see sorophorous.] In bot., the mucilaginous cord or cushion which is emitted from the germinating sporocarp in Marsilea, and which bears the sori arranged in two rows. See cut under Marsilea.

sorophorous (sō-rōf'ō-rus), a. [Gr. σωρός, a heap, + φέρω, < φέρω = E. bear.] Bearing sori.

sororal (sō-rō-räl), a. [L. soror, sister (= E. sister), + -al.] Of or pertaining to a sister or sisters; sisterly.

The sororal relation.

H. Mann.

sororially (sō-rō-ri-äl-i), a. [sororial* for sororal + -ly.] In a sisterly manner. [Rare.]

"This way then, my dear sister," cried Jane to the newcomer, and taking her sororially by the hand, she led her forth from the oak parlour.

T. Hook, The Sutherlands. (Davies.)

sororicide¹ (sō-ror'i-sid), n. [L. sororicida, < soror, a sister, + -cida, < cædere, kill.] One who kills his sister. Blount, Glossographia.

sororicide² (sō-ror'i-sid), n. [LL. sororicidium, < L. soror, sister, + -cidium, < cædere, kill.] The murder of a sister. Bailey, 1727.

sororize (sō-ror-iz), v. i.; pret. and pp. sororized, ppr. sororizing. [L. soror, sister, + -ize: simulating fraternize.] To associate as sisters; be in communion or sympathy as sisters. [Rare.]

The beautiful girls . . . are . . . sororizing with the rustic maidenhoods of their parishes.

Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, II. 8. (Encyc. (Dict.)) sorory (sō-ror-i), n. [L. soror, sister: see sister.] A sisterhood. [Rare.]

While heaven did digne the world should him injoy,

The ninefold Sorory themselves exiled,

Euen from their native home to art's annoy.

Tourneur, Transformed Metamorphosis, st. 68.

sorose (sō-rōs), a. [*NL. sorosus, < sorus, q. v.] In bot., bearing sori.

sorosis (sō-rō'sis), n.; pl. soroses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. σωρός, a heap.] In bot., a fleshy multiple fruit composed of many flowers, seed-vessels, and receptacles consolidated, as in the pineapple, breadfruit, and mulberry.

Sorotrocha (sō-rot'rō-kā), n. pl. [NL. (Ehrenberg), neut. pl. of sorotrochus: see sorotrochous.] An order of Rotifera, containing those wheel-animalcules whose wheel-organ is divided or compound: distinguished from Monotrocha.

sorotrochian (sō-rot'rō-ki-an), a. and n. [L. sorotrochus + -ian.] I. a. Sorotrochous; not monotrochous.

II. n. A rotifer whose wheel is compound or divided; any member of the Sorotrocha.

sorotrochous (sō-rot'rō-kus), a. [NL. sorotrochus, < Gr. σωρός, a heap, + τροχός, a wheel, < τρέχω, run.] Having the wheel-organ divided or compound, as a rotifer; not monotrochous.

sorra, n. See sorrow, n., 4.

sorraget, n. See sorage.

sorrancel, n. Same as sorance.

sorrel¹ (sor'el), n. [Early mod. E. also sorrell, sorel, sorell; < ME. sorrel, < OF. sorrel, F. surelle (ML. surella), sorrel, so named from its sour taste; with dim. -el, < sur, sour, sharp, < OHG. MHG. sūr, G. sauer, sour: see *sour*¹. Cf. AS. sūre (= MLG. sūre = Icel. sūra = (with dim. suffix) D. zuring), sorrel, < sūr, sour: see *sour*¹.] 1. One of several species of the genus Rumex, smaller plants than the docks of the same genus, having the leaves typically halberd-shaped, more or less succulent, and impregnated with oxalic acid. The common sorrel of the Old World is R. acetosa, which has been much cultivated for culinary use. R. scutatus, the French sorrel, is, however, preferred for the purpose, being more succulent and less acid. Sorrel is much grown on the European continent, especially in France. It is used in salads and soups, but is more commonly dressed as a spinach. The use of sorrel in America is slight but increasing. R. acetosella, sometimes substituted for the foregoing, is the common sheep-sorrel. Both plants are refrigerant and diuretic antiscorbutics. See cut under Rumex.

2. A plant of the genus Oxalis, more properly called wood-sorrel (see cuts under Oxalis and obcordate): the name is also extended to other plants of different genera (see phrases).—Climbing sorrel, Begonia scandens, of tropical America, a somewhat shrubby herb climbing by rootlets. [West Indies.]—Field-sorrel. Same as sheep-sorrel.—Indian sorrel. Same as roselle.—Mountain-sorrel. See Oxyria.—Red sorrel. (a) Same as roselle. (b) The sheep-sorrel: probably from the red male inflorescence.—Salt of sorrel. See salt.—Switch-sorrel, a widely diffused tropical shrub, Dodonaea viscosa, of the Sapindaceæ. Its leaves have an acid and bitter taste.—Water-sorrel. Same as water-dock. (See also horse-sorrel.)

sorrel² (sor'el), a. and n. [Early mod. E. sorrell, sorell, sorel; < *OF. sorel, sorell, surrel, dim. of sor, F. saur, saure, brown, reddish, brownish, sorrel: see *sore*².] I. a. Of a yellowish- or reddish-brown color.

Saure, a sorrell colour, also a sorrell horse. Cotgrave.

He is of a middle stature, strong sett, high coloured, a head of sorrell hair, a severe and sound judgement; a good fellow. Aubrey, Lives (Samuel Butler).

sortes (sôr'têz), n. pl. [L. pl. of sor(t)-s, lot, share: see sort.] Lots used in a kind of divination, consisting in the chance selection of a passage from an author's writings—a practice common in ancient times and in the middle ages. The method pursued by the ancients was generally to write a number of verses of a favorite poet on separate slips, put them in an urn, draw out one at random, and from its contents infer good or bad fortune. This form of divination was known as Sortes Homerice, Sortes Virgilianæ, etc., according to the name of the poet from whose works the lines were chosen. Among the Christians of the middle ages the Bible was used for a similar purpose; the book being opened by hazard, or a pin stuck between the leaves, the first passage catching the eye was accepted as prophetic. Such lots were called Sortes Biblicæ or Sacre. This use of the Bible is still common as a popular superstition.

A discourse on health; the art of promoting and preserving health; hygiene. — 2. That branch of theology which treats of the salvation of men through Jesus Christ.

While the doctrines of Theology and Anthropology received a considerably full development during the Patristic and Scholastic periods, it was reserved for the Protestant church, and the modern theological mind, to bring the doctrines of Soteriology to a correspondent degree of expansion. W. G. T. Shedd, Hist. Christ. Doctrine, II. v. i.

sothi, a. and n. A Middle English form of sooth.

sothern, a. A Middle English form of southern, southern.

sothfast, sothfastness, etc. Middle English forms of soothfast, soothfastness, etc.

Sothiac (sō'thi-ak), a. [= F. Sothiaque, < Gr. Σόθιος, an Egyptian name of Sirius.] Connected with Sirius, the dog-star. — Sothiac cycle or period. See cycle.

Sothic (sō'thik), a. [< Gr. Σόθιος, an Egyptian name of Sirius.] Of or pertaining to the dog-star, Sothis. — Sothic year, the fixed year of the Egyptians, determined by the heliacal rising of Sirius. Since the declination of this star is little altered by precession, and its rising took place about the summer solstice, the year would have averaged nearly the sidereal year, or 9 minutes more (instead of 11 minutes less, as the tropical year is) than 365 days. But it is said that in practice one day was intercalated every four years. The Sothic year seems to have been little used by the Egyptians, at least before the Ptolemies.

sotiet, n. [ME., also sotye, < OF. sotie, sottie, folly, foolishness, < sot, foolish: see sot¹.] Folly.

To seen a man from his estate
Through his sotie effeminate,
And leue that a man shall dooe.
Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

sotilt, sotilteet. Middle English forms of subtle, subtlety.

sotnia (sot'ni-ä), n. [< Russ. sotniya, a hundred.] A company or squadron in a Cossack regiment.

A party of Cossacks reached Peschera from Lovatz; one sotnia turned northward and successfully attacked Toros. The other party turned south to Teteven. G. B. McClellan, N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 150.

sotted¹, a. [< ME. sotted; < sot¹ + -ed.] Be-sotted; befooled.

This sotted preest, who was gladder than he?
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 330.

sottery (sot'er-i), n. [< sot¹ + -cry.] Folly.

Episcopacy, and so Presbytery, had indeed . . . suffered very much smut, soyle, darkness, and dishonour by the Tyrannies, Fedities, Luxuries, Sotteries, and Insolencies of some Bishops and other Churchmen under the Papal prevalence. Bp. Gauden, Tears of the Church, p. 12. (Davies.)

sottiet, n. [OF.: cf. sotie.] A species of broad farce, satirical in its aim, popular in Paris in the fifteenth century and the early part of the sixteenth, from which the later French comedy derived some of its elements. The sotties were put down on account of their political effect.

sottiset (sot'is), n. [< F. sotise, sottise, < sot, foolish: see sot¹.] A piece of foolishness; a silly act or action; a stupid thing.

sottish (sot'ish), a. [< sot¹ + -ish¹.] Pertaining to a sot; having the character of a sot. (a) Dull; stupid; senseless; doltish; very foolish. (b) Dull with intemperance; given to tipping and drunkenness; pertaining to drunkenness: as, a man of sottish habits.

sottishly (sot'ish-li), adv. In a sottish manner; stupidly; senselessly; without reason. Glanville.

sottishness (sot'ish-nes), n. The state or character of being sottish. (a) Stupidity; dullness; foolishness.

The King [of Britain], both for his Wives sake and his own sottishness, consulting also with his Peers not unlike himself, readily yields. Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.
(b) Stupidity from intoxication; drunken habits generally.

No sober, temperate person can look with any complacency upon the drunkenness and sottishness of his neighbour. South.

sotto (sot'tō), prep. [It., < L. subter, under, beneath, < sub, under: see sub.] Under; below: an Italian word occurring in a few phrases: as, sotto il soggetto, below the subject; sotto voce, under the voice, in an undertone, aside.

sot-weed (sot'wēd), n. Tobacco. [Rare.]

I scarce had fill'd a pipe of sot-weed,
And by the candle made it hot-weed.
Hudibras Redivivus. (Nares.)

We had every one ramm'd a full charge of sot-weed into our infernal guns. Tom Brown, Works, II. 190.

sotylt, a. A Middle English form of subtle.

sou (sō), n. [F. sou, OF. sol, the name of a coin: see sot², sous, soldo.] An old Roman, Gallic, and French coin, originally of gold, then of silver, and finally of copper. Under Philip Augustus it was of silver, and of the value of twelve deniers. Under succeeding monarchs the value varied much; but twenty sous tournois were equivalent to one livre tournois, and twenty-four sous to one livre parisis. Under Obverse. Reverse.

Sou, 1793.—British Museum. (Size of the original.)

Louis XV. and Louis XVI. the sou was struck in copper, and had an intrinsic value of two deniers twelve grains, though retaining the conventional value of twelve deniers, and this coinage continued until the adoption of the existing decimal system in 1793. The present five-centime piece, twenty of which make a franc, are still popularly called sous. — Sou marqué (F.), an old copper piece worth fifteen deniers (livres); also, in the corrupted form sou marqué, said to be applied in the southern United States to a sou bearing some distinguishing mark, as a sou of 1787 counterstamped RF, or one marked in some way as counterfeit or spurious.

souari (sou-ä'ri), n. [Guiana.] A tree, Caryocar nuciferum (and also one or two other species of the genus), yielding nuts and a wood distinguished by the same name. Also saouari, sou-arri, and sucarrou.

souari-nut (sou-ä'ri-nut), n. See butternut, 2, and Caryocar. Also sucarrou-nut.

soubah, n. See subah.

soubahdar, soubadar, n. See subahdar.

soubise (sō-bēz'), n. [F.] A cravat of a fashion worn by men toward the close of the eighteenth century.

soubrette (sō-bret'), n. [< F. soubrette, fem. of OF. soubret, sober, thoughtful, sly, cunning, dim. of soubre, sobre, sober: see sober.] Theat., a maid-servant in comedy, frequently a lady's-maid. The part is usually characterized by coquetry, pertness, effrontery, and a spirit of intrigue: by extension the term is applied to almost any part exhibiting these qualities.

soubriquet, n. See sobriquet.

soucet. An obsolete spelling of souse¹, souse².

souch, v. A Scotch form of sough¹.

souchet, v. t. [ME. souchen, < OF. souchier, < L. suspicere, suspect: see suspect, suspicion.] To suspect.

Priuell vnperceyued they pleyed to-gedere,
That no seg vynder sunne souchet no gille.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1069.

souchet (sō-shā'), n. [< OF. souchet, dim. of F. souche, souchet, galangal, a stump, stock of a tree: see sock¹ and socket.] The tuber of the rush-nut.

souchong (sō'shong), n. [< F. souchong, < Chinese siao, small, fine, + chung, sort or sorts.] A kind of black tea. Also soochong.

soud¹, v. t. [< ME. souden, < OF. souder, < L. solidare, make solid, < solidus, solid: see solid. Cf. solder.] To consolidate; fasten together; join.

"O martir, souded to virginitee,
Now maystow syngen, folwyng euer-in-oon,
The white Lamb celestial," quod she.
Chaucer, Prioresse's Tale, l. 127.

soud², n. and v. Same as sold².

soud³, interj. A word (supposed to be) imitative of a noise made by a person heated and fatigued. Schmidt.

Sit down, Kate, and welcome.—
Soud, soud, soud, soud!
Shak., T. of the S., iv. l. 145.

soudant, n. An obsolete form of sultan.

Soudanese, a. and n. See Sudanese.

soudaneset, soudanneset, n. Obsolete forms of sultanness.

soudier, n. and v. A Scotch form of solder.

soudiour, n. A Middle English form of soldier.

soufflé (sō'flē), n. [< F. souffler, a blowing sound, < souffler, blow: see soufflé.] In med., a murmuring or blowing sound.—Cephalic, placental, etc., soufflé. See the adjectives.—Cranial soufflé, a low, soft murmur heard on auscultating the skull of infants and anemic adults.

Voices I call 'em; 'twas a kind o' sough

Like pine-trees that the wind's ageth'rin' through.

Lowell, Biglow Papers, 2d ser., II.

2. A gentle breeze; a waft; a breath.

There, a sough of glory

Shall breathe on you as you come.

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

3. Any rumor that engages general attention. [Scotch.]

"I hae heard a sough," said Annie Winnie, "as if Leddy Ashton was nae canny body."

Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xxxiv.

4. A cant or whining mode of speaking, especially in preaching or praying; the chant or recitative characteristic of the old Presbyterians in Scotland. [Scotch.]

I have heard of one minister, so great a proficient in this sough, and his notes so remarkably flat and productive of horror, that a master of music set them to his fiddle.

Burt, Letters, I. 207. (Jamieson.)

To keep a calm sough, to keep silence; be silent. [Scotch.]

"Thir kittle times will drive the wisest o' us daft," said Niel Blane, the prudent host of the Howf; "but I se aye keep a calm sough."

Scott, Old Mortality, xx.

soujee, n. See suje.

souket, r. A Middle English form of suck.

soul¹ (söl), n. [< ME. soule, soule, saule, sawle, saull, < AS. säwel, säwol, säwul, säwl, säul, säwle, life, spirit, soul, = OS. sēola, sēole, siōle, sēle = OFries. siele, sēle = MD. siele, D. ziel = MLG. sēle, LG. sele, sal = OHG. sēla, sēula, MHG. sēle, G. seele = Icel. sála, later sál = Sw. själ = Dan. sjæl = Goth. saiwala, soul (tr. Gr. ψυχή, etc.); origin unknown. The word has been compared with Gr. αἰσός, quick-moving, changeable, and with sea (see seal); also with L. saeculum, age (life, vitality f) (see secle, secular).] 1. A substantial entity believed to be that in each person which lives, feels, thinks, and wills. Animals also, and even plants, have been thought to have souls. Primitive peoples identify the soul with the breath, or something contained in the blood. Separated from the body, it is supposed to have some imperfect existence, and to retain the form of the body as a ghost. The verses of Davies (see below) enumerate most of the ancient Greek opinions. The first is that of Anaximander and of Diogenes of Apollonia; the second is that of Heraclitus; the third is that of Empedocles; the fourth is that attributed to Empedocles by Aristotle; the fifth is that of Democritus and other Pythagoreans, as Simplicius in the "Phaedo"; the sixth is attributed wrongly to Galen; the seventh is that of Democritus and the atomists; the eighth is attributed by some authorities to the Pythagoreans; and the ninth is that of the Stoics. Aristotle makes the soul little more than a faculty or attribute of the body, and he compares it to the "axness" of an ax. The scholastics combined this idea with that of the separability and immortality of the soul, thus forming a highly metaphysical doctrine. Descartes originated distinct metaphysical dualism, which holds that spirit and matter are two radically different kinds of substance—the former characterized by consciousness, the latter by extension. Most modern philosophers hold to monism in some form, which recognizes only one kind of substance. That the soul is immortal is a very ancient and widely diffused opinion; it is also commonly believed that the soul has no parts. A soul separated from the body is commonly called a spirit, not a soul. In biblical and theological usage 'soul' (nephesh, psyche, also rendered 'life') is sometimes used for the non-corporeal nature of man in general, and sometimes, in distinction from spirit, for the lower part of this non-corporeal nature, standing in direct communication with the body, and regarded as the seat of the emotions, rarely of will or spirit. Some theologians minimize the distinction between soul and spirit, making them mere aspects or relations of the same substance, while others have made them distinct substances or distinct entities.

For of the soule the bodie forme doth take;

For soule is forme, and doth the bodie make.

Spenser, Hymn in Honour of Beauty, I. 132.

I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

1 Thes. v. 23.

The word of God is . . . sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit.

Heb. iv. 12.

To hold opinion with Pythagoras

That souls of animals infuse themselves

Into the trunks of men. Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 132.

One thinks the soule is aire; another fire;

Another blood, diffus'd about the heart;

Another saith the elements conspire,

And to her essence each doth give a part.

Musicians think our soules are harmonies;

Physicians hold that they complexion be;

Epicures make them swarms of atomies,

Which doe by chance into our bodies flee.

Some think one generall soule fills every braine,

As the bright sunne sheds light in every starre;

And others thinke the name of soule is vaine,

And that we onely well-mixt bodies are.

Sir J. Davies, Nosce Teipsum.

They [corporations] cannot commit treason, nor be outlawed, nor excommunicate, for they have no souls.

Case of Sutton's Hospital, 10 Coke's Rep., p. 32, b.

Although the human soul is united to the whole body, it has, nevertheless, its principal seat in the brain, where alone it not only understands and imagines, but also perceives. Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), iv. § 189.

Our idea of soul, as an immaterial spirit, is of a substance that thinks and has a power of exciting motion in body by writing or thought.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiii. § 22.

With chemic art exalts the mineral powers,

And draws the aromatic souls of flowers.

Pope, Windsor Forest, I. 244.

It seems probable that the soul will remain in a state of inactivity, though perhaps not of insensibility, from death to the resurrection.

Hartley, Observations on Man, II. iv. § 3, prop. 90.

2. The moral and emotional part of man's nature; the seat of the sentiments or feelings: in distinction from intellect.

Hear my soul speak:

The very instant that I saw you, did

My heart fly to your service.

Shak., Tempest, III. 1. 63.

These vain joys, in which their wills consume
Such powers of wit and soul as are of force
To raise their beings to eternity.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

In my soul I loathe

All affection. Corneille, Task, II. 416.

3. The animating or essential part; the essence: as, the soul of a song; the source of action; the chief part; hence, the inspirer or leader of any action or movement: as, the soul of an enterprise; an able commander is the soul of an army.

Brevity is the soul of wit,

And tediousness the limbs and outward flourishes.

Shak., Hamlet, II. 2. 90.

He had put domestic factions under his feet; he was the soul of a mighty coalition.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

4. Fervor; fire; grandeur of mind, or other noble manifestation of the heart or moral nature.

I have been woo'd by many with no less

Soul of affection.

Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, iv. 4.

Money gives soul to action. Ford, Perkin Warbeck, lii. 1.

There is some soul of goodness in things evil.

Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1. 4.

5. A spiritual being; a disembodied spirit; a shade.

Then of his wretched friend

The Soul appear'd; at every part the form did comprehend His likeness; his fair eyes, his voice, his stature, ev'ry weed

His person wore, it fantasied. Chapman, Iliad, xxiii. 1. 58.

O sacred essence, other form,

O solemn ghost, O crowned soul!

Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxxv.

6. A human being; a person.

All the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were threescore and ten.

Gen. xli. 27.

My lord, this is a poor mad soul; . . . and the truth is, poverty hath distracted her. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 113.

Humph. Where had you this Intelligence?

Tom. From a foolish fond Soul that can keep nothing from me.

Steele, Conscious Lovers, I. 1.

All Souls' day, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., the 2d of November, a day kept in commemoration of all the faithful departed, for the eternal repose of their souls, to which end the mass and offices of the day are directed. It is the day following the feast of All Saints.—Apparitional soul. See apparition.—Commendation of the soul. See commendation, 5.—Cure of souls. See cure.—Descent of souls. See descent.—Seat of the soul, the part of the body (according to some speculators a mathematical point) in immediate dynamic connection with the soul.

As long as the soul was supposed to be a material thing (which was the usual ancient opinion), it was naturally believed to have a distinct place. Later the knowledge of the functions of the nervous system, and their centralization in the brain, showed that the soul was more intimately connected with that than with other parts of the body; and it was vaguely supposed that the unity of consciousness would in some measure be explained by the hypothesis of a special seat of the soul in the brain. The commonest primitive notion was that the soul was resident in the blood or in the heart. Either the whole soul or its parts were also located in the bowels, bones, liver, gall, kidneys, and other organs. The doctrine that the soul is in the brain seems to have originated in Egypt, and found many partial adherents in antiquity, but was not generally accepted before modern times. The Neoplatonists held that the soul is wholly in the whole body and wholly in every part. Descartes placed the soul in the pineal gland, and other physiologists of the seventeenth century located it in different organs connected with the brain. Leibnitz introduced the theory that it resides at a mathematical point, which has found eminent supporters, some of whom regard this point as movable. Others hold that any conception of consciousness which forces its adherents to such a conclusion ought to be considered as reduced to an absurdity. Recent observations concerning multiple consciousness strengthen indications previously known that the unity of consciousness is somewhat illusory; and the anatomy of the brain does not support the notion of an absolute centralization of the power of forming ideas.—Sentient soul, the soul as affected by the senses, or as possessing sentience. = Syn. 1 and 2. Intellect, Spirit, etc. See mind.—4. Ardo, force.

soul^{1†} (söl), r. t. [< ME. soulen; < soul¹, n.] To endure with a soul.

The gost that fro the fader gan procede

Hath souled hem withouten any drede.

Chaucer, Second Nun's Tale, I. 329.

soul² (söl or söl), n. [Also sool; < ME. soule, soule, souel, saule, saulee, food, = Dan. sul, meat eaten with bread.] Anything eaten with bread; a relish, as butter, cheese, milk, or preserves; that which satisfies. [Prov. Eng.]

Maria Egyptiaca eet in thyrty wynter

Bote thre lytel loues [loaves], and loue [love] was her soul.

Piers Plowman (C), xviii. 24.

soul^{2†}, v. [< soul², n.; cf. soil⁴.] To afford suitable sustenance; satisfy with food; satiate.

I haue, sweet wench, a piece of cheese,

As good as tooth may chawe,

And bread and wildings souling well.

Warner, Albion's England, iv. 32.

soul-ale, n. Same as dirge-ale.

Soulamea (sō-lā'mē-ä), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1783), < soulamoë, its name in the Moluccas, said to mean 'king of bitters.'] A genus of polypetalous shrubs, of the order Simarubaceæ and tribe Picramnia, formerly referred to the Polygalaceae. It is characterized by flowers with a three-parted calyx, three linear petals, six stamens, and a two-celled ovary with solitary ovules. There are 2 species, both tropical. They bear long petioled, thin, entire leaves, and axillary spikes of small pedicelled flowers. For S. amara, a shrub or small tree of the Moluccas and New Ireland, see bitter-king.

soul-bell (söl'bel), n. [< soul¹ + bell¹.] The passing-bell.

We call them soul-bells for that they signify the departure of the soul, not for that they help the passage of the soul. Bp. Hall, Apol. against Brownists, § 43.

soul-blind (söl'blind), a. Destitute of the sensation of light and of every image of it.

soul-blindness (söl'blind'nes), n. Defective power of recognizing objects seen, due to cerebral lesion, without actual blindness and independent of other psychic defect.

souldier, souldiour, n. Obsolete forms of soldier.

souled (söld), a. [< ME. souled; < soul¹ + -ed².] Having a soul or mind; instinct with soul or feeling; used chiefly in composition: as, high-souled, mean-souled.

Gripping, and still tenacious of thy hold, Wouldst thou the Grecian chiefs, though largely souled, Should give the prizes they had gain'd before? Dryden, Iliad, l. 185.

soul-fearing (söl'fēr'ing), a. Terrifying the soul; appalling. [Rare.]

Till their [cannon's] soul-fearing clamours have brawled down The flinty ribs of this contemptuous city. Shak., K. John, ii. 1. 383.

soulfret, n. An obsolete variant of sulphur.

soulful (söl'fūl), a. [< soul¹ + -ful.] Full of soul, emotion, or feeling; expressive of sentiment or emotion.

There wasn't a sounding-line on board that would have gone to the bottom of her soulful eyes. C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 58.

soulfully (söl'fūl-i), adv. In a soulful or feeling manner.

soulfulness (söl'fūl-nes), n. The quality or state of being soulful; feeling. Andover Rev., VII. 37.

soulili, n. [Javanese.] One of the sacred monkeys of Java, Semnopithecus mitratus, with a black peaked bonnet suggesting a miter.

soulish (söl'lish), a. [< soul¹ + -ish¹.] Of or pertaining to the soul. Byrom. [Rare.]

The . . . psychical (or soulish) man. J. F. Clarke, Orthodoxy, its Truths and Errors, p. 181.

soul-killing (söl'kil'ing), a. Destroying the soul; ruining the spiritual nature. Shak., C. of E., i. 2. 100.

soulless (söl'les), a. [*< ME. soulles, < AS. sūlleas, sūlleas, soulless, lifeless, irrational, < sūwol, soul, life, + -leas, E. -less.] 1. Having no life or soul; dead.

Their holiness is the very outward work itself, being a brainless head and soulless body. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion (ed. 1605), X. 4. (Latham).

2. Having no soul or spirit.—3. Having or expressing no thought or emotion; expressionless.

Having lain long with blank and soulless eyes, He sat up suddenly. Browning, Paracelsus, iii.

4. Without greatness or nobleness of mind; mean; spiritless; base.

Slave, soulless villain, dog! O rarely base! Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 157.

soullessness (söl'les-nes), n. The state of being without soul, in any sense of that word.

A certain soullessness and absence of ennobling ideals in the national character. The Academy, No. 876, p. 109.

soul-mass (söl'mās), n. A mass for the dead.

soul-massing (söl'mās'ing), n. The saying of masses for the dead.

So doth it cast down all their soul-massing and foolish foundations for such as be dead and past the ministry of God's word.

J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 278.

soul-paper (söl'pā'pēr), n. A paper or parchment bearing an inscription soliciting prayers for the soul of some departed person or persons. Soul-papers were given away with soul-cakes on All Souls' day.

soul-penny (söl'pen'i), n. An offering toward the expense of saying masses for the souls of the departed.

The Dean shall have, for collecting the soul-pennies from the brethren, on the first day, i. j. d. out of the goods of the gild. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 181.

soul-scot (söl'skot), n. [Prop. soul-scat, repr. AS. sāwel-sceat, sāwel-sceat, money paid at the open grave for the repose of the soul, < sāwel, soul, + sceat, money; see soul¹ and scat¹, and cf. scot², shot².] In old eccles. law, a funeral payment, formerly made at the grave, usually to the parish priest in whose church service for the departed had been said; a mortuary. Also soul-shot.

On each side of this bier kneeled three priests, who told their beads and muttered their prayers with the greatest signs of external devotion. For this service a splendid soul-scat was paid to the convent of Saint Edmund's by the mother of the deceased. Scott, Ivanhoe, xlii.

Those among the dead man's friends and kinsfolks who wished had come and brought the soul-shot, as their gift at the offertory of that holy sacrifice. Lock, Church of our Fathers, ii. 306.

soul-shot (söl'shot), n. See soul-scot.

soul-sick (söl'sik), a. Diseased or distressed in mind or soul; morally diseased. [Rare.]

I am soul-sick, And wither with the fear of one condemn'd, Till I have got your pardon. Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, iv. 1.

soul-silver, n. [< soul² + silver.] The whole or a part of the wages of a retainer or servant, originally paid in food, but afterward commuted into a money payment. Halliwel.

soul-sleeper (söl'slē'pēr), n. Same as psychopannychist.

soul-stuff (söl'stuf), n. The hypothetical substance of the soul; psychoplasma. See mind-stuff.

soul-vexed (söl'vekst), a. Disturbed or distressed in spirit. Shak., W. T., v. 1. 59.

soum, sowm (soum), n. [A var. of sum², amount, proportion: see sum².] The proportion of cattle or sheep suitable to any pasture, or vice versa: as, a soum of sheep, as many sheep as a certain amount of pasture will support; a soum of grass or land, as much as will pasture one cow or five sheep. [Scotch.]

soum, sowm (soum), v. i. [< soum, sowm, n.] To calculate and determine what number of cattle or sheep a certain piece of land will support. [Scotch.]—Soum and roum, to pasture (in summer) and fodder (in winter). Jameson.—Souming and rouming, in Scots law, the action whereby the number of cattle to be brought upon a common by the persons respectively having a servitude of pasture may be ascertained. The criterion is the number of cattle which each of the dominant proprietors is able to fodder during winter. Strictly speaking, to soum a common is to ascertain the several soums it may hold, and to roum it is to portion it out among the dominant proprietors.

soun¹, v. An obsolete variant of swoon.

soun², n. and v. An original spelling of sound⁵. sound¹ (sound), a. and n. [< ME. sound, sond, sund, isund, < AS. gesund (= OS. gesund = OFries. sund, sond = MD. ghesond, D. gezond = MLG. gesunt, LG. gesund, sund = OHG. gisunt, MHG. gesunt, G. gesund = Sw. Dan. sund), sound; < ge-, a collective and generalizing prefix (see i-), + sund*, of uncertain origin, perhaps akin to L. sanus, whole, sound: see sane¹.] 1. Healthy; not diseased; having all the organs and faculties complete and in perfect action: as, a sound mind; a sound body.

Et horn child is hol and sund, And Athulf bithute (without) wund. King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

Though he falle, he falleth nat bote as ho fulle in a bote, That ay is saf and sounde that sitteth with yune the borde. Piers Plowman (C), xi. 40.

Universal distrust is so unnatural, indeed, that it never prevails in a sound mind. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 101.

2. Whole; uninjured; unburnt; unutilized; not lacerated or bruised: as, a sound limb.

Thou dost breathe; Hast heavy substance; bleed'st not; speak'st; art sound. Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 52.

3. Free from special defect, decay, or injury; unimpaired; not deteriorated: as, a sound ship; sound fruit; a sound constitution.

Look that my staves be sound, and not too heavy. Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 66.

Her timbers yet are sound, And she may float again. Couper, Loss of the Royal George.

A cellar of sound liquor, a ready wit, and a pretty daughter. Scott, Kenilworth, i.

4. Morally healthy; honest; honorable; virtuous; blameless.

In the way of loyalty and truth Toward the king, my ever royal master, Dare mate a sounder man than Surrey can be. Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2. 274.

5. Without defect or flaw in logic; founded in truth; firm; strong; valid; that cannot be refuted or overthrown: as, a sound argument.

About him were a press of gaping faces, Which seem'd to swallow up his sound advice. Shak., Lucrece, l. 1409.

Rules of life, sound as the Time could bear. Wordsworth, Off Saint Bees' Heads.

6. Right; correct; well-founded; free from error; pure: as, sound doctrine.

It is out of doubt that the first state of things was best, that in the prime of Christian religion faith was soundest. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iv. 2.

Hold fast the form of sound words. 2 Tim. i. 13.

7. Reasoning accurately; logical; clear-minded; free from erroneous ideas; orthodox.

Who shall decide when doctors disagree, And soundest casuists doubt, like you and me? Pope, Moral Essays, iii. 2.

A kick that scarce would move a horse May kill a sound divine. Couper, Yearly Distress.

8. Founded in right and law; legal; not defective in law: as, a sound title; sound justice.

They reserved their titles, tenures, and signories whole and sound to themselves. Spenser, State of Ireland.

Here by equity we mean nothing but the sound interpretation of the law. Blackstone, Comm., III. xxvii.

9. Unbroken and deep; undisturbed: said of sleep.

Let no man fear to die: we love to sleep all, And death is but the sounder sleep. Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, iii. 6.

New waked from soundest sleep, Soft on the flow'ry herb I found me laid In balmy sweat. Milton, P. L., viii. 253.

10. Thorough; complete; hearty.

The men . . . give sound strokes with their clubs where-with they fight. Abp. Abbot.

11. Of financial condition, solvent; strong; not undermined by loss or waste: as, that bank is one of our soundest institutions.—As sound as a roach. See roach².—Sound and disposing mind and memory, in the law of wills. See memory.—Sound mind. See insanity.—Sound on the goose. See goose.—Syn. 1. Hearty, hale, hardy, vigorous.—3. Entire, unbroken, undecayed.—5 and 7. Sane, rational, sensible.

II. n. Safety. [Rare.]

Our goddis the gouerne, & soche grace lene That thou the victorie wyn, thi worship to saue, And to this title in sound thi seluyn may come. Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 6135.

sound¹ (sound), v. [< ME. sounden; < sound¹, a.] 1. trans. To heal; make sound.

Further wol I never founde Non other help, my sores for to sounde. Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 242.

II. intrans. To become sound; heal.

Thro girt with mony a wounde, That lykly ar never for to sounde. Lydgate, Complaint of the Black Knight, l. 292.

sound¹ (sound), adv. [< sound¹, a.] Soundly; heartily; thoroughly; deeply: now used only of sleeping.

So sound he slept that nought nought him awake. Spenser, F. Q., i. l. 42.

Till he tell the truth, Let the supposed fairies pinch him sound. Shak., M. W. of W., iv. 4. 61.

Every soul throughout the town being sound asleep before nine o'clock. Irring, Knickerbocker, p. 175.

sound² (sound), n. [*< ME. sound, sund, < AS. sund, a sound, a strait of the sea (= MD. sond, sund, D. sond, sont, zond = MHG. G. sund = Icel. Sw. Dan. sund, a sound), also, in AS. and Icel., swimming; contracted from orig. sūmund, < swimman (pp. swimmen), swim: see swim. Cf. sound³.] A narrow passage of water not a stream, as a strait between the mainland and an isle, or a strait connecting two seas, or connecting a sea or lake with the ocean: as, Long Island Sound; the Sound (between Denmark and Sweden).

Behold, I come, sent from the Stygian sound, As a dire vapour. B. Jonson, Catiline, l. 1.

And, with my skates fast-bound, Skimmed the half-frozen Sound. Longfellow, Skeleton in Armor.

Sound dues. See due¹.

sound³ (sound), n. [< ME. sounde; cf. Icel. sunl-magi, the sound of a fish, lit. 'swimming-maw': see sound² and maw¹.] In zool.: (a) The swimming-bladder or air-bladder of a fish. The sound is a hollow vesicular organ, originating from the digestive tract—in fact, a rudimentary lung, the actual homologue of the lungs of air-breathing vertebrates, though in fishes, as in other branchiata, respiration is effected by gills. (See air-bladder.) Some fishes' sounds are an esteemed article of food, as that of the cod, which when fried is something like an oyster so cooked; others are valuable as a source of isinglass.

Sounds of a fissahe, cannon. Palegrave. (Halliwell.)
Of [fishes'] sounds we make isinglass.

Goldsmith, Int. to Brooke's Nat. Hist., III.

(b) A cuttlefish.

sound⁴ (sound), v. [*Early mod. E. also sounde; < ME. souden (= D. sonderen = G. sondiren = Sw. sondera = Dan. sondere), < OF. (and F.) sonder = Sp. Pg. sondar, sound; (a) perhaps < MD. sond, sund = AS. sund = Icel. Sw. Dan. sund, a strait, sound (cf. AS. sund-gyrd, a sounding-rod, sund-line, a sounding-line: see sound²); (b) otherwise perhaps < L. subundare, submerge: see sub- and ound, undulate.] I. trans. 1. To measure the depth of; fathom; try or test, as the depth of water and the quality of the ground, by sinking a plummet or lead attached to a line on which is marked the number of fathoms. Machines of various kinds are also used to indicate the depth to which the lead has descended. A cavity in the lower end of the lead is partially filled with Apparatus used in Sounding.

A, B, C, Brooke's Deep-sea Sounding-apparatus: a, rod with horns b pivoted thereto; c, sounding-line; d, wires by which the lead e is attached to the horns, connected with a washer f under the lead; A, opening in lower end of rod, by which specimens of the bottom may be secured. When the rod strikes the bottom, the lead slides downward, bringing the horns into the position shown in B, and releasing the wires d and the lead; the rod only is then drawn up, leaving the lead at the bottom.

D, E, British Navy Sounding-apparatus: a, lead; b, counterpoised books which engage the loop at the top of the lead; c, wedge-shaped cup for specimens, attached by cord or wire to the pivot of the hooks; e, attachment for the sounding-line or wire. When the cup d touches bottom, the hooks b drop into the position shown in E; the sinker or lead then drops over, releasing the cup, and this, with its specimen and the hooks, is drawn to the surface.

tallow, by means of which some part of the earth, sand, gravel, shells, etc., of the bottom adhere to it and are drawn up. Numerous devices are in use for testing the nature of the bottom, as a pair of large forceps or scoops carried down by a weight, which are closed when they

a and b, arms pivoted to c; d, lead, which is attached to a stem at the top of which is a crosspiece. When the arms are raised into the position shown in A, the crosspiece engages them and holds them in that position till the lead strikes the bottom; they are then released, and fall into the position shown in B. The cups (shown in the cuts), on closing, scoop up a specimen of the bottom.

strike the ground, and so inclose some of the sand, shells, etc., a cup at the bottom of a long leaden weight, which is closed by a leathern cover when full, etc. See the accompanying cuts of apparatus used in sounding. Brooke's apparatus is said to be the first by which soundings of over 2,000 fathoms were made and specimens of the bottom obtained.

Go sound the ocean, and cast your nets;
Happily you may catch her in the sea.

Shak., Tit. And., iv. 3. 7.

Two plummetts dropt for one to sound the abyss.
Tennyson, Princess, II.

2. In surg., to examine by means of a sound or probe, especially the bladder, in order to ascertain whether a stone is present or not.

By a precious oyle Doctor Russell at the first applied to it when he sounded it with probe (ere night) his tormenting paine was . . . well asswaged.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 179.

3. Figuratively, to try; examine; discover, or endeavor to discover, that which is concealed in the mind of; search out the intention, opinion, will, or wish of.

It is better to sound a person with whom one deals, afar off, than to fall upon the point at first, except you mean to surprise him by some short question.

Bacon, Negotiating (ed. 1887).

I have sounded him already at a distance, and find all his answers exactly to our wish.

Goldsmith, Good-natured Man, II.

4. To ascertain the depth of (water) in a ship's hold by lowering a sounding-rod into the pumpwell.—5. To make a sounding with, or carry down in sounding, as a whale the tow-line of a boat.—To sound a line, to sound all lines. See *line*².

II. intrans. 1. To use the line and lead in searching the depth of water.

I sounde, as a schyppe man soundeth in the see with his plummett to knowe the depeth of the see. Je pilote.

Palegrave, p. 728.

The shipmen . . . sounded, and found it twenty fathoms. Acts xxvii. 27, 28.

2. To penetrate to the bottom; reach the depth.

For certes, lord, so sore hath she me wounded
That stood in blake, with lokynge of hire eighen,
That to myn hertis botme it is ysounded.

Chaucer, Troilus, II. 535.

3. To descend to the bottom; dive: said of fish and other marine animals. When a sperm-whale sounds, the fore parts are lifted a little out of water, a strong spout is given, the nose is dipped, the back and small are rounded up, the body bends on a cross-axis, the flukes are thrown up 20 or 30 feet, and the whale goes straight down head first, in less than its own length of water.

sound⁴ (sound), n. [= D. G. Dan. sonde = Sw. sond, < F. sonde, a probe, a sounding-lead, = Sp. Pg. sonda, a sound; from the verb: see sound⁴, v.] In surg., any elongated instrument, usually metallic, by which cavities of the body are sounded or explored; a probe; specifically, an instrument used for exploring or dilating the urethra, or for searching the bladder for stone.

sound⁵ (sound), n. [< ME. sounde (with ex-crescent d), soun, soun, sowne, son, < OF. soun, son, sun, F. son = Pr. son, so = Sp. son = Pg. som = It. suono = Icel. sönn, a sound, < L. sonus, a sound; cf. Skt. svana, sound, < svan, sound. Cf. sound⁶, v., and see assontant, consonant, dissonant, resonant, person, parson, re-sound, sonata, sonnet, sonorous, sonant, uni-son, etc.] 1. The sensation produced through the ear, or organ of hearing; in the physical sense, either the vibrations of the sounding-body itself, or those of the air or other medium, which are caused by the sounding-body, and which immediately affect the ear. A musical sound, or tone, is produced by a continued and regular series of vibrations (or, in the physical sense, may be said to be these vibrations themselves); while a noise is caused either by a single impulse, as an electrical spark, or by a series of impulses following at irregular intervals. A sounding-body is a body which is in such a state of vibration as to produce a sound (see vibration). Thus, a tuning-fork, a bell, or a piano-string, if struck, will, in consequence of its elasticity, continue to vibrate for some time, producing, in the proper medium, a sound; similarly, the column of air in an organ-pipe becomes a sounding-body when a current of air is continually forced through the mouthpiece past the lip; again, an inelastic body, as a card, may become a sounding-body if it receives a series of blows at regular intervals and in sufficiently rapid succession, as from the teeth of a revolving cog-wheel. The vibrations of the sounding-body are conveyed to the ear by the intervening medium, which is usually the air, but may be any other gas, a liquid (as water), or an elastic solid. The presence of such a medium is essential, for sound is not propagated in a vacuum. The vibrations of the sounding-body, as a tuning-fork, produce in the medium a series of waves (see wave) of condensation and rarefaction, which are propagated in all directions with a velocity depending upon the nature of the medium and its temperature—for example, the velocity of sound in air is about 1,090 feet per second at 32° F. (0° C.), and increases slightly as the temperature rises; in other gases the velocity varies inversely as the square root of the density; it is consequently nearly four times as great in hydrogen. In liquids the velocity is greater than in air—for water, somewhat more than four times as great. In solids the velocity varies very widely, being relatively small in inelastic substances like wax and lead, and very great (two to three miles per second) in wood and steel. Sound-waves may differ (1) in their wavelength—that is, in the number of vibrations per second; (2) in the amplitude of the motion of the particles forming them; and (3) in their form, as to whether they are simple, and consist of a single series of pendulum-like vibrations, or are compound, and formed of several such series superimposed upon each other. Corresponding to these differences in the sound-waves, the sounds perceived by the ear differ in three ways: (1) They differ in pitch. If the sound-waves are long and the number of vibrations few per second, the pitch is said to be low and the sound is called grave; as the number of vibrations increases, the pitch is said to rise and the sound to be higher; if the number of vibrations is very great and the length of the waves correspondingly small, the sound becomes shrill and piercing. It is found that the vibrations must be as numerous as 24 per second in order that the ear may be able to unite them as a continuous sound. Similarly, if the vibrations exceed 30,000 to 40,000 per second, they cease to produce any sensation upon the ear. (2) Sounds differ in intensity or loudness. Primarily the intensity of the sound depends upon the amplitude of the vibrations; it diminishes with the square of the distance from the sounding-body; it also diminishes as the density of the air or other medium decreases, and is increased by the proximity of a sonorous body which can vibrate in unison with it. (3) Sounds differ in quality or timbre, that property by which we distinguish between the same tone as sounded upon two different musical instruments, as a piano and a violin. This difference is due to the fact that a note produced by a musical instrument is in general a compound note, consisting of the fundamental note, the pitch of which the ear perceives, and with it a number of higher notes of small intensity whose vibrations as compared with the fundamental note are usually as the numbers 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, etc. These upper notes, harmonics or over-tones (see harmonic), blend with the fundamental note, and upon their number and relative intensity, consequently, the resultant combined effect upon the ear, or the quality of the note, depends. Sound-waves may, like light-waves, be reflected from an opposing surface (see reflection, echo, resonance); they may be refracted, or suffer a change of direction, in passing from one medium to another of different density; they may suffer diffraction; and they may also suffer interference, giving rise to the pulsations of sounds called beats. See beat, 7.

2. A particular quality or character of tone, producing a certain effect on the hearer, or suggesting a particular cause; tone; note; as, a joyful sound; a sound of woe.

There is a sound of abundance of rain. 1 KI. xviii. 41.

Doug. That's the worst tidings that I hear of yet.

Wor. Ay, by my faith, that bears a frosty sound. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iv. 1. 128.

The sound of a sea without wind is about them. Swinburne, Hesperia.

3. Vocal utterance.

'Tis not enough no harshness gives offence,
The sound must seem an echo to the sense.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 365.

4. Hearing-distance; ear-shot.

Sooner shall grass in Hyde-park Circus grow,
And wits take lodgings in the sound of Bow.
Pope, R. of the L., iv. 118.

5. Empty and unmeaning noise.

Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, Signifying nothing. Shak., Macbeth, v. 5. 27.

6. Same as signal, 2.—Anacampitic sounds. See anacampitic.—Blood-sounds, in auscultation, anemic murmurs.—Bronchial sound, the normal bronchial breathing-sound.—Cardiac sounds, the heart-sounds.—Characteristic sound. See characteristic letter, under characteristic.—Cogged breath-sound. See breath-sound.—Friction sound. See friction-sound.—Refraction of sound. See refraction.—Respiratory sounds. See respiratory.—To read by sound, in telegraph. See read, 1.—Syn. 1. Noise, Sound, Tone. Noise is that effect upon the ears which does not convey, and is not meant to convey, any meaning: as, the noise made by a falling chimney; street noises. Sound is a general word, covering noise and intelligible impressions upon the auditory nerves: as, the sound of cannon, of hoofs, of a trumpet, of prayer. Tone is sound regarded as having a definite place on the musical scale, or as modified by feeling or physical affections, or as being the distinctive quality of sound possessed by a person or thing permanently or temporarily: as, his tones were those of anger; a piano of peculiarly rich tone. For technical distinctions, see def. 1 above, noise, and tone.

sound⁶ (sound), v. [< ME. soudnen, sounen, sounen, sunen, < OF. suner, soner, F. sonner = Pr. Sp. sonar = Pg. soar = It. sonare (= Icel. söna), < L. sonare, sound, < sonus, a sound: see sound⁵, n.] I. intrans. 1. To produce vibrations affecting the ear; cause the sensation of sound; make a noise; produce a sound; also, to strike the organs of hearing with a particular effect; produce a specified audible effect: as, the wind sounds melancholy.

Ther herde I pleyen on an harpe,
That sounded bothe wel and sharpe,
Orpheus ful craftely.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 1202.

O earth, that soundest hollow under me.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

2. To cause something (as an instrument) to sound; make music.

The singers sang, and the trumpeters sounded.
2 Chron. xxix. 28.

3. To seem or appear when uttered; appear on narration: as, a statement that sounds like a fiction.

How oddly will it sound that I Must ask my child forgiveness!
Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 197.

All this is mine but till I die;
I can't but think 'twould sound more clever
To me and to my heirs for ever.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. vi. 11.

Your father never dropped a syllable which should sound toward the asking me to assist him in his adversity.
Godwin, Fleetwood, xix.

4. To be conveyed in sound; be spread or published.

From you sounded out the word of the Lord.
1 Thea. I. 8.

5. To tend; incline. [Now rare.]

Alle hire wordes moore and lesse, Sounynge in vertu and in gentillesse.
Chaucer, Physician's Tale, l. 54.
 Seyng any thyng sounynge to treson.
Paston Letters, l. 183.

All such thingis as soune wyth or ayenst the common wele.
Arnold's Chron., p. 88.

6†. To resound.

The shippes hereupon discharge their Ordinance, . . .
 insomuch that the tops of the hilles sounded therewith.
Hakluyt's Voyages, l. 245.

To sound in damages, in law, to have as its object the recovery of damages: said of an action brought, not for the recovery of a specific thing, as replevin or an action of debt, but for damages only, as for trespass, etc.

II. trans. 1. To cause to produce sound; set in audible vibration.

A baggepipe wel coude he blowe and soene.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 565.

I have sounded the very base-string of humility.
Shak., l. Hen. IV., ll. 4. 6.

2. To utter audibly; pronounce; hence, to speak; express; repeat.

But now to yow rehersen al his speche,
 Or al his woful wordes for to soene.
Chaucer, Troilus, ll. 573.

Then I, as one that am the tongue of these,
 To sound the purposes of all their hearts.
Shak., K. John, iv. 2. 48.

The Arab by his desert well
 . . . hears his single camel's bell Sound welcome to his regal quarters.
Whittier, The Haschish.

3. To order or direct by a sound; give a signal for by a certain sound: as, to sound a retreat.

To sound a parley to his heartless foe.
Shak., Lucerne, l. 471.

4. To spread by sound or report; publish or proclaim; celebrate or honor by sounds.

Thou sun, of this great world both eye and soul,
 Acknowledge him thy greater; sound his praise.
Milton, P. L., v. 171.

She loves aloft to sound
 The Man for more than Mortal Deeds renown'd.
Congreve, Pindaric Odes, ll.

5. To signify; import. [A Latinism.]

Hise reasons he spak ful solemnly.
Sounynge alway thenceures of his wyning.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 270.

If you have ears that will be pierced—or eyes
 That can be opened—a heart that may be touched—
 Or any part that yet sounds man about you.
B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 6.

The cause of divorce mentioned in the law is translated "some uncleanness," but in Hebrew it sounds "nakedness of aught, or any real nakedness." Milton, Divorce, l.

6. To examine by percussion, as a wall in order to discover hollow places or studding; specifically, in med., to examine by percussion and auscultation, in order to form a diagnosis by means of sounds heard: as, to sound the lungs.

sound⁶ (sound). An obsolete or dialectal contracted form of sound, swoun.

soundable (soun'da-bl), a. [*sound*⁴ + -able.] Capable of being sounded.

soundboard (soun'dbôrd), n. 1. In musical instruments, a thin resonant plate of wood so placed as to enhance the power and quality of the tones by sympathetic vibration. In the piano-forte it is placed just under or behind the strings; in the pipe-organ it forms the top of the wind-chest in which the pipes are inserted; in the violin, guitar, etc., it is the same as the belly—that is, the front of the body. Great care is exercised in the selection and treatment of the wood for soundboards, which is either pine or spruce-fir. Also sounding-board. See cut under harp.

2. Same as sounding-board, 1. See cut under abat-voix.—Pedal soundboard. See pedal.

sound-boarding (soun'dbôr'ding), n. In carp., short boards which are disposed transversely between the joists, or fixed in a partition for holding the substance called pugging, intended to prevent sound from being transmitted from one part of a house to another.

sound-body, sound-box, sound-chest (soun'd-bod'i, -boks, -chest), n. Same as resonance-box.

sound-bone (soun'dbôn), n. [*sound*³ + bone.] The bone of a fish lying close to the sound or air-bladder. It is a part of the backbone, consisting of those vertebrae collectively which are ordinarily cut out in one piece in splitting the fish.

sound-bow (soun'dbô), n. The thickened edge of a bell against which the clapper strikes. In stating the proportions of a bell, the thickness of the sound-bow is usually taken as a unit.

sound-deafness (soun'def'nes), n. Deafness to sound of every pitch or quality, as distinguished from pitch-deafness and timbre-deafness.

sounder¹ (soun'dër), n. [Early mod. E. also sunder, < ME. soundre, < AS. sunor, a herd.] 1. A herd of wild swine.

That men calleth a trip of a tame swyn is called of wyldde swyn a soundre: that is to say, 3if ther be passyd v. or vij. togedres.
M.S. Bodl., 546. (Hallivell.)

 From the sounder of the swyne theine departyth he.
Book of St. Alban's (ed. 1496), sig. d., i.

2. A young wild boar: an erroneous use.

It had so happened that a sounder (i. e., in the language of the period, a boar of only two years old) had crossed the track of the proper object of the chase.

Scott, Quentin Durward, ix.
 Such then were the pigs of Devon, not to be compared with the true wild descendant, . . . whereof many a sounder still grunted about Swinley down.

Kingdely, Westward Ho, viii.

sounder² (soun'dër), n. [*sound*⁴ + *-er*1.] A sounding-machine.—Flying sounder, an apparatus, devised by Thomson, for obtaining deep-sea soundings, at a moderate depth, without rounding to or reducing speed. With this sounding-machine a sounding was made at a depth of 130 fathoms while the steamer was moving at the rate of 16 knots an hour.

sounder³ (soun'dër), n. [*sound*⁵ + *-er*1.] That which sounds; specifically, in teleg., a receiving-instrument in the use of which the message is read by the sound produced by the armature of the electromagnet in playing back and forth between its stops.

sound-figures (soun'dfig'ürz), n. pl. Chladni's figures. See nodal lines, under nodal.

sound-hole (soun'dhöl), n. In musical instruments of the viol and lute classes, an opening in the belly or soundboard, so shaped and placed as to increase its elasticity and thus its capacity for sympathetic vibration. In the modern violin and similar instruments there are two sound-holes, placed on each side of the bridge; they are usually called the f-holes, from their shape.

sounding¹ (soun'ding), n. [ME. soundynge, soundynge, sounynge; verbal n. of *sound*⁴, v.] 1. The act or process of measuring the depth of anything; exploration, as with a plummet and line, or a sound.—2. The descent of a whale or of a fish to the bottom after being harpooned or hooked.—3. pl. The depth of water in rivers, harbors, along shores, and even in the open seas, which is ascertained in the operation of sounding. The term is also used to signify any place or part of the ocean where a deep sounding-line will reach the bottom; also, the kind of ground or bottom where the line reaches. Soundings on English and American charts are expressed in fathoms, except in some harbor-charts where they are in feet. See deep-sea.—In or on soundings. (a) So near the land that a deep-sea lead will reach the bottom. (b) In comparatively shoal water: said of a whale in the Arctic Ocean, Bering Sea, Sea of Okhotsk, or in bays, lagoons, etc., whose depths may be readily fathomed.—To get on or off soundings, to get into or beyond water where the bottom can be touched by sounding; figuratively, to enter into a subject or topic which one is or is not competent to discuss.—To strike soundings, to find bottom with the deep-sea lead.

sounding² (soun'ding), n. [ME. soundynge; verbal n. of *sound*⁵, v.] The act of producing a sound or a noise; also, a sound or a noise produced; specifically, in music, compare *sound*⁵, v. i., 2.

Musicians have no gold for sounding.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 5. 143.

The Stage.
 After the second sounding [of the music].
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, Ind.

sounding² (soun'ding), p. a. [Ppr. of *sound*⁵, v.] 1. Causing or producing sound; sonorous; resounding; making a noise.

Ay me! whilst thee the shores and sounding seas
 Wash far away.
Milton, Lycidas, l. 154.

2. Having a magnificent or lofty sound; hence, bombastic: as, mere sounding phrases.

Keep to your subject close in all you say;
 Nor for a sounding sentence ever stray.
Dryden and Soames, tr. of Boileau's Art of Poetry, l. 182.

sounding-board (soun'ding-bôrd), n. 1. A canopy over a pulpit, etc., to direct the sound of a speaker's voice toward the audience. See abat-voix. Also soundboard.

Since pulpits fail, and sounding-boards reflect
 Most part an empty, ineffectual sound.
Cowper, Task, iii. 21.

2. In building, a board used in the deafening of floors, partitions, etc. See sound-boarding.

3. Same as soundboard, 1.

sounding-bottle (soun'ding-bot'l), n. A vessel for raising water from a great depth for examination and analysis. It is generally made of wood, and has valves opening upward in the top and bottom. It is fixed on the sounding-line over the lead, so that the water passes through it as the line descends; but when it is drawn up the force of gravity closes the valves, thus retaining the contents. It often contains a thermometer for showing the temperature below the surface.

sounding-lead (soun'ding-led), n. The weight used at the end of a sounding-line.

sounding-line (soun'ding-lin), n. A line for trying the depth of water.

sounding-machine (soun'ding-ma-shēn'), n. A device for taking deep-sea soundings. See deep-sea.

He upon your soundless deep doth ride.
Shak., Sonnets, lxxx.

soundless² (soun'dles), a. [*sound*⁵ + -less.] Having no sound; noiseless; silent; dumb.

Cax. For your words, they rob the Hybla bees,
 And leave them honeyless. . . .
Bru. O yes, and soundless too;
 For you have stol'n their buzzing, Antony.

Shak., J. C., v. 1. 36.

sound-line (soun'dlin), n. The tow-line carried down by a whale when sounding.

soundly (soun'dli), adv. [*sound*¹ + *-ly*2.] In a sound manner, in any sense of the word sound.

soundness (soun'dnes), n. [*sound*¹ + -ness.] The state of being sound, in any sense. = syn. See *sound*¹, a.

sound-post (soun'dpôst), n. In musical instruments of the viol class, a small cylindrical wooden prop or pillar which is inserted between the belly and the back, nearly under the treble foot of the bridge. Its purpose is to prevent the crushing of the belly by the tension of the strings, and to transmit the vibrations of the belly to the back. Its material, shape, and position are of great importance in determining the quality and power of the tone. It is sometimes called the instrument's soul or voice. Also sounding-post.

sound-proof (soun'dprôf), a. Impervious to sound; preventing the entrance of sounds.

It [silicate of cotton] is of great efficiency as a stuffing for sound-proof walls and flooring.
Ure, Dict., IV. 283.

sound-radiometer (soun'drâ-di-om'e-tēr), n. An apparatus devised by Dvorak to show the mechanical effect of sound-waves. It consists of a light cross of wood pivoted with a glass cap upon a vertical needle, and carrying four pieces of card perforated with a number of holes, raised on one side and depressed on the other like those of a nutmeg-grater. The cross-arms rotate rapidly when placed before the resonance-box of a loud-sounding tuning-fork.

sound-register (soun'drej'is-tēr), n. An apparatus for collecting and recording tones of the singing voice or of a musical instrument. It was invented in Paris in 1858.

sound-shadow (soun'dshad'ô), n. The interception of a sound by some large object, as a building. It is analogous to a light-shadow, but is less distinct, since sound-waves have much greater length than light-waves.

For just as a high wall, a hill, or a railway-cutting often completely cuts off sounds by forming a sound-shadow.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 364.

sound-wave (soun'dwäv), n. A wave of condensation and rarefaction by which sound is propagated in an elastic medium, as the air. See *sound*⁵ and wave.

By soverayntie of nature. Shak., Cor., iv. 7. 35.

Specifically—(a) Mastery; control; predominance.

Wommen desirous to have sovereyn-tee,
As wel over hir housbond as hir love.
Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, I. 182.

I was born to command,
Train'd up in sovereyntie.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, iv. 3.

(b) The rule or sway of a monarch; royal or imperial power.

Jovius Augustus . . . let the true nature of his power be seen, and, first among the Cæsars, arrayed himself with the outward pomp of sovereyntie.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 138.

(c) Supremacy or dominion; hegemony: applied to the relation between a powerful state and other states or regions: as, Rome's sovereyntie over the East; Great Britain holds the sovereyntie of the seas. (d) The supreme, absolute, uncontrollable power by which any state is governed (Cooley); the political authority, whether vested in a single individual or in a number of individuals, to order and direct what is to be done by each individual in relation to the end and object of the state (Halliwell). It is essential to the modern conception of sovereignty that it should be exclusive of any other human superior authority, should be wielded by a determinate person or organization of persons, and should be on the whole habitually obeyed by the bulk of the community. Thus, in the United States, sovereignty is vested in the body of adult male citizens. The claim that each State—that is, the adult male free citizens of each State—possessed a separate sovereignty was one of the elements of controversy involved in the civil war.

I state Austin's doctrine of Sovereignty in another way, more popularly, though without, I think, any substantial inaccuracy. It is as follows: There is, in every independent political community—that is, in every political community not in the habit of obedience to a superior above itself—some single person or some combination of persons which has the power of compelling the other members of the community to do exactly as it pleases. This single person or group—this individual or this collegiate Sovereign . . . may be found in every independent political community as certainly as the centre of gravity in a mass of matter. If the community be violently or voluntarily divided into a number of separate fragments, then, as soon as each fragment has settled down (perhaps after an interval of anarchy) into a state of equilibrium, the Sovereign will exist and with proper care will be discoverable in each of the now independent portions. The Sovereignty over the North American Colonies of Great Britain had its seat in one place before they became the United States, in another place afterwards; but in both cases there was a discoverable Sovereign somewhere. This Sovereign, this person or combination of persons, universally occurring in all independent political communities, has in all such communities one characteristic common to all the shapes Sovereignty may take, the possession of irresistible force, not necessarily exerted, but capable of being exerted. . . . The Sovereign, if a single person, is or should be called a Monarch; if a small group, the name is an Oligarchy; if a group of considerable dimensions, an Aristocracy; if very large and numerous, a Democracy. Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 349.

Much is said about the sovereignty of the States. . . . What is sovereignty in the political sense of the term? Would it be far wrong to define it "a political community without a political superior"? Tested by this, no one State, except Texas, ever was a sovereignty. Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 146.

The chief attributes of sovereignty with which the states have parted are the coining of money, the carrying of mails, the imposing of tariff dues, the granting of patents and copyrights, the declaration of war, and the maintenance of a navy. J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 98.

(e) A state, community, or political unit possessing independent power.

The late colonies had but recently become compactly organized self-governing States, and were standing somewhat stiffly apart, a group of consequential sovereignities, jealous to maintain their blood-bought prerogatives, and quick to distrust any power set above them, or arrogating to itself the control of their restive wills. W. Wilson, Cong. Gov., i.

(f) Supremacy in excellence; supreme excellence.

Fie, fie, unreverend tongue! to call her bad
Whose sovereignty so oft thou hast preferred
With twenty thousand soul-confirming oaths. Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 6. 15.

(g) Efficacy; especially, medicinal efficacy.

My father left me some prescriptions
Of rare and proved effects, such as his reading
And manifest experience had collected
For general sovereignty. Shak., All's Well, i. 3. 230.

Popular sovereignty. See popular.—Sovereignty of God, in theol. God's absolute dominion over all created things.—Squatter sovereignty. Same as popular sovereignty. [Colloq., U. S.]

This letter [Gen. Cass on Wilnot Proviso] is notable as the first clear enunciation of the doctrine termed Popular (otherwise Squatter) Sovereignty—that is, of the lack of legitimate power in the Federal Government to exclude Slavery from its territories. H. Greeley, Amer. Conflict, i. 190.

sovrán (suv'- or sov'-ran), a. and n. [A modified form of sovereign, in imitation of the It. sorano: see sovereign. It was first used by Milton, and has been affected by later poets.] Same as sovereign.

Since he
Who now is Sorran can dispose and bid
What shall be right. Milton, P. L., i. 246.

sowdworth, n. An obsolete form of saltwort (Salsola Kali): also applied to the columbine, Aquilegia vulgaris.

sowel, n. Same as *soul*².

sowens (sō'eniz), n. pl. [Also sowans, sowins; origin obscure; cf. *sew*².] 1. A nutritious article of food made from the farina remaining among the husks of oats, much used in Scotland and formerly in Northumberland. The husks (called in Scotland seeds or sids), after being separated from the oatmeal by the sieve, still retain a considerable portion of farinaceous matter. A quantity of the husks is steeped in water till the farinaceous matter is dissolved, and until the liquid has become sour. The whole is then put into a sieve, which allows the milky liquid to pass through into a barrel or other vessel, but retains the husks. The starchy matter gradually subsides to the bottom of the barrel. The sour liquor is then decanted off, fresh water is stirred into the deposit that is left, and the mixture, when boiled, forms sowens. In England it is more commonly called flummery. The singular form sowen is used attributively or in compounds: as, a sowen-tub.

These sowens, that is, flummery, being blended together, produce good yeast. Mortimer, Husbandry.

As if it were any matter . . . whether a ploughman had suppit on minced pices or sour sowens. Scott, Old Mortality, vii.

2. A kind of paste employed by weavers for stiffening their yarn in working.

[Scotch and prov. Eng. in both senses.]

They laid their sowies to the wall. Auld Maitland (Child's Ballads, VI. 222).

sowing (sō'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *sow*¹, v.] 1. The act of one who sows or scatters seed.—2. That which is sowed.

You could not keep the birds out of the garden, try how you would. They had most of the sowings up. The Century, XXXVI. 815.

sowing-machine (sō'ing-mā-shēn'), n. In agri.: (a) A hand or horse-power seed-planting machine. (b) A broadcast sower. The hand-machines consist of a simple mechanism turned by a crank, which scatters the seed in a cloud in every direction. It is carried in one hand and operated by the other.

sowins (sō'iniz), n. pl. See sowens.

sowkert, n. An obsolete form of sucker.

sowl, sowle^{1t}. Obsolete forms of *soul*¹, *sole*⁶.

sowle^{2t}, n. Same as *soul*².

sowm, n. and v. See soum.

sown¹ (sōn). A past participle of *sow*¹.

sown^{2t}, sownet, n. and v. Obsolete forms of *sound*⁶.

sown^{3t}, n. and v. An obsolete form of swoon.

sowpt, n. An obsolete form of *soup*².

sowset. An obsolete spelling of *souse*¹, *souse*².

sowskin (sou'skin), n. See hogskin.

sowstert, n. Same as seuster. Halliwell.

sowteget, n. See soutage.

sowtert, sowterly. Obsolete forms of souter, souterly.

sowth^{1t}, n. and a. An obsolete spelling of south.

sowth² (south), v. [Appar. a var. of souch, *sough*¹.] I. intrans. To whistle softly. [Scotch.]

II. trans. To try over, as a tune, with a low whistle. [Scotch.]

On braes when we please, then,
We'll sit an' south a tune; . . .
An' sing 't when we ha'e done. Burns, First Epistle to Davie.

sowther, v. Same as *souther*². Halliwell.

sow-thistle (sou'this'tl), n. [ME. southstall, < AS. sugethistel, < sugu, sow, + thistel, thistle. In ME. also called swines thistle.] A plant of the genus Sonchus, primarily S. oleraceus, a weed of waste places, probably native in Europe and central Asia, but now diffused nearly all over the world. It is a smooth herb with a milky juice, bearing runcinate-pinnatifid leaves and rather small yellow flower-heads. A similar plant, but with less divided spiny leaves, is S. asper. A much more showy species is S. arvensis, with larger and brighter heads. These are all naturalized in the United States, the last less abundantly. The name has been extended to species of the allied genus Lactuca.

soy (soi), n. [Al-so soja; = F. soy, soui = G. Sw. Dan. soja (NL. soja, soya); < Jap. si-yan, Chinese shi-yu, soy.] 1. A kind of sauce prepared in the East from the soy-bean (see def. 2). It is eaten with fish, cold meat, etc. There are two or three qualities of soy, but the Japanese soy is reckoned the best.

I have been told that soy is made with a fishy composition, and it seems most likely by the taste; tho' a Gentleman of my Acquaintance who was very intimate with one that sailed often from Tonquin to Japan, from whence true Soy comes, told me that it was made only with Wheat and a sort of Beans mixt with Water and Salt.

From travellers accustom'd from a boy
To eat their salmon, at the least, with soy.
Byron, Beppo, vii.

2. The soy-bean or -pea, Glycine Soja (Soja hispida, etc.). It is an annual leguminous plant with stout nearly erect or somewhat climbing stems covered with rusty hairs, bearing trifoliate leaves and from their axils two or three pods $\frac{1}{2}$ or 2 inches long. The seeds are made into the above sauce and variously used in cookery; an oil is also expressed from them, and the residue is extensively used in China for feeding cattle and as a fertilizer. The plant is native from northern India to Japan. The cultivated plant differs somewhat from the wild, and by some authors is distinguished as Glycine hispida. Also Sahua bean.

soya (soi'ä), n. [Hind. soyā, soā, fennel.] Dill. Also sowa.

soy-bean (soi'bēn), n. See soy, 2.

soylet. An obsolete spelling of *soil*¹, *soil*², *soil*³.

Soyimida (soi'mi-dä), n. [NL. (Adrien de Jussieu, 1830), from the Telugu name.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Meliaceæ and tribe Siceteniæ. It is characterized by flowers with five petals, united stamens forming a short tenlobed tube or cup, the lobes two-toothed, with sessile anthers between the teeth, and an ovoid five-celled ovary which ripens into a woody septifragal capsule with compressed and winged seeds destitute of albumen. The only species, S. febrifuga, is a native of the East Indies, where it is known as rohan (or rohan) and redwood. (See also rohan-bark (under *bark*²) and furibals.) It is a tall tree with bitter bark and hard wood, bearing abruptly pinnate leaves with obtuse opposite leaflets, and flowers in axillary and terminal panicles.

soy-pea (soi'pē), n. See soy, 2.

Sozobranchia (sō-zō-brang'ki-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. sozōen, save, keep, + NL. branchia, gills: see branchiæ.] A group of urodele amphibians which do not lose the gills or tail. See Perennibranchiata.

sozobranchiate (sō-zō-brang'ki-ät), a. [< NL. sozobranchiatus, < Gr. sozōen, save, keep, + NL. branchiatus: see branchiæ.] Preserving the gills, as a urodele amphibian; perennibranchiate.

Sozura (sō-zū-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of sozurus: see sozurous.] Urodele (or tailed) gill-less batrachians, or those batrachians which lose the gills, but not the tail, when adult. They are a higher group than the Sozobranchia, both being together contrasted with the Anura or tailless batrachians.

sozurous (sō-zū-rus), a. [< NL. sozurus, < Gr. sozōen, save, keep, + ovpā, tail.] Retaining the tail; pertaining to the Sozura, or having their characters.

sozzle (soz'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. sozzled, ppr. sozzling. [A var. of sozzle.] 1. To mingle confusedly. [Prov. Eng.]-2. To spill or wet through carelessness.-3. To splash. [U. S.]

A sandpiper glided along the shore: sheran after it, but could not catch it; she sat down and sozzled her feet in the foam.
S. Judd, Margaret, p. 8.

sozzle (soz'l), n. [< sozzle, v.] A state of sloppy disorder. [U. S.]

The woman, who in despite of poverty and every discouragement had always hated, to the very roots of her hair, anything like what she called a sozzle—who had always been screwed up and sharp set to hard work.
Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, vii.

Sow-thistle (Sonchus oleraceus).
1, upper part of the stem with the heads;
2, one of the basal leaves; a, a flower; b, the achene with the pappus.

sozzly (soz'li), a. [< sozzle + -ly.] Sloppy; dragged; mentally flabby; shiftless. [New Eng.]

Folks grows helpless all the time, and the help grows sozzlier; and it comes to sauciness . . . and changes.
Mrs. Whitney, The Other Girls, xiii.

Sp. An abbreviation of Spanish.

sp. An abbreviation: (a) in phar., of spiritus, spirit; (b) in bot., of species, specimen; (c) in zool., of species only: when two or more species are meant, spp. is used.

s. p. An abbreviation of sine prole, without issue.

spa (spä or spā), n. [Formerly also spaw; < Spa, or Spaa, in the eastern part of Belgium, where there are mineral springs.] A mineral spring, or the locality in which such springs exist.

Past cure of physis, spaw, or any diet.
Beau. and Fl., Scornful Lady, iii. 2.

Never knew her better; . . . she has been as healthy as the German Spd.
Sheridan, Rivals, ii. 1.

spaad† (späd), n. [< D. spaath = F. spath = Sp. espato = Pg. espatho = It. spato, < MHG. spāt, G. spat, spath, friable stone, splinter, spar; origin unknown. Cf. feldspath.] A kind of mineral; spar.

English talc, of which the coarser sort is called plaster, the finer, spaad, earth-flax, or salamander's hair.
Woodward. (Johnson.)

space (späs), n. [< ME. space, < OF. (and F.) espace = Fr. espace = Sp. espacio = Pg. espaço = It. spazio, < L. spatium, room, space, distance, interval, a public walk, etc., lit. 'that which is drawn out,' < √ spa, draw out; cf. Gr. σπᾶν, draw, draw out, Skt. √ sphā, fatten. Cf. *span*¹, *spade*¹.] 1. The general receptacle of things; room, (a) as a character of the universe, (b) as a cognition or psychological phenomenon, (c) as a mathematical system. That which is real about space is that the manifoldness of the universe is subject to certain general laws or limitations. In this respect it is like any other uniformity of nature; it is peculiar only in the peculiar way in which we view it—namely, in this, that instead of thinking it, as we do other laws, as abstract and general, we seem to see it, we individualize it and its parts. This peculiarity does not, however, constitute the cognition of space as entirely not generic, for there is a tendency to individualize other laws. The conception of space is formed, or at least connected with objects, by means of the so-called local signs, by which the excitation of one nerve-terminal is distinguishable from a similar excitation of another, and which are analogous to the signs by which we distinguish present experiences from memories, imaginations, and expectations. These local signs are also the origin of our idea of individuality: so that it is not strange that this mode of being becomes attributed not merely to moving objects, but to the space and time that constitute the law of motion. The celebrated doctrine of Kant was that space is a form of pure intuition—that is, an idea imported by the mind into cognition, and corresponding to nothing in the things in themselves (though he did not hold that special spatial relations were altogether illusory)—just as color is a quality of sensation which in its generality corresponds to nothing in the object, though differences of color correspond to differences in objects. That this intuition of space is individual, not general, and that no outward intuition is possible except under this form, were points also insisted upon by Kant. At present there are, broadly speaking, two views of space-perception. One is the great doctrine of Berkeley—worked out in different directions by J. S. Mill, Helmholtz, Lotze, Wundt, and others—that the idea of space is evoked under the combined influence of retinal sensations and of muscular sensations of motion, in a manner analogous to that by which the laws of dynamics have been evolved from experience. This is the theory which, under one modification or another, is held by almost all modern scientific psychologists. Some competent writers, however, oppose this, holding that "all our sensations are positively and inexplicably extensive wholes." This opinion conflicts with the usual one only in so far as it clings to the inexplicability and irrationality of space. The vulgar conception of space as a sort of thing or substance of a different category from material things, through which the latter move without sensible resistance, is acceptable to mathematicians, who find that such a construction lends itself remarkably to their diagrammatic reasoning. For the geometer, space is primarily a system of points having the following properties: (1) It is continuous. See continuity, 2. (2) It is unlimited, whether the part at a finite distance from a given point be limited or not. (3) It has three dimensions—that is, a set of three numbers varying continuously may be placed in continuous one-to-one correspondence with the points of space. By a continuous correspondence is meant one in which a continuous variation in one member will correspond in every case to a continuous variation in the other. (4) All the points of space have perfectly similar spatial relations. (5) It is possible for a rigid body to move in space, and such a body is fixed by the fixation of three points, but not fewer. (6) Any figure may be magnified while preserving the proportionality of all its lines. Geometers often imagine these properties to be modified. In particular, they use the hypothesis of a space of four or more dimensions. They also often suppose the principle of similar figures, or, what is the same thing, the doctrine of parallels, to be false, thus producing what is known as the non-Euclidean geometry. This is of various kinds.

Now to pure space lifts her ecstatic stare,
Now, running round the circle, finds it square.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 33.

Stars countless, each in his appointed place,
Fast anchor'd in the deep abyss of space.
Cowper, Retirement, l. 84.

2. The interval between any two or more objects, or between terminal points; distance; extent, as of surface: as, the space of a mile.

And so he hym chased as faste as his horse myght hym bere, till he hadde lefte his felowes be-hynde the space of an arblast.
Martin (E. E. T. 8.), ii. 194.

There shall be a space between you and it (the ark) about two thousand cubits by measure.
Josh. iii. 4.

I warrant he hath a thousand of these letters, writ with blank space for different names.
Shak., M. W. of W., ii. 1. 77.

Four gray walls, and four gray towers,
Overlook a space of flowers.
Tennyson, Lady of Shalott, l.

3. The interval between two points of time; quantity of time; duration.

There was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour.
Rev. viii. 1.

Mean space I thinke to goe downe into Kente.
Cushman, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 37.

Nine times the space that measures day and night
To mortal men he with his horrid crew
Lay vanquish'd, rolling in the fiery gulf.
Milton, P. L., l. 50.

4. A short time; a while.

And, sith for me ye fight, to me this grace
Both yield, to stay your deadly stryfe a space.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 33.

And Arthur and his knight-hood for a space
Were all one will.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

5. Hence, time in which to do something; respite; opportunity; leisure.

Avyseth yow on it, when ye han space,
And of som goodely answer yow purchase.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1124.

And I gave her space to repent.
Rev. ii. 21.

6†. A path; course (†).

This like monk leet olde thynges pace,
And heeld after the newe world the space.
Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 176.

7. In printing, one of the blank types which separate the words in print. The thicknesses most used are one third, one fourth, and one fifth of the square body of the text-type. Half-spaces, still thinner, are also made. Spaces as thick as one half the square body and all thicker are known as quadrats.

8. In musical notation, one of the degrees between the lines of the staff. In the usual staff there are four spaces within the staff, but in the Gregorian staff there are only three. The name and significance of a space depend on the clef and the key-signature. See staff.

9. In ornith., an unfeathered place on the skin between pteryx; an apterium. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 87.—Absolute, algebraic, basal space. See the adjectives.—Added space. Same as leger space.—Barycentric coordinates in space. Same as tetrahedral coordinates (which see, under coordinate).—Berth and space. See *berth*².—Cell-spaces, the spaces in the ground-substance of connective tissue which inclose the connective-tissue corpuscles.—Chyle-spaces, the central lymphatic cavities of the intestinal villi.—Complemental space of pleura, the portion of the pleural cavity immediately above the insertion of the diaphragm, which is not filled by air in ordinary breathing.—Dangerous space (milit.), the zone before and behind the object fired at covered by the trajectory. See battle-range, under battle.—Dead space, in fort. Same as dead angle (which see, under *angle*³).—Deep cardiac space, the projection on the surface of the chest of the lung-covered portions of the heart. It borders on each side the superficial cardiac space.—Elliptic, Euclidean, extramundane, gastrovascular space. See the adjectives.—Fontana's spaces. Same as canal of Fontana (which see, under canal).—Geometry of space. See geometry.—Half-space or foot-space, in a staircase, a resting-place or broad space between two flights of steps.—Haversian spaces. See Haversian canal, under canal.—Hemal, hyperbolic, intercellular, interdental space. See the adjectives.—Hypoprostacic space, the space lying between the rectum and the prostate. Buchanan.—Interlamellar spaces, the spaces between the lamellæ of the cornea.—Interosseous space, the space between parallel long bones.—Interpeduncular space, the triangular space at the base of the brain, between the crura cerebri.—Interpleural, ivory, leger space. See the adjectives.—Lenticular space. See lenticular mark, under lenticular.—Linear, local, maxillopharyngeal, mean, middle, parabolic, paraxial, perforated, pericardial, popliteal, etc., spaces. See the adjectives.—Polar coordinates in space. See coordinate.—Quarter-space, a landing or interval at an angle-turn of a stair.—Retroperitoneal space. See retroperitoneal.—Room and space. See *room*¹.—Superficial cardiac space, the area on the surface of the chest over that part of the heart which is not covered by the lung. It is represented with approximate accuracy by a right-angled triangle bounded by the midsternal line, a horizontal line through the point of the apex beat, and a line drawn through that point and the intersection of the midsternal line with a horizontal line through the fourth costosternal articulation.

space (späs), v.; pret. and pp. spaced, ppr. spacing. [< space, n. Cf. spatiate, expatiate.] I.† intrans. To move at large; expatiate. [Rare.]

But she, as Fayes are wont, in privie place
Did spend her dayes, and lov'd in forests wyld to space.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. ii. 44.

II. trans. 1. To set at intervals; put a space between; specifically, in printing, to arrange the spaces and intervals in or between so that there may be no obvious disproportion: as, to space a paragraph; to space words, lines, or letters.

The porch, too, is open, and consists of columns spaced equidistantly over its floor, without either the bracketing arrangements of the southern or the domical forms of the northern styles. J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 389.

2. To divide into spaces.

The artificer is ordered "to set up the frames, and to space out the rooms, that the Nine Worthies may be so instaled as best to please the eye."

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 27.

3. To measure by paces. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]—Spaced braid, a white cotton braid used for the trimming of washable garments. The name is derived from the pattern, which exhibits flat and simple spaces between raised edging.—To space out, in printing, to put more spaces between the words or lines of.

space-box (spās' boks), n. In printing, a petty case of wood or millboard, in six or eight divisions, holding the spaces needed for corrections on stone. Sometimes called space-barge or space-paper in England.

space-curvature (spās' kēr' vā-tūr), n. A curvature of three-dimensional space in a space of four dimensions.

spaceful (spās' fūl), a. [< space + -ful.] Wide; extensive. Sandys.

space-homology (spās' hō-mol' ō-jī), n. Geometrical homology in three dimensions.

spaceless (spās' les), a. [< space + -less.] Destitute of space. Coleridge.

space-line (spās' līn), n. In printing, same as lead, 3.

space-mark (spās' mārĕ), n. See proof-reading.

space-perception (spās' pēr-sep'shən), n. The perception of space—that is, of bodies as extended or moving.

spacer (spā'sēr), n. 1. A device used in cable telegraphy for reversing the current at proper intervals, thus increasing the speed of transmission: also used for a somewhat similar purpose on land-lines.—2. In a typewriter, a key, and the mechanism connected with it, by which spaces are made between words.

space-relation (spās' rē-lā'shən), n. A spatial relation, such as that two points lie within a tetrahedron of which four others are the vertices, and the like.

space-rule (spās' rōl), n. In printing, a hair-line of type-metal, type-high and about one thirty-sixth of an inch thick. Such rules are made of many lengths, from one twelfth of an inch to half an inch. They are used for cross-lines in table-work.

space-writing (spās' rī'ting), n. In newspaper work, the system of payment to reporters or other writers in proportion to the space allowed to their articles in print; also, writing or work under this system.

The standard of literary excellence in the news columns of the New York press has also been lowered by the general substitution of space writing for the work of salaried reporters, as well as by the influence already referred to. Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 858.

spacial, spaciality, etc. See spatial, etc.

spacing (spā'sing), n. [Verbal n. of space, v.] 1. The making of spaces. (a) The allowing and gaging of intervals between words in setting type, type-writing, or the like.

The change in the spacing being effected by a small cam at the side of the carriage. Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 24.

(b) In art, mach., etc., the division of any surface into special parts.

In the spaces of decoration, as in all else, the Japanese artist studiously avoids uniformity or repetition of exact spacing. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 591.

2. A space thus made.

Each tongue upon discs is cut slantingly across at regular spacings by steam passages analogous to the guide-plate vents of water turbines. The Engineer, LXIX. 225.

3. Spaces collectively.

spacing-lace (spā'sing-lās), n. Same as seaming-lace.

spacious (spā'shus), a. [Formerly also spatious; < F. spacieux = Sp. spatioso = Pg. espaçoso = It. spazioso, < L. spatiosus, roomy, ample, < spatium, room, space: see space.] 1. Inclosing an extended space; of great extent; wide-extended.

As though no other place, on Britain's spacious earth,
Were worthy of his end, but where he had his birth.
Drayton, Polyolbion, l. 189.

The spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
Addison, Ode, Spectator, No. 465.

2. Having large or ample room; not contracted or narrow; roomy.

On the North side of the Church is a spacious Court, which I could not conjecture to be less than one hundred and fifty yards long, and eighty or one hundred broad.

Maundrell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 126.

Those melodious bursts that fill

The spacious times of great Elizabeth.

Tennyson, Fair Women.

3†. Extensive; on a large scale; abounding: said of persons.

Is't possible that such a spacious villain

Should live, and not be plagued?

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, l. 1.

= Syn. Wide, capacious, ample, broad.

spaciously (spā'shus-lī), adv. In a spacious manner; widely; extensively; roomily.

spaciousness (spā'shus-nes), n. The quality of being spacious; largeness of extent; extensiveness; roominess.

spadassin (spād'a-sin), n. [< F. spadassin, < It. spadaccio, swordsman, < spada, sword: see spade, spathe.] A swordsman; especially, a person devoted to fencing and presumed to be expert with the sword; hence, less properly, a bravo.

Bully swordsmen, spadassins of that party, go swag-gering; or indeed they can be had for a trifle of money. Carlyle, (Imp. Dict.)

spaddle (spād'l), n. [Dim. of *spade*¹. Cf. *paddle*².] A little spade; a spud. [Obsolete or provincial.]

Others destroy moles with a spaddle, waiting in the mornings and evenings for them. Mortimer, Husbandry.

spade¹ (spād), n. [< ME. spade, < AS. spadu, spædu, also rarely spada, spud, in an early gloss spadi, = OS. spado = OFries. spada = MD. spade, spæye, D. spade, spa = MLG. or curved) may be pressed into the ground or other resisting substance with one foot, and a handle, usually with a crosspiece at the top, to be grasped by both hands. A spade differs from a two-handed shovel chiefly in the form and thickness of the blade.

The nomen heo spade and schouele and ner the place wende, Deope heo gonne to delue ther as the smoke out wende. Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 43.

Strength may wield the pond'rous spade,
May turn the clod, and wheel the compost home.

Cowper, Task, iii. 636.

2. A tool of soft iron used with diamond-powder by cameo-cutters in finishing.—3. In whaling, a large chisel-like implement used on blubber or bone in cutting-in. See phrases following.—4. In herpet., a formation on the foot of some toads with which they dig. See spade-foot.—Boat-spade, an instrument, carried under the stern-sheets of a whale-boat, resembling a very large chisel, having a wide blade, and a handle six or eight feet long. This instrument was employed to stop a running whale by the process known as hamstringing or spading flukes (cutting the cords about the small), which required much experience and dexterity, and was a very hazardous undertaking; it has been done away with by the introduction of bomb-lances.—Bone-spade, a cutting-spade, with a long thin shank, used by whalers for cutting out the throat-bone of a baleen-whale.—Cutting-spade, a sharp instrument like a very large narrow chisel fixed to a pole ten or more feet in length, used for cutting the blubber from a whale.—Half-round spade, a long-handled spade with a blade curved, or rolled up on the sides, resembling a carpenter's gouge, and used for cutting holes in the head of the blubber when boarding.—Shoe- ing of a spade, in her., same as spade-iron, 2 (b).—To call a spade a spade, to call things by their proper names, even though these may seem homely or coarse; speak plainly and without mincing matters. Various unnecessary conjectures have been made as to the supposed occult origin of this phrase; but it means what it says—to call a simple thing by its simple name, without circumlocution or affected elegance.

Chesham does not like to call a spade a spade. He calls it a horticultural utensil. Thackeray, Philip, xlii.

spade¹ (spād), v. t.; pret. and pp. spaded, ppr. spading. [*< spade*¹, n.] 1. To dig or cut with a spade; dig up (the ground) by means of a spade.—2. In whaling, to use the boat-spade on, as a whale; cut the tendons of the flukes of; hamstring.

spade² (spād), n. [Prob. < Sp. Pg. espada, spade at cards, usually in pl. espadas, spades (sing. espada, the ace of spades); appar. a particular use of espada, a sword (< L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broadsword), these cards having, it is said, among the Spaniards, the figure of a sword; according to others the figure was orig. intended, as in the cards now in use, for the head of a pike, in which case the name spade is prob. an orig. E. designation, the head of a pike sufficiently resembling the pointed spade: see *spade*¹.] A playing-card of one of the two black suits of a pack, the other being clubs.

"Let Spades be trumps!" she said, and trumps they were. Pope, R. of the L., iii. 46.

Reverse.

Spade-guinea, 1787.—British Museum. (Size of the original.)

spade-guinea (spād'gin'ē), n. A guinea coined by George III. during the period 1787-99. It is now so called because the shield of arms on the reverse has the shape of the spade of playing-cards. See cut on preceding page.

spade-gun (spād'gun), n. A gun having a recess in the stock to hold a spade or trowel, and a socket in the butt-plate to which the spade can be fitted for use as an intrenching-tool.

spade-handle (spād'han'dl), n. 1. The handle of a spade. Hence—2. In mach., a pin held at both ends by the forked ends of a connecting-rod.

spade-husbandry (spād'huz'band-ri), n. A mode of cultivating the soil and improving it by means of deep digging with the spade instead of using the subsoil-plow.

spade-iron (spād'ir'ern), n. 1. The blade of a spade, with the tang or socket by which it is secured to the handle.—2. In her., a bearing representing (a) the whole blade of a spade, without the handle or with a truncated piece of the handle, or (b) an iron or steel border put upon the blade of a spade to reinforce or repair it. This border is generally represented with some ornamental outline engraved or lobed on its inner edge, and is also called shoeing of a spade.

spader (spā'dēr), n. One who or that which spades; a digging-machine.

The steam-ploughs and horse-ploughs did their work well, and the rotary spader did its work well.

Walt Whitman, The Galaxy, IV. 608.

spade-rack (spād'rak), n. A rack on board a whaler, underneath the spare boats, in which the boat-spades are kept when not in use.

spadiard (spād'yārd), n. [Appar. < spade + -iard, but perhaps an error for spaliard.] A worker in a tin-mine. Kennett; Halliwell. [Cornwall, Eng.]

spadic (spā'dik), n. [Brazilian.] Same as coca.

spadiceous (spā-dish'ius), a. [L. spadiceus, < spadix, < Gr. σπάδιξ, a palm-branch, also nut-brown, palm-colored, bay; see spadix.] 1. Of a bright-brown color; bay; chestnut.

Of those five [unicorns' horns] which Scaliger beheld, though one [was] spadiceous, or of a light red, and two inclining to red, yet was there not any of this complexion among them.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 23.

2. In bot., bearing or having the nature of a spadix. See petaloideous, endogen, and Monocotyledones.

Also spadicous.

spadices, n. Plural of spadix.

spadicifloral (spā-di-si-flō'ral), a. [NL. spadix (spadic), q. v., + L. flos (flor-), a flower; see floral.] In bot., having flowers borne on a spadix.

spadicose (spād'i-kōs), a. [L. spadix (-ic) + -ose.] In bot., spadiceous; growing on a spadix.

spadilla (spā-dil'ä), n. [See spadille.] In the game of solo, the queen of spades, which is always the highest trump.

spadille, spadillo (spā-dil', -yō), n. [L. spadille, < Sp. espadilla (= It. spadiglia), a small sword, the ace of spades, dim. of Sp. espada = Pg. espada, spade (at cards), the ace of spades; see *spade*1, *spade*2.] In card-playing, the ace of spades at ombre and quadrille. In the following quotation spadille is personified as Spadillio.

Spadillio first, unconquerable lord,
Led off two captive trumps and swept the board.

Pope, R. of the L., iii. 49.

spading-machine (spā'ding-mā-shēn'), n. A digging-machine.

spadix (spā'diks), n.; pl. spadices (spā-dī'sēz). [NL. < L. spadix, < Gr. σπάδιξ, a branch broken off, esp. a palm-branch, hence palm-colored, bay, < σπάρ, tear, rend, stretch out.] 1. In bot., a form of inflorescence in plants, in which the flowers are closely arranged in a spike or head which has a fleshy or thickened rachis. The term is mostly restricted to the Araceæ and the palms, and further to those cases in which the inflorescence is accompanied by the peculiar bract or bracts called a spathe. See cuts under Araceæ, Indian, and inflorescence.

2. In zool.: (a) The hectocotylus of the male cephalopod: a specialized part of the fore foot, on one side, which becomes hectocotylized, or assumes a sexual function. On the opposite side is a corresponding part, not subject to hectocotylization, called the antispadix. (b) In Hydrozoa, the manubrium of the hydromedusans, an offset of a blastostyle bearing the genital products, like the part of a pea-pod which bears the peas. (c) [cap.] A genus of coelenterates.

spado (spā'dō), n. [L. < Gr. σπάδων, a eunuch, < σπάρ, tear, rend, pluck off or out. Cf. *spade*3, n.] 1†. A castrated animal; a gelding. Imp. Dict.—2. In civil law, one who from any cause has not the power of procreation; an impotent person.

spadone (spā-dō'ne), n. [It., aug. of spada, a sword: see *spade*2. Cf. spadron.] A long and heavy sword, usually one wielded by both hands. It was commonly carried without a scabbard, behind and across the back, with the handle projecting over the right shoulder, or resting on the shoulder as the modern rifle at shoulder arms, and for this reason the heel of the blade was often covered with leather, there being no edge for the first quarter or third part of its length, and sometimes a small secondary guard was interposed before the sharp part of the blade begins. See cut under *second*1.

spadronet (spa-drōn'), n. Same as spadone.

spadron (spa-drōn'), n. [F. dial. espadron, F. espadon = Sp. espadon, a large sword, a broadsword, < It. spadone, a sword: see spadone.] Same as spadone.

spæ (spā), v. i. and t.; pret. and pp. spæd, ppr. spæing. [Also spay; < Icel. spá = Sw. spå = Dan. spaa, prophesy; cf. OS. spāhi = OHG. spāhi, MHG. spāhe, wise, skilful; OHG. spēhon, MHG. spēhen, G. spāhen, spy: see *spy*1.] To foretell; divine; predict from signs or indications. [Scotch.]

Tell me the very minute o' the hour the wean's born, and I'll spæ its fortune.

Scott, Guy Mannering, iii.

spæ-book (spā'būk), n. A book containing directions for telling fortunes, etc. [Scotch.]

spæman (spā'man), n.; pl. spæmen (-men). A fortune-teller; diviner; soothsayer. [Scotch.]

spær (spā'ēr), n. [< spæ + *-ær*1.] A spæman or spæwife; a fortune-teller. [Scotch.]

A spær o' poor folk's fortunes.

Blackwood's Mag.

spæwife (spā'wif), n.; pl. spæwives (-wivz). A female fortune-teller. [Scotch.]

Plague on her for an auld Highland witch and spæwife; . . . she'll cast some of her cantrips on the cattle.

Scott, Chronicles of the Canongate, xlii.

spaghetti (spā-get'ti), n. [It., pl. of spaghetto, dim. of spago, a small cord.] A kind of Italian macaroni made in the form of cords smaller than ordinary macaroni, but several times larger than the threads of vermicelli.

spagiric (spa-jir'ik), a. and n. [Also spagyric, spagyrick; = F. spagirique; irreg. formed (it is said by Paracelsus) < Gr. σπάρ, rend, tear, stretch out, + ἀγίρειν, bring or collect together.] 1. Chemical or alchemical; pertaining to chemistry as taught by Paracelsus and his followers.

It was a huge diligence and care of the Divine mercy that discovered to man the secrets of spagyric medicines.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 904.

II. n. A chemist, especially one devoted to alchemical pursuits.

spagirical (spa-jir'ik-al), a. [Also spagyric, spagyric; < spagirie + -al.] Same as spagirie.

spagirist (spa-jir'ist), n. [Also spagyrist; < spagirie + -ist.] A Paracelsian chemist or physician of the sixteenth or seventeenth century; a follower of Paracelsus in regarding inorganic chemistry as the basis of medical knowledge.

No more than I can [tell] who initiated Mr. Boyle among the Spagyrics, before I had the honour to know him.

Evelyn, To Mr. Wotton.

spæhe, spahi (spā'hē, -hi), n. [Formerly also spachi; = F. spahi, < Turk. sipāhi = Pers. Hind. spāhi: see seppoy.] 1. A member of the corps of Turkish cavalry organized in the fourteenth century on a feudal basis, who fought in a very disorderly manner, and were disbanded soon after serving as the chief instruments in the suppression of the Janizaries in 1826.

But the Spachies and Janizaries . . . are the Nerves and Supporters of the Turkish Monarchy.

Sandys, Travailes (ed. 1673), p. 38.

2. One of the corps of native Algerian cavalry in the French service, originally formed from the Turkish spæhes serving in Algeria at the time of the French conquest.

spail. See *spale*1, *spale*2.

spait, n. See spate.

spaipe (spāv), v. t. A dialectal variant of *spay*1.

spake1 (spāk), n. A Scotch form of *spoke*1.

Your cage shall be made o' the beaten gold,

And the spakes o' ivory.

May Colvin (Allingham's Ballad-book, p. 247).

spake2. An archaic or poetic preterit of spæc. spake3, a. [ME., also spak, spac, < Icel. spakr, quiet, gentle, wise, = Sw. spak = Dan. spag, quiet, gentle, tame.] 1. Quiet; tame.

Hyt sate by hym so spake.

Rob. of Brunne, Handlyng Synne, l. 7496.

2. Ready; prompt.

Spæc to uel and slaw to god.

Old Eng. Hom. (ed. Morris), l. 305.

spakelyt, adv. [ME., also spakly, spakli, spacly; < *spake*3 + *-ly*2.] Quickly; speedily; nimbly.

Spek to me spakli or i spille sone.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1535.

One semblable to the Samaritan and some-del to Piers the Plowman, Barfote on an asse bakke boteles cam pryke,

Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 12.

The blode sprete owtte, and sprede as the horse sprynges, And he sproulez fulle spakely, bot spekes he no more.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 2063.

spake-net (spāk'net), n. [< *spake*1 + *net*1.] A net for catching crabs. Halliwell.

Spalacidae (spā-las'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spalax (-ac) + -idae.] A family of myomorphie rodents, typified by the genus Spalax; the mole-rats proper, having small or rudimentary eyes and ears, short tail and limbs, and fossorial fore feet and claws: divided into two subfamilies, Spalacinae and Bathyerginae. Also Aspalacidae, and formerly Georychidae. See cuts under Bathyergus, mole-rat, and Rhizomys.

Spalacinae (spal-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spalax (-ac) + -inae.] A subfamily of Spalacidae, including the typical mole-rats, in which the mandibular angle is in relation with the socket of the lower incisor. See Spalax. Also Aspalacinae.

spalacine (spāl'a-sin), a. Of or pertaining to the Spalacidae or Spalacinae.

Spalacopodidae (spāl'a-kō-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spalacopus (-pod) + -idae.] A family of hystriomorphie rodents, named by Lilljeborg (1866) from the genus Spalacopus. It is inexactly equivalent to the Octodontidae of authors, but includes the prehensile-tailed porcupines (Cercolabinae). It was divided by Gill (1872) into four subfamilies, Octodontinae, Ctenodactylinae, Echimyinae (Echimyomyinae), and Cercolabinae. See Octodontidae.

Spalacopus (spā-lak'ō-pus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1832), < Gr. σπάλαξ (σπαλάκ-), a mole, + πούς = E. foot.] The name-giving genus of Spalacopodidae, now a member of the family Octodontidae and subfamily Octodontinae. The ears are rudimentary, the tail is short, and the fore claws are shorter than their digits. The skull and teeth resemble those of Schizodon. There are two South American species, of fossorial habits, constructing extensive subterranean burrows in which they live. They have been called poepagomys, from a synonymous genus Poepagomys.

Spalax (spā'laks), n. [NL. (Güldenstädt), < Gr. σπάλαξ, also σπάλαξ and σπάλαξ, a mole.] The typical genus of mole-rats, subfamily Spalacinae, having the eyes rudimentary and covered with skin. It contains S. typhlus, the sleeper or blind mole-rat of Europe, the most completely mole-like of the rodents in general appearance, habits, and adaptive modifications of structure. Also Aspalax. See cut under mole-rat.

spald1 (spāld), v. [Also dial. spaud; < ME. spalden, spawden, < MD. spalden = MLG. spalden, spolden = OHG. spaltan, MHG. G. spalten (> Dan. spalte), split, cleave; akin to speld, *spell*4; cf. *spall*1, *spale*1. Hence *spall*1.] 1† trans. To splinter; chip.

Be thane speris whare sproungene, *spald*dyd chippys.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3700.

II. intrans. To founder, as a ship. [Prov. Eng., in form spaud.]

spald2† (spāld), n. [Also (Sc.) spauld, spawld; < ME. spalde, spawde; a var. of *spall*2: see *spall*2.] The shoulder.

Ly stille thethin now and roste,

I kepe nothyng of thi coste

Ne noghte of thi spalde.

Perceval, l. 796. (Halliwell.)

The bul . . . lenand his spald to the stok of ane tre.

Gavin Douglas, Æneid, xii. 410.

spalder (spāl'dēr), n. [< *spald*1 + *-er*1.] In stone-working, a workman who spalls or scales off small flakes by the use of a heavy ax-shaped hammer, or muckle-hammer.

spalding-knife (spāl'ding-nif), n. A knife for splitting codfish. E. H. Knight.

spale1 (spāl), v. t.; pret. and pp. spaled, ppr. spaling. [A var. of *spall*1, split, etc.: see *spall*1.] To break up.

spale1 (spāl), n. [Also spail; < ME. spale; cf. Icel. spölr (spat-), a rail, bar, short piece, bit; in part a var. of *spall*1, *spell*4, in part appar. due to *spale*1, r.: see *spell*4, and cf. *spall*1.] 1. A chip or splinter of wood. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]—2. In ship-building, one of a number of cross-bands fastened temporarily to the frames to keep them in place until properly secured. Also called spaling.

spale2 (spāl), v. t. [Also spail; perhaps a particular use of *spale*1.] In mining, to inflict a fine upon for breach of some rule of the mine.

Weale.

spall¹ (spāl), v. [Also spawl; a later form of *spall*¹ in part due to *spall*¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To split; splinter; chip; specifically, in mining, to chip or break up roughly, as ore, preparatory to sorting the material.—2. [*< spall*¹, n.] To keep (the frames of a ship) at their proper distance apart.

II. intrans. To splinter; chip; give off spalls.
spall¹ (spāl), n. [Also spawl; < ME. spalle; a var. of *spell*⁴, *speal*¹, etc., in part due to *spall*¹, v.: see *spell*⁴, and cf. *spald*¹, *spale*¹.] A chip or splinter thrown off, as in chopping or hewing; now specifically, in masonry, a piece of stone chipped off by a blow of a hammer or mallet.

spall², spawl³ (spāl), n. [Also spaul, and formerly spald, spauld; *< ME. spauke, spalde, spauke, < OF. espauke, espaulde*, F. épauke = Sp. Pg. espalda = It. spalla, the shoulder, < L. spatula, a broad blade: see spatula. Cf. epaulet.] The shoulder. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Their mightie strokes their haberjeons dismayd,
And naked made each others manly spalles.

Spenser, F. Q., II. vi. 29.

spallier (spal'yér), n. [Also spaliard; cf. spadiard.] A laborer in tin-works. Halliwel.

spalling-floor (spāl'ing-flôr), n. A clear space on the ground, a low platform, or something similar, on which ores are spalled.

spalling-hammer (spāl'ing-ham'ér), n. A heavy ax-like hammer with a chisel-edge, used for rough-dressing stone by chipping off small flakes; in mining, any hammer with which spalling is done.

spalpeen (spal'pēn), n. [< Ir. spailpín, a mean fellow, rascal, stroller (= Gael. spailpean, a mean fellow, a fop), < spailp, a beau, also pride, self-conceit, = Gael. spailp, pride, self-conceit; cf. spailp, strut, walk affectedly.] A mean fellow; a rascal; a term of contempt, or of contemptuous pity, for a man or boy. [Irish.]

The spalpeen! turned into a buckeen that would be a squireen, but can't. Miss Edgeworth, Love and Law, i. 4.

spalt¹ (spält), v. [An altered form of *spald*¹, prob. due to a pp. spalt. Cf. *spalt*².] To split off, as large splinters from a piece of timber in working it. [Prov. Eng.]

spalt² (spält), a. [Appar. *< spalt*¹, perhaps through the pp. spalt.] 1. Brittle; liable to break or split.

Of all oke growing in England, the parke oke is the softest, and far more spalt and bricke than the hedge oke.
Harrison, Descrip. of Eng., ii. 22 (Holinshed's Chron., i.).

2. Frail; clumsy; heedless; pert. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

spalt³ (spält), n. [< G. spalt(-stein), spalt, lit. 'splinter-stone,' < spalten, split (see *spalt*¹), + stein, stone.] A whitish scaly mineral, used to promote the fusion of metals.

span¹ (span), v.; pret. and pp. spanned, ppr. spanning. [< ME. spannen, < AS. spannan, spannan (pret. spænn), gespannan, bind, connect, = D. spannan, stretch, bend, hoist, cock (a gun), hitch (horses) = MLG. LG. spannen = OHG. spannan, MHG. G. spannen, extend, connect, = Icel. spennna, span, clasp, = Sw. späna, stretch, strain, draw, = Dan. spænde, stretch, strain, span, buckle; > span, perhaps, with present formative -n, < > spa, extend, in Gr. σπέννω, σπᾶν, draw out (see spasm), L. spatium, extension, space (see space). Cf. spin, speed.] I. trans. 1. To stretch or spread out; extend in continuity; give extent to.

My right hand hath spanned [spread out, R. V.] the heavens. Isa. xlviii. 13.

2. To stretch from side to side or from end to end; extend over or across; continue through or over the extent of.

This soul doth span the world. G. Herbert, Content.
The Rhyndacus is still spanned by an ancient bridge of three arches. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 295.

The existing church shows portions of work a thousand years apart, and spans nearly the whole of Aquileian history.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 63.

3. To make a stretch or reach along, over, or around; measure or cover the span of; grasp; specifically, to measure or encompass with the hand, the little finger and thumb being extended as far as possible: as, to span a stream with a log or a bridge; to span a person's wrist.

Thenne the klinge spanes his spere.
Avowing of Arthur, st. 13. (Skeat).
Oft on the well-known spot I fix my eyes,
And span the distance that between us lies.
Tickell, An Epistle.

How your plump arms, that were, have dropped away!
Why, I can span them. Browning, Pippa Passes, iii.
364

4. To cock by the use of a spanner, as a wheel-lock musket or pistol.

Every man, officer and soldier, having a pistol ready spanned in one hand. Clarendon, Civil Wars, III. 248.

5. Naut., to confine with ropes: as, to span the booms.—6. To shackle the legs of, as a horse; hobble. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To measure off or mark distances from point to point; make distinct stretches in going, as a span-worm or measuring-worm does.

If the whale is spanning, i. e. swimming in a decided direction and appearing at the surface at intervals more or less regular, less caution is observed.

Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 526.

2. To be matched for running in harness; form a span: as, the horses span well. [U. S.]

span¹ (span), n. [< ME. spanne, sponne, < AS. span, a span (def. 4), gespan, a joining, connection, = D. span, a span, a team of horses, = OHG. spanna, MHG. G. spanna (> It. spanna = OF. espan, F. empan) = Icel. spönn (spann) = Sw. spann = Dan. spand, a span; from the verb.] 1. The full extent or course over which anything is stretched or prolonged; the space or time covered or included between terminal points; entire reach from end to end or from side to side: as, the span of life; the span of a bridge. As used of physical things, span is understood as the actual or net space or distance between bounding lines or surfaces; hence, the span of an arch is the length of the opening between the inner faces of its abutments. Compare def. 2. Often used figuratively.

The brief span of Roman literature, strictly so called, was suddenly closed under a variety of influences.

Maine, Village Communities, p. 381.

Two arches over the same span of river, supposing the abutments are at the same depth, are cheaper than one.

Ruskin, Elements of Drawing.

Yes, Manhood hath a wider span
And larger privilege of life than man.

Lowell, Comm. Ode.

2. A part or division of something between terminal points: as, a bridge of ten spans. In this sense a span would comprise the distance from the middle line of one pier or support to that of the next, the whole number of spans including the entire length of the structure. [The decision of the case referred to in the first quotation turned upon the distinction between senses 1 and 2.]

The word span does not, even in architecture, always mean a part of a structure. It is, perhaps, as often used to denote the distance or space between two columns.
Such is the obvious import of the term as used in the act under consideration, not merely as a part of the structure itself, but the measure of the distance between the piers of the bridge.

U. S. Supreme Ct., March, 1888. (Judge Lamar.)

The channel spans were built out from the central pier and from the adjacent flanking spans without the use of false works in either channel. Scribner's Mag., IV. 32.

3. Extent of stretch, physical or mental; distance over which anything may be extended; reach or grasp, as of the memory or of perception. [Rare.]

Between the ages of eight and nineteen the span of school-girls increases from 6 to 7.9 for letters, and from 6.6 to 8.6 for numerals. Span increases not only with age, but with rank in class, and it is suggested that a "standard span" be added to the items for anthropometric measurement. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 193.

4. As a measure, originally, the extent between the tips of the thumb and little finger when stretched out: the oldest use of the word in English. The span belongs to the system of long measure to which the cubit and fingerbreadth belong. It has always been considered as half a cubit, and still is so in several countries of Asia. The English span is 9 inches. The Swedish spänn is an entirely different kind of measure.

Spanne, measure of the hand. Palmus.
Prompt. Parv., p. 467.

Whyche Morteys ys in Depnesse ij Spannyss to the botom;

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 43.

Atween his shoulders was a span,
About his middle war but three.

The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads), I. 126.

5. Figuratively, any short space or period; a brief or limited extent or course; a relatively small measure of continuity.

Behold, thou hast made my days as it were a span long.
Book of Common Prayer, Psalter, xxxix. 6.

For the refreshing of that one span of ground God lets fall a whole shower of rain. Donne, Sermons, x.

Thyself but Dust; thy Stature but a Span,
A Moment thy Duration; foolish Man!

Prior, Solomon, i.

6. The hand with the fingers outspread, as for measuring or for grasping a handful of something. [Rare.]

And my Conductor, with his spans extended,
Took of the earth, and, with his fists well filled,
He threw it into those rapacious gullets.

Longfellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, vi. 25.

7. Naut., a rope fastened at both ends so that a purchase may be hooked to its bight; also, a double rope having thimbles attached between its two parts, used as a fair-leader for ropes.—8. (a) In the United States (from the original Dutch usage), a pair of horses or mules harnessed together; particularly, a pair of horses usually driven together, or matched for driving or work. (b) In South Africa, two or more yokes of oxen or bullocks attached to a wagon or a plow. For a wagon the span may consist of from twelve to twenty animals, and for a plow of six or eight.

span². An archaic preterit of spin.

span³ (span), adv. [The first element in the compound span-new erroneously taken as a separate word: see span-new, and cf. spick-and-span.] Wholly; entirely; freshly: as, my hands are span clean (sometimes spandy clean). Bartlett. [Colloq., U. S.]

The L. adjectives are Hispanus, Hispaniensis, and Hispanicus (see Hispanic).] A native or a citizen of Spain, a kingdom of southwestern Europe, forming the greater part of the Iberian peninsula; in general, a member of the Iberian race, of mixed Celtic, Latin, Gothic, Arabic, and other elements, but now ranked as one of the Latin peoples.

spaniel (span'yel or span'el), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also spannel; < ME. spaniel, spangelle, spaynyel, spaynel, spangeole, < OF. espagneul, espagnol, F. épagneul, a spaniel, orig. OF. chien espagnol, F. chien épagneul, a Spanish dog; < Sp. Español, Spanish: see spaniard.] I. n. 1. A dog of a domestic breed, of medium and small sizes, with a long silky and usually curly coat, long, soft, drooping ears, feathered tail and stern, of docile, timid, and affectionate disposition, much used for sporting purposes and as pets. The most usual colors are liver and white, red and white, or black and white, in broken or massed areas, sometimes deep brown or black on the face or breast, with a tan mark over the eye. Spaniels sport or are bred into many strains, and three classes of them are sometimes distinguished: land- or field-spaniels, including the cocker and springer; water-spaniels; and toy spaniels, as the King Charles and the Blenheim. The English spaniel is a superior and very pure breed; and, although the name spaniel would seem to indicate a Spanish origin, it is most probably indigenous. This dog was used in the days of falconry to start the game. The King Charles is a small black-and-tan variety of the spaniel; the Blenheim is similar, but white marked with red or yellow; both should have a rounded head with short muzzle, full eyes, and well-fringed ears and feet. The Maltese dog and the lion-dog are also small toy spaniels, used as lap-dogs. The water-spaniels, large and small, differ from the common spaniel in the roughness of their coats, and in uniting the aquatic propensities of the Newfoundland dog with the fine hunting qualities of their own race. Leading strains of the springers are the Clumber, Norfolk, and Sussex, in different colors. 2. Figuratively, a mean, cringing, fawning person; a blindly submissive follower: from the characteristics of the spaniel in relation to its master, or when in a state of fear.

He, unhappy man! whom your advancement
Hath ruin'd by being spaniel to your fortunes,
Will curse he train'd me hither. Ford, Fancies, iii. 3.

II. a. Like a spaniel; fawningly submissive; mean; servile; cringing.

Low-crook'd court'sies, and base spaniel-fawning.
Shak., J. C., iii. 1. 43.

spaniel (span'yel or span'el), v. [spaniel, n.] I. intrans. To fawn; cringe; be obsequious. Churchill.

II. trans. To follow like a spaniel. Shak., A. and C., iv. 12. 21.

on the Mediterranean, and characteristic of that region. The disposition of these fowls is restless and vivacious; the form somewhat slender, approaching the game; comb typically high and deeply serrated, although there are rose-combed varieties of some of the breeds; size small to medium. The hens are non-sitters, and very superior layers; the eggs are white. The colors vary according to the breed. The ear-lobes are enameled-white. The group includes the Andalusian, Leghorns, Minorcas, and white-faced black Spanish. — Spanish walnut oil. See oil. — Spanish white. See white. — Spanish woodbine. Same as Spanish arbor-vine. — Spanish wormseed. See wormseed. — To ride the Spanish mare. See ride. — To walk Spanish, to be forced to walk on tiptoe by another, who seizes one by the collar and by the seat of the trousers: a sport of boys; hence, to walk gingerly; act under the compulsion of another. [Colloq., U. S.]

II. n. 1. The language of Spain, one of the Romance languages, but much mixed with other elements and altered by them. Of its many dialects, that of Castile became the standard form in cultivated speech and literature, the language of which is hence distinctively called Castilian. It is the prevailing language in Mexico, Central America, and those countries of South America which were settled by Spaniards.

2. A white-faced black Spanish fowl. See Spanish fowl, under I.

Spanish-flag (span'ish-flag'), n. A scorpaenoid fish, Sebastes rubrivinctus, of the coast of California, attaining a length of fifteen inches, and in life one of the most brilliantly colored fishes in American waters. "Come on," said the cab-driver, sparring away like clockwork.
Dickens, Pickwick, II.

4. To bandy words; engage in a wordy contest, either angrily or humorously.

Well, Madam, what if, after all this sparring,
We both agree, like friends, to end our jarring?
Goldsmith, Epilogue spoken by Mrs. Bulkley and Miss Catley.

spar³ (spär), n. [Cf. spar³, v.] 1. A preliminary sparring action; a flourish of the arms and fists in putting one's self in the attitude of boxing. — 2. A sparring-match; a contest of boxing or striking; also, a cock-fight in which the contending cocks are not permitted to do each other serious harm, or in which they have their spurs covered with stuffed leather pads, so that they cannot cut each other.—3. A wordy contest; a skirmish of words.

spar¹ (spär), n. [= F. spar = Sp. espar, < L. sparus, < Gr. σπάρος, a kind of fish, the gilthead.] A sparoid fish; any species of Sparus. Rawlinson, Anc. Egypt.

sparable (spar'a-bl), n. [Formerly sperrable, sparrowble, a corruption of sparrow-bill, a nail so called on account of its resemblance to the bill of a sparrow: see sparrow-bill.] A kind of headless nail used for the soles and heels of coarse boots and shoes.

All shoemakers know what sparables are, and most of them, I think, know also that sparable is short for sparrowbill. The sparables are of two kinds—thin for soles, and thick for heels. In the trade they are called separately "bills" and "thick bills." . . . Heel sparables are going out of use, and a nail with a head is used instead.

N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 111.

Cob clouts his shoes, and, as the story tells,
His thumb-nailes par'd afford him sparables.

Herrick, Upon Cob.

Sparable tin, small crystals of tin-stone: so called from their imaginary resemblance to the kind of nail so named.

Foot, Mayor of Garratt, ii. 2.

sparagus (spar'a-gus), n. [An aphetic form of asparagus. Hence sparagrass, sparrow-grass.] Same as asparagus. Congreve, tr. of Eleventh Satire of Juvenal. [Obsolete or vulgar.]

Sparaxis (spa-rak'sis), n. [NL. (Ker, 1805), so named from the torn shreds fringing the spathe; < Gr. σπάραξις, a tearing, < σπαράσσειν, tear.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order Iridæ and tribe Iricæ. It is characterized by flowers with a short perianth-tube enlarged and bell-shaped above, unilateral erect stamens, and slender undivided recurved style-branches. The fruit is a membranous three-valved loculicidal capsule. There are 5 (or as some regard them 11) species, all natives of the Cape of Good Hope. They are bulbous plants with a slender stem bearing a few flat or sword-shaped erect or curving leaves, and handsome flowers, each solitary and sessile within a thin dry fringed spathe, marked with brown lines. They are valued as summer-flowering bulbs, and numerous low-growing varieties are in cultivation, especially of S. tricolor and S. grandiflora, of various colors from white to crimson, generally with a dark center. The bulb of S. bifida is edible. See harlequin-flower.

sparbulet, v. t. See sparple.

spar-buoy (spär'boi), n. A buoy for marking a channel, etc., made of a spar moored by one end so that the other end will stand up above the water. Spar-buoys are much used in navigable channels where ice runs swiftly. See cut under buoy.

Sparidae (spär'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sparus + -idae.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Sparus, to which different limits have been assigned; the sea-breams. (a) In the early system of Bonaparte, same as Cuvier's fourth family of acanthopterygian fishes (Sparoides), which included, besides the true Sparidae, many other fishes. (b) In Günther's system, a family of Acanthopterygii perciformes, having ventrals perfect, no bony stay for the preoperculum, a lateral line, and either a series of treacher teeth in the jaws or molars on the sides. (c) In Jordan and Gilbert's classification, acanthopterygian fishes of the ordinary type with the supramaxillary bones slipping under the preoperculum. It thus included not only the true Sparidae, but the Pristigasteridae, Lutjanidae, Pomacentridae, and Lobotidae. (d) By Gill restricted to fishes of an oblong compressed form with peculiar scales, continuous lateral line, head compressed, supramaxillary bones retractile under the suborbitals, dorsal with the spinous part depressible in a groove and about as long as the soft part, pectorals with lower rays branched, and ventrals subbrachial and complete. The family thus limited comprises numerous species, among which are some of the most esteemed of the temperate seas, such as the gilthead of Europe, and the sheephead and scup of the eastern American coast. Also Sparoides. See cuts under Pomacentrus, porgy, Scorpius, scup, and sheepshead.

sparidal (spär'i-dal), a. Same as sparoid.

Sparinae (spär'i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sparus + -inae.] A subfamily of sparoid fishes, typified by the genus Sparus, to which various limits have been assigned. (a) The genera Sparus, Sargus, and Charax: the Sparinae of Bonaparte. (b) By Jordan and Gilbert used for sparoids having molar teeth on the sides of the jaws, none on vomer, palatines, or tongue, entire opercle, and few pyloric caeca, including Sparus, Sargus, or Dipodus, and various other genera.

sparine (spär'in), a. and n. [< sparus + -ine.] 1. a. Sparoid, in a narrow sense; closely resembling a sparus; belonging to the Sparinae.

II. n. A sparoid fish of the subfamily Sparinae.

sparing (spär'ing), n. [< ME. sparynge; verbal n. of spare, v.] 1. Parsimony.

Sparynge. Parclmonia. Prompt. Parv., p. 467.

2. pl. That which is saved by frugality or economy; savings. [Rare.]

Shak., Rich. III., III. 5. 83.

sparingness (spär'ing-nes), n. The character of being sparing or inclined to spare; especially, frugality, scantiness, or the like: as, the sparingness of one's diet.

A year afterward he entered the ministry again, and lived with the utmost sparingness. George Eliot, Felix Holt, vi.

spark (spärk), n. [< ME. sparke, sperke, sparc, sparc, sparke, < AS. spearca, spearca = MD. sparcke, spercke, D. spark = MLG. LG. sparke (> OF. esparque), a spark; perhaps so called from the crackling of a firebrand: cf. Icel. Sw. spraka = Dan. sprage, crackle, Lith. sprageti, crackle, Gr. σπάραγος, a crackling, Skt. √sphūrj, rumble.] 1. A particle of ignited substance emitted from a body in combustion; a fiery particle thrown off by burning wood, iron, powder, or other substance.

He muhte . . . blown so litheliche thet sum sperke muhte awieklen. Aueren Ricle, p. 96.

Man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward. Job v. 7.

Hence—2. A scintillating or flying emanation, literally or figuratively; anything resembling a spark of fire: as, sparks from a gem; a spark of wit.

To try if it were possible to get a spark of human spirit out of you. Scott, Woodstock, v.

For all the haft twinkled with diamond sparks. Tennyson, Passing of Arthur.

3. A small diamond used with many others to form a setting or frame, as to a cameo or a miniature painting; also, a distinct crystal of diamond with the natural curved edges, suitable for glaziers' use.

This madonna invites me to a banquet for my discourse, to other . . . sends me a spark, a third a ruby, a fourth an emerald. Shirley, Bird in a Cage, II. 1.

These writing diamonds are sparks set in steel tubes much like everpoint pencils. Lea, Photography, p. 427.

4. A separate bit or particle of fire or burning matter in an otherwise inert body or mass; hence, a bit of anything, material or immaterial, comparable to this in its nuclear character or possible extension of activity.

If any spark of life be unquench'd in her,
This will recover her. Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, III. 2.

If the true spark of religious and civil liberty be kindled, it will burn. D. Webster, Speech, Bunker Hill Monument, June 17, 1825.

Electric spark, the luminous effect produced when a sudden disruptive electrical discharge takes place between two charged conductors, or between two conductors at different electric potentials. The length of the spark depends primarily upon the difference of potential of the two charged bodies; it is hence in general a conspicuous phenomenon with high-potential frictional electricity, and not with ordinary voltaic currents. See electricity.—Fairy sparks. See fairy.

spark (spärk), v. [< ME. sparcen, < AS. spearcian = MLG. LG. sparcen, emit sparks; from the noun: see spark, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit sparks, as of fire or electricity; sparkle or scintillate. Spenser.—2. In elect., to produce sparks at points where the continuity of the circuit is interrupted. The production of sparks is due to the formation of a small arc between the extremities of the broken conductor, and also to self-induction in the circuit. Sparking often takes place between the collecting brushes and the commutator of the dynamo. It is injurious to the machine, aside from the actual dissipation of energy which it involves. It also occurs to an injurious degree in other electrical apparatus in which currents are frequently interrupted. Various measures are resorted to for the purpose of reducing it to a minimum or avoiding it altogether. See spark-arrester, 3.

There is no *spark*ing at the brushes. S. P. Thompson, Dynamo-Elect. Mach., p. 113.

II. trans. 1. To affect by sparks, as of electricity; act upon by the emission or transmission of sparks. [Recent.]

The insulation is apt to be *spark*ed through and spoiled. Elect. Rev. (Eng.), XXIV. 550.

Whenever a large Leyden jar is *spark*ed through the coil. Philos. Mag., XXVII. 339.

2. To splash with dirt. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

spark (spärk), n. [Usually associated with spark, sparkish, sparkling, etc., but perhaps a var. of sprack (cf. ME. sparklich, var. of sprackliche), < Icel. sparkr, usually transposed sprækr, sprightly: see sprack.] 1. A person of a gay or sprightly character; a gay, lively, showy man (or, rarely, in former use, woman); a "blade" or roysterer.

Robbin Hood upon him set
With his courageous sparkes.
True Tale of Robin Hood (Child's Ballads, V. 558).

I will wed thee
To my great widows daughter and sole heire,
The lovely spark, the bright Laodice.
Chapman, Widdowes Teares, I. (Davies.)

Their worthy father . . . was, at his years, nearly as wild a spark. Sheridan, School for Scandal, I. 2.

2. A lover; a gallant; a beau. [Colloq.]

Fly to your spark; he'll tell you more of the matter. Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, III.

spark (spärk), v. [< spark, n.] I. intrans. To play the spark or gallant; court. [Colloq.]

A sure sign that his master was courting, or, as it is termed, *spark*ing, within. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 432.

The boys that do a good deal of *spark*ing and the girls that have a lot of beaux don't always get married first. E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xxxiii.

II. trans. To pay attention to, especially with a view to marriage; court; play the gallant to, in a general sense: as, he is *spark*ing Miss Doe; to spark a girl home. [Colloq.]

spark-arrester (spärk'a-res'tēr), n. 1. A fender of wire netting.—2. A netting or cage of wire placed over the smoke-stack of a steam-engine. In some arresters a deflector is placed in the stack, against which the sparks strike, and fall into a reservoir below. Also called spark-consumer.

3. A device for preventing injurious sparking in electrical apparatus at points where frequent interruptions of the circuit occur, as in telegraph-keys, relays, and similar instruments. It consists in some cases of a spark-coil or high-resistance connective across the point of interruption, so that the circuit is never actually broken, but only greatly reduced. In others it is a condenser whose plates are connected each with one extremity of the broken circuit. In this case the energy of the current induced on breaking is expended in charging the condenser. Also *spark*er.

spark-condenser (spärk'kōn-den'sēr), n. In elect., an instrument having a glass cage in which a spark may be passed between the battery connections. It is used for burning metals or obtaining the spectra of gases, and is designed to isolate the atmosphere in which the experiment is conducted, so as to eliminate accidental disturbing causes, and also to enable the experiment to take place in an atmosphere of any required condensation or tenuity.

spark-consumer (spärk'kōn-sū'mēr), n. In a steam-engine, a spark-arrester.

spark (spärk), a. [< spark + -ed.] Variegated. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

spark (spärk), a. [< spark + -ed.] Having a streaked or variegated back; streaked-back: as, the spark-back plover, the turnstone. [Local, Massachusetts.]

spark (spärk), n. [< spark + -er.] Same as spark-arrester, 3.

sparkful (spärk'fūl), a. [< spark + -ful.] Sparkish.

Hitherto will our *spark*ful youth laugh at their great grandfather's English. Camden, Remains, Languages.

sparkish (spär'kish), a. [< spark + -ish. Cf. spark.] Gay; jaunty; sprightly; showy; fine.

I have been detained by a *spark*ish coxcomb, who pretended a visit to me. Wycherley, Country Wife, IV. 2.

A daw, to be *spark*ish, trick'd himself up with all the gay feathers he could muster. Sir R. L'Estrange.

sparkle (spär'kl), v.; pret. and pp. sparkled, ppr. sparkling. [Early mod. E. also sparkle, sparkle; < ME. sparcken, spearclen, sperclen (= MD. sparckelen); freq. of spark. Cf. sparkle, n.] I. intrans. 1. To emit sparks; send off small ignited particles, as burning fuel, etc.—2. To shine as if giving out sparks; glitter; glisten; scintillate, literally or figuratively: as, a brilliant *spark*les; a *spark*ling beauty; *spark*ling wit.

The Sea seemed all of a Fire about us; for every sea that broke *spark*led like Lightning. Dampier, Voyages, I. 414.

The rosy sky,
With one star *spark*ling through it like an eye. Byron, Don Juan, II. 183.

Sparkling heat, such a heat as produces sparks; especially, a degree of heat in a piece of iron or steel that causes it to sparkle or emit sparks under the hammer; a welding-heat.—Sparkling wine, wine characterized by the presence or the emission of carbonic-acid gas in little bubbles which sparkle or glisten in the light.—Syn. 1 and 2. Scintillate, Glitter, etc. (see glare, v. t.), coruscate.

II. trans. 1. To emit with coruscations; throw out sparkingly.

The bright glister of their beames cleare
Did sparkle forth great light.

Spenser, F. Q., III. i. 32.

2. To scatter; disperse. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

The riches of Darius was left alone, and lay sparkled abroad o'er all the fields.

J. Brende, tr. of Quintus Curtius, III. 43.

3†. To sprinkle; spatter.

The pavement of the temple is all sparkled with bludde.
Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, (ed. Arber, p. 196).

sparkle (spär'kl), n. [< ME. sparkle, sparcle, with dim. -le, -el, < sparkl; or < sparkle, v.] 1. A spark; an ignited or a luminous particle; or something comparable to it; a scintillation; a gleam.

Foure gledes han we, whiche I shal devyse, Avaunting, llyng, anger, covetlisse,
Thise foure sparkles longen unto elde.

Chaucer, Prolog, to Reeve's Tale, l. 31.

And drove his heel into the smoulder'd log,
That sent a blast of sparkles up the flue.

Tennyson, Morte d'Arthur.

2. The act or state of sparkling; emission of sparks or scintillations; sparkling luminosity or luster: used literally or figuratively.

Swift as the sparkle of a glancing star
I shoot from heaven, to give him safe convoy.

Milton, Comus, l. 80.

A zest and sparkle ran through every part of the paper.
G. S. Merriam, S. Bowles, II. 359.

sparkleberry (spär'kl-ber'i), n. Same as farkleberry.

sparkler (spär'klér), n. [< sparkle + -er.] 1. A thing which or a person who sparkles; that which or one who gives off scintillations, as of light, beauty, or wit: often applied specifically to gems, especially the diamond.

But what would you say, should you see a Sparkler shaking her elbow for a whole night together, and thumping the table with a dice-box? Addison, Guardian, No. 120.

It (Mercury) keeps so near the sun . . . that very few people have ever seen the brilliant sparkler.

H. W. Warren, Astronomy, p. 113.

2. One of various species of tiger-beetles (Cicindela): so called in allusion to their shining or sparkling appearance when running in the sunshine. See cuts under Cicindela.

sparkless (spär'les), a. [< sparkl + -less.] Free from sparks; not emitting sparks: as, a sparkless commutator. Electric Review (Eng.), XXVI. 203.

sparklessly (spär'les-li), adv. Without the emission of sparks.

sparklet (spär'let), n. [< sparkl + -let.] A small spark, or minute sparkle; a scintillating speck. [Rare.]

sparkliness (spär'li-nes), n. Sparklingness; sparkling vivacity. Aubrey, Lives (John Suckling).

sparklingly (spär'ling-li), adv. In a sparkling manner; with twinkling or vivid brilliancy.

sparklingness (spär'ling-nes), n. The quality of being sparkling; vivid and twinkling luster.

spark-netting (spär'net'ing), n. A spark-arrester or spark-consumer.

sparkling (spär'ling), n. [Also sperling, spirling, sporling, spurling; < ME. sparlynge, sperlyng, sperlynge, spurylunge = MLG. sperlink = G. sperling (> OF. esperlanc, esperlan, F. éperlan; ML. sperlingus), a smelt; cf. D. spiering, a smelt.] 1. A smelt. [Prov. Eng.]

For sprats and spurtings for your house.

Tusser, Husbandry.

2. A samlet; a smolt. [Wales.]

sparkling (spär'ling), n. [Also spurling; < spearl + -ling, from the sharp, picked bill.] A tern or sea-swallow. [Prov. Eng.]

sparling-fowl (spär'ling-foul), n. The goosander or merganser, especially the female. J. Latham.

sparliret, n. [ME., also sparlyre, sperlire, sparlyer, sperlyuer, the calf of the leg, a muscle, < AS. spærlira, sperlira, spearlira, < spær, spare, + lira, fleshy part of the body without fat or bone: see spare and lire.] The calf of the leg.

Smytt thee the Lord with the moost yuel biel in knees, and in sparyguers.

Wyck, Deut. xxviii. 35.

spar-maker (spär'mä'kér), n. A carpenter whose special business is the making of masts, yards, etc.

Sparmannia (spär-man'i-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus filius, 1781), named after Andreas Sparmann or Sparrmann, a Swedish naturalist of the 18th century.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Tiliaceæ, the linden family, and of the tribe Tiliæ. It is characterized by the outer stamens being without anthers, the numerous inner ones perfect, and by aglobose or ovoid capsule which is echinate with rigid bristles. There are three species, natives of tropical or southern Africa. They are shrubs or trees with soft stellate pubescence, bearing toothed or lobed heart-shaped leaves and white flowers in small terminal umbelliform cymes which are surrounded by an involucre of short bracts. S. Africana is a handsome greenhouse-shrub reaching from 6 to 12 feet high, with ornamental long-stalked leaves and downy white flowers with yellow and brown sterile stamens. It produces a fiber of very fine texture, known as African hemp, and recommended for its strength and beautiful silver-gray color.

sparoid (spä'roid), a. and n. [< NL. Sparus + -oid.] 1. a. Resembling a sea-bream; of or pertaining to the Sparidae in a broad sense. Also sparidal.—Sparoid scales, scales characteristic of sparoid fishes—thin, wide, with lines of growth proceeding from their hind border. Agassiz.

II. n. A sparoid fish.

Sparoidæ (spä-roi'dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Sparidae.

sparplet (spär'pl), v. t. [Also sparble; < ME. sparplen, sparpyllen, < OF. esparpeiller, F. éparpiller, scatter, fly off like a butterfly, = Pr. esparpalhar = It. sparpagliare, scatter, fly off like a butterfly. Cf. disparple.] To scatter; spread abroad; disperse.

Thel made the renges to sparple a-brode.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), III. 396.

sparret, n. and v. An obsolete form of sparl.

sparter (spär'ér), n. One who spars; one who practises boxing. Thackeray, Adventures of Philip, vii.

sparrow (spär'ô), n. [< ME. sparowe, sparuwe, sparewe, sparwe, < AS. spearwa, spearewa, in early glosses spearwa, = OHG. sparo (sparic), sparwe, MHG. spär (MHG. dim. sperling, sperling) = Icel. spörr = Sw. sparf = Dan. spurv = Goth. sparwa, a sparrow; prob. from the root of spur, spurn, 'kick, quiver': see spur. Cf. MD. sparwer, sperwer, D. sperwer = MLG. sparwer, sperwer = OHG. sparwari, sparcári, MHG. sperwære, sparwære, G. sperber (cf. It. spaviere, spariere = Pr. esparvier = OF. espervier, F. épervier, in ML. sparcarius, sparacarius, esparvius, < OHG., cf. Sp. esparaván), a sparrow-hawk, lit. 'sparrow-eagle,' the second element being OHG. aro (in comp. -ari), eagle: see earn. Cf. sparver, spavin.] 1. The house-sparrow, Passer domesticus, a fringilline bird of Europe, which has been imported and naturalized in America, Australia, and other countries. It is about 6 inches long and 9½ in extent of wings. The upper parts of the male are ashy-gray, boldly streaked on the back with black and bay; there is a dark-chestnut or mahogany spot on each side of the neck; the lesser wing-coverts are chestnut; the median are tipped with white, forming a wing-bar; the greater coverts and inner secondaries have a black field bordered with gray; and the lower parts are ashy or gray, with jet-black on the throat, spreading on the breast, and bordered on the side of the neck with white. The female is similar, but more plainly feathered, lacking the distinctive head-markings of the male. The sparrow is a constrictal granivorous bird, whose food is principally seeds and grain, yet it has been introduced in many countries for the purpose of destroying noxious insects. It is extremely hardy, pugnacious, and prolific, rearing several large broods annually. Of all birds the sparrow naturally attaches itself most closely to man, and easily modifies its habits to suit artificial conditions of environment. It is thus one of several animals, as rats, mice, and other vermin, well fitted to survive under whatever conditions man may offer or enforce; hence it wins in competition with the native birds of the foreign countries where it naturalizes, without as readily developing counteractive agencies to check its increase. It speedily becomes a pest wherever introduced, and seldom destroys noxious insects to any appreciable extent. It was brought into the United States from Germany about 1839, and is now probably more numerous than any single native bird. In New York city thousands of sparrows are sold and eaten as reed-birds. See cut under Passer. 2. Some or any fringilline bird resembling the sparrow, as Passer montanus, the tree-sparrow; one of various finches and buntings, mostly of plain coloration. In the United States the name is given, with a qualifying word, to very many small sparrow-like birds, mostly of homely streaked coloration. Chipping- or field-sparrows belong to the genus Spizella; crown-sparrows to Zonotrichia; fox-sparrows to Passerella; grasshopper-sparrows to Coturniculus; the grass-sparrow to Pooecetes; the lark-sparrow to Chondestes; sage-sparrows to Amphispiza; savanna-sparrows to Passerculus; seaside sparrows to Ammodramus; snow-sparrows to Junco; song-sparrows to Melospiza. See cuts under Chondestes, Coturniculus, Embernagra, field-sparrow, grassfinch, sage-sparrow, savanna-sparrow, snowbird, and song-sparrow.

3. Some little bird likened to or mistaken for a sparrow. Thus, the hedge-sparrow is the hedge-chantrel, Acceptor modularis, and some other warblers are loosely called sparrows.—Bush-sparrow, the hedge-sparrow, Acceptor modularis.—English sparrow, the common European house-sparrow, Passer domesticus: so called in the United States. See def. 1.—Green-tailed sparrow, Blanding's finch. See finch.—Java sparrow, the rice-bird of Java, Amadina (Munia) oryzivora, about as large as the bobolink, of a bluish-gray color with pink bill and white ear-coverts: a well-known cage-bird.—Sandwich sparrow, a variety of the common savanna-sparrow found in Alaska.—White-throated sparrow, a crown-sparrow. (See also field-sparrow, hedge-sparrow, hill-sparrow, house-sparrow, reed-sparrow, satin-sparrow, water-sparrow, and other compounds noted in def. 2.)

sparrow-bill (spär'ô-bil), n. 1. The bill of a sparrow.—2. A kind of shoe-nail: the original form of sparable.

Hob-nails to serve the man I th' moone,
And sparrowsbills to cloute Pan's shooes.

Dekker, London's Tempe.

sparrowblet (spär'ô-bl), n. Same as sparrow-bill, 2, sparable.

sparrow-grass (spär'ô-gräs), n. [A corruption, simulating spurrow + grass, of sparagras, itself a corruption of sparagus for asparagus.] Asparagus. [Prov. or vulgar.]—French sparrow-grass, the sprouts of the spiked star-of-Bethlehem, Ornithogalum Pyrenaicum, sold to be eaten as asparagus. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants. [Prov. Eng.]

sparrow-hawk (spär'ô-häk), n. [Also contr. sparhawk; < ME. spar-hawk, sperhawk, < AS. spearhafoc, spearhabuc, spærhabuc (= Icel. sparrhaukr = Sw. sparfök = Dan. spurvehög), < spearwa, sparrow, + hafoc, hawk: see sparrow and hawk.] For the D., G., and Rom. names for 'sparrow-hawk,' see under sparrow.] 1. One of several small hawks which prey on sparrows and other small birds. (a) A hawk of the genus Accipiter or Nisus. In Great Britain the name is appropriated to A. nisus, or Nisus fringillarius, about 12 inches long, closely related to the sharp-shinned hawk of America. (b) In the United States, a hawk of the genus Falco and subgenus Tinnunculus, especially F. (T.) sparverius, which abounds in nearly all parts of the country, and is known in books as the rusty-crowned falcon and prairie-hawk. It is 10 or 11 inches long, and from 20 to 23 in extent of wings. The adult is ashy-blue on the crown, with a chestnut spot; on the back cinnamon-rufous, the male having few black marks or none, and the female numerous black bars. The wing-coverts in the male are ashy-blue, usually spotted with black; in the female cinnamon barred with black. The tail is bright-chestnut in the male with a broad subterminal black band, and the outer feathers mostly white with black bars; in the female barred throughout with black. The under parts are white, variously tinted with buff or tawny, in the male with few black spots if any; in the female with many dark-brown stripes. The bill is dark horn-blue; the cere and feet are yellow or orange. It is an elegant and spirited falcon, breeding in hollows of trees, building no nest, but often taking possession of a woodpecker's hole. The female lays five, six, or seven

It is an elegant and spirited falcon, breeding in hollows of trees, building no nest, but often taking possession of a woodpecker's hole. The female lays five, six, or seven subspheeroidal eggs, 1 1/2 inches long by 1 1/2 inches broad, of a buffy or pale-yellowish ground-color, spotted and splashed all over with dark brown. Several similar sparrow-hawks inhabit America, and various other species, of both the genera named, are found in most parts of the world.

2. In silver-working, a small anvil with two horns (one flat-sided and pyramidal, the other conical in form), held between the knees of the workman, for use in flanging, making bezels, etc.

sparrow-owl (spar'ō-oul), n. Any one of many small owls of the genus Glaucidium. Two occur in western parts of the United States, G. gnoma, the gnome-owl, and G. ferrugineum. See cut under Glaucidium.

sparrow-tail (spar'ō-tāl), n. and a. 1. n. Something formed like a sparrow's tail; a swallow-tail.

These long-tailed coats [in 1786] . . . were cut away in front to a sparrow-tail behind. Fairholt, Costume, I. 401.

II. a. Having a long skirt cut away at the sides and squared off at the end: as, a sparrow-tail coat (now usually called swallow-tail).

The lawyers in their blue sparrow-tail coats with brass buttons, which constituted them [about 1840] a kind of professional uniform, moved about with as much animation as uneasy jay-birds. E. Eggleston, The Graysons, xvi.

sparrow-tonguet (spar'ō-tung), n. The knot-grass, Polygonum aviculare.

sparrowwort (spar'ō-wört), n. 1. Any plant of the genus Passerina.—2. A South African species of heath, Erica Passerina.

sparry (spär'i), a. [< spar² + -y¹.] Resembling spar; consisting of or abounding with spar; spathose.

As the rude cavern's sparry sides
When past the miner's taper glides. J. Baillie.

The rock . . . is a sparry iron ore, which turns reddish brown on exposure to the weather.

J. Croft, Climate and Time, p. 308.

sparry iron, sparry iron ore, a carbonate of iron: same as siderite. 2. The clay-ironstones, or the clay-bands and black-bands of the coal and other formations, belong to this family of iron ores.

sparsate (spär'sät), a. [< sparse + -ate¹.] In entom., thinly scattered; sparse: as, sparsate punctures. [Rare.]

sparse (spärs), a. [< OF. espars, F. épars = Pg. esperso, scattered, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter, sprinkle (> It. spargere = Sp. esparcir = Pg. espargir, scatter): see sparge. Cf. sparse, v., sperse, disperse.] 1. Thinly scattered; dispersed round about; existing at considerable intervals; as used of population or the like, not dense. [Sparse has been regarded, falsely, as an Americanism, and has been objected to as being exactly equivalent to scattered, and therefore unnecessary. As a merely qualifying adjective, however, it is free from the possible ambiguity inherent in the participial form and consequent verbal implication of scattered.]

A sparse remnant of yellow leaves falling slowly athwart the dark evergreens. George Eliot, Middlemarch, ix.

The sparse populations of new districts.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Probs. of Greater Britain, II. 1.

Halley . . . was one of the first to discuss the possible luminosity of sparse masses of matter in space.

Nineteenth Century, XXVI. 788.

2. In bot., scattered; placed distantly or irregularly without any apparent or regular order: applied to branches, leaves, peduncles, etc.—

3. In zool., spare or remote, as spots or other markings; scattered irregularly; few or scanty, as hairs or other appendages.

sparsel (spärs), v. t. [< OF. esparsier, esparsier, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter: see sparse, a. Cf. sperse, disperse, sparge.] To disperse; scatter.

As when the hollow flood of aire in Zephires cheeks doth swell,
And sparseth all the gathered clouds.

Chapman, Illad, xi. 208.

He [God] opens his hand wide, he sparseth abroad his blessings, and fills all things living with his plenteousness.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, II. 418.

sparsely (spärs'li), adv. 1. In a scattered or sparse manner; scantily; widely apart, as regards population, etc.; thinly.

The country between Trinity river and the Mississippi is sparsely settled, containing less than one inhabitant to the square mile.

Omsted, Texas, p. 365.

2. In bot. and zool., so as to be sparse, thin, few, or scanty; sparsely or sparingly. See sparse, a., 2, 3.

sparseness (spärs'nes), n. The state of being sparse; scattered condition; wide separation: as, sparseness of population.

The sparseness of the wires in the magnet coils and the use of the single cup battery were to me . . . obvious marks of defect.

The Century, XXXV. 931.

sparsile (spär'sil), a. [< LL. sparsilis, < L. sparsus, pp. of spargere, scatter: see sparse.] Scattered; sparse.—Sparsile star, in astron., a star not included in a constellation-figure.

sparsity (spär'si-ti), n. [< sparse + -ity.] The state of being sparse or scattered about; freedom from closeness or compactness; relative fewness.

At receptions where the sparsity of the company permits the lady of the house to be seen, she is commonly visible on a sofa, surrounded by visitors in a half-circle.

Howells, Venetian Life, xxi.

spart (spärt), n. [= F. sparte = Sp. Pg. esparto = It. sparto, < L. spartum, < Gr. σπάρον, Spanish broom; a particular use of σπάρον, a rope, cable; cf. σπάρον, a rope. Cf. esparto.] 1. A plant of the broom kind; broom.

The nature of spart or Spanish broom.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, bk. xix. (Davies.)

2. A rush, Juncus articulatus, and other species. [Prov. Eng.] spartaite (spär'tä-it), n. [< Sparta (see def.) + -ite².] A variety of calcite or calcium carbonate, containing some manganese. It is found in Sparta, Sterling Hill, New Jersey.

Spartan (spär'tan), a. and n. [< L. Spartanus, < Sparta, < Gr. Σπάρτη, Sparta, Lacedæmon.]

I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Sparta or Lacedæmon, the capital of Laconia, or the ancient kingdom of Sparta or Lacedæmon (Laconia), in the Peloponnesus; Lacedæmonian; specifically, belonging to the branch of the ancient Dorian race dominant in Laconia.—2. Noting characteristics distinctive of, or considered as distinctive of, the ancient Spartans.

Lycurgus . . . sent the poet Thales from Crete to prepare and mollify the Spartan surliness with his smooth songs and odes, the better to plant among them law and civility.

Milton, Areopagitica.

Spartan dog, a bloodhound; hence, a cruel or blood-thirsty person.

O Spartan dog,

More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sea!

Shak., Othello, v. 2. 361.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Sparta or Laconia; a Lacedæmonian; specifically (as opposed to Lacedæmonian in a narrower sense), a member of that branch of the ancient Dorian race which conquered Laconia and established the kingdom of Sparta, celebrated for its military success and prestige, due to the rigid discipline enforced upon all Spartans from early childhood; a Spartan.

Spartanism (spär'tan-izm), n. [< Spartan + -ism.] The distinguishing spirit or a characteristic practice or quality of the ancient Spartans. See Spartan.

sparteine (spär'tē-in), n. [< Spart(ium) + -e-ine.] A liquid alkaloid (C₁₅H₂₆N₂) obtained from the common broom, Cytisus (Spartium) scoparius. In small doses (.02 to .05 gram) it stimulates the action of the vagus, and is used medicinally in the form of the sulphate in place of digitalis: it acts more quickly than the latter drug, but not as powerfully.

sparterie (spär'ter-i), n. [< F. sparterie, < Sp. esparteria, < esparto, Spanish grass, broom: see esparto, spart.] In com., a collective name for articles manufactured from esparto and its fiber, as mats, nets, cordage, and ropes.

spart-grass (spär't-gräs), n. Same as spart, 2; also, a cord-grass, Spartina stricta. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names.

sparth, n. [< ME. sparth, sparth, sperthe, an ax, a battle-ax, < Icel. sparth, a kind of Irish ax; perhaps akin to spear.] A battle-ax, or perhaps in some cases a mace.

He hath a sparth of twentil pound of wighte.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1662.

At his saddle-gerthe was a good steel sperthe,

Full ten pound weight and more.

Scott, Eve of St. John.

Spartiate (spär'ti-ät), n. [F., < L. Spartiates, < Gr. Σπαρτιάτης, a Spartan, < Σπάρτη, Sparta: see Spartan.] A citizen of Sparta; an ancient Laconian of the Dorian race. See Spartan.

Aristotle recognizes only one thousand families of the ancient Spartiates; and their landed possessions, the very groundwork of their state and its discipline, had in great measure passed into the hands of women.

Von Ranke, Univ. Hist. (trans.), p. 360.

Spartina (spär'ti-nä), n. [NL. (Von Schreber, 1789), so called from the tough leaves; < Gr. σπάρτιν, a cord, < σπάρην, σπάρον, a rope or cord.] A genus of grasses, of the tribe Panicæ. It is characterized by flowers with three glumes and a thread-shaped two-cleft style, grouped in dense one-sided commonly numerous and divergent panicle spikes with the rachis prolonged beyond the uppermost spikelet. There are 7 species, natives mostly of salt-marshes; one, S. stricta, is widely dispersed along the shores of America, Europe, and Africa; four others are found in the United States, one in South America beyond the tropics, and one in the islands of Tristan da Cunha, St. Paul, and Amsterdam. They are rigid reed-like grasses rising from a tufted or creeping base, with scaly rootstocks, very smooth sheaths, and long convolute leaves sometimes flattened at the base. Book-names for the species are marsh-grass, cord-grass, and salt-grass; four of them are among the most conspicuous maritime grasses of the United States. S. polytachya, the largest species, a stately plant with a broad stiff panicle often of fifty spikes, is known locally on the coast as creek-thatch and creek stuff, from its growth in creeks or inlets of salt water, and from its use, when cut, as a cover for stacks of salt-hay and as bedding in stables. (See also salt reed-grass, under reed-grass.) S. cynosuroides is the cord-grass of fresh-water lakes and rivers, smaller, attaining a height of about 6 feet; it occurs from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and in great quantities along the Mississippi: a superior brown wrapping-paper has been made from it. S. juncea, a low turf-forming species with diminutive three- to five-forked inflorescence, sometimes called rush salt-grass, covers large tracts of salt-marsh on the Atlantic coast, is recommended for binding wet sands, and yields a tough fiber from its leaves. S. stricta, the salt-marsh grass, with very different inflorescence, bears its numerous branches rigidly appressed into a single long and slender erect spike, or sometimes two, when it is called thin-spike grass. It is said to be also used as a durable thatch; it is succulent and is eagerly eaten by cattle, imparting to their milk, butter, and flesh a strong rancid flavor locally known as a "thatchy" taste.

Spantium (spär'shi-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. spartum, sparton, < Gr. σπάρον, Spanish broom: see spart, esparto.] A genus of leguminous plants, of the tribe Genistæ, type of the subtribe Sparticeæ. It is distinguished from the related genus Genista by a somewhat spathaceous calyx with very short teeth, by acuminate and incurved keel-petals, and by a narrower pod. The only species, S. juncea, is a native of the Mediterranean region and of the Canary Islands, known as Spanish broom, now naturalized in various parts of tropical America and long cultivated in gardens. It is a shrub with numerous long, straight, rush-like branches, which are green, polished, and round—not angular like the similar branches of the Irish broom. They are commonly without leaves; when these are present, they are composed each of a single leaflet and are without stipules. The handsome pea-like flowers form terminal racemes; they are yellow, fragrant, and highly attractive to bees, and are the source of a yellow dye. The branches are used to make baskets and fasten vines in vineyards; they yield by maceration a fiber which is made into cord and thread, and in Italy and Spain into cloth. The seeds in small doses are diuretic and tonic; in large, emetic and cathartic.

spartot (spär'tō), n. Same as esparto.

spart-torpedo (spär'tör-pē'dō), n. A torpedo secured to the end of a spar, rigged outboard of a vessel, and arranged to be fired on coming into contact with another vessel. Sometimes called pole-torpedo.

Sparus (spä'r-us), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1766), < L. sparus, < Gr. σπάρος, a kind of fish, the gilt-head.] 1. The name-giving genus of Sparidæ, whose longest-known representative is the gilt-head of Europe: used at first in a very comprehensive sense, embracing many heterogeneous species belonging to a number of modern families, but now restricted to the gilt-head and very closely related species, typical of the family Sparidæ. See cut under porgy.—2. [l. c.] A fish of this or some related genus; a spar.

sparve (spärv), n. [A dial. form of sparrow, ult. < AS. spearica: see sparrow.] A sparrow: still locally applied to the hedge-sparrow, Accentor modularis. [Cornwall, Eng.]

sparvert (spär'ver), n. [Also esparver; early mod. E. also sparrier, sparriour, sperver, sparvill; < OF. espervier, esprerier, the furniture of a bed; perhaps a transferred use of esparrier, esperrier, a sweep-net, which is a fig. use of es-pervier, a sparrow-hawk: see sparrow, and cf. pavilion, ult. < L. papilio (n.), a butterfly.] 1. The canopy of a bed, or the canopy and curtains taken together.

I will that my . . . daughter have the sparver of my bedde.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, App. A.

2. In her., a tent.

sparvliour, n. Same as sparver.

sparwet, n. A Middle English form of sparrow.

spary (spär'i), a. [< spar¹ + -y¹.] Springing.

Homer, being otherwise sparie ynough in speaking of pictures and colours, yet commendeth the ships painted therewith.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxxiii. 7.

spasm (spazm), n. [Early mod. E. spasme; < F. spasme = Pr. espasme = Sp. Pg. espasmo = It. spasimo, spasmo, < L. spasmus, < Gr. σπασμός, also σπάσμα, a spasm, < σπᾶν, draw, pull, pluck, tear, rend. Cf. span¹, space, from the same ult. root.] 1. Excessive muscular contraction. When this is persistent, it is called tonic spasm; when it consists of alternating contractions and relaxations, it is called clonic spasm. A spasm of one side of the body is called hemispasm; a spasm of some particular part, as one arm, or one side of the face, is called a monospasm. 2. In general, any sudden transitory movement of a convulsive character, voluntary or involuntary; an abnormally energetic action or phase of feeling; a wrenching strain or effort:

as, a spasm of industry, of grief, of fright, etc.; a spasm of pain or of coughing.

The spasms of Nature are centuries and ages, and will tax the faith of short-lived men. Slowly, slowly the Avenger comes, but comes surely. Emerson, Fugitive Slave Law.

Bronchial spasm, the spasmodic contraction of the muscular coat of the bronchial tubes which is the essential element of asthma. — Carpopedal, clonic, cynic, hysterical spasm. See the adjectives. — Functional spasm, a general term for the nervous disorders of artisans and writers, as writers' cramp, etc. Usually called occupation neurosis. — Habit spasm, a trick of winking, jerking the head, sudden brief grinning, making a sudden short vocal noise, running out the tongue, and similar acts of half-voluntary aspect, occurring at intervals long or short. Also called habit chorea. — Inspiratory spasm, a spasmodic contraction of all or nearly all the inspiratory muscles. — Mobile spasm, tonic spasm of varying intensity in the various muscles of a part, causing slow, irregular movements of the part, especially conspicuous in the hands. Sometimes the movements are quick. In rare cases it comes on without preceding hemiplegia; it may then, as in other cases, be called athetosis. Also called, when following hemiplegia, spastic hemiplegia and post-hemiplegic chorea. — Nictitating spasm. See nictitate. — Nodding spasm. Same as salaam convulsion (which see, under salaam). — Retrocolic spasm. See retrocolic. — Saltatorial spasm, a form of clonic spasm of the legs, coming on when the patient attempts to walk, causing jumping movements. — Spasm of accommodation, spasm of the ciliary muscle, producing accommodation for near objects. — Spasm of the chest, angina pectoris. — Spasm of the glottis, spasmodic contraction of the laryngeal muscles such as to close the glottis. See child-croaking, and laryngismus stridulus (under laryngismus). — Tetanic spasm. Same as tonic spasm.

spasmodic (spaz-mat'ik), a. [= F. spasmodique = Sp. espasmódico, < ML. spasmodicus, < Gr. σπασμωδ(τ-), a spasm; see spasm.] Same as spasmodic.

spasmodical (spaz-mat'ik-al), a. [< spasmodic + -al.] Same as spasmodic.

The Ligaments and Shewings of my Love to you have been so strong that they were never yet subject to such spasmodical Shrinkings and Convulsions.

Howell, Letters, II. 20.

spasmatomancy (spaz'mā-tō-man-si), n. [< Gr. σπασμα(τ-), a spasm, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination from spasmodic or involuntary movements, as of the muscles, features, or limbs.

The treatises [on physiognomy] also contain occasional digressions on onychomancy, . . . spasmatomancy, etc. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 4.

spasmodic (spaz-mod'ik), a. and n. [= F. spasmodique = Sp. espasmódico = Pg. espasmódico = It. spasmodico, < *NL. spasmodicus, < Gr. σπασμωδής, σπασματώδης, convulsive, spasmodic, < σπασμός, σπάσμα(τ-), a spasm, + είδος, form.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to, of the nature of, or characterized by spasm; affected by spasm or spasms; convulsive: as, spasmodic movements; spasmodic asthma; a spasmodic person. — 2. Attended by or manifesting procedure by fits and starts; jerky; overstrained; high-strung; rhapsodical: as, spasmodic action or efforts; spasmodic utterance or literature. — Spasmodic asthma, true asthma caused by spasm of the bronchial tubes, as distinguished from other forms of paroxysmal dyspnea, as from heart disease. — Spasmodic cholera, Asiatic cholera with severe cramps. — Spasmodic croup. See croup. — Spasmodic school, a group of British authors of the middle of the nineteenth century, including Philip Bailey, George Gilfillan, and Alexander Smith, whose writings were considered to be distinguished by an overstrained and unnatural style. The name, however, properly has a much more extensive scope, being exemplified more or less in nearly all times and countries, both in literature and in art.

The so-called spasmodic school of poetry, whose peculiarities first gained for it a hasty reputation, and then, having suffered under closer critical examination, it almost as speedily dropped out of mind again.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 172.

Spasmodic stricture, a stricture, as of the urethra, vagina, or rectum, caused by spasmodic muscular contraction, and not permanent, or involving any organic lesion. — Spasmodic tabes, spastic paraplegia, or lateral sclerosis.

II. n. Same as antispaasmodic. [Rare.]

spasmodical (spaz-mod'ik-al), a. [< spasmodic + -al.] Same as spasmodic.

spasmodically (spaz-mod'ik-al-i), adv. In a spasmodic manner; by fits and starts; by spasmodic action or procedure.

Gradual oscillations of the land arc, in the long run, of far greater importance in the economy of nature than those abrupt movements which occur spasmodically.

Huxley, Physiography, p. 205.

spasmodist (spaz'mō-dist), n. [< spasmodic + -ist.] One who acts spasmodically; a person whose work is of a spasmodic character, or marked by an overstrained and unnatural manner. [Rare.]

De Meyer and the rest of the spasmodists [in music]. Poe, Marginalia, xxxvii. (Davies.)

spasmology (spas-mol'ō-jī), n. [< Gr. σπασμός, a spasm, + -λογία, < λόγος, speak: see -ology.] In pathol., scientific knowledge of spasms.

spasmodotoxin (spas-mō-tok'sin), n. [< Gr. σπασμός, a spasm, + E. toxin.] A toxin of unknown composition, obtained by Brieger in 1887 from cultures of bacillus tetani.

spasmus (spas'mus), n. [L.: see spasm.] Spasm. — Spasmus nutans. Same as salaam convulsion (which see, under salaam).

spastic (spas'tik), a. [< Gr. σπαστικός, drawing, pulling, stretching, < σπᾶν, draw, pull: see spasm.] 1. In med., pertaining or relating to spasm; spasmodic: as, spastic contractions; spastic remedies. — 2. In zool., convulsive, as an infusorian; or of pertaining to the Spastica. — Spastic albuminuria, albuminuria dependent upon a convulsive attack. — Spastic anemia, local anemia or ischemia from spastic contraction of the arteries of the part. — Spastic hemiplegia, mobile spasm following hemiplegia. See under spasm. — Spastic infantile paralysis. See paralysis. — Spastic paralysis, paralysis with muscular rigidity and increase of reflexes. — Spastic spinal paralysis, spastic pseudoparalysis, spastic pseudoparesis. See paralysis.

Spastica (spas'ti-kī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σπαστικός, drawing, pulling, stretching: see spastic.] In Perty's system of classification, a division of ciliate infusorians, containing those which contract and change form with a jerk. There were 4 families: — Urceolarina, Ophrydina, Vorticellina, and Vaginifera.

spastically (spas'ti-kal-i), adv. In a spastic manner.

spasticity (spas-tis'i-ti), n. [< spastic + -ity.] 1. A state of spasm. — 2. Tendency to or capability of suffering spasm.

spat¹ (spat), n. [A var. of spot.] A spot; stain; place. [Scotch.]

spat¹ (spat), v. t.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [A var. of spot, prob. in part < D. spalten, spot: see spot. Cf. spatter.] To spatter; defile.

Thy mind is spotted, spatted, spilt;

Thy soul is soiled with sinne.

Kendall, Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

spat² (spat), n. [Prob., like the similar D. spat, a speck, spot, = Sw. spott, spittle, etc. (see spot), from the root of *spit*² (cf. *spit*¹): see *spit*².] The spawn of shell-fish; specifically, the spawn of the oyster; also, a young oyster, or young oysters collectively, up to about the time of their becoming set, or fixed to some support. See spawn, n., 2.

Oyster spat may be reared from artificially fertilized eggs. The American, VII. 75.

spat² (spat), v.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [*< spat*², n.] I. intrans. To spawn, as an oyster; shed spat.

The surfaces upon which spatting occurs must be kept as free as possible from sediment and organic growths. Science, VI. 465.

II. trans. To shed or emit (spawn), as an oyster.

spat³ (spat), n. [In the sense 'blow' (def. 1), cf. spot; in part prob. imitative, like pat.] 1. A light blow or slap. [Local.] — 2. A large drop; a spatter: as, two or three spats of rain fell. — 3. A petty contest; a little quarrel or dissension. [U. S.]

They was pretty apt to have spats.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 33.

spat³ (spat), v.; pret. and pp. spatted, ppr. spatting. [*< spat*³, n.] I. trans. To give a light blow to, especially with the flat of the hand; strike lightly; slap: as, to spat dough; to spat one's hands together.

The little Isabel leaped up and down, spatting her hands.

S. Judd, Margaret.

II. intrans. To engage in a trivial quarrel or dispute; have a petty contest. [U. S.]

spat⁴ (spat). A preterit of *spit*².

spat⁵ (spat), n. [Also spatt; usually or only in pl. spats, spatts; abbr. of spatterdashies.] A gaiter or legging. [Scotland and North of England.]

[Cloth gaiters seem to have revived, after about thirty years of disuse, and are now called spats.]

N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 87.

A pair of black spats covering broad flat feet.

N. Macleod, The Starling, III.

Spatangida (spā-tan'ji-dā), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -ida.] The spatangoid sea-urchins, as distinguished from Clypeastrida. See Spatangoida.

Spatangidæ (spā-tan'ji-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -idæ.] A family of irregular sea-urchins, typified by the genus Spatangus; the heart-urchins. The mouth is eccentric, transverse, or reniform, and without dentary apparatus; there are petaloid ambulacra, of which the anterior one is unpaired; semite or fascioles are always present; and the figure is oval or cordate. This is the leading family of the order divided mainly by the characters of the ambulacra and semite into several subfamilies (some of which rank as separate families with some authors), as Ananchytinæ, Brissinæ, Leskianæ, and others. See cuts under Spatangoida and Spatangus, with others there noted. Also called Brissidæ.

Spatangina (spat-an'ji-nā), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -ina.] 1. The spatangoid sea-urchins, as an order of petalostichous echinoids contrasted with Clypeastrina. — 2. Same as Spatanginæ.

Spatanginæ (spat-an'ji-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatangus + -inæ.] One of several subfamilies of Spatangidæ, including the genus Spatangus and closely related forms, as Lorenina, Breynia, etc.

spatangite (spā-tan'jit), n. [< Spatangus + -ite.] A fossil spatangoid. See Dysasteridæ, and cut under Ananchytes.

spatangoid (spā-tang'goid), a. and n. [< Spatangus + -oid.] I. a. Resembling a heart-urchin; related to Spatangus; of or pertaining to the Spatangidæ in a broad sense.

II. n. A spatangoid sea-urchin; a heart-urchin.

Spatangoida, Spatangoidea (spat-ang-goi'dā, -dē-i), n. pl. [NL.: see spatangoid.] The Spatangidæ, in a broad sense, as an order of petalostichous sea-urchins: synonymous in some uses with Petalosticha, but usually restricted to exclude the clypeastroids or flat sea-urchins; then also called Spatangida and Spatangina. The forms are numerous; most of them fall in the family Spatangidæ as usually limited, from which the Cassidulidæ are distinguished by the absence of semite and other approaches to the regular sea-urchin. The form of the spatangoids is various, and only a part of them have a cordate figure. Some are quite elongate, and may even bear a sort of beak or rostrum, as in the genus Fourtalesia. The tendency is away from radism and toward a sort of bilateral symmetry, as evidenced by the disposition of five ambulacra in two groups, an anterior trivium — under the odd ambulacrum of which is the mouth — and a posterior bivium, in relation a, anterior ambulacrum, forming with b, d, anterolateral ambulacra, the trivium; c, e, two posterolateral ambulacra, forming the bivium; d, madreporic tubercle surrounded by genital pores; e, intrapetulous semite or fasciole; f, circumanal semite.

with which is the anus. The odd anterior ambulacrum often aborts, leaving apparently but four ambulacra on the upper surface; in other cases it is disproportionately enlarged. The ambulacra are always petaloid; semite are not recognized outside this group, and occur nearly throughout it (but not in Cassidulidæ and the fossil Dynasteridæ); the spines are very variable, and few or many, but always slender or fine, sometimes like hairs of great length. The genital and ocular plates are centric; there are no Polian vesicles, and four kinds of pedicels or tube-feet occur, of which the semital are always different from the two or three kinds of ambulacral feet. See cuts under Ananchytes, Echinocardium, petalostichous, semite, and Spatangus.

Spatangus (spā-tang'gus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπαγγος, a sea-urchin.] 1. The representative genus of the family Spatangidæ, and a type form of the irregular sea-urchins called Spatangoida. — 2. [l. c.] A species of this genus: as, the violet spatangus, S. purpureus.

spatch-cock (spach'kok), n. [Usually supposed to stand for despatch-cock*, meaning 'a cock quickly done'; but such a formation is irregular, and no record of it exists. There is prob. some confusion with spitchcock, q. v.] A fowl killed and immediately broiled, as for some sudden occasion. [Colloq., Eng.]

spate (spāt), n. [Also spait, speat; appar. < Ir. speid, a great river-flood.] A natural outpour of water; a flood; specifically, a sudden flood or freshet, as from a swollen river or lake. [Originally Scotch.]

Down the water wif speed she rins,

While tears in spats fa' fast frae her eie.

Jock o' the Side (Child's Ballads, VI. 82).

Mr. Scrope held that whole spawning-beds are swept away by spates on the Tweed.

Quarterly Rev., CXXVI. 361.

The Avon . . . running yellow in spate, with the recent heavy rains.

W. Black, House-boat, xix.

spate-bonet, n. Same as spade-bone.

Some afterwards set up on a window a painted Mastiff-dog gnawing the spate-bone of a shoulder of mutton.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., V. 1. 32. (Davies.)

Violet Spatangus (S. purpureus). One half shown with its spines removed.

spatha (spā'thā), n.; pl. spathæ (-thē). [L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad flat blade, a broadsword: see spathe.] 1. A broadsword, thin, pointed, and double-edged, such as was used by the Franks and kindred peoples.

The British swords, called spathæ, were large, long, and heavy. Encyc. Brit., IX. 69.

2. In bot., same as spathe.

spathaceous (spā-thā'shius), a. [spathe + -aceous.] In bot., spathe-bearing; furnished with or of the nature of a spathe.

spathal (spā'thal), a. [spathe + -al.] In bot., inclosed in or furnished with a spathe: as, spathal flowers.

spathe (spā'th), n. [L. spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad flat blade, a broadsword, a broad rib, the shoulder-blade, the stem of a leaf, the spathe of a flower, a spatula. Hence ult. (< Gr.) *E. spade*¹, *spade*², spatula, spatule, *spattle*², spadille, *spittle*³, etc.] 1. In bot., a peculiar often large and colored bract, or pair of bracts, which subtend or envelop a spadix, as in palms and arums. The name is also given to the peculiar several-leaved involucre of iris and allied plants. See spadix, 1, and cuts under Araceæ, Indian turnip (under Indian), Monstera, Feltandra, and Symplocarpus. 2. In zool., some spatulate or spoon-shaped part.

spathebill (spā'th'bil), n. The spoon-billed sandpiper, Eurynorhynchus pygmaeus. G. Cuvier (trans.). See cut under Eurynorhynchus.

spathed (spā'th'd), a. [spathe + -ed.] In bot., surrounded or furnished with a spathe; spatheaceous.

Spathogaster (spath-ē-gas'tēr), n. [NL. (Hartig, 1840), < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, + γαστήρ, the stomach.] 1. A spurious genus of hymenopterous gall-insects, containing dimorphic forms of Neuroterus, the name being retained as distinctive of such forms.—2. A genus of syrphid flies. Schiner, 1868. Also Spatigaster (Schiner, 1862), Spathiogaster (Loew, 1843), Spazigaster and Spazogaster (Rondani, 1843).

spathegastic (spath-ē-gas'trik), a. [Spathegaster + -ic.] Pertaining to Spathogaster (sense 1): as, a spathegastic form.

Spathelia (spā-thē'lī-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1752), perhaps so called from its resemblance to a palm-tree; < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, spathe, petiole of a palm-tree: see spathe.] A genus of polypetalous trees, of the order Simarubaceæ and tribe Pieramniæ. It is characterized by polygamous flowers without the disk usually present in the order, five stamens alternate to the petals, and a three-angled ovary with two pendulous ovules in each of its three cells. There are 3 species, natives of the West Indies, extending perhaps into Mexico. They are lofty and handsome trees with an erect unbranched trunk, destitute of the bitter principle which pervades Pieramnia, the next related genus, and many others of the order, and in many respects, as in the ovary, resembling Bonellia, the frankincense-tree, of the order Burseraceæ. They bear odd-pinnate alternate leaves, composed of numerous linear-oblong or sickle-shaped leaflets with a toothed or gland-bearing margin, and cymose clusters of red short-pediced flowers, disposed in elongated terminal panicles. The fruit is a somewhat elliptical three-angled and three-winged drupe, with a three-celled and three-seeded stone perforated with resin-bearing canals. S. simplex is the mountain-pride or mountain-green of the West Indies, a handsome tree with slender trunk rising from 20 to 50 feet, its leaves and its powdery inflorescence each several feet long.

spathic (spā'th'ik), a. [G. spath, spar (see spad), + -ic.] In mineral., having an even lamellar or flatly foliated structure.—spathic iron, spathic iron ore, carbonate of iron: same as siderite, 2.

spathiform (spā'th'i-fōrm), a. [G. spath, spar, + L. forma, form.] Resembling spar in form: as, the ocherous and spathiform varieties of uranite.

spathilla (spā-thil'ā), n.; pl. spathillæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of spatha, a spathe: see spathe. Cf. spathella.] In bot., a secondary or diminutive spathe in a spathaceous inflorescence, as in palms. Also, sometimes, spathella.

When the spadix is compound or branching, as in Palms, there are smaller spathæ, surrounding separate parts of the inflorescence, to which the name spathellæ has sometimes been given. Encyc. Brit., IV. 120.

spathing (spā'thing), n. Same as spaying.

spathiopyrite (spā'th'i-ō-pī'rit), n. [Gr. σπάθιον, dim. of σπάθη, a broad blade, + E. pyrite.] Same as safflorite.

spathose¹ (spā'thōs), a. [spathe + -ose.] In bot., relating to or formed like a spathe; spatheaceous; spathal.

spathose² (spā'th'ōs), a. [G. spath, spar (see spathic), + -ose.] In mineral., sparry; of the nature of spar; occurring in broad plates or lamellæ; foliated in texture.—spathose iron, spathic iron.

spathous (spā'thus), a. [spathe + -ous.] In bot., same as *spathose*¹.

spatulate (spā'thū-lāt), a. Same as spatulate.

Spatulea (spā'thū-lē-ā), n. Same as Spatula, 3.

Spathura (spā'thū-rā), n. [NL. (Gould, 1850), < Gr. σπάθη, a blade, + οὐρά, a tail.] A remarkable genus of Trochilidæ, containing hummingbirds with the lateral tail-feathers long-exsert-

Racket-tailed Humming-bird (Spathura underwoodi).

ed, narrowed, and then dilated into a spatule or racket at the end, and with conspicuous leg-muffs. There are 4 or 5 species, as S. underwoodi, also called Steganurus spatuligera.

spatial (spā'shāl), a. [Also spacial; < L. spatium, space: see space.] Of, pertaining to, or relating to space; existing in or connected with space.

We have an intuition of objects in space: that is, we contemplate objects as made up of spatial parts, and apprehend their spatial relations by the same act by which we apprehend the objects themselves.

Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. p. xx. The ascertaining of a fixed spatial order among objects supposes that certain objects are at rest or occupy the same position. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 160.

To analyze the United States of America as a spatial extent. H. N. Day, Logic, p. 175.

spatiality (spā-shi-al'i-ti), n. [Also spaciality; < spatial + -ity.] Spatial character; extension.

So far, all we have established or sought to establish is the existence of the vague form or quale of spatiality as an inseparable element bound up with the other qualitative peculiarities of each and every one of our sensations. W. James, Mind, XII. 10.

spatially (spā'shāl-i), adv. Having reference to or as regards space. Also written spacially.

Usually we have more trouble to discriminate the quality of an impression than to fix it spatially.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 62.

Objects of different sense-organs, experienced together, do not in the first instance appear either inside or alongside or far outside of each other, neither spatially continuous nor discontinuous, in any definite sense of these words. W. James, Prin. of Psychol., II. 181.

spatiatet (spā'shi-āt), v. i. [L. spatiatus, pp. of spatiari (> G. spazieren), walk about, go, proceed, < spatium, room, space: see space. Cf. exspatiate.] To rove; ramble; expatiate.

Confined to a narrow chamber, he could spatiate at large through the whole universe. Benlley.

spatilomancy (spā-til'ō-man-si), n. [Gr. σπατίλη, excrement, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by means of animal excrements and refuse.

spatious, a. An obsolete spelling of spacious.

spatt, n. See *spat*⁵.

spatter (spat'er), v. [Freq. of *spat*¹, or, with variation, of spot: see *spat*¹, spot.] 1. trans. 1. To scatter or throw about carelessly, as some fluid or semi-fluid substance; dash or splash so as to fall in spreading drops or small quantities: as, to spatter water or mud over a person; to spatter oaths or calumnies.

Where famish'd dogs, late guardians of my door, Shall lick their mangled master's spatter'd gore. Pope, Iliad, xxii. 97.

2. To dash or splash upon; bespatter, literally or figuratively: as, to spatter a person with water, mud, or slander.

Reynard, close attended at his heels By panting dog, tir'd man, and spatter'd horse. Cowper, Needless Alarm, l. 125.

II. intrans. 1. To sputter; act or talk in a sputtering manner.

The Grave spattered and shook his Head, saying, 'Twas the greatest Error he had committed since he knew what belonged to a Soldier. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 15.

That mind must needs be irrecoverably deprav'd which, either by chance or importunity tasting but once of one just deed, spatters at it, and abhors the relish ever after. Milton, Elkonoklastes, II.

2. To undergo or cause scattering or splashing in drops or small quantities.

The colour spatters in fine drops upon the surface of the buttons. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 562.

spatter (spat'er), n. [spatter, v.] 1. The act of spattering, or the state of being spattered; a spattering or splashing effect.

She . . . sometimes exposed her face to the chill spatter of the wind. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xvii.

2. A quick succession of not very loud sounds, such as is produced by the spattering of some substance.

A spatter of musketry was heard, which proceeded from the last of the enemy leaving the place.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 378.

3. That which is spattered; a small splash, as of something thrown or falling in drops: as, a spatter of milk, ink, or mud on one's clothes.

The sun dripped through In spatters of wasted gold. St. Nicholas, XVIII. 987.

spatterdash (spat'er-dash), n. [spatter + dash.] A covering for the legs, used to protect the stockings, trousers, etc., from mud and wear. In modern military uniform the name is applied to several kinds of gaiters, and to the water-proof leggings or shields to the trousers of some French mounted troops. Also spatterdash.

Here's a fellow made for a soldier: there's a leg for a spatterdash, with an eye like the king of Prussia. Sheridan (?) The Camp, l. 2.

spatter-dock (spat'er-dok), n. The yellow pond-lily, Nymphaea (Nuphar) advena; also extended to other species of the genus. See *Nymphaea*¹, 1, and pond-lily, 1. [U. S.] spatterwork (spat'er-werk), n. A method of producing a figure or design upon a surface of any kind by spattering coloring matter upon the exposed parts of it; any work or object, or objects collectively, showing an effect so produced.

spattle¹ (spat'i), n. [ME. spattle, spettle, spatel, spotil, spotele, later spatyll (= OFries. spedel, speda), < AS. spātl, spittle, < spētan, spit: see *spit*². Cf. spittle.] Spittle. Bp. Bale.

He spette in to erthe, and made clay of the spote. Wyclif, John ix. 6.

spattle² (spat'l), n. [Formerly also spatule; < OF. spatule, espatule, F. spatule = Sp. espátula = Pg. spatula = It. spatola, < L. spatula, spathula, a blade, spatula: see spatula. Doublet of spatula, *spittle*³.] 1. A flat blade for stirring, mixing, or molding plastic powdered or liquid substances; a spatula.—2. Specifically, in pottery, a tool for mottling a molded article with coloring matter.

spatting-machine (spat'ling-mā-shēn'), n. A machine, consisting of a reservoir with sieves through which the liquid is caused to fall to divide it into spray, for sprinkling a colored glaze to form party-colored ware.

spatula (spat'ū-lā), n. [L. spatula, also spathula, dim. of spatha, < Gr. σπάθη, a broad blade, a spatula, a paddle: see *spade*¹, spathe. Cf. spatule, *spattle*³, *spittle*³.] 1. A broad flat blade or strip of metal or wood, with unsharpened edges and a commonly rounded outer end (which may be spoon-shaped), and a handle: used for spreading, smoothing, scraping up, or stirring substances, comminuting powders, etc. Spatulas are usually set in handles like those of table-knives, and are of many shapes, sizes, and materials. Those used by druggists, painters, etc., are comparatively long and narrow, straight, and made of more or less flexible steel. Fresco-painters use a trowel-shaped or spoon-shaped spatula for spreading wax or mortar upon the surface which is to receive the painting.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Boie, 1822).] A genus of Anatiniæ, having the bill much longer than the head or tarsus, twice as wide at the end as at the base, there broadly rounded and spoon-shaped, with narrow prominent nail and numerous protrusive lamellæ; the shoveler-ducks or scoublers. The tail is short and pointed, of fourteen feathers. S. clypeata is the common shoveler (see cut under shoveler). S. rhynchotis is Australian, S. platalea is South American, S. capensis is South African, and S. variegata inhabits New Zealand. Also Rhynchaspis, Clypeata, and Spithulea.—Spatula mallei, in anat., the flattened extremity of the handle of the malleus attached to the umbo of the membrana tympani. See cut under tympanic.

Spatulamancy (called in Scotland Slinneanch [divination]) by reading the spleen bone or the blade bone of a shoulder of mutton well scraped.

Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 78.

spatular (spat'ū-lār), a. [< spatula + -ar3.] Like a spatula in form; spatulate.

Spatularia (spat'ū-lā-rī-ā), n. [NL. (Shaw), < L. spatula, a spatula: see spatula.] In ichth., Skull of Spatularia, with the long beak removed, the anterior (asc) and posterior (psc) semicircular canals exposed; Am, auditory chamber; Or, orbit of eye; N, nasal sac; Hy, hyoid apparatus; Br, representatives of branchiostegal rays; Op, operculum; Mn, mandible; A, B, suspensoria; D, palatoquadrate cartilage; E, maxilla.

a genus of ganoid fishes: same as Polyodon, 1. See also cut under paddle-fish.

Spatulariidae (spat'ū-lā-rī-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spatularia + -idae.] In ichth., a family of ganoid fishes, named from the genus Spatularia: same as Polyodontidae. Also Spatularidae. See cuts under paddle-fish and Psephurus.

spatulate (spat'ū-lāt), a. [< NL. spatulatus, < spatula, a spatula: see spatula.] Shaped like a spatula; in zool. and anat., spoon-shaped, or rounded more or less like the outlines of a spoon; spatuliform; in bot., shaped like a spatula; resembling a spatula in shape, being oblong or rounded with a long narrow attenuate base: as, a spatulate leaf, petal, or other flattened organ. Also spatulate. See cuts under Eurynorhynchus, paddle-fish, Parotia, Prioniturus, Spathura, and *shorelér*2.

Spatulate Leaves of Calitriche heterophylla.

The large basal joint of the sixth appendage [of Limulus] is almost devoid of spines, and bears a curved, spatulate process. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 229.

spatulation (spat'ū-lā'shon), n. [< spatulate + -ion.] Spatulate shape or formation; appearance as of a spatula; spoon-shaped figure or arrangement. See cuts noted under spatulate.

The lateral [tail]-feathers [of some humming-birds] may suddenly enlarge into a terminal spatulation, as in the forms known as "Racquet-tails." Encyc. Brit., XII. 359.

spatule (spat'ūl), n. [< F. spatule, < L. spatula, a blade, spatula: see spatula.] 1. Same as *spattle*2.

Stirring it thrice a day with a spatule.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxiii. 17.

2. In zool., a spatulate formation or spatuliform part; specifically, in ornith., the racket at the end of the tail-feathers, as of the motmots or sawbills and certain parrakeets and humming-birds. See cuts under Momotus, Prioniturus, and Spathura.

spatuliform (spat'ū-lī-fōrm), a. [< L. spatula, a blade, spatula, + forma, form.] Spatulate in form; spoon-shaped.

spatuligerous (spat'ū-līj'ē-rus), a. [< L. spatula, a blade, spatula, + gerere, carry.] In zool., bearing or provided with a spatule or racket.

spaud, v. A dialectal form of *spald*1.

spauder (spā'der), n. [Also spawder (†) (Sc. spelder), also splauder, spread; freq. of spaud, spald: see *spald*1.] An injury to animals arising from their legs being forced too far asunder on ice or slippery roads. [Prov. Eng.]

spaul (spāl), n. See *spall*2.—Black spaul. Same as symptomatic anthrax (which see, under anthrax).

spauld, n. An obsolete variant of *spall*2.

spave (spāv), v. t. A dialectal variant of *spay*1.

spaviet (spav'i-et), a. A Scotch form of spavined.

My spaviet Pegasus will limp.

Burns, First Epistle to Davie.

spavin (spav'in), n. [Early mod. E. also spaveu; < ME. spaveyne, < OF. espavent, espavain, F. éparrin = Olt. spavano, It. spavento = Sp. espaván = Pg. espavão, espavão, spavin; perhaps so called in allusion to the hopping or sparrow-like motion of a horse afflicted with spavin; cf. Sp. espaván, a sparrow-hawk, < OHG. sparo, spawce = AS. spearwa = E. sparrow: see sparrow. But this explanation is uncertain, resting on the mere resemblance of form.] 1. A disease of horses affecting the hock-joint, or joint of the hind leg between the knee and the fetlock. See bog-sparin, blood-sparin, bone-sparin.—2. In coal-mining, the clay underlying the coal. Also called under-clay, coal-clay, seat, seat-clay, etc. [Yorkshire, Eng.] spavined (spav'ind), a. [< spavin + -ed2.] Affected with spavin; hence, figuratively, halting; crippled; very lame or limping.

A blind, spavined, galled hack, that was only fit to be cut up for a dog-kennel. Goldsmith, Vicar, xiv.

If they ever praise each other's bad drawings, or broken-winded novels, or spavined verses, nobody ever supposed it was from admiration. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, I.

spawt, n. An obsolete form of spa.

spawder, n. See spawder.

spawl1, n. and v. See *spall*1.

spawl2, n. See *spall*2.

spawl3 (spāl), n. [A contr. of *spattle*1.] Saliva or spittle thrown out carelessly; slaver.

The new-born infant from the cradle takes,

And first of spittle she lustration makes;

Then in the spawl her middle finger dips;

Anoints the temples, forehead, and the lips.

Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, ii.

spawl3 (spāl), v. i. [Formerly also spall; *< spawl*3, n.] To throw saliva from the mouth so as to scatter it; eject spittle in a careless, dirty manner: sometimes with indefinite it.

There was such spitting and spawling, as though they had been half choked.

Harrington's Apology (1596). (Nares.)

In disgrace,

To spit and spawl upon his sunbright face.

Quarles, Emblems, iii. 2.

Why must he sputter, spawl, and slaver it? Swift.

spawld, n. A Scotch variant of *spald*2 for *spall*2. spawn (spân), v. [Early mod. E. spauue; < ME. spawen, spawen, < OF. espandre, espandre, also espandir, shed, spill, pour out, spawn, same as espauir, blow, bloom as a flower, lit. expand, F. épandre, spread, = It. spandere, spill, scatter, shed, < L. expandere, spread out, shed abroad: see expand. Cf. spanning.] I. trans. To produce or lay (eggs): said of a female fish, and by extension of other animals; hence, to generate. It is sometimes applied, in contempt, to human beings.

What practices such principles as these may spawn, when they are laid out to the sun, you may determine. Swift.

II. intrans. 1. To produce or lay eggs of the kinds called spawen, as a fish, frog, mollusk, or crustacean; by extension, to produce offspring: said of other animals, and, in contempt, of human beings.

The Trout usually spawns about October or November.

I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 75.

2. To issue, as the eggs or young of a fish: by extension applied to other animals, and to human beings, in contempt.

The beguiling charms of distinctions and magnificent subtleties have spawned into prodigious monsters, and the birth of error. Evelyn, True Religion, II. 176.

It is so ill a quality, and the mother of so many ill ones that spawn from it, that a child should be brought up in the greatest abhorrence of it. Locke.

spawn (spân), n. and a. [Early mod. E. spauue; < spawen, v.] I. n. 1. The eggs or ova of various oviparous animals, as amphibians, fishes, mollusks, crustaceans, etc., when small and numerous, or extruded in more or less coherent masses; female roe. The number of individual eggs in spawn varies much, and is sometimes prodigiously great: thus, it has been estimated that the spawn of a single codfish may contain several million eggs. In oviparous fishes the eggs are spawned directly into the water, fecundated as they flow out, or afterward, by the milt of the male, and left to hatch by themselves. Fish-spawn is also easily procured by the process of stripping the female, and artificially fecundated by the same process applied to the male, the spawn and milt being mixed together in the water of a vessel made for the purpose. In ovoviviparous fishes the spawn is impregnated in the body of the female, as is usual with the eggs of higher animals. Frogs and toads lay a quantity of spawn consisting of a jelly-like mass in which the eggs are embedded, and it is fertilized as it flows forth. Some shell-fish extrude spawn in firm gelatinous masses, as the common sea-shell, Natica heros. (See sand-saucer.) The mass of eggs (called coral or berry) that a lobster carries under her tail is the spawn or roe of that crustacean; and in various other crustaceans and some fishes the spawn is carried to hatching in special brood-pouches (see opossum-shrimp), which are sometimes in the male instead of the female, as in the sea-horse (see Hippocampidae). Anadromous fishes are those which leave the sea and run up rivers to spawn; a few fishes are catadromous, or the converse of this. The name spawen is seldom or never given to the eggs of scaly reptiles, birds, or mammals; but the term has sometimes included milt. See spawning.

2. The spat of the oyster, from the time of the discharge of the egg until the shell is visible and the creature has become attached.—3. Offspring of fish; very small fish; fry.—4.

Offspring in general; a swarming brood: applied, mostly in contempt, to human beings.

To Sem the East, to Cham the South, the West To Iapheth falls; their severall scopes exprest:

Their fruitful Spawn did all the World supply.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii. The Colonies, Arg.

How'er that common spawn of ignorance,

Our fry of writers, may beslime his fame.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, Ind.

5. In bot., the mycelium of fungi; the white fibrous matter forming the matrix from which fungi are produced. Certain species of edible fungi, as Agaricus campestris, are propagated artificially by sowing the spawn in prepared beds of horse-droppings and sand.

By this time these will be one mass of natural spawn, having a grey mouldy and thready appearance, and a smell like that of mushrooms. Cooke and Berkeley, Fungi, p. 257.

The agarics have an abundant mycelium, known to gardeners as the spawen, consisting of white, cottony filaments, which spread in every direction through the soil. Amer. Cyc., XII. 70.

To shoot spawn. See shoot.

II. a. Containing spawn; spawning, or about to spawn; ripe, as a fish.

spawn-brick (spân'brik), n. In bot., brick-shaped masses of mold or compressed horse-droppings fermented with mushroom-spawn, and used for the artificial sowing or stocking of a mushroom-bed.

The [mushroom]-bed will be ready for spawning, which consists of inserting small pieces of spawn bricks into the sloping sides of the bed, about 6 inches asunder. Encyc. Brit., XII. 284.

spawn-eater (spân'ē'tēr), n. A spawn-eating fish, or other animal which habitually feeds upon spawn, to the detriment of the fisheries or of fish-culture; especially, a cyprinoid fish, Spawn-eater (Notropis hudsonius).

Notropis hudsonius, found in streams along the coast from New York to Virginia. This is one of the largest minnows, from 4 to 8 inches long, of a pale coloration, the sides with a broad silvery band, and usually a dusky spot at the base of the caudal fin. It is sometimes called smelt.

spawned (spând), p. a. 1. Having emitted spawn; spent, as a fish.—2. Extruded or deposited, as spawn.

spawner (spā'nēr), n. [< spawn + -er1.] 1. That which spawns, as the female of fish, frogs, oysters, etc.; a ripe fish about to spawn: correlated with milter.

There the Spawner casts her eggs, and the Melter hovers over her all that time that she is casting her Spawn, but touches her not.

I. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. 1653), p. 147.

2. In fish-culture, a spawn-gatherer. [Recent.]

spawn-fungus (spân'fung'gus), n. See fungus.

spawn-hatcher (spân'hach'ēr), n. An apparatus for the artificial hatching of the ova of fish. It consists essentially of a box, or a series of boxes, fitted with trays with perforated bottoms to receive the spawn, and arranged for the supply of a regulated current of fresh water.

spawning (spā'ning), n. [Verbal n. of spawn, v.] The act or process of emitting and fecundating spawn. It consists essentially in the emission by the female of her eggs, and by the male of his milt, in such a manner that they may come in contact with each other, and that the eggs may be placed in a position favorable to their development. The manner, time, and place in which this is performed vary with the species. Some kinds bury their eggs in sand or gravel; some attach them to weeds, sticks, or stones; some build nests of stones or other material; and others drop their eggs carelessly through the water. Fish spawn at all seasons of the year, every species having its appropriate time. Rapid streams, quiet lakes, and sea-bottoms are among the places of deposit. In some cases nests are constructed somewhat elaborately. With the laying of the eggs the care of the parents for their offspring generally ends. Not unfrequently both sire and dam immediately devour their yet unhatched descendants. A few species guard their eggs during incubation, and in some rare cases this care continues after the young fishes are hatched.

spawning-bed (spā'ning-bed), n. A bed or nest made in the bottom of a stream, as by salmon and trout, in which fish deposit their spawn and milt.

spawning-ground (spā'ning-ground), n. A water-bottom on which fish deposit their spawn; hence, the body or extent of water to which they resort to spawn; a breeding-place.

spawning-screen (spá'ning-skrén), n. In fish-culture, a frame or screen on which the spawn of fish is collected.

spawn-rising (spán'ri'zing), n. In fish-culture, the increase in size of spawn after the milt has been added.

spay¹ (spā), v. t. [Early mod. E. also spate; dial. spare, spaire, spave; supposed to be < Gael. spoith = Manx spoioy = Bret. spachein, spaza, castrate, geld; cf. W. yspaddu, exhaust, empty, dyspyddu, drain, exhaust; perhaps connected with L. spado, < Gr. σπάδων, a eunuch, < σπᾶν, draw, extract: see spade.] To castrate (a female) by extirpating the ovaries. The process corresponds to castration or emasculation of the male, incapacitating the female from breeding, or making her barren. Applied to hens, it corresponds to the castrating of a cock. It is also practised on other animals, as swine. The animals fatten more readily, and the flesh is improved. Compare Batley's operation, under operation.

spay² (spā), n. [Also spate; perhaps < OF. espeis*, espois, F. épois, branches of a stag's horns, < G. spitz, a point (cf. G. spitz-hirsch, a stag whose horns have begun to grow pointed): see spitz, spitz. Cf. spittard, a two-year-old hart.] The male red-deer or hart in his third year.

spayeret, spayret, n. See *spare*².

Spea (spé'ā), n. [NL. (Cope, 1863), < Gr. σπίος, a cave.] A genus of spadefooted toads (Scaphiopodidae or Pelobatidae), representing a low type of organization, and peculiar to America. Several species, as S. hammondi and S. bombifrons, inhabit arid regions in the western United States and Mexico, being adapted to dry climate by the rapidity of their metamorphosis. During rains in summer they come out of their holes in the ground, and lay their eggs in rain-pools, where the tadpoles are soon seen swimming. These get their legs very promptly, and go hopping about on dry land. They are very noisy in the spring, like the common spadefoots.

speak (spék), v.; pret. spoke (spake archaic or poetical), pp. spoken (spoke obs. or vulgar), ppr. speaking. [ME. spoken (pret. spake, spak, spec, spæc, pp. spoken, spoke, earlier spæken, spokene, i-spæken, ispeke), < late AS. speccan, earlier sprecan (pret. spæc, pl. spæcon, earlier spæc, pl. spæcon, pp. speccen, earlier sprecen) = OS. sprecan = OFries. spreka = D. sprecken = MLG. LG. spreken = OHG. sprehhan, MHG. G. sprechen, speak; cf. To use articulate utterance in the tones of the speaking-voice, in distinction from those of the singing-voice; exert the faculty of speech in uttering words for the expression of thought.

Sire, are hi beo [ere they be] to dithe awreke
We mote there the children speke.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 69.

Their children speak half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language. Neh. xiii. 24.

Many good scholars speak but fumblingly.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

2. To make an oral address, as before a magistrate, a tribunal, a public assembly, or a company; deliver a speech, discourse, argument, plea, or the like: as, to speak for or against a person or a cause in court or in a legislature.

Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself. Acts xxvi. 1.

Lord Sandwich, by a most inconceivable jumble of cunning, speak for the treaty. Walpole, Letters, II. 278.

3. To make oral communication or mention; talk; converse: as, to speak with a stranger; to speak of or about something; they do not speak to each other.

Than eche toke other be the hande, and wente spekyng of many thynges till thei com to the hostell of Vlfin and Bretell.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 467.

I must thank him only,
Lest my remembrance suffer ill report;
At heel of that, defy him. . . .
Would we had speak together.
Shak., A. and C., II. 2. 167.

4. To communicate ideas by written or printed words; make mention or tell in recorded speech.

I speak concerning Christ and the church. Eph. v. 32.

The Scripture speaks only of those to whom it speaks. Hammond.

The Latin convent is thought to have been on mount Gihon, though some seem to speak of that hill as beyond the pool of Gihon. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 10.

5. To make communication by any intelligible sound, action, or indication; impart ideas or information by any means other than speech or writing; give expression or intimation.

And let the kettle to the trumpet speak,
The trumpet to the cannoneer without.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 286.

That brow in furrow'd lines had fix'd at last,
And speak of passions, but of passion past.
Byron, Lara, I. 5.

Abate the stride, which speaks of man.
Tennyson, Princess, II.

6. Of an organ-pipe, to emit or utter a tone; sound.—7. Naut., to make a stirring and lapping sound in driving through the water: said of a ship.

At length the sniffer reached us, and the sharp little vessel began to speak, as the rushing sound through the water is called; while the wind sang like an Eolian harp through the taut weather-rigging.

M. Scott, Tom Cringle's Log, viii.

8. To bark when ordered: said of dogs.—III. spoken. See well or ill spoken, below.—Properly speaking. See properly.—So to speak. See *so*¹.—Speaking acquaintance. (a) A degree of acquaintance extending only to formal intercourse.

Between them and Mr. Wright [the Rector] there was only a speaking acquaintance.
Trollope, Belton Estate, I. 33.

(b) A person with whom one is only sufficiently acquainted to interchange formal salutations or indifferent conversation when meeting casually.—Speaking terms, a relation between persons in which they speak to or converse with each other: usually, an acquaintance limited to speaking in a general way or on indifferent subjects. Not to be on speaking terms is either to be not sufficiently acquainted for passing speech or salutation, or to be so much estranged through disagreement as to be debarred from it.

Our poorer gentry, who never went to town, and were probably not on speaking terms with two out of the five families whose parks lay within the distance of a drive.
George Eliot, Felix Holt, I.

To speak by the card. See *card*¹.—To speak for. (a) To speak in behalf or in place of; state the case, claims, or views of.

The general and his wife are talking of it;
And she speaks for you stoutly.

Every half mile some pretty farmhouse was shining red through clumps of trees, the many cattle-sheds speaking for the wealth of the owner.
Froude, Sketches, p. 93.

To speak holiday. See holiday, a.—To speak in lutescent. See *lutescent*².—To speak like a book. See book.—To speak of. (a) See def. 3. (b) To take or make account of; mention as notable or of consequence; deserve mention.

Those Countries nearest Tigris Spring,
In those first ages were most flourishing,
Most spoken of.
Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Colonies.

Strangers . . . that pay to their own Lords the tenth, and not to the owner of those liberties any thing to speak of.
Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 244.

To speak out, to speak loud or louder; hence, to speak freely, boldly, or without reserve; disclose what one knows or thinks about a certain matter.—To speak to. (a) To answer for; attest; account for.

For a far longer time than they, the modern observatories, can directly speak to. Piazza Smyth, Pyramid, p. 74.

(b) To admonish or rebuke. [Colloq. and euphemistic.]

"Papa," he exclaimed, in a loud, plaintive voice, as of one deeply injured, "will you speak to Giles? . . . If this sort of thing is allowed to go on, . . . it will perfectly ruin the independence of my character."
Jean Ingelow, Off the Skelligs, xix.

To speak to one's heart. See heart.—To speak up, to express one's thoughts freely, boldly, or unreservedly; speak out.

Speak up, jolly blade, never fear.

Robin Hood and Little John (Child's Ballads, V. 221).

To speak well for, to be a commendatory or favorable indication of or with regard to: as, his eagerness speaks well for him, or for his success.—Well or ill spoken, given to speaking well or ill: given to using decorous or indecorous speech, in either a literal or a moral sense.

Thou speak'st

In better phrase and matter than thou didst. . . .
Methinks you're better spoken. Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 10.

He was wise and discrete and well spoken, having a grave & deliberate utterance.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 413.

=Syn. Speak Talk. Speak is more general in meaning than talk. Thus, a man may speak by uttering a single word, whereas to talk is to utter words consecutively: so a man may be able to speak without being able to talk. Speak is also more formal in meaning: as, to speak before an audience; while talk implies a conversational manner of speaking.

II. trans. 1. To utter orally and articulately; express with the voice; enunciate.

And thei seide, "That he is, for this thre dayes he speak no speche, ne neuer shall speak worde."
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 94.

They sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none speak a word unto him.
Job II. 13.

2. To declare; utter; make known by speech; tell, announce, or express in uttered words.

Grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word. Acts iv. 29.

One that, to speak the truth,
Had all those excellencies that our books
Have only feign'd.
Middletown, Anything for a Quiet Life, I. 1.

I am come to speak

Thy praises. Bryant, Hymn to Death.

3. To use in oral utterance; express one's self in the speech or tongue of: as, a person may read a language which he cannot speak.

The Arabic language is spoke very little north of Aleppo. Pococke, Description of the East, II. I. 154.

4. To accost or address in speech; specifically (naut.), to accost at sea; hail and hold communication with by the voice, as a passing vessel.

About six bells, that is three o'clock P. M., we saw a sail on our larboard bow. I was very desirous, like every new sailor, to speak her.

R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 10.

5. To say, either in speech or in writing; use as a form of speech.

A beavie of ladies is spoken figuratively for a company or troupe: the terme is taken of Larkes.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., April, Glosse.

6. To produce by means or as a result of speech; bring about or into being by utterance; call forth.

They sung how God spoke out the World's vast Ball;
From Nothing and from No where call'd forth All.
Cowley, Davideis, I.

7. To mention as; speak of as being; call. [Obsolete or rare.]

Mayst thou live ever spoken our protector!

Fletcher, Valentinian, v. 8.

8. To make known as if by speech; give speaking evidence of; indicate; show to be; declare.

Whatever his reputed parents be,
He hath a mind that speaks him right and noble.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, I. 1.

And for the heaven's wide circuit, let it speak
The Maker's high magnificence.

Milton, P. L., viii. 101.

Eleanor's countenance was dejected, yet sedate; and its composure spoke her injured to all the gloomy objects to which they were advancing.

Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, xxiv.

To speak a ship. See def. 4, above.—To speak daggers. See *dagger*¹.—To speak (a person) fair, to address in fair or pleasing terms; speak to in a friendly way.

Oh run, dear friend, and bring the lord Philaster! speak him fair; call him prince; do him all the courtesy you can.
Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 3.

To speak for, to establish a claim to by prior assertion; ask or engage in advance: as, we have spoken for seats; she is already spoken for.—To speak one's mind, to express one's opinion, especially with emphasis.

The Romans had a time once every year, when their Slaves might freely speak their minds.

Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonat.

To speak out, to utter openly; proclaim boldly.

But strait I'll make his Dumbness find a Tongue
To speak out his imposture, and thy wrong.

J. Beaumont, Psyche, II. 164.

=Syn. Tell, State, etc. See *say*¹.

speakable (spé'ka-bl), a. [ME. speker, spekere (= OFries. spreker (in forspreker) = D. MLG. spreker = OHG. sprähhari, sprähari, sprehhari, sprehheri, sprechari, MHG. sprechere, sprecher, G. sprecher, a speaker); < speak + -able.]

1. Capable of being spoken; fit to be uttered.

The other, . . . heaping oaths upon oaths, . . . most horrible and not speakeable, was rebuked of an honest man.
Ascham, Toxophilus, I.

2t. Having the power of speech. [Rare.]

Redouble then this miracle, and say How can'st thou speakeable of mute?

Milton, P. L., ix. 563.

speaker (spé'kér), n. [ME. speker, spekere (= OFries. spreker (in forspreker) = D. MLG. spreker = OHG. sprähhari, sprähari, sprehhari, sprehheri, sprechari, MHG. sprechere, sprecher, G. sprecher, a speaker); < speak + -er.] 1. One who speaks or utters words; one who talks or converses; one who makes a speech or an address; specifically, one who engages in or practises public speaking.

Thei seyn also that Abraham was Frend to God, and that Moyses was familee spekere with God.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 136.

Bearers far more strange of the Roman name, though no speakers of the Roman tongue, are there in special abundance.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 57.

2. A proclaimer; a publisher. [Rare.]

After my death I wish no other herald,
No other speaker of my living actions.

Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 70.

3. [cap.] The title of the presiding officer in the British House of Commons, in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, in the lower houses of State legislatures in the United States, and in British colonial legislatures; also of the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain as presiding officer of the House of Lords. The Speaker of the House of Commons is elected in each Parliament from its members, with the royal concurrence, generally without regard to politics, and may preside in successive Parliaments of opposite political character. His powers (which have been much diminished in the course of time) are limited to the preservation of order and the regulation of debate under the rules of the House, the use of the casting-vote in case of an equal division, and speaking in general committee. The Speaker in the House of Representatives (as also in the State legislatures) is usually a leader of the party having a majority of the members, and has, in addition to the powers of the British Speaker, the power of appointing all committees, and the right, as a member, of participating in general debate after calling another member to the chair, and of voting on all questions—rights exercised, however, only on important occasions. He is thus in a position to control the course of legislation to an important extent, and the office is consequently regarded as of great power and influence.

I hear that about twelve of the Lords met and had chosen my Lord Manchester speaker of the House of Lords.

Pepys, Diary, April 26, 1680.

In the Lower House the Speaker of the Tudor reigns is in very much the same position as the Chancellor in the Upper House; he is the manager of business on the part of the crown, and probably the nominee either of the king himself or of the chancellor.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 272.

Not only that the Standing Committees are the most essential machinery of our governmental system, but also that the Speaker of the House of Representatives is the most powerful functionary of that system.

W. Wilson, Cong. Gov., p. 103.

4. A title, and hence a general name, for a book containing selections for practice in declamation, as at school. [U. S.]

speakership (spē'kēr-shīp), n. [speaker + -ship.] The office of Speaker in a legislative body.

speaking (spē'king), p. a. Adapted to inform or impress as if by speech; forcibly expressive or suggestive; animated or vivid in appearance: as, a speaking likeness; speaking gestures.

A representation borrowed, indeed, from the actual world, but closer to thought, more speaking and significant, more true than nature and life itself. J. Caird.

The smallness of Spalato, as compared with the greatness of ancient Salona, is a speaking historical lesson.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 172.

Speaking demurrer, in law, a demurrer which alleges or suggests a fact which to be available would require evidence, and which therefore cannot avail on demurrer.

speakingly (spē'king-li), adv. In a speaking manner; so as to produce the effect of speech; very expressively.

A Mute is one that acteth speakingly, And yet says nothing. Brome, Antipodes, v. 4.

speaking-machine (spē'king-mā-shēn'), n. A mechanical contrivance for producing articulate sounds automatically; a speaking automaton.

Kempelen's and Kratzenstein's speaking-machine, in the latter part of the last century; the speaking-machine made by Fabermann of Vienna, closely imitating the human voice. Encyc. Brit., XV. 208.

speaking-trumpet (spē'king-trūm'pet), n. A trumpet-shaped instrument by which the sound of the human voice is reinforced so that it may be heard at a great distance or above other sounds, as in hailing ships at sea or giving orders at a fire. In the United States navy a speaking-trumpet is the badge of the officer of the deck at sea.

Speaking-trumpet.
a, tube; b, bell; c, mouthpiece; d, rings for a band by which the trumpet may be attached to the person.

speaking-tube (spē'king-tüb), n. A tube of sheet-tin, gutta-percha, or other material, serving to convey the voice to a distance, as from one building to another, or from one part of a building to another, as from an upper floor to the street-door, or from the rooms of a hotel to the office. It is commonly used in connection with an annunciator, and is usually fitted at each end with a whistle for calling attention.

speaking-voice (spē'king-vois), n. The kind of voice used in speaking; opposed to singing-voice, or the kind of voice used in singing. The singing-voice and the speaking-voice differ in several respects: (a) in pitch and inflection, which are arbitrary in singing, but conformed to the thought in speaking; (b) in succession of tones, the tones of music being discrete, while those of speech are concrete; (c) in time and emphasis, which in music are more arbitrary and less conformed to the thought than in speech. So great is the difference that many persons who have a good voice for one use have a very poor voice for the other.

speal², n. An obsolete variant of *spalt*².

speal-bone (spēl'bōn), n. The shoulder-blade. — Reading the speal-bone, scapulimancy; divination by means of a shoulder-blade. E. B. Tylor, Prim. Cult., I. 125. Compare scapulimancy.

spean (spēn), n. [ME. spene, < AS. spana, teat, udder; cf. spanan, wean; see spane.] An animal's teat. [Old and prov. Eng.]

It hath also four speanes to her paps.

Topell, Four-footed Beasts, p. 38. (Halliwell.)

spear¹ (spēr), n. [ME. spere, pl. speres, speren, < AS. spere = OS. sper = OFries. sper, spiri = MD. spere, D. speer = MLG. sper, spere = OHG. MHG. sper, G. speer (> OF. espier) = Icel. spjör, pl., = Dan. spær, a spear (the L. sparus, a small missile weapon, dart, hunting-spear, is prob. < Teut.); perhaps akin to spar, a beam, bar: see *spar*¹. In def. 7 prob. confused with *spire*¹.] 1. A weapon consisting of a penetrating head attached to a long shaft of wood, designed to be thrust by or launched from the hand at an enemy or at game. Spears have been used as warlike weapons from the earliest times, and were the principal reliance of many ancient armies, as those of the Greeks, while in others they were used coordinately with the bow and the sword. They are represented by the bayonet in modern armies, though some use is still made of spears, of which javelins and lances are lighter, and pikes heavier, forms. Compare cuts under bayonet and pike.

Hunting-spear, 15th or 16th century.

When they were over, the they myten in a-monge hem so vigorously that oon myght here the crassinge of speres half a myle longe.

Merlin (E. E. T. S.), II. 155.

They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks. Isa. II. 4.

2. A man armed with a spear; a spearman.

Earl Doorm

Struck with a knife's haft hard against the board, And call'd for flesh and wine to feed his spears.

Tennyson, Gerald.

3. A sharp-pointed instrument with barbed tines, generally three or four, used for stabbing fish and other animals; a fish-gig.—4. An instrument like or suggestive of an actual spear, as some articles of domestic or mechanical use, one of the long pieces fixed transversely to the beam or body of chevaux-de-frise, in some parts of England a bee's sting, etc.—5. One of the pieces of timber which together form the main rod of the Cornish pumping-engine.—6. The feather of a horse. Also called the streak of the spear. It is a mark in the neck or near the shoulder of some barbs, which is reckoned a sure sign of a good horse.

7. A spire: now used only of the stalks of grasses: as, a spear of wheat.

Tell me the mores, dust, sands, and speares Of corn, when Summer shakes his ears.

Herrick, To Find God.

The speare or steeple of which church was fired by lightning.

Lambarde, Perambulation (1566), p. 287. (Halliwell.)

Holy spear. Same as holy lance. See *lance*¹.—Spear pyrites, a variety of marcasite.—Spear side, occasionally spear half, a phrase sometimes used to denote the male line of a family, in contradistinction to distaff or spindle side (or half), the female line. See distaff side, under distaff.

A King who by the spindle-side sprang from both William and Cerdic, but who by the spear-side had nothing to do with either.

E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 168.

To sell under the spear, to sell by auction: from the ancient Roman practice of setting a spear (hasta) in the ground at an auction, originally as a sign of the sale of military booty.

My lords the senators

Are sold for slaves, their wives for bondwomen, . . . And all their goods, under the spear, at outcry.

B. Jonson, Catiline, II.

spear¹ (spēr), v. [*ME. spear*¹, n.] I. trans. To pierce or strike with a spear or similar weapon: as, to spear fish.

The [Australian] youngsters generally celebrated the birth of a lamb by *spear*ing it.

C. Reade, Never too Late to Mend, II.

The Mayfly is torn by the swallow, the sparrow spear'd by the shrike.

Tennyson, Maud, IV. 4.

II. intrans. To shoot into a long stem; germinate, as barley. See *spire*¹.

The single blade [of wheat] spears first into three, then into five or more side-shoots.

Science, VII. 174.

spear² (spēr), v. An obsolete form of *spear*¹.

spear-billed (spēr'bīld), a. Having a long, straight, and sharp bill, beak, or rostrum: as, the spear-billed grebes of the genus Echmophorus. See cut under Echmophorus. Coues.

spear-dog (spēr'dog), n. The common piked dog-fish, Squalus acanthias or Acanthias vulgaris. [Local, Eng.]

spearer (spēr'ēr), n. [*ME. spear*¹ + -er.] 1. One who spears.—2. A person armed with a spear, whether for war or for ceremony.

spear-fish (spēr'fīsh), n. 1. A catostomoid fish of the genus Carpiodes, C. cyprinus, a kind of carp-sucker, also called sailfish, skimback, and quillback. It is common from the Mississippi valley to Chesapeake Bay.—2. The bill-fish, Tetrapturus albidus, belonging to the family Histiophoridae, or sailfishes. The dorsal fin is low or moderately developed, and the ventrals are represented only by spines. It inhabits American waters as far north as New England in summer, and is not seldom taken in the sword-fishery. In tropical seas its horizon is about 100 fathoms deep. The spear-fish is related to the sword-fish (though of another family), and has a similar beak or sword. It attains a length of six or eight feet. In the West Indies its Spanish name is aguja. Compare cut under sailfish.

spear-flower (spēr'flou'ēr), n. A tree or shrub of the large tropical and subtropical genus Ardisia of the Myrsinaceae. The species are mostly handsome with white or red flowers and pea-form fruit, often blue. The name translates Ardisia, which alludes to the sharp segments of the calyx.

spear-foot (spēr'fūt), n. The off or right hind foot of a horse.

spear-grass (spēr'grās), n. 1. A name of various species of Agrostis, bent-grass, of Agropyrum repens, quitch-grass, of Alopecurus agrestis, foxtail, and perhaps of some other grasses. The spear-grass of Shakespeare, according to Ellacombe, is the quitch-grass; according to Prior, it is the common reed, Phragmites communis. [Old or prov. Eng.]

To tickle our noses with spear-grass to make them bleed.

Shak., I Hen. IV., II. 4. 340.

2. The June-grass, or Kentucky blue-grass, Poa pratensis (see cut under Poa); also other species of the genus. P. annua is the low or annual spear-grass. It is so called from the lance-shaped spikelets. (See meadow-grass.) The name is said to be applied also to the porcupine-grass, on account of its awns. [U. S.]

3. In New Zealand, a name of one or two plants of the umbelliferous genus Aciphylla: so called from their long grass-like leaflets, which have hard and sharp points.

spear-hand (spēr'hānd), n. The right hand or the right side, as distinguished from the shield-hand.

spear-head (spēr'hēd), n. The head of a spear. It is always pointed, and of iron or steel among people who know the use of iron, but anciently of bronze, and among some savage peoples of stone, bone, or the like. The form varies from that of a long double-edged blade which with its socket is two feet or more in length, as was common in throwing-spears of the Franks and Saxons, to the head of the fourteenth-century lance, which was a mere pointing of the wooden shaft with steel and only a few inches in length. The spear-head is often barbed, sometimes serrated or wavy, etc. Compare coronal, 2, also pilum, *lance*¹, javelin.

spear-hook (spēr'hūk), n. Same as spring-hook.

spear-javelin (spēr'jav'lin), n. Same as framaea, 1.

spear-leafed lily. See lily, 1.

spear-lily (spēr'il'i), n. A plant of one of three species of the Australian genus Doryanthes of the Amaryllidaceae. It has partly the habit of Agave, having a cluster of over one hundred sword-shaped leaves at the base, an erect stem, in D. excelsa from 10 to 18 feet high, with a dense terminal head of red flowers. The leaves of that species contain a fiber suitable for rope- and paper-making.

spearman (spēr'mān), n.; pl. spear-men (-men). [ME. sperman; < *spear*¹ + man.] 1. One who uses or is armed with a spear; especially, a soldier whose spear is his principal weapon. Compare lancer, lanquenet, *pikeman*¹.

Wily as an eel that stirs the mud Thick overhead, so baffling spearman's thrust.

Browning, Ring and Book, II. 162.

2. A book-name for any leaf-beetle of the genus Doryphora. The Colorado potato-beetle, D. decemlineata, is the ten-lined spearman. See cut under beetle.

spearmint (spēr'mint), n. [Said to be a corruption of spire-mint, with ref. to the pyramidal inflorescence.] An Spearmint (Mentha viridis), upper part of the stem with the inflorescence. a, a flower.

aromatic plant, Mentha viridis, the common garden-mint, or mint proper. It is known chiefly in gardens, or as an escape from them, in both hemispheres, and is suspected to be a garden or accidental variety of M. sylvestris. Its properties are those of peppermint, and it yields an oil like that of the latter, but with a more pleasant flavor.—Spirit of spearmint. See spirit.

spear-nail (spēr'nāl), n. A form of nail with a spear-shaped point.

spear-plate (spēr'plāt), n. Same as strapping-plate.

spear-thistle (spēr'this'tl), n. See thistle.

spear-widgeon (spēr'wij'on), n. 1. The red-breasted merganser, Mergus serrator. Also called shelduck.—2. The goosander, Mergus merganser. [Irish in both uses.]

spearwood (spēr'wūd), n. One of two Australian trees, Eucalyptus Doratoxydon in the southwest, and Acacia Doratoxydon in the interior, or the wood of the same, sought by the natives for spear-shafts.

spearwort (spēr'wért), n. [ME. spereworte, sperewurt, AS. sperewurt, < spere, spear, + wurt, wort: see spear¹ and wort¹.] The name of several species of crowfoot or Ranunculus with lance-shaped leaves. R. Lingua, the greater spearwort, is found in Europe and temperate Asia; R. Flammula, the lesser spearwort (also called banewort), through the north temperate zone; R. ophioglossifolius, the snake-tongue or adder's-tongue spearwort, in southwestern Europe; R. ambigua (R. alismifolius), the water-plantain spearwort, in North America.

speat, n. Same as spate.

speave, v. t. A dialectal form of spay¹.

speck¹ (spek), n. A colloquial abbreviation of speculation.

They said what a wery gen'rous thing it was o' them to have taken up the case on spec, and to charge nothing at all for costs unless they got 'em out of Mr. Pickwick.

Dickens, Pickwick, xxxiv.

spec.² In nat. hist., an abbreviation of specimen: with a plural specs., sometimes specc. Compare sp.

specet, n. A Middle English form of spice¹.

special (spesh'al), a. and n. [ME. special, special, speciale, special, specialle, < OF. special, especial, F. spécial = Pr. special, especial = Sp. especial = Pg. especial = It. speciale, special. < L. specialis, belonging to a species, particular, < species, kind, species: see species. Doublet, especial.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a species or sort; of a particular kind or character; distinct from other kinds; specifically characteristic.

Crist! kepe us out of harme and hate,
For thin hooli spirit so special.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 57.

A special idea is called by the schools a species.
Watts, Logic, I. iii. § 3.

A certain order of artistic culture should be adopted, answering to the order of development of the special sensibilities and faculties concerned.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 553.

2. Of or pertaining to one or more of a kind; peculiar to an individual or a set; not general; particular; individual.

He spekis thus in his special spell,
And of this matere makis he mynde.
York Plays, p. 471.

For the question in hand, whether the commandments of God in Scripture be general or special, it skilleth not.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 7.

The special charm of Oxford for Shelley lay in the comparative freedom of the student's life.

E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 56.

3. Peculiar or distinct of the kind; of exceptional character, amount, degree, or the like; especially distinguished; express; particular.

Thei suffre no Cristene man entre in to that Place, but zif it be of specyalle grace of the Soudan.

Mandeville, Travels, p. 66.

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?

Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4. 112.

It is a fair and sensible paper, not of special originality or brilliancy.

O. W. Holmes, Emerson, I.

Other groups of phenomena require special study.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 382.

4. Specifically, limited as to function, operation, or purpose; designed for specific application or service; acting for a limited time or in a restricted manner; not general of the kind named: as, special legislation; special pleading; a special agent, constable, or correspondent; special employment; a special dictionary.

Too all his ost he gave a special charge,
Aynst that day that he shuld fight alone.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), I. 3221.

To Eltham will I, where the young king is,
Being ordain'd his special governor.
Shak., I Hen. VI., I. 1. 171.

Estate tail special. See estate.—Heir special. See heir.—Special act. See statute.—Special administrator, an administrator appointed without full powers of administration, but for some special purpose, as to collect and hold assets and pay urgent debts pending a contest as to the probate of a will. Also called a temporary administrator, a collector, or an administrator ad colligendum.—Special agent, an agent authorized to transact in the service or interest of his principal only a particular transaction or a particular kind of business, as distinguished from a general agent: as, a special agent of the revenue department.—Special anatomy. See anatomy.—Special assignment. See partial assignment, under partial.—Special bail. See bail², 3.—Special bailiff, bastard, case. See the nouns.—Special carrier. See carrier¹, 2.—Special commission, in law, a commission of oyer and terminer issued by the crown to the judges for the trial of specified cases.—Special constable, contract, damages, demurrer, deposit, edict, homology, hospital, injunction, issue, jury, license, etc. See the nouns.—Special linear complex, the aggregate of all the lines of space that cut a given line.—Special logic, the rules for thinking concerning a certain kind of objects.

Such special logics only exhibit the mode in which a determinate matter or object of science, the knowledge of which is presupposed, must be treated, the conditions which regulate the certainty of inferences in that matter, and the methods by which our knowledge of it may be constructed into a scientific whole.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, iii.

Special orders, paper, partner, plea, pleader, pleading, property, providence, retainer, sessions, statute, tail, verdict, etc. See the nouns.—Special trust, an active trust; a trust which involves specific duties on the part of the trustee, as distinguished from a general or naked trust, in which he holds only a legal title and it may be possession, but the entire right of disposal is in the beneficiary.—Syn. Special, Especial, Particular, Peculiar, Specific. Special is more common than especial, which has the same meaning; but especially is for rhythmic reasons (because it occurs most frequently at the beginning of a dependent clause, where usually an unaccented particle occurs, and where, therefore, a word with an accent on the first syllable is instinctively avoided) much more common than specially. The special comes under the general, as the particular comes under the special. A special favor is one that is more than ordinary; a particular favor is still more remarkable; a peculiar favor comes very closely home. When we speak of any particular thing, we distinguish it from all others; when we speak of a specific fault in one's character, we name it with exactness; a special law is one that is made for a particular purpose or a peculiar case; a specific law is either one that we name exactly or one that names offenses, etc., exactly.

II. n. 1. A special or particular person or thing. Specifically—(a) A particular thing; a particular.

Thir 's all the specials I of speake.
Raid of the Redcure (Child's Ballads, VI. 133).

(b) A private companion; a paramour or concubine.
Special, concubine, the woman (special or leman). Concubina. Prompt. Parv., p. 463.

Syr Roger of Donkester,
That was her own special.
Lyttell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 123).

2. A person or thing appointed or set apart for a special purpose or occasion, as a constable, a railway-train, an examination, a dispatch, etc.: as, they traveled by special to Chicago; the specials were called out to quell the riot.

What are known as specials are being held this week. These are for men who partially failed at the last regular examinations.

Lancet, 1893, II. 796.

In special, in a special manner; especially; particularly. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Se that thou in special Requere noht that is agayns hire nam.
Chaucer, Troilus, I. 901.

But yf vertue and nurture were wite alle;
To yow therfore I speke in specyalle.
Babes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 1.

specialisation, specialise. See specialization, specialize.

specialism (spesh'al-izm), n. [< special + -ism.] Devotion to a special branch or division of a general subject or pursuit; the characteristic pursuit or theme of a specialist; restriction to a specialty. [Recent.]

Special hospitals and specialism in medical practice are in danger of being carried too far. Lancet, 1889, II. 1049.

All specialism of study, one-sidedness of view, and division of labor is dangerous [according to Comte].

N. A. Rev., CXX. 259.

specialist (spesh'al-ist), n. [< special + -ist.] A person who devotes himself to a particular branch of a profession, science, or art; one who has a special knowledge of some particular subject: thus, ophthalmologists, neurologists, or gynecologists are specialists in medicine.

Specialists are the coral-insects that build up a reef.
O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast-table, iii.

specialistic (spesh'al-ist'ik), a. [< specialist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a specialist or specialism. [Recent.]

The learned specialistic mind takes in the facts of one or two creeds or departments. Athenæum, No. 3273, p. 87.

specialità (> D. specialiteit = G. specialität = Sw. Dan. specialitet), < L. specialitas (-t)-s, particularity, peculiarity, < specialis, particular, special: see special. Cf. specialty, a doublet of speciality, as personality, reality, etc., are of personality, reality, etc.] 1. A special characteristic or attribute; a distinctive feature, property, or quality; a condition or circumstance especially distinguishing a class or an individual. [In this abstract sense speciality is preferable to the form specialty, on the analogy of personality, reality, and other words of similar tenor as related to personality, reality, etc. The distinction, so far as it exists, is accidental: the syncope form, in these pairs, is more vernacular, the full form more recent and artificial.]

It is the speciality of all vice to be selfishly indifferent to the injurious consequences of our actions, even . . . to those nearest to us. F. P. Cobbe, Peak in Darlen, p. 32.

The specialities of nature, chiefly mental, which we see produced, . . . must be ascribed almost wholly to direct equilibration. H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 170.

2. A special matter or thing; a characteristic or distinctive object, pursuit, diversion, operation, product, or the like; a specialty. See specialty, 6.

The speciality of the sport was to see how some for his slackness had a good bob with the bag.
Laneham, quoted in Strutt's Sports and Pastimes, p. 191.

The small State of Rhode Island, whose speciality has always been the manufacture of ordnance.

Comte de Paris, Civil War in America (trans.), I. 187.

specialization (spesh'al-i-zā'shon), n. [< specialize + -ation.] 1. The act or process of specializing; a making or fixing of special differences or requirements; differentiation.

In the history of Law the most important early specialization is that which separates what a man ought to do from what he ought to know.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 18.

2. The state of being or becoming specialized; a condition of fixed or developed differentiation, as of parts, organs, or individuals, with reference to form, appearance, function, etc.

That there is [in women] . . . a mental specialization joined with the bodily specialization is undeniable; and this mental specialization, though primarily related to the rearing of offspring, affects in some degree the conduct at large.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 375.

3. In biol., that evolutionary process whereby parts or organs primitively indifferent or of common character become differentiated in form or function (usually in both); also, the result of such process or course of development; adaptive modification. The most exact synonym is differentiation (which see). It is common to say differentiation of structure, but specialization of function, giving to the former word a morphological and to the latter a physiological significance. Since, however, change of form almost always implies change in use of the parts thus modified in adaptation to different purposes, the two words come to the same thing in the end, and may be interchanged. The whole course of biological evolution is from the most general to some particular form and function, or from that which is simple, primitive, indifferent, and low in the scale of organization to that which is a complex of particulars and thus highly organized. Such specialization is expressed both in the structure of any of the higher animals and plants, regarded as wholes to be compared with other wholes, and in the structure of their several parts, organs, or tissues, compared with one another in the same animal or plant, and compared with the corresponding parts, organs, or tissues in different animals and plants. The actual ways in which or means by which specialization is known or supposed to be effected are among the broadest problems in biology. See biological matter under evolution, Darwinism, selection, survival, variation, species, protoplasm, morphology, homology, analogy, heredity, environment, and words of like bearing on the points in question.

All physiologists admit that the specialization of organs, inasmuch as they perform in this state their functions better, is an advantage to each being.

Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 122.

This [frizzly] character of hair must be a specialization, for it seems very unlikely that it was the attribute of the common ancestors of the human race.

W. H. Flower, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 320.

Also spelled specialisation.

specialize (spesh'al-iz), v.; pret. and pp. specialized, ppr. specializing. [= F. spécialiser; as special + -ize.] 1. trans. I. To make individually or generically special or distinct; make specifically distinct; differentiate from other kinds in form, adaptation, or characteristics, as by a process of physical development; limit to a particular kind of development, action, or use. See specialization, 3.

The sensitiveness of the filaments [of Dionæa Muscipula] is of a specialized nature, being related to a momentary touch rather than to prolonged pressure.

Darwin, Insectiv. Plants, p. 292.

The eye is a highly specialized organ, admirably adapted for the important function which it fulfills.

Stokes, Light, p. 90.

Prudence may be said to be merely Wisdom specialized by the definite acceptance of Self-interest as its sole ultimate end.

H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 304.

24. To mention specially or in detail; particularize; specify.

Our Saviour specializing and nominating the places.
Sheldon, Miracles (1616), p. 201.

II. intrans. To act in some special way; pursue a special course or direction; take a specific turn or bent.

That some cells have specialised on the amoeboid character is seen in the so-called myeloplaxas.

Lancet, 1889, II. 635.

Also spelled specialise.

specializer (spesh'al-i-zér), n. One who makes a specialty of anything; a specialist. Also spelled specialiser. The Nation.

specialty (spesh'al-i), adv. [ME. specially, specialliche; < special + *-ly*2. Doublet of speciality.] 1. In a special manner; specifically; particularly; exceptionally; especially.

Thay suld be clene of enery vyce,

And, specialite, of Countye.

Lauder, Dewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), I. 461.

The earth . . . of Scripture generally is specialty the dry land.

Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 101.

2. For a particular reason or purpose; by special or exceptional action or proceeding; as, a meeting specialty called; an officer specialty designated.

The Latin tongue lived on in Britain after the withdrawal of the legions, but it lived on, as it lives on in modern countries, as a book-language specialty learned.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 124.

specialty (spesh'al-ti), n.; pl. specialties (-tiz). [ME. specialte, < OF. specialte, speciaute, especialte, especiaute, etc., a more vernacular form of specialite, specialite, etc., speciality: see speciality.] 1. The fact or condition of being special or particular; particularity of origin, cause, use, significance, etc. [Rare.]

And that they that be ordeynyd to sette messys bryng them be ordre and continually tyl alle be served, and not inordinally. And thorow affection to persons or by specialte.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 330.

It is no denial of the specialty of vital or psychical phenomena to reduce them to the same elementary motions as those manifested in cosmic phenomena.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. vi. § 35.

2. The special or distinctive nature of anything; essence; principle; groundwork. [Rare.]

The specialty of rule hath been neglected.

Shak., T. and C., I. 3. 78.

3. A special quality or characteristic; a distinguishing feature; a speciality. See speciality, 1.

The Last Supper at San Marco is an excellent example of the natural reverence of an artist of that time, with whom reverence was not, as one may say, a specialty.

H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 208.

4. A special or particular matter or thing; something specific or exceptional in character, relation, use, or the like.

Acosta numbereth diuerse strange specialties, excepted from the general Rules of Natures wonted course.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 872.

5. A special employment or pursuit; a distinct occupation or division of duty or interest; that which one does especially, either by choice or by assignment.

As each individual selects a special mode of activity for himself, and aims at improvement in that specialty, he finds himself attaining a higher and still higher degree of aptitude for it.

Dr. Carpenter, Correlation and Conserv. of Forces, p. 410.

6. A special product or manufacture; something made in a special manner or form, or especially characteristic of the producer or of the place of production: as, a dealer in specialties; also, an article to which a dealer professes to pay special attention or care, or which is alleged to possess special advantages in regard to quality, quantity, or price: as, fountain-pens a specialty. See the second quotation under speciality, 2.—7. In law, an instrument under seal, containing an express or implied agreement for the payment of money. The word has also been loosely used to include obligations or debts upon recognizance, judgments and decrees, and statutes, because these, being matter of record, rank in solemnity, conclusiveness, and endurance with free contracts under seal.

Let specialties be therefore drawn between us.

Shak., T. of the S., II. 1. 127.

All instruments under seal, of record, and liabilities imposed by statute, are specialties within the meaning of the Stat. 21 James I. Wood, On Limitation of Actions, § 29.

specie (spé'siē or -shē), n. [L. specie, abl. of species, kind, formerly much used in the phrase in specie, in kind, in ML. in coin: see species.] 1. As a Latin noun, used in the phrase in specie: (a) In kind.

So a lion is a perfect creature in himself, though it be less than that of a buffalo, or a rhinoceros. They differ but in specie; either in the kind is absolute; both have their parts, and either the whole. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

You must pay him in specie, Madam; give him love for his wit.

Dryden, Mock Astrologer, v. 1.

Uneconomical application of punishment, though proper, perhaps, as well in specie as in degree.

Bentham, Introduct. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 54, note.

(b) In coin. See def. 2. Hence, as an English noun.—2. Coin; metallic money; a medium of exchange consisting of gold or silver (the precious metals) coined by sovereign authority in pieces of various standard weights and values, and of minor coins of copper, bronze, or some other cheap or base metal: often used attributively. The earliest coinage of specie is attributed to the Lydians, about the eighth century B. C. Previously, and long afterward in many countries, pieces of silver and gold (the latter only to a small extent) were passed by weight in payments, as lumps of silver are still in China. The use of specie as a measure of price is based upon the intrinsic value of the precious metals as commodities, which has diminished immensely since ancient times, but is comparatively stable for long periods under normal circumstances. In modern civilized communities specie or bullion is largely used by banks as a basis or security for circulating notes (bank-notes) representing it. In times of great financial disturbance this security sometimes becomes inadequate from depletion or through excessive issues of notes, and a general suspension of specie payments takes place, followed by great depreciation of the paper money. General suspensions of specie payments occurred in the United States in 1837, 1857, and 1861, the last, due to the civil war, continuing till 1879. Specie payments by British banks were suspended by law, in consequence of the French wars, from 1797 to 1823, but were actually resumed by the Bank of England in 1821. Similar interruptions of solvency have occurred in the other European countries, resulting in Austria and Russia in an apparently permanent substitution of depreciated paper money for specie in ordinary use and reckoning.—Specie circular, in U. S. hist., a circular issued by the Secretary of the Treasury in July, 1836, by direction of President Jackson, ordering United States agents to receive in future only gold and silver or Treasury certificates in payment for government lands.

species (spé'shēz), n.; pl. species. [In ME. spece, spece, species, kind, spice (see spice); in mod. E. directly from the L.; = F. espèce, species (espèces, coin), = Sp. Pg. especie = It. specie = G. Dan. Sw. species, species (D. specie = Dan. specie, specie), < L. species, a seeing, sight, usually in passive sense, look, form, show, display, beauty, an apparition, etc., a particular sort, a species, LL. a special case, also spices, drugs, fruits, provisions, etc., ML. also a potion, a present, valuable property, NL. also coin, < specere, look, see, = OHG. spehon, MHG. spēhen (> It. spiare = Pr. Sp. Pg. espier = OF. espier, F. épier: see spy), G. spāhen, spy, = Gr. σπιεσθαι, look, = Skt. √ spaç, later paç, see. Hence special, especial, specie, specify, specious, spice, etc. From the same L. verb are ult. E. spectacle, aspect, expect, inspect, prospect, respect, suspect, etc., respite, despise, suspicion, etc., and the second element in auspice, frontispiece, etc.] 1. An appearance or representation to the senses or the perceptive faculties; an image presented to the eye or the mind. According to the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation, the species, the outward and visible forms or the appearance of bread and wine in the eucharist, are the accidents only of bread and wine severally, the substance no longer existing after consecration. See intentional species, below.

The sun, the great eye of the world, prying into the recesses of rocks and the hollowness of valleys, receives species or visible forms from these objects.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 782.

Wit . . . is no other than the faculty of imagination in the writer, which searches over all the memory for the species or ideas of those things which it designs to represent.

Dryden.

By putting such a rubric into its Missal, the church of Milan sought to express nothing more than that the accidents or species of the sacrament are broken.

Rock, Church of our Fathers, I. 125.

24. Something to be seen or looked at; a spectacle or exhibition; a show.

Shows and species serve best with the people. Bacon.

3. [Tr. of Gr. είδος.] In logic, and hence in ordinary language, a class included under a higher class, or, at least, not considered as including lower classes: a kind; a sort; a number of individuals having common characters peculiar to them.

There is a priver specie of pride that waiteth first to be sawed or he wol sawe.

Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

Different essences alone . . . make different species.

Locke, Human Understanding, III. vi. 35.

It is well for thee that . . . we came under a convention to pardon every species of liberty which we may take with each other.

Scott, Redgauntlet, letter iii.

A poor preacher being the worst possible species of a poor man.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 222.

4. One of the kinds of things constituting a combined aggregate or a compound; a distinct constituent part or element; an instrumental means: as, the species of a compound medicine. [Now rare in this medical sense, and obsolete or archaic in others.]

In Algebra, Species are those Letters, Characters, Notes, or Marks which represent the Quantities in any Equation or Demonstration.

E. Phillips, New World of Words (ed. 1706).

5. In biol., that which is specialized or differentiated recognizably from anything else of the same genus, family, or order; an individual which differs, or collectively those individuals which differ, specifically from all the other members of the genus, etc., and which do not differ from one another in size, shape, color, and so on, beyond the limits of (actual or assumed) individual variability, as those animals and plants which stand in the direct relation of parent and offspring, and perpetuate certain inherited characters intact or with that little modification which is due to conditions of environment. Species is thus practically, and for purposes of classification, the middle term between genus on the one hand and individual (or specimen) on the other; and only the latter can be said in strictness to have material existence, so that species, like genus, etc., is in this sense an abstract conception. It is also an assured fact in biology that no given stock or lineage breeds perfectly true in all its individuals; the line of descent is always marked by modification of characters (due to the interaction between heredity and environment); the whole tendency of such modification is toward further specialization, in the preservation of the more useful and the extinction of the less useful or the useless characters, and thus to the gradual acquirement, by insensible increments, of differences impressed upon a plastic organism from without—which is as much as to say that new species have always been in process of evolution, and still continue to be so developed. (See biological senses of evolution, selection, survival, and variation.) Such evolution has in fact been arrested at some point for every species once existent whose members have perished in time past; and of those specific forms whose adaptation to their environment has fitted them to survive till the present some are tending to perpetuation and some to extinction, but all are subject to incessant modification, for better or worse. (See atavism, reversion, 2, retrograde, a., 3, degradation, 7, 8, and paranthesis, 2.) Such are the views taken by nearly all biologists of the present day, in direct opposition to the former opinion of a special creation, which proceeded upon the assumption that all species of animals and plants, such as we find them actually to be, came into existence by creative fiat at some one time, and have since been perpetuated with little if any modification. In consequence of the fact that the greatest as well as the least differences in organisms are of degree and not of kind, no rigorous and unexceptionable definition of species is possible in either the animal or the vegetable kingdom; and in the actual naming, characterizing, and classifying of species naturalists differ widely, some reducing to one or two species the same series of individuals which others describe as a dozen or twenty species. (See lumper, 3, splitter, 2.) This, however, is rather a nomenclatorial than a doctrinal difference. The difficulty of deciding in many cases, and the impossibility of deciding in some, what degree of difference between given specimens shall be considered specific, and so formally named in the binomial system, have led to the introduction of several terms above and below the species (see subgenus, subspecies, conspecies, variety, race, 5 (a) (b), intergrade, v. 1), and also to a modification of the binomial nomenclature (see polynomial, 2, and trinomial). Two tests are commonly applied to the discrimination between good species and mere subspecies or varieties: (1) the individuals of thoroughly distinct species do not interbreed, or, if they are near enough to hybridize, their progeny is usually infertile, so that the cross is not in perpetuity: the horse and ass offer a good case in point; (2) the specific distinctions do not vanish by insensible degrees when large series of specimens from different geographical localities or geological horizons are available for comparison: for, should characters assumed to be distinctive, and therefore specific, be found to grade away under such scrutiny, they are by that fact proved to be non-specific, and the specimens in question are reducible to the rank of conspecies, subspecies, varieties, or races. Attempts which have been made to separate mankind into several species of the genus Homo fail according to both of the criteria above stated. To these may be added, in judging the validity of an alleged species, the third premise, that stable specific forms are evolved by or in the course of natural selection only; for all the countless stocks or breeds resulting from artificial selection, however methodically conducted, tend to revert when left to themselves, and also hybridize freely; they are not therefore in perpetuity except under cultivation, and are no species in a proper sense, though their actual differences may have become, under careful selection, far greater than those usually accounted specific or even generic. (See dog, rose.) Taking into account geological succession in time as well as geographical distribution in space, and proceeding upon accepted doctrines of the evolution of all forms of animal and vegetable life from antecedent forms, it is evident, first, that "species" is predicable only by means of the "missing links" in the chains of genetic relationships; for, were all organisms that have ever existed before our eyes in their actual evolutionary sequences, we should find no gap or break in the whole series; but, secondly, that development along numberless diverging lines of descent with modification has in fact resulted (through obliteration of the consecutive steps in the process) in the living fauna and flora of the globe, in respect of which not only specific, but generic, ordinal, and still broader distinctions are easily and certainly predicable. It does not appear that any animal or plant has always maintained what we now find its specific character to be; yet the persistence of some forms under no greater variation than that usually accounted generic is established, as in the case of the genus Lingula, whose members have survived from the Silurian to the present epoch with only specific modification. In the animal kingdom probably about 250,000 species have been described, recorded, and formally named by a word following the name of the genus to which they are severally ascribed (see under specific); the actual number of species is doubtless much greater than this; some 200,000 species are insects (see Insecta), of which 80,000 or more belong to one order (see Coleoptera). These estimates are exclusive of merely nominal species. (See synonymy.) The known species of flowering plants are summed up by Durand in his "Index Generum Phanerogamorum" as follows: dicotyledons, 78,200; monocotyledons, 19,600; gymnosperms, 2,420—in all, 100,220. This is the net result after extensive sifting. To this number large additions are to be expected from regions, as central Africa, still imperfectly or not at all explored. Of the number of cryptogams no reliable estimate can at present be given. The described species of fungi, judging from the eight volumes of Saccardo's work now published, are likely to number, before sifting, about 50,000. Abbreviated sp., with plural spp.

6t. Coin; metallic money; specie. See specie.

Rome possessed a much greater proportion of the circulating species of its time than any European city.

Arbutnot, Ancient Coins.

Species, your honour knows, is of easier conveyance.
Garrick, Neck or Nothing, il. 2.

He [Necker] affirms that, from the year 1726 to the year 1784, there was coined at the mint of France, in the species of gold and silver, to the amount of about one hundred millions of pounds sterling.
Burke, Rev. in France.

7. One of a class of pharmaceutical preparations consisting of a mixture of dried herbs of analogous medicinal properties, used for making decoctions, infusions, etc. See under tea.
—8. In civil law, the form or shape given to materials; fashion; form; figure. Burrill.

9. In math.: (a) A letter in algebra denoting a quantity. [This meaning was borrowed by some early writers from the French of Viète, who derived it from a Latin translation of Diophantus, who uses εἶδος to mean a term of a polynomial in a particular power of the unknown quantity.] (b) A fundamental operation of arithmetic. See the four species, below.

Disjunct species, in logic. See disjunct.—Intelligible species. See intelligible.—Intentional species, a similitude or simulacrum of an outward thing; the vicarious object in perception and thought, according to the doctrine held and attributed to Aristotle by the medieval realists, beginning with Aquinas. Such species were divided into sensible species and intelligible species, which distinction and terminology, originating with Aquinas, were accepted by Scotus and others. The sensible species mediated between the outward object and the senses. They were metaphorically called emanations, but, being devoid of matter, are not to be confounded with the emanations of Democritus, from which they also differ in being related to other senses besides sight. So far as they belong to the outward thing they were called impressed, so far as they are perceived by the mind expressed species. From these sensible species the agent intellect, by an act of abstraction, was supposed to separate certain intelligible species, which the higher or patient intellect was able to perceive. These intelligible species so far as they belong to sense were called impressed, so far as they are perceived by the intellect expressed species. Species were further distinguished as acquired, infused, and connatural. The doctrine of intentional species was rejected by the nominalists, and exploded early in the seventeenth century, but not until the nineteenth was it generally acknowledged to be foreign to the opinion of Aristotle.

—Nascent species, in biol., a species of animal or plant in the act, as it were, of being born or produced; an incipient species, whose characters are not yet established in the course of its development.—Sensible species. See intentional species.—Species anthelminticæ, a mixture of equal parts of absinthium, tansy, camomile, and santonica.—Species diuretica, a mixture of equal parts of roots of lovage, asparagus, fennel, parsley, and butcher's-broom.—Species laxantes. Same as St. Germain tea (which see, under tea).—Species pectorales. Same as breast tea (which see, under tea).—Species sudorificæ. Same as wood tea (which see, under tea).—Subaltern species, in logic, that which is both a species of some higher genus and a genus in respect of the species into which it is divided.—The four species, the four fundamental operations of arithmetic—addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division. This phrase, rare in English but common in German, seems to have been first so applied by the East Frisian mathematician Gemma in 1540. It was borrowed from logic, where since Petrus Hispanus four species of logical procedure are enumerated in all the old books. Thus, Wilson (1851) says: "There be four kinds of argumentes, a perfecte argument, an unperfecte argument, an inductione, an example"; and Blundeville (1590): "There be foure principall kindes or formes of argumentation, that is, a syllogisme, an induction, an enthymeme, and example."

species-cover (spē'shēz-kuv'ēr), n. The cover used in a herbarium to inclose and protect all the species-sheets of a single species. Such covers are usually made of folded sheets of light-weight brown paper, a little larger than the species-sheets.

species-cycle (spē'shēz-sī'kl), n. In bot., the complete series of forms needed to represent adequately the entire life-history of a species.

species-monger (spē'shēz-mung'gēr), n. In nat. hist.: (a) One who occupies himself mainly or exclusively in naming and describing species, without inclination to study, or perhaps without ability to grasp, their significance as biological facts; a specialist in species, who cares little or nothing for broader generalizations. (b) One who is finical in drawing up specific diagnoses, or given to distinctions without a difference. [Cant in both senses.]

species-paper (spē'shēz-pā'pēr), n. Same as species-sheet.

species-sheet (spē'shēz-shēt), n. One of the sheets or pieces of paper upon which the individual specimens of a species in a herbarium are mounted for preservation and display. They are usually made of heavy stiff white paper, the standard size of which is, in the United States, 16½ × 11½ inches, weighing about 28 pounds to the ream. Only a single species is placed on a sheet, and its label is placed in the lower right-hand corner.

specificable (spēs'i-fi-ā-bl), a. [<specify + -able.] That may be specified; capable of being distinctly named or stated.

A minute but specificable fraction of an original disturbance may be said to get through any obstacle.

Nature, XXXVIII. 592.

specific (spē-sif'ik), a. and n. [<OF. spécifique, F. spécifique = Sp. específico = Pg. específico = It. specifico (cf. G. spezifisch), <ML. specificus, specific, particular, <L. species, kind. + -ficus, <facere, make.] I. a. 1. That is specified or defined; distinctly named, formulated, or determined; of a special kind or a definite tenor; determinate; explicit: as, a specific sum of money; a specific offer; specific obligations or duties; a specific aim or pursuit.

To be actuated by a desire for pleasure is to be actuated by a desire for some specific pleasure to be enjoyed by oneself.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 282.

In addition to these broad differences, there are finer differences of specific quality within each sense.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 115.

2. Pertaining to or accordant with what is specified or determined; relating to or regarding a definite subject; conformable to special occasion or requirement, prescribed terms, or known conditions; having a special use or application.

It was in every way stimulating and suggestive to have detected a specific bond of relationship in speech and in culture between such different peoples as the English and the Hindus.

J. Fiske, Evolutionist, p. 109.

3. Of or pertaining to a species. (a) Pertaining to a logical species. (b) In zool. and bot., of or pertaining to species or a species: constituting a species; peculiar to, characteristic of, or diagnostic of a species; designating or denominating a species; not generic or of wider application than to a species: as, specific characters; specific difference; a specific name. See generic, subgeneric, conspecific, subspecific.

4. Peculiar; special.

Their style, like the style of Boiardo in poetry, of Botticelli in painting, is specific to Italy in the middle of the fifteenth century. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 251.

5. In law, having a certain or well-defined form or designation; observing a certain form; precise.—6. In med., related to special infection, particularly syphilitic infection; produced by some distinct zymotic poison.—Specific cause, in med., a cause which in operation will produce some special disease.—Specific centers, points or periods in the course of evolution at which an organism is supposed to become specifically differentiated from a common stock, having assumed or acquired its specific characters.—Specific characters, in zool. and bot., the diagnostic marks of a species; differences of whatever kind, which are peculiar to a species and serve to distinguish it from any other. The sum of such characters, or the total specific characteristics, are also spoken of as the specific character. Any one such mark or feature is a specific character.—Specific denial, in law, denial which itself rehearses what is denied, or which sufficiently specifies what particular part of the adversary's allegations are denied, as distinguished from a general denial of all his allegations.—Specific difference, in logic. See difference.—Specific disease, a disease produced by a special infection, as syphilis.—Specific duty, in a tariff, an impost of specified amount upon any object of a particular kind, or upon a specified quantity of a commodity, entered at a custom-house.—Specific gravity. See gravity.—Specific heat. See heat.—Specific inductive capacity. See capacity and induction, 6.—Specific intent, legacy, lien. See the nouns.—Specific medicine or remedy, a medicine or remedy that has a distinct effect in the cure of a certain disease, as mercury in syphilis, or quinine in intermittent fever.—Specific name, in zool. and bot., the second term in the binomial name of an animal or a plant, which designates or specifies a member of a genus, and which is joined to the generic name to complete the scientific or technical designation. Thus, in the name Felis leo, leo is the specific name, designating the lion as a member of the genus Felis, and as specifically different from Felis tigris, the tiger, Felis catus, the wildcat, etc. Also called nomen specificum, and formerly nomen triviale or trivial name. See binomial, 2, and nomen.—Specific performance, relief, resistance. See the nouns.—Specific rotatory power. See rotatory, = syn. 1 and 2. Particular, etc. See specific.

II. n. Something adapted or expected to produce a specific effect; that which is, or is supposed to be, capable of infallibly bringing about a desired result; especially, a remedy which cures, or tends to cure, a certain disease, whatever may be its manifestations, as mercury used as a remedy for syphilis.

Always you find among people, in proportion as they are ignorant, a belief in specifics, and a great confidence in pressing the adoption of them.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 20.

specific (spē-sif'i-ka), a. [<specific + -al.] Same as specific. [Archaic.]

To compel the performance of the contract, and recover the specific sum due.

Blackstone, Com., III. ix.

specifically (spē-sif'i-ka-li), adv. 1. In a specific manner; according to the nature of the species or of the case; definitely; particularly; explicitly; in a particular sense, or with a particularly differentiated application.

But it is rather manifest that the essence of spirits is a substance specifically distinct from all corporeal matter whatsoever. Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism, iii. 12.

Those several virtues that are specifically requisite to a due performance of this duty.

South, Sermons.

2. With reference to a species, or to specific difference; as a species.

specificity (spē-sif'i-ka-li-nes), n. The state of being specific. [Rare.]

specificate (spē-sif'i-kāt), v. t. [<ML. specificatus, pp. of specificare, specify: see specify.] To denote or distinguish specifically; specify.

Now life is the character by which Christ specificates and denominates himself.

Donne, Sermons, vii.

specification (spēs'i-fi-kā'shon), n. [= F. spécification = Sp. especificación = Pg. especificação = It. specificazione, <ML. specificatio(n)-a, specifying, enumeration, <specificare, specify: see specify.] 1. An act of specifying, or making a detailed statement, or the statement so made; a definite or formal mention of particulars: as, a specification of one's requirements.

All who had relatives or friends in this predicament were required to furnish a specification of them.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 7.

2. An article, item, or particular specified; a special point, detail, or reckoning upon which a claim, an accusation, an estimate, a plan, or an assertion is based: as, the specifications of an architect or an engineer, of an indictment, etc.; the specification of the third charge against a prisoner; statements unsupported by specifications.—3. The act of making specific, or the state of having a specific character; reference to or correlation with a species or kind; determination of species or specific relation.

For, were this the method, miracles would no more be miracles than the diurnal revolution of the sun, the growth and specification of plants and animals, the attraction of the magnet, and the like.

Evelyn, True Religion, II. 195.

Here we may refer to two principles which Kant put forward under the names of Homogeneity and Specification.

F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 68.

4. In patent law, the applicant's description of the manner of constructing and using his invention. It is required to be so explicit as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to make and use the same; and in the United States it forms part of the patent, which cannot therefore protect the inventor in anything not within the specification.

5. In civil law, the formation of a new property from materials belonging to another person. Specification exists where a person works up materials belonging to another into something which must be taken to be a new substance—for example, where whisky is made from corn. The effect is that the owner of the materials loses his property in them, and has only an action for the value of them against the person by whom they have been used. The doctrine originates in the civil law, but has been adopted by the common law, under the name of confusion and accession, at least where the person making the specification acts in good faith.—Accusative of specification. Same as synecdochical accusative. See synecdochical.—Charge and specifications. See charge.—Law of specification, in Kantian philos., the logical principle that, however far the process of logical determination may be carried, it can always be carried further.—Principle of specification, in Kantian philos.: (a) The logical maxim that we should be careful to introduce into a hypothesis all the elements which the facts to be explained call for, or that entium varietates non temere esse minuendas, which is a counteracting maxim to Occam's razor. (b) Same as law of specification.

specificity (spēs-i-fis'i-ti), n. [<specific + -ity.] The state of being specific, or of having a specific character or relation; specific affinity, cause, origin, or effect; specificness. [Recent.]

The suddenness, vigour, and specificity of their effects.

F. W. H. Myers, Proc. Lond. Soc. Psychic Research.

Are we any longer to allow to this disease [cowpox] any high degree of specificity?

Lancet, 1889, I. 1130.

specificize (spē-sif'i-siz), v. t.; pret. and pp. specificized, ppr. specificizing. [<specific + -ize.] To make specific; give a special or specific character to. [Recent.]

The richest specificized apparatus of nervous mechanism.

Allen, and Neurol., VI. 488.

specificness (spē-sif'ik-nes), n. The state or character of being specific.

specify (spes'i-fi), v. t.: pret. and pp. specified, ppr. specifying. [ME. specifyen, specifien, < OF. specifier, especifier, F. spécifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. especificar = It. specificare = D. specificeren = G. specificeren = Sw. specificera = Dan. specificere, < ML. specificare, make specific, mention specifically, < specificus, specific, particular: see specific.] 1. To mention specifically or explicitly; state exactly or in detail; name distinctly: as, to specify the persons concerned in a given act; to specify one's wants, or articles required.

Ther cowde no man the nowmber specife.
Generules (E. E. T. S.), I. 1953.
I nevere hadde to do more with the seyde John Wortes than is specified in the seyde instruction.

Paston Letters, I. 20.
There is no need of specifying particulars in this class of uses.
Emerson, Nature, p. 17.

2. To name as a requisite, as in technical specifications; set down in a specification.—3. To make specific; give a specific character to; distinguish as of a species or kind. [Rare.]

Be specified in yourself, but not specified by anything foreign to yourself. F. H. Bradley, Ethical Studies, p. 71.
= Syn. To indicate, particularize, individualize.

specillum (spé-sil'um), n.; pl. specilla (-i). [L., < specere, look, behold: see species.] 1. In med., a probe.—2. A lens; an eye-glass.

specimen (spes'i-men), n. [= F. spécimen = Sp. espécimen, < L. specimen, that by which a thing is known, a mark, token, proof, < specere, see: see species.] 1. A part or an individual taken as exemplifying a whole mass or number; something that represents or illustrates all of its kind; an illustrative example: as, a collection of geological specimens; a wild specimen of the human or of the feline race; a specimen page of a book (a page shown as a specimen of what the whole is or is to be); a specimen copy of a medal.

The best specimens of the Attic coinage give a weight of 4.366 grammes (67.38 + grains Troy) for the drachma.
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVI. 117.

Curzola is a perfect specimen of a Venetian town.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 205.
The leaf sculpture of the door jambs of the Cathedral of Florence affords specimens of the best Italian work of this sort (fourteenth century).

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 296.
2. In zool. and bot., an individual animal or plant, or some part of one, prepared and preserved for scientific examination; an example of a species or other group; a preparation: as, a specimen of natural history; a specimen of the dog or the rose. Abbreviated sp. and spec.—3. A typical individual; one serving as a specially striking or exaggerated example of the kind indicated. [Jocose and colloq.]

There were some curious specimens among my visitors.
Thoreau, Walden, p. 163.

= Syn. Specimen, Sample. A specimen is a part of a larger whole employed to exhibit the nature or kind of that of which it forms a part, without reference to the relative quality of individual portions; thus, a cabinet of mineralogical specimens exhibits the nature of the rocks from which they are broken. A sample is a part taken out of a quantity, and implies that the quality of the whole is to be judged by it, and not rarely that it is to be used as a standard for testing the goodness, genuineness, or purity of the whole, and the like. In many cases, however, the words are used indifferently. Sample is more often used in trade: as, a sample of cotton or coffee.

speciological (spé'shi-ô-loj'i-kal), a. [< speciology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to speciology.

speciology (spé'shi-ol'ô-ji), n. [< L. species, species, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγω, speak: see -ology.] In biol., the science of species; the doctrine of the origin and nature of species.

speciosity (spé'shi-os'i-ti), n.; pl. speciosities (-tiz). [< OF. speciosité = Sp. especiosidad = Pg. especiosidade = It. speciosità, < L.L. speciosita (-t-s, good looks, beauty, < L. speciosus, good-looking, beautiful, splendid: see specious.] 1. The state of being specious or beautiful; a beautiful show or spectacle; something delightful to the eye.

So great a glory as all the speciosities of the world could not equalise.

Dr. H. More, On Godliness, III. vi. § 5. (Encyc. Diet.)

2. The state of being specious or plausible; a specious show; a specious person or thing. [Rare.]

Professions built so largely on speciosity instead of performance.

specious (spé'shus), a. [< ME. specious, < OF. specieux, F. spécieux = Sp. Pg. especioso = It. specioso, < L. speciosus, good-looking, beautiful, fair, < species, form, figure, beauty: see species.] 1. Pleasing to the eye; externally fair or showy; appearing beautiful or charming; sightly; beautiful. [Archaic.]

The rest, far greater part,
Will deem in outward rites and specious forms Religion satisfied. Milton, P. L., xii. 534.

2. Superficially fair, just, or correct; appearing well; apparently right; plausible; beguiling: as, specious reasoning; a specious argument; a specious person or book.

It is easy for princes under various specious pretences to defend, disguise, and conceal their ambitious desires.
Bacon, Political Fables, ii., Expl.

Thou specious Head without a Brain. Prior, A Fable.

A brief yet specious tale, how I had wasted
The sun in secret riot. Shelley, The Cenci, iii. 1.

3. Appearing actual, or in reality; actually existing; not imaginary. [Rare.]

Let me sum up, now, by saying that we are constantly conscious of a certain duration—the specious present—varying in length from a few seconds to probably not more than a minute, and that this duration (with its content perceived as having one part earlier and the other part later) is the original intuition of time.
W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 642.

4. Pertaining to species or a species.—Specious arithmetic, algebra: so called by old writers following Viete. The phrase implies that algebra is computation by means of species, or letters denoting quantities; but the choice of the name was probably influenced by the beauty of algebraic processes.—Specious logic. See logic. = Syn. 2. Colorable, Plausible, etc. See ostensible.

speciously (spé'shus-li), adv. In a specious manner; with an appearance of fairness or of reality; with show of right: as, to reason speciously.

My dear Anacreon, you reason speciously, which is better in most cases than reasoning soundly; for many are led by it and none offended.

Landor, Imag. Conv., Anacreon and Polycrates.

speciousness (spé'shus-nes), n. The state or quality of being specious; plausible appearance; fair external show: as, the speciousness of an argument.

His theory owes its speciousness to packing, and to packing alone.
Macaulay, Sadler's Refutation Refuted.

speck¹ (spek), n. [< ME. spekke, spekke, < AS. specca (pl. speccan), a spot, speck (also in comp. specc-faag, specked, spotted); cf. LG. spaken, spot with wet, spakig, spotted with wet; MD. spicken, spit, spickelen, spot, speckle: see speckle.] 1. A very small superficial spot or stain; a small dot, blot, blotch, or patch appearing on or adhering to a surface: as, specks of mold on paper; fly-specks on a wall.

He was wonderfully careful that his shoes and clothes should be without the least speck upon them.

Steele, Tatler, No. 48.

2. In fruit, specifically, a minute spot denoting the beginning of decay; a pit or spot of rot or rottenness; hence, sometimes, a fruit affected by rot.

The shrivelled, dwarfish, or damaged fruit, called by the street traders the specks.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 117.
The little rift within the lover's lute,
Or little pitted speck in garner'd fruit,
That rotting inward slowly moulders all.
Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien (song).

3. A patch or piece of some material.

But Robin did on the old mans cloake,
And it was torn in the necke;
"Now by my faith," said William Scarlett,
"Heere should be set a specke."
Robin Hood and the Old Man (Child's Ballads, V. 258).

4. Something appearing as a spot or patch; a small piece spread out: as, a speck of snow or of cloud.

Come forth under the speck of open sky.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, vi.

5. A distinct or separate piece or particle; a very little bit; an atom; a mite: as, specks of dust; a speck of snuff or of soot; hence, the smallest quantity; the least morsel: as, he has not a speck of humor or of generosity.

The bottom consisting of gray sand with black specks.
Anson, Voyages, ii. 7.

Still wrong bred wrong within her, day by day
Some little speck of kindness fell away.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 328.

6. A percoid fish, Ulocentra stigmæa of Jordan, common in ponds of the hill-country from Georgia to Louisiana. It is a darter, 2½ inches long, of an olivaceous color, speckled with small orange spots, and otherwise variegated.—7. A speck-moth.

speck¹ (spek), v. t. [< ME. specken; < *speck*¹, n.]

1. To spot; mark or stain in spots or dots.
Wyclif, Gen. xxx. 32.

Each flower of slender stalk, whose head, though gay
Carnation, purple, azure, or speck'd with gold, Hung drooping unsustain'd. Milton, P. L., ix. 429.

2. Of fruit, specifically, to mark with a discolored spot denoting decay or rot: usually in the past participle.

It seemed as if the whole fortune or failure of her shop might depend on the display of a different set of articles, or substituting a fairer apple for one which appeared to be specked.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, iii.

speck² (spek), n. [*Prop. spick (the form speck being dial., and in part due to D. or G.); early mod. E. spycke, < ME. spik, spyk, spike, also assimilated spich, < AS. spic, bacon, = D. spek = MLG. spek = OHG. MHG. spec, G. speck = Icel. spik, lard, fat; prob. akin to Gr. πικον (πικον*), = Zend piranh = Skt. pīran, fat.] Fat; lard; fat meat. Now used chiefly as derived from the German in the parts of Pennsylvania originally settled by Germans, or from the Dutch in New York (also in South Africa, for the fat meat of the hippopotamus); among whalers it is used for whale's blubber.

Adue good Cheese and Oynons, stuffe thy guts
With Specke and Barley-pudding for digestion.

Heywood, English Traveller, I. 2.

Speck [in Pennsylvania] is the hybrid offspring of English pronunciation and German Speck (pronounced schpeck), the generic term applied to all kinds of fat meat.
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVII., App., p. xii.

Speck and applejees, pork fat and apples cut up and cooked together: an old-fashioned Dutch dish. Bartlett.

speck-block (spek'blok), n. In whaling, a block through which a speck-fall is rove.

speck-fall (spek'fal), n. [*< speck*² + *fall*³.] In whale-fishing, a fall or rope rove through a block for hoisting the blubber and bone off the whale.

speckle (spek'li), n. [Early mod. E. also speck-it (= D. spikkel, a speckle), with dim. -le, < *speck*¹, n. (cf. speckle, v.)] 1. A little speck or spot; a speckled marking; the state of being speckled: as, yellow with patches of speckle.

She curiously examined . . . the peculiar speckle of its plumage.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, x.

2. Color; hence, kind; sort. [Scotch.]

As ye well ken, . . . "the wauges o' sin is deith." But, maistly, . . . sinners get first wauges o' anither speckle frae the maister o' them.

G. Macdonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock, xii.

speckle (spek'li), v. t.; pret. and pp. speckled, ppr. speckling. [< MD. spickelen, speckelen, speckelen, speckle: see speckle, n.] To mark with specks or spots; fleck; speck; spot.

Seeing Atys, straight he [the boar] rushed at him,
Speckled with foam, bleeding in flank and limb.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 348.

speckle-belly (spek'li-bel'i), n. 1. The North American white-fronted goose, Anser albifrons gambeli: so called in California because the under parts are whitish, blotched and patched with black. Also called harlequin brant, speckled brant. See cut under laughing-goose.—2. The gadwall, or gray duck, Chauclasmus streperus. See cut under Chauclasmus. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Long Island].—3. A trout or char, as the common brook-trout of the United States, Salvelinus fontinalis. See cut under *char*⁴.

speckled (spek'ld), p. a. [< speckle + -ed.] 1. Spotted; specked; marked with small spots of indeterminate character; maculate: specifically noting many animals.

I will pass through all thy flock to day, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats: and of such shall be my hire. Gen. xxx. 32.

Ouer the body they haue built a Tombe of speckled stone, a brace and halfe high. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 271.

2. Variegated in appearance or character; diversified; motley; piebald: as, a speckled company. [Colloq.]

It was a singularly freaked and speckled group.

S. Judd, Margaret, I. 10.

Speckled alder. See *alder*¹, I.—Speckled beauty. (a) A trout: a trite cant phrase. (b) A British geometrid moth, Cleora viduaria.—Speckled-bill, the speckled-billed coot, or spectacle-coot; the surf-duck, Edemia perspicillata. [New Eng.].—Speckled brant. Same as speckle-belly, 1.—Speckled footman, a British bombycid moth, Euleyria cribrum.—Speckled leech, Hirudo or Sanguisuga medicinalis, one of the forms of medicinal leech.—Speckled loon. See *loon*².—Speckled terrapin. See terrapin.—Speckled trout, a speckle-belly; the brook-trout.—Speckled wood, palmyra-wood cut transversely into veneers, and showing the ends of dark fibers mixed with lighter wood.—Speckled yellow, a British geometrid moth, Venidia maculata.

speckledness (spek'ld-nes), n. The state of being speckled.

speckled-tailed (spek'ld-täld), a. Having a speckled tail: specifically noting Thryothorus bewicki spilurus, a variety of Bewick's wren found on the Pacific coast of the United States, translating the word spilurus.

speckless (spek'les), a. [< speck + -less.] Free from specks or spots; spotless; fleckless; perfectly clean, clear, or bright: as, speckless linen; a speckless sky.

There gleamed resplendent in the dimness of the corner a complete and speckless pewter dinner service.

New Princeton Rev., II. 111.

speck-moth (spek'môth), n. One of certain geometrid moths, as Eupithecia subfulvata, the tawny speck: an English collectors' name.

specktioneer (spek-shô-nêr'), n. [Also specktioneer; appar. orig. a humorous term, irreg. < speck + -tion + -eer (with allusion to inspection and engineer).] In whale-fishing, the chief harpooner: so called as being the director of the cutting operations in clearing the whale of its speck or blubber and bones.

In a rough, careless way, they spoke of the specktioneer with admiration enough for his powers as a sailor and harpooner.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xix.

specky (spek'i), a. [< speck + -y.] Having specks or spots; slightly or partially spotted.

The tonsils were full, and the left one specky.

Lancet, No. 3494, p. 334.

specs, specks (speks), n. pl. A colloquial contraction of spectacles.

spectable (spek'ta-bl), a. [ME. spectable, < OF. spectable = Sp. espectable = Pg. espectável = It. spettabile, notable, remarkable, < L. spectabilis, that may be seen, visible, admirable, < spectare, see, behold: see spectacle.] That may be seen; visible; observable.

There are in hem certayne signes spectable, Which is to eschewe, and which is profitable.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 123.

Their [the Pharisees'] prayers were at the corners of streets; such corners where divers streets met, and so more spectable to many passengers.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 104. (Davies.)

spectacle (spek'ta-kl), n. [ME. spectacle, spektacle, < OF. (and F.) spectacle = Sp. Pg. espectaculo = It. spettacolo = D. spektakel, spectacle, show, = G. Dan. spektakel, noise, uproar, = Sw. spektakel, spectacle, noise, < L. spectaculum, a show, spectacle, < spectare, see, behold, freq. of specere, see: see species.] 1. An exhibition; exposure to sight or view; an open display; also, a thing looked at or to be looked at; a sight; a gazing-stock; a show; especially, a deplorable exhibition.

A Donghill of dead carcases he spyde,

The dreadfull spectacle of that sad house of Pryde.

Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 53.

So exquisitely was it [a crucifix] form'd that it represented in a very lively manner the lamentable spectacle of our Lord's Body, as it hung upon the Cross.

Maunderell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 72.

How much we forgive in those who yield us the rare spectacle of heroic manners! Emerson, Conduct of Life.

2. Specifically, a public show or display for the gratification of the eye; something designed or arranged to attract and entertain spectators; a pageant; a parade: as, a royal or a religious spectacle; a military or a dramatic spectacle.

The stately semi-religious spectacle in which the Greeks delighted.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 324.

In the winter season the circus used to amalgamate with a dramatic company, and make a joint appearance in equestrian spectacles.

J. Jefferson, Autobiog., iii.

3†. A looking-glass; a mirror.—4†. A spy-glass; a speculum.

Poverty a spectacle is, as thynketh me,

Thurgh whiche he may hise verray frendes see.

Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 347.

5. pl. A pair of lenses set in a frame adjusted to the eyes, to correct or improve defective vision; also, sometimes, a similar frame with pieces of plain white or colored glass to protect the eyes from glare or dust: commonly called a pair of spectacles. The frame was in former times usually of horn or tortoise-shell, and afterward of Spectacles.

A, spectacles with bows hinged to the shoulders on the rims connected by the nose or bridge. B, spectacles with hook-bows and with bridge and shoulders riveted to the lenses. C, detail showing construction of shoulder. D, side view, showing rim. In all the figures: a, bows; b, shoulders; c, rims; d, bridge.

silver; it is now usually of steel or of gold. It is made up of the "bridge," "rims" (or frames of the lenses), "bows," and "sides" or "temples"; but the bows are now often omitted. The frame is so constructed and adjusted as to rest on the nose and ears and hold the lenses in the proper position. Spectacles which are supported on the nose only, by means of a spring, are commonly called eye-glasses. Spectacles with convex lenses are for the aged, or farsighted; and spectacles with concave lenses are for the near-sighted. In both cases the value of spectacles depends upon their being accurately adapted to the person's vision. Spectacles with colored lenses, as green, blue, neutral-tint, or smoke-color, are used to protect the eyes from a glare of light. Divided spectacles have each lens composed of two parts of different foci neatly united, one part for observing distant objects, and the other for examining objects near the eye. Another kind, called periscope spectacles, are intended to allow the eyes considerable latitude of motion without fatigue. The lenses employed in this case are of either a meniscus or a concavo-convex form, the concave side being turned to the eye. Spectacles with glazed wings or frames partly filled with crape or wire gauze are used to shield the eyes from dust, etc.

He [Lord Crawford] sat upon a couch covered with deer's hide, and with spectacles on his nose (then a recent invention) was laboring to read a huge manuscript called the Rosier de la Guerre.

Scott, Quentin Durward, vii.

6. pl. Figuratively, visual aids of any kind, physical or mental; instruments of or assistance in seeing or understanding; also, instruments or means of seeing or understanding otherwise than by natural or normal vision or perception: as, rose-colored spectacles; I cannot see things with your spectacles.

And even with this I lost fair England's view,
And bid mine eyes be packing with my heart,
And call'd them blind and dusky spectacles,
For losing ken of Albion's wished coast.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 112.

Subjects are to look upon the faults of princes with the spectacles of obedience and reverence to their place and persons.

Donne, Sermons, ii.

Shakespeare . . . was naturally learn'd; he needed not the Spectacles of Books to read Nature; he look'd inwards, and found her there.

Dryden, Essay on Dram. Poesy (1688), p. 31.

7. pl. In zoöl., a marking resembling a pair of spectacles, especially about the eyes: as, the spectacles of the cobra. See cut under cobra-de-capello.

A pair of white spectacles on the eyes, and whitish about base of bill.

Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 815.

Compound spectacles. (a) Spectacles fitted for receiving extra colored glasses, or to which additional lenses can be attached to vary the power. (b) A form of spectacles having in each bow two half glasses differing in power or character; divided spectacles. See def. 5.—Franklin spectacles. Same as pantoscopic spectacles (which see, under pantoscopic).

spectacled (spek'ta-kl-d), a. [< spectacle + -ed.]

1. Furnished with or wearing spectacles.

The bleared sights

Are spectacled to see him. Shak., Cor., ii. 1. 222.

Porphyro upon her face doth look,
Like puzzled urchin on an aged crone
Who keepeth closed a wondrous riddle-book,
As spectacled she sits in chimney-nook.

Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, xv.

2. In zoöl.: (a) Marked in any way that suggests spectacles or the wearing of spectacles: as, the spectacled bear or cobra. (b) Spectable or spectacular; being "a sight to behold"; spectral: as, the spectacled shrimp.—Spectacled bear. Ursus or Tremarctos ornatus, the only South American bear, having a light-colored mark on the face, like a pair of spectacles.—Spectacled cobra. Any specimen of the common Indian cobra, Naja tripudians, which has the markings of the back of the hood well developed so as to resemble a pair of spectacles. See cut under cobra-de-capello.—Spectacled coot, spectacled duck, the surf-scooter or duck. Edemia peripallata; the goggle-nose. (Connecticut).—Spectacled elder, Somateria (Arctonetta) fisheri, an elder-duck of the northwest coast of America, having in the male the eyes set in silvery-white plumage rimmed with black.—Spectacled goose, guillemot, snake, stenoderm. See the nouns.—Spectacled shrimp, the specter or skeleton-shrimp, a caprellid. See Caprella.—Spectacled vampire. Same as spectacled stenoderm.

spectacled-headed (spek'ta-kl-d-hed'ed), a. Having the head spectacled: applied to flies of the genera Holcocephala (family Asilidæ) and Diopsi and Sphyracephala (family Diopsidæ). See cut under Diopsi.

A queer-looking, spectacled-headed, predatory fly. . . The head is unusually broad in front, the eyes being very prominent and presenting a spectacled or goggled appearance.

C. H. Tyler Townsend, Proc. Entom. Soc. [of Washington], I. 254.

spectacle-furnace (spek'ta-kl-fêr'nās), n. A literal translation of the German brillenofen, which is a variety of the spurofen, a form of shaft-furnace of which the essential peculiarity is that the melted material runs out upon the inclined bottom of the furnace into a crucible-like receptacle or pot outside and in front of the furnace-stack. This sort of furnace has been used at Mansfeld and in the Harz, but apparently not in any English-speaking country.

spectacle-gage (spek'ta-kl-gāj), n. A device used in fitting spectacles to determine the proper distance between the glasses.

spectacle-glass (spek'ta-kl-glās), n. 1. Glass suited for making spectacles; optical glass.—2. A lens of the kind or form used in spectacles.

—3†. A field-glass; a telescope.

As 1678 he added a spectacle-glass to the shadow-vane of the lesser arch of the Sea-quadrant.

Aubrey, Lives (Edmund Halley).

spectacle-maker (spek'ta-kl-mā'kér), n. A maker of spectacles; one who makes spectacles, eye-glasses, and similar instruments. The Spectacle-makers' Company of London was incorporated in 1630.

spectacle-ornament (spek'ta-kl-ôr'na-ment), n. A name given to an ornament, often found in sculptured stones in Scotland, consisting of two disks connected by a band: the surface so marked out is often covered with interlaced whorl-ornaments.

spectacular (spek-tak'ū-lār), a. [< L. spectaculum, a sight, show (see spectacle), + -ar.] 1. Pertaining to or of the nature of a show or spectacle; marked or characterized by great display: as, a spectacular drama.

The spectacular sports were concluded.

Hicks, Sermon, Jan. 30, 1681.

2. Pertaining to spectacles or glasses for assisting vision. [Rare.]

spectacularity (spek-tak'ū-lār'i-ti), n. [< spectacular + -ity.] Spectacular character or quality; likeness to or the fact of being a spectacle or show.

It must be owned that when all was done the place had a certain spectacularity; the furniture and ornaments wore somehow the air of properties.

Hovells, Private Theatricals, x.

spectacularly (spek-tak'ū-lār-li), adv. In a spectacular manner or view; as a spectacle.

The last test was, spectacularly, the best of the afternoon.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 360.

spectant (spek'tant), a. [< L. spectant (t-s), ppr. of spectare, look at, behold, freq. of specere, look at, behold: see spectacle, species.] In her.: (a) At gaze. (b) Looking upward with the nose bendwise: noting any animal used as a bearing.

spectate (spek'tāt), v. t. and i. [< L. spectatus, pp. of spectare, see, behold: see spectant.] To look about or upon; gaze; behold. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Coming on the Bridge, a Gentleman sitting on the Coach civilly salutes the Spectating Company; the turning of the Wheels and motion of the Horses are plainly seen as if natural and Alive.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 287.

Mr. De Quincey—Works, VI. 329—has spectate: and who can believe that he went anywhere but to spectate for it?

F. Hall, False Philol., p. 76.

spectation (spek-tā'shqn), n. [< L. spectatio (n-), a beholding, contemplation, < spectare, pp. spectatus, look at, behold: see spectant.] Look; aspect; appearance; regard.

This simple spectation of the lungs is differed from that which concomitates a pleurisy.

Harvey.

spectator (spek-tā'tor), n. [Early mod. E. spectatour; < F. spectateur = Sp. Pg. espectador = It. spettatore, < L. spectator, a beholder, < spectare, pp. spectatus, look at, behold: see spectant.] One who looks on; an onlooker or eyewitness; a beholder; especially, one of a company present at a spectacle of any kind: as, the spectators of or at a game or a drama.

Me leading, in a secret corner lay,

The sad spectator of my Tragedie.

Spenser, F. Q., II. 4. 27.

There be of them that will themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren spectators to laugh too.

Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 46.

We, indeed, appeared to be the only two unconcerned spectators on board; and, accordingly, were allowed to ramble about the decks unnoticed.

B. Hall, Travels in N. A., II. 10.

=Syn. Looker-on, onlooker, observer, witness, by-stander. A person is said to be a spectator at a show, a bullfight, a wrestling-match; one of the audience at a lecture, a concert, the theater; and one of the congregation at church.

spectatorial (spek-tā'tō'ri-āl), a. [< spectator + -ial.] Pertaining to or characteristic of a spectator. [In the quotation it is used with direct reference to the name of the periodical cited.]

There is a vicious terror of being blamed in some well-inclined people, and a wicked pleasure in suppressing them in others; both which I recommend to your spectatorial wisdom to animadvert upon.

Steele, Spectator, No. 348.

spectatorship (spek-tā'tor-ship), n. [< spectator + -ship.] The act of looking or beholding; the state or occupation of being a spectator or looker-on.

Guess . . . If thou standest not 't the state of hanging, or of some death more long in spectatorship.

Shak., Cor., v. 2. 71.

Bathing in the sea was the chief occupation of these good people, including, as it did, prolonged spectatorship of the process.

H. James, Jr., Confidence, xix.

spectatress (spek-tā'tres), n. [< spectator + -ess. Cf. spectatrix.] A female spectator or looker-on.

Helen, in the night when Troy was sack'd, Spectatress of the mischief which she made.

Roué, Fair Penitent, v. 1.

spectatrix (spek-tā'triks), n. [= F. spectatrice = It. spettatrice, fem. of spectator, a beholder: see spectator.] Same as spectatress.

specter, spectre (spek'tēr), n. [< OF. (and F.) spectre = Sp. Pg. espectro = It. spettro, an image, figure, ghost, < L. spectrum, a vision, appearance, apparition, image, < specere, see: see species, spectacle. Cf. spectrum.] 1. A ghostly apparition; a visible incorporeal human spirit; an appearance of the dead as when living. Specters are imagined as disembodied spirits haunting or revisiting the scenes of their mundane life, and showing themselves in intangible form to the living, generally at night, from some overpowering necessity, or for some benevolent (or more usually) malevolent purpose. They are sometimes represented as speaking, but more commonly as only using terrifying or persuasive gestures to induce compliance with their wishes. The word is rarely used for the dissociated soul of a living person.

The ghosts of traitors from the Bridge descend,
With bold fanatic spectres to rejoice.

Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 223.

One of the afflicted,
I know, bore witness to the apparition
Of ghosts unto the spectre of this Bishop, Saying, "You murdered us!"

Longfellow, Giles Corey, III. 2.

A fine traditional spectre pale,
With a turnip head and a ghostly wail,
And a splash of blood on the dickey!

W. S. Gilbert, Haunted.

2. In zool.: (a) One of many names of gressorial orthopterous insects of the family Phasmidae; a walking-stick or stick-insect; a specter-insect. (b) The specter-bat. (c) The specter-lemur. (d) A specter-shrimp.—Specter of the Brocken, an optical phenomenon named from the Brocken, a mountain of the Harz range, where it has been most frequently observed. It consists of the shadow of the observer cast at sunrise or sunset in apparently gigantic size upon the mist or fog about the mountain-summit. The shadow is sometimes inclosed in a prismatic circle called the Brocken bow, and again is bordered with a colored fringe. Howitt states that, if the fog is very dry, one sees not only one's self, but one's neighbor; if very damp, only one's self, surrounded by a rainbow-colored glory. Also Brocken specter. = Syn. 1. Apparition, Phantom, etc. See ghost.

specter-bat (spek'tēr-bat), n. The spectral bat, a South American leaf-nosed bat or vampire, Phyllostoma spectrum, or a similar species.

specter-candle (spek'tēr-kan'dl), n. A straight fossil cephalopod, as a baculite, belemnite, or orthoceratite. These and similar objects have often been superstitiously regarded, in ignorance of their origin and nature. See baculus, salagrama, and thunder-stone.

specter-crab (spek'tēr-krab), n. A glass-crab; one of the larval forms which were called Phyllosomata. See cut under glass-crab.

specter-insect (spek'tēr-in'sekt), n. Same as specter, 2 (a).

specter-lemur (spek'tēr-lēm'r), n. The tarsier, Tarsius spectrum. See cut under tarsier.

specter-shrimp (spek'tēr-shrimp), n. A small lamodipod crustacean of the family Caprellidae, as Caprella tuberculata; a skeleton-shrimp: so called from the singular form and aspect.

spectra, n. Plural of spectrum.

spectral (spek'tral), a. [= F. spectral, < L. spectrum, specter: see specter.] 1. Of or pertaining to a specter; resembling or having the aspect of a specter; ghostlike; ghostly.

Some of the spectral appearances which he had been told of in a winter's evening. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xiii.

To his excited fancy everything assumed a spectral look. The shadows of familiar things about him stalked like ghosts through the haunted chambers of his soul.

Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 3.

Spectral in the river-mist
The ship's white timbers show.
Whittier, The Ship-builders.

2. Pertaining to ocular spectra, or pertaining to the solar, prismatic, or diffraction spectrum; exhibiting the hues of the prismatic spectrum; produced by the aid of the spectrum: as, spectral colors; spectral analysis.

It is important to be able to observe the varying effects of pressure and density upon spectral phenomena.

J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 75.

3. In zool., like or likened to a specter or apparition; suggestive of a ghost in any way: as, the spectral bat; spectral shrimps; spectral insects.—Spectral lemur, the tarsier.—Spectral owl, Syrnium cinereum, or Strix cinerea, the great gray owl of arctic America, remarkable for having more plumage in proportion to the size of the body than any other owl.

spectrality (spek-tral'i-ti), n.; pl. spectralities (-tiz). [< spectral + -ity.] The state of being spectral; a spectral being or object. [Rare.]

What is he doing here in inquisitorial sanbenito, with nothing but ghastly spectralities prowling round him?

Carlyle, Sterling, I. 1. (Davies.)

spectrally (spek'tral-i), adv. In a spectral manner; like a ghost or specter.

spectre, n. See specter.

spectrobolemeter (spek'trō-bō-lom'e-tēr), n. [< NL. spectrum, spectrum, + E. bolometer.]

An instrument consisting of a bolometer in combination with a spectroscopic, used in the study of the distribution of heat in the solar spectrum and in similar investigations. The absorbing surface of the bolometer is an extremely slender strip of platinum, and it is so mounted that this can be moved at will to any desired part of the spectrum, the amount of heat received being measured, as usual, by the deflection of a galvanometer-needle.

spectrograph (spek'trō-grāf), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. γράφω, write.] An apparatus designed to give a representation of the spectrum from any source, particularly one in which photography is employed; a spectroscopic in which a sensitive photographic plate takes the place of the eyepiece of the observing telescope.

spectrographic (spek'trō-graf'ik), a. [< spectrograph + -ic.] Pertaining to a spectrograph or the observations made with it; specifically, relating to the process or results of photography as applied to the study of spectra.

Spectrographic operations are, as Professor Young well says, much more sensitive to atmospheric conditions than are visual observations.

D. Todd, Science, III. 727.

spectrography (spek-trog'ra-fi), n. [< spectrograph + -y.] The art of using the spectrograph.

spectrological (spek'trō-loj'i-kal), a. [< spectrology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to spectrology; performed or determined by spectrology: as, spectrological analysis.

spectrology (spek'trō-lō-jī), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That branch of science which determines the constituent elements and other conditions of bodies by examination of their spectra.

spectrometer (spek-trom'e-tēr), n. [< NL. spectrum, spectrum, + L. metrum, measure.] An instrument used chiefly to measure the angular deviation of light-rays in passing through a prism, and hence to determine the refractive indices of the substance of which the prism is formed. Its essential parts are—(1) a tube B (see figure), having a slit at the further end through which the light is thrown by the mirror M, and a collimating lens at the other end to convert the divergent pencil into a parallel beam; (2) the prism P, which can be turned upon the central axis, its position being centered by two slides moved at right angles to each other by means of the screws E and F; (3) the observing telescope A, the eyepiece of which is provided with cross-wires so that the position of a given line can be accurately fixed; the axis of the telescope can be made horizontal by the screw N. After the position of the prism has been accurately adjusted, usually so as to give the minimum deviation for the given ray, the angle of deviation is measured by the telescope moving with the graduated circle C, while the prism (with the vernier) is stationary. By the tangent screws at O and O' the positions of the two circles can be adjusted more delicately. The instrument can also be used, like the ordinary reflecting goniometer (it is then a spectrometer-goniometer), to measure the angle between the two faces of the prism, which angle, with that of the minimum deviation, is needed to give the data for calculating the required refractive index. (See refraction.) If a diffraction-grating instead of a prism is employed, the telescope A is moved into the position A', making a small angle with the tube B; the instrument may then be used to measure the wave-length of a given light-ray.

spectrometric (spek'trō-met'rik), a. [< spectrometer + -ic.] Pertaining to a spectrometer or the observations made with it.

spectromicroscopical (spek'trō-mīkrō-skop'i-kal), a. [< NL. spectrum + E. microscopical.] Pertaining to spectroscopic observations made in connection with the microscope.

The spectro-microscopical apparatus, especially in the hands of botanists, has become an important instrument in the investigation of the coloring matter of plants.

Behrens, Micros. in Botany (trans.), II. 139.

spectrophone (spek'trō-fōn), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. φωνή, sound.] An adaptation of the principle of the radiophone, devised by Bell to be used in spectrum analysis. It consists of a spectroscopic the eyepiece of which is removed—the sensitive substances being placed in the focal point behind an opaque diaphragm containing a slit, while the ear is in communication with the substances by means of a hearing-tube. See the quotation.

Suppose we smoke the interior of our spectroscopic receiver, and fill the cavity with peroxide of nitrogen gas. We have then a combination that gives us good sounds in all parts of the spectrum (visible and invisible) except the ultra violet. Now pass a rapidly interrupted beam of light through some substances whose absorptive spectrum is to be investigated, and bands of sound and silence are observed in exploring the spectrum, the silent positions corresponding to the absorption bands.

A. G. Bell, in Philosoph. Mag., 6th ser., II. 527, 1881.

spectrophonic (spek'trō-fōn'ik), a. [< spectrophone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the spectrophone, or investigations made by means of it.

spectrophotometer (spek'trō-fō-tōm'e-tēr), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. photometer.] An instrument used to compare the intensities of two spectra (as from the limb and center of the sun), or the intensity of a given color with that of the corresponding color in a standard spectrum. It is based upon the fact that the eye is very sensitive to slight differences of intensity between two similar colors when brought side by side. It consists essentially of a spectroscopic arranged with total reflecting prisms, so that, for example, the spectra to be compared can be brought into immediate juxtaposition, while Nicol prisms in the path of the pencil of rays make it possible to diminish the intensity of the brighter light until the two exactly correspond. The angular position of the analyzing prism gives the means of deducing the required relation in intensity.

spectrophotometric (spek'trō-fō-tō-met'rik), a. [< spectrophotometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the spectrophotometer, to its use, or to observations made with it.

spectrophotometry (spek'trō-fō-tōm'e-tri), n. [< spectrophotometer + -y.] The art of using the spectrophotometer.

spectropolariscope (spek'trō-pō-lar'i-skōp), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. polariscope.] A combination of the spectroscopic and the polariscope, an instrument sometimes used in the analysis of sugar. It is a modification of a form of the saccharimeter.

spectropyrometer (spek'trō-pi-rom'e-tēr), n. [< NL. spectrum + E. pyrometer.] An instrument devised by Crova for measuring high temperatures, based upon the principle that two incandescent bodies of the same radiating power have the same temperature when their spectra are identical in extent. It is essentially a form of spectrophotometer.

spectroscope (spek'trō-skōp), n. [< NL. spectrum + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument used to produce a spectrum of the light (or, more generally, the radiation) from any source by the passage of the rays through a prism or their reflection from a grating, and for the study of the spectrum so formed. In its common form the essential parts of the prismatic spectroscope are—(1) a tube with a slit at the further end (see fig. 1), through which the light enters, and at the other end a collimating lens which brings the rays into a parallel beam (the slit is formed between two parallel edges the distance between which can be varied at will); (2) a prism to refract and disperse the rays, or a series or train of prisms when greater dispersion is desired—a gain, however, which is accompanied by a serious diminution in the intensity of the light; (3) a telescope through which the magnified image of the spectrum thus formed is viewed. A third tube is usually added, containing a scale, which is illuminated by a small gas-flame and reflected from the surface of the prism into the telescope, thus giving the means of fixing the position of the lines observed. A small glass comparison prism is often placed in front of half the slit, and through it, by total reflection, a second beam of light can be introduced, the spectrum of which is seen directly over the other. An instrument which gives a spectrum when the source of the light is in a straight line with the eye—that is, which gives dispersion without deviation—is called a direct-vision spectroscope (see

fig. 2); this may be accomplished by combining two crown-glass prisms, with a third flint-glass prism of an angle of 90° between them (fig. 8). For certain rays—for example, the yellow—there is no divergence while a spectrum is obtained, since the dispersion of the flint-glass prism in one direction is greater than that of the two crown-glass prisms in the opposite direction. Other forms of direct-vision spectroscopes have also been devised. In the grating spectroscope, or diffraction spectroscope, a diffraction-grating (a series of very fine parallel lines ruled on glass or speculum-metal) takes the place of the prism; and the parallel rays falling upon it are reflected, and form a series of diffraction-spectra (see diffraction, grating, 2, and interference, 5), which are called normal spectra (see spectrum, 3), since the dispersion of the rays is proportional to their wave-length. A prism is sometimes used before the telescope to separate parts of the successive spectra which would otherwise overlap. If a Rowland grating (see diffraction) is employed, the arrangements can be much simplified, since the large concave surface of the grating forms an image directly, which may be received upon a screen, or for study upon a photographic plate, or viewed through an eyepiece with cross-wires to fix the position of the lines observed. The grating is supported at one end of a rigid bar, in practice about 21 feet in length, at the other end of which, and at the center of curvature of the concave surface, is the eyepiece or support for the sensitive plate. The ends of this bar rest on carriages moving on two rails at right angles to each other; and, as the end carrying the eyepiece is moved, the whole length of the spectrum (several feet) may be successively observed, the fixed beam of parallel rays from the slit falling upon the grating as its position is slowly turned. The whole apparatus is mounted on rigid supports in a room from which all light but that received through the slit is carefully excluded. A high degree of dispersion is thus obtained, combined with the advantage of the normal spectrum, and the further advantages that the amount of light employed is large, while the disturbing effect of the absorption of the material of the prisms is avoided. See further under spectrum.—Analyzing spectroscope, integrating spectroscope, terms applied to the spectroscope (Young) to describe its use, with or without a lens throwing an image of the luminous object upon the slit. In the former case, different parts of the slit are illuminated by light from different parts of the object, and their spectra can be separately compared, or, in other words, the light is thus analyzed; while in the second case, when the collimator is pointed toward the source of light, the combined effect of the whole is obtained.—Half-prism spectroscope, a spectroscope in which the beam of rays enters the prism at right angles to one face, and suffers dispersion only on emerging from the face opposite and inclined to it. The half-prism ordinarily employed is half of a compound prism such as is used in the direct-vision spectroscope.—Rainband-spectroscope. See rainband.

spectroscope (spek'trō-skōp), v. i. and t.; pret. and pp. spectroscoping, ppr. spectroscoping. [spectroscope, n.] To use the spectroscope; study by means of observations with the spectroscope. C. Piazza Smyth, Trans. R. S. E., XXXII. 521. [Rare.]

spectroscopic (spek-trō-skōp'ik), a. [spectroscopic + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or performed by means of the spectroscope or spectroscopy; as, spectroscopic analysis; spectroscopic investigations.

spectroscopical (spek-trō-skōp'i-kal), a. [spectroscopic + -al.] Same as spectroscopic.

spectroscopically (spek-trō-skōp'i-kal-i), adv. In a spectroscopic manner; by the use of the spectroscope.

spectroscopist (spek'trō-skō-pist), n. [spectroscopic + -ist.] One who uses the spectroscope; one skilled in spectroscopy.

spectroscopy (spek'trō-skō-pi), n. [As spectroscopic + -y.] That branch of science, more particularly of chemical and physical science, which is concerned with the use of the spectroscope and with spectrum analysis.

spectrum (spek'trum), n.; pl. spectra (-trā). [< NL. spectrum, a spectrum, < L. spectrum, an appearance, an image or apparition: see specter.] 1. A specter; a ghostly phantom.—2. An image of something seen, continuing after the eyes are closed, covered, or turned away. If, for example, one looks intently with one eye upon any colored object, such as a wafer placed on a sheet of white paper, and immediately afterward turns the same eye to another part of the paper, one sees a similar spot, but of a different color. Thus, if the wafer is red, the seeming spot will be green; if black, it will be changed into white. These images are also termed ocular spectra.

3. In physics, the continuous band of light (visible spectrum) showing the successive prismatic colors, or the isolated lines or bands of color, observed when the radiation from such a source as the sun, or an ignited vapor in a gas-flame, is viewed after having been passed through a prism (prismatic spectrum) or reflected from a diffraction-grating (diffraction- or interference-spectrum). The action of the prism (see prism and refraction) is to refract the light and at the same time to separate or disperse the rays of different wave-lengths, the refraction and dispersion being greater as the wave-length diminishes. The grating (see grating, 2), which consists usually of a series of fine parallel lines (say 10,000 or 20,000 to the inch) ruled on speculum-metal, diffracts and at the same time disperses the light-rays, forming a series of spectra whose lengths depend upon the fineness of the lines. If, now, a beam of white light is passed through a slit, and then by a collimator lens is thrown upon a prism, and the light from this received upon a screen, a colored band will be obtained passing by insensible degrees, from the less refrangible end, the red, to the more refrangible end, the violet, through a series of colors ordinarily described as red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, and violet. A similar effect is obtained from a grating, with, however, this difference, that in the prismatic spectrum the red covers only a small part relatively of the colored band, since the action of the prism is to crowd together the less refrangible rays and separate the more refrangible rays of less wave-length, and thus distort the spectrum. The diffraction-spectrum, on the other hand, shows the red occupying about the same space as the blue and violet, and is called a normal spectrum. When the light from different sources is studied in the spectroscope, it is found, first, that a solid or a liquid when incandescent gives a continuous spectrum, and this is true of gases also at great pressures; second, bodies in the gaseous form give discontinuous spectra, consisting of colored bright lines (line-spectrum) or bands (band-spectrum), or of bands which under certain conditions appear as channeled spaces or flutings (fluted spectrum), and these lines or bands for a given substance have a definite position, and are hence characteristic of it; third, if light from an incandescent solid or liquid body passes through a gas (at a lower temperature than the incandescent body), the gas absorbs the same rays as those its own spectrum consists of; therefore, in this case, the result is a spectrum (absorption-spectrum) continuous, except as interrupted by black lines occupying the same position as the bright lines in the spectrum of the gas itself would occupy. An absorption-spectrum, showing more or less sharply defined dark bands, is also obtained when the light has passed through an appropriate liquid (as blood), or a solid such as a salt of didymium (see further under absorption). For example, the spectrum from a candle-flame is continuous, being due to the incandescent carbon particles suspended in the flame. If, however, the yellow flame produced when a little sodium is inserted in the non-luminous flame of a Bunsen burner is examined, a bright-yellow line is observed; if a red lithium flame, then a red and a yellow line are seen; the red strontium flame gives a more complex spectrum, consisting of a number of lines, chiefly in the red and yellow; and so of other similar substances. For substances like iron, and other metals not volatile except at very high temperatures, the heat of the voltaic arc is employed, and by this means their spectra, often consisting of a hundred or more lines (of iron at least 2,000), can be mapped out. Still again, if the light from the sun is studied in the same way, it is found to be a bright spectrum from red to violet, but crossed by a large number of dark lines called Fraunhofer lines, because, though earlier seen by Wollaston (1802), they were first mapped by Fraunhofer in 1814; this name is given especially to the more prominent of them, which he designated by the letters A to H, etc. (See the figures.) These lines, as explained above, are due to the absorption by gases, either in the sun's atmosphere or in that of the earth. When the light is passed through a train of prisms, or reflected from a Rowland grating, and thus a very high degree of dispersion obtained, the rays are more widely separated and the spectrum can be more minutely examined. Studied in this way, it is found that the dark lines in the solar spectrum number many thousands, the greater part of which can be identified in the spectra of known terrestrial substances. Thus, the presence in the sun's atmosphere of thirty-six elements has been established (Rowland, 1891); these include sodium, potassium, calcium, magnesium, iron, copper, cobalt, silver, lead, tin, zinc, titanium, aluminum, chromium, silicon, carbon, hydrogen, etc. The radiation from the sun consists not only of those rays whose wave-length is such as to produce the effect of vision upon the eye, but also of others of greater wave-length than the red rays and less wave-length than the violet; the spectrum from such a source consequently includes, besides the luminous part, an invisible part (invisible spectrum) below the red, called the infra-red region, and another beyond the violet, called the ultra- violet. The first region is also present in the spectrum from any hot body, and the latter in that from a body at a high temperature—for example the incandescent carbons of an arc electric light. Thus, Langley by means of his bolometer has proved the existence of rays having a wave-length nearly twenty times that of the luminous red rays, in the radiation of the surface of the moon, and corresponding to a temperature not far from that of melting ice. Further, while the visible spectrum includes rays separated by only about one octave (since the wave-length for the extreme red is approximately twice that of the extreme violet), the full spectrum, from the extreme ultra-violet to the longest waves recognized by the bolometer, embraces more than seven octaves. In other words, it extends from rays having a wave-length of 0.18 of a micron to those whose wave-length is 30 microns (1 micron = 1000 millimeter). The invisible regions of the spectrum cannot be directly studied by the eye, but they can be explored, first by photography, it being possible to prepare suitable plates sensitive to the infra-red as well as others sensitive to ultra-violet rays, and such photographs show the presence of many additional absorption-lines. The invisible infra-red region (heat-spectrum) can also be explored by the thermopile and still better the bolometer, and the distribution of the heat thus examined, and a thermogram of the spectrum constructed in which the presence of "cold" absorption-bands is noted. Still again, the method of phosphorescence is employed to give a phosphorograph of the spectrum, while fluorescence is made use of in studying the ultra-violet region. In studying the invisible heat-spectrum lenses and prisms of rock-salt must be used, because the dark rays of long wave-length are largely absorbed by glass; further, in investigating the invisible ultra-violet region quartz is similarly employed, since it is highly transparent to these short wave-length vibrations. In many investigations it is of great advantage to use the grating-spectroscopic, especially one provided with a concave Rowland grating, since then the normal spectrum (fig. II.) is obtained directly without the use of the usual lenses and prisms, and hence free from their absorbing effects. Recent photographs of the solar spectrum obtained by Prof. Rowland in this way give a clearness of definition combined with high dispersion never before approached. Thus, in their enlarged form as published (1890), the double sodium-lines are widely separated, and sixteen distinct fine lines may be counted between them. It was formerly the custom to divide the solar spectrum into three parts, formed by the invisible heat-rays, the luminous rays, and the so-called chemical or actinic rays. This threefold division of the spectrum is, however, largely erroneous, since all the rays of the spectrum are "heat-rays" if they are received upon an absorbing surface, as lampblack; and, while it is true that the chemical change upon which ordinary photography depends is most stimulated by the violet and ultra-violet rays, this is not true universally of all chemical changes produced by direct radiation. The rays from the lowest end of the spectrum to the highest differ intrinsically in wave-length only, and the difference of effect observed is due to the character of the surface upon which they fall. The spectra of the stars, of the comets, nebulae, etc., can be studied in the same way as the solar spectrum, and the result has been to throw much light upon the constitution of these bodies; the spectrum of the aurora has been similarly examined. In addition to its use in the study of cosmical physics, spectrum analysis has proved a most delicate and invaluable method to the chemist and physicist in the examination of the different elements and their compounds. By this method of research a number of new elements have been detected (as rubidium, cesium, indium, thallium); and recently the study of the absorption-spectra of the earths—obtained from samarskite, gadolinite, and other related minerals—has served to show the existence of a group of closely related elements whose existence had not before been suspected. Further, the study of the change in the spectra of certain elements under different conditions of temperature has led Lockyer to some most important and suggestive hypotheses as to the relation between them and their possible compound nature.

Fixed Lines and Colored Spaces of Prismatic Spectrum (I.) and Normal Spectrum (II.).

1, red; 2, red-orange; 3, orange; 4, orange-yellow; 5, yellow; 6, green-yellow and yellow-green; 7, green and (7½) blue-green; 8, cyan-blue; 9, blue and (9½) blue-violet; 10, violet; A, A, B, C, etc., Fraunhofer lines.

4. [cap.] [NL.] In zool., a generic name variously used: (a) A genus of lepidopterous insects. Scopoli, 1777. (b) A genus of gressorial orthopterous insects: same as Phasma. Stoll, 1787. (c) A genus of lemuroid mammals: same as Tarsius. Lacépède, 1803.—5. The specific name of some animals, including Tarsius spectrum and Phyllostoma spectrum.—Fluted spectrum. See Herschelian.—Secondary spectrum, the residual or secondary chromatic aberration observed in the use of an ordinary so-called achromatic lens (see achromatic), arising from the fact that while by combining the crown- and flint-glass two of the colors of the spectrum are brought to the same focus, the dispersion of the others is not equally compensated. By using new kinds of glass which allow of proportional dispersion in different parts of the spectrum (see apochromatic), Abbe has made lenses which collect three colors to one focus, leaving only a small residual aberration uncorrected, which is called the tertiary spectrum.

speculable (spek'ü-lä-bl), a. Knowable.

specular (spek'ü-lär), a. [= F. spéculaire = Pr. specular = Sp. Pg. espectral = It. speculare, < L. specularis, belonging to a mirror, < speculum, a mirror: see speculum.] 1. Of or pertaining to a mirror; capable of reflecting objects: as, a specular surface; a specular mineral; specular metal (an alloy prepared for making mirrors).—2. Assisting or facilitating vision; serving for inspection or observation; affording a view: as, a specular orb (the eye or a lens); specular stone (an old name for mica used in windows, in Latin specularis lapis); a specular tower (one serving as a lookout). [Archaic.]

You teach (though we learn not) a thing unknown
To our late times, the use of specular stone,
Through which all things within without were shown.
Donne, To the Countess of Bedford.

Look once more, ere we leave this specular mount.
Milton, P. R., iv. 236.

Calm as the Universe, from specular towers
Of heaven contemplated by Spirits pure.
Wordsworth, Cave of Staffa.

3. In ornith., of or pertaining to the speculum of the wing; ocellar: as, the specular area; specular iridescence.—Specular iron ore, a variety of hematite, or anhydrous iron sesquioxide, occurring in crystals and massive forms with a brilliant metallic luster. Finely pulverized and washed, it is used as a polishing-powder.

Specularia (spek'ū-lā'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Heister, 1748), < L. speculum in speculum Veneris, 'Venus's looking-glass,' a medieval name of S. Speculum, from the resemblance of its flowers set on their cylindrical ovary to the ancient round bronze mirror at the end of a straight handle: see speculum.] A genus of gamopetalous plants of the order Campanulaceae. It is distinguished from the allied genus Campanula by its wheel-shaped or shallow and broadly bell-shaped corolla and linear or narrowly oblong ovary. There are about 8 species, natives of the northern hemisphere, chiefly of southern and central Europe, with one in South America. They are annual herbs, either erect or decumbent, and smooth or bristly. They bear alternate entire or toothed leaves, and blue, violet, or white two-bracted flowers nearly or quite sessile in the axils. S. Speculum is the Venus's looking-glass, formerly a favorite in English gardens; S. hybrida is there known as the corn-violet; and S. perfoliata, native in the United States, is remarkable for its dimorphic flowers, the earlier being minute and clistogamic.

speculate (spek'ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. speculated, ppr. speculating. [< L. specularis, pp. of speculari, spy out, watch, observe, behold (> It. speculare = Sp. Pg. especular = OF. speculer, F. spéculer), < specula, a watch-tower, < specere, see: see species. Cf. speculum.] I. trans. 1†. To view as from a watch-tower or observatory; observe.

I shall never eat garlic with Diogenes in a tub, and speculate the stars without a shirt.

Shirley, Grateful Servant, li. 1.

2. To take a discriminating view of; consider attentively; speculate upon; examine; inspect: as, to speculate the nature of a thing. [Rare.]

We . . . conceit ourselves that we contemplate absolute existence when we only speculate absolute privation.
Sir W. Hamilton, Discussions, p. 21.

II. intrans. 1. To pursue truth by thinking, as by mathematical reasoning, by logical analysis, or by the review of data already collected. —2. To take a discursive view of a subject or subjects; note diverse aspects, relations, or probabilities; meditate; conjecture: often implying absence of definite method or result.

I certainly take my full share, along with the rest of the world, . . . in speculating on what has been done, or is doing, on the public stage.
Burke, Rev. in France.

3. To invest money for profit upon an uncertainty; take the risk of loss in view of possible gain; make a purchase or purchases, as of something liable to sudden fluctuations in price or to rapid deterioration, on the chance of selling at a large advance: as, to speculate in stocks. speculation (spek'ū-lā'shon), n. [< OF. speculation, speculation, F. spéculation = Pr. speculacio = Sp. especulación = Pg. especulação = It. speculazione, < LL. speculatio(n-), a spying out, exploration, observation, contemplation, < L. speculari, view: see speculate.] 1. The act or state of speculating, or of seeing or looking; intelligent contemplation or observation; a viewing; inspection. [Obsolete or archaic, but formerly used with considerable latitude.]

Thence [from the works of God] gathering plumes of perfect speculation,
To imp the wings of thy high flying mynd,
Mount up aloft through heavenly contemplation.

Spenser, Heavenly Beauty, l. 134.

Thou hast no speculation in those eyes
Which thou dost glare with.

Shak., Macbeth, iii. 4. 95.

I am arrived to that perfection in speculation that I understand the language of the eyes.

Steele, Spectator, No. 354.

2. The pursuit of truth by means of thinking, especially mathematical reasoning and logical analysis; meditation; deep and thorough consideration of a theoretical question. This use of the word, though closely similar to the application of speculation in the Latin of Boethius to translate θεωρία, is chiefly due to 1 Cor. xiii. 12, "now we see through a glass, darkly," where 'glass' is in the Vulgate speculum. But some writers, as Milton and Cowper, associate the meaning with specula, 'a watch-tower.'

For practise must agree with speculation, Belief & knowledge must guide operation.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 147.

Thenceforth to speculations high or deep
I turn'd my thoughts. Milton, P. L., ix. 602.

Join sense unto reason, and experiment unto speculation.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., li. 5.

From him [Pythagoras] Socrates derived the principles of virtue and morality, . . . and most of his natural speculations. Sir W. Temple, Ancient and Modern Learning.

The brilliant fabric of speculation erected by Darwin can scarcely sustain its own weight.

Dawson, Nature and the Bible, p. 240.

3. In philos., sometimes, a purely a priori method of philosophizing: but commonly in philosophy the word has the meaning 2, above.

—4. The investing of money at a risk of loss on the chance of unusual gain; specifically, buying and selling, not in the ordinary course of commerce for the continuous marketing of commodities, but to hold in the expectation of selling at a profit upon a change in values or market rates. Thus, if a merchant lays in for his regular trade a much larger stock than he otherwise would because he anticipates a rise in prices, this is not termed speculation; but if he buys what he does not usually deal in, not for the purpose of extending his business, but for the chance of a sale of the particular articles at a profit by reason of anticipated rise, it is so termed. In the language of the exchanges, speculation includes all dealing in futures and options, whether purchases or sales.

The establishment of any new manufacture, of any new branch of commerce, or of any new practice in agriculture, is always a speculation from which the projector promises himself extraordinary profits.

Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. x. 1.

A vast speculation had fail'd,
And ever he mutter'd and madden'd.
Tennyson, Maud, i. 3.

5. A game at cards, the leading principle of which is the purchase of an unknown card on the calculation of its probable value, or of a known card on the chance of no better appearing during the game, a part of the pack not being dealt. Latham. = Syn. 2. Hypothesis, etc. See theory.

speculatist (spek'ū-lā-tist), n. [< speculate + -ist.] A speculative philosopher; a person who, absorbed with theoretical questions, pays little attention to practical conditions.

Such speculatists, by expecting too much from friendship, dissolve the connection. Goldsmith, Friendship.

Fresh confidence the speculatist takes
For every hare-brain'd proselyte he makes.
Cowper, Progress of Error.

speculative (spek'ū-lā-tiv), a. [= F. spéculatif = Sp. Pg. especulativo = It. speculativo, < LL. speculativus, pertaining to or of the nature of observation, < L. speculari, view: see speculate.] 1†. Pertaining to or affording vision or outlook: a meaning influenced by Latin specula, 'a watch-tower.'

Now roves the eye;
And, posted on this speculative height,
Exults in its command. Cowper, Task, l. 289.

2†. Looking; observing; inspecting; prying.

My speculative and officed instrument.

Shak., Othello, i. 3. 271.

To be speculative into another man, to the end to know how to work him or wind him or govern him, proceedeth from a heart that is double and cloven.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i.

3. Given to speculation; contemplative; theoretical.

He [Washington] was not a speculative, but a practical man; not at all devoted to Ideas.
Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, Washington, p. 114.

Speculative men are deemed unsound and frivolous.
Emerson, Misc., p. 12.

4. Purely scientific; having knowledge as its end; theoretical: opposed to practical; also (limiting a noun denoting a person and signifying his opinions or character), in theory, and not, or not merely, in practice; also, cognitive; intellectual. In this sense (which has no connection with speculation), speculative translates Aristotle's θεωρητικός. Thus, speculative science is science pursued for its own sake, without immediate reference to the needs of life, and does not exclude experimental science.

I do not think there are so many speculative atheists as men are wont to imagine.

Boyle, Christian Virtuoso, part i.

It is evidently the intention of our Maker that man should be an active and not merely a speculative being.

Reid, Active Powers, Int.

When astronomy took the form of a speculative science, words were invented to denote distinctly the conceptions thus introduced.

Whewell, Philos. of Inductive Sciences, I. liii.

A distinction merely speculative has no concern with the most momentous of all practical controversies.

J. R. Seeley, Nat. Religion, p. 51.

5. Inferential; known by reasoning, and not by direct experience: opposed to intuitive; also, improperly, purely a priori. This meaning was introduced into Latin by Anselm, with reference to 1 Cor. xiii. 12, where the Vulgate has speculum. Speculative cognition is cognition not intuitive.

6. Pertaining or given to speculation in trade; engaged in speculation, or precarious ventures for the chance of large profits; of the nature of financial speculation: as, a speculative trader; speculative investments or businesses.

The speculative merchant exercises no one regular, established, or well-known branch of business.

Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, I. x. 1.

Speculative geometry, philosophy, reason, theology, etc. See the nouns.

speculatively (spek'ū-lā-tiv-li), adv. In a speculative manner; as or by means of speculation, in either the intellectual or the material sense.

speculativeness (spek'ū-lā-tiv-nes), n. The state of being speculative, or of consisting in speculation.

speculativism (spek'ū-lā-tiv-izm), n. [< speculative + -ism.] The tendency to speculation or theory, as opposed to experiment or practice; a theorizing tendency. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 269. [Recent.] speculator (spek'ū-lā-tor), n. [= F. spéculateur = Sp. Pg. especulador = It. speculatore, < L. speculator, an explorer or scout, a searcher, an investigator, < speculari, pp. speculatus, spy out, watch, observe, view: see speculate.] 1†. An observer or onlooker; a watcher; a lookout; a seer; in a specific use, an occult seer; one who looks into mysteries or secrets by magical means.

All the boats had one speculator, to give notice when the fish approached.

Broome.

2. One who engages in mental speculation; a person who speculates about a subject or subjects; a theorizer.

The number of experiments in moral science which the speculator has an opportunity of witnessing has been increased beyond all calculation.

Macaulay, History.

3. One who practises speculation in trade or business of any kind. See speculation, 4.

speculatorial (spek'ū-lā-tō'ri-āl), a. [< L. speculatorius, pertaining to a scout or observer (see speculatory), + -al.] Speculatorial.

speculatury (spek'ū-lā-tō'ri), a. [< L. speculaturus, pertaining to a scout or observer, < speculator, an observer: see speculator.] 1†. Practising or intended for oversight or outlook; overseeing; overlooking; viewing.

My privileges are an ubiquitary, circumambulatory, speculatury, interrogatory, redargutory immunity over all the privy lodgings.

Carew, Colum Britannicum.

Both these [Roman encampments] were nothing more than speculatury outposts to the Akeman-street.

T. Warton, Hist. Kiddington, p. 66.

2. Given to, or of the nature or character of, speculation; speculative. [Rare.]

speculatrix (spek'ū-lā-triks), n.; pl. speculatrices (spek'ū-lā-tri'sēz). [L., fem. of speculator: see speculator.] A female speculator. [Rare.]

A communion with invisible spirits entered into the general creed [in the sixteenth century] throughout Europe, and crystal or beryl was the magical medium. . . . Persons even of ordinary rank in life pretended to be what they termed speculators, and sometimes women were speculatrices.

I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 297.

speculum (spek'ū-lum), n.; pl. specula (-lā), sometimes speculums (-lumz). [< L. speculum, a mirror, a copy or imitation (cf. specula, a watch-tower, lookout), < specere, look at, behold: see species.] 1. Something to look into or from; specifically, a mirror or looking-glass. —2. An attachment to or part of an optical instrument, as a reflecting telescope, having a brightly polished surface for the reflection of objects. Specula are generally made of an alloy called speculum-metal, consisting of ten parts of copper to one of tin, sometimes with a little arsenic to increase its whiteness. Another speculum alloy is made of equal weights of steel and platinum. Specula are also made of glass covered with a film of silver on the side turned toward the object.

3. In ornith.: (a) An ocellus or eye-spot, as of a peacock's tail. See ocellus, 4. (b) The mirror of a wing, a specially colored area on some of the flight-feathers. It is usually iridescent-green, purple, violet, etc., and formed by a space of such color on the outer webs of several secondaries toward their end, and commonly set in a frame of different colors formed by the tips of the same secondaries or of the greater wing-coverts, or of both. Sometimes it is dead-white, as in the gadwall. A speculum occurs in various birds, and as a rule in ducks, especially the Anatimæ, being in these so constant and characteristic a marking that some breeds of game fowls are named duckwing in consequence of a certain resemblance in the wing-markings. See duckwing. Also called mirror. See cuts under Chauleasmus and mallard.

The wing [in Anatine] has usually a brilliant Speculum, which, like the other wing-markings, is the same in both sexes. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 600.

*spell*² (spel), v.; pret. and pp. spelled or spelt, ppr. spelling. [Late ME. spellen; a particular use of *spell*¹, tell, appar. due to D. use: MD. spellen, declare, explain, explain in detail or point by point, spell, D. spellen, spell; cf. OF. espeller, espeler, declare, spell, F. épeler, spell, = Pr. espelar, espelhar, declare (< G. or D.): see *spell*¹. The word is in part confused, as the var. speal also indicates, with *spell*⁴, *speld*¹, spelder, a splinter, because a splinter of wood was used as a pointer to assist in spelling words: see *spell*⁴, and cf. spelder, v., spell.] I. trans. 1. To tell or set forth letter by letter; set down letter by letter; tell the letters of; form by or in letters.

Spellyn (letters). Sillabico. Prompt. Parv., p. 468.

A few commonplace and ill-spelled letters, a few wise or witty words, are all the direct record she has left of herself.
The Century, XL. 649.

2. To read letter by letter, or with laborious effort; hence, to discover by careful study; make out point by point: often with out or over.

I will sit on this footstool at thy feet, that I may spell over thy splendour, and learn for the first time how princes are attired.
Scott, Kenilworth, vii.

He was a perfect specimen of the Trullibers of old; he smoked, hunted, drank beer at his door with his grooms and dogs, and spelled over the county paper on Sundays.
Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, vii.

3. To constitute, as letters constitute a word; make up.

The Saxon heptarchy, when seven kings put together did spell but one in effect.
Fuller.

To spell backward, to repeat or arrange the letters of in reverse order; begin with the last letter of; hence, to understand or explain in an exactly contrary sense; turn inside out; reverse the character or intention of.

I never yet saw man,
How wise, how noble, young, how rarely featured,
But she would spell him backward.
Shak., Much Ado, iii. 1. 61.

To spell baker, to do something difficult: supposed to refer to baker as one of the first words met by children in passing from the "easy" monosyllables to the "hard" dissyllables in the old spelling-books. [Old and colloq., U. S.]

If an old man will marry a young wife,
Why then—why then—why then—he must spell Baker.
Longfellow, Giles Corey, ii. 1.

II. intrans. 1. To form words with the proper letters, in either reading or writing; repeat or set down the letters of words.

O, she knew well
Thy love did read by rote and could not spell.
Shak., R. and J., ii. 3. 88.

2. To make a study; engage in careful contemplation of something. [Poetical and rare.]

Where I may sit and rightly spell
Of every . . . doth shew,
And eve

*spell*³ (spel), v. t. [Late ME. spellen, spellien, spealie, spilten, < AS. spellian (pret. spellede, pp. spelled), rarely spilian, play, jest, = OS. spilōn, play, dance, = D. spelen = MLG. MHG. spil, G. spiel, play, game; root unknown.] To take the place of (another person) temporarily in doing something; take turns with; relieve for a time; give a rest to.

Sometimes there are two ostensible boilers [slaves in charge of sugar-boiling] to spell and relieve one another.

When one is obliged to be spelled for the purpose of natural rest, he should leave his injunctions to a judicious negro. T. Roughley, Jamaica Planters' Guide (1823), p. 340.

Mrs. Savor kept her seat beside Annie. She said, "Don't you want I should spell you a little while, Miss Kilburn?" Houcelis, Annie Kilburn, xvi.

spell³ (spel), n. [*< spell*³, v.] 1. A turn of work or duty in place of another; an interval of relief by another person; an exchange of work and rest: as, to take one's regular spell; to work the pumps by spells.

Their toil is so extreme as they can not endure it above four hours in a day, but are succeeded by spels.

Carew, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 11.

A poor old negro, whose woolly head was turned to gray, though scarcely able to move, begged to be taken in, and offered to give me a spell when I became tired.

B. Hall, Travels in N. A., I. 188.

Hence—2. A continuous course of employment in work or duty; a turn of occupation between periods of rest; a bout.

We read that a working day (in Holland) of thirteen or fourteen hours is usual; a spell of eighteen or more hours is not uncommon. The Academy, July 27, 1889, p. 54.

3. An interval of rest or relaxation; a turn or period of relief from work; a resting-time.

A halt was made for the purpose of giving the horses a spell and having a pot of tea.

A. C. Grant, Bush Life in Queensland, I. 42.

In the warm noon spell

'Twas good to hear him tell

Of the great September blow.

R. W. Gülder, Building of the Chimney.

4. Any interval of time within definite limits; an unbroken term or period.

Nothing new has happened in this quarter since my last, except the setting in of a severe spell of cold weather and a considerable fall of snow.

Washington, To J. Reed, Dec. 25, 1775.

After a grievous spell of eighteen months on board the French galleys. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xix.

5. A short period, indefinitely; an odd or occasional interval; an uncertain term; a while. [Colloq.]

No, I ain't got a girl now. I had one a spell, but I'd rather do my own work.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 145.

Why don't ye come and rest a spell with me, and to-morrow ye kin go on ef ye like? Harper's Mag., LXXX. 349.

6. A bad turn; an uncomfortable time; a period of personal ailment or ill feeling. [Colloq., U. S.]

Wal, arter all, we sot out, and Hepsy, she got clear beat out; and when Hepsy does get beat out she has spells, and she goes on awful, and they last day arter day.

H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 171.

spell⁴ (spel), n. [Also spill, speal, formerly spell; partly a var. of speld (see speld), partly < D. spil, the pin of a bobbin, spindle, axis (see spindle). Cf. *spall*¹, *spale*¹.] 1. A chip, splinter, or splint. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Cf. E. spell or spill, originally a chip of wood for lighting a candle.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), Gloss., p. 305.

2. In the game of nur-and-spell, the steel spring by which the nur is thrown into the air.—3. One of the transverse pieces at the bottom of a chair which strengthen and keep together the legs. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

spellable (spel'ə-bl), a. [*< spell*² + -able.] Capable of being spelled, or represented in letters: as, some birds utter spellable notes. Carlyle, Misc., IV. 69. (Davies.) [Rare.] spellbind (spel'bind), v. t. [*< A. back-formation, after spellbound; < spell*¹ + bind.] To bind by or as if by a spell; hold under mental control or restraint; fascinate. [Recent.]

Now the poor French word . . . "Qu'en dira-t-on?" spellbinds us all. Carlyle, Essays (J. P. F. Richter again).

The other, in his speech about the banner,

Spell-bound his audience until they swore

That such a speech was spell, or heard till then.

Halleck, Fanny.

spell-bone (spel'bōn), n. [*< spell*⁴ + *bone*¹.] The small bone of the leg; the fibula. See phrases under peroneal. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.] spellbound (spel'bound), a. Bound by or as if by a spell; entranced; rapt; fascinated.

Falsenes come never to gode endyng.

MS. Cantab. Fl. II. 38, f. 125. (Hallivell.)

spelling² (spel'ing), n. [< late ME. spellingge (= MD. spellunge, D. spelling); verbal n. of *spell*², v. Cf. D. spelkunst (kunst, art), spelling; buchstabieren, spell, as a noun, spelling (< buch-stabe, a letter: see under book); Sw. stafning = Dan. starning, spelling (see staff, stave); and cf. orthography.] 1. The act of one who spells; the manner of forming words with letters; or thography.

Spellynge, syllabicator. Prompt. Parv., p. 408.

Our common spelling is often an untrustworthy guide to etymology.

J. Hadley, Essays, p. 356.

To prepare the way for such a change [a reform in spelling] the first step is to break down, by the combined influence of enlightened scholars and of practical educators, the immense and stubborn prejudice which regards the established modes of spelling almost as constituting the language, as having a sacred character, as in themselves preferable to others. All agitation and all definite proposals of reform are to be welcomed so far as they work in this direction.

Proc. Amer. Philol. Assoc., VII. 35.

It may be observed that it is mainly among the class of half-taught dabblers in philology that etymological spelling has found its supporters. All true philologists and philological bodies have uniformly denounced it as a monstrous absurdity, both from a practical and a scientific point of view.

H. Sweet, Handbook of Phonetics, p. 201.

2. A collocation of letters representing a word; a written word as spelled in a particular way.

Our present spelling is in many particulars a far from trustworthy guide in etymology, and often, indeed, entirely falsifies history. Such spellings as island, author, delight, sovereign, require only to be mentioned, and there are hundreds of others involving equally gross blunders, many of which have actually corrupted the spoken language.

H. Sweet, Handbook of Phonetics, p. 200.

Phonetic spelling. See phonetic.—Spelling reform. the improvement by regulation and simplification of the conventional orthography of a language, specifically of the English language; the proposed simplification of English orthography. The spelling of all languages having a recorded history tends to lag behind the changes of pronunciation, and in time a reform becomes necessary. In English, since the gradual fixation of the spelling after the invention of printing, the separation of spelling and pronunciation has become very wide, and numerous proposals for spelling reform have been made. The present organized effort for spelling reform has arisen out of the spread of phonography, which is based on phonetic spelling, and from the more recent spread of the study of comparative philology, which is also based on phonetics. Proposals for a gradual reform in spelling have been put forth jointly by the American Philological Association and the Philological Society of England, and are advocated by the Spelling Reform Association. Amended spellings have been accepted to some extent by various periodicals, and are admitted, less freely, into recent books. Movements for spelling reform exist also in France, Germany, Denmark, and other countries. A spelling reform has been accomplished in Dutch, Spanish, and other tongues, and to some extent, by government action, in Germany.

spelling-bee (spel'ing-bé), n. Same as spelling-match.

spelling-book (spel'ing-būk), n. A book from which children are taught to spell.

spelling-match (spel'ing-mach), n. A contest for superiority in spelling between two or more persons or parties. A formal spelling-match is usually between sides or sets of persons chosen by two leaders. Any person who misspells one of the words given out retires, and the victory belongs to the side that has the larger number left at the close. Also called spelling-bee. [U. S.] spellkent (spel'ken), n. [Also speelken; < D. spel, play (see spell), + E. ken, a resort.] A playhouse; a theater. [Low slang.]

Who in a row like Tom could lead the van,

Booze in the ken, or at the spellken hustle?

Byron, Don Juan, xl. 19.

spell-stopped (spel'stopt), a. Stopped by a spell or spells; spellbound. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 61.

spell-work (spel'wèrk), n. That which is worked by spells or charms; power of magic; enchantment. Moore, Lalla Rookh.

spelonkt, n. Same as spelunc.

tre, spelt; < LL. spelta, spelt.] A kind of wheat commonly known as Triticum Spelta, but believed to be a race of the common wheat, Triticum sativum (T. vulgare). Spelt is marked by the fragile rachis of the spike, which easily breaks up at the joints, and by the grains being adherent to the chaff. It was cultivated by the Swiss lake-dwellers, by the ancient Egyptians, and throughout the Roman empire, and is still grown in the colder mountainous regions of Europe and elsewhere. It makes a very fine flour, used especially for pastry-making, but the grain requires special machinery for grinding.

spelt² (spelt), n. [< ME. spelt; a var. of speld.] A splinter, splint, or strip; a spell or spill.

The spekes was splentide alle with speltis of silver;

The space of a spere lenghe springande fulle faire.

Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3265.

spelt² (spelt), v. t. [A var. of speld, *spald*¹, perhaps confused with ME. spelken, spilt; see *spald*¹, speld, spelk. Cf. *spelt*², n.] To split; break.

Feed geese with oats, spelted beans.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

spelt³ (spelt). A preterit and past participle of *spelt*².

spelter (spel'tér), n. [Not found in ME., and prob. of LG. origin: LG. spialter, pewter, = MD. speauter, D. spiauter = G. Sw. Dan. spiauter, zinc, bell-metal; cf. Spencerian (spen-sé'-ri-an), a. [< Spencer (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining or relating to the English philosopher Herbert Spencer (born 1820), or characteristic of his philosophical system. See Spencerianism.

Spencerianism (spen-sé'-ri-an-izm), n. The philosophy of Herbert Spencer, called by him the synthetic philosophy. Like almost all the ancient and a considerable part of the modern philosophical systems, it is a philosophy of evolution; but it differs from most of these in reducing evolution to the rank of a mere secondary principle, and in making the immutable law of mechanics the sole fundamental one. Spencer has formally stated his philosophy in sixteen propositions, which concern the relations of evolution and dissolution. These are of a special and detailed character, so that he does not countenance the claim made for him of the principle of evolution itself. His sixteenth proposition states that under the sensible appearances which the universe presents to us, and "transcending human knowledge, is an unknown and unknowable power."

spending-money (spen'ding-mun'i), n. Money provided or used for small personal expenses; pocket-money for incidental outlay.

spending-silver (spen'ding-sil'vèr), n. [< ME. spending-silver; < spending + silver.] Money for expenses; spending-money; cash.

And spending silver hadde he ryght ynow.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, I. 7.

For of thy spendynge silver, monk,
Thereof wyll I ryght none.
Lyttell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 87).

spendthrift (spend'thrift), n. and a. [*< spend*¹, v., + obj. thrift.] I. n. One who spends lavishly, improvidently, or foolishly; an unthrifty spender; a prodigal.

What pleasure can the miser's fondled hoard,
Or spendthrift's prodigal excess, afford?
Couper, In Memory of John Thornton.

II. a. Wastefully spending or spent; lavish; improvident; wasteful; prodigal: as, a spendthrift heir; spendthrift ways.

And then this "should" is like a spendthrift sigh,
That hurts by easing. Shak., Hamlet, IV. 7. 123.

Spendthrift alike of money and of wit.
Couper, Table-Talk, I. 634.

spendthriftly (spend'thrift'i), a. [< spendthrift + -ly.] Lavish; wasteful; prodigal. [Rare.]

Spendthriftly, unclean, and ruffian-like courses.
Rogers, Naaman the Syrian, p. 611.

spense (spens), n. [Also spence; < ME. spense, spence, < OF. spense, spence, espense, expense, expense (see expense); in ME. partly by aphesis from dispen, < OF. despen, expense, also a larder, buttery, etc., < despendre, spend: see expense, dispen, and cf. *spend*¹, spender.] 1†. Expense; expenditure of money.

So he sped hym by spies, & spense of his gode,
That the lady for hir lord lyuely he stole.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 13692.

For better is cost upon somewhat worth than spense upon nothing worth.
Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 115.

2. A buttery; a larder; a cellar or other place where provisions are kept. [Obsolete and prov. Eng.]

Al vinolent as bottle in the spence.
Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, I. 223.

Yn the spence, a tabell planke, and [j. sylwes] [shelves].
English Gids (E. E. T. S.), p. 327.

Bluff Harry broke into the spence,
And turn'd the cows adrift.
Tennyson, Talking Oak.

3. The apartment of a house where the family sit and eat. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

spensar (spen'sér), n. [Also spenser; Sc. spensar; < ME. spenser, spencere, spensere, also despenser, < OF. despencier, despencier (ML. dispensarius), dispenser, spenser, < despen, expense: see dispenser, spense.] Hence the surnames Spenser, Spenser.] A steward or butler; a dispenser.

Cesar heet his spensar gave the Greke his money.
Trevise, tr. of Higden's Polychronicon, IV. 309.

The spencer came with keys in his hand,
Opened the doore and them at dinner fand.
Henryson, Moral Fables, p. 12.

Spenserian (spen-sē'ri-ān), a. and n. [< Spenser (see def. and spenser) + -ian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the English poet Edmund Spenser (died 1599); specifically, noting the style of versification adopted by Spenser in his "Faerie Queene." It consists of a strophe of eight decasyllabic lines and an Alexandrine, with three rimes, the first and third line forming one, the second, fourth, fifth, and seventh another, and the sixth, eighth, and ninth the third. It is the stateliest of English measures, and is used by Thomson in his "Castle of Indolence," by Byron in his "Childe Harold," etc.

II. n. The poetical measure of Spenser's "Faerie Queene"; a Spenserian verse or stanza. O. W. Holmes, Poetry.

spent (spen't), p. a. [Pp. of *spend*¹, v.] 1. Nearly or quite exhausted or worn out; having lost force or vitality; inefficient; impotent: generally in a comparative sense. A spent deer or other animal is one that has been chased or wounded nearly to death. A spent ball is a flying ball (from a gun) that has so nearly lost its impulse as to be unable to penetrate an object struck by it, though it may occasionally inflict a dangerous contused wound. A spent bill of lading or other commercial document is one that has fulfilled its purpose and should be canceled.

The forme of his style there, compared with Tullies writynge, is but even the talke of a spent old man.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 152.

Mine eyes, like spent lamps glowing out, grow heavy.
Fletcher, Sea Voyage, III. 1.

2. Exhausted by spending or spawning; of fish, having spawned.

speos (spē'os), n. [< Gr. σπέος, a cave.] In Egypt. archæol., a temple or part of a temple, or a tomb of some architectural importance, as distinguished from a mere tunnel or syringe, excavated in the solid rock; a grotto-temple or tomb, as at Beni-Hassan (see cut under hypogeum) and Abou Simbel (Ipsamboul). The larger speos of Abou Simbel is about 169 feet deep, and has all the parts of a complete open-air Egyptian temple.

Speotyto (spē-ot'i-tō), n. [NL. (Gloger, 1842), < Gr. σπέος, a cave, + τύτο, the night-owl.] An American genus of Strigidae, containing several species of small long-legged earless owls which live in treeless regions and burrow in the ground, as S. cucularia of the pampas of South America and S. hypogæa of the prairies of western North America; the burrowing owls. A variety of the latter also inhabits Florida, and the genus is likewise represented in the West Indies. S. hypogæa is the species which is found in association with prairie-dogs and spermophiles, giving rise to many exaggerated accounts of the relation between the bird and the mammal. These owls were formerly placed in the genus Athene, and were also called Pholeotypus. See cuts under owl.

spert, v. t. A variant of sparl.

sporable¹ (spē'ra-bl), a. [< L. sperabilis, that may be hoped for, < sperare, hope, < spes, hope.] Capable of being hoped for; affording grounds of hope.

Wherin, suerly perceaving his own cause not sperable, he doth honorably and wisely.

Sir W. Cecil (June 3, 1565), in Ellis's Hist. Letters, 2d ser., [clxxii].

sperable², n. An obsolete form of sparable.

speraget, n. Same as sparage.

speratet (spē'rät), a. [< L. speratus, pp. of sperare, hope.] Hoped for; not hopeless: opposed to desperate. In old law, in determining whether debts to a testator, the right to collect which devolved upon the executor, were assets to be accounted for by him, though not collected, regard had to be had to their character, whether they were sperate or desperate.

Spergula (spér-gū-lä), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1719), named from its scattering its seeds; < L. spargere, scatter: see sparge.] A genus of poly-petalous plants, of the order Caryophyllaceæ and tribe Alsineæ. It is characterized by the presence of small scarious stipules, by flowers with five styles alternate with the five sepals, and by a one-celled capsule with its five valves opposite the sepals. There are 2 or 3 species, widely scattered through temperate regions of either hemisphere, and especially abundant in fields and cultivated places of the Old World. They are annual herbs with dichotomous or clustered branches, the swollen and succulent axils bearing apparent whorls of awl-shaped leaves. The small white or pink flowers form raceme-like cymes with conspicuous pedicels. The species are known by the general name of spurry, sometimes sandweed.

Spergularia (spér-gū-lä'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Persoon, 1805), < Spergula + -aria.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Caryophyllaceæ and tribe Alsineæ. It is distinguished from the allied genus Spergula by its three styles and three-valved capsule, and differs from Arenaria, to which it was formerly referred, in the possession of stipules. There are 3 or 4 species, scattered through temperate regions, especially along salt-marshes and shores. They are commonly diffuse herbs, small and often succulent, with thread-like or linear leaves, often, as

In Spergularia, with secondary clusters of leaves forming apparent whorls at the axils. The small flowers open in bright sunshine, and are white or rose-colored or commonly purplish. The species are known as sand-spurry. At least 3 species are found on the Atlantic coast of the United States. See Tinea.

sperhawk, n. Same as sparhawk for sparrowhawk.

sperket (spér'ket), n. [Also spirket; origin obscure.] A large hooked wooden peg, not much curved, to hang saddles, harness, etc., on. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]

High on the spirket there it hung.

Bloomfield, The Horkey. (Davies.)

sperling (spér'ling), n. Same as *sparling*¹.

sperm² (spér'm), n. [ME. sperme, < OF. sperme, sparme, F. sperme = Sp. Pg. esperma = It. sperma, < L. sperma, < Gr. σπέρμα (σπερμα-), seed, < σπείρω, sow. Cf. *spore*².] The male seed of any kind, as the semen or seminal fluid of the higher vertebrates, the male spawn or milt of the lower vertebrates, or the seminal elements of any animal, containing the male germs, or spermatozoa.

sperm² (spér'm), n. [Abbr. of spermaceti.] 1. Same as spermaceti.—2. A sperm-whale.—3. Sperm-oil.

sperma (spér'mā), n. Same as semen (which see).

spermaceti (spér-ma-set'i or -sē'ti), n. and a. [Formerly or dial. also, in corrupt forms, parmaceti, parmacetty, parmacity, parmacitty, etc.; < F. spermaceti = Sp. espermaceti = Pg. espermacete = It. spermaceti, < NL. spermaceti, lit. 'whale's seed,' the substance having been regarded as the spawn of the whale; < L. sperma, seed, + ceti, gen. of cetus, < Gr. κῆτος, whale: see *Cete*³.] I. n. A peculiar fatty substance contained in the characteristic adipose tissue of the cavity of the head of the sperm-whale or cachalot, Physeter or Catodon macrocephalus, and related cetaceans. During the life of the animal the spermaceti is in a fluid state, and when the head is opened has the appearance of an oily white liquid. On exposure to the air the spermaceti concretes and precipitates from the oil, from which it may then be separated. After being purified by an elaborate process the spermaceti concretes into a white, crystallized, brittle, semi-transparent unctuous substance, nearly inodorous and insipid. It dissolves in boiling alcohol, and as the solution cools it is deposited in perfectly pure lamellated crystals. In this state it is called cetin. Spermaceti is a mixture of various fatty acids and derivatives of the acids. It is bland and demulcent, but in medicine it is chiefly employed externally as an ingredient in ointments, cerates, and cosmetics. It has also been largely used in the manufacture of candles.

By this [fallacy of Equivocation] are they deluded who conceive spermaceti (sperma Ceti, Pseud. Ep. 1646), which is found about the head, to be the spawn of the whale.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to, derived from, or composed of spermaceti or sperm.—2. Producing or yielding spermaceti, as the sperm-whales.—Spermaceti ointment. See ointment.

spermaceti-oil (spér-ma-set'i-oil), n. Sperm-oil.

spermaceti-whale (spér-ma-set'i-hwāl), n. A sperm-whale.

Spermacocce (spér-ma-kō'sē), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1732), so called in allusion to the carpels pointed with one or more calyx-teeth; < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, germ, + ἀκμή, a point, < ἀκῆ, a point, anything sharp.] A genus of rubiaceous plants, type of the tribe Spermacocceæ. It is characterized by flowers with from two to four calyx-lobes sometimes with smaller teeth between, a small two-cleft or capitate stigma, and a dry fruit of two carpels which separate when ripe and are each or only one of them open, one often retaining the membranous axis. There are about 175 species, scattered through tropical and sub-tropical regions, and particularly common in America. They are annual or perennial herbs or low undershrubs, with smooth, rough, or hairy stems, commonly with four-angled branchlets. They bear opposite leaves, which are either sessile or petioled, membranous or coriaceous, nerved or feather-veined. The stipules are united with the petioles into a bristle-bearing membrane or sheath. The small sessile flowers are solitary in the axils or variously clustered, often in dense axillary and terminal heads, and are white, pink, or blue. In allusion to the heads, the species are called button-weed. Five species occur in the United States all southern and summer-flowering and with a short white corolla; S. glabra, the most common, extends into Ohio. Several species are in repute for medicinal properties, especially as substitutes for Ipecacuanha, for which S. ferruginea and S. Pongia are used in Brazil, and S. verticillata in the West Indies. The root of S. hispida is used as a sudorific in India.

Spermacocceæ (spér-ma-kō'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Chamisso and Schlechtendal, 1828), < Spermacocce + -æ (shortened for Spermacocceæ).] A tribe of rubiaceous plants, of which Spermacocce is the type, embracing 18 other genera, chiefly natives of tropical or subtropical America.

spermaeduct (spér'ma-duk't), n. [NL. spermaeductus, irreg. < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + L. ductus, a duct: see duct.] A spermatic duct, or sperm-duct; a male gonaduct or seminal passage; a hollow tubular or vesicular organ in the male, serving to convey or detain sperm or semen. It is connected in some way with the spermary, from which it carries off the sperm, and in many animals is specifically called the vas deferens. But it is a more comprehensive term, including the whole of the male generative passages, of whatever kind. Also spermaeductus, spermaeduct.

spermagone (spér'ma-gōn), n. Same as spermogone.

spermagonium (spér-ma-gō'ni-um), n. Same as spermogonium.

spermalist (spér'ma-list), n. [< *sperm*¹ + -al + -ist.] A spermist.

spermangium (spér-man'ji-um), n.; pl. spermangia (-iā). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, sperm, + αγγεῖον, vessel.] In Algae, a receptacle containing the spores: same as conceptacle, 2 (b).

spermaphyte (spér'ma-fit), n. See spermophyte.

spermarium (spér-mā'ri-um), n.; pl. spermaria (-iā). [NL., < L. sperma, seed, + -arium.] A spermary: used in distinction from ovarium.

spermary (spér'ma-ri), n.; pl. spermaries (-riz). [NL. spermarium.] The male germ-gland or essential sexual organ, of whatever character; the sperm-gland, or spermatic organ, or seminal gonad, in which spermatozoa are generated, in its specialized condition in the higher animals known as the testis or testicle. The term is used in distinction from ovary, both spermaries and ovaries being gonads. Also spermarium.

spermatemphraxis (spér'ma-tem-frak'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(-), seed, + εμπάσσειν, obstruct: see emphractic.] Obstruction to the discharge of semen.

spermatheca (spér-ma-thē'kü), n.; pl. spermathecae (-sē). [NL., irreg. < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + θήκη, a case. Cf. spermatheca.] A spermatic case, capsule, or sheath; a receptacle for semen; specifically, the seminal receptacle in the female, as of various insects and other invertebrates, which receives and conveys or detains the sperm of the male. More correctly spermatheca. See cuts under Dendrocaula, ovariole, and Rhabdocala.

spermathecal (spér-ma-thē'kal), a. [< spermatheca + -al.] Of or pertaining to a spermatheca: as, a spermathecal duct or vesicle.

On reaching the point where the spermathecal duct debouches, they [ova] are impregnated by the spermatozoa which escape now from the spermatheca and meet the ova. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 658.

spermata, n. Plural of spermaticum.

spermatic (spér-mat'ik), a. [< OF. (and F.) spermatique = Sp. espermático = Pg. espermático = It. spermatico, < L. spermatikus, < Gr. σπερματικός, < σπέρμα, seed: see *sperm*¹.] 1. Of or pertaining to sperm, or male seed, in general; containing spermatozoa, or consisting of sperm or semen; seminal: as, spermatic fluid.—2. Secreting spermatozoa; generating or producing semen; seminal, as a spermary.—3. Connected with or related to the spermary, or essential male organ; subservient to the male function; testicular: as, spermatic vessels; the spermatic cord.—4. In bot., resembling or of the nature of spermata: as, spermatic filaments; spermatic gelatin.—5. Figuratively, seminal; germinal; fructifying. [Rare.]

I find certain books vital and spermatic, not leaving the reader what he was; he shuts the book a richer man. Emerson, Books.

External spermatic fascia. Same as intercolumnar fascia (which see, under fascia).—External spermatic nerve. The genital branch of the genitocrural nerve. It supplies the cremaster muscle.—Internal spermatic fascia. Same as infundibuliform fascia (which see, under fascia).—Spermatic artery. Any artery supplying a testis or other spermary, corresponding to an ovarian artery of the female. In man the spermatic arteries are two long slender arteries arising from the abdominal aorta a little below the renal arteries, and passing along each spermatic cord, to be distributed to the testes.—Spermatic calculus. A concretion sometimes found in the seminal vesicles.—Spermatic canal. (a) The inguinal canal. (b) Any spermatic duct, as the vas deferens.—Spermatic cartridge. Same as spermatophore.—Spermatic cord. See cord.—Spermatic cyst. In pathol., a cyst arising in the testicle near the epididymis, and filled with fluid in which are often found spermatozoa, crystals, etc. See spermatocyst.—Spermatic duct. Same as spermaeduct.—Spermatic filament. A spermatozoon.—Spermatic gelatin. In bot., a gelatinous substance in spermogonia which when wet aids in the expulsion of the spermata.—Spermatic loges. See logos.—Spermatic plexus of nerves. See plexus.—Spermatic plexus of veins. A thick plexus of convoluted vessels formed in the spermatic cord by the vena comites of the spermatic arteries. These veins coalesce after leaving the inguinal canal, and empty into the vena cava inferior of the right side and the renal vein of the left side. This venous plexus corresponds to the ovarian venous plexus of the female, and is specifically known as the pampiniform plexus. When varicose, it constitutes a varicocele or cirrhocele, an extremely common affection, most frequent on the left side.—Spermatic rete. Same as rete vasculosum testis (which see, under rete).—Spermatic sac. A sac containing a number of spermatozoa packed or bundled together, to be discharged on rupture of the sac.

spermatical (spér-mat'ik-əl), a. [< spermatic + -al.] Same as spermatic. Bacon.

spermatogenous (spér-mā-shi-ōj'e-nus), a. [< NL. spermaticum + Gr. -γενής, producing: see -genous.] In bot., producing or bearing spermata: as, a spermatogenous surface.

On the contrary, they are disk-shaped or cushion-shaped bodies with the spermatogenous surface folded into deep sinuous depressions. De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 241.

spermatophore (spér-mā'shi-ō-fōr), n. [< NL. spermaticum + Gr. -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear¹.] In bot., a structure bearing a spermaticum.

spermatism (spér'ma-tizm), n. [< spermatize + -ism.] 1. Emission of semen; a seminal discharge.—2. Same as spermism.

spermatist (spér'ma-tist), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(-), seed, + -ist.] Same as spermist.

spermaticum (spér-mā'shi-um), n.; pl. spermatica (-iā). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed.] In bot., an exceedingly minute cylindrical or rod-shaped body in fungi, produced like spores in cup-like organs called spermogonia. The spermata are conjectured to be the male fertilizing organs, although the male sexual function of all spermata in fungi has not been demonstrated. In more technical language a spermaticum is a "male non-motile gamete conjugating with the trichogyne of a procarp" (Goebel).

spermatize (spér'ma-tiz), v. t. i.; pret. and pp. spermatized, ppr. spermatizing. [< Gr. σπερματίζω, sow, yield seed, < σπέρμα, seed: see *sperm*¹.] To yield male sperm or seed; have a seminal emission; discharge semen.

spermatoat, n. Plural of spermatōon. Owen.

spermatoal (spér-ma-tō'al), a. [< spermatōon + -al.] Pertaining to a spermatōon. Owen.

spermatoblast (spér'ma-tō-blāst), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(-), seed, + βλάστης, bud, sprout, shoot.] The bud or germ of a spermatozoon; a germinal blastema whence spermatozoa are produced. Spermatozoa form a layer of nucleated and nucleolated cells in the seminal tubules, which proliferates or projects into the lumen of the tubule with often a lobed or digitate end; and from every lobe a spermatozoon develops and is discharged, leaving a branching stump of the spermatoblast. Also spermatoblast, nenatoblast.

spermatoblastic (spér'ma-tō-blas'tik), a. [< spermatoblast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to spermatoblasts or the formation of spermatozoa; germinal or budding, as a structure which develops spermatozoa. Also spermatoblastic.

spermatocoele (spér'ma-tō-sēl), n. [< Gr. σπέρμα(-), seed, + κύημα, a tumor.] A retention-cyst of the epididymis or testicle containing spermatozoa.

spermatocyst (spér'ma-tō-sist), n. [< NL. spermatocystis, < Gr. σπέρμα(-), seed, + κύστις, bladder: see cyst.] 1. In anat., a seminal vesicle.—2. In pathol., a spermatic cyst or sac. See spermatic.

spermatocystic (spér'ma-tō-sis'tik), a. [< spermatocyst + -ic.] Containing spermatozoa, as a cyst; of the nature of a spermatocyst.

spermatocystidium (spér'ma-tō-sis-tid'i-um), n.; pl. spermatocystidia (-iā). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(-), seed, + κύστις, bladder, + dim. -ιδιον.] In bot., same as antheridium. Hedwig.

spermatocystis (spér'ma-tō-sis'tis), n. [NL.: see spermatocyst.] Same as spermatocyst.

spermatocystitis (spér'ma-tō-sis-ti'tis), n. [NL., < spermatocystis + -itis.] Inflammation of the seminal vesicles.

spermatocytal (spér'ma-tō-si'tal), a. [< spermatocyte + -al.] Of or pertaining to spermatocytes; of the nature of a spermatocyte.

spermatocyte (spér'ma-tō-sit), n. [< NL. spermaticum + Gr. κύτος, a hollow: see cyste.] 1. In bot., the mother-cell of a spermatozoid.

The protoplasm in each of the two cells of the antheridium (in Salvinia) contracts and by repeated bipartition divides into four roundish primordial cells (spermatocytes), each of which produces a spermatozoid. Goebel, Special Morphology of Plants (trans.), p. 230.

2. The cell whose nuclear chromatin and cell-protoplasm become respectively the head and tail of the spermatozoon: synonymous with spermatoblast. Flemming.

These spermatocytes may either all develop into spermatozoa (Mammals), or a single spermatocyte may become modified as a basilar cell (Plagiostome Fishes), or a number may form an envelope or cyst around the others (Amphibians and Fishes). Encyc. Brit., XX. 412.

spermatogemma (spér'ma-tō-jem'mā), n.; pl. spermatogemmae (-ē). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(-), seed, + gemma, a bud.] A mass of spermatocytes; a multinuclear spermatic cyst; a kind of spermatoblast. See also spermosphere. Encyc. Brit., XX. 412.

spermatogenesis (spér'ma-tō-jen'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γένεσις, origin.] In biol., the formation or development of spermatozoa. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 301.

spermatogenetic (spér'ma-tō-jē-net'ik), a. [spermatogenesis, after genetic.] Of or pertaining to spermatogenesis; exhibiting or characterized by spermatogenesis; as, a spermatogenetic process or result; a spermatogenetic theory. Encyc. Brit., XX. 412.

spermatogenous (spér'ma-toj'e-nus), a. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γένεσις, producing: see -γεν-.] Producing spermatozoa.

spermatogeny (spér'ma-toj'e-ni), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + -γένεσις, -γενεῖν, producing: see -γεν-.] The generation or production of spermatozoa; spermatogenesis.

spermatogonium (spér'ma-tō-gō'ni-um), n.; pl. spermatogonia (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + γονή, generation.] 1. In bot., same as pycnidium, 1.—2. A primitive or formative seminal cell, forming a kind of sperm-morula, or spermosphere composed of spermatoblasts or spermatocytes, which in turn give rise to spermatozooids. La Valette St. George.

spermatoid (spér'ma-toid), a. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + εἶδος, form.] Resembling sperm, or male seed; sperm-like; of the nature of sperm; spermatoid or seminal.

spermatological (spér'ma-tō-loj'i-kal), a. [spermatology + -ic.] Of or pertaining to spermatology. Also spermatological.

spermatologist (spér'ma-tol'ō-jist), n. [spermatology + -ist.] One who is versed in spermatology. Also spermatologist.

spermatology (spér'ma-tol'ō-jī), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + -λογία, -λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine or body of facts and opinions regarding sperm, semen, or the male elements of procreation, as those of spermatogenesis or spermatogeny. Also spermatology.

spermatomere (spér'ma-tō-mēr), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + μέρος, part.] One of the parts into which the male or female pronucleus of an ovum may divide after fertilization.

Two of these "residual globules" are, according to them, expelled by the spermatomeres during their nuclear metamorphosis preceding division.

Micros. Science, XXVI. 587.

spermatoön (spér'ma-tō'on), n.; pl. spermatoa (-i). [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ζών, an egg.] The nucleus of a sperm-cell or spermatozoön; a cell which stands in the relation of such a nucleus, as that out of or from which a spermatozoön may be developed; a spermato-blast.

Spermophilus (spér'ma-tof'i-lus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), emended from Spermophilus.] Same as Spermophilus.

spermatophoral (spér'ma-tof'ō-ral), a. [spermatophore + -al.] Of the character of or pertaining to a spermatophore. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 291.

spermatophore (spér'ma-tō-för), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + φέρειν = E. bear.] A special case, capsule, or sheath containing spermatozoa; specifically, one of the peculiar spermatocysts of cephalopods (also called spermatie or seminal cartridge, seminal rope, or filament of Needham), usually forming a long cylindrical structure in which several envelopes may be distinguished. The contents of such a spermatophore are not exclusively seminal, for in the hinder part of each there is a special substance, the exploding mass, which serves to discharge the packet of spermatozoa. These are invested in a special tubular tunic, and packed in the front part of the spermatophore, like a charge of shot in a cartridge in front of the powder. Behind this packet of sperm the exploding mass forms a spiral coil, which extends through the greater part of the spermatophore and is continuous behind with the coat of the latter. When the spermatophore is wetted it swells up and bursts, through the force of the spring coiled inside, and the spermatozoa are discharged with considerable force. A spermatophore thus offers a striking analogy to the nematophore or thread-cell of a coelenterate, though the object attained is not urtication or netting, but a seminal emission and consequent impregnation of the female. A spermatophore of some sort, less complex than that of cephalopods, is very commonly found in several classes of invertebrates.

spermatophorous (spér'ma-tof'ō-rus), a. [As spermatophore + -ous.] Bearing or conveying seed, sperm, or spermatozoa; spermatogenous; seminiferous; specifically, bearing sperm as a spermatophore; of or pertaining to a spermatophore; spermatophoral.

spermatorrhæa, spermatorrhœa (spér'ma-tō-rō'æ), n. [NL. spermatorrhæa; < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ρεῖν, flow, run.] Involuntary seminal loss.

spermatospore (spér'ma-tō-spōr), n. [Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + σπόρος, a sowing.] A kind of cell which gives rise to spermatozoa. Also spermatospore.

spermatotheca (spér'ma-tō-thē'kă), n. Same as spermatheca.

spermatovum (spér'ma-tō-vum), n.; pl. spermatova (-vâ). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + L. ovum, egg.] A fecundated egg; an ovum after impregnation by spermatozoa, whence its substance consists of material from both parents. Also spermovum.

Spermatozoa (spér'ma-tō-zō'ä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of spermatozoön, q. v.] 1. A supposed class or other group of animalcules; sperm-animals: so called before their nature was known, when they were regarded as independent parasitic organisms.—2. [l. c.] Plural of spermatozoön.

spermatozoal (spér'ma-tō-zō'al), a. [spermatozoön + -al.] Same as spermatozoan.

spermatozoan (spér'ma-tō-zō'an), a. and n. [spermatozoön + -an.] I. a. Of the nature of a spermatozoön; of or pertaining to spermatozoa.

II. n. A spermatozoön or spermatozoid.

spermatozoic (spér'ma-tō-zō'ik), a. [spermatozoön + -ic.] Same as spermatozoan.

spermatozoid (spér'ma-tō-zō'id), a. and n. [spermatozoön + -id.] See spermatozoid.

spermatozoidal (spér'ma-tō-zō'i-dal), a. [spermatozoön + -oid + -al.] Same as spermatozoid. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 443.

spermatozoid (spér'ma-tō-zō'oid), a. and n. [spermatozoön + -oid.] I. a. Resembling a spermatozoön; of spermatozoan nature or appearance.

II. n. 1. A spermatozoön. Von Siebold.

Also, less commonly, spermatozoid. See zoid.

—2. In bot., a male ciliated motile gamete produced in an antheridium: same as antherozoid. In this sense more commonly spermatozoid. See also cut under antheridium.

spermatozoön (spér'ma-tō-zō'on), n.; pl. spermatozoa (-i). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα(τ-), seed, + ζών, an animal.] 1. One of the numberless microscopic bodies contained in semen, to which the seminal fluid owes its vitality, and which are the immediate and active means of impregnating or fertilizing the ovum of the female; a spermatie cell or filament; a spermatozoan or spermatozoid. Spermatozoa are the vital and essential product of a spermary, male gonad, or testis, as ova are of the ovary or female gonad; their production, or the ability to produce them, is the characteristic distinction of the male from the female organism, whatever their size or shape or other physical character, and however various may be the organ in which they are produced. Spermatozoa, like ova, have the morphological value of the cell; and a spermatozoön is usually a cell in which a cell-wall, cell-contents, and cell-nucleus, with or without a nucleolus, may be distinguished. The form may be spherical, like the ovum, and indistinguishable therefrom by any physical character; more frequently, and especially in the higher animals, these little bodies are shaped like a tadpole, with a small spherical or discoidal head, a succeeding rod-like or bacillar part, and a long slender tail or caudal filament, capable of spontaneous vibratile movements, by means of which the spermatozoa swim actively in the seminal fluid, like a shoal of microscopic fishes, every one seeking, in the passages of the female into which the fluid has been injected, to discover the ovum in which to bury itself, in order to undergo dissolution in the substance of the ovum. They are smaller than the corresponding ovum, and several or many of them may be embedded in one ovum. The actual union of spermatozoa with an ovum, and fusion of their respective protoplasma, is required for impregnation, and is the consummation of sexual intercourse, to which all other acts and processes are simply ancillary or subservient. Spermatozoa may be killed by cold, or chemical or mechanical injury, like any other cells. These bodies, very similar to various animalcules, were discovered and named spermatozoa by Leeuwenhoek in 1677; they were at first and long afterward regarded as independent organisms, variously classed as parasitic helminths or infusorians—such a view being held, for instance, by Von Baer so late as 1827 or 1835. Von Siebold, who found them in various vertebrates, called them spermatozooids. Their true nature appears to have been first recognized by Kölliker. Spermatozoa or their equivalents are diagnostic of the male sex under whatever conditions they exist, whether in male individuals separate from the female, or in those many hermaphrodite animals which unite the two sexes in one individual; and the organ which produces them is invariably a testis or its equivalent spermary, of whatever character. The male elements of the lowest animals, however, as Protozoa, do not ordinarily receive the name spermatozoa, this being specially applied to the more elaborate male cells of the character above described. The origination of spermatozoa has of late years been the subject of much research and discussion; the details of the process, as observed in different animals, or under different conditions of investigation, together with conflicting doctrinal conclusions, have occasioned a large special vocabulary. See many words preceding and following this one.

Spermatozooids of Adiantum Capillus-Veneris.

M, four spermatozoa of man; A, two of ape; R, two of rabbit. In each case, I, broadest view, II, profile, of A, kernel or nucleus of the head, and m, filamentous body, ending in s, the long slender tail.

2†. [cap.] A genus of animalcules. Von Baer, 1827.

sperm-ball (spér'm'bál), n. A spherical cluster of spermatozoa, such as occurs in some sponges. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 424.

sperm-blastoderm (spér'm'blas'tō-dèrm), n. A blastodermic layer of formative spermatozoa composing the surface of a sperm-blastula.

sperm-blastula (spér'm'blas'tū-lă), n. A spermatie blastula, or hollow sphere whose surface is a layer of formative spermatozoa.

sperm-cell (spér'm'sel), n. 1. A spermatozoön: so called from its morphological valence as a cell.—2. A cell giving rise to spermatozoa; a spermatoblast or spermatocyte.

spermet, n. An obsolete spelling of *sperm*¹.

Spermestes (spér-mes'téz), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1837), said to be (irreg.) < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + ἐσθίειν, eat.] The typical genus of Spermestinae, containing six or eight species confined to Africa and Madagascar. Such are S. cucullata, S. poensis, and S. bicolor, of the continent, and the Madagascar S. nana. These little birds are closely related to Amadina, of which Spermestes is often rated as a subgenus.

Spermestinae (spér-mes-ti'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spermestes + -inae.] An extensive subfamily of Ploceidae, named from the genus Spermestes. The very numerous species, about 150, are chiefly African and Asiatic, but some of them extend to Australia and various Polynesian islands. Among them are the amadavats and estrilds. Leading genera are Lagonosticta, Spermopiza, Pyrenestes, Estrilda, and Amadina. See cut under senegal.

spermestine (spér-mes'tin), a. Of, or having characters of, the Spermestinae.

spermic (spér'm'ik), a. [*sperm*¹ + -ic.] Same as spermatie.

spermidium (spér-mid'i-um), n.; pl. spermidia (-i). [NL., < L. sperma, seed, germ, + -idium.] In bot., same as achenium, 1.

spermiduct (spér'mi-duk't), n. [L. sperma, sperm, + ductus, a duct: see duct. Cf. spermaduct.] A passage for the conveyance of sperm in the female of Echinorhynchus. See the quotation. [Rare.]

From the lower end of the ovarium [of the female of Echinorhynchus] two short oviducts, or rather spermiducts, arise, and almost immediately unite into a sort of uterus, which is continued into the vagina.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 555.

spermin (spér'min), n. [*sperm*¹ + -in.] A non-poisonous alkaloid (C₂H₅N) obtained from sputum, human semen, organs of leucemic patients, and alcoholic anatomical preparations.

spermism (spér'mizm), n. [*sperm*¹ + -ism.] The theory or doctrine that the male sperm contains the whole germ of the future animal, which develops entirely from a spermatozoön, the ovum serving merely as a mold or matrix; animalculism. Also spermatism.

spermist (spér'mist), n. [*sperm*¹ + -ist.] One who holds the theory of spermism or spermatism; an animalculist: the opposite of ovulist. See theory of incasement, under incasement. Also spermatist.

sperm-kernel (spér'm'kér'nel), n. Same as spermococcus.

sperm-morula (spér'mor'f-lä), n. A spermatomorph; a mulberry-mass of formative spermatozoa.

sperm-nucleus (spér'm-nū'klē-us), n. 1. The nucleus of a spermatozoon; a spermococcus or sperm-kernel.—2. In bot., the nucleus of a male gamete, which coalesces with the nucleus of an oosphere to form a germ-nucleus. Goebel.

spermoblast (spér'mō-blást), n. Same as spermoblast.

spermoblastic (spér-mō-blás'tik), a. Same as spermoblastic.

spermocarp (spér'mō-kärp), n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., the so-called "fruit" in the Characeae and certain confervoid algae. It is the fertilized and matured female organ with its variously formed covering or pericarp and accessory cells. The "fruit" of the Characeae has also been called the antheridium, sporogonium, enveloped oogonium, and sporophyllum, by different authors. Sporophyllum seems the preferable term. See the various words. Compare sporocarp. See cuts under antheridium and conceptacle.

spermococcus (spér'mō-kōk'us), n.; pl. spermococci (-si). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + κόκκος, grain, berry.] The nucleus of a spermatozoon: it consists of the head of the sperm-animalcule, excepting its thin outer layer. Also sperm-kernel.

spermoderm (spér'mō-dér'm), n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + δέρμα, skin.] In bot., the integument of a seed in the aggregate; properly, same as testa.

spermogastrula (spér'mō-gas'trō-lä), n.; pl. spermogastrulae (-lä). [NL., < L. sperma (see sperm) + NL. gastrula, q. v.] A sperm-blastula which has undergone a kind of gastrulation.

spermogone (spér'mō-gōn), n. [NL. spermogonium.] In bot., same as spermogonium; also employed by some writers to denote the spermatium or spore-like body which is produced in a spermogonium. See spermogonium, spermatorium. Also spelled spermagone.

spermogonia, n. Plural of spermogonium.

spermogoniferous (spér'mō-gō-nif'e-rus), a. [NL. spermogonium, q. v., + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., bearing or producing spermogonia.

spermogonium (spér'mō-gō-ni-um), n.; pl. spermogonia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σπερμιογόνος, producing seed, σπέρμα, seed, + -γόνος, producing; see -gony.] In bot., a cup-shaped cavity or like a bullfinch's, giving name to the subfamily Spermophilinae. The limits of the genus vary with different authors, but it usually includes about 50 species, of tropical and subtropical America. The only one of these which occurs in the United States is S. moreletii, which is found in Texas, and known as Morelet's pygmy finch. It is only about 4 inches long, with extremely turgid bill convex in all its outlines, short rounded wings, and still shorter tail. The male is entirely black and white, the latter color tinged with buff on the under parts; the female is olivaceous-brown above and brownish-yellow or buff below, with whitish wing-bars. A like dissimilarity of coloration characterizes the sexes throughout the genus. By those who hold that Spermophila is the same name as Spermophilus, this genus is called Spermophila; and some or all of the species are often placed in a more extensive genus Gymnorhynchus, of which Spermophila or Spermophilus then constitutes one section. See cut under grassquit. Also called Spermophila.

2. In mammal., same as Spermophilus, 1. J. Richardson, 1825.—3t. In entom., a genus of arachnidans. Hentz, 1842.

spermophile (spér'mō-fil), n. [NL. Spermophilus.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the genus Spermophilus, as a ground-squirrel or suslik, of which there are numerous species in Europe, Asia, and North America. See cuts under suslik and Spermophilus.—2. A fringilline bird of the genus Spermophila; a little seed-eater, of which there are numerous Central and South American species. See cut under grassquit.

Spermophilinae (spér'mō-fi-li-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spermophilus (in sense 2) < Spermophila + -inae.]

1. In mammal., the ground-squirrels or spermophiles, prairie-dogs, and marmots, one of two subfamilies into which the Sciuridae are sometimes divided, represented by the genera Spermophilus, Tamias, and Arctomys. It is not separated from Sciurinae or the true arboreal squirrels by any trenchant characters, and the two divisions intergrade through the genera Xerus and Tamias. But the spermophilines are of terrestrial habits, with usually stouter form, larger size, and less bushy tail than the Sciurinae. They inhabit Europe, Asia, and especially North America, where the greater number of species are found, and most of them are called gophers. The group is also called Arctomyinae. See cuts under Arctomys, chipmunk, prairie-dog, Spermophilus, and suslik.

2. In ornith., an American subfamily of Fringillidae, named from the genus Spermophila. P. L. Sclater, 1862.

spermophiline (spér-mof'i-lin), a. and n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φιλέω, love.] 1. a. Pertaining to the Spermophilinae, or having their characters.

2. n. A member of the Spermophilinae.

Spermophilus (spér-mof'i-lus), n. [NL. (F. Cuvier, 1822), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φιλέω, love.]

1. A genus of ground-squirrels, giving name to the Spermophilinae. The type is S. citellus of Europe, the suslik, but the genus is especially well represented in North America, where more than a dozen distinct species occur, some of which run into several varieties. They are divided into 3 subgenera. (1) Otospermophilus, in which the ears are high and pointed, the tail is full and broad, with the hairs from two thirds to three quarters of the length of the head and body, and the whole aspect is strongly squirrel-like. To this section belongs S. grammurus, with its varieties beecheyi and douglasi; these are the common ground-squirrels of California, Oregon, and Washington, and east to the Rocky Mountains. S. annulatus of Mexico probably also belongs here. (2) Colobotis, in which the ears are short and marginiform, the tail is short, from one third to one half the length of the body, and the form is stout. The Old World species belong here, and several of those of North America, as Parry's spermophile, S. empetra (or parryi), which inhabits British America and Alaska, and runs into several varieties, as kodiakensis and erythroglossus. In the United States the best-known species of this section is Richardson's spermophile, S. richardsoni, very generally distributed, in one or another of its varieties, from the plains of the Saskatchewan to those of the Laramie. It is a tawny animal, resembling a prairie-dog in appearance and habits. Here also belong S. mollis, S. spilosoma, and S. obsoletus, inhabiting western parts of the United States. (3) Idiotomys, which includes several slender-bodied species, almost like weasels in this respect (whence the name), with the ears generally small or rudimentary, as in Colobotis, the skull long and narrow, the tail variable, and the first upper premolar generally small. The most squirrel-like of these is Franklin's spermophile, S. franklini, inhabiting Illinois and Missouri and northward to 64°. It not only resembles a gray squirrel, the tail being bushy, two thirds as long as the head and body. The commonest species is S. tridecemlineatus, the thirteen-

Thirteen-lined Spermophile, or Federation Squirrel (Spermophilus tridecemlineatus). lined spermophile, or federation squirrel, so called by Dr. S. L. Mitchell (in 1821) from the original thirteen States of the United States, it having a number (six or eight) of longitudinal stripes, with five or seven rows of spots between them, likened by that patriot to the "stars and stripes." It inhabits the prairies of the United States at large, and extends northward into British America. Other species of this section are S. mexicanus of Texas and Mexico, and S. tereticaudus of Arizona and California. Three of the above animals, S. grammurus, S. franklini, and S. tridecemlineatus, are numerous enough in cultivated districts to be troublesome, and all of them are called gophers, a name shared by the different animals of the family Geomysidae. They are all terrestrial (S. franklini somewhat arboreal), and live in burrows underground, much like prairie-dogs, though none of them dig so extensively. In many parts of the Dakotas and Montana the ground is honeycombed with the burrows of S. richardsoni. They feed on herbage and seeds, and are also to some extent carnivorous. They are prolific, like most rodents, and bring forth their young in burrows. Those of northern regions hibernate like marmots. Their flesh is eatable. The name of the genus is also written Spermophila and Spermatophilus, but both of these forms are rare. See also cut under suslik.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Gebler.

spermophore (spér'mō-för), n. [NL. spermatophorum.] Same as spermatophorum.

spermatophorum (spér-mof'ō-rum), n.; pl. spermatophora (-rä). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φέρω = E. bear.] 1. A seminal vesicle.—2. In bot., a synonym of placenta and also of funiculus.

Spermophyta (spér-mof'i-tä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of spermatophytum: see spermatophyte.] The highest of the four principal groups or divisions into which the vegetable kingdom is separated by the later systematists. It embraces the higher or flowering plants, those producing true seeds. It is the same as Phanerogamia. The correlative terms in descending systematic order are Pteridophyta, Bryophyta, and Thallophyta. See Phanerogamia, and compare Cryptogamia.

spermatophyte (spér'mō-fit), n. [NL. spermatophytum, < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φυτόν, plant.] In bot., a member of the Spermophyta; a plant producing true seeds; a phænogam, or flowering plant. Sometimes written spermaphyte.

spermatophytic (spér-mō-fit'ik), a. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φυτόν, plant.] In bot., capable of producing true seeds; phænogamic.

spermoplasm (spér'mō-plazm), n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + πλάσμα, anything formed or molded; see plasm.] The protoplasm of a spermatozoon; the plasmic contents of a spermule, distinguished from the spermococcus or sperm-kernel. Also spermoplasma.

spermopodium (spér'mō-pō-di-um), n.; pl. spermopodia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + ποίς (pod-) = E. foot.] In bot., an unused name for the gynophore in Umbelliferae.

spermosphere (spér'mō-sfēr), n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + σφαίρα, sphere.] A mass of spermoblasts; a spermatogemma.

Spermospiza (spér-mō-spi'zä), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + σπιζα, a finch.]

1. A leading genus of Spermestinae, the type of which is the African S. hæmatina. Originally called Spermophaga, a name too near Spermophagus.—2. A genus of American finches, synonymous with Spermophila. Bonaparte.

spermospore (spér'mō-spör), n. Same as spermospore.

spermothea (spér'mō-thē'kä), n.; pl. spermotheae (-sē). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + θέκη, a case. Cf. spermatheca.] In bot., a pericarp. [Rare.]

spermous (spér'mus), a. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + -ους.] Same as spermatic.

spermovarian (spér-mō-vā-ri-an), a. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + -ovarium.] Of or pertaining to a spermovarium.

spermovarium (spér-mō-vā-ri-um), n.; pl. spermovaria (-ä). [NL., < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + NL. ovarium, q. v.] A hermaphroditic genital gland; a bisexual gonad; an ovipary or ovotestis, which gives rise, simultaneously or successively, to male and female products. See cut under ovotestis.

spermovary (spér-mō-vā-ri), n.; pl. spermovaries (-riz). [NL. spermovarium.] Same as spermovarium.

spermovum (spér-mō-vum), n.; pl. spermova (-vā). [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + L. ovum, egg.] Same as spermotum.

sperm-rope (spér'm-rōp), n. A string of spermatozoa packed in a long case; a package of sperm, as one of the spermatic cartridges of a cephalopod. For description, see spermatophore. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 682.

spermule (spér'mül), n. [NL. spermulum, dim. of L.L. sperma, seed; see sperm.] A seed-animalcule, sperm-cell, spermatozoon, or zoöspERMium; the fertilizing male element, of the morphological valence of a cell. Spermule is Haeckel's

Section of Barberrry-leaf (of its natural thickness at x), infested with Puccinia graminis in its acedial stage. sp, spermogonia; a, fruit, inclosed within the peridium p, or open and discharging spores. (Somewhat magnified.)

receptacle in which spermatia are produced. See spermatium, peridium, Puccinia (with cut). Also spermagonium.

spermogonous (spér-mog'ō-nus), a. [Gr. spermogone + -ous.] In bot., resembling or having the character of spermogonia or spermogones.

sperm-oil (spér'm'oil), n. Spermaceti-oil; the oil of the spermaceti-whale. See train-oil.

spermolith (spér'mō-lith), n. [Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + λίθος, stone.] A concretion which occasionally forms in the seminal ducts.

spermological (spér-mō-loj'i-kal), a. Same as spermatological.

spermologist (spér-mol'ō-jist), n. [Gr. spermolog-y + -ist.] 1. Same as spermatologist.—2. In bot., one who treats of or collects seeds; a student of or an authority in spermology.

spermology (spér-mol'ō-jī), n. 1. Same as spermatology.—2. In bot., that branch of science which investigates the seeds of plants.

spermonucleus (spér-mō-nū'klē-us), n.; pl. spermonuclei (-i). [NL., < L. sperma (see sperm) + nucleus, q. v.] A male pronucleus. See masculonucleus, feminonucleus. Hyatt.

Spermophila (spér-mof'i-lä), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), < Gr. σπέρμα, seed, + φιλέω, love.] 1. In ornith., the little seed-eaters or pygmy finches, an extensive genus of small American fringilline birds, with very short stout bills term, corresponding to ovule for the female egg-cell. The protoplasm of the spermule is called spermioplasm, and the nucleus spermococcus.

spermulum (sper'mi-lum), n.; pl. spermula (-lā). [NL.: see spermule.] A spermule, sperm-cell, or spermatozoön.

sperm-whale (sper'm'hwāl), n. [< sperm² + whale¹.] The spermaceti-whale or cachalot, Physeter (or Catodon) macrocephalus, belonging to the family Physeteridae (which see for technical characters; see also cut of skull under Physeter). It is one of the largest of animals, exceeded in length only by the great or finner, Balenoptera edwardi; it has teeth in the lower jaw, but none and no baleen in the upper; and the enormous square head contains the valuable product spermaceti. This whale is also the source of the best whale-oil, and its chase is a very important industry in the warmer waters of all seas. See cachalot.—Porpoise sperm-whale, a pygmy sperm-whale, or snub-nosed cachalot, of the family Physeteridae and genus Kogia, as K. brevicestris (K. floweri of Gill), of the Pacific and chiefly tropical seas, but sometimes occurring off the coast of the United States.—Sperm-whale porpoise, a bottle-nosed whale of the genus Hyperoodon. It belongs to the same family (Physeteridae) as the sperm-whale, but to a different subfamily. (See Ziphius.) The species are several, not well determined, and with confused synonymy. They are larger than any porpoises properly so called, though far inferior in size to the true sperm-whale.

Sperm-whale (Physeter macrocephalus).

speron, n. [< It. sperone = OF. esperon, F. éperon, a spur, the beak of a ship: see spur.] The beak of a ship.

Which barks are made after the manner of Fusts or Gallots, with a Speron and a couered poepe.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 215.

sperri, v. t. Same as *spari*¹.

sperrabiet, n. An obsolete form of sparable.

sperrylite (sper'i-lit), n. [Named after F. L. Sperry, the discoverer.] A native arsenide of platinum, occurring in minute isometric crystals with pyrite and chalcocopyrite at the Vermilion mine, near Sudbury in Ontario. It has a tin-white color, brilliant metallic luster, and a specific gravity of 10.6. It is the only compound of platinum known to occur in nature.

sperset (spers), v. t. and i. [An aphetic form of disperse, or var. of sparse.] To disperse. Sperser, Visions of Bellay, l. 195.

spertbet, n. A Middle English form of sparth.

spertlet, v. and n. An obsolete form of spurtlet.

spervert, spervyout, n. Same as sparver.

spessartite, spessartine (spes'ār-tīt, -tīn), n. [< Spessart, a mountainous region in Germany, north of the river Main.] A manganesian variety of garnet.

spet, v. and n. An obsolete or dialectal variant of *spit*².

spetch (spech), n. [Assibilated form of *speck*¹.] A piece of skin or hide used in making glue: as, size made from buffalo-spetches.

spetoust, a. See spitoust.

spew (spū), v. [Formerly also spue; < ME. spewen, spuen, spiuwen, < AS. spiuwan (pret. spāw, pp. spiuwen) = OS. spiuwan = OFries. spia = MD. spijen, spouwen, spuiwen, D. spuwen = OHG. spīwan, spīan, MHG. spien, G. speien = Icel. spýja = Sw. Dan. spy = Goth. speiwan, spew, = L. spuere = Gr. πτύειν, Doric πτύπειν (for πτύειν*), spit, = Bulg. plivati, pljuti = Bohem. plíti = Pol. pluc = Russ. plivat = Lith. spiauti = Lett. spļaut (Slav. √ pljū < spljū < spū), spit. Hence ult. *spit*².] I. intrans. 1. To discharge the contents of the stomach; vomit; puke.

Then he gan to spue, and up he threwe

The balsame all agayne.

Robin Hood and the Peddlers (Child's Ballads, V. 248).

2. In gun, to run at the mouth: said of a gun which bends at the chase, or whose muzzle droops, from too quick firing.

II. trans. 1. To vomit; puke up or out; eject from or as if from the stomach.

So then because thou art lukewarm . . . I will spue thee out of my mouth.

2. To eject as if by retching or heaving; send or cast forth from within; drive by internal force or effort: often used figuratively.

That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you.

Lev. xviii. 28.

To live, for me, Jane, is to stand on a crater-crust which may crack and spew fire any day.

Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xx.

To spew oakum, said of the seams of a ship when the oakum starts out from between the planks.

spewer (spū'ēr), n. [< spew + -er¹.] One who or that which spews.

spewiness (spū'i-nes), n. The state of being spewy, moist, or damp.

The coldness and spewiness of the soil.

Bp. Gauden, Hieraspistes (1653), p. 561. (Latham.)

spewing (spū'ing), a. Same as spewy.

The soil [in New England] for the general is a warm kind of Earth, there being little cold spewing Land.

S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 29.

[See also the quotation under emuscation.]

spewy (spū'i), a. [< spew + -y¹.] Wet; boggy; moist; damp.

The lower valleys in wet winters are so spewy that they know not how to feed them.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

Speyside pine. See *pine*¹.

sp. gr. An abbreviation of specific gravity.

sphacel (sfas'el), n. [< NL. sphacelus, q. v.] Same as sphacelus.

sphacela (sfas'e-lā), n.; pl. sphacelæ (-lā). [< Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene.] In bot., in certain algæ, a hollow chamber of considerable size which is developed from the apical cell of each branch. When young it is filled with dark mucilaginous contents, which at a later stage become watery. The term is sometimes used as nearly or quite the equivalent of propagulum. Also sphacela.

Sphacelaria (sfas-e-lā'ri-ā), n. [NL., so called in allusion to the tips of the branches, which are black and shriveled when dried; < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene.] A genus of algæ, typical of the family Sphacelariaceæ. They have olive-brown, branching, filamentous fronds, with corticating cells wanting or confined to the base of the frond. The axis and branches are terminated by a large apical cell, from which, by transverse, longitudinal, and oblique divisions, a solid frond is formed whose external surface is composed of rectangular cells arranged in regular transverse bands. The unilocular and plurilocular sporangia are spherical or ellipsoidal, borne on short pedicels; reproduction is non-sexual, by means of propagula. The species are variable, and difficult of determination. There are two species along the New England coast.

Sphacelariaceæ (sfas-e-lā'ri-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphacelaria + -aceæ.] A family of algæ, typified by the genus Sphacelaria. They are olive-brown seaweeds with branching polysiphonous fronds, the branches of which terminate in a peculiar large apical cell. Also Sphacelariæ.

sphacelate (sfas'e-lāt), a. [< sphacellus + -ate¹.] 1. In pathol., dead; necrosed.—2. In bot., decayed, withered, or dead.

sphacelated (sfas'e-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. sphacelated, ppr. sphacelating. [< sphacellus + -ate².] I. intrans. To become necrosed.

II. trans. To affect with sphacellus or necrosis.

The floor of the existing wound was of course formed by sphacelated hepatic tissue.

Lancet, 1890, II. 425.

sphacelated (sfas'e-lā-ted), a. [< sphacelate + -ed².] Same as sphacelate.

sphacelation (sfas-e-lā'shōn), n. [< sphacelate + -ion.] Necrosis; the process of becoming or making gangrenous; mortification.

sphacela (sfas'el), n. [< NL. sphacela.] In bot., same as sphacela.

Sphacelia (sfā-sē'li-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene.] A former genus of fungi, now known to be the conidial stage or form of Claviceps, the ergot. It constitutes the first stage of the ergot, and consists of a growth of mycelium destroying and replacing the ovary of the host, taking approximately the form of the latter. It produces conidial spores upon the tips of basidia which radiate from the surface of the hyphal mass. See ergot, 2. Also Sphacelium.

sphacellism (sfas'e-lizm), n. [< sphacell(us) + -ism.] Same as sphacellism.

sphacellismus (sfas-e-lis'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφάκελισμός, gangrene, < σφάκελιζειν, be gangrened or blighted, < σφάκελος, gangrene: see sphacellus.] Necrosis.

Sphacellium (sfā-sē'li-um), n. [NL.: see Sphacelia.] Same as Sphacelia.

Sphaceloma (sfas-e-lō'mā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene: see sphacellus.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, containing the very destructive species (S. Ampelinum) known as anthracnose. It first appears on the shoots, leaves, and berries of grape-vines as minute brown spots which are a little depressed in the middle and have a slightly raised darker-colored rim. These spots soon increase in size and elongate longitudinally. On the fruit the spots retain a more or less regularly rounded outline, and have a well-defined band of bright vermilion between the dark border and the central portion. Finally, under the action of the disease, the berries dry up, leaving nothing, apparently, but the skin and seeds. Washing the vines with a strong solution of sulphate of iron before the appearance of the leaves has been found effective in destroying or checking the disease. See anthracnose.

sphacellus (sfas'e-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφάκελος, gangrene, mortification, caries, also a spasm, convulsion.] 1. Necrosis.—2. A necrosed mass of tissue.

Sphæralcea (sfē-rāl'sē-ā), n. [NL. (St. Hilaire, 1824), so called from the fruit, a round head of carpels; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + ἀκτα, a plant, Malva Alcea, related to the plant here defined.] A genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Malvaceæ, tribe Malvæ, and subtribe Abutilæ. It is characterized by flowers each with three bractlets, and fruit of numerous two-valved carpels naked within, each containing two or three reniform seeds. There are about 25 species, natives of warmer parts of America, with 4 at the Cape of Good Hope. They are herbs or shrubs, in habit resembling the genus Malva. They usually bear angled or lobed leaves, and short-pediced violet or reddish flowers single or clustered in the axils or forming a raceme or spike. They are known as globe mallow, and several species are in cultivation for ornament under glass. They possess marked demulcent properties, especially S. ciliatissima, a decoction of which is used as a remedy in Brazil, and as a substitute for marsh-mallows.

Sphæranthus (sfē-ran'thus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), so called from the clustered heads of flowers; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + άνθος, flower.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Compositæ, tribe Inuloidæ, and subtribe Pluchineæ. It is characterized by flowers without pappus, the central ones bisexual, fertile or sterile, tubular and four-to five-cleft, the outer female and fertile, filiform and minutely two- to three-toothed, and by the aggregation of the small flower-heads into a dense solitary terminal spherical or ovoid glomerula. There are about 10 species, natives of the tropics of Asia, Africa, and Australia. They are erect villous or glutinous herbs, with divaricate branches terminated by the pink flower-clusters. The leaves are alternate, toothed, and decurrent on the stem. S. hirtus is known as the East Indian globe-thistle; S. mollis is a common Indian weed of dry cultivated land, clothed everywhere with soft glandular hairs which give off a powerful honey-like odor.

sphæraphides (sfē-raf'i-dēz), n. pl. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + ραφίς, a needle.] In bot., the more or less spherical masses of crystals or raphides occurring in the cells of many plants. Also called sphere-crystals.

sphæret, n. An obsolete form of sphere.

sphærenchyma (sfē-reng'ki-mā), n. [NL., irreg. < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + ἐνχυμα, an infusion: see parenchyma.] Spherical or spheroidal cellular tissue, such as is found in the pulp of fruits: a modification of parenchyma. Treas. of Bot.

Sphæria (sfē'ri-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball: see sphere.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, giving name to the family Sphæriaceæ. The perithecia are black, carbonaceous or membranaceous, pierced at the apex, usually superficial or erumpent. The species are very numerous, among them being S. morbosa, the destructive black-knot of plum- and cherry-trees. See black-knot, 2.

Sphæriaceæ (sfē-ri-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fries, 1825), < Sphæria + -aceæ.] A family of pyrenomycetous fungi, typified by the genus Sphæria.

Sphæriacel (sfē-ri-ā'sē-i), n. pl. [NL., < Sphæria + -acel.] Same as Sphæriaceæ.

sphæriaceous (sfē-ri-ā'shius), a. [< Sphæria + -aceous.] In bot., resembling or belonging to the genus Sphæria or the Sphæriaceæ.

sphæridia, n. Plural of sphæridium, 1.

sphæridial (sfē-rid'i-āl), a. [< sphæridium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the sphæridia of a sea-urchin.

Sphæridiidae (sfē-ri-di'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphæridium + -idae.] The Sphæridiinae as a family of palpicorn coleopterous insects. Also Sphæridiadeæ, Sphæridiida, Sphæridides, Sphæridites, Sphæridiota, Sphæridites.

Sphæridiinae (sfē-rid-i'i-nē), n. pl. [NL. (Le Conte, 1833, as Sphæridiini), < Sphæridium + -inae.] A subfamily of the water-beetle family Hydrophilidae, remarkable from the fact that its forms are all terrestrial. They are small, oval, convex, or hemispherical beetles which live in the excrement of herbivorous mammals. They are usually black in color, with the elytra frequently spotted or margined with yellow. They are divided into six genera, of which five are represented in the United States. See Sphæridium, 2.

sphæridium (sfē-rid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖριον, dim. of σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] 1. Pl. sphæridia (-i). In echinoderms, one of the numerous minute spheroidal bodies, rarely more than one hundredth of an inch long, which are found in nearly all sea-urchins upon the ambulacral plates, especially those nearest the mouth. Each contains a dense glassy calcareous skeleton, and is articulated by a short pedicel, like a spine, to one of the tubercles. The sphæridia are supposed to be olfactory or auditory sense-organs.

In some genera, these sphæridia, to which Loven ascribes a sensory function (probably auditory), are sunk in fossae of the plate to which they are attached.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 490.

2. [cap.] [NL. (Fabricius, 1795).] The typical genus of the Sphæridiinae, comprising mainly African species distinguished by the elongate scutellum and the visible pygidium. S. scarabaeoides is an example.

Sphaeriidae (sfē-rī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerium + -idae.] A family of fresh-water bivalve mollusks, typified by the genus Sphaerium, formerly called Cycladidae, and now generally united with the typical Cyrenidae under the latter name.

sphaeristerium (sfē-ris-tē-rī-um), n.; pl. sphaeristeria (-ā). [L. sphaeristerium, < Gr. σφαίριον, a place for playing ball, < σφαίριον, play at ball, < σφαίρα, a ball; see sphere.] In class. antiq., any place or structure for the exercise of ball-playing; a tennis-court.

sphaerite (sfē'rit), n. [L. < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, sphere, + -ite.] A hydrous phosphate of aluminium, allied to wavelite in structure and composition.

Sphaerium (sfē'ri-um), n. [NL. (Scopoli, 1777), < Gr. σφαίριον, dim. of σφαίρα, a ball.] The typical genus of the Sphaeriidae, or a genus of the family Cyrenidae, for a long time generally known as Cyclas. It contains many small clam-like fresh-water shells.

Sphaerobacteria (sfē'ro-bak-tē'ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφαίρα, a sphere, + NL. bacterium, q. v.] In Cohn's system of classification, a tribe of schizomycetes or bacteria, with spherical cells, as in the genus Micrococcus. See Micrococcus.

Sphaerococcaceae (sfē'ro-ko-kā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerococcus + -aceae.] The same or nearly the same as the Sphaerococcoidae.

Sphaerococcoidae (sfē'ro-ko-koi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerococcus + -oidae.] An order or suborder of florideous algae, named from the genus Sphaerococcus. The fronds are cylindrical or membranaceous, often of very delicate substance. The antheridia form superficial patches, or are occasionally contained in sunken cavities.

Sphaerococcus (sfē'ro-kok'us), n. [NL. (Stackhouse), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + κόκκος, a berry.] A genus of florideous algae, giving name to the order Sphaerococcoidae. There are no American species.

Sphaerodactylus (sfē'ro-dak'ti-lus), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + δάκτυλος, finger.] A genus of American gecko lizards, having toes ending in small circular sucking-disks, by means of which they adhere to perpendicular surfaces. There are large carinate scales on the back, and small smooth hexagonal ones on the belly. S. notatus is one of the smallest of lizards, about 2 inches long, found in Florida and Cuba; it is notable as the only gecko of the United States. Also Sphaerodactylus.

Sphaerogaster (sfē'ro-gas'tēr), n. [NL. (Zetterstedt, 1842), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + γαστήρ, belly.] A genus of dipterous insects, of the family Acroceridae, containing one species, S. arcticus, a minute shining-black fly, which occurs from the northernmost point of Lapland to northern Sweden.

Sphaerogastra (sfē'ro-gas'trā), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + γαστήρ, belly.] A division of arachnidans, containing those whose abdomen is more or less spheroidal or globose, as the spiders: contrasted with Arthrogastra. See cut under spider.

sphaeroid, n. See spheroid.

Sphaeroma (sfē-rō'mā), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1802), < Gr. σφαίρωμα, anything made round or globular, < σφαίρειν, make round or globular, < σφαίρα, a ball, sphere; see sphere.] The typical genus of Sphaeromidae, so called from their habit of rolling themselves up in a ball when disturbed, like some of the Oniscidae. They are known as globe-slaters. Also Sphaeroma. Leach.

sphaeromere, n. See spheromere.

sphaeromian, a. and n. See spheromian.

Sphaeromidae (sfē-rom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaeroma + -idae.] A family of isopod crustaceans, typified by the genus Sphaeroma; the globe-slaters. Also Sphaeromatidae.

sphaerosiderite, n. See sphaerosiderite.

sphaerospore, n. Same as sphaerospore.

sphaerostilbite (sfē-rō-stil'bīt), n. [L. < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + Ε. stilbite.] A variety of stilbite.

Sphaerotheca (sfē-rō-thē'kā), n. [NL. (Léveillé, 1851), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + θήκη, a case.] A genus of pyrenomycetous fungi, belonging to the family Erysiphaceae, characterized by a peritheciium which contains only a single ascus. The appendages are simple threads not unlike the mycelium with which they are frequently interwoven. The ascus is usually suborbicular in shape, and generally contains eight spores. S. humuli, called the hop-mildew, is destructive to the hop-vine; S. pannosa is injurious to rose-bushes; and S. mors-vivae is the common gooseberry-mildew. See hop-mildew.

sphaerotherian (sfē-rō-thē'ri-an), a. and n. [L. < Sphaerotherium + -an.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the genus Sphaerotherium.

2. n. A milleped of the genus Sphaerotherium or family Sphaerotheriidae.

Sphaerotheriidae (sfē'ro-thē-ri'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerotherium + -idae.] A family of chilognath myriapods, typified by the genus Sphaerotherium, having aggregated eyes and lateral antennae. Also called Zephroniidae.

Sphaerotherium (sfē-rō-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., (Brandt, 1841), < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A genus of chilognath myriapods, of the family Glomeridae, and giving name to the Sphaerotheriidae. S. elongatum is an example. Also called Zephronia.

sphaerozoa, n. Plural of sphaerozoön.

sphaerozoid (sfē-rō-zō'id), a. and n. 1. a. Of or pertaining to the Sphaerozoidea.

2. n. A sphaerozoön, or member of the Sphaerozoidea.

Sphaerozoidae (sfē-rō-zō'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphaerozoon + -idae.] A family of spumellarians, or compound radiolarians, typified by the genus Sphaerozoon, with a skeleton composed of numerous detached spicules scattered round the social central capsules, or embedded in their common gelatinous body.

sphaerozoön (sfē-rō-zō'on), n.; pl. sphaerozoa (-ā). [NL.: see Sphaerozoon.] An individual or species of the genus Sphaerozoon or family Sphaerozoidea.

Sphaerozoon (sfē-rō-zō'um), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαίρα, a ball, + ζῷον, an animal.] A genus of compound radiolarians, typical of the family Sphaerozoidea, the protoplasm of which contains colored cellaeform bodies, and gives rise to a network of spicules forming a loose detached skeleton. S. ovodimare is an example. A second species is S. punctatum. See also cut under spicule.

Sphaerozoon ovodimare, magnified.

sphaerule, sphaerulite, etc. See spherule, etc.

Sphagnaceae (sfag-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bridel, 1826), < Sphagnum + -aceae.] A monotypic order of mosses; the peat-mosses. They are soft and flaccid caulescent plants, generally of large size, growing in more or less compact tufts or patches on the surface of bogs, or floating in stagnant water, more rarely on the borders of mountain rivulets. They are whitish, yellowish, or sometimes red or olive-colored, and are perennial by the annual prolongation of the stems or by simple innovations at the apex. The branches are generally spreading, in lateral fascicles of from two to seven, rarely more, those at the summit of the stem capitate. The leaves are nerveless, translucent, formed of a single layer of two kinds of cells. The inflorescence is monocious or dioecious; the male organs (antheridia) are borne upon clavate catkin-like branches, solitary at the side of each leaf, globose or ovoid, pedicellate; the female organs (archegonia) are generally three or four terminating a short branch, only one perfecting fruit and forming a capsule. The capsule is globose, operculate with a convex or nearly flat lid, the orifice naked; the spores are of two kinds. See cut under Sphagnum.

Sphagnei (sfag-nē-i), n. pl. [NL., < L. sphagnos, < Gr. σάγνος, a kind of moss.] Same as Sphagnaceae.

sphagnicolous (sfag-nik'ō-lus), a. [L. < NL. Sphagnum + L. colere, inhabit.] In bot. and zool., growing or living upon or among mosses of the genus Sphagnum.

sphagnologist (sfag-nol'ō-jist), n. [L. < sphagnology + -ist.] In bot., a student of the Sphagnaceae; one who is an authority on, or interested in the study of, the Sphagnaceae. Jour. Roy. Micros. Soc., 2d ser., VI. 108.

sphagnology (sfag-nol'ō-jī), n. [L. < NL. Sphagnum + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The special study of the Sphagnaceae.

sphagnous (sfag'nus), a. [L. < NL. Sphagnum + -ous.] In bot., pertaining to bog-mosses or peat-mosses; abounding in bog- or peat-mosses. See Sphagnum.

Sphagnum (sfag'nūm), n. [NL. (Dillenius, 1741), < Gr. σάγνος, also σάκος, and φάκος, φάκων, a kind of moss.] 1. A genus of mosses, the peat- or bog-mosses, the only representative of the order Sphagnaceae. For characters, see Sphagnaceae.

The plants of this genus are widely diffused over the temperate parts of the globe, and enter largely into the composition of peat. There are about 25 North American species and many varieties or forms, about the validity of which the best authorities differ widely. The most divergent forms may be distinguished by well-marked characters, but these seem to merge into one another by a complete series of connecting links. See peat, peat-moss, Bryaceae.

2. [l. c.] A mass or quantity of moss of this genus: often used attributively: as, sphagnum moss; a sphagnum bog.

Sphagolobus (sfā-gol'ō-bus), n. [NL. (Cabanis, 1860), < Gr. σφαγή, the throat, + λόβος, lobe.] A genus of hornbills, of the family Bucerotidae, characterized by the peculiar form of the casque and by the curly crest. The a, Fertile plant of Sphagnum cuspidatum, var. plumosum; b, the capsule of Sphagnum subsecundum; c, the antheridium of Sphagnum subsecundum; d, cells of the leaf of Sphagnum cymbifolium.

Sphagolobus atratus.

only species is S. atratus of western Africa, of a blackish color with the tail dark-green and broadly tipped with white.

sphalerite (sfal'e-rit), n. [L. < Gr. σφαλερός, slippery, uncertain (< σάλλειν, cause to fall, throw down, trip: see fall, fail), + -ite: so named because often confounded with more useful ores.] The native zinc sulphide more familiarly known as zinc-blende. See blende.

sphalerocarpium (sfal'e-rō-kār'pi-um), n.; pl. sphalerocarpia (-ā). [NL., < Gr. σφαλερός, slippery, uncertain (see sphalerite), + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., a name proposed for an accessory fruit, as that of Shepherdia, in which the achene is invested by a persistent succulent calyx, which assumes the appearance of a berry.

Sphargididae (sfār-jid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1839), < Sphargis (Sphargid-) + -idae.] A family of chelonians, typified by the genus Sphargis, having a soft, thick, coriaceous carapace not consolidated by the bones, and clawless feet forming mere paddles; the soft-shelled turtles. Only one species is known, the luth, or leather-back turtle, which reaches a gigantic size. Preferably to be called Dermochelyidae. Also Sphargidae, Sphargidina, Sphargidoidea. See cut under leatherback.

Sphargis (sfār'jis), n. [NL. (Merrem, 1820).] The typical genus of Sphargididae. The species is S. coriacea, the soft-shelled or leather-backed turtle, or trunk-turtle. An earlier and unexceptionable name, and therefore the onym of this genus, is Dermochelya. See cut under leatherback.

Sphecia (sfē'shi-ā), n. [NL. (Hübner, 1816), < Gr. σφήξ (σφήκ-), a wasp.] A genus of lepidopterous insects, of the family Egeriidae, having the abdomen moderate and no anal tuft; the hornet-moths. Two European species are the hornet-moth (S. apiformis) and the lunar hornet-moth (S. bembeciformis). See Sesia.

Sphécidae (sfes'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., also erroneously Sphégidae, < Sphex (Sphéc-) + -idae.] A family of fossorial hymenopterous insects, typified by the genus Sphex: same as Sphégidae.

Sphecius (sfē'shi-us), n. [NL. (Dahlbom, 1843), < Gr. σφήξ (σφήκ-), a wasp.] A notable genus of digger-wasps, of the family Bembecidae, having the middle tibiae armed with two spurs at the apex, and the marginal cell of the fore wings lanceolate. The species are of large size and bright colors. S. speciosus is one of the largest of the Sphecus speciosus, natural size.

North American solitary wasps, and digs large cylindrical burrows which it stores with stung cicadas, particularly with the dog-day harvest-fly (Cicada tibicen).

Sphecotheres (sfē-kō-thē-rēs), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816, also Sphecothera and Sphecothera), < Gr. σφίς (σφικ-), a wasp, + θήρ, hunt, chase.] One of two leading genera of passerine birds, of the family Oriolidae, having the lores and circumocular region naked. There are 4 species, ranging in Australia, New Guinea, Timor, and the Kel Islands. The Australian is S. macularia; the Papuan is S. leucodora; S. flaviventris inhabits the Kel Islands and parts of Australia; while S. viridis is found in Timor and Semaio. Also called Picnorhamphus.

Sphegidæ (sfēj'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Westwood, 1840), irreg. < Sphex (Sphex-) + -idæ.] A family of fossorial hymenoptera, or digger-wasps.

The prothorax is narrowed anteriorly, and forms a sort of neck; the basal segment of the abdomen is narrowed into a long, smooth, round petiole; and the head and thorax are usually clothed with a long, thin pubescence. These wasps usually burrow into sand-banks, and provision their cells with caterpillars and spiders. Eighteen genera and about three hundred species are known. Also Sphecidæ. See sand-wasp, and cuts under digger-wasp, Ammophila, mud-dauber, and Pelopæus.

Sphegæus, n. See Sphegæus.

sphenone (sfen'ō-nē), n. [< Gr. σφενόνη, a sling, a head-band, a hoop, etc.] In Gr. archæol.: (a) A form of head-band or fillet worn by women to confine the hair around and on the top of the head. It is characteristically broad in front and narrow behind, being thus opposite in its arrangement to the opisthosphenone. (b) An elliptical or semi-elliptical area, or any place of kindred form, as the auditorium of a theater; that end of a stadium which was curved or rounded.

The Messenian stadium, which is surrounded by colonnades, has 16 rows of seats in the sphenone.

C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 290.

sphene (sfēn), n. [< F. sphène, in allusion to the wedge shape of the crystals, < Gr. σφην, a wedge.] The mineral titanite. The transparent green, greenish-yellow, or yellow varieties frequently exhibit a play of colors as brilliant as that of the yellow or green diamond, showing a strong refractive and dispersive power on light. It is quite soft, the hardness being only 5.5. See titanite.

sphenethmoid (sfē-neth'moid), a. and n. [< sphen(oid) + ethmoid.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the ethmoid bone; sphenethmoidal; ethmosphenoid: as, the sphenethmoid suture or articulation.—2. Representing or combining characters of both sphenoid and ethmoid: as, the sphenethmoid bone.

II. n. The sphenethmoid bone, as of the frog's skull: one of the cranial bones, situated in front of the parasphenoid. See girdle-bone, and cuts under *Anura*² and Rana.

Also spheno-ethmoid.

sphenethmoidal (sfē-neth-moi'dal), a. [< sphenethmoid + -al.] Same as sphenethmoid.—sphenethmoidal nerve, a branch of the nasal nerve described by Luschka as passing through the posterior internal orbital canal to the mucous membrane of the posterior ethmoidal cells and the sphenoidal sinus. Called by Krause the posterior ethmoidal nerve.

sphenic (sfē'nik), a. [< Gr. σφην, a wedge, + -ic.] Wedge-like.—sphenic number, a number having three unequal factors.

sphenion (sfē'ni-on), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge.] The apex of the sphenoidal angle of the parietal bone, on the surface of the skull: so called by Von Török. See craniometry.

spheniscan (sfē-nis'kan), n. [< Spheniscus + -an.] A penguin or spheniscomorph; especially, a jackass-penguin of the restricted genus Spheniscus. See cut under Spheniscus.

Spheniscidæ (sfē-nis'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spheniscus + -idæ.] The penguins as a family of squamipennate or brevipennate palmiped natatorial birds, of the order Pygopodes; the only family of Spheniscomorphæ, Squamipennes, Impennes, or Philepteri, so strongly marked that it is regarded as representing a superfamily, order, or even superorder, though formerly included in the Alcidæ, or auk family. The wings are reduced to flippers, like a seal's or turtle's. They hang by the side, and cannot be closed like those of other birds; in swimming under water they are flapped alternately with a peculiar motion suggesting that of the blades of a screw propeller. They are covered with small scaly feathers in which no remiges can be distinguished, and their bones are peculiarly flat, and not hollow. The feet are four-toed and webbed, with very short broad tarsal, the bones of which are more separate than the metatarsals of any other birds. In walking or standing the whole tarsus rests on the ground, so that the birds are plantigrade; and in swimming under water the feet act mainly as rudders. The beak varies in form in different genera. The plumage is uniformly implanted in the skin, without any apteria; and there is a highly developed system of subcutaneous muscles, contributing to the sinuous movements of the birds under water, suggestive of those of the duck-mole. The feathers of the upper parts and wings are scaly, with thick, flattened shafts and slight webbing. The Spheniscidæ are confined to the southern hemisphere, and abound in cold temperate and antarctic waters, especially about the southern end of Africa and South America, where they live in communities, often of great extent. There are about 14 species, one of which reaches Brazil and another Peru. The generic forms are Aptenodytes, the king-penguin, of great size, with slender bill; Pygoscelis, a similar but long-tailed type; Diasturhamphus, with extensively feathered bill; Eudyptula, of very small size; Eudyptes (or Calarractes), the rock-hoppers, which are crested, and hop instead of waddling; and Spheniscus, the jackass-penguins. There is a fossil penguin, Palæudyptes antarcticus, from the Tertiary of the west coast of Nelson Island, which was a giant, 6 or 7 feet tall. Aptenodytes is a synonym. See the generic names, Spheniscomorphæ, and cuts under Eudyptes, metatarsus, *penguin*¹, Pygoscelis, Spheniscus, and Squamipennes.

Spheniscinæ (sfē-ni-si'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spheniscus + -inæ.] The penguins: (a) as a subfamily of Alcidæ; (b) as the only subfamily of Spheniscidæ.

spheniscine (sfē-nis'in), a. [< Spheniscus + -inæ.] Of or pertaining to the Spheniscidæ; spheniscomorphic.

spheniscoid (sfē-nis'koid), a. [< Spheniscus + -oid.] Same as spheniscomorphic.

spheniscomorph (sfē-nis'kō-mōrf), n. A penguin as a member of the Spheniscomorphæ.

Spheniscomorphæ (sfē-nis'kō-mōrf'fē), n. pl. [NL. (Huxley, 1867), < Spheniscus + Gr. μορφή, form.] The penguins as a group of schizognathous carinate birds, represented by the single family Spheniscidæ. See Spheniscidæ.

spheniscomorphic (sfē-nis'kō-mōrf'fik), a. [< Spheniscomorphæ + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Spheniscomorphæ. Also spheniscoid.

Spheniscus (sfē-nis'kus), n. [NL. (Brisson, 1760), < Gr. σφινιακος, dim. of σφην, a wedge.] 1. In ornith., a genus of penguins, of the family Spheniscidæ, having a stout, compressed beak hooked at the end, and no crest; the jackass-penguins. There are several species, of medium size. S. demersus is found off the Cape of Good Hope. It is bluish-gray or slate-colored above, white below, with a dark mask and single collar cut off by a white band from the other colored parts, the collar extending as a stripe along the sides of the body. The Magellanic penguin, S. magellanicus, of South America, is similar, but has a double collar. S. humboldti is another, inhabiting the coast of Peru. S. minor is a very small species, only about 12 inches long, now placed in another genus, Eudyptula.

2. In entom., a genus of heteromerous coleopterous insects, of the family Tenebrionidae. Kirby, 1817.—3. [l. c.] In math., a sphenic number.

sphenobasilar (sfē-nō-bas'i-lār), a. [< sphenoid + basilar.] Of or pertaining to the basisphenoid and the basioccipital or basilar process of the occipital bone; basilar, as the suture between these bones. See cuts under craniofacial, skull, and sphenoid.

sphenoccipital (sfē-nōk-sip'i-tal), a. [< sphenoid + occipital.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the occipital bone; occipitosphenoid; sphenobasilar.

Sphenocercus (sfē-nō-sēr'kus), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + κέρκος, a tail.] A genus of fruit-pigeons or Treroninae, having the tail cuneate. Several species inhabit parts of Asia, Japan, and the East Indies, as S. sphenurus of the Himalayan region, S. sieboldi of Japan, S. korthalsi of Sumatra, S. apicauda of Nepal, S. oxyurus of Java and Borneo, S. formosæ of Formosa. The genus is also called Sphenurus, Sphenoceras, and Sphenoteron.

Wedge-tailed Pigeon (Sphenocercus sphenurus).

Sphenodon (sfē-nō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + δόρυς (dōr-ys) = E. tooth.] 1. In mammal., a genus of extinct megatherioid edentates, or fossil sloths, remains of which occur in the bone-caves of South America. Lund, 1839.—2. In herpet.: (a) A genus of extant rhynchocephalous lizards of New Zealand. S. punctatus is known as the tuatara. The name is synonymous with Hatteria. (b) [l. c.] A lizard of this genus. They resemble ordinary lizards externally, but have internal characters representative of an order (Rhynchocephalia). They are now restricted to certain localities in New Zealand, and live chiefly in holes in the sand or about stones on certain rocky islets, though they were formerly abundant in other places. They have been thinned out, it is said, chiefly by hogs. Three species are described. See cut under Hatteria.

sphenodont (sfē-nō-dont), a. and n. [< Sphenodon (t-).] 1. a. Having the character of a sphenodon; of or pertaining to the Sphenodontidæ or Hatteriidæ.

II. n. A sphenodont lizard.

Sphenodontidæ (sfē-nō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphenodon (t-) + -idæ.] A family of rhynchocephalous reptiles, named from the genus Sphenodon: same as Hatteriidæ.

sphenodontoid (sfē-nō-don'toid), a. and n. [< Sphenodon (t-) + -oid.] Same as sphenodont.

Sphenæacus (sfē-nē-ā'kus), n. [NL. (Strickland, 1841), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + αἶξ (iax-), a rudder.] A genus of aberrant reed-warblers, of uncertain systematic position. It is remarkable in having only ten tail-feathers, which are stiffened with spiny shafts, and whose webs are lax and decomposed. There are no rictal bristles (as in the related emu-wren: see cut under Stipiturus). There are 6 species, of South Africa, New Zealand, and the Chatham Islands, as S. africanus, S. punctatus of New Zealand, and S. rufescens of the Chathams. Also Sphenæacus and Sphenura.

Sphenænas (sfē-nē'nas), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + οἶνός, a wild pigeon of the color of ripening grapes, < οἶνός, οἶνός, the vine: see wine.] Same as Sphenocercus.

spheno-ethmoid (sfē-nō-eth'moid), a. and n. Same as sphenethmoid.

spheno-ethmoidal (sfē' nō-eth-moi'dal), a. Same as sphenethmoidal.

sphenofrontal (sfē-nō-fron'tal), a. [< sphenoid + frontal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the frontal bone; frontosphenoid.—sphenofrontal suture or articulation, in man, a long horizontal suture between the orbital plates of the frontal bone and the orbitosphenoids, and between the external angular processes of the frontal and the alisphenoids.

sphenogram (sfē-nō-gram), n. [< Gr. σφην, a wedge, + γραμμα, a writing, < γράφειν, write.] A cuneiform or arrow-headed character.

sphenographer (sfē-nōg'ra-fēr), n. [< sphenograph-y + -er.] One versed in sphenography. [Little used.]

sphenographic (sfē-nō-graf'ik), a. [< sphenograph-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to sphenography.

sphenographist (sfē-nog'ra-fist), n. [< sphenograph-y + -ist.] Same as sphenographer.

sphenography (sfē-nog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. σφην, a wedge, + -γραφία, < γραφειν, write.] The study and description of cuneiform writings. [Rare.]

sphenoid (sfē'noid), a. and n. [< Gr. σφηνοειδής, wedge-shaped, < σφην, a wedge, + εἶδος, form.] 1. a. Wedge-shaped; wedge-like; specifically, in anat., noting certain cranial bones. See II., 2.—Minimum sphenoid diameter, the least transverse diameter of the skull, measured between the temporal fossae.

II. n. 1. In crystal., a wedge-shaped crystalline form contained under four equal isosceles triangles. It is the hemihedral form of the square pyramid of the tetragonal system.—2. In anat., a large and important compound bone of the skull: so called from its shape and connections in man. The cranial articulations are with the occipital, temporal, parietal, frontal, and ethmoid; the facial, with the vomer, malar, palate, and sometimes the superior maxillary. It has a solid median and inferior body, and bears on each side two pairs of wings, greater and lesser, separated by the sphenoidal fissure from each other. It is a collection of bones, not a single bone, its composition including: a., alisphenoid, or greater wing, the lower letter a pointing to its continuation as the external pterygoid process; b., basisphenoid, or main body of the bone, b pointing to the sphenoccipital articulation; c., post-clinooid processes, bounding the pituitary fossa or sella Turcica behind; d., presphenoid, or fore part of the body of the bone; e., orbitosphenoid, or lesser wing; f., internal pterygoid process; 1, optic foramen; 2, sphenoidal fissure, or foramen lacerum anterius; 3, foramen rotundum; 4, foramen ovale; 5, groove for internal carotid artery, or cavernous groove.

In man and the mammals generally, (a) a basisphenoid, the principal posterior part of the body of the bone, bearing (b) the alisphenoids, the pair of greater wings, these elements forming with the parietal bones the second or parietal segment of the cranium; (c) the presphenoid, the lesser anterior moiety of the body of the bone, bearing (d) the orbitosphenoids, the pair of lesser wings, or processes of Ingrassias, these forming with the frontal bones the third or frontal cranial segment; (e) a pair of pterygoid bones, the so-called internal pterygoid processes; (f) a pair of spongy bones, the sphenoturbinals. The development of the human sphenoid is from 14 centers of ossification, 8 in the postsphenoid division, and 6 in the presphenoid division. Below mammals, in Sauropsida (birds and reptiles), the sphenoid is simplified by subtraction of the pterygoids, which then form permanently distinct bones, and complicated by the addition of other elements, especially an underlying membrane-bone called the parasphenoid. In Ichthyopsida (amphibians and fishes) further and very great modifications occur. To the sphenoid of man are attached twelve pairs of muscles.

sphenoidal (sfē-noi'dal), a. [< sphenoid + -al.] Same as sphenoid.—Sphenoidal angle. See craniometry.—Sphenoidal crest, the median thin ridge projecting from the anterior surface of the sphenoid bone to articulate with the perpendicular plate of the ethmoid. Also called ethmoidal crest.—Sphenoidal fissure. See fissure.—Sphenoidal fontanelle, the membranous interspace in the infant skull at the junction of the squamous suture with the coronal suture. It often contains a Wormian bone.—Sphenoidal hemihedrism. See hemihedrism.—Sphenoidal process. See process.—Sphenoidal rostrum. (a) The beak, or a beak-like part, of the sphenoid bone. In man it is a vertical ridge upon which the vomer rides, forming the sphenovomerine suture or schindylesis. (b) In birds, a rostrate part of the skull which appears to be chiefly, if not entirely, developed from the parasphenoid.—Sphenoidal septum. See septum sphenoidale, under septum.—Sphenoidal sinuses. See sinus.—Sphenoidal spongy bones, the sphenoturbinals.

sphenoides (sfē-noi'dēz), n. [NL., < Gr. σφηνοειδής, wedge-shaped: see sphenoid.] 1. In anat., the sphenoid bone: more fully called os sphenoides.—2. [cap.] A genus of cœlenterates.

sphenoidium (sfē-noi'dē-um), n.; pl. sphenoides (-ē). [NL.: see sphenoid.] The sphenoid bone, or os sphenoidium.

sphenoido-auricular (sfē-noi'dō-ā-rik'ū-lār), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoidal diameter of the skull to the minimum auricular diameter: as, the sphenoido-auricular index.

sphenoidofrontal (sfē-noi'dō-fron'tal), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoidal diameter of the skull to the minimum frontal diameter.

sphenoidoparietal (sfē-noi'dō-pā-rī'e-tal), a. In craniom., noting the ratio of the minimum sphenoidal diameter of the skull to the maximum parietal diameter.

sphenomalar (sfē-nō-mā'lār), a. [< sphenoid + malar.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and malar bones: as, the sphenomalar articulation, between the alisphenoid and malar bones.—Sphenomalar suture. See suture.

sphenomaxillary (sfē-nō-mak'si-lār-i), a. [< sphenoid + maxillary.] Relating to the sphenoid and superior maxillary bones.—Sphenomaxillary fissure, fossa, suture, etc. See the nouns.

Sphenomonadidae (sfē'nō-mō-nad'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphenomonas (-monad-) + -idae.] A family of dimastigote eustomatous infusorians, represented by the genus Sphenomonas. These animalcules are free-swimming; the cuticular surface is indurated; flagella are two in number, one long and one short, both vibratile and extended anteriorly; the oral aperture is succeeded by a distinct tubular pharynx; the endoplasm is colorless, granular; an endoplast and contractile vesicle are conspicuous.

Sphenomonas (sfē-nom'ō-nas), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + μονάς, solitary, a unit: see monad.] The representative genus of Sphenomonadidae. These animalcules are of persistent polyhedral prismatic figure, with four or more longitudinal carinae, and two vibratile flagella, a long and a short one. Two fresh-water species are S. quadrangularis and S. octocostatus.

sphenonchus (sfē-nong'kus), n.; pl. sphenonchi (-ki). [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + ὄγκος, bulk, mass.] In ichth.: (a) One of the hooked dermal spines of the cephalic armature of certain fossil fishes, as of the genera Hybodus and Acrodus. (b) [cap.] A lapsed genus of fishes, founded on sphenonchi by Agassiz in 1843.

spheno-orbital, spheno-orbital (sfē-nō-ōr'bi-tāl, -tār), a. Same as sphenorbital.

sphenopalatine (sfē-nō-pal'a-tin), a. [< sphenoid + palatine.] Pertaining to the sphenoid and palatine bones. Also sphenopalatal, sphenopalatinate.—Internal sphenopalatine nerve. Same as nasopalatine nerve (which see, under nasopalatine).—Sphenopalatine artery, a branch arising from the third or sphenomaxillary portion of the internal maxillary artery. It passes through the sphenopalatine foramen into the cavity of the nose, and is distributed to the nasal mucous membrane and the membranes of the antrum, ethmoid, and sphenoid cells. Also called nasal artery.—Sphenopalatine foramen, ganglion, notch. See the nouns.—Sphenopalatine nerves, two small branches of the superior maxillary nerve to the sphenopalatine or Meckel's ganglion.—Sphenopalatine vein, a small vein entering the pterygoid plexus.

sphenoparietal (sfē'nō-pā-rī'e-tal), a. [< sphenoid + parietal.] Pertaining to the sphenoid and parietal bones: as, the sphenoparietal suture.—Sphenoparietal sinus, a small vessel which communicates with the cavernous sinus and middle meningeal veins, and rests in a groove on the under side of the lesser wing of the sphenoid. Brech. et.—Sphenoparietal suture. See suture.

sphenopetrosal (sfē'nō-pet-rō-sal), a. [< sphenoid + petrosal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and petrosal bones; petrosphenoidal.—Sphenopetrosal suture. See suture.

sphenopharyngeus (sfē'nō-far-in-jē-us), n. [< sphenoid + pharyngeus.] An occasional elevator muscle of the pharynx which arises from the spine of the sphenoid.

Sphenophorus (sfē-nōf'ō-rus), n. [NL. (Schönherr, 1838), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + φόρος, < φέρειν = E. bear.] A notable genus of rhynchophorous beetles, of many species and very wide distribution, having the anterior coxae narrowly separated, and the body beneath glabrous. Nearly 200 species are known, of which 30 inhabit America north of Mexico. Many of them breed in the roots of plants, and so may become pests. The adult beetles also often feed upon plants. Thus S. sculptilis feeds upon corn, and S. pulchellus upon the cocklebur (Xanthium).

Sphenophyllum (sfē-nō-fil'um), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1822), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + φύλλον, a leaf.] A genus of fossil plants, occurring throughout the whole thickness of the coal-measures, both in Europe and in the United States, and supposed to have been found also in the Lower Silurian, near Cincinnati in Ohio. It is a herbaceous plant, with whorls of wedge-shaped leaves, springing from enlarged articulations, the fructification in cylindrical spikes, with bracts curved upward in a sharp flexure from near the base, and globular sporanges in the axils of the bracts. Sphenophyllum, first thought by Brongniart to belong to the gymnosperms, is now believed to constitute a peculiar type of vegetation, regarded by some authors as related to the rhizocarps, by others as connected with the Calamariae through Asterophyllites.

sphenopterid (sfē-nop'te-rid), n. A fern of the genus Sphenopteris.

Sphenopteris (sfē-nop'te-ris), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1822), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + πτερίς (ptēris), a fern: see Pteris.] A genus of fossil ferns, very widely distributed and very abundant, especially in the (Carboniferous) coal-measures, but ranging from the Devonian to the Middle Cretaceous. "These are delicate ferns, very numerous in species, and most difficult to discriminate" (Dawson). Almost nothing is known of the fructification of Sphenopteris, and the numerous specific distinctions which have been made are generally derived from the subdivisions of the fronds, and the shape and venation of the pinnules. Lesquereux divides the sphenopterids into three subdivisions: (a) the pectopterid sphenopterids, species of which group were referred to Pectopteris by Brongniart, of which the fronds have their ultimate pinnae pinnately deeply lobed, the lobes connate to the middle or higher, and the veins pinnately divided, as in Pectopteris; (b) Sphenopteris proper, of which the pinnae are more deeply divided in lobes, or pinnately narrowed and decurrent at the base, and generally dentate or crenate at the apex; (c) the hymenophyllite sphenopterids, which he thinks should constitute a distinct genus. See cut under fern.

sphenopterygoid (sfē-nop'ter'i-goid), a. [< sphenoid + pterygoid.] Common to the sphenoid and pterygoid bones. Also pterygosphenoid.

sphenorbital (sfē-nōr'bi-tal), a. [< sphenoid + orbital.] Pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the orbits of the eyes; orbitosphenoid. The sphenorbital parts of the sphenoid are the lesser wings, or orbitosphenoids; the sphenorbital fissure is the sphenoidal fissure, or anterior lacerate foramen. See orbitosphenoid. Also spheno-orbital and spheno-orbital.

Sphenorhynchus (sfē-nō-ring'kus), n. [NL., prop. Sphenorhynchus (Hemprich and Ehrenberg, 1829), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + ῥιγχος, a snout.] 1. A genus of Ciconiidae, the wedge-billed storks, having a sharp straight bill with a membrane saddled on the base of the upper mandible, and no ambiens muscle. The only species is the white-bellied stork or simbil, S. abdimi, also called Abdimia sphenorhyncha, of greenish and brownish-purple color and white below, the bill tipped with orange-red. It inhabits Africa, nests in trees, and is regarded with veneration by the natives. See cut under simbil. 2†. A genus of South American dendrocolapline birds, now called Glyphorhynchus. Maximilian, 1831.—3†. A genus of reptiles. Tschudi, 1838.

sphenosquamosal (sfē'nō-skwa-mō'sal), a. [< sphenoid + squamosal.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid and the squamous part of the temporal bone; squamosphenoidal.

sphenotemporal (sfē-nō-tem'pō-ral), a. [< sphenoid + temporal.] In anat., of or belonging to the temporal and sphenoid bones. Also temporosphenoid.—Sphenotemporal suture. See suture.

sphenotic (sfē-nō'tik), a. and n. [< sphenoid + otic.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the otic capsule, or hard parts of the auditory organ: as, a sphenotic ossification in various fishes. See cut under teleost.

II. n. In ornith., a postfrontal process of bone, or a separate ossification, developed in relation with sphenoidal and otic elements, entering into the posterior boundary of the orbital cavity.

sphenotresia (sfē-nō-trē'si-ā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + τρήσις, perforation, < τερπαίνω (τερπαινω), perforate.] The breaking up of the basal portion of the fetal skull in craniotomy.

sphenotribe (sfē-nō-trib), n. [< Gr. σφην, a wedge, + τριβειν, rub, bruise.] The instrument used in performing sphenotresia.

sphenoturbinal (sfē-nō-tēr'bi-nal), a. and n. [< sphenoid + turbinal.] 1. a. Sphenoidal and turbinated or whorled or scroll-like; sphenoturbinate: specifically applied, conformably with ethmoturbinal and maxilloturbinal, to the sphenoidal spongy bones. See II.

II. n. One of the sphenoidal spongy bones; one of a pair of small bones situated in front of the body of the sphenoid, in man at birth solid, nodular, distinct from each other and from the sphenoid, afterward fused with the body of the sphenoid as delicate spongy or scroll-like bones which take part in forming the sphenoidal sinuses. Their homologues in other animals are questionable.

sphenoturbinate (sfē-nō-tēr'bi-nāt), a. [< sphenoid + turbinate.] Same as sphenoturbinal.

sphenovomerine (sfē-nō-vom'er-in), a. [< sphenoid + vomerine.] Of or pertaining to the sphenoid bone and the vomer: as, the sphenovomerine suture or schindylesis.

Sphenozamites (sfē'nō-za-mi'tēz), n. [NL. (Brongniart, 1849), < Gr. σφην, a wedge, + NL. Zamites, q. v.] A genus of fossil plants belonging to the cycads, ranging from the Permian to the Jurassic inclusive. They are said by Schimper to bear some resemblance to the problematical Noeggerathia, and, among living forms, to be most nearly analogous to Zamia and Encephalartos. See Zamites.

Sphenura (sfē-nū'rā), n. [NL., < Gr. σφιν, a wedge, + ουρά, a tail.] 1. In ornith., a generic name variously applied. (a) An Australian genus of aberrant reed-warblers, with only ten tail-feathers and three pairs of strong recurved rectal bristles. It is quite near Sphenaceus (which see), and in part synonymous therewith. There are 3 species, S. brachyptera, S. longirostris, and S. broadbentii. Lichtenstein, 1823. (b) A genus of South American synallaxine birds now called Eusphenura and Thriphopaga. Spix, 1824; Sundevall, 1855. (c) A genus of Indian and African birds related to neither of the foregoing, now called Argya (or Argia) and Malcolmia. Bonaparte, 1854.

2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects. Dejean, 1834.

spheral (sfēr'al), a. [L. sphæralis, of or pertaining to a sphere, globular, < sphæra, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] 1. Rounded or formed like a sphere; sphere-shaped; hence, symmetrical; perfect in form. — 2. Of or pertaining to the spheres or heavenly bodies; moving or revolving like the spheres; hence, harmonious.

Well I know that all things move
To the spheral rhythm of love.

Whittier, Andrew Rykman's Prayer.

The spheral souls that move
Through the ancient heaven of song-illuminated air.

Swinburne.

Carlyle had no faith in . . . the astronomic principle by which the systems are kept in poise in the spheral harmony.

The Century, XXVI. 538.

spherality (sfēr'al-i-ti), n. [L. sphæralis, of or pertaining to a sphere, globular, < sphæra, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] The state of being spheral, or having the form of a sphere. [Rare.]

spheraster (sfēr-as'tēr), n. [NL., < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + αστήρ, a star.] In sponges, a regular polyact or stellate spicule whose rays coalesce into a spherical figure, as in the genus Geddia; an aster with a thick spherical body. W. J. Sollas.

spheration (sfēr-rā'shon), n. [L. sphæra, a sphere, + -ation.] Formation into a sphere; specifically, the process by which cosmic matter is formed into a globular or planetary body. [Recent.]

The physical relations accompanying the spheration of a ring are not such as to determine uniformly either direct or retrograde motion.

Winchell, World-Life, p. 123.

sphere (sfēr), n. [Early mod. E. also spear, spear, also sphere (with vowel as in L.); earlier (and still dial.) sper, < ME. sper, < OF. espere, later sphere, F. sphère = Pr. espera = Sp. esfera = Pg. sphera = It. sfera = D. sfer = G. sphäre = Dan. sphære = Sw. spher, < L. sphæra, ML. also sphera, spera, < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, globe, sphere, applied to a playing-ball, a sphere as a geometrical figure, the terrestrial globe, the earth, also an artificial globe (so in Strabo, the notion that the earth is a sphere appearing first prob. in Plato), also a star or planet (Plutarch), also a hollow sphere, one of the concentric spheres supposed to revolve around the earth, also a ball (of the eye), a pill, etc.; perhaps lit. 'that which is tossed about' (applied first to a playing-ball), for σφαῖρα* for σφαῖρα*, < σφαῖρεν, scatter, throw about (see sperm, spore); or perhaps connected with σφαῖρα, a coil, ball, spire (see *spire*2).] 1. In geom., a solid figure generated by the revolution of a semicircle about its diameter. This is substantially Euclid's definition. The modern definition is a quadric surface having contact with the absolute throughout a conic, and therefore, everywhere equidistant from a center. The surface of a sphere is $4\pi R^2$, where R is the radius; its volume is $\frac{4}{3}\pi R^3$. Hence — 2. A rounded body, approximately spherical; a ball; a globe.

The Lieutenant's evidence was as round, complete, and lucid as a Japanese sphere of rock-crystal.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 55.

3. An orbicular body representing the earth or the apparent heavens, or illustrating their astronomical relations. Hence — 4. The visible supernal region; the upper air; the heavens; the sky. [Poetical.]

Then shall the righteous shine like glorious stars
Within the sphere of heaven.

Sweet Echo, . . .

Sweet queen of parley, daughter of the sphere.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 6.

Milton, Comus, l. 241.

I,

An eagle, clang an eagle to the sphere.

Tennyson, Princess, lll.

5. One of the supposed concentric and eccentric revolving rigid and transparent shells called crystalline, in which, according to the old astronomers (following Eudoxus), the stars, sun, moon, and planets were severally set, and by which they were carried in such a manner as to produce their apparent motions. The term is now generally restricted to the sphere of the fixed stars, and is recognized as a convenient fiction. It is also loosely applied to the planets themselves.

After shewede he hym the nyne spheres;
And after that the melodye herde he
That cometh of thilke spheres thryes three,
That welles is of musik and melodye

In this world here and cause of harmonye.

Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 59.

Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven!

Marlowe, Doctor Faustus, v. 4.

Hence — 6. An orbicular field or course of movement; an orbit, as that of a heavenly body or of the eye; a circuit.

As Mars in three-score yeares doth run his sphere, . . .
The sphere of Cupid forty yeares containes.

Spenser, Sonnets, lx.

Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres.

Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 17.

7. Place or scene of action; the space within which movement is made or operations are carried on; a circumscribed region of action: as, the sphere of a mission; the spheres (fuller, spheres of influence) of the different European powers and trading companies in Africa.

The four elements wherof the body of man is compact . . . be set in their places called sphæra, higher or lower accordyng to the souerainete of their nature.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, l. 1.

All this while the King had mov'd within his own Sphere, and had done nothing out of the Realm.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 403.

Our South African sphere seems better suited for European settlement than is the Tunisian protectorate of France.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Proba. of Greater Britain, v.

8. Position or rank in society; position or class with reference to social distinctions.

Pleas'd, or not pleas'd, if we be Englands King,
And mightiest in the Sphere in which we moove, We'll shine alone, this Phaeton cast downe.

Heywood, Royal King (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 29).

I saw her (Marie Antoinette) just above the horizon, decorating and cheering the elevated sphere she just began to move in.

Burke, Rev. in France.

9. Circuit or radius, as of knowledge, influence, or activity; definite or circumscribed range; determinate limit of any mental or physical course: as, the sphere of diplomacy.

This being wholly out of my sphere, I can give no account of them.

Dampier, Voyages, II. l. 126.

Nature to each allots his proper Sphere.

Congress, Of Pleasing.

Armillary sphere. See armillary. — Axis of a sphere. See axis. — Circle of the sphere. See circle. — Colloid, dialing, direct sphere. See the qualifying words. — Copernican sphere, an armillary sphere with the addition of a second sphere representing the sun, central to a divided circle representing the ecliptic. — Doctrine of the sphere, the elements of the geometry of figures drawn upon the surface of a sphere. — Epidermic spheres. Same as epithelial pearls (which see, under pearl). — Geometry of spheres, a branch of geometry in which the lines of Plücker's geometry of lines are replaced by spheres, and the intersections of lines by the contact of spheres. — Harmony or music of the spheres. See harmony. — Logical sphere, the subject or ultimate antecedent of a statement, or the objects which a term denotes. — Magic sphere. See magic. — Oblique sphere, the sphere of the heavens, or another sphere representing that, as it appears at a station where the angle between the equator and the horizon is oblique. The right sphere is the same sphere for an equatorial station where the angle is a right angle, and the parallel sphere is the same where the angle vanishes — that is, for a polar station. — Osculating sphere of a non-plane curve, the sphere through four consecutive points of the curve. — Parallel circles on a sphere. See parallel. — Parallel sphere. See oblique sphere. — Power of a sphere in regard to another, the squared distance of the two centers less the sum of the squares of the radii. Clifford. — Projection of the sphere. See map-projection, under projection. — Radical sphere, a sphere orthogonally cutting four spheres having their centers at the summits of the tetrahedron of coordinates. — Right sphere. See oblique sphere. — Sector of a sphere. See sector. — Segmentation sphere. See segmentation. — Segment of a sphere. See segment. — Sphere at infinity. See infinity. — Twelve-point sphere. (a) A sphere (discovered by Prouhet in 1863) belonging to a tetrahedron in which the four perpendiculars from the summits upon the opposite faces intersect in one point, this sphere passing through the four feet of these perpendiculars and consequently also through the centers of gravity of the four faces, and through the mid-points of the lines from the vertices to the common intersections of the perpendiculars aforesaid. (b) More generally, a sphere (discovered in 1884 by the Italian mathematician Intrigila) belonging to any tetrahedron, and passing through the four feet of the perpendiculars from the summits upon the opposite faces, and consequently also through the mid-points of the lines from the summits to the center of the hyperboloid of which these perpendiculars are generators, and through the orthogonal projections of these points upon the opposite faces. = Syn. 1-3. Orb, Ball, etc. See globe.

sphere (sfēr), v. t.; pret. and pp. sphered, ppr. sphering. [L. sphere, n.] 1. To make into a sphere; make spherical; round, or round out; fill out completely.

Blow, villain, till thy sphered bias cheek
Outswell the colic of puff'd Aquilon.

Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 8.

2. To place in a sphere or among the spheres; ensphere.

And therefore is the glorious planet Sol
In noble eminence enthroned, and sphered
Amidst the other.

Shak., T. and C., l. 3. 90.

Light . . . from her native east
To journey through the airy gloom began,
Sphered in a radiant cloud; for yet the sun
Was not.

Milton, P. L., vii. 247.

Because I would have reach'd you, had you been Sphered up with Cassiopeia.

Tennyson, Princess, iv.

3. To inclose as in a sphere or orbit; encircle; engirdle.

When any towne is spher'd
With siege of such a foe as kills men's minds.

Chapman, Illad, xviii. 185.

4. To pass or send as in a sphere or orbit; circulate. [Rare.]

We'll still sit up,
Sphering about the waasal cup
To all those times
Which gave me honour for my rhimes.

Herrick, His Age.

sphere-crystals (sfēr'kris'talz), n. pl. In bot., same as spheraphides.

sphereless (sfēr'les), a. [L. sphere + -less.] Having no sphere; wandering; unrestrained.

Let the horsemen's scimitars
Wheel and flash, like sphereless stars,
Thirsting to eclipse their burning
In a sea of death and mourning.

Shelley, Masque of Anarchy, st. 79.

sphere-yeast (sfēr'yēst), n. In bot., an aggregation of certain sprouting forms of the genus Mucor: formerly so called from a resemblance in shape to the saccharomycete of yeast.

spheric (sfēr'ik), a. [= F. sphérique = Sp. esférico = Pg. esférico = It. sferico, < L. sphæricus, < Gr. σφαῖρικός, of or pertaining to a ball, < σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] Of or pertaining to a sphere or the spheres; sphere-like; spherical.

Up the spheric circles, circle above circle.

Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

Let any sculptor hew us out the most ravishing combination of tender curves and spheric softness that ever stood for woman.

S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 273.

spherical (sfēr'ik-al), a. [L. spheric + -al.] 1. Bounded by or having the form of the surface of a sphere: as, a spherical body; a spherical surface; a spherical shell.

We must know the reason of the spherical figures of the drops.

Glanville.

2. Pertaining or relating to a sphere or spheres, or to sphericity: as, a spherical segment or section; spherical trigonometry. — 3. Relating to the planets; planetary, in the astrological sense.

We make guilty of our disasters the sun, the moon, and the stars: as if we were villains by necessity; fools by heavenly compulsion; knaves, thieves, and treachers by spherical predominance.

Shak., Lear, i. 2. 134.

Adjunct spherical function. See function. — Center of spherical curvature. See *center*1. — Concave spherical mirror. See *mirror*2. — Line of spherical curvature. See *line*2. — Spherical aberration. See *aberration*4. — Spherical angle. See *angle*3. — Spherical bracketing, in arch, an arrangement of brackets for the support of lath-and-plaster work forming a spherical surface. — Spherical compasses, a kind of calipers for measuring globular bodies, variously constructed. — Spherical complex, the aggregate of all the spheres in space fulfilling a single geometrical condition. — Spherical congruence, the aggregate of all the spheres in space fulfilling two geometrical conditions. — Spherical conic section. See conic. — Spherical coordinates. See coordinate. — Spherical curvature, spicoid, excess, function, geometry. See the nouns. — Spherical cycloid, a curve which is the intersection of a sphere with a quadric surface. — Spherical group, the spherical complex determined by a linear equation between the coordinates and the power of the center of the variable circle. — Spherical harmonic. Same as Laplace's function (which see, under function). — Spherical indicatrix. See indicatrix. — Spherical inversion. See geometrical inversion, under inversion.—Spherical lune, the portion of the surface of a sphere included between two great circles.—Spherical nucleus. Same as nucleus globosus (which see, under nucleus).—Spherical pencil, a singly infinite continuous series of spheres determined like a spherical group, but by three equations.—Spherical polygon. See polygon.—Spherical representation, a mode of continuous correspondence between the points of a surface and the points of a sphere, each radius of the sphere through the center representing the parallel normal of the surface. Any part of the sphere considered as thus representing a part of the surface is called its spherical image.—Spherical saw, a saw made in the form of a segment of a sphere, used for sawing out curvilinear work. See cut d under saw.—Spherical sclere. See sclere and sphaeraster.—Spherical-shot machine, a machine for finishing cannon-balls by molding and pressing to a true spherical form. E. H. Knight.—Spherical surface-harmonic. See harmonic.—Spherical triangle, trigonometry, etc. See the nouns.

spherically (sfer-i-kal-i), adv. In the form of a sphere, or of part of a sphere; so as to be spherical.

sphericalness (sfer-i-kal-nes), n. The state or property of being spherical; sphericity. [Rare.]

sphericity (sfer-i-kal-i-ti), n. [= F. sphéricité; as spheric + -ity.] The character of being in the shape of a sphere.

sphericle (sfer-i-kl), n. [Dim. of sphere.] A small sphere; a spherule. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

spherics (sfer'iks), n. [Pl. of spheric (see -ics).] Geometry of figures drawn on the surface of a sphere; specifically, spherical trigonometry.

spheriform (sfer'i-fōrm), a. [< L. sphaera, sphere, + forma, form.] Formed or existing as a sphere; sphere-shaped; spherical. Cudworth, Intellectual System, II. 23. [Rare.]

sphero-cobaltite (sferō-kō'bāl-tit), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + E. cobalt + -ite.] Carbonate of cobalt, a rare mineral occurring in small spherical masses with concentric radiated structure, and having a peach-blossom red color.

spheroconic (sferō-kōn'ik), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + κώνος, a cone: see conic.] A non-plane curve, the intersection of a sphere with a quadric cone having its vertex at the center of the sphere.—Cyclic arcs of the spheroconic, the intersections of the cyclic planes of the cone with the sphere.—Reciprocal spheroconic, the envelop of the great circles of which the points on the first spheroconic are the poles.

sphero-crystal (sferō-kris'tal), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + κρυστάλλος, crystal.] 1. In lithol., a mineral occurring in spherical form with fibrous-radiate structure.—2. pl. In bot., same as sphaeraphides.

sphero-dactyl (sferō-dak'til), a. Of or pertaining to the genus Sphero-dactylus, as a gecko.

sphero-gastric (sferō-gas'trik), a. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + γαστήρ, stomach.] Having a spherical or globular abdomen, as a spider; of or pertaining to the Sphaerogastra. See cut under honey-bearer.

sphero-graph (sferō-gráf), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + γράφειν, write.] A nautical instrument consisting of a stereographic projection of the sphere upon a disk of pasteboard, in which the meridians and parallels of latitude are laid down to single degrees. By the aid of this projection, and a ruler and index, the angular position of a ship at any place, and the distance sailed, may be readily and accurately determined on the principle of great-circle sailing.

spheroid (sfer'oid), n. [Also sphaeroid; = F. sphéroïde, < Gr. σφαῖροειδής, like a ball or sphere, globular, < σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + εἶδος, form.] 1. A geometrical body approaching to a sphere, but not perfectly spherical.—2. In geom., a solid generated by the revolution of an ellipse about one of its axes. When the generating ellipse revolves about its longer or major axis, the spheroid is prolate or oblong; when about its less or minor axis, the spheroid is oblate. The earth is an oblate spheroid—that is, flattened at the poles, so that its polar diameter is shorter than its equatorial diameter. (See earth, 1.) The same figure is assumed by the other planets; hence the properties of the oblate spheroid are of great importance in geodesy and astronomy.—Universal spheroid, a surface generated by the revolution of an ellipse about any diameter.

spheroidal (sfer'oi-dal), a. [< spheroid + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to, or having the form of, a spheroid.—2. In crystal., globose; bounded by several convex faces.—3. In entom., round and prominent, appearing like a ball or sphere partly buried in the surface: as, spheroidal eyes; spheroidal coxae.—Spheroidal bracketing, in arch., bracketing which has a spheroidal surface.—Spheroidal epithelium. See epithelium.—Spheroidal state or condition, the condition of water or other liquid when, on being placed on a highly heated surface, as red-hot metal, it assumes the form of a more or less flattened spheroid, and evaporates without ebullition.

The spheroid in this condition does not touch the surface of the metal, but floats on a layer of its own vapor, and evaporates rapidly from its exposed surface. It is heated mainly by radiation from the hot surface, since the layer of intervening vapor conducts heat very feebly. The formation of a layer of non-conducting vapor explains why it is possible to dip the wetted hand into molten iron with impunity. It is sometimes spoken of as the caloric or caloric paradox.

spheroidally (sfer'oi-dal-i), adv. In a spheroidal manner; so as to form a spheroid or spheroids.

The great mass . . . is largely built up of spheroidally jointed rock. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 450.

spheroidic (sfer'oi-dik), a. [= F. sphéroidique; as spheroid + -ic.] Same as spheroidal. [Rare.]

spheroidical (sfer'oi-di-kal), a. [< spheroidic + -al.] Same as spheroidal. [The usual old form.]

The same spheroidical form.

spheroidicity (sfer'oi-dis'i-ti), n. [< spheroidic + -ity.] The state or character of being spheroidal.

Spheroma, n. See Sphaeroma.

spheromere (sfer'ō-mēr), n. [Also sphaeromere; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + μέρος, a part.] One of the radially arranged parts or symmetrical segments of any radiate; an actinomere. Perhaps the most remarkable spheromeres are those two which, in the Venus's-girdle, give that ctenophoran a ribbon-like figure by their enormous development. See cut under Cestum.

spherometer (sfer'ōm'e-tēr), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring the radii of spheres; a sphere-measurer. It is of especial service to opticians in determining the focal length, etc., of lenses. The common form (see figure) consists of a vertical screw c, with a large graduated head a, turning in a socket supported by three legs whose hard steel points are exactly equidistant. The fixed scale b at the side, together with the graduated screw-head, makes it possible to measure with great accuracy the distance between the extremity of the screw and the plane passing through the ends of the three supports, when, for example, all the points are in contact with the surface of the sphere. If, in addition, the distance between the ends of the supports is known, a simple calculation gives the radius of the sphere. The same instrument may also be used to determine with precision the thickness of a plate, as (in the figure) A, placed upon a horizontal surface.

Spherometer.

spheromian (sfer'ō-mi-an), a. and n. [< Sphaeroma + -ian.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to Sphaeroma or the Sphaeromidae.

2. n. A globe-slater.

Also spelled sphaeromian.

spheropolar (sfer'ō-pō-lār), a. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, sphere, + E. polar.] Reciprocal relatively to a sphere. The plane through the points of contact of a cone with a sphere is the spheropolar of the vertex.

spherosiderite (sfer'ō-sid'e-rit), n. [Also sphaerosiderite; < Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, sphere, + σίδηρος, of iron: see siderite.] A variety of the iron carbonate siderite, occurring in globular concretionary forms.

spherospore (sfer'ō-spōr), n. [< Gr. σφαῖρα, a ball, + E. spore.] In bot., same as tetraspore.

spherular (sfer'ō-lār), a. [< spherule + -ar.] 1. Having the form of a spherule; resembling a spherule.—2. Of or pertaining to a spherulite; spherulitic.

Spherular bodies consisting of radially-aggregated fibres of a single mineral. Nature, XXXIX. 315.

spherulate (sfer'ō-lāt), a. [< spherule + -ate.] In entom., having one or more rows of minute rounded tubercles; studded with spherules.

spherule (sfer'ōl), n. [Also sphaerule; < L. sphaerula, dim. of sphaera, a ball, sphere: see sphere.] A little sphere or spherical body. Quicksilver, when poured upon a plane surface, divides itself into a great number of minute spherules.

spherulite (sfer'ō-lit), n. [Also sphaerulite; < spherule + -ite.] 1. A vitreous globule, such as those of which perlite is made up, having a more or less perfectly developed concentric and at the same time decidedly radiating fibrous structure. The highly silicious volcanic rocks not unfrequently have a spherulitic structure.—2. Same as radiolite.—3. Spherulite rock, in geol., a rock of which the predominating part has a spherulitic structure.

spherulitic (sfer'ō-lit'ik), a. [< spherulite + -ic.] Made up of or containing spherulites; having the character of a spherulite. Also sphaerulitic.

spherulitize (sfer'ō-lit'iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. spherulitized, ppr. spherulitizing. [< spherulite

+ -ize.] To convert more or less completely into spherulites, or cause to assume a spherulitic structure, wholly or in part. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 250.

spherulitoid (sfer'ō-li-toid), a. [< spherulite + -oid.] Having more or less perfectly the form of a spherulite. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 248.

sphery (sfär'i), a. [< sphere + -y.] 1. Belonging to the spheres.

She can teach ye how to climb Higher than the sphery chime.

Milton, Comus, l. 1021.

2. Resembling a sphere or star in roundness, brightness, or other attribute.

What wicked and dissembling glass of mine
Made me compare with Hermia's sphery eye?

Shak., M. N. D., II. 2. 90.

spheterize (sfer'e-riz), v. t.; pret. and pp. spheterized, ppr. spheterizing. [< Gr. σφητερίζω, make one's own, < σφῆτερος, their own, poss. adj. of the 3d pers. pl., < σφῆς, they.] To take to one's self; appropriate as one's own. Burke. [Rare.] (Encyc. Dict.)

Sphex (sfeks), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1758), < Gr. σφῆς, a wasp: see wasp.] 1. A notable genus of large handsome digger-wasps, typical of the family Sphegidae (or Sphecidae or Sphexidae). They abound in tropical regions, but some 12 species inhabit the United States. S. ichneumonae digs rapidly in hard ground, and provisions its cells with grasshoppers. About 100 species are known. See cut under digger-wasp. 2. [l. c.] A wasp of this genus.

sphex-fly (sfeks'fli), n. One of numerous different dipterous insects, as of the genus Conops, which resemble a sphex in some respects.

sphiggure (sfīg'ūr), n. See sphingure.

sphincter (sfingkt'ēr), n. [NL., < L. sphincter, < Gr. σφικτήρ, anything which binds tight, a lace, a band, < σφίγγω, shut tight, close.]

An orbicular, circular, or annular muscle surrounding and capable of closing a natural orifice or passage of the body.—Oral sphincter. Same as orbicularis oris (which see, under orbicularis).—Sphincter ani, the sphincter of the anus, under which name two distinct muscles are known. (a) The sphincter ani proper, sphincter externus, or external sphincter is a thin, flat plane of voluntary muscular fibers supplied by hemorrhoidal branches of nerves from the sacral plexus, surrounding the anus, subcutaneous and intimately adherent to the integument, of elliptical form 3 or 4 inches in long diameter, and an inch wide across. It arises from the tip of the coccyx, and is inserted into the tendinous raphe of the perineum. Like most sphincters, it consists of symmetrical lateral halves united by a raphe in front of and behind the opening it encloses. (b) The sphincter recti, sphincter internus, or internal sphincter surrounds the lower end of the rectum, forming a muscular ring about an inch in extent and a quarter of an inch thick, and consists of an aggregation and thickening of the circular fibers of the gut. This sphincter is involuntary, and in health maintains its tonic contractility, which yields by reflex action to the pressure of the contents of the bowel.—Sphincter oculi, or sphincter palpebrarum, the orbicular muscle of the eyelids, which surrounds and closes them. Usually called orbicularis palpebrarum. See cut under muscle.—Sphincter oris, the oral sphincter. See orbicularis oris, under orbicularis.—Sphincter pupillaris, the circular or concentric fibers of the iris, whose contraction makes the pupil smaller. Also called sphincter pupillæ and sphincter iridis.—Sphincter pylori. See pylorus.—Sphincter recti, the internal sphincter ani (see above).—Sphincter vaginae, an elliptical muscle surrounding the orifice of the vagina, corresponding to the bulbocavernosus of the male. Also called constrictor vaginae.—Sphincter vesicae, the unstriated involuntary muscular fibers around the neck of the urinary bladder.—Sphincter vesicae externus, the partly plain partly striated muscular fibers which surround the prostatic part of the urethra. Also called sphincter prostaticus and sphincter of Henle.

sphincteral (sfingkt'ēr-al), a. [< sphincter + -al.] Same as sphincterial.

sphincterate (sfingkt'ēr-āt), a. [Also sphinctrate; < sphincter + -ate.] 1. In anat. and zool., provided with a sphincter; closed or closable by means of a sphincter.—2. Contracted or constricted as if by a sphincter; thus, an hour-glass is sphincterate in the middle.

sphincterial (sfingkt'ēr-ial), a. [< sphincter + -ial.] Of or pertaining to a sphincter or its function: as, a sphincterial muscle; sphincterial fibers; sphincterial action.

sphincteric (sfingkt'ēr-ik), a. [< sphincter + -ic.] Same as sphincterial.

sphincterotomy (sfingkt'ēr-ōt'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. σφικτήρ, a sphincter, + -τομή, < τέμνειν, to cut.] The operation of cutting a sphincter to prevent its spasmodic action.

sphinctrate (sfingkt'ēr-āt), a. Same as sphincterate.

Sphindidae (sfīn'di-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphindus + -idae.] An aberrant family of serricorn beetles, in which the antennæ are so obviously clavate as to resemble those of the clavicorn series. It contains a few small species found in fungi which grow upon the trunks of trees.

Sphindus (sfín'dus), n. [NL. (Chevrolat, 1833), a made word.] The typical genus of the Sphindidae. Only 3 species are known, one of which is North American.

Sphingidae (sfín'ji-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1819), < Sphinx (Sphing-) + -idae.] An important family of heterocerous lepidopterous insects, with fusiform antennae, typified by the genus Sphinx, including all those commonly known as sphinxes, sphinx-moths, hawk-moths, or humming-bird moths. The body is robust; the abdomen is stout, conical, often tufted; the tongue is usually long and strong; the antennae have a hook at the tip; the wings are comparatively small and narrow, the fore wings acute at the tip. They are diurnal or crepuscular in habit, a few flying in the hottest sunshine, but the majority in the twilight. The larvae are large, naked, usually green in color, and generally furnished with a prominent caudal horn, which is sometimes replaced after the last molt by a shining lenticular tubercle. When full-grown they either pupate above ground, between leaves, in a slight cocoon, or more generally go deep under ground, and transform in an earthen cell. The long-tongued species have a special tree and characteristic tongue-case. The species of temperate regions are divided into four principal subfamilies: Macroglossinae, Cherocampinae, Sphinginae, and Smerinthinae. From America north of Mexico 83 species have been described, about 50 from Europe, and rather more than 600 for the entire world. Also Sphingidae, Sphingidi, Sphingina, Sphingodea, and Sphingoides. See cuts under hog-caterpillar, Philampelus, hawk-moth, Lepidoptera, and sphinx.

Sphingiform (sfín'ji-fórm), a. [< NL. Sphinx (Sphing-) + L. forma, form.] In entom., resembling a moth of the family Sphingidae.

sphingine (sfín'jin), a. Resembling a sphinx or hawk-moth; of or pertaining to the Sphingidae; sphingoid or sphingiform.

sphingoid (sfing'goid), a. [< NL. Sphinx (Sphing-) + -oid.] Like a sphinx or hawk-moth; sphingine or sphingiform.

sphingure (sfing'gür), n. [= F. sphiggure: see Sphingurus.] A member of the genus Sphingurus.

Sphingurinae (sfing-gü-rí-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphingurus + -inae.] The American porcupines; a subfamily of Hystriidae, of more or less completely arboreal habits, represented by four genera, Sphingurus, Syntheres, Chaetomys, and Erethizon: so named by E. R. Alston in 1876. It corresponds to the Syntherina of Gervais (1852), the Syntherinae of J. A. Allen (1877), and the Cercolabinae (as a subfamily of Spalacopodidae) of Liljeborg (1886) and Gill (1872). See cuts under porcupine and prehensile.

sphingurine (sfing'gü-rin), a. Of or belonging to the Sphingurinae; syntherine; cercolabine.

Sphingurus (sfing-gü-rus), n. [NL. (F. Cuvier, 1822, in form Sphiggurus), < Gr. σφίγγω, throttle, strangle (see sphinx), + οὐρά, tail.] The typical genus of Sphingurinae, having the tail prehensile, all four feet four-toed, and little development of spines. It is closely related to Syntheres; but the latter is more spiny, and has a broad, highly arched frontal region. The two genera are united by Brandt under the name Cercolabes. Each has several Neotropical species in Central and South America, east of the Andes, from southeastern Mexico and the West Indies to Paraguay.

sphinx (sfíngks), n.; pl. sphinxes, sphinges (sfíngk'sez, sfín'jēz). [= F. sphinx = Sp. esfinge = Pg. esfinge = It. sfinge = G. sphinx, < L. sphinx, < Gr. σφίγξ (σφίγγ-), Æolic σίγξ, a sphinx (Theban or Egyptian: see defs. 1 and 2); supposed to mean lit. 'strangler,' the story being that the Sphinx strangled those who could not solve her riddles; < σφίγγινω, throttle, strangle, orig. bind, compress, fix; prob. = L. figere, fix (see fix); by some connected with L. fascis, a bundle: see fascis.] 1. [cap. or l. c.] In Gr. myth., a female monster, said to have proposed a riddle to the Thebans who passed her as she sat on a rock by the roadside, and to have killed all who were not able to guess it. The riddle, according to tradition, inquired what being has successively four, two, and three feet, and is weakest when it has most feet. Ædipus answered, Man, who creeps in infancy, afterward goes erect, and finally walks with a staff (a third foot). The Sphinx, in compliance with her own conditions, thereupon threw herself from her rock and died. In art this monster is represented with the body of a lion or a dog, winged, and the head and often the breasts of a woman.

For valour, is not Love a Hercules? . . .
Subtle as Sphinx. Shak., L. L. L., iv. 3. 342.

In the third [court] . . . are two Sphinges very curiously carved in brass.

2. In Egypt. antiq., a figure somewhat similar in composition to the Greek, having the body of a lion (never winged), and a male human head or an animal head. The human-headed figures have been called androspinxes; those with the head of a ram, criosphinxes; and those with the head of a hawk, hieracosphinxes. Egyptian sphinxes are symbolical figures, having no connection with the Greek fable; and the Greeks probably applied the term sphinx to the Egyptian statues merely on account of the accidental external resemblance between them and their own conception. The Egyptian sphinxes were commonly placed in avenues leading to temples or tombs. The most celebrated example is the Great Sphinx near the great pyramids of Ghizeh, hewn out of solid granite, with the recumbent body of a lion, 146 feet long from the shoulders to the rump, and 56 feet high, and a man's head 28½ feet high from chin to crown. A small temple stood between the fore paws of this sphinx. There are also Oriental sphinxes, in general akin to the Egyptian, but more often winged than wingless. See cut under androspinx.

3. In her., a creature with a lion's body and a woman's head, but not necessarily like any ancient original. It is assumed to be winged; when not winged, it should be blazoned "sans wings."—4. An enigmatic or sphinx-like person; one who talks puzzlingly, or is inscrutable in disposition or character; one whom it is hard to understand.—5. In entom.: (a) A hawk-moth; a member of the genus Sphinx or the family Sphingidae. See cuts under hawk-moth, hog-caterpillar, Lepidoptera, and Philampelus. (b) [cap.] [NL. (Linnaeus, 1767).] The typical genus of the family Sphingidae. At first it was co-extensive with this family; later it formed a group of variable extent; now it is confined to forms having the head small, the eyes lashed, tibiae spinose, and fore tarsi usually armed with long spines. It is a wide-spread genus; 19 species occur in America north of Mexico. The larvae of this, as well as of other groups of the family Sphingidae, have the habit of erecting the head and anterior segments, from which Linnaeus derived a fanciful resemblance to the Egyptian Sphinx (whence the name).

6. The Guinea baboon, Cynocephalus papio or Papio sphinx. Also called sphinx-baboon.—Abbot's sphinx, Thyreus abboti, a small North American ing coloration, whose larva feeds on purslane.—Satellite sphinx. See satellite-sphinx (with cut).—Walnut-sphinx, Cressonia juglandis, an American moth whose larva feeds on the walnut.

sphinx-moth (sfíngks'môth), n. Same as sphinx, 5 (a).

sphragide (sfraj'id), n. [< F. sphragide, < L. sphragis, < Gr. σφραγίς, a signet, a seal.] Same as Lemnian earth (which see, under Lemnian).

sphragistics (sfra-jis'tiks), n. [< Gr. σφραγιστικός, of, for, or pertaining to sealing, < σφραγίζω, seal, < σφραγίς, a seal.] The study of seals and the distinctions among them; the archæology of seals. This study is similar in its nature to numismatics, and has been of great use in the history of the middle ages, as well as in the investigation of costume, armor, etc.; it is also of value in connection with the documents to which seals are attached, as aiding in their classification and in the proof of their authenticity.

sphrigosis (sfri-gó'sis), n. [NL., for sphrigrisis*; < Gr. σφριγάν, be full and vigorous, + -osis.] Over-rankness in fruit-trees and other plants. It is a disease in which the plant tends to grow to wood or stems and leaves in place of fruit or bulb, etc., or to grow so luxuriantly that the nutritious qualities of the product are injured, as in the turnip and potato. Sphrigosis is sometimes due to over-manuring, sometimes to constitutional defect. Compare rankness, 4.

sphygmie (sfí'g'mik), a. [< Gr. σφύγμικός, pertaining to the pulse, < σφύγξ, the beating of the heart, the pulse: see sphygmus.] 1. Of or pertaining to the pulse.—2. In zool., pulsating or pulsatile; beating with rhythmic contraction and dilatation, like a pulse; specifically, belonging to the Sphygmica.

Sphygmica (sfí'g'mi-kä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. σφύγμικός, pertaining to the pulse: see sphygmie.] A group or series of amœbiform protozoans, in which regularly contractile or sphygmie vacuoles are observed. See Amœboidea.

sphygmogram (sfí'g'mō-gram), n. [< Gr. σφύγ-

Sphygmogram.

μός, pulse, + γράμμα, a writing.] A tracing of the changes of tension at a point in an artery, as obtained with a sphygmograph.

sphygmograph (sfí'g'mō-gráf), n. [< Gr. σφύγμός, pulse, + γράφω, write.] An instrument which, when applied over an artery, traces on Abbot's Sphinx (Thyreus abboti), moth and larva, natural size.

sphinx whose larva feeds on the vine.—Achemon sphinx, Philampelus achemon. See cuts of moth and larva under Philampelus.—Blind-eyed sphinx, Paonias exocatus, a handsome American moth, of a general fawn color, with roseate hind wings ornamented with a blue-centered eyespot, whose larva lives upon the apple.—Carolina sphinx, Protoparce carolina, a mottled gray and black moth whose larva is the tobacco-worm. See cut under tobacco-worm.—Catalpa sphinx, Ceratonia catalpa, an American moth whose larva feeds on the catalpa.—Clear-winged sphinx, a moth whose wings are partly hyaline, as Hemaris diffinis and other members of the same genus; also, improperly, certain of the Senidae. See cut under raspberry-borer.—Death's-head sphinx, Acherontia atropos. See cut under death's-head.—Five-spotted sphinx, Protoparce celeris, a common gray North American moth whose abdomen is marked with five orange spots on each side, and whose larva feeds upon the tomato, potato, and other solanaceous plants. See cut under tomato-worm.—Morning-sphinx, any species of the genus Deilephila, as D. lineata, the white-lined morning-sphinx, a common American moth of strik-

Sphinx.—Greek sculpture in the British Museum.

Sphygmograph.

a, band by which the instrument is fastened on; b, spring which rests upon the artery; c, adjusting-screw (with graduated head) which regulates the pressure of the spring b according as the pulse is strong or weak; d, d, supports for paper upon which the tracing is made; e, feed-roller, between which and the pressure-wheels c, e the paper is carried; f, spring which bears on the shaft of the wheels c, e to engage the paper positively; g, small spring clockwork (incased) by which motion is imparted to the feed-roller e; h, milled-headed winding-key; i, stop-motion; j, tracer attached to the oscillating arm b, which is moved by the rod i that connects this arm with the spring b.

a piece of paper moved by clockwork a curve which indicates the changes of tension of the blood within. The paper is blackened by holding it over a smoking lamp, and the tracer, moving in accordance with the pulsations of the artery, indicates the rapidity, strength, and uniformity of the beats. The tracings are preserved by a thin varnish of gum damar dissolved in benzolin.

sphygmographic (sfīg-mō-graf'ik), a. [Gr. sphygmograph + -ic.] Of or pertaining to, or registered or traced by, the sphygmograph.

sphygmography (sfīg-mō-grā-fī), n. [As sphygmograph + -y.] 1. The act or art of taking pulse-tracings or sphygmograms.—2. A description of the pulse.

sphygmoid (sfīg'moid), a. [Gr. σφγμός, pulse, + -oides, form.] Pulse-like.

sphygmology (sfīg-mō-lō-jī), n. [Gr. σφγμός, pulse, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning the pulse.

sphygmomanometer (sfīg'mō-mā-nom'e-tēr), n. [Gr. σφγμός, pulse, + μέτρον, rare, + μέτρον, measure (cf. manometer).] An instrument for measuring the tension of the blood in an artery.

sphygmometer (sfīg-mō-mē-tēr), n. [Gr. σφγμός, pulse, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as sphygmomanometer.

sphygmophone (sfīg'mō-fōn), n. [Gr. σφγμός, pulse, + φωνή, sound, voice.] An instrument by the aid of which each pulse-beat makes a sound. It is a combination of a kind of sphygmograph with a microphone.

sphygmoscope (sfīg'mō-skōp), n. [Gr. σφγμός, pulse, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument for rendering the arterial pulsations visible. One form of it works by the projection of a ray of light from a mirror which is moved by the pulsation; in another form the impact of the pulsation is received in a reservoir of liquid, which is caused by it to mount in a graduated tube. The invention of the instrument is ascribed to Galileo.

sphygmus (sfīg'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. σφγμός, the beating of the heart, the pulse, < σφίζειν, beat violently, throb.] The pulse.

sphynx, n. An occasional misspelling of sphinx.

Sphyræna (sfī-rē'nī), n. [NL. (Artedi, Bloch, etc.), < L. sphyræna, < Gr. σφίρα, a sea-fish so called, a hammer-fish, < σφίρα, hammer, mallet.] 1. The representative genus of Sphyrænidae. It contains about 20 species of voracious pike-like fishes, of most temperate and tropical seas. S. spet or S. vulgaris is the bécuna, of both coasts of the Atlantic and of the Mediterranean, the sphyreua of the ancients, about 2 feet long, of an olive color, silvery below, when young with dusky blotches. S. argentea of the Pacific coast, abundant from San Francisco southward, about 3 feet long, is an important food-fish. S. plicata, the barracuda of the West Indies, grows to be sometimes 7 or 8 or even, it is claimed, 10 feet long. See cut under bécuna. 2. [l. c.] A fish of this genus.

Sphyrænidæ (sfī-rē'nī-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1831), < Sphyræna + -idæ.] A family of percussive acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Sphyræna. About 20 species are known, all of which are closely related, and usually referred to the single genus Sphyræna. They are mostly inhabitants of the tropical seas; but a few advance northward and southward into cooler waters, as along the United States coast to New England. They are voracious and savage, and the larger ones are much dreaded. See cut under bécuna. Also Sphyrænoidei.

sphyrænine (sfī-rē'nīn), a. [Gr. Sphyræna + -ine.] Same as sphyrænoidei.

sphyrænoidei (sfī-rē'nōidē), a. [Gr. Sphyræna + -oidē.] Of or pertaining to the Sphyrænidæ.

Sphyrna (sfēr'nī), n. [NL. (Rafinesque, 1815), an error for Sphyræna, < Gr. σφίρα, a hammer.] A genus of hammer-headed sharks, giving name to the family Sphyrnidae. It contains those in which the head is most hammer-like, and grooves extend from the nostrils to the front. S. tiburo, the bonnet-shark, is now placed in another genus (Rectapneustes). Zygæna is an exact synonym of Sphyrna, but is preoccupied in entomology. Also called Cestracion (after Klein). See cut under hammerhead.

Sphyrnidae (sfēr'nī-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Sphyrna + -idæ.] A family of anarthrous selachians; the hammer-headed sharks, having an extraordinary conformation of the head. There are 3 genera and 5 or 6 species, found in most seas. The body usually has the common shark-like form; but the head is expanded laterally into a kidney-like shape, or arched like a hammer-head. The eyes are upon the sides of the expanded head, and the nostrils are on the front edge. The fins are like those of ordinary sharks. See cuts under hammerhead and shark. Also called Zygænidæ.

sphyrnine (sfēr'nīn), a. [Gr. Sphyrna + -ine.] Of the character or appearance of a hammer-headed shark; belonging to the Sphyrnidae; zygenine.

Sphyropicus (sfī-rō-pī'kus), n. [NL. (orig. Sphyrapicus, S. F. Baird, 1858), < Gr. σφίρα, a hammer, + πικος, a woodpecker.] A remarkable genus of Picidae, having the tongue obtuse, brushy, and scarcely extensile, owing to the shortness of the hyoid bones, whose horns do not curl up over the hindhead; the sapsuckers, or sapsucking woodpeckers. There are several species, all American, feeding upon soft fruits and sapwood, as well as upon insects. The common yellow-bellied woodpecker of the United States is S. varius, of which a variety, S. nuchalis, is found in the west, and another, S. ruber, has the whole head, neck, and breast carmine-red. A very distinct species is S. thyroideus of the western United States, notable for the great difference between the sexes, which long caused them to be regarded as different species, and even placed in different genera. The condition of the hyoid apparatus in this genus is unique, though an approach to it is seen in the genus Xenopicus. See cut under sapsucker.

spialt (spī'al), n. [Early mod. E. also spyal, spyal; by aphesis from espial: see espial, and cf. spion, spy.] 1. Close or secret watch; espial.

I have those eyes and ears shall still keep guard
And spial on thee. B. Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2.

2. A spy; a watcher; a scout.

Secretaries and spials of princes and states bring in bills for intelligence. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

spiauterite (spī-ā'tēr-it), n. [Gr. spiauter, spelter (see spelter), + -ite.] Same as wurtzite.

spica (spī'kă), n. [L. spica, a point, spike, ear of grain: see spike.] 1. In bot., a spike.

—2. In surg., a spiral bandage with reversed turns: so named because it was thought to resemble a spike of barley.—3. In ornith., a spur; a calcar.—4. [cap.] In astron., a very white star of magnitude 1.2, the sixteenth in order of brightness in the heavens, a Virginis, situated on the left hand of the Virgin.—Spica celtica, an old name of Valeriana Celtica.—Spica nardi. Same as spikenard.

spical (spī'kal), a. [*NL. spicalis, < L. spica, a spike: see spike.] Same as spicate: as, the spical palpi of a dipterous insect.

Spicatæ (spī-kā'tē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of L. spicatus, spiked: see spicate.] A section of penatulooid polyps, distinguished by a bilateral arrangement of the polyps on the rachis, which is elongate, cylindrical, and destitute of pinules.

spicate (spī'kāt), a. [L. spicatus, spiked, pp. of spicare, furnish with spikes, < spica, a spike: see spike.] 1. In bot., having the form of a spike; arranged or disposed in spikes.—2. In ornith., spurred; calcarate; spiciferous.

spicated (spī'kāt-ed), a. [Gr. spicate + -ed.] In bot., same as spicate.

spicateous (spī-kā'tē-us), a. [Irreg. < spicate + -ous.] In zool., spicate; specifically, of or pertaining to the Spicatæ.

spicatum (spī-kā'tum), n. [L., sc. opus, lit. 'spicate work': see spicate.] In anc. masonry, herring-bone work: so called from the resemblance of the position of the blocks of any two contiguous courses to that of the grains in an ear of wheat.

spicato (spī-kā'tō), a. [It., pp. of spiccare, detach, divide.] In music, same as picchetato.

spice (spīs), n. [ME. spice, spye, spye, spece, species, kind, spice (lecl. spiz, spices, < E.), < OF. espice, espece, kind, spice, F. épice, spice, espèce, kind, species, espèces, pl., specie, = Fr. espèce, especi = Sp. especie, spice, especie, species, = Pg. especie, spice, especie, species, specie, = It. specie, species, kind, pl. species, drugs, < L. species, look, appearance, kind, species, etc., LL. also spices, drugs, etc. (ML. espicia, after Rom.): see species. Doublet of species and specie.] 1. Kind; sort; variety; species.

The spices of penance ben three. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.
Justice, all though it be but one . . . vertue, yet is it described in two kyndes or spices.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 1.

The very calling it a Bartholomew pig, and to eat it so, is a spice of idolatry. B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, i. 1.

2. Kind of thing; anything of the kind or class before indicated; such sort: used demonstratively or indefinitely.

Chydnye comys of hert hy,
And grett pride and velany,
And other spye that mekyle deres.

Il. de Brunne, MS. Boves, p. 31. (Halliwell.)

At that toucheth dedly synne

In any spye that we falle ynne.

MS. Harl. 1701, f. 1. (Halliwell.)

For trowthe telleth that lone is triacle of heuene;
May no synne be on him sene that vseth that spise.

Piers Plowman (B), i. 147.

3. An exemplification of the kind of thing mentioned; specimen; sample; instance; piece.

Whanne he seeth the lepre in the skynne, and the heeris chaungid into whijt colour, and thilk spise of lepre lower than the skynne and that other flesch, a plage of lepre it is.

Wyclif, Lev. xiii. 3.

He hath spices of them all, not all. Shak., Cor., iv. 7. 46.

4. A characteristic touch or taste; a modicum, smack, or flavoring, as of something piquant or exciting to the mind: as, a spice of roguery or of adventure. [In this sense now regarded as a figurative use of def. 5; compare sauce in a similar figurative use.]

I think I may pronounce of them, as I heard good Senecio, with a spice of the wit of the last age, say, viz., "That a merry fellow is the saddest fellow in the world."

Steele, Tatler, No. 45.

The world loves a spice of wickedness.

Longfellow, Hyperion, l. 7.

5. A substance aromatic or pungent to the taste, or to both taste and smell; a drug; a savory or piquant condiment or eatable; a relish. The word in this sense formerly had a much wider range than at present (def. 6); it is still used in northern England as including sweetmeats, gingerbread, cake, and any kind of dried fruit.

"Hastow auzte in thi purs, any hote spices?"
"I haue peper and piones [peony-seeds]," quod she, "and a pounce of garlike, A ferthyngworth of fenel-seed for fastyngdayes."

Piers Plowman (B), v. 311.

Now, specifically.—6. One of a class of aromatic vegetable condiments used for the seasoning of food, commonly in a pulverized state, as pepper, allspice, nutmeg, ginger, cinnamon, and cloves; collectively, such substances as a class: as, the trade in spices or spice.

So was her love diffused; but, like to some odorous spices, Suffered no waste nor loss, though filling the air with aroma.

Longfellow, Evangeline, ll. 5.

7. A piquant odor or odorous substance, especially of vegetable origin; a spicy smell. [Poetical.]

The woodbine spices are wafted abroad,
And the musk of the rose is blown.

Temnyson, Maud, xxii.

8. Figuratively, a piquant concomitant; an engaging accompaniment or incident; an attractive or enjoyable variation.

Is not birth . . . youth, liberality, and such like, the spice and salt that season a man?

Shak., T. and C., i. 2. 277.

Variety's the very spice of life,
That gives it all its flavour.

Courper, Task, ll. 606.

Madagascar spice, the clove-nutmeg. See Ravensara.—Spice plaster. See plaster.—Syn. 4. Relish, savor, dash.

spice (spīs), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiced, ppr. spicing. [ME. spice, < OF. espicer, F. épicer = Sp. especiar, spice; from the noun.] 1. To prepare with a condiment or seasoning, especially of something aromatic or piquant; season or temper with a spice or spices: as, highly spiced food; to spice wine.

Shulde no curyous clothe comen on hys rugge,
Ne no mete in his mouth that maister Iohan spiced.

Piers Plowman (B), xix. 232.

2. To vary or diversify, as speech, with words or matter of a different kind or tenor; interlard; make spicy, piquant, or entertaining: as, to spice one's talk with oaths, quips, or scandal; to spice a sermon with anecdotes.

In decorative art, a cylindrical box, low in proportion to its diameter, and having a lid; especially, such a box of Indian or other Oriental work. Spice-boxes are usually of metal, often of gold or silver, and decorated with damascening or otherwise.

Small boxes of very graceful form, covered with the most delicate tracery, and known to Europeans as spice-boxes.

G. C. M. Birdwood, Indian Arts, l. 160.

spice-bush (spīs'bush), n. A North American shrub, Lindera Benzoin, the bark and leaves of which have a spicy odor, bearing small yellow flowers very early in the spring and oval scarlet berries in late summer. See Lindera and fever-bush. Also spice-wood.

spice-cake (spīs'kāk), n. A cake flavored with a spice of some kind, as ginger, nutmeg, or cinnamon.

She's g'en him to eat the good spice-cake,
She's g'en him to drink the blood-red wine.

Young Beichan and Susie Pye (Child's Ballads, IV. 5).

A spice-cake, which followed by way of dessert, vanished like a vision.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, l.

spiced (spist), p. a. [< ME. spiced; < spice¹ + -ed².] 1. Impregnated with an aromatic odor; spicy to the smell; spice-laden.

In the spiced Indian air, by night,
Full often hath she gossip'd by my side.
Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 124.

Spiced carnations of rose and garnet crowned their bed
In July and August.

R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 39.

2†. Particular as to detail; over-nice in matters of conscience or the like; scrupulous; squeamish.

Ye sholde been al pacient and meke,
And han a sweete, spiced conscience,
Sith ye so preche of Jobes patience.
Chaucer, Prolog. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 435.

Take it: 'tis yours;
Be not so spiced: 'tis good gold,
And goodness is no gall to the conscience.
Fletcher, Mad Lover, iii. 1.

spiceful (spis'fūl), a. [< spice¹ + -ful.] Spice-laden; spicy; aromatic.

The scorching sky

A, natural size; B, two of the sacs with colored vesicles and spicules which lie in the investing protoplasm, magnified.

calcareous or silicious, coherent or detached. See cuts under Radiolaria and Spherosomum. (b) One of the spines of echinoderms, sometimes of great size, and bristling over the surface of the test, as in sea-urchins, or small, and embedded in the integument, as in holothurians; sometimes of singular shape, like wheels, anchors, etc. See cuts under ancestral, Echinometra, Echinus, and Spatangus. (c) In sponges, a spiculum; one of the hard calcareous or silicious bodies, of whatever shape, which enter into the composition of the skeleton; a mineral sclere: a sponge-spicule (which see). Some sponges mostly consist of spicules, as that figured under Euplectella. (d) In some worms and mollusks, a dart-like organ constituting a kind of penis; a spiculum (which see). (e) In entom.: (1) A minute spine or spinous process. (2) The piercing ovipositor of any insect; especially, the lancet-like portion of the sting of a parasitic hymenopter. See Spiculifera.

spicule-sheath (spik'ūl-shēth), n. A thin layer of organic substance forming the sheath or investment of a sponge-spicule.

Spiculifera (spik'ū-lif'ē-rā), n. pl. [NL.: see spiculiferous.] In Westwood's classification of insects, a division of Hymenoptera, in which the abdomen is, in the female, armed with a long plurivalve ovipositor, and the larvae are footless. It contains the Ichneumonina (including braconids), the evanids, the proctotrypids, the chalcids, and the cynipids or gall-flies. It thus corresponds to the Pupipora of Latreille, except in excluding the Chrysidoidea as Tubulifera.

spiculiferous (spik'ū-lif'ē-rus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + ferre = E. bear¹.] In zool., having a spiculum or spicula; spicular or spiculous; specifically, in entom., having a piercing ovipositor; of or pertaining to the Spiculifera. Also spiculigerous.

spiculiform (spik'ū-lif'ōrm), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + forma, form.] In bot. and zool., having the form of a spicule; being of the nature of a spicule.

spiculigenous (spik'ū-lif'ē-nus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + -genus, producing: see -genous.] Producing spicules; giving origin to spicules; spiculiferous: as, the spiculigenous tissue of a sponge.

spiculigerous (spik'ū-lif'ē-rus), a. [< L. spiculum, a spicule, + gerere, carry.] Same as spiculiferous.

spiculose (spik'ū-lōs), a. [< NL. spiculosus: see spiculous.] Same as spiculous.

spiculous (spik'ū-lus), a. [Also spiculose; < NL. spiculosus, < L. spiculum, a spicule: see spicule.] Having spicules; spinulose; spiculose or spiculiferous.

spiculum (spik'ū-lum), n.; pl. spicula (-lā). [NL., < L. spiculum, a little sharp point: see spicule.] In zool., a spicula or spicule. Specifically—(a) In some worms, a chitinous rod developed in the cloaca as a copulatory organ; a kind of penis. (b) In some mollusks, as snails, the love-dart, a kind of penis, more fully called speculum amoris. (c) In insects, the piercing non-poisonous ovipositor of the Spiculifera.

spicy (spi'si), a. [< spice¹ + -y¹.] 1. Producing spice; abounding with spices.

As . . . off at sea north-east winds blow
Sabeian odours from the spicy shore
Of Araby the bless'd.
Milton, P. L., IV. 162.

2. Having the qualities of spice; flavored with spice; fragrant; aromatic: as, spicy plants.

The spicy nut-brown ale. Milton, L'Allegro, l. 100.

Under southern skies exalt their sails,
Led by new stars, and borne by spicy gales!
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 392.

3. Highly flavored; pungent; keen; pointed; racy: as, a spicy letter or debate. [Colloq.]

Your hint about letter-writing for the papers is not a bad one. . . . A political surmise, a spicy bit of scandal, a sensation trial, wound up with a few moral reflections upon how much better we do the same sort of thing at home. Lever, A Rent in a Cloud, p. 58.

4. Stylish; showy; smart in appearance: as, a spicy garment; to look spicy. [Slang.]

"Bless'd if there isn't Snipe dismounting at the gate!" he exclaimed joyfully; "there's a drummer holding his nag. What a spicy chestnut it is!"

Whyte Melville, White Rose, l. xiii.

=Syn. 3. Racy. Spicy. See racy.

spider (spî'dér), n. [An altered form of spither*, < ME. spither, dat. spithre, < AS. spīther*, orig. spinther*, with formative -ther of the agent, < spinnan, spin: see spin. Cf. *spinner*¹, a spider; D. spin = OHG. spinnā, MHG. G. spinne, a spider, lit. 'spinner.' For other E. names, see atercop, *cop*², *lob*¹, *lop*².] 1. An arthropod of the order Araneæ, Araneina, or Araneida (the old Linnean genus Aranea), of the class Arachnida, of which there are many families, hundreds of genera, and thousands of species, found all over the world. Though popularly considered insects, spiders are not true Insecta, since they have eight instead of only six legs, normally seven-jointed, and no wings are developed. They are dimersomatous—that is, have the body divided into two principal regions, the cephalothorax, or head and chest together, and the abdomen, which is generally tumid or globose, whence the name Sphærogaster. No antennae are developed as such, but there are raporial organs called palps, which are subchelate—that is, have a distal joint folding down on the next like the blade of a pocket-knife. (See cut under falc.) In those species which are poisonous the palps are traversed by the duct of a venom-gland. Some spiders are by far the most venomous animals in existence in proportion to their size: that the bite of a spider can be fatal to man (and there are authentic instances of this) implies a venom vastly more powerful than that of the most poisonous snakes. (See kati and Latrodectus.) Spiders breathe by means of pulmonary sacs, or lung-sacs, nearly always in connection with tracheæ or spiracles, whence they are called pulmo-tracheal; these sacs are two or four in number, whence a division of spiders into dipneumonous and tetrapneumonous araneids. (See Dipneumones, 2, Tetrapneumones.) Most spiders belong to the former division. They have usually eight eyes, sometimes six, rarely four, in one genus (Nops) only two. The abdomen is always distinct, ordinarily globose, never segmented, and provided with two or more pairs of spinnerets. (See cut under arachnidium.) The characteristic habit of spiders is to spin webs to catch their prey, or to make a nest for themselves, or for both these purposes. Cobweb is a fine silky substance secreted by the arachnidium, or arachnidial glands, and conducted by ducts to the several, usually six, arachnidial mamillæ, which open on papillæ at or near the end of the abdomen, and through which the viscid material is spun out in fine gossamer threads. Gossamer or spider-silk serves not only to construct the webs, but also to let the spider drop speedily from one place to another, to throw a "flying bridge" across an interval, or even to enable some species to "fly"—that is, be buoyed up in the air and wafted a great distance. It has occasionally been woven artificially into a textile fabric, and is a well-known domestic application for stanching blood. (See cut under silk-spider.) Some spiders are sedentary, others vagabond; the former are called orbicularian, reticularian, tubularian, etc., according to the character of their webs. Spiders move by running in various directions, or by leaping; whence the vagabond species have been described as rectigrade, laterigrade, cicigrade, saltigrade, etc. They lay numerous eggs, usually inclosed in a case or cocoon. The male is commonly much smaller than the female, and in impregnating the female runs great risk of being devoured. The difference in size is as if the human female should be some 60 or 70 feet tall. (See cut under silk-spider.) Spiders are carnivorous and highly predatory. Some of the largest kinds are able to kill small birds, whence the name bird-spiders of some of the great hairy mygalids. (See cut under bird-spider.) A few are aquatic, as the water-spiders of the genus Argyroneta (which see, with cut). Wolf-spiders or tarantulas belong to the family Lycodæ; but the name tarantula is more frequently applied to the Mygalidæ (or Theraphosidæ). The common garden-spider or diadem-spider of Europe is Epeira diademata; that of the United States is E. copinaria (or riparia). See Araneida, and cuts under chelicera, cross-spider, pulmonary, and tarantula.

My brain, more busy than the labouring spider,
Weaves tedious snares to trap mine enemies.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. l. 339.

Female of Latrodectus mactans, enlarged one quarter.
a, under side of abdomen.

2. Some other arachnidian, resembling or mistaken for a spider; a spider-mite. See red-spider.—3. A spider-crab; a sea-spider.—4. A cooking-utensil having legs or feet to keep it from contact with the coals: named from a fancied resemblance to the insect—the ordinary frying-pan is, however, sometimes erroneously termed a spider. (a) A kind of deep frying-pan, commonly with three feet.

Some people like the sound of bubbling in a boiling pot, or the fizzing of a frying-spider.

C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 10.

Haah was warmed up in the spider.

J. T. Trounbridge, Coupon Bonds, p. 113.

(b) A trivet; a low tripod used to support a dish, or the like, in front of a fire.

5. In mach.: (a) A skeleton of radiating spokes, as a rag-wheel. (b) The internal frame or skeleton of a gear-wheel, for instance, on which a cogged rim may be bolted, shrunk, or cast. (c) The solid interior part of a piston, to which the packing is attached, and to whose axis the piston-rod is secured. E. H. Knight.

—6. Naut., an iron outrigger to keep a block clear of the ship's side.—Geometrical spider. See geometric.—Grass-spider, one of many different spiders, as species of Agalena, which spin webs on the grass, such as may be seen spangled with dew in the morning in meadows.—Round-web spider, one of many orbicular spiders, as species of Epeira (see, also, cut under cross-spider).—Spider couching. See couching, 5.—Trap-door spider. See Cteniza, Mygalidæ, trap-door, and cut under Araneida. (See also bird-spider, crab-spider, diving-spider, garden-spider, house-spider, jumping-spider, sea-spider, silk-spider, water-spider, wolf-spider.)

spider-ant (spî'dér-ant), n. A solitary ant of the family Mutillidæ; so called from the spider-like aspect of the females.

spider-band (spî'dér-band), n. Naut., an iron hoop round a mast to which the lower ends of the futtock-shrouds are secured; also, a hoop round a mast provided with belaying-pins. See cut under futtock-shrouds.

spider-bug (spî'dér-bug), n. A long-legged heteropterous insect of the family Emesidæ, Emesa longipes, somewhat resembling a spider. See cut under stick-bug. [U. S.]

spider-catcher (spî'dér-kach'er), n. A bird that catches spiders. Specifically—(a) The wall-creeper, Tychodroma muraria. See cut under Tychodroma. (b) pl. The genus Arachnothera in a broad sense, numerous species of which inhabit the Indo-Malayan region. They are small creeper-like birds with long bills, and belong to the family Nectariniidæ. Also called spider-eaters and spider-hunters.

spider-cells (spî'dér-selz), n. pl. Neuroglia cells.

spider-cot (spî'dér-kot), n. Same as spider-veb.

spider-crab (spî'dér-krab), n. A spider-like crab, or sea-spider, with long slender legs and comparatively small triangular body. The name is given to many such crabs, of different families, but especially to the malodids, or crabs of the family Malodæ, such as Maia squinado, the common spinous spider-crab of Great Britain, and species of Libinia, Inachus, etc. The giant Japanese spider-crab, Macrochira kaempferi, is the largest crustacean. See cuts under Leptopodia, Lithodes, Maia, and Oxyrhyncha.

spider-diver (spî'dér-dî'vër), n. The little grebe, or dabchick. [Local, British.]

spider-eater (spî'dér-é'tër), n. Same as spider-catcher (b).

I obtained an interesting bird, a green species of Spider-eater. H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 233.

spidered (spî'dér-d), a. [Spider + -ed².] Infested with spiders; cobwebbed. [Rare.]

Content can visit the poor spidered room.
Wolcott (Peter Findar), p. 39. (Davies.)

Spider-catcher (Arachnothera magna).

A Spider-crab (Inachus dorsettensis), male.

spider-flower (spî'dér-flou'ër), n. 1. A plant of the former genus Lasiandra of the Melastomaceæ, now included in Tibouchina. The species are elegant hothouse shrubs from Brazil, bearing large purple flowers.—2. A plant of the genus Cleome, especially C. spinosa (C. pun-gens), a native of tropical America, escaped from gardens in the southern United States. The stipules are spinous, the flowers large, rose-purple to white, with long stamens and style, suggesting the name. See cut under Cleome.

spider-fly (spî'dér-flî), n. A parasitic pupiparous dipterous insect, as a bee-louse, bat-louse, bird-louse, bat-fly, sheep-tick, etc. They are of three families, Brachidæ, Nycteribidæ, and Hippoboscidæ. Some of them, especially the wingless forms, as Nycteribia, closely resemble spiders in superficial appearance. See cut under sheep-tick.

spider-helmet (spî'dér-hel'met), n. A name given to the skeleton head-pieces sometimes worn. See secret, n., 9.

spider-hunter (spî'dér-hun'tër), n. Same as spider-catcher (b).

spider-legs (spî'dér-legz), n. pl. In gilding, irregular fractures sometimes occurring when gold-leaf is fitted over a molding having deep depressions.

spider-line (spî'dér-lin), n. One of the threads of a spider's web substituted for wires in micrometer-scales intended for delicate astronomical observations.

The transit of the star is observed over spider lines stretched in the field, while a second observer reads the altitude of this star from the divided circle.

The Century, XXXVI. 608.

spider-mite (spî'dér-mit), n. A parasitic mite or acarid of the family Gamasidæ.

spider-monkey (spî'dér-mung'ki), n. A tropical American platyrrhine monkey, of the family Cebidæ, subfamily Cebinæ, and genera Ateles and Brachyteles; a kind of sajou or sapajou, likened to a spider by reason of the very long and slim limbs, and long prehensile tail. They are large slender-bodied monkeys of great agility and of arboreal habits, with the thumb absent or imperfect. Brachyteles (or Eriodes) arachnoides is a Brazilian spider-monkey called the miriki. Ateles paniscus is the large black spider-monkey, or colata; A. melanochir is the black-handed spider-monkey; and many more species or varieties of this genus have been named. One of the spider-monkeys, A. velleronus, is among the most northerly of American monkeys, extending into Mexico to Orizaba and Oajaca. The flesh of some species is used for food, and the pelts have a commercial value. See also cut under Eriodes.

A Spider-monkey (Ateles paniscus).

spider-net (spî'dér-net), n. Netting by spider-stitch.

spider-orchid (spî'dér-ör'kis), n. A European orchid, Ophrys aranifera. It has an erect stem from 9 to 18 inches high, with a few leaves near the base, and a loose spike of few small flowers with broad dull-brown lip and parts so shaped and arranged as somewhat to resemble a spider.

spider-shell (spî'dér-shel), n. The shell of a gastropod of the family Strombidæ and genus Pteroceras; a scorpion-shell, having the outer lip expanded into a number of spines. The species inhabit the Indian and tropical Pacific oceans. See cut under scorpion-shell.

spider-stitch (spî'dér-stich), n. A stitch in darned netting and in guipure, by which open spaces are partly filled with threads carried diagonally and parallel to each other, the effect of several squares together being that of a spider-web.

spider-wasp (spí'dér-wosp), n. Any true wasp of the family Pompilidae, which stores its nest with spiders for its young, as Ceropales rufiventris of North America, which lays its eggs in the mud nests of Agania. See cut under Agania.

spider-web (spí'dér-web), n. The web or net spun by a spider; cobweb; gossamer. Also spider-cot.

spider-wheel (spí'dér-hwél), n. In embroidery, any circular pattern or unit of design open and having radiating and concentric lines. Compare catharine-wheel, 4.

spider-work (spí'dér-wérk), n. Lace worked by spider-stitch.

spiderwort (spí'dér-wért), n. 1. A plant of the genus Tradescantia, especially T. virginica, the common garden species. It is a native of the central and southern United States, and was early introduced into European gardens. The petals are very delicate and ephemeral; in the wild plant they are blue, in cultivation variable in color, often reddish-violet.

Spiderwort (Tradescantia virginica). 1, the inflorescence; 2, the lower part of the stem with the root.

2. By extension, any plant of the order Commelinaceae; specifically, Commelina celestis, a blue-flowered plant from Mexico. The name is also given to Lloydia serotina, mountain-spiderwort; to Anthericum (Phalangium) lilago, St. Bernard's lily; and to Paradisa (Cacalia) liliumstrum, St. Bruno's lily—all Old World plants, the last two ornamental.

spidery (spí'dér-i), a. [spider + -y]. Spider-like. Cotgrave.

spier, v. and n. An old spelling of spy.

spiegel (spé'gl), n. [Short for spiegeleisen.] Same as spiegeleisen.—Spiegel-iron. Same as spiegeleisen.

spiegeleisen (spé'gl-i-'zen), n. [G., < spiegel (< L. speculum), a mirror, + eisen = E. iron.] A pig-iron containing from eight to fifteen or more per cent. of manganese. Its fracture often presents large well-developed crystalline planes. This alloy, as well as ferromanganese, an iron containing still more manganese than spiegeleisen, is extensively used in the manufacture of Bessemer steel, and is a necessary adjunct to that process. Also called spiegel-iron.

spiegelerz (spé'gl-erz), n. [G., < spiegel, a mirror, + erz, ore.] Specular ironstone: a variety of hematite.

spier (spí'ér), n. [< spy + -er]. One who spies; a spy; a scout. Halliwel.

spier, v. See speer.

spiffy (spif'i), a. [Origin obscure.] Spruce; well-dressed. [Slang, Eng.] spificate (spif'i-kát), v. t.; pret. and pp. spificated, ppr. spificating. [Also spifficate, smiffigate; appar. a made word, simulating a L. origin.] 1. To beat severely; confound; dismay. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.—2. To stifle; suffocate; kill. [Slang.]

So out with your whinger at once,
And scrag Jane while I spificate Johnny.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 166.

spification (spif-i-ká'shon), n. [< spificate + -ion.] The act of spificating, or the state of being spificated; annihilation. [Slang.]

Whose blood he vowed to drink—the Oriental form of threatening spification. R. F. Burton, El-Medina, I. 204.

Spigelia (spi-jé'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), named after Adrian van der Spiegel (1558–1625), a Belgian physician and professor of anatomy at Padua.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Loganiaceae and tribe Euloganieae, type of the subtribe Spigeliæ. It is characterized by flowers commonly disposed in one-sided spikes, the corolla with valvate lobes, a jointed style, and a two-celled ovary becoming in fruit a compressed twin capsule which is circumscissile above the cup-shaped persistent base. There are about 30 species, natives of America and mostly tropical, 5 extending into the United States; of these 2 are confined to Florida, 2 to Texas, and 1, S. Marylandica, the Maryland pinkroot or worm-grass, reaches Pennsylvania and Wisconsin. They are annual or perennial herbs, rarely somewhat shrubby, either smooth, downy, or woolly, bearing opposite feather-veined or rarely nerved leaves, which are connected by a line or transverse membrane or by stipules. The flowers are usually red, yellow, or purplish, and the many-flowered second and curving spikes are often very handsome. In S. Anthelmia, the Demerara pinkroot, the flowers are white and pink, followed by purple fruit, and the two pairs of upper leaves are crowded in an apparent whorl. See pinkroot.

Spigelian (spi-jé'li-an), a. [< Spiegel (see Spigelia) + -ian.] In anat., noting the lobulus Spigelii, one of the lobes of the liver.

spight, n. See speight.

spight, n. and v. An obsolete erroneous spelling of spite.

spignel, n. See spicknel.

spignet (spig'net), n. [A corruption of spike-nard.] The American spikenard, Aralia racemosa. See spikenard.

spigot (spig'ot), n. [Early mod. E. also spigot, spiggot, spiggotte, spygotte, < ME. spigot, spygott, spygott, speget; obs. or dial. also spicket, < ME. spykkt, spykette; appar. < Ir. Gael. spioicad, a spigot (= W. ysbigod, a spigot, spindle), dim. of Ir. spíce = W. ysbig, a spike, < L. spica, spicus, a point, spike: see spike.] The Celtic forms may be from the E.] A small peg or plug designed to be driven into a gimlet-hole in a cask through which, when open, the contained liquor is drawn off; hence, by extension, any plug fitting into a faucet used for drawing off liquor.

He runs down into the Cellar, and takes the Spiggott. In the mean time all the Beer runs about the House.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 63.

spigot-joint (spig'ot-joint), n. A pipe-joint made by tapering down the end of one piece and inserting it into a correspondingly widened opening in the end of another piece. Also called faucet-joint. E. H. Knight.

spigot-pot (spig'ot-pot), n. A vessel of earthenware or porcelain with a hole in the side, near the bottom, for the insertion of a spigot.

spigurnelt, n. [ML. spigurnellus; origin obscure.] In law, a name formerly given to the sealer of the writs in chancery.

These Bohuns . . . were by inheritance for a good while the king's spigurnells—that is, the sealers of his writs.

Holland, tr. of Camden, p. 312.

spike (spik), n. [Early mod. E. also spike; < ME. spik = Icel. spik = Sw. spik, a spike, = Ir. spíce = W. ysbig, a spike; cf. MD. spijker, D. spijker = MLG. LG. spiker = OHG. spicari, spichari, spihiri, MHG. spicher, G. speicher-nagel, spiker = Norw. spiker = Dan. spiger (with added suffix -er); cf. (with loss of initial s) Ir. pice, Gael. pic, W. pig, a peak, pike (see pike); = Sp. Pg. espiga = It. spiga, a spike, = OF. espi, espy, a pointed ornament, also OF. espi, F. épi, wheat; < L. spica, f., also spicus, m., and spicum, neut., a point, spike, ear of corn, the top, tuft, or head of a plant (spicus crinalis or spicum crinale, a hair-pin). Hence spicous, spicose, etc., and ult. spike, spigot, pike, pick, etc., spine, etc.] 1. A sharp point; a pike; a sharp-pointed projection. (a) A long nail or pointed iron inserted in something with the point outward, as in chevaux-de-frise, the top of a wall, gate, or the like, as a defense or to a, dock-spike, used in building docks and piers; b, cut-spike, or large cut nail; c, d, railway-spikes, for fastening rails to sleepers; e, barbed spike; f, barbed and forked spike; g, h, types of forked spikes, the points of which spread and become hooked in the timber when driven, thus making them extremely difficult to draw out.

hinder passage. See cut under chevaux-de-frise. (b) A sharp projecting point on the sole of a shoe, to prevent slipping, as on ice or soft wet ground. (c) The central boss of a shield or buckler when prolonged to a sharp point. Such a spike is sometimes a mere pointed umbo and sometimes a square or three-cornered steel blade screwed or bolted into the boss. (d) In zool.: (1) The antler of a young deer, when straight and without snag or tine; a spike-horn. (2) A young mackerel 6 or 7 inches long. (3) A spine, as of some animals. (e) A piece of hardened steel, with a soft point that can be clenched, used to plug up the vent of a cannon in order to render it useless to an enemy.

2. A large nail or pin, generally of iron. The larger forms of spikes, particularly railroad-spikes, are chisel-pointed, and have a head or fang projecting to one side to bite the rail. Spikes are also made split, barbed, grooved, and of other shapes. See cut in preceding column.

3. An ear, as of wheat or other grain.

Bots yf the seed that sowen is in the alosh sterue,
Shall neuere spir springen vp, ne spik on strawe curne.

Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 180.

4. In bot., a flower-cluster or form of inflorescence in which the flowers are sessile (or apparently so) along an elongated, unbranched common axis, as in the well-known mullein and plantain. There are two modifications of the spike that have received distinct names, although not distinguishable by exact and constant characters. They are spadix and catkin. In the Equisetaceae a spike is an aggregation of sporophylls at the apex of a shoot. Compare raceme, and see cuts under inflorescence, barley, papyrus, and Equisetaceae.

Hence—5. A sprig of some plant in which the flowers form a spike or somewhat spike-like cluster: as, a spike of lavender.

The head of Nardus spreadeth into certayne spikes or cares, whereby it hath a twofold use, both of spike and also of leaf; in which regard it is so famous.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xii. 12.

Within, a stag-horned sumach grows,
Fern-leaved, with spikes of red.

Whittier, The Old Burying-Ground.

spike (spik), v. t.; pret. and pp. spiked, ppr. spiking. [< spike, n.] 1. To fasten with spikes or long and large nails: as, to spike down the planks of a floor or a bridge.—2. To set with spikes; furnish with spikes.—3. To fix upon a spike.—4. To make sharp at the end. Johnson.—5. To plug up the vent of with a spike, as a cannon.—Spike loosestrife. See loosestrife.

spike (spik), n. [= MD. spijcke, spick, D. spijk, < OF. spique, F. spic, lavender; cf. NL. Lavan-dula Spica, spike-lavender; < L. spica, a spike: see spike.] Cf. aspice.] Same as spike-lavender.—Oil of spike. See oil of lavender, under lavender.

spikebill (spik'bil), n. 1. A merganser, as the hooded merganser; a sawbill. See cut under merganser. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Michigan].—2. The great marbled godwit, Limosa fedoa. G. Trumbull, 1888. [New Jersey].

spike-extractor (spik'eks-trak'tor), n. An apparatus for extracting spikes, as from a rail.

spikenard (spik'nárd), n. [< ME. spikenard, spikenarde, spyknaerd, spikanard, < OF. spique-nard (also simply espic, spic) = Sp. espicanardi, espica nardo = Pg. spicanardo, espicanardo = It. spiganardo, formerly spigo nardo, = MD. spijk-nard = MHG. spicanarde, nardespicke, G. spicknard, < L. spica nardi, 'a spike of nard' (ML. also nardus spicatus, 'spiked nard'): L. spica, spike; nardi, gen. of nardus, nard: see spike and nard.] 1. A plant, the source of a famous perfumed unguent of the ancients, now believed to be Nardostachys jatamansi, closely allied to valerian, found in the Himalayan region. This plant is known to have been used by the Hindus as a medicine and perfume from a very remote period, and is at present employed chiefly in hair-washes and ointments. The odor is heavy and peculiar, described as resembling that of a mixture of valerian and patchouli. The market drug consists of short pieces of the rootstock densely covered with fibers, the remains of leafstalks. Also nard.

Spikenard (Nardostachys jatamansi).

2. An aromatic ointment of ancient times, in which spikenard was the characteristic ingredient; nard. It was extremely costly.

There came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious, and she brake the box, and poured it on his head. Mark xiv. 3.

3. A name given to various fragrant essential oils.—American spikenard, a much-branched herbaceous plant, Aralia racemosa, with a short thick rootstock more spicy than that of A. nudicaulis, the wild sarsaparilla, and like that, used in domestic medicine in place of true sarsaparilla. The A. nudicaulis is sometimes named small spikenard, while A. racemosa, the angelica-tree, has been called spikenard-tree.—Celtic spikenard, Valeriana Celtica of the Alps, Apennines, etc.—Cretan spikenard, Valeriana Phu, an Asiatic plant, sometimes cultivated in Europe, but medicinally weaker than the official valerian.—False spikenard, an American plant, Smilacina racemosa, somewhat resembling the true (American) spikenard. Also false Solomon's seal.—Indian spikenard, the true spikenard. See def. 1.—Flowman's spikenard, a European plant, Inula Conyza, so called from its fragrant root and from being confounded with a plant by some writers called nardus rustica or cloven-nard. Prior.—Small spikenard. See American spikenard.—West Indian spikenard, a fragrant weed, Hyptis suaveolens, sometimes cultivated for medicinal use.

ones are secondary parasites. S. maris is a common parasite of the large native American silkworms, such as the polyphemus and cecropia.

Spilogale (spi-log'a-lê), n. [NL., < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + γαλήν, contr. of γαλέν, a weasel.] A genus of American skunks, differing from Mephitis in certain cranial characters. The skull is depressed, with highly arched zygomatics, well-developed postorbital and slight mastoid processes, and peculiarly bullous petrotic region. S. putorius, formerly Mephitis bicolor, is the little striped or spotted skunk of the United States. It is black or blackish, with numerous white stripes and spots in endless diversity of detail. The length is scarcely 12 inches without the tail, which is shorter than the rest of the animal. The genus was named by J. E. Gray in 1865. See cut in next column.

Little Striped Skunk (Spilogale putorius).

Spilornis (spi-lôr'nis), n. [NL. (G. R. Gray, 1840), < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + ὄρνις, a bird.] A genus of large spotted and crested hawks, of the family Falconidae, having the tarsi bare below, the nostrils oval and perpendicular, and the crest-feathers rounded. There are several species of India, and thence through the Indo-Malayan region to Celebes and the Sulu and Philippine Islands. The best-known is the cheela, S. cheela, of India. The bacha, S. bacha, inhabits Java, Sumatra, and Malacca; S. pallidus is found in Borneo, S. rufpectus in Celebes, S. sulensis in the Sulu Islands, and S. holospilus in the Philippines.

Crested Serpent-eagle, or Cheela (Spilornis cheela).

spilosite (spil'ô-sit), n. [Irreg. < Gr. σπίλος, a spot, + *-ite*².] A name given by Zincken to a rock occurring in the Harz, near the borders of the granitic mass of the Ramberg, apparently the result of contact metamorphism of the slate in the vicinity of granite or diorite. The most prominent visible feature of this change in the slate is the occurrence of spots; hence the rock has been called by the Germans Fleckenachifer, while rocks of a similar origin, but striped instead of spotted, are known as Bänderschiefer. Similar phenomena of contact metamorphism have been observed in other regions and described by various authors, and such altered slates are called by English geologists spotted schists, chistolite schists, and andalusite schists, etc.

Spilotes (spi-lô'téz), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1830), as if < Gr. σπίλωρής, < σπίλον, stain, < σπίλος, a spot.] A genus of colubrine serpents, having smooth equal teeth, one median dorsal row of scales, internasals not confluent with nasals, two prefrontals, two nasals, one preocular, the rostral not produced, and the anal scute entire. S. couperi is a large harmless snake of the South Atlantic and Gulf States, sometimes 6 or 8 feet long, of a black color shading into yellow below, and known as the indigo- or gopher-snake. This genus was called Georgia by Baird and Girard in 1863.

spilt (spilt), A preterit and past participle of *spill*¹.

spiltert (spil'tér), n. Same as *speller*³.

spilth (spilth), n. [*< spill*¹ + *-th*³. Cf. tilth.] That which is spilled; that which is poured out lavishly.

Our vaults have wept
With drunken spilth of wine.

spin (spin), v.; pret. spun (formerly also span), pp. spun, ppr. spinning. [< ME. spinnen, spynnen (pret. span, pl. sponne, pp. sponnen), < AS. spinnan (pret. spann, pp. spunnen) = D. spinnen = MLG. LG. spinnen = OHG. spinnan, MHG. G. spinnen = Icel. Sw. spinna = Dan. spinde = Goth. spinnan, spin; prob. related to span (AS. spannan, etc.), < Teut. √ span, draw out: see *span*¹. Hence ult. spinner, spindle, spinster, spider.] I. trans. 1. To draw out and twist into threads, either by the hand or by machinery: as, to spin wool, cotton, or flax.

All the yarn she [Penelope] spun in Ulysses' absence did but fill Ithaca full of moths. Shak., Cor., I. 3. 93.

For plain truths lose much of their weight when they are rarely'd to subtilties, and their strength is impaired when they are spun into too fine a thread.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. iv.

The number of strands of gut spun into a cord varies with the thickness of catgut required.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 320.

2. To make, fabricate, or form by drawing out and twisting the materials of: as, to spin a thread or a web; to spin glass.

O fatal austren! which, er any cloth
Me shapen was, my desteyne me sponne.

Chaucer, Troilus, III. 784.

She, them saluting, there by them ate still,
Beholding how the thrids of life they span.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. ii. 49.

What Spinster Witch could spin such Thread
He nothing knew. Congreve, An Impossible Thing.

There is a Wheel that's turn'd by Humane power, which Spins Ten Thousand Yards of Glass in less than half an hour. Advertisement quoted in Ashton's Social Life [In Reign of Queen Anne, I. 290.]

3. To form by the extrusion in long slender filaments or threads of viscous matter which hardens in air: said of the spider, the silkworm, and other insects: as, to spin silk or gossamer; to spin a web or cocoon.—4. Figuratively, to fabricate or produce in a manner analogous to the drawing out and twisting of wool or flax into threads, or to the processes of the spider or the silkworm: sometimes with out.

When they [letters] are spun out of nothing, they are nothing, or but apparitions and ghosts, with such hollow sounds as he that hears them knows not what they said.

Donne, Letters, xlvii.

Those accidents of time and place which obliged Greece to spin most of her speculations, like a spider, out of her own bowels.

De Quincey, Style, iv.

5. To whirl rapidly; cause to turn rapidly on its own axis by twirling: as, to spin a top; to spin a coin on a table.

If the ball were spun like a top by the two fingers and thumb, it would turn in the way indicated by the arrow in the diagram.

St. Nicholas, XVII. 826.

6. To fish with a swivel or spoon-bait: as, to spin the upper pool.—7. In sheet-metal work, to form in a lathe, as a disk of sheet-metal, into a globe, cup, vase, or like form. The disk is fitted to the live spindle, and is pressed and bent by tools of various forms. The process is peculiarly suitable to plated ware, as the thin coating of silver is not broken or disturbed by it. Called in French repoussé sur tour.

8. To reject at an examination; "send spinning." [Slang.]

"When must you go, Jerry?" "Are you to join directly, or will they give you leave?" "Don't you funk being spun?" "Is it a good regiment?" How jolly to dine at mess every day!"

Whyte Melville, White Rose, I. x.

Spun glass, silk. See the nouns.—Spun gold, gold thread prepared for weaving in any manner; especially, that prepared by winding a very thin and narrow flat ribbon of gold around a thread of some other material.—Spun silver, silver thread for weaving. Compare spun gold.—Spun yarn (naut.), a line or cord formed of rope-yarns twisted together, used for serving ropes, bending sails, etc.—To spin a yarn, to tell a long story: originally a seamen's phrase. (Colloq.)—To spin hay (naut.), to twist hay into ropes for convenient carriage.—To spin out, to draw out tediously; prolong by discussion, delays, wordiness, or the like; protract: as, to spin out the proceedings beyond all patience.

By one delay after another, they spin out their whole lives.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

Do you mean that the story is tediously spun out?

Sheridan, The Critic, I. 1.

He endeavoured, however, to gain further time by spinning out the negotiation.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., II. 13.

To spin street-yarn, to gad abroad; spend much time in the streets. [Slang. New Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To form threads by drawing out and twisting the fiber of wool, cotton, flax, and the like, especially with the distaff and spindle, with the spinning-wheel, or with spinning-machinery.

Deceite, wepyng, spynnyng, God hath yeve

To women kyndely.

Chaucer, Prolog. to Wife of Bath's Tale, I. 401.

When Adam dalve, and Eve span,

Who was then a gentleman?

Bp. Pilkington, Works (Parker Soc.), p. 125.

2. To form threads out of a viscous fluid, as a spider or silkworm.—3. To revolve rapidly; whirl, as a top or a spindle.

Let the great world spin for ever down the ringing grooves of change.

Tennyson, Locksley Hall.

4. To issue in a thread or small stream; spirt.

Make incision in their hides,

That their hot blood may spin in English eyes.

Shak., Hen. V., IV. 2. 10.

The sharp streams of milk spun and foamed into the pail below. R. T. Cooke, Somebody's Neighbors, p. 84.

5. To go or move rapidly; go fast: as, to spin along the road. [Colloq.]

While it [money] lasts, make it spin.

W. Collins, Hide and Seek, ii. 4.

The locomotive spins along no less merrily because ten carloads of rascals may be profiting by its speed.

S. Lanier, The English Novel, p. 3.

6. To use a spinner or spinning-spoon; troll: as, to spin for trout.—7. To be made to revolve, as a minnow on the trolling-spoon. The minnow is fastened on a gang of small hooks that are turned into its back and sides to so bend it that it may turn round and round when dragged through the water.—Spinning dervish. See dervish.

spin (spīn), n. [< spin, v.] 1. A rapid revolving or whirling motion, as that of a top on its axis; a rapid twirl: as, to give a coin a spin.

She found Nicholas busily engaged in making a penny spin on the dresser, for the amusement of three little children. . . . He, as well as they, was smiling at a good long spin. Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xxxix.

2. A continued rapid motion or action of any kind; a spirited dash or run; a single effort of high speed, as in running a race; a spurt. [Colloq.]—3. In math., a rotation-velocity considered as represented by a line, the axis of rotation, and a length marked upon that line proportional to the number of turns per unit of time. W. K. Clifford.

spina (spī'nā), n.; pl. spinæ (-nē). [< L. spina, a thorn, prickle, the backbone: see spine.] 1. In zool. and anat.: (a) A spine, in any sense. (b) The spine, or spinal column; the backbone: more fully called spina dorsalis or spina dorsi, also columna spinalis.—2. [cap.] [NL.] In ornith., a genus of fringilline birds, the type of which is S. lesbia of southern Europe. Kaup, 1829. Also called Buscaria. See Spinus.—3. In Rom. antiq., a barrier dividing the hippodrome longitudinally, about which the racers turned.—4. One of the quills of a spinet or similar instrument.—Erector spinæ, multifidus spinæ, rotatores spinæ. See erector, multifidus, rotator.—Spina angularis. See spine of the sphenoid, under spine.—Spina bifida, a congenital gap in the posterior wall of the spinal canal, through which protrudes a sac, formed in hydromyelia externa of meninges, and in hydromyelia interna of these with a nervous lining. This forms a tumor in the middle line of the back.—Spina dorsalis, spina dorsi, the vertebral column.—Spina frontalis. See nasal spine (a), under nasal.—Spina helix, the spinous process of the helix of the ear.—Spina mentalis, one of the mental or genial tubercles. See *mental*², *genial*².

spinaceous (spī-nā'shi-us), a. [< Spinacia + -ous (accom. to -aceous).] Of, pertaining to, or of the nature of spinach, or the class of plants to which it belongs.

spinach, spinage (spī'āj), n. [(a) According to the present pron., prop. spelled spinage (early mod. E. also spynage), this being an altered form of spinach (early mod. E. spinache); = MD. spinagie, spinazi, D. spinazie = LG. spinacia, < OF. spinache, espinache, espinage, espinace, espinocce, espinocche, espinocche, etc., = Sp. spinaca = Cat. espinac = It. spinace, also spinacchia, < ML. spinacia, spinacium, also spinacius, spinachia, spinachium, spinathia, etc., after Rom. (NL. spinacia), spinach; cf. (b) Pr. espinar, OF. espinars, espinard, espinar, F. épinard, < ML. spinarius*, spinarium*, spinach; (c) G. Dan. spinat = Sw. spenat, spinat, < ML. spinatum*, spinach; (d) Pg. espinafre, spinach (cf. L. spinifer, spine-bearing); so called with ref. to the prickly fruit; variously formed, with some confusions, < L. spina, a thorn: see spine.] 1. A chenopodiaceous garden vegetable of the genus Spinacia, producing thick succulent leaves, which, when boiled and seasoned, form a pleasant and wholesome, though not highly flavored dish. There is commonly said to be but a single species, S. oleracea; but S. glabra, usually regarded as a variety, is now recognized as distinct, while there are two other wild species. The leaves of S. oleracea are sagittate, undivided, and prickly; those of S. glabra are larger, rounded at the base, and smooth. These are respectively the prickly-leaved and round-leaved spinach. There are several cultivated varieties of each, one of which, with wrinkled leaves like a Savoy cabbage, is the Savoy or lettuce-leaved spinach. All the species are Asiatic; the cultivated plant was first introduced into Europe by the Arabs by way of Spain.

2. One of several other plants affording a dish like spinach. See phrases below.—Australian spinach, a species of goosefoot, Chenopodium auricomum, a recent substitute for spinach; also, Tetragonia implexicaoma, the Victorian bower-spinach, a trailing and climbing plant festooning bushes, its leaves covered with transparent vesicles as in the ice plant.—Indian spinach. Same as Malabar nightshade. See nightshade.—Mountain spinach. See mountain spinach.—New Zealand spinach, a decumbent or prostrate plant, Tetragonia expansea, found in New Zealand, Australia, and Tasmania, and also in Japan and southern South America. It has numerous rhom-boid thick and succulent deep-green leaves.—Strawberry spinach. Same as strawberry-bite.—Wild spinach, a name of several plants locally used as pot-herbs, namely Chenopodium Bonus-Henricus and C. album, Beta maritima (the wild beet), and Campanula latifolia. [Prov. Eng.]

Spinacia (spī-nā'si-ā), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, spine: see spine, and cf. spinach.] In ichth., a genus of marine gasterosteids. S. vulgaris is the common sea-stickleback of northern Europe.

Spinacia (spī-nā'si-ā), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < ML. spinacia, spinach: see spinach.] A genus of apetalous plants, of the order Chenopodiaceæ and tribe Atripliceæ. It is characterized by bractless and commonly dioecious flowers, the pistillate with a two- to four-toothed roundish perianth, its tube hardened and closed in fruit, covering the utricle and its single erect tergal seed. There are 4 species, all Oriental (for which see spinach). They are erect annuals, with alternate stalked leaves which are entire or sinuately toothed. The flowers are borne in glomerules, the fertile usually axillary, the staminate forming interrupted spikes.

Spinacidae (spī-nā'si-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spinax (-ac-) + -idae.] A family of anarthrous sharks, typified by the genus Spinax; the dogfishes. There are 6 or more genera and about 20 species of rather small sharks, chiefly of the Atlantic. Also called Acanthiidae, Centrinidae, and Spinacæ.

spinacine (spīn'a-sin), a. [< Spinax (-ac-) + *-ine*¹.] Of or pertaining to the Spinacidae.

spinacoid (spīn'a-koid), a. and n. [< Spinax (-ac-) + -oid.] I. a. Resembling or related to the dogfish; of or pertaining to the Spinacidae.

II. n. A member of the Spinacidae; a dogfish.

spinage, n. See spinach.

spinal (spī'nāl), a. [= F. spinal = Sp. espinal = Pg. espinal = It. spinale, < LL. spinalis, of or pertaining to a thorn or the spine, < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, spine, the spine or backbone: see spine.] In anat.: (a) Of or pertaining to the backbone, spine, or spinal column; rachidian; vertebral: as, spinal arteries, bones, muscles, nerves; spinal curvature; a spinal complaint. (b) Pertaining to a spine or spinous process of bone; spinous: as, the spinal point (the base of the nasal spine, or subnasal point); specifically used in craniometry. [Rare.]—Accessory spinal nerve, or spinal accessory. Same as accessorius (b).—Acute, atrophic, and spastic spinal paralysis. See paralysis.—Spinal arteries, numerous branches, especially of the vertebral artery, which supply the spinal cord.—Spinal bulb, the medulla oblongata.—Spinal canal. See *canal*¹.—Spinal column, the spine or backbone; the vertebral column or series of vertebrae, extending from the head to the end of the tail, forming the morphological axis of the body of every vertebrate. In man the bones composing the spinal column are normally thirty-three—seven cervical, twelve dorsal or thoracic, five lumbar, five sacral, and four coccygeal. These form a flexuous and sacral. Twenty-four of its bones are individually movable. The total length averages 26 or 27 inches. See vertebra, and cut under backbone.—Spinal cord, the main neural axis of every vertebrate, exclusive of the brain; the myelon, or the neuron without the encephalon; the spinal marrow, or nervous cord which extends in the spinal canal from the brain for a varying distance in different animals, and gives off the series of spinal nerves in pairs. The cord is directly continuous with the brain in all cranial vertebrates, and, with the brain, constitutes the neuron, or cerebrospinal axis, developed from an involution of epiblast in connection with a notochord (see cut under protovertebra). The cord is primitively tubular, and may retain, in the adult, traces of its coelia (see rhombocœlia), comparable to the coelia of the brain; but it generally solidifies, and also becomes fluted, or presents several parallel columns, from between certain of which the spinal nerves emerge. In man the cord is solid and subcylindrical, and extends in the spinal canal from the foramen magnum, where it is continuous with the oblongata, to the first or second lumbar vertebra. It gives off the spinal nerves, and may be regarded as made up of a series of segments, from each of which springs a pair of nerves; it is divided into cervical, thoracic, lumbar, sacral, and coccygeal regions, corresponding to the nerves and not to the adjacent vertebrae. There is an enlargement where the nerves from the arms come in (the cervical enlargement), and one where those from the legs come in (the lumbar enlargement). A cross-section of the cord exhibits a central H-shaped column of gray substance incased in white. (See figure.) The tracts of different functions are exhibited on one side of the cut; they are not distinguished in the adult healthy cord, but differ from one another in certain periods of early development, and may be marked out by secondary degenerations. The cord is a center for certain reflex actions, and a collection of pathways to and from the brain. The reflex centers have been located as follows: scapular, 5 C. to 1 Th.; epigastric, 1 Th. to 7 Th.; abdominal, 8 Th. to 1 L.; cremasteric, 1 L. to 3 L.; patellar, 2 L. to 4 L.; cystic and sexual, 2 L. to 4 L.; rectal, 4 L. to 2 S.; gluteal, 4 L. to 5 L.; Achilles tendon, 5 L. to 1 S.; plantar, 1 S. to 3 S. See also cuts under brain, cell, Petromyzontidae, and Pharyngobranchia.—Spinal epilepsy, muscle-clonus, spontaneous or due to assuming some ordinary position of the legs, the result of increased myotatic irritability, as in spastic paralysis.—Spinal foramina, the intervertebral foramina.—Spinal ganglia. See ganglion.—Spinal marrow. Same as spinal cord.—Spinal muscles, the muscles proper of the spinal column, which lie longitudinally along the vertebrae, especially the epaxial muscles of the back, constituting what are known in human anatomy as the third, fourth, and fifth layers of muscles of the back (the so-called first and second "layers" of human anatomy being not axial, but appendicular). One of these is called spinialis.—Spinal nerves, the numerous pairs of nerves which arise from the spinal cord and emerge from the intervertebral foramina. In the higher vertebrates spinal nerves originate by two roots from opposite sides of that section of the spinal cord to which they respectively pertain—a posterior, sensory, or ganglionated root, and an anterior, motor, or non-ganglionated root, which usually unite in one sensorimotor trunk before emergence from the intervertebral foramina, and then as a rule divide into two main trunks, one epaxial and the other hypaxial. The number of spinal nerves varies within wide limits, and bears no fixed relation to the length of the spinal cord, which latter may end high in the dorsal region, yet give off a leash of nerves (see cauda equina, under cauda) which emerge from successive intervertebral foramina as far as the coccygeal region. The spinal nerves form numerous and intricate connections with the nerves of the ganglionic system. Their epaxial trunks are always few and small in comparison with the size, number, and extent of the ramifications of the hypaxial trunks, which latter usually supply all the appendicular and most of the axial parts of the body.—Spinal reflexes. See reflex.—Spinal veins, the numerous veins and venous plexuses in and on the spinal column, carrying off blood from the bones and included structures. In man these veins are grouped and named in four sets. See vena.

Cross-section of Human Spinal Cord.

AC, anterior column; AF, anterior fissure; AGC, anterior gray commissure; AH, anterior horn of gray matter; AR, anterior roots; AT, ascending anterolateral tract, or tract of Gowers; BC, postero-external column, or column of Burdach; Can, central canal; CC, Clarke's column; CPT, crossed pyramidal tract; CT, cerebellar tract; DPT, direct or uncrossed pyramidal tract; DT, anterolateral descending tract; GC, postero-medial column, or column of Goll; L, Lissauer's tract; LC, lateral column; LH, lateral horn or intermedullary tract of gray matter with contained ganglion-cells; PC, posterior column; PF, posterior fissure; PGC, posterior gray commissure; PR, posterior root; SC, substantia gelatinosa; WC, anterior white commissure.

Human Spinal Column.

A, side view; B, same, in median sagittal section; C, front view; a, seven cervicals; b, twelve dorsals; c, five lombars; d, five sacra, fused in a sacrum; e, four caudals or coccygeals, forming a coccyx.

flexible column capable of bending, as a whole, in every direction. It is most movable in the lumbar and cervical regions, less so in the dorsal and coccygeal, fixed in the spinalis (spī-nā'lis), n.; pl. spinales (-lēz). [NL. (sc. musculus), < LL. spinalis, pertaining to a thorn: see spinal.] In anat., a series of muscular slips, derived from the longissimus dorsi, which pass between and connect the spinous processes of vertebrae: usually divided into the spinalis dorsi and spinalis colli, according to its relation with the back and the neck respectively.

spinate (spī'nāt), a. [< NL. spinatus, < L. spina, spine: see spine. Cf. spinach (d).] Covered with spines or spine-like processes.

Spinax (spī'naks), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1817), < Gr. σπίναξ or σπίνη, a fish so called.] A genus of dogfishes, giving name to the family Spinacidae, and represented by S. niger or spinax, a small black shrank of Europe.

Spindalis (spin'da-lis), n. [NL. (Jardine and Selby, 1836); origin unknown.] A genus of thick-billed tanagers, of the family Tanagridæ, peculiar to the Antillean region. They have a comparatively long bill, ascending gonys, and swollen upper mandible; in the male the coloration is brilliant orange varied with black and white. There are 6 species, S. nigricapula, portoricensis, multicolor, pretii, benedicti, and zeus, respectively inhabiting Jamaica, Porto Rico, San Domingo, Cuba, Cozumel Island (off the Yucatan coast), and the Bahamas. The first-named builds a cup-shaped nest in trees or shrubs, and lays spotted eggs, and the others are probably similar in this respect. See cut under casher-bird.

spindle (spin'dl), n. [Also dial. spinnel; < ME. spindelle, spindelle, spindel, spyndel, spyndelle, spyndyl, spyndylle, < AS. spindelle, spindel, earlier spinel, spini, spini (dat. spinele, spinele) (= MD. spille (by assimilation for spinde*), D. spil = OHG. spinnela, spinnila, spinnala, MHG. spinnela, spinnel, G. spindel (also spille, < D.) = Sw. Dan. spindel), a spindle, < spinnan, spin: see spin. Cf. *spil*².] 1. (a) In hand-spinning, a small bar, usually of wood, hung to the end of the thread as it is first drawn from the mass of fiber on the distaff. By rotating the spindle, the spinner twists the thread, and as the thread is spun it is wound upon the spindle.

Sing to those that hold the vital shears,
And turn the adamantine spindle round,
On which the fate of gods and men is wound.
Milton, Arcades, l. 66.

(b) The pin which is used in spinning-wheels for twisting the thread, and on which the thread, when twisted, is wound. See cut under spinning-wheel. (c) One of the skewers or axes of a spinning-machine upon which a bobbin is placed to wind the yarn as it is spun. See cut under spinning-jenny.—2. Any slender pointed rod or pin which turns round, or on which anything turns. (a) A small axle or axis, in contradistinction to a shaft or large axle, as the arbor or mandrel in a lathe: as, the spindle of a wheel; the spindle of the fuse of a watch. See dead-spindle, live-spindle. (b) A vertical shaft supporting the upper stone or runner of a pair in a flour-mill. See cut under mill-spindle. (c) In vehicles, the tapering end or arm on the end of an axle-tree. (d) A small shaft which passes through a door-lock, and upon which the knobs or handles are fitted. When it is turned it withdraws the latch. (e) In ship-building: (1) The upper main piece of a made mast. (2) An iron axle fitted into a block of wood, which is fixed securely between two of the ship's beams, and upon which the capstan turns. (f) In foundry, the pin on which the pattern of a mold is formed. (g) In building, same as needle. (h) In cabinet-making, a short turned part, especially the turned or circular part of a baluster, stair-rail, etc.

3. Something having the form of a spindle (sense 1); a fusiform object. (a) The grip of a sword. (b) A pine-needle or leaf. [U. S.]

We went into camp in a magnificent grove of pines. The roots of the trees are buried in the spindles and burs which have fallen undisturbed for centuries.
G. W. Nichols, Story of the Great March, xxii.

(c) The roll of not yet unfolded leaves on a growing plant of Indian corn.

Its [the spindle-worm's] ravages generally begin while the cornstalk is young, and before the spindle rises much above the tuft of leaves in which it is embosomed.
Harris, Insects Injurious to Vegetation.

(d) In conch., a spindle-shell. (e) In anat., a fusiform part or organ. (1) A spindle-cell. (2) The inner segment of a rod or cone of the bacillary layer of the retina. See cut under retina. Huxley, Crayfish, p. 121. (f) In embryol., one of the fusiform figures produced by chromatin fibers in the process of karyokinesis. Amer. Nat., XXII, 933.

4. In geom., a solid generated by the revolution of the arc of a curve-line about its chord, in opposition to a conoid, which is a solid generated by the revolution of a curve about its axis. The spindle is denominated circular, elliptic, hyperbolic, or parabolic, according to the figure of its generating curve. 5. A measure of yarn: in cotton a spindle of 18 hanks is 15,120 yards; in linen a spindle of 48 cuts is 14,400 yards.—6. A long slender stalk.

The spindles must be tied up, and, as they grow in height, rods set by them, lest by their bending they should break.
Mortimer.

7. Something very thin and slender.

I am fall'n away to nothing, to a spindle.
Fletcher, Women Pleased, iv. 3.

Ring-spindle, a spindle which carries a traveling ring.—Spindle side of the house, the female side. See spear-side.

spindle (spin'dl), v. i.; pret. and pp. spindled, ppr. spindling. [< spindle, n.] To shoot or grow in a long, slender stalk or body.

When the flowers begin to spindle, all but one or two of the biggest at each root should be nipped off. Mortimer.

spindle-cataract (spin'dl-kat'a-rakt), n. A form of cataract characterized by a spindle-shaped opacity extending from the posterior surface of the anterior part of the capsule to the anterior surface of the posterior part of the capsule, with a central dilatation. Commonly called fusiform cataract.

spindle-cell (spin'dl-sel), n. A spindle-shaped cell; a fusiform cell.—Spindle-cell layer, the deepest layer of the cerebral cortex, containing many fusiform with a few angular cells.—Spindle-cell sarcoma. See spindle-celled sarcoma, under sarcoma.

spindle-celled (spin'dl-seld), a. Made up of or containing spindle-shaped cells.—Spindle-celled sarcoma. See sarcoma.

spindle-legged (spin'dl-legd), a. Having long, thin legs; spindle-shanked.

A pale, sickly, spindle-legged generation of valetudinarians.
Addison, Tatler, No. 148.

spindle-legs (spin'dl-legz), n. pl. Long, slim legs; hence, a tall, thin person with such legs or shanks: used humorously or in contempt.

spindle-shanked (spin'dl-shangk), a. Same as spindle-legged.

spindle-shanks (spin'dl-shangks), n. pl. Same as spindle-legs.

A Weazel-faced cross old Gentleman with Spindle-Shanks.
Steele, Tender Husband, i. 1.

spindle-shaped (spin'dl-shäpt), a. Circular in cross-section and tapering from the middle to each end; fusiform; formed like a spindle.

spindle-shell (spin'dl-shel), n. In conch., a spindle-shaped shell; a spindle. (a) A shell of the genus Fusus in some of its applications, as F. antiquus, the common spindle or red-whelk, also called buckie or red-whelk. See cuts under Fusus and Siphonostoma, 2. (b) A spindle-stromb. (c) A gastropod of the family Muricele and genus Chrysodonus, having a spindle-like or fusiform shape and the canal slightly produced. The species inhabit chiefly the northern cold seas. See cut under reverse.

spindle-step (spin'dl-step), n. In mill- and spinning-spindles, the lower bearing of an upright spindle. E. H. Knight.

spindle-stromb (spin'dl-stromb), n. A gastropod of the family Strombidae and genus Rostellaria, having a spindle-like or fusiform shell with a long spire, and also a long anterior canal. The species inhabit the tropical Pacific and Indian oceans. See cut under Rostellaria.

spindletail (spin'dl-täl), n. The pin-tailed duck, Daifila acuta. See pintail, 1. [Local, U. S.]

spindle-tree (spin'dl-tré), n. A European shrub or small tree, Euonymus Europæa (E. vulgaris), growing in hedge-rows, on borders of woods, etc. It is so called from the use of its hard fine-grained wood in making spindles, and other uses have given it the names prick-timber, skewer-wood, and pegwood. It is one of the dogwoods. The name is carried over to the American E. atropurpurea, the wahoo or burning-bush, and to the Japanese E. japonica; it is also extended to the genus, and even to the order (Celastrineæ).

spindle-valve (spin'dl-valv), n. A valve having an axial guide-stem. E. H. Knight.

spindle-whorl (spin'dl-hwér), n. See whorl.

spindle-worm (spin'dl-wér), n. The larva of the noctuid moth Achatodes (or Gortyna) zæ: so called because it burrows into the spindle of Indian corn. See spindle, n., 3 (c). [Local, U. S.]

spindling (spind'ling), a. and n. [*< spindle + -ing*².] 1. a. Long and slender; disproportionately slim or spindle-like.

II. n. A spindling or disproportionately long and slim person or thing; a slender shoot. [Rare.]

Half-conscious of the garden-squirt,
The spindlings look unhappy.
Tennyson, Amphion.

spindly (spind'li), a. [*< spindle + -y*¹.] Spindle-like; disproportionately long and slender or slim. [Colloq.]

The effect of all this may be easily imagined—a spindly growth of rootless ideas. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVI, 556.

spindrift (spin'drift), n. [A var. (simulating spin, go rapidly) of spoon-drift, q. v.] Naut., the spray of salt water blown along the surface of the sea in heavy winds.

spine (spín), n. [< OF. espine, F. épine = Pr. Sp. espina = Pg. espinha = It. spina, < L. spina, a thorn, prickle, also the backbone; prob. for spiena*, and akin to spica, a point, spike: see *spike*¹.] In the sense of 'backbone' spine is directly < L. spina. Hence spinach, spinage, spinal, spiny, spinet, spinney, etc.] 1. In bot., a stiff sharp-pointed process, containing more or less woody tissue, and originating in the degeneracy or modification of some organ. Usually it is a branch or the termination of a stem or branch, indurated, leafless, and attenuated to a point, as in the hawthorn, sloe, pear, and honey-locust; its nature is clearly manifest by the axillary position, and also by the fact that it sometimes produces imperfect leaves and buds. A spine may also consist of a modified leaf (all gradations being found between merely spiny-toothed leaves and leaves which are completely contracted into simple or multiple spines, as in the barberry, or of a persistent petiole, as in some Astragal and in Fouquieria, or of a modified stipule, as in the common locust. A spine is to be clearly distinguished from a prickle, which is merely a superficial outgrowth from the bark. See prickle, 1.

2. The backbone; the rachis, spina, or spinal column of a vertebrate. The name is due to the series of spinous processes of the several vertebrae which it presents, forming a ridge along the middle of the back. See spinal column (under spinal), and vertebra, vertebral.

3. A name of some part in various animals. (a) In anat., a sharp process, point, or crest of bone; a spinous process, generally stouter than a styloid process: as, the spine of the ilium, of the ischium, of the scapula, of the pubis. See cuts under innominatum and shoulder-blade. (b) In morph., a bony element or pair of bony elements, which completes a segment of either the neural canal or the hemal canal of a vertebrate on the midline of the dorsal or ventral aspect of the body, the ossification intervening dorsad between a pair of neurapophyses or ventrad between a pair of hemapophyses, the former being a neural spine, the latter a hemal spine. Thus, the spinous process of a dorsal vertebra is the neural spine of that vertebra, and the segment of the sternum with which the rib of that vertebra articulates is the hemal spine of the same vertebra. Ours. See cuts under dorsal, carapace, and endoskeleton. (c) In mammal., a modified hair; a sharp, stiff, hard, horny dermal outgrowth, as one of the quills of a porcupine, or of the prickles of the hedgehog or spiny ant-eater. In many animals the transition from soft fur through harsh or bristly pelage to spines is very gradual. See cuts under Echinidæ, Erinaceus, and porcupine. (d) In ornith., a spur or calcar, as of the wing or foot; a mucro, as of a feather. See cuts under Palamedea, Rasores, and mucronate. (e) In herpet., a sharp, prickly scale of considerable size; a horn. See cuts under Ceratæ and Phrynosoma. (f) In conch., any considerable sharp projection of the shell. Such spines are endlessly modified in size, shape, and site. Good examples are figured under nautilus, scorpion-shell, and Spondylus. (g) In Crustacea, any considerable spinous process of the carapace, of the legs, etc. Such spines are the rule with most crustaceans. The large tail-spine of some is specified as the telson. (h) In entom., any comparatively short sharp projection of the chitinous body-wall of an insect. Such occur commonly upon the larvæ of Lepidoptera, upon the bodies of many adult Coleoptera, Hemiptera, and Hymenoptera, and upon the legs (principally upon the tibia) of these and nearly all Orthoptera and many Neuroptera. The body-spines of adult insects are always of great use in classification. (i) In icht.: (1) A fin-spine; one of the unjointed and unbranched sharp bony rays of the fins, such as those

a, b, c, spines (followed by soft rays) of the dorsal, ventral, and anal fins of an acanthopterygian fish; a, ten spines; b, one spine; c, three spines.

the presence of which gives name to the acanthopterygian fishes; a spinous fin-ray, as distinguished from a soft ray. See *ray*¹, 7, and the formula under radial, a. (2) A spinous process, as of an opercular bone. (3) The spinous process of some ganoid, placoid, etc., scales. See cuts under Echinorhinus, sand-fish, scale, sea-raven, and shackle-joint. (j) In echinoderm., one of the movable processes which beset the exterior, as of an echinus, and are articulated with the tubercles of the body-wall. Primary spines are the large ones forming continuous series along the ambulacra, as distinguished from less-developed secondary and tertiary spines. Other spines are specified as senial. See cuts under Cidaræ, Echinometra, Echinus, senilia, and Spatangus. (k) In general, some or any hard sharp process, like a spine; a thorn; a prickle; as, the spine at the end of the tail of the lion or the fer-de-lance.

4. In mach., any longitudinal ridge; a fin. E. H. Knight.—5. In lace-making, a raised projection from the cordonnet: one of the varieties of pinwork; especially, one of many small points that project outward from the edge of the lace, forming a sort of fringe.—6. The duramen or heartwood of trees: a ship-builders' term. See duramen.—Angular curvature of the spine. See curvature.—Anterior superior spine of the ilium. See spines of the ilium.—Concussion of the spine, in theoretic strictness, a molecular lesion of the spinal cord too fine for microscopic detection, but impairing the functions of the cord, and produced by violent jarring, as in a railway accident: often applied, without discrimination, to cases which, after an accident, exhibit various nervous or spinal symptoms without any manifest gross lesion which explains them. These include cases of traumatic neurasthenia, of hemorrhage in the cord or its membranes, of displacement and fracture of vertebrae, and of muscular and ligamentous strains.—Ethmoidal spine, a projection of the sphenoid bone for articulation with the cribriform plate of the ethmoid.—Hemal spine. See def. 3 (b), and hemal.—Interhemal spine. See interhemal.—Interneural spine. See interneural.—Lateral curvature of the spine. See curvature.—Mental external spine, the mental protuberance of the human mandible.—Mental spines, the genial tubercles. See *genial*².—Nasal, pharyngeal, pleural spine. See the adjectives.—Palatine spine. See (posterior) nasal spine, under nasal.—Posterior superior spine of the ilium. See spines of the ilium.—Pubic spine. See below, and pubic.—Railway spine. concussion of the spine (especially in its more vague sense) resulting from railway accident.—Scapular spine. Same as spine of the scapula.—Sciatic spine. the spine of the ischium.—Semital spine. See semital.—Spine of the ischium. a pointed triangular eminence situated a little below the middle of the posterior border of the ischium, and separating the lesser from the greater sacrosciatic notch. In man the pudic vessels and nerve wind around this spine.—Spine of the pubis. the pubic spine, a prominent tubercle which projects from the upper border of the pubis about an inch from the symphysis.—Spine of the scapula. the scapular spine, in man a prominent plate of bone separating the supraspinous and infraspinous fossae, and terminating in the acromion.—Spine of the sphenoid. a projection from the lower part of the greater wing of the sphenoid, extending backward into the angle between the petrous and squamous divisions of the temporal bone. Also called spinous process of the sphenoid.—Spines of the ilium. the iliac spines. In man these are four in number: the anterior extremity of the iliac crest terminates in the anterior superior spine, below which and separated from it by a concavity is the anterior inferior spine; in a similar manner the posterior extremity of the iliac crest terminates in the posterior superior spine, while below it is the posterior inferior spine, the two being separated by a notch.—Spines of the tibia. a pair of processes between the two articular surfaces of the head of the tibia, in the interior of the knee-joint, to which are attached the ends of the semilunar cartilages and the crucial ligaments of the joint.—Trochlear spine. a small spine-like projection upon the orbital part of the frontal bone for attachment of the pulley of the superior oblique muscle of the eye.

spine-armed (spī'ärmd), a. Armed with spines or spiny processes, as a murex; spinigerous.

spineback (spīn'bak), n. A fish of the family Notacanthidae.

spine-bearer (spīn'bär'ēr), n. A spine-bearing caterpillar.

spine-bearing (spīn'bär'ing), a. Having spines; spined or spiny; spinigerous.

spinebelly (spīn'bel'i), n. A kind of balloon-fish, Tetraodon lineatus, more fully called striped spinebelly. See cut under balloon-fish.

spinebill (spīn'bil), n. An Australian meliphagine bird, Acanthorhynchus tenuirostris, formerly called slender-billed creeper, or another of this genus, A. superciliosus. In both these honeyeaters the bill is slender, curved, and extremely acute. They are closely related to the members of the genus Myzomela, but present a totally different pattern of coloration. The first-named is widely distributed on the continent and in Tasmania; the second inhabits western and southwestern Australia.

spined (spīd), a. [< spine + -ed²]. 1. Having a spine or spinal column; backboned; vertebrate.—2. Having spines; spinous or spiny; as, a spined caterpillar; the spined cichadas.—Spined soldier-bug. See soldier-bug.

spinefoot (spīn'fūt), n. A lizard of the genus Acanthodactylus, as A. vulgaris of northern Africa.

spinel (spīn'el or spīn'el'), n. [Also spinelle, espinel; early mod. E. spinelle; < OF. spinelle, espinelle, F. spinelle = It. spinella, spinel; prob. orig. applied to a mineral with spine-shaped crystals; dim. of L. spina, a thorn, spine; see spine.] 1. A mineral of various shades of red, also blue, green, yellow, brown, and black, commonly occurring in isometric octahedrons. It has the hardness of topaz. Chemically, it consists of the oxides of magnesium and aluminium, with iron protoxide in some varieties, also chromium in the variety picroite. Clear and finely colored red varieties are highly prized as ornamental stones in jewelry. The red varieties are known as spinel ruby or balas ruby, while those of a dark-green, brown, or black color, containing iron protoxide in considerable amount, are called ceylonite or pseudomorph. The valuable varieties, including the spinel ruby (see ruby), occur as rolled pebbles in river-channels in Ceylon, Burma, and Siam; they are often associated with the true ruby (corundum). The spinel group of minerals includes several species which may be considered as made up of equal parts of a protoxide and a sesquioxide (RO + R₂O₃). Here belong garnet, magnetite, franklinite, etc. An octahedral habit characterizes them all.

There [in the Island of Zeylan] is also founde an other kynde of Rubies, which wee caule Spinelle and the Indians Caropus. R. Eden, tr. of Antonio Pigafetta (First Books [on America], ed. Arber, p. 264).

2. A bleached yarn from which the linen tape called inkle is made. E. H. Knight.—Zinc-spinel. Same as gahnite.

spineless (spīn'les), a. [< spine + -less]. 1. Having no spine or spinal column; invertebrate. Hence—2. Having no backbone, vigor, or courage; limp; weak; nerveless.—3. Having the backbone flexible or supple.

A whole family of Sprites, consisting of a remarkably stout father and three spineless sons.

Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, iv. (Davies.)

4. In ichth., having no fin-spines; soft-finned; anaacanthine; malacopterous; as, the spineless fishes, or Anacanthini.—Spineless perch. a pirate-perch.

spinellane (spī-nel'än), n. [< spinelle + -ane.]

A blue variety of nosean occurring in small crystalline masses and in minute crystals, found near Andernach on the Rhine.

spinelle (spī-nel'), n. See spinel.

spine-rayed (spīn'rad), a. In ichth., acanthopterygian.

spinescent (spī-nēs'ent), a. [< L. spinescens(t)-s, ppr. of spinescere, grow thorny, < spina, a thorn, prickly, spine; see spine.] 1. In bot., tending to be hard and thorn-like; terminating in a spine or sharp point; armed with spines or thorns; spinose.—2. In zool., somewhat spinous or spiny, as the fur of an animal; very coarse, harsh, or stiff, as hair; spinulose.

spinet¹ (spīn'et), n. [< L. spinetum, a thicket of thorns, < spina, a thorn, spine; see spine. Cf. OF. spinat, F. dial. épinat, a thicket of thorns; and see spinney.] A small wood or place where briars and thorns grow; a spinney.

A satyr, lodged in a little spinet, by which her majesty and the Prince were to come, . . . advanced his head above the top of the wood. B. Jonson, The Satyr.

spinet² (spīn'et or spīn'et'), n. [Formerly also spinnet, espinette; = D. spinet = G. Sw. spinett = Dan. spinet, < OF. espinette, F. épinette = Sp. Pg. espineta, < It. spinetta, a spinet, or pair of virginals (said to be so called because struck with a pointed quill), < spinetta, a point, spigot, etc., dim. of spina, a thorn, < L. spina, a thorn; see spine.] A musical instrument essentially similar to the harpsichord, but of smaller size and much lighter tone. Also called virginal and couched harp.—Dumb spinet. Same as manichord.

spinetail (spīn'tail), n. In ornith.: (a) A passerine bird of the family Dendrocolaptidae, having stiff and more or less acuminate tail-feathers, much like a woodpecker's; a spine-tailed or sclerurine bird. See cuts under saberbill and Sclerurus. (b) A cypseline bird of the subfamily Chæturine; a spine-tailed or chæturine swift, having mucronate shafts of the tail-feathers. See Acanthyllis, and cut under mucronate. (c) The ruddy duck, Erimatura rubida. [Pennsylvania and New Jersey.]

spine-tailed (spīn'tald), a. 1. In ornith.: (a) Having stiff and generally acuminate tail-feathers; dendrocolaptine; sclerurine. (b) Having mucronate shafts of the tail-feathers; chæturine.—2. In herpet., having the tail ending in a spine, as a serpent. See fer-de-lance, and cuts under Craspedocephalus and Cylchura.—3. In entom., having the abdomen ending in a spine or spines. The Scotiidae are known as spine-tailed wasps, and the Sapygidae have been called parasitic spine-tailed wasps. See cut under Elia.

spine-tipped (spīn'tipt), a. In bot., tipped with or bearing at the extremity a spine, as the leaves of agave.

spin-house (spīn'hous), n. A place in which spinning is carried on. Also spinning-house. See the quotation.

As we returned we stepp'd in to see the Spin-house, a kind of Bridewell, where incorrigible and lewd women are kept in discipline and labour.

Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 19, 1641.

spincerebrate (spī-ni-ser'ē-brāt), a. [< L. spina, the spine, + cerebrum, the brain, + -ate¹.] Having a brain and spinal cord; cerebrospinal; myelencephalous.

spindeltoid (spī-ni-del'toid), a. and n. [< L. spina, the spine, + E. deltoid.] 1. a. Representing that part of the human deltoid muscle which arises from the spine of the scapula, as a muscle; pertaining to the spindeltoides.

II. n. The spindeltoides.

spindeltoides (spī-ni-del-toi'dē-us), n.; pl. spindeltoides (-i). [NL.: see spindeltoid.] A muscle of the shoulder and arm of some animals, corresponding to the spinal or mesoscapular part of the human deltoides; it extends from the mesoscapula and metacromion to the deltoid ridge of the humerus.

spiniferite (spī-nif'ē-rīt), n. [< L. spinifer, bearing spines (see spiniferous), + -ite².] A certain minute organism beset with spines, occurring in the Chalk flints. Their real nature is unascertained, but they have been supposed to be the gemmules of sponges.

spiniferous (spī-nif'ē-rus), a. [< L. spinifer, bearing spines, < spina, a thorn, spine, + ferre = E. bear.] Bearing or provided with spines; spinous or spiny; spinigerous.

spiniform (spī-ni-fōrm), a. [< L. spina, a thorn, spine, + forma, form.] Having the form of a spine or thorn; spine-like. Huxley.

spinigerous (spī-nij'ē-rus), a. [< LL. spiniger, bearing thorns or spines, < L. spina, a thorn, spine, + gerere, bear, carry.] Bearing spines, as a hedgehog; spinose; aculeate; spiniferous.—Spinigerous elytra. in entom., elytra each one of which has an upright sutural process, the two uniting, when the elytra are closed, to form a large spiniform process on the back, as in certain phytophagous beetles.

Spinigrada (spī-nig'rā-dā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of spinigradus; see spinigrade.] An order of echinoderms, composed of the ophiurans and euryaleans, or the brittle-stars and gorgon's-heads. Forbes. [Rare.]

spinigrade (spī-ni-grād), a. [< NL. spinigradus, < L. spina, a thorn, spine, + gradī, walk, go; see grade¹.] Moving by means of spines or spinous processes, as an echinoderm; of or pertaining to the Spinigrada.

spininess (spī-ni-nēs), n. Spiny character or state. (a) Thorniness. (b) Slenderness; lankness; lankness.

The old men resemble grasshoppers for their cold and bloodless spininess. Chapman, Iliad, iii., Commentarius.

spinirector (spī-ni-rek'tor), a. and n. [< L. spina, the spine, + rector for NL. erector, q. v.] 1. a. Erecting, extending, or straightening the spine, or spinal column: noting the set or series of muscles of the back of which the erector spinæ is the basis.

II. n. The erector spinæ. (See erector.) It corresponds to the so-called fourth layer of the muscles of the back in human anatomy. Coues and Shute, 1887.

spinispicule (spī-ni-spik'ul), n. [< L. spina, a spine, + E. spicule.] A spiny sponge-spicule; a spiraster.

spinispirula (spī-ni-spir'ō-lā), n.; pl. spinispirulæ (-læ). [NL., < L. spina, a spine, + spirula, a small twisted cake, dim. of spira, a coil, spire; see spire².] A spiny sigmaspire; a sigmoid microscelere or flesh-spicule provided with spines. Also called spiraster. Sollas.

spinispirular (spī-ni-spir'ō-lār), a. [< spinispirula + -ar³.] Spiny and slightly spiral, as a sponge-spicule; having the character of a spinispirula. Sollas.

spinispirulate (spī-ni-spir'ō-lāt), a. [< spinispirula + -ate¹.] Same as spinispirular.

spinitis (spī-ni'tis), n. [NL., < L. spina, the spine, + -itis.] Inflammation of the spinal cord and its membranes, in the horse and other domestic quadrupeds.

spinitrapezius (spī-ni-trā-pē'zi-us), n.; pl. spinitrapezii (-i). [NL., < L. spina, the spine, + NL. trapezius.] The spinal as distinguished from the cranial part of the trapezius muscle, forming in some animals a nearly distinct muscle.

spink¹ (spīngk), n. [< ME. spink, spynk, spynke = Sw. dial. spink, also spikke, spekke, a sparrow (gull-spink, a goldfinch), = Norw. spikke (for spinke*), a sparrow or other small bird; cf. Gr. σπίγγος, also σπίζα, a finch (< σπίζω, chirp); an imitative name, like the equiv. pink⁵, finch¹.] The chaffinch, Fringilla cælebs. [Prov. Eng.]

The spink chants sweetest in a hedge of thorns.

W. Harte.

spink² (spīngk), n. [Origin obscure; prob. in part a var. of pink².] The primrose, Primula veris; also, the lady's-smock, Cardamine pratensis (also bog-spinks), and some other plants. [Scotland.]

spinnaker (spīn'ā-kēr), n. [Said to be < spin, in sense of 'go rapidly'.] A jib-headed racing-sail carried by yachts, set, when running before the wind, on the side opposite to the mainsail.

spinnel (spīn'el), n. A dialectal variant of spindle.

spinner¹ (spīn'ēr), n. [< ME. spinnere, spynner, spinnare (= D. G. spinner = Sw. spinnare = Dan. spinder; < spin + -er¹. Cf. spider.] 1. One who or that which spins, in any sense; one skilled in spinning. (a) A workman who gives shape to vessels of thin metal by means of a turning-lathe. See spin, r. t., 8. (b) In woolen-manuf., any thread-spinning machine; a drawing and twisting machine for making woolen threads. (c) A trawling fish-hook fitted with wings to make it revolve in the water; a propeller spoon-bait. (d) In hat-manuf., a machine for finishing the exterior of a hat. It consists of a flat oval table with a face corresponding to the curve of the hat-brim.

2. A spider; especially, a spinning-spider.

As if thou hadst borrowed legs of a spinner and a voice of a cricket.

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, l. 1.

3. See the quotation. [Eng.]

I do not know whether the daddy longlegs is ever called "gin spinner"; but Jenny Spinner is certainly the name of a very different insect, viz. the metamorphosis of the iron-blue dun, which, according to Ronald's nomenclature, is an ephemera of the genus Cloe.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 158.

4. A spinneret.—5. The night-jar or night-churr, Caprimulgus europæus: from its cries, which may be likened to the noise of a spinning-wheel. See cut under night-jar. Also wheel-bird. Compare reeler in like use for another bird. [Wexford, Ireland.]—Ring-and-traveler spinner. Same as ring-frame.

spinner², n. [ME. spynner; origin obscure.] A kind of boat.

As on Monday next after May day there come tydings to London, that on Thursday before the Duke of Suffolk come unto the costes of Kent full nere slower with his ij. shepes and a litel spynner; the qweche spynner he sente with certeyn letters to certeyn of his trustid men.

Paston Letters, I. 124.

spinneret (spin'ér-et), n. [*spinner*¹ + -et.] A part or organ concerned in the spinning of silk, gossamer, or cobweb, as of a silkworm or spider. Specifically—(a) One of the mammillæ of the arachnidum of a spider; one of the four, six, or eight little conical or nipple-like processes under a spider's abdomen and near its end, through which the viscid secretion of the arachnidial glands is spun out into threads of silk. Some of the spinnerets are three-jointed. See arachnidium. (b) One of the tubules of the labium of certain caterpillars, as silkworms, through which silk is spun out of the secretion of glands connected with the mouthparts. See sericterium. (c) One of the tubules of the anal segment of certain coleopterous larvae, as in the first larval stage (triungulin) of some blister-beetles (Meloidæ), through which a little silk is spun. See cut under Sitaris. (d) A like organ of any other insect.

spinnerular (spi-ner'ô-lâr), a. [spinnerule + -ar.] Entering into the formation of a spinneret, as a tubule; of or pertaining to spinnerules.

spinnerule (spin'ér-öl), n. [*spinner*¹ + -ule.] One of the several individual tubules which collectively form the spinneret of a spider.

spinnery (spin'ér-i), n.; pl. spinneries (-iz). [= D. spinnerij, a spinning-house, = G. spinnerei = Sw. spinnari = Dan. spinderi, spinning, spinning-house; as spin + -ery.] A spinning-mill. Imp. Dict.

spinnett, n. See *spinet*².

spinney, spinny² (spin'i), n. [*ME. spineye, spenne, < OF. espinaie, espinoie, espinoie, F. épinaie, a thicket, grove, a thorny plot, < L. spinetum, a thicket of thorns, < spina, a thorn: see spine. Cf. *spinet*².] A small wood with undergrowth; a clump of trees or shrubs; a small grove or shrubbery.

As he sprent ouer a spennet, to spyre the schrewe.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 1895.

A land . . . covered with fine hedgerow timber, with here and there a nice little grove or spinney.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, I. 1.

spinning (spin'ing), n. [ME. spynnyng; verbal n. of spin, v.] 1. The act of one who spins.—2. The process of giving shape to vessels of thin metal by means of a turning-lathe.

spinning-frame (spin'ing-frâm), n. A machine by which cotton thread was twisted hard and firm, so as to make it suitable for the warp of cotton cloth: the invention of Richard Arkwright. E. H. Knight.

spinning-head (spin'ing-hed), n. An early form of spinning-machine in which the drawing and twisting mechanisms are combined in one head.

spinning-house (spin'ing-hous), n. Same as spin-house.

spinning-jack (spin'ing-jak), n. In cotton-manuf., a device for twisting and winding a sliver as it comes from the drawing-rollers. It is placed in the can, in which it rotates, the sliver being wound on a bobbin. E. H. Knight.

spinning-jenny (spin'ing-jen'i), n. A spinning-machine, invented by James Hargreaves

Hargreaves' Original Spinning-Jenny.

a, frame; b, frames supporting spindles; c, drum driven by the band e from the band-wheel f, and carrying separate bands (not shown) which separately drive each spindle; d, fluted wooden clasp which travels on wheels on the top of the frame, and in which the rovings are arranged in due order.

in 1767, which was the first to operate upon more than one thread. It has a series of vertical spindles, each of which is supplied with roving from a separate spool, and has a clasp and traversing mechanism by means of which the operator is enabled to clasp and draw out all the rovings simultaneously during the operation of twisting, and to feed the twisted threads to the spindles when winding on—the whole operation being almost exactly like hand-spinning, except that a large number of rovings are operated upon instead of a single one.

spinning-machine (spin'ing-ma-shên'), n. 1. Any machine for spinning; a mule; a spinner. Specifically—2. An apparatus which spins continuously, as distinguished from the intermittent action of the mule. E. H. Knight.

spinning-mill (spin'ing-mil), n. A mill or factory where thread is spun.

spinning-mite (spin'ing-mit), n. Any mite or acarid of the family Tetranychidæ; a red-spider.

spinning-organ (spin'ing-ôr-gan), n. The organ or apparatus by means of which a spider or caterpillar spins silk; an arachnidium, as of a spider. See cut under arachnidium.

spinning-roller (spin'ing-rô-lër), n. One of the iron wheels, covered with various materials—as rubber, vulcanite, paper, or felt—running in pairs in the drawing mechanism of a spinning-machine.

spinning-spider (spin'ing-spi'dër), n. A spider which spins cobwebs; specifically, a true spider or araneid, as distinguished from any other arachnid, whether it actually spins or not.

spinning-wart (spin'ing-wárt), n. A spinneret; one of the papillæ or mammillæ out of which a spider spins silk. See cut under arachnidium. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 291.

spinning-wheel (spin'ing-hwël), n. A machine for spinning wool, cotton, or flax into threads by hand. It consists of a wheel, band, and spindle, and a, bench; b, b', standards; c, driving hand-wheel with flat rim, turned by the peg d held in the right hand of the spinner; d, cord-band, crossed at e and driving the speed-pulley f; g, cord-band imparting motion to the spindle h; i, thread in process of spinning.

is driven by foot or by hand. Before the introduction of machinery for spinning there were two kinds of spinning-wheels in common use—the large wheel for spinning wool and cotton, and the small or Saxon wheel for spinning flax. The girdle-wheel was a spinning-wheel formerly in use, small enough to be fastened to a girdle or apron-string, and used while standing or walking about.

spinnny¹, n. See spinnny.

spinnny², a. [Ap- par. an irreg. var. of spiny, 3, or of spindly.] Thin; slender; slim; lank.

They plow it early in the year, and then there will come some spinnny grass that will keep it from scalding.

Mortimer.

spinode (spi'nôd), n. [L. spina, a thorn, spine, + nodus, a knot.] In geom., a stationary point or cusp on a curve. A spinode may be conceived as resulting from the vanishing of the angle at a node between the two branches, the length of arc between them being reduced to zero, just as an inflection may be regarded as resulting from the vanishing of the interval between the two points of tangency of a bitangent, the total curvature between them at the same time vanishing. But this view in the latter case includes all the points of the inflectional tangent as points of the curve, and in the former case includes all lines through the spinode as tangents. For this reason the spinode, like the inflection, is reckoned as a distinct kind of singularity. A curve cannot, while remaining real, change continuously from having a cusp to having an acnode without passing through a form in which it has a spinode.

spinode-curve (spi'nôd-kêrv), n. A singularity of a surface consisting in a locus of points where tangent-planes to the curve intersect it in curves having spinodes at those points. The spinode-curve on a real surface is the boundary between a synclastic and an anticlastic region. It bears no resemblance to that singularity of a surface termed the cuspidal curve.

spinode-torse (spi'nôd-tôrs), n. That torse of which a spinode-curve is the edge of regression. It is the envelop of tangent-planes to a surface intersecting it in curves having spinodes.

spinose (spi'nôs), a. [L. spinosus, full of thorns: see spinous.] Full of spines; spinous; spinigerous or spiniferous; armed with spines or thorns; of a spiny character: as, a spinose leaf; a spinose stem.—Spinose maxillæ, in entom., maxillæ armed with spines at the apex, as in the dragon-fly.

spinose (spi'nôs-li), adv. In bot., in a spinose manner.

spinosity (spi-nôs'i-ti), n.; pl. spinosities (-tiz). [L. spinositas (-t)s, thorniness, < spinosus, thorny, spinous: see spinous.] 1. The state of being spinous or spinose; rough, spinous, or thorny character or quality; thorniness: literally or figuratively.

The part of Human Philosophy which is Rational . . . seemeth but a net of subtilty and spinosity.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

2. A thorny part or thing; something thorny or crabbed.

spinous (spi'nus), a. [= F. épineux = Sp. espinoso = Pg. espinhoso = It. spinoso, < L. spinus, full of thorns, thorny, spinous, < spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] 1. In zool. and anat.: (a) Having spines; spinous; spinigerous or spiniferous. (b) Shaped like a spine; spiniform; having the character of a spine; sharp or pointed: as, a spinous process of bone. See spinose.

—2. In bot., same as spinose.—Spinous foramen, the foramen spinosum of the sphenoid. See under foramen.—Spinous process of a vertebra, one of the elements of most vertebrae, usually autogenous, or having its own center of ossification, forming a process, point, or plate of bone where the lateral halves of the neural arch, or neurapophyses, come together behind (in man) or above the neural arch; a neural spine. See cuts under axis, cervical, dorsal, hypapophysis, lumbar, and vertebra.—Spinous process of the sphenoid. See spine of the sphenoid, under spine.—Spinous rat, a spiny rat, in any sense.—Spinous shark. See shark, and Echinorhinus (with cut).—Spinous spider-crab, Maia squinado, the common spider-crab.

spinous-radiate (spi'nus-râ-di-ât), a. In entom., rayed or encircled with spines.

Spinozism (spi-nô'zizm), n. [Spinoza (see def.) + -ism.] The metaphysical doctrine of Baruch (afterward Benedict) de Spinoza (1632–1677), a Spanish Jew, born at Amsterdam. Spinoza's chief work, the "Ethics," is an exposition of the idea of the absolute, with a monistic theory of the correspondence between mind and matter, and applications to the philosophy of living. It is an excessively abstruse doctrine, much misunderstood, and too complicated for brief exposition. The style of the book, an imitation of Euclid's "Elements," is calculated to repel the mathematician and logician, and to carry the attention of the ordinary reader away from the real meaning, while conveying a completely false notion of the mode of thinking. Yet, while the form is pseudomathematical, the thought itself is truly mathematical. The main principle is, indeed, an anticipation in a generalized form of the modern geometrical conception of the absolute, especially as this appears in the hyperbolic geometry, where the point and plane manifolds have a correspondence similar to that between Spinoza's worlds of extension and thought. Spinoza is described as a pantheist; he identifies God and Nature, but does not mean by Nature what is ordinarily meant. Some sayings of Spinoza are frequently quoted in literature. One of these is omnis determinatio est negatio, "all specification involves exclusion"; another is that matters must be considered sub specie eternitatis, "under their essential aspects."

Spinozist (spi-nô'zist), n. [Spinoza + -ist.] A follower of Spinoza.

Spinozistic (spi-nô-zis'tik), a. [Spinozist + -ic.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of Spinoza or his followers: as, the Spinozistic school; Spinozistic pantheism.

spinster (spin'stër), n. [ME. spinster, spynstare, spinnestere, spynnestere (= D. spinster), with suffix -estre (E. -ster), < AS. spinnan, spin: see spin.] 1. A woman who spins; by extension, any person who spins; a spinster.

My wif was a webbe and wollen cloth made.

Hu spak to the spynnesters to spynnen hit oute.

Piers Plowman (C), vii. 222.

The silkworm is Only man's spinster.

Randolph, Muses' Looking-Glass, IV. 1.

Let the three housewifely spinsters of destiny rather curtail the thread of thy life.

Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 88.

2. An unmarried woman (so called because she was supposed to occupy herself with spinning): the legal designation in England of all unmarried women from a viscount's daughter downward; popularly, an elderly unmarried woman; an "old maid": sometimes used adjectively.

I, Anthony Lumpkin, Esquire, of Blank place, refuse you, Constantia Neville, spinster, of no place at all.

Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, v. 1.

O, that I should live to hear myself called Spinster!
Sheridan, The Rivals, v. 1.

Here the spinster aunt uttered a loud shriek, and became senseless.
Dickens, Pickwick, x.

3†. A woman of an evil life or character: so called from being forced to spin in the house of correction. See spin-house.

We are no spinsters; nor, if you look upon us, So wretched as you take us.
Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, III. 1.

spinsterdom (spin'stér-dum), n. [spinster + -dom.] Spinsters or "old maids" collectively. G. Meredith, Manfred, II. 2. [Rare.]

spinsterhood (spin'stér-húd), n. [spinster + -hood.] The state of being a spinster; unmarried life or state.

spinsterhood (spin'stér-shíp), n. [spinster + -ship.] Spinsterhood. Southey.

spinstress (spin'stress), n. [spinster + -ess.] A woman who spins, or whose occupation is spinning; a spinster.

Let meander souls by virtue be cajoled,
 As the good Grecian spinstress [Penelope] was of old.
Tom Brown, Works, IV. 10. (Davies.)

spinstry (spin'stri), n. [spinster + -y (cf. -ery).] The work or occupation of spinning; spinning.

What new decency can be added to this your spinstry?
Milton, Church-Government, II. 2.

spintext (spin'tekst), n. [spin, v., + obj. text.] One who speaks out long dreary discourses; a prosy preacher.

The race of formal spintexts and solemn saygraces is nearly extinct.
V. Knox, Winter Evenings, ix.

spinthere (spin'thër), n. [= F. spinthère, < Gr. σπινθήρ, a spark.] A greenish-gray variety of sphene or titanite.

spintry (spin'tri), n. [L. spintria, spinthria, a male prostitute.] A male prostitute. [Rare.]

Ravished hence, like captives, and, in sight
 Of their most grieved parents, dealt away
 Unto his spintries, sellaries, and slaves.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, IV. 5.

spinula (spin'ü-lä), n.; pl. spinulæ (-lë). [NL., < L. spinula, dim. of spina, a spine: see spine.] In entom., a minute spine or hook. Specifically—(a) One of the little hooks bordering the anterior edge of the lower wing in most Hymenoptera: same as hamulus, 1 d. (b) One of the bristles forming the strigilla.

spinulate (spin'ü-lät), a. [spinula + -ate.] In zool., covered with little spines.—Spinulate hairs, hairs emitting minute rigid branches or spinules: such hairs cover many lepidopterous insects.

spinulated (spin'ü-lät-ed), a. [spinulate + -ed.] Same as spinulate.

spinule (spin'ül), n. [L. spinula, dim. of spina, a thorn, spine: see spine.] A small spine; a spicule.

spinulescent (spin'ü-less'ent), a. [spinule + -escent.] In bot., producing diminutive spines; somewhat spiny or thorny.

spinuliferous (spin'ü-lif'e-rus), a. [L. spinula, a spinule, + ferre = E. bear.] In bot., same as spinulose.

spinulose (spin'ü-lös), a. [NL. spinulosus: see spinulous.] In bot. and zool., furnished with spinules or diminutive spines.

I have never seen any prominent spine upon the posterior elevation, though it is sometimes minutely spinulose.
Huxley, Crayfish, p. 234.

spinulous (spin'ü-lus), a. [NL. spinulosus, < L. spinula, a spinule: see spinule.] Same as spinulose.

spinus (spi'nus), n. [NL., < Gr. σπις, a bird of the finch kind; cf. spink.] 1†. An old name of some small bird which feeds on seeds, as a thistle-bird, linnet, siskin, or bunting. Hence—2. [cap.] A genus of thistle-birds named by Koch in 1816, containing the linnet, the siskin or aberdevine, the goldfinch, the redpoll, and others, both of Europe and of America. In present usage, the siskin is Spinus spinus, the pine-finch is S. pinus, the goldfinch of Europe is S. carduelis, that of America is S. tristis, etc. The name wavers in application, and is more or less inexact synonym with several others, as Acanthis, Carduelis, Chrysomitris, Astragalinus, Agrothus, Lánaria, Línoda, etc. See cuts under siskin and goldfinch.

spiny (spi'ni), a. [spin + -y.] 1. Having thorns or spines; full of spines; thorny; prickly.—2. Figuratively, thorny; perplexed; difficult; troublesome.

The spiny desarts of scholastick philosophy.
Warburton, On Prophecy, p. 61. (Latham.)

3†. Thin; slim; slender.
 As in well-grown woods, on trees, cold spiny grasshoppers sit chirping Chapman, Iliad, III. 161.

Faith, thou art such a spiny bald-rib, all the mistresses in the town will never get thee up.
Middleton, Mayor of Queenborough, III. 3.

Spiny calamary, a cephalopod of the genus Acanthoteuthis. P. P. Carpenter.—Spiny crab, a crab whose carapace is spiny, or has spinous processes; a spider-crab or maloid. See cut under Oxyrhynchus.—Spiny fish, a spiny-finned or acanthopterygian fish.—Spiny lobster. See lobster.—Spiny rat, one of sundry small rat-like rodents whose pelage is more or less spiny. (a) One of the South American species of Echimyus and Loncheres or Nelomys. See cut under Echimyus. (b) One of several pouched rats of the genus Heteromys.

spiny-eel (spi'ni-él), n. See Mastacembelidae.
spiny-finned (spi'ni-find), a. In ichth., having spinous fin-rays; spine-finned; acanthopterygious.

spiny-skinned (spi'ni-skind), a. Echinodermatous.

spion† (spi'on), n. [Early mod. E. also spyon; = D. G. Sw. Dan. spion, < OF. (and F.) espion, a spy: see spy. Cf. espionage.] A spy.

Captaine of the Spions.
Heywood, Four Prentises of London (Works, 1874, II. 242).

spira, v. An obsolete form of speel.

spira (spi'rá), n.; pl. spiræ (-rë). [L., the base of a column, a spire: see spire.] In arch., the moldings at the base of a column; a torus. Such a molding or moldings are not present in the Greek Doric order of architecture, but the feature is constant in all varieties of the Ionic and Corinthian. See cuts under base, 3.

spirable† (spi'r'a-bl), a. [L. spirabilis, that may be breathed, respirable, < spirare, breathe, blow: see spire.] Capable of being breathed; respirable.

The spirable odor and pestilent steame ascending from it put him out of his bias of congruity.
Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 173). (Davies.)

spiracle (spi'r or spi'r'a-kl), n. [ME. spyrakle, < OF. spiracle, vernacularly spirail, espirail = It. spiracolo, < L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, air-hole, < spirare, breathe: see spire.] 1. An aperture or orifice.

And after XL dayes this spiracle
 Is uppe to close, and whence the [you] list, it [the wine] drinke.
Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 202.

2. In zool., an aperture, orifice, or vent through which air, vapor, or water passes in the act of respiration; a breathing-hole; a spiraculum: applied to many different formations. Specifically—(a) In Mammalia, the nostril or blow-hole of a cetacean, as the whale, porpoise, etc., through which air, mixed with spray or water, is expelled. (b) In ichth., (1) An aperture on the upper side of the head, in front of the suspensorium of the lower jaw, observed in many fishes, as selachians and ganoids. This is the external opening of the hyomandibular cleft, or persistent first postoral visceral cleft, of the embryo. (2) The single nostril of the monorhine vertebrates, or myxotus—the lampreys and hags. (c) In entom., a breathing-hole; the external orifice of one of the tracheæ or windpipes of an arachnid or myriapod, opening in the side of the body. In true insects (Hexapoda) the spiracles are typically twenty-two in number, a pair (one on each side) for each of the three thoracic segments, and for each of the anterior eight abdominal segments; but they are almost always lacking on some one or more of these. They are either simple openings into the respiratory system, or are provided with valves, sieves, or fringes of hair for the exclusion of foreign particles. See cut under Systoechus.

spiracula, n. Plural of spiraculum.

spiracula² (spi-rak'ü-lä), n.; pl. spiraculæ (-lë). [NL.: see spiracle.] In entom., same as spiracle.

spiracular (spi-rak'ü-lär), a. and n. [spiraculum + -ar.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a spiracle, breathing-hole, or blow-hole.—2. Fitted for or permitting respiration, as a spiracle; respiratory.—Spiracular arch, in ichth., one of the visceral arches of some fishes, between the mandibular and hyomandibular arches, in special relation with the spiracular cleft and spiracle.—Spiracular cleft, in ichth., the hyomandibular cleft: so called from its relations to the spiracle in certain fishes, as all selachians and various ganoids. See spiracle, 2 (b) (1).—Spiracular gill, a false gill, or pseudobranch.—Spiracular respiration, a breathing through spiracles, as in the tracheal respiration of many insects.

II. n. A small bone or cartilage in special relation with the spiracle of some fishes.

A series of small oesicles, of which two may be distinguished as spiraculars.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 648.

spiraculate (spi-rak'ü-lät), a. [spiraculum + -ate.] Provided with a spiracle.

spiraculiferous (spi-rak'ü-lif'e-rus), a. [L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, + ferre = E. bear.] In entom., bearing a spiracle or breathing-pore: said of segments in which these organs are visible. See cut under Systoechus. Westwood.

spiraculiform (spi-rak'ü-li-fôrm), a. [L. spiraculum, a breathing-hole, + forma, form.] In entom., having the structure, form, or appearance of a spiracle; stigmatiform.

spiraculum (spi-rak'ü-lum), n.; pl. spiracula (-lä). [L.: see spiracle.] 1. A spiracle, in any sense.—2. A breathing-hole in the aventail, beaver, or mesal of a helmet.

spiræ, n. Plural of spira.

Spiræa (spi-rë'ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. spiræa, < Gr. σπειρα, meadow-sweet, so called from the shape of its follicles, < σπειρα, a coil, spire: see spire.] 1. A genus of rosaceous plants, type of the Spirææ. It is characterized by fruit commonly of five follicles, containing usually numerous linear seeds with a membranous or rarely coriaceous outer seed-coat and little or no albumen. The flowers have four or five calyx-lobes, as many rounded petals, twenty to sixty filiform stamens, and a smooth or woolly fleshy disk. The Himalayan S. parvifolia is an exception in its solitary seeds and obconical calyx. There are about 50 species, widely scattered through temperate and cold regions of the northern hemisphere, and occurring rarely on mountains within the tropics. They are herbs or shrubs, bearing alternate simple pinnate or ternately compound leaves, usually furnished with free or wing-like and united stipules. The small white, pink, or rose-colored flowers form a copious axillary or terminal inflorescence, which is either a raceme, cyme, panicle, or corymb, or consists, as in S. Aruncus, of a diffuse panicle composed of numerous elongated slender spikes. Most of the species are highly ornamental in flower. They are now most commonly known, especially in cultivation, by the generic name Spiræa. Eleven species are natives of Europe, 3 of which occur in England: of these S. Filipendula is the dropwort, and the others, S. salicifolia and S. Ulmaria, are known as meadow-sweet (the latter also as queen-of-the-meadows, which see). Six species are natives of the northeastern United States, of which S. salicifolia is the most widely distributed, a shrub with slender ascending spire-like branches, popularly known in the west as steplebush, in America usually with white flowers, in Europe, Siberia, Mongolia, and Japan pink or rose-colored. It is often cultivated, especially in Russia, where a great many varieties have originated: in Wales it forms a large part of the hedges. For S. tomentosa, a similar pink-flowered eastern species, see hardhack; its representative on the Pacific coast, S. Douglasii, with handsome whitened leaves, is one of the most showy of American shrubs. For S. lobata, see queen-of-the-prairie, and for S. Aruncus, goat-beard; the latter is one of the most ornamental plants of eastern woodland borders. For S. hypericifolia, common in cultivation from Europe and Siberia, and also called Italian may and St. Peter's wreath, see bridal-wreath. Several species from Japan are now abundant in ornamental grounds, as S. Japonica and its variety S. Fortunei, and S. prunifolia, the plum-leaved spiræa, a white-flowered shrub with handsome silky leaves. S. Thunbergii from Japan is much used in parks, forming a small diffuse shrub 2 or 3 feet high with light recurving branches whitened before the leaves with a profusion of small flowers usually in threes in the axils. Some Asiatic species with pinnate leaves and large terminal panicles of white flowers are arborescent, as S. sorbifolia, often seen as a shrub in New England dooryards, and S. Kamchatica, with the panicles very large, the flowers fragrant and feathery. The former S. opulifolia, the ninebark, and its variety area, the golden spiræa of gardens, are now referred to Neillia, or by some separated as a genus Physocarpus. Many species possess moderate astringent or tonic properties; the roots of the British species are so used, and the flowers of S. hypericifolia; S. Ulmaria is valuable also as a diuretic. S. tomentosa, the principal American medicinal species, a plant of bitter and astringent taste, is used in New England and also formerly by the Indians as a tonic.

Flowering Branch of Hardhack (Spiræa tomentosa).
a, flower; b, fruit; c, leaf.

2. [L. c.] A plant of this genus. (b) The white-flowered shrub Astilbe Japonica, now extensively imported into the United States and propagated under glass, forming one of the chief materials of Easter decorations.

Spirææ (spi-rë'ë-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Spiræa + -æ.] A tribe of poly-petalous plants, of the order Rosaceæ. It is characterized by flowers with bractless and commonly persistent calyx-lobes, ten or more stamens, from one to eight superior carpels, usually each with two or more pendulous ovules, either indehiscent or ripening into follicles, and not included within the calyx-tube. It consists of 10 genera, of which Spiræa is the type. They are usually shrubs, all natives of the northern hemisphere; Spiræa only is of wide distribution; 4 others are confined to North America, of which Neivusa is found only in Alabama, and Adenostoma in California. Four or five other genera are confined to Japan and China.

spiræic (spi-rë'ik), a. [NL. Spiræa + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to or derived from Spiræa.—2†. Same as salicylic.

spiral (spi'ral), a. and n. [F. spirale = Sp. Pg. espiral = It. spirale = D. spiraal = G. Sw. Dan. spiral, < ML. spiralis, spiral (linea spiralis, a spiral line, a spiral), < L. spira, a coil, spire: see spire.] 1. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a spire or coil; like a spire; pointed or shaped like a spire.—2. Winding around a fixed point or center, and continually receding from it, like a watchspring; specifically, in conch., making a number of turns about the columella or axis of the shell; whorled. The whorls may be in one plane, producing the flat or discoid shell, or often wend into a spire, resulting in the ordinary turreted form. Compare cuts under Planorbis and Limnaea, and see spire, 2. 3. Winding and at the same time rising or advancing like a screw-thread: more accurately helical or helicoidal.

Flat Spiral of an Ammonite (Ammonites bifrons).

Where upward, in the mellow blush of day,
The noisy bittern wheeled his spiral way.
Longfellow, Sunrise on the Hills.

Spiral axis. See axis.—Spiral balance, a form of balance in which the weight of the body under examination is measured by the stretching (torsion) of an elastic wire in the form of a long spiral. A common use of the simple form of spiral balance (see cut) is in determining the specific gravity of small fragments of minerals, which for this purpose are weighed first in the upper pan and then in that below, which is immersed in water.—Spiral canal of the cochlea, of the middle. See canal, and cut under ear.—Spiral duct, in bot., same as spiral vessel.—Spiral fracture, a fracture of bone due to torsion, so that the broken ends have a more or less screw-like appearance. See gearing.—Spiral layer, the middle one of the three layers or coats of the tracheal wall in insects. See tenidium and trachea.—Spiral ligament of the cochlea, the spiral ridge at the outer insertion of the basilar membrane: it is prismatic, or triangular in section.—Spiral line, the line connecting the radii or radiating lines of a geometrical spider's web, and forming a continuous spiral from the circumference nearly to the center. It is formed after the radii have been put in place.—Spiral nebula, phyllotaxis, plexus. See the nouns.—Spiral point. See spire, 3.—Spiral pteropods, the Limacina.—Spiral pump, a form of the Archimedean screw water-elevator. See Archimedean screw, under Archimedean.—Spiral screw. See screw, 1.—Spiral space, the area bounded at its two ends by successive parts of the same radius vector, and within and without by successive parts of the same spiral.—Spiral spring. See spring.—Spiral valve, in ichth., a continuous fold or ridge of mucous membrane which winds spirally about the interior of the intestine of some fishes, as ganoids.—Spiral vessel, in bot., a vessel which is usually long, with fusiform extremities, and has the walls thickened in a spiral manner with one or more simple or branched bands or fibers. In most cases the direction of the spiral is from right to left, but it frequently happens that the earlier formed spirals run in one direction, while those formed later run in an opposite direction. See tissue, vessel.—Spiral wheels, in mach. See wheel.

Spiral Balance for determining specific gravities.

II. n. 1. In geom., a plane curve which runs continuously round and round a fixed point, called the center. 2. A helix or curve which winds round a cylinder like a screw.—3. A spiral spring.—4. In wool, one of the curls or convolutions in wool-fiber, the number of which in a unit of length is made the basis of an estimate of its quality for manufacturing.—5. In zool. and anat., a spiral formation, as of a univalve, of the cochlea, etc.—Airy's spirals, the peculiar colored interference figures seen when two sections of quartz, one of a right-handed the other of a left-handed crystal, both cut transverse to the vertical axis, are placed one over the other, and viewed in converging polarized light.—Curschmann's spirals, in pathol., bodies formed of spirally wound mucous threads with often a fine shining central thread. They seem to be casts of small bronchi, and are expected in asthma and certain forms of bronchitis.—Double, equiangular, logarithmic, loxodromic spiral. See the adjectives.—Logistic spiral. Same as logarithmic spiral (which see, under logarithmic).—Norwich spiral, that second involute of the circle whose apex is midway between the cusp of the first involute and the center of the circle: so called because first shown by Sylvester at the meeting of the British Association at Norwich in 1868.—Parabolic spiral. See parabolic, and cut above.

Parabolic Spiral. Archimedean Spiral.

ter, with constantly increasing radius vector, so that the latter is never normal to the curve; also, a part of such a curve in the course of which the radius from the center describes 360°. Besides the spirals mentioned below, the involute of the circle and the cycloids are very important. The principal spirals which have received attention are the spiral of Archimedes (usually understood to have been discovered by Conon the Samian), the radius of which increases uniformly with the angle; the hyperbolic spiral, whose radius vector is inversely proportional to the angle; the lituus, the square of whose radius vector is inversely proportional to the angle; and the logarithmic spiral, whose angle is proportional to the logarithm of the radius vector.

Hyperbolic Spiral. (Less of the inner part of one branch is shown than of the other.)

The teeth of the cutter should be made to run slightly spiraled. Joshua Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 346.

spirality (spi-ral'i-ti), n. [< spiral + -ity.] Spirality character or quality. Science, III. 583.

spirally (spi-ral-i), adv. In the form or manner of a spiral.

spiral-tail (spi-ral-tail), n. The royal or king bird of paradise, Cinnurus regius: so called from the spiral coil at the end of the middle tail-feathers. See cut under Cinnurus.

spirament, n. [< L. spiramentum, a breathing-hole, air-hole, < spirare, breathe: see spire, 3.] A spiracle. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 78.

spirant (spi-rant), n. [< L. spirant(-t)s, ppr. of spirare, breathe, blow, exhale: see spire, 3.] A consonant uttered with perceptible blowing, or expulsion of breath; an alphabetic sound in the utterance of which the organs are brought near together but not wholly closed; a rustling, or fricative, or continuative consonant. The term is by some restricted to sounds of the grade of v and f, the th of thin and that of thine, and the German ch; others make it include also the sibilants; others, the semivowels w and y.

Spiranthes (spi-ran'thez), n. [NL. (Richard, 1818), so called in allusion to the spiral arrangement of the flowers; < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + άνθος, flower.] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Neottieæ, type of the subtribe Spirantheæ. It is characterized by commonly spirally ranked and somewhat ringlet flowers with the upper sepal and the two petals erect or connivent and galeate, and the lateral sepals set obliquely on the ovary or long-decurrent, and by a column not prolonged into a free appendage, but usually decurrent on the ovary. There are about 80 species, widely dispersed through temperate and tropical regions of both hemispheres. They are terrestrial herbs from a short rootstock or a cluster of fleshy fibers or thickened tubers. Many species produce small white or greenish fragrant flowers, in several spirals forming a dense spike; in some the spike is reduced to a single spiral or becomes straight and unilateral. The flowers are commonly small, but reach a large size in some tropical American species. The leaves are usually narrow, often grass-like. Six species are natives of the northeastern United States, all late-flowering and some of them leafless. They are known as lady's-tresses, S. cernua also locally as wild tuberose, and S. gracilis as corkscrew-plant.

spiranthic (spi-ran'thik), a. [< spiranth-y + -ic.] Of the nature of or affected with spiranth. spiranth (spi-ran'thi), n. [< Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire (see spire, 2), + άνθος, a flower.] In bot., the abnormal dislocation of the organs of a flower in a spiral direction. Thus, Masters describes a curious flower of Cypripedium insignis, in which a displacement occurred by a spiral torsion proceeding from right to left, which involved the complete or partial suppression of the organs of the flower. Also spelled spiranth.

spiraster (spi-ras'ter), n. [NL., < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + αστήρ, a star.] In sponges, an irregular polyact spicule in the form of a stout spiral with thick spines; a spinispirula. When these spines or rays are terminal, the spicule is called an amphias. Sollas.

Spirastrea (spir-as-trō'sā), n. pl. [NL.: see spirastrea.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, a group of choristidan tetractinellidan sponges, generally provided with spirasters.

spirastrose (spi-ras'trōs), a. [< spiraster + -ose (see -ous).] Having microscloeres or flesh-spicules in the form of spirasters; of or pertaining to the Spirastrea: distinguished from sterastrose.

spirated (spi-rā-ted), a. [< spire, 2 + -ate + -ed.] Formed into or like a spiral; twisted like a corkscrew. See cut under satin. [Rare.]

The males of this species [Antelope bezoartica] have long, straight, spiraled horns nearly parallel to each other, and directed backward. Darwin, Descent of Man, II. 285.

spiration (spi-rā'shon), n. [< LL. spiratio(n)], a breathing, < L. spirare, pp. spiratus, breathe, blow, exhale: see spire, 3.] 1. A breathing. God did by a kind of spiration produce them. Barrow, Sermons, II. xxxiv.

2. In theol., the act by which the procession of the Holy Ghost is held to take place; also, the relation or notion so constituted.

spire (spir), n. [Also spear (formerly also speer), now commonly associated with spear 1; < ME. spire, spyre, spir, < AS. spīr, a stalk, = MLG. spīr, LG. spier, a point, needle, sprout, = G. spier, a needle, pointer, spiere, a spar, = Icel. spira, a spar, stilt, a kind of beaker, = Sw. spira, a spar, scepter, pistil, = Dan. spire, a spar, germ, shoot, spir, a spar, spire (in arch.); perhaps connected with spike 1 and spine, or with spear 1.] 1. A sprout or shoot of a plant. An oak comth of a litel spire. Chaucer, Troilus, II. 1335.

2. A stalk of grass or some similar plant; a spear. Shal neuere spir springen vp. Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 180.

Pointed Spires of Flax, when green,
Will Ink supply, and Letters mark unseem.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

3. The continuation of the trunk in a more or less excurrent tree above the point where branching begins. No tops to be received, except the spire and such other top or limb as may be grown on the main piece [British oak for navy contracts]. Lastett, Timber, p. 72.

4. A name of various tall grasses, as the mar-ram, Ammophila arundinacea; the reed canary-grass, Phalaris arundinacea; and the common reed, Phragmites communis. Britten and Holland, Eng. Plant Names. [Prov. Eng.]—5. In mining, the tube carrying the train to the charge in the blast-hole: so called from the spires of grass or rushes used for the purpose. Also called reed or rush.—6. A body that shoots up to a point; a tapering body; a conical or pyramidal body; specifically, in arch., the tapering part of a steeple rising above the tower; a steeple; the great pinnacle, often of wood covered with lead, frequently crowning the crossing of the nave in large churches. The earliest spires, in the architectural sense, were merely pyramidal or conical roofs, specimens of which exist in some of the oldest Romanesque buildings. These roofs, becoming gradually elongated and more and more acute, resulted at length in the graceful tapering spire. Among the many existing medieval examples, that of Salisbury Cathedral is one of the finest; that of Senlis Cathedral, France, though not of great size, is one of the earliest of fully developed spires, and is admired for the purity and elegance of its design. The spires of medieval architecture are generally square, octagonal, or circular in plan; they are sometimes solid, more frequently hollow, and are variously ornamented with bands encircling them, with panels more or less enriched, and with piercings and spire-lights, which are of infinite variety. Their angles are sometimes crocketed, and they are often terminated by a finial. In later examples the general pyramidal outline is obtained by diminishing the diameter of the structure in successive stages, and this has been imitated in modern spires, in which the forms and details of classic architecture have been applied to an architectural creation essentially medieval. The term spire is sometimes restricted to signify such tapering structures, crowning towers or turrets, as have parapets at their base, while when the spire rises from the exterior of the wall of the tower, without the intervention of a parapet, it is called a broach. See also cuts under broach, 10, rood-steeple, and transept.

The glorious temple rear'd
Her pile, far off appearing like a mount
Of alabaster, topt with golden spires.
Milton, P. R., iv. 548.

7. The top or uppermost point of a thing; the summit. To silence that Which, to the spire and top of praises vouch'd, Would seem but modest. Shak., Cor., I. 2. 24.

spire (spir), v.; pret. and pp. spired, ppr. spiring. [< ME. spiren, spyren (= Dan. spire = Sw. spira, germinate); < spire 1, n.] I. intrans. 1. To sprout, as grain in malting.—2. To shoot; shoot up sharply. Von cypress spiring high,
With pine and cedar spreading wide
Their darksome boughs on either side.
Wordsworth, White Doe of Rylstone, iv.

II. trans. 1†. To shoot or send forth.

Spire of Senlis Cathedral, France; early 13th century.

In gentle Ladies breast and bounteous race
Of woman kind it fayrest Flower doth spire.
Spenser, F. Q., III. v. 52.

2. To furnish with a spire or spires.

Like rampred walls the houses lean,
All spired and domed and turreted,
Sheer to the valley's darkling green.
W. E. Healey, From a Window in Princes Street.

spire² (spir), n. [F. spire = Sp. Pg. espira = It. spira, < L. spira, < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, twist, wreath, spire, also a tore or anchor-ring. Cf. Gr. σπυρίς, a woven basket, L. sporta, a woven basket, Lith. spartas, a band. Hence spiral, etc.] 1. A winding line like the thread of a screw; anything wreathed or contorted; a coil; a curl; a twist; a wreath; a spiral.

His head . . .
With burnish'd neck of verdant gold erect Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass Floated redundant. Milton, P. L., ix. 502.

2. In conch., all the whorls of a spiral univalve above the aperture or the body-whorl, taken together as forming a turret. In most cases the spire is exerted from the last turn of the shell, giving the ordinary turreted conical or helicoid form of numberless gastropods; and in some long slender forms, of many turns and with small aperture, the spire makes most of the length of the shell, as figured at Cerithium, Cylindrella, and Terebra, for example. In other cases, however, the spire scarcely protrudes from the body-whorl, and it may be even entirely included or contained in the latter, so that a depression or other formation occupies the usual position of the apex of the shell. (Compare cuts under Cypræa, Cymbium, and Oculum.) See also cut under univalve.

a, Spire of a Univalve (Imbricaria conica).

3. In math., a point at which different leaves of a Riemann's surface are connected. Also called a spiral point.

spire³ (spir), v. i. [= OF. spirer, espirer, esperer = Sp. Pg. espirar = It. spirare, < L. spirare, breathe. Hence ult. spirit, etc., and aspire, conspire, inspire, perspire, respire, transpire.] To breathe.

But see, a happy Borean blast did spire
From faire Pelorus parts, which brought us right.
Viears, tr. of Virgil (1632). (Nares.)

spire⁴, r. A Middle English form of sperr.

spire⁵ (spir), n. [*Cf. spire*¹.] The male of the red deer, Cervus elaphus, in its third year.

A spire [has] brow [antler] and uprights.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 510.

spire-bearer (spir' bār'ēr), n. In conch., a spirifer.

spired¹ (spird), a. [*Cf. spire*¹ + *-ed*².] Having a spire.

And Baal's spired Stone to Dust was ground.
Cowley, Davidels, II.

spired² (spird), a. [*Cf. spire*² + *-ed*².] In conch., having a spire, as a univalve shell; spiriferous; turreted.

spire-light (spir' lit), n. A window or opening of any kind for light in a spire.

spire-steeple (spir' stē'pl), n. A spire considered as part of a steeple; a spire. [Rare.]

spiric (spir' rik), a. and n. [Gr. σπειρικός, spiric, < σπειρα, a tore, < σπειρεν, sweep round.] 1. a. Pertaining to or in the form of a tore or anchoring.—Spiric body, a tore.—Spiric line. See *line*².

II. n. A curve, the plane section of a tore. Such curves, which are bicircular quartics, were treated by the ancient geometers Eudoxus and Perseus.

spiricle (spir' i-kl), n. [NL. spiricula, dim. of L. spira, a spire: see *spire*².] In bot., one of the delicate coiled threads in the hairs on the surface of certain seeds and achenes, which uncoil when wet. They probably serve in fixing small and light seeds to the soil, in order that they may germinate.

Spirifer (spir' i-fēr), n. [NL. (Sowerby, 1816), < L. spira, a coil, spire, + ferre = *E. bear*¹.] 1. The typical genus of Spiriferidae, having the long brachial appendages coiled into a pair of a, ventral view; b, dorsal view; c, lateral view.

spirals, called the carriage-spring apparatus, supported upon similarly convoluted shelly lamellæ, and the shell impunctate, with a long straight hinge-line. Numerous species range from the Lower Silurian to the Permian. S. hystericus is an example. Also called Spirifera, Spiriferus. 2. [I. c.] A member of this genus.

Spiriferidae (spir-i-fēr'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spirifer + -idae.] A family of arthropomatus brachiopods with highly developed spiral appendages, typified by the genus Spirifer, containing numerous genera, ranging from the Lower Silurian to the Liassic.

spiriferine (spi-rif' ē-rin), a. [Cf. Spirifer + *-ine*¹.] Bearing brachial appendages in the form of a spiral; of or pertaining to the Spiriferidae.

spiriferoid (spi-rif' ē-roid), n. and a. [Cf. Spirifer + -oid.] 1. n. A brachiopod of the family Spiriferidae.

II. a. Resembling a spirifer; having characters of the Spiriferidae.

spiriferous (spi-rif' ē-rus), a. [NL. spirifer, < L. spira, a coil, spire, + ferre = *E. bear*¹.] 1. Having a spire, as a univalve shell; spired; turreted.—2. Having spiral appendages, as a brachiopod; spiriferine.—3. Containing or yielding fossil spirifers, as a geological stratum. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 507.

spirignath (spir' ig-nath), n. [NL. spirignatha (Latreille, 1796), < spirignathus*: see spirignathous.] The slender spirally coiled antlia or haustellum of lepidopterous insects. Also spirignatha, spiritrompe.

spirignathous (spi-rig' nā-thus), a. [NL. spirignathus, < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, + γνάθος, a jaw.] Having a filiform sucking-tube coiled in a spiral, as a moth or butterfly; haustellate or antliate, as a lepidopterous insect.

spirillar (spir' i-lār), a. [Cf. Spirillum + *-ar*³.] In bot., belonging to or resembling the genus Spirillum.

Spirillum (spi-ril' um), n. [NL. (Ehrenberg, 1830), dim. of L. spira, a coil, spire: see *spire*².] A genus or form-genus of Schizomycetes or bacteria, having cylindrical or somewhat compressed spirally twisted cells. They are rigid and furnished at each end with a cilium, and multiply by transverse division, the parts soon separating from one another. This genus, which according to some authorities also embraces the genus known as Vibrio, contains many species, found in swamp-water, salt water, infusions, etc. See Schizomycetes.—Spirillum fever. See *fever*¹.

spirit (spir' it), n. [ME. spirit, spirite, spyrte, spirite (also sprit, sprite, > E. spritel), < OF. espirit, esperit, espirit, F. esprit = Sp. spiritu = Pg. espirito = It. spirito, spirit (= G. Sw. Dan. spiritus, spirits of wine, etc.), < L. spiritus, a breathing or blowing (as of the wind), a breeze, the air, a breath, exhalation, the breath of life, life, mind, soul, spirit, also courage, haughtiness, etc., L. a spirit, ghost, < spirare, breathe: see *spire*³. Cf. spritel, a doublet of spirit.] 1. According to old and primitive modes of thought, an invisible corporeal thing of an airy nature, scarcely material, the principle of life, mediating between soul and body. The primitive and natural notion of life was that it consisted of the breath, and in most languages words etymologically signifying 'breath' are used to mean the principle of life. Spirit is one of these, and translates the Greek πνεῦμα. The ordinary notion of the Greek philosophers was that the soul is warm air. This was strengthened by the discovery, about the time of Aristotle (who, however, does not share the opinion), of the distinction between the veins and the arteries. It is found elaborately developed in the writings of the Stoics, and especially of Galen. The spirit in the body exists in various degrees of fineness. The coarser kinds confer only vegetative life, and betray themselves in eruptions, etc.; there are, besides, a vital spirit (πνεῦμα ζωτικόν), and an animal or psychical spirit (πνεῦμα ψυχικόν). At birth man was said to possess only vegetative spirit, but as soon as he draws breath this was thought to be carried through the left ventricle and the arteries to every part of the body, becoming triturated, and conveying animal life to the whole. The spirits were also said to be in different states of tension or tone, causing greater or less energy of body and mind. The vital spirits, being carried to the ventricles of the brain, were there further refined, and converted into spirits of sense, or animal spirits. In vision these spirits dart out from the eye to the object, though this be the most distant star, and immediately return laden in some form with information. This doctrine, modified by the addition of an incorporeal soul, and confused with the Hebrew conception of a spirit, was generally believed down to and into the scientific era. Old writers, therefore, who use phrases which are still employed metaphorically must be understood as meaning them literally. See def. 3.

There is no malice in this burning coal;
The breath of heaven hath blown his spirit out.
Shak., K. John, iv. 1. 110.

From the kind heat which in the heart doth reign
The spirits of life doe their beginning take;
These spirits of life, ascending to the braine,
When they come there the spirits of sense do make.

These spirits of sense in fantasie's high court
Judge of the formes of objects ill or well;
And so they send a good or ill report
Downe to the heart, where all affections dwell.

Besides, another motive power doth rise
Out of the heart, from whose pure blood do spring
The vital spirits, which, borne in arteries, Continuall motion to all parts doe bring.
Sir J. Davies, Nosce Teipsum.

Adam, now enforced to close his eyes,
Sunk down, and all his spirits became entranced.
Milton, P. L., xi. 419.

Thus much cannot be denied, that our soul acteth not immediately only upon bones, flesh, brains, and other such like gross parts of the body, but, first and chiefly, upon the animal spirits, as the immediate instruments of sense and fancy, as that by whose vigour and activity the other heavy and unwieldy bulk of the body is so nimbly moved. And therefore we know no reason why we may not assent here to that of Porphyrius: that the blood is the food and nourishment of the spirit, and that this spirit is the vehicle of the soul, or the more immediate seat of life.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, v. § 3.

2. The principle of life conceived as a fragment of the divine essence breathed into man by God. This conception is developed in the Old and New Testaments, in the writings of the Neoplatonists, and by theologians. In Biblical and theological language the spirit is the highest part of human nature, as most akin to the divine, connected medially with the body through the soul, and spoken of alone, or in contradistinction to the body, or as distinguished from both body and soul (see soul).

All flesh died that moved upon the earth, . . . all in whose nostrils was the breath of the spirit of life.
Gen. vii. 21, 22.

The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha. 2 Ki. ii. 15.
My spirit is consumed, my days are extinct, the grave is ready for me. Job xvii. 1.

Who among men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man, which is in him? 1 Cor. ii. 11 (R. V.).
Our body shall be turned into ashes, and our spirit shall vanish as the soft air. Wisdom of Solomon, ii. 3.

3. Metaphorically, animation; vivacity; exuberance of life; cheerfulness; courage; mettle; temper; humor; mood: usually in the plural. But in old writers this meaning is not figurative, since they conceived this quality to be due to the tension of animal spirits.

So feeble were his spirites, and so low.
Chaucer, C. T., I. 1361.

Hastings went to the council that morning in remarkably high spirits. J. Gairdner, Rich. III., ii.

All furnish'd, all in arms; . . .
As full of spirit as the month of May.

Shak., I Hen. IV., iv. 1. 101.
I wonder you can have such spirits under so many distresses.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 1.

4. A peculiar animating and inspiring principle; dominant influence; genius; that which pervades and tempers the conduct and thought of men, either singly or (especially) in bodies, and characterizes them or their works.

O spirit of love! how quick and fresh art thou!
Shak., T. N., I. 1. 9.

This shows plainly the democratical spirit which acts our deputies. Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 141.

All seem to feel the spirit of the place,
And by the general reverence God is praised.
Wordsworth, Sonnets, III. 48.

That is the best part of each writer which has nothing private in it; . . . that which in the study of a single artist you might not easily find, but in the study of many you would abstract as the spirit of them all.
Emerson, Compensation.

And that law of force which governs all the changes of character in a given people at a given time, which we call the Spirit of the Age, this also changes, though more slowly still. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 80.

5. The essence, real meaning, or intent of any statement, command, or contract: opposed to letter.

Who also hath made us able ministers of the new testament; not of the letter, but of the spirit: for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life. 2 Cor. iii. 6.

The scientific principles of Aristotle were in spirit, if not in form, in contrast with those of modern science.
W. Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 171.

6. Incorporeal, immaterial being or principle; personality, or a personality, unconnected or only associated with a body: in Biblical use applied to God, and specifically [cap.] to the third person of the Trinity (the Holy Spirit); also to supernatural good and evil beings (angels).

God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth. John iv. 24.
But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit: for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. 1 Cor. ii. 10.

Putting together the ideas of thinking and willing, or the power of moving or quieting corporeal motion, joined to substance, of which we have no distinct idea, we have the idea of an immaterial spirit.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxiii. 15.

If we seclude space out of our consideration, there will remain but two sorts of substances in the world: that is, matter and mind; or, as we otherwise call them, body and spirit.
Watts, Logic, I. ii. § 2.

Spirit exists everywhere in nature, and we know of no spirit outside of nature.
Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 455.

7. A person considered with respect to his peculiar characteristics of mind or temper, especially as shown in action; a man of life, fire, energy, enterprise, courage, or the like, who influences or dominates: as, the leading spirits of the movement were arrested.

No place will please me so, no mean of death,
As here by Cæsar, and by you cut off,
The choice and master spirits of this age.

Shak., J. C., iii. 1. 163.

8. A disembodied soul, or a soul naturally destitute of an ordinary solid body; an apparition of such a being; a specter; a ghost.

Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was; and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it. Eccl. xii. 7.

Whilst he [the child] is young, be sure to preserve his tender mind from all impressions and notions of spirits and goblins or any fearful apprehensions in the dark.

Locke, Education, § 138.

9. A supernatural being; an angel, fairy, elf, sprite, demon, or the like.

I am a spirit of no common rate, . . .
And I will purge thy mortal grossness so
That thou shalt like an airy spirit go.

Shak., M. N. D., iii. 1. 157.

And when Saul inquired of the Lord, the Lord answered him not, neither by dreams, nor by Urim, nor by prophets. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit. 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 7.

Why, a spirit is such a little, little thing that I have heard a man who was a great scholar say that he'll dance ye a Lancashire hornpipe upon the point of a needle.

Addison, The Drummer.

10. A subtle fluid contained in a particular substance, and conferring upon it its peculiar properties. (a) In Bacon's philosophy, such a fluid for each kind of substance, living or dead.

The spirits or pneumatics, that are in all tangible bodies, are scarcely known. . . . Spirits are nothing else but a natural body, rarefied to a proportion, and included in the tangible parts of bodies, as in an integument. And they be no less differing one from the other than the dense or tangible parts; . . . and they are never (almost) at rest; and from them and their motions principally proceed arefaction, coagulation, concoction, maturation, putrefaction, vivification, and most of the effects of nature.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 98.

(b) In old chem., a liquor obtained by distillation: often in the plural.

11. A strong alcoholic liquor; in a restricted sense, such a liquor variously treated in the process of distillation, and used as a beverage or medicinally, as brandy, whisky, and gin; in the plural, any strong distilled liquor.

They are like too frequent use of Spirits in a time of health, which weaken the force of Nature by raising it too high.

Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. ix.

12. A solution of tin in an acid, used in dyeing.—13†. An asperate; a breathing, as the letter h.

But he it [h] a letter or spirit, we have great use of it in our tongue, both before and after vowels.

B. Jonson, Eng. Grammar, iv.

14. The essence or active principle of anything.—15. In mod. German philos., the highest mode of existence; also, anything possessing such existence.—Animal, ardent, astral spirits. See the adjectives.—Aromatic spirit, a liquid composed of compound spirit of orange and alcohol.—Aromatic spirit of ammonia, a liquid composed of ammonium carbonate 40, water of ammonia 100, oil of lemon 12, oil of lavender-flowers 1, oil of pimenta 1, alcohol 700, water to make 1,000 parts. It is stimulant, antacid, and is used in sick-headache or as an aid in recovering after alcoholic debauch.—Barwood spirits. Same as tin spirits.—Brethren of the Free Spirit, Brethren of the Holy Spirit. See brother.—Compound spirit of horse-radish, a liquid composed of scraped horse-radish root, bitter-orange peel, nutmeg, proof-spirit, and water.—Compound spirit of juniper, a liquid composed of oil of juniper 10, oil of caraway 1, oil of fennel 1, alcohol 3,000, water to make 5,000 parts. It is adjunct to diuretic remedies.—Compound spirit of lavender. Same as compound tincture of lavender (which see, under tincture).—Compound spirit of orange, a liquid composed of the oils of bitter-orange peel, lemon, coriander, star-anise, and alcohol.—Dulcified spirit. See dulcify.—Dyers' spirit. See dye.—Familiar spirit. See familiar.—Fetid spirit of ammonia, a liquid composed of asafetida, strong solution of ammonia, and alcohol. It is a nervous stimulant, antacid.—Fever of the spirit. See fever.—Holy Spirit, or the Spirit, the Spirit of God; the Holy Ghost. See ghost.—In spirit. (a) Inwardly; as, to groan in spirit. (b) By inspiration; by or under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

How then doth David in spirit call him Lord?

Mat. xxii. 43.

Mahwa-spirit, an alcoholic liquor distilled from fermented flowers of Bassia latifolia.—Master spirit. See master.—Materialized spirit. See materialize.—Medicinal spirits, medicines prepared either by macerating bruised seeds, flowers, herbs, etc., in alcohol or spirit for two or three days before distillation, and then drawing off by a gentle heat, or extemporaneously by adding a proper proportion of essential oil to pure spirit of the prescribed strength. In this way are prepared spirits of aniseed, cassia, cinnamon, juniper, lavender, peppermint, rosemary, etc. They are used principally as aromatics and stimulants.—Methylated spirit. spiritualism (spir'it-tū-ál-izm), n. [= F. spiritualisme = Sp. Pg. espiritismo = It. spiritualismo; as spiritual + -ism.] 1. The state of being spiritual; spiritual character. Milman.—2. In philos., the doctrine of the existence of spirit as distinct from matter, or as the only reality; opposed to materialism.—3. The belief that disembodied spirits can and do communicate with the living, especially through the agency of a person particularly susceptible to spiritualistic influences, called a medium; also, the various doctrines and theories, collectively, founded upon this belief. In its modern form, spiritualism originated in the State of New York in the year 1848, and since that time has extended over the United States and Europe. The mediums through whom the supposed communications take place are of various kinds, no fewer than twenty-four different classes being mentioned in the books explanatory of spiritualism. Among the chief methods of communication are rappings, table-tippings, writing, and speaking; in the latter forms of communication the medium is supposed to be fully possessed by the spirit for the time being. Spiritualism has no formal system of theology, and it is contended by many of its advocates that it is not necessarily inconsistent with the maintenance of a faith otherwise Christian, and that spirit-communications are providential interventions for the purpose of inculcating the doctrine of immortality, and counteracting the material tendencies of the age. The meetings for spiritualistic communications are commonly called séances. Also spiritism.

spiritualist (spir'it-tū-ál-ist), n. [= F. spiritualiste = Sp. Pg. espiritualista = It. spiritualista; as spiritual + -ist.] 1. One who professes a regard for spiritual things only; also, one whose employment is spiritual.

May not he that lives in a small thatched house . . . preach as loud, and to as much purpose, as one of those high and mighty spiritualists? Echard, Grounds of Contempt of Clergy (1696), p. 140. (Latham.)

spirometer (spi-rom'e-tēr), n. [Irreg. < L. spirare, breathe (see spire), + metrum, measure.] A contrivance for measuring the extreme differential capacity of the human lungs.

The instrument most commonly employed consists of an inverted chamber submerged in a water-bath. The breath is conducted by a flexible pipe and internal tube so as to collect in the chamber, which rises in the water, and is fitted with an index which marks the cubic inches of air expired after a forced inspiration. In the accompanying cut, a a is a small gas-holder containing an inverted vessel a'; b, index, which shows on the scale c the number of cubic inches expired; d, manometer, which, when a' is held down, shows the pressure which the lungs can exert; e, plug-vent for outlet of expired air; f, cock for outlet of water; g, tube through which the expiration is made.

Spirometer.

spirometric (spi-rō-met'rik), a. [< As spirometer + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the spirometer; ascertained by means of the spirometer; as tested by the spirometer.—Spirometric capacity, extreme differential capacity of the lungs, measured by the total amount of air which can be expired after the fullest possible inspiration.

spirometry (spi-rom'e-tri), n. [< As spirometer + -y.] The use of the spirometer in measuring the capacity of the lungs.

Spiromonas (spi-rom'ō-nas), n. [NL. (Perty, 1852), < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + μονάς, a unit.] A genus of pantostomatous flagellate infusorians, spirally twisted on their long axis (whence the name). These animalcules are free-swimming or temporarily attached, soft and plastic, with two anterior subequal flagella, one of which is adherent at will. S. volubilis is an example. According to Kent, the Cyclidium distortum and Heteromita angustata of Dujardin are both species of Spiromonas.

spirophore (spi-rō-fōr), n. [Irreg. < L. spirare, breathe, + Gr. φερεω, < φέρω, I. bear.] An apparatus for producing artificial respiration in cases of suspended animation, as in persons rescued from drowning. It consists of an air-tight case, in which the body is inclosed up to the neck, and an air-pump, for producing at proper intervals a partial vacuum in the case, thus causing the external air to fill the lungs of the patient.

Spirophyton (spi-rof'i-ton), n. [NL. (Hall), < Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + φυτόν, a plant.] A genus of fossil algae, a characteristic plant of a subdivision of the Devonian occurring in the State of New York, and called from this fossil (Spirophyton cauda-galli) the cauda galli grit. This alga belongs to a group which appeared early in the Silurian, and continued into the Tertiary, but is now extinct. The frond of Spirophyton was broad, thin, with a distinct transversal nervation, and spirally convoluted around a slender axis, the convolution widening with the distance from the point of attachment.

spirozoid (spi-rō-zō'id), n. [< Gr. σπειρα, a coil, spire, + E. zoid.] The defensive zooid of certain hydroid hydrozoans, as of Podocoryne, a tubularian polyp: so called as coiling or curling spirally when not in action. These zooids are long slender filaments always provided with cnidæ or lasso-cells for netting, and are sometimes called spiralozooids. Compare dactylozoid and macropolyp.

spirt¹, spirt². See spurt¹, spurt².

spirtle, v. and n. See spurtle.

Spirula (spir'ū-lā), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1799), < LL. spirula, dim. of L. spira, a coil, spire: see spire.] 1. In Cephalopoda: (a) A genus of sepioid cuttlefishes, typical of the family Spirulidæ, having a delicate shell in the hinder part of the body rolled into a flat or discoidal spiral, with discrete whorls whose involute spire presents ventrally, and no guard. There are several species, as S. larva and S. fragilis. The shells are common, and are sometimes carried by the Gulf Stream to the coast of England, Spirula larva.

but specimens of the entire animal are extremely rare. Also Spirulæ, Spiruleæ. (b) [i. c.; pl. spirulæ (-læ).] A member of this genus. Imp. Dict.—2. [i. c.; pl. spirulæ (-læ).] In sponges, an irregular spineless polyact spicule of spiral form.

spirulate (spir'ū-lāt), a. [< LL. spirula, dim. of L. spira, a coil, spire (see Spirula), + -ate.] Spiral in form, or in disposition of parts; spirally arranged: said of structures, markings, etc.

Spirulidæ (spi-rū'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spirula + -idæ.] A family of cephalopods, typified by the genus Spirula. They are squids or sepioids with the mantle supported by a cartilaginous prominence or ridge and a corresponding pit or furrow, the fins small and terminal, and an internal tubular shell partitioned into numerous chambers by transverse septa, and wound in a loose coil.

spirulite (spir'ū-lit), n. [< NL. Spirula + -ite.] A fossil cephalopod resembling or related to Spirula.

spiry¹ (spir'i), a. [Early mod. E. spirie; < spire + -y.] 1. Having the form of a spire or pyramid; tapering like a spire.

In these lone walls (their days' eternal bound)

Those moss-grown domes with spiry turrets crown'd.

Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 142.

2. Abounding in spires or steeples.

And villages embosom'd soft in trees,

And spiry towns by surging columns mark'd

Of household smoke. Thomson, Spring, l. 958.

spiry² (spir'i), a. [< spire + -y.] Of a spiral form; spiral; wreathed; curled.

Hid in the spiry volumes of the snake.

Dryden, State of Innocence, iv. 2.

spitz-dog (spits'dog), n. [A half translation of G. spitzhund, a Pomeranian dog, < spitz, a point, + hund, a dog, = E. hound.] A variety of dog, so called from the pointed muzzle; a Pomeranian dog. See Pomeranian.

spitzhute (spits'hüt), n. [< G. spitz, a point, + E. hute.] In organ-building, a stop having conical pipes of metal, which give a thin, somewhat reedy tone.

spitzkasten (spits'käs-ten), n. [G., < spitz, a point, + kasten, a chest: see chest.] In mining, a pointed box; a V-vat: a German word frequently used by writers in English on ore-dressing.

Spiza (spī'zā), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1828), < Gr. σπιζα, a finch, < σπιζειν, pipe, chirp. Cf. spink.] A genus of fringilline birds, including a number of types, and hence variously limited. (a) That genus of painted finches of which the common indigo-bird of the United States is the type: synonymous with Passerina or Hortulanus of Vieillot, and Cyanospiza of Baird. See cut under indigo-bird. (b) Now employed for the silk-buntings, of which the common dickcissel or black-throated bunting, S. americana, is the type: synonymous with Dickcissel (Spiza americana).

Bufo. The male is 6½ inches long, 10½ in extent of wings; the plumage is smooth and compact; the upper parts are grayish-brown, streaked with black on the back; the lower are whitish, shaded with gray, tinged with bright yellow on the breast, and marked with a large black throat-patch; the edge of the wing is yellow; the lesser and middle coverts are bright-chestnut; the lower eyelid is white, the superciliary stripe yellow, and the bill dark horn-blue. The female is similar, but plainer, being less tinged with yellow, and having no black throat-patch, but a few black maxillary or pectoral streaks. This bunting is widely but irregularly distributed in the United States, especially in the eastern half, abounding in some districts, but seldom or never seen in others apparently as eligible. It nests on the ground or in a low bush, and lays four or five plain pale-greenish eggs (rarely speckled). The nuptial male has a quaint monotonous ditty, three notes of which are rendered in the name dickcissel—a word which originated in Illinois, and crept into print in or about 1876.

Spizaetus (spi-zā'e-tus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < Gr. σπιζα, a finch (see Spiza), + ætos, an eagle.] A genus of Falconidae, including hawks or small eagles having the feet feathered to the bases of the toes, the tail square or little rounded, the wings short and rounded, and the head, in the typical species, with a long occipital crest. The genus is sometimes restricted to such birds as the crested eagle of Brazil, S. manducator or S. ornatus; in a wider sense, it includes 12 or more species of Central and South America, Africa, India and the Indo-Malayan region, Celebes, Formosa, and Japan. Also Spizaetos.

Spizella (spi-zel'ā), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1832), < Spiza + dim. -ella.] A genus of small American finches or sparrows, the chipping-sparrows, having the wings pointed, the tail long and emarginate, the back streaked, and the under parts not streaked in the adult. It includes several of the most familiar sparrows of the United States, as the chippy or chip-bird, S. socialis or domestica; the field-sparrow, S. agrestis or pusilla; the tree-sparrow, S. monticola; the clay-colored bunting and Brewer's bunting, S. pallida and S. breweri; and the black-chinned sparrow, S. atrigularis. See cut under field-sparrow.

Spizellinae (spi-zel'i-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Spizella + -inae.] A subfamily of Fringillidae, containing a large number of small spotted and streaked sparrows. None of those which occur in the United States have any red, blue, or orange colors. S. F. Baird, 1858.

spizelline (spi-zel'in), a. [< Spizella + -ine.] Resembling or related to the chipping-sparrow; of or pertaining to the Spizellinae.

spizine (spi'zin), a. [< Spiza + -ine.] Resembling or related to the finches or buntings of the genus Spiza.

Splachneæ (splak'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Splachnum + -æ.] A tribe of bryaceous mosses, named from the genus Splachnum. Also Splachnei, Splachnaceæ.

Splachnum (splak'num), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1753), < Gr. σπλάχνον, some cryptogamous plant.] A genus of bryaceous mosses, giving name to the tribe Splachneæ. They are loosely caespitose, mostly annual plants, with soft, slender branches, which bear distant lower and tufted upper leaves, all with very loose areolation. The capsule is long-pedicelled, small, oval or short-cylindrical, provided with a peristome of sixteen linear orange-colored teeth. There are 6 North American species.

splaiet, v. An old spelling of splay.

splanadet, n. Same as splanade.

splanchnapophysis (splangk'na-pō-fiz'i-al), a. [< splanchnapophysis + -al.] Of or pertaining to a splanchnapophysis.

splanchnapophysis (splangk-na-pōf'i-sis), n.; pl. splanchnapophyses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. σπλάγχ- νον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + ἀπόφυσις, an offshoot: see apophysis.] An apophysis or outgrowth of a vertebra on the opposite side of the vertebral axis from a neurapophysis, and inclosing or tending to inclose some viscus. See cut under hyrapophysis.

splanchnic (splangk'nik), a. and n. [< Gr. σπλάγχνικός, pertaining to the viscera, < σπλάχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, bowels.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to the viscera or entrails; visceral; intestinal; enteric.—Splanchnic cavities, the visceral cavities of the body.—Splanchnic musculature, the muscles of the splanchnopleure; that one of the two chief layers of calomate muscles which surrounds the alimentary canal: contrasting with somatic musculature, or the muscles of the somatopleure.—Splanchnic nerves, three nerves from the thoracic sympathetic ganglia—the first or great, the second lesser or small, and the third smallest or inferior. The first goes to the semilunar ganglion, the second to the coeliac plexus, the third to the renal and coeliac plexuses.—Splanchnic wall, the splanchnopleure.

II. n. A splanchnic nerve.

splanchnocœle (splangk'nō-sēl), n. [< Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, the viscera, + κοίλος, hollow.] A visceral cavity; specifically, the visceral cavity of a brachiopod, an anterior division of which is the brachioœle or brachial chamber, and the lateral parts of the posterior division of which are the pleuroœles.

splanchnographer (splangk-nō-grā-fēr), n. [< splanchnograph-y + -er.] One who describes viscera; a writer on splanchnography.

splanchnographical (splangk-nō-grāf'i-kal), a. [< splanchnograph-y + -ic-al.] Descriptive of viscera; pertaining to splanchnography.

splanchnography (splangk-nō-grā-fī), n. [< Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] Descriptive splanchnology; a description of or a treatise on viscera.

splanchnological (splangk-nō-loj'i-kal), a. [< splanchnology-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to splanchnology.

splanchnologist (splangk-nōl'ō-jist), n. [< splanchnology-y + -ist.] One who is versed in splanchnology.

splanchnology (splangk-nōl'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning viscera.

splanchnopleura (splangk-nō-plō'rā), n.; pl. splanchnopleuræ (-rē). [NL.: see splanchnopleure.] Same as splanchnopleure.

splanchnopleural (splangk-nō-plō'ral), a. [< splanchnopleure + -al.] Forming the walls of viscera; constituting or pertaining to the splanchnopleure.

splanchnopleure (splangk'nō-plōr), n. [< NL. splanchnopleura, < Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + πλευρά, the side.] The inner or visceral layer of mesoderm, formed by the splitting of the mesoblast, separated from the somatopleure by the perivisceral space, coelomatic cavity, or coeloma. It is formed in those animals whose germ becomes four-layered in the above manner, and then constitutes the musculature and connective tissue of the intestinal tract and its annexes—the lining epithelium being derived from the hypoblast. Thus, the connective tissue and muscular substance of the lungs, liver, kidneys, etc., and the thickness of the walls of the stomach, bowels, etc., are all splanchnopleural. The term is contrasted with somatopleure.

splanchnopleuric (splangk'nō-plō'rik), a. [< splanchnopleure + -ic.] Same as splanchnopleural. Foster, Elements of Embryology, i. 2.

splanchnoskeletal (splangk-nō-skel'e-tal), a. [< splanchnoskeleton + -al.] Skeletal or hard, as a part of a viscus; forming a part of, or relating to, the splanchnoskeleton.

splanchnoskeleton (splangk-nō-skel'e-tōn), n. [NL., < Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + σκελετόν, skeleton.] The splanchnic or visceral skeleton; those hard parts of the body, collectively considered, which are developed in special relation with the viscera, and serve to support or contain them. Such are teeth, branchial arches, tracheal rings, bonelets of the eyeball and heart, penis-bones, etc. The term originated with Carus, 1828, and acquired currency through Owen and others. Its difference of meaning from scleroskeleton is not clear in all its applications.

splanchnotomical (splangk-nō-tōm'i-kal), a. [< splanchnotomy-y + -ic-al.] Anatomical in respect of the viscera; of or pertaining to splanchnotomy.

splanchnotomy (splangk-not'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. σπλάγχνον, pl. σπλάχνα, viscera, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, cut.] Dissection of the viscera; the anatomy of the viscera: more commonly called visceral anatomy.

splash (splash), v. [A var. of plash, with unorig. s, regarded as intensive; perhaps suggested by the appar. relation of smash to mash.] 1. trans. 1. To spatter or bespatter, as with water, water and mud, or any other liquid.

In carving a partridge, I splashed her with gravy from head to foot. Sydney Smith, To Francis Jeffrey, 1806.

2. To dash or throw about in splotches: as, to splash dirty water on one.—3. To accomplish with splashing or plashing.

The stout, round-sterned little vessel ploughed and splashed its way up the Hudson, with great noise and little progress. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 179.

4. To ornament with splashed decoration.—Syn. 1 and 2. Spill, etc. See slopi.

II. intrans. 1. To dabble or spatter about in water or other liquid; dash or spatter water about.

It is in knowledge as in swimming; he who flounders and splashes on the surface makes more noise, and attracts more attention, than the pearl-diver who quietly dives in quest of treasures to the bottom.

Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 211.

2. To fall with or make a splashing sound.

The heavy burden splashed in the dark blue waters.

Scott, Rob Roy, xxxi.

splashing fremitus, fremitus caused by succession. splash (splash), n. [< splash, v.] 1. Water or other liquid thrown upon anything.—2. A noise or effect as from water or mud thrown up or dashed about.

The splash and stir
Of fountains spouted up and showering down.

Tennyson, Princess, i.

3. A spot of dirt or other discoloring or disfiguring matter; a blot; a daub.

Her [Rachel's] very mode of writing is complex, nay, is careless, incoherent; with dashes and splashes, . . . with involutions, abruptnesses, whirls, and tortuosities.

Carlyle, Varnhagen von Ense's Memoirs.

4. A spot or plash of color strongly differing from the surrounding color, as on the hide of a horse, cow, or other animal.—5. A complexion-powder, generally the finest rice-flour, used by women to whiten their necks and faces.—6. A shad-wash.

splash-board (splash'börd), n. A guard of wood, or an iron frame covered with leather, in front of a wheeled vehicle or a sleigh, to protect the occupants from the splashing of the horses' feet; a dash-board or dasher. The guard placed over a wheel (on a passenger railroad-car, at the ends of the steps to protect them from dirt thrown by the wheels) is also sometimes called a splash-board. Also splash-irrig.

He filled the glass and put it on the splash-board of the wagonette.

W. Black, In Far Lochaber, xix.

splasher (splash'ër), n. [< splash + -er.] 1. One who or that which splashes. Specifically—2. That which is splashed; a contrivance to receive splashes that would otherwise deface the thing protected. (a) A guard placed over locomotive-wheels to protect persons on the engine or the machinery from the wheels, or from wet or dirt thrown up by them. (b) A guard over a wheel to prevent the splashes from entering the vehicle, or to protect the garments of the riders on entering. (c) A screen placed behind a wash-stand to protect the wall from water that may be splashed.

splash-wing (splash'wing), n. Same as splash-board.

splashy (splash'i), a. [< splash + -y.] Full of dirty water; wet; wet and muddy; splashy.

Not far from hence is Sedgemoor, a watry, splashy place.

Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, II. 34. (Davies.)

splat, v. t. [Early mod. E. splette; < ME. splatten; a secondary form of split (?).] To split; play; extend; spread out.

Splatte that pyke. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 265.

Pitche it not downwarde,
Nor splatte it not to flatte.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 48.

splatch (splach), n. and v. A variant of splotch. splatter (splat'ër), v. i. and t. [Prob. a var. of splatter, like splutter as related to sputter. Cf. splot.] To make a noise, as in dashing water about; splash; cast or scatter about.

Dull prose-folk Latin splatter.

Burns, To William Simpson.

splatter-dash (splat'ër-dash), n. An uproar; a bustle. [Colloq.]

splatterdashes (splat'ër-dash-ez), n. pl. Same as splatterdashes.

splatter-faced (splat'ër-fäst), a. Broad- or flat-faced.

Oh, lawk! I declare I be all of a tremble;
My mind it misgives me about Sukey Wimble,
A splatter-faced wench, neither civil nor nimble!

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, I. iv. (song).

splay (splä), v. t. [< ME. splayen, splaien, splayen; by aphesis from display: see display.] 1†. To display; unfold; spread out; hence, to cut up; carve: as, to splay a fish.

The cok confesseth emynent cupide

When he his gemmy tail begynneth splay.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 23.

To splayen out hire leves on brede

Ageyn the sunne.

Lydgate, Complaint of the Black Knight, l. 38.

2. To dislocate, as a horse's shoulder.—3. In arch., to slope; form with an oblique angle, as the jambs or sides of a window. See the noun. splay (splä), n. [< splay, v.] 1. Spread; flare.

By hammering in the corners of a bit, care should be taken to preserve the splay throughout to the extremity, by properly inclining the face of the hammer.

Morgans, Mining Tools, p. 49.

2. In arch., a sloped surface, or a surface which makes an oblique angle with another, as when the opening through a wall for a door or window widens from the position of the door or window proper toward the face of the wall. A large chamfer is called a splay.

Plan of Portal of Notre Dame, Paris. s s s, Splays.

Among the most marked of these [defects in design of facade of Rheims Cathedral] is the projection of the great portal jambs, with their archivolts, beyond the faces of the buttresses, and the continuation of the splays to the outer faces of the jambs, so that those of the adjoining portals almost meet in a sharp edge.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 110.

3. In fort., the outward widening of an embrasure from the mouth toward the exterior of the parapet. See embrasure.—splay out, an inclined cut on the edges of fancy brickwork.

splay (splä), a. [< splay, v.] Spread or spreading out; wide and flat; turned outward; hence, clumsy; awkward. See splay-foot, splay-mouth.

In the German mind, as in the German language, there does seem to be something splay, something blunt-edged, unhandy, and infelicitous.

M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, Pref.

splay (splä), v. t. [A var. of splay, prob. by confusion with splay.] Same as spay. Shak., M. for M., ii. l. 243.

splayer (splä'ër), n. In tile-manuf., a segment of a cylinder used as a mold for curved tiles, as ridge- or hip-tiles, drain-tiles, etc.

splay-foot (splä'füt), n. and a. [< splay + foot.] 1. n. A broad flat foot turned more or less outward. A splay-foot may be only coarse or uncomely, but in extreme cases it amounts to the deformity known as talipes valgus, a kind of clubfoot.

II. a. Having splay-feet; splay-footed.

Tho' still some traces of our rustic vein
And splay-foot were remain'd and will remain.

Pope, Imitation of Horace, Epistle 1, l. 271.

splay-footed (splä'füt'ed), a. [Early mod. E. also splea-footed; as splay-foot + -ed.] Having splay-feet.

Salutes from a splay-footed witch. . . .
Croaking of ravens, or the screech of owls,
Are not so boding mischief.

Ford, Broken Heart, v. 1.

splay-mouth (splä'mouth), n. A naturally large or wide mouth; also, the mouth stretched wide in a grin or grimace.

Hadst thou but, Janus like, a face behind,
To see the people what splay-mouths they make.

Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, l. 116.

splay-mouthed (splä'moutht), a. Having a splay-mouth; making the mouth splay, as in a grimace.

These solemn, splay-mouth'd gentlemen, Madam, says I, only do it to improve in natural philosophy.

Tom Brown, Works, II. 271. (Davies.)

spleen (splén), n. [< ME. splene, splen, < OF. esplen, esplein, esplain, esplen, esplene = It. splene, < L. splen, < Gr. σπλήν = L. lien (for orig. splien*) = Skt. plihan (for orig. splihan*), the spleen.] 1. A non-glandular, highly vascular organ which is situated in the abdomen, on the left side, in connection with the digestive organs, and in which the blood undergoes certain modifications in respect of its corpuscles. This viscus has no proper secretion and no excretory duct, and in these respects agrees with the thyroid, thymus, and adrenal bodies. In man the spleen is of an oblong flattened form, dark livid-red in color, soft and friable in texture, and extremely vascular. It lies in the left hypochondriac region, capping the cardiac end of the stomach. The spleen has been supposed to be the seat of various emotions. Its enlargement or induration, under malarial poisoning, is known as ague-cake. See cut under pancreas.

I thought their spleens would break; they laugh'd us all
Out of the room. Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, III. 2.

2. Ill humor; melancholy; low spirits.

He affected to complain either of the Spleen or his Memory.

Congreve, Way of the World, I. 6.

Such [melancholic fancy] as now and then presents itself to musing, thoughtful men, when their spirits are low, and the spleen hath gotten possession of them.

Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. xii.

3. Bad temper; anger; ill-will; malice; latent spite; grudge: as, to vent one's spleen; a fit of the spleen.

A hare-brain'd Hotspur, govern'd by a spleen.

Shak., I Hen. IV., v. 2. 19.

The Dauphin all this while, though outwardly having made a Reconciliation with the Duke of Burgoyne, yet inwardly bearing a Spleen against him, intended nothing so much as his Destruction.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 174.

4†. A sudden impulse, fancy, or caprice; a whim.

A thousand spleens bear her a thousand ways.

Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 907.

5†. Mood; disposition.

Haply my presence

May well abate the over-merry spleen.

Shak., T. of the S., Ind., l. 137.

They [the Presbyterians] came to that Spleen at last that they would rather enthrall themselves to the King again than admit their own Brethren to share in their Liberty.

Milton, Ana. to Salmasius.

In the spleen†, in low spirits; out of sorts; in ill humor.—On the spleen†, on the impulse of the moment; suddenly; impulsively.

Words which sell are on the splene,

In faire language peynted ful pleasantye.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 62.

spleen (splén), v. [< spleen, n.] I. trans. 1. To deprive of the spleen; extirpate the spleen of. Animals subjected to this operation tend to become fat, and may live for an indefinite period apparently in perfect health.

Animals spleened grow salacious. Arbuthnot.

splice (splis), n. [< splice, v.] 1. The joining together of two ropes or parts of a rope by interweaving part of the untwisted strands of each, or the union so effected. The short splice is used for a rope where it is not to pass through blocks. The long splice or round splice is made by unlaid the ends of ropes that are to be joined together and following the lay of one rope with a strand of the other until all the strands are used, and then neatly tucking the ends through the strands so that the size of the rope will not be changed. This occupies a great extent of rope, but by the three joinings being fixed at a distance from one another the increase of bulk is diminished, hence it is adapted to run through the sheave-hole of a block, etc. The eye-splice or ring-splice forms a sort of eye or circle at the end of a rope, and is used for splicing in thimbles, etc. See cut under eye-splice.

Splices of Ropes.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 969.

8. In spoil-five, a drawn game.—Spoils system, in politics, the practice of treating the public offices not as public trusts, to be administered primarily for the public interest, but as spoils of war, to be taken from members of the defeated party and given to members of the successful party—the emoluments and distinction of holding such offices being regarded as rewards for services rendered to the successful party, and the influence resulting from the possession of the offices being expected to be used for the maintenance of that party in power: a term of depreciation. The name is derived from a remark made in a speech in the United States Senate, in January, 1832, by Mr. Marcy of New York: speaking of and for the New York politicians, he said, "They see nothing wrong in the rule that to the victor belong the spoils of the enemy." This system had previously attained great power in the State of New York; under Jackson's administration it prevailed in national politics, and was soon adopted by nearly all parties, and applied to local as well as State and national offices.—To shoot to spoil. See shoot.—Syn. 1. Plunder, Booty, etc. See pillage, n.

spoke-setter (spōk'set'er), n. A machine by which a hub is centered to insure true borings for the spoke-mortises.

spoke-shave (spōk'shāv), n. A wheelwrights' and carpenters' tool, having a plane-bit between two handles, formerly used in shaping

A, spoke-shave with blade a, made adjustable in the stock b, by adjusting screws c; B, spoke-shave similar to A, but without the adjusting screws; C, spoke-shave for working upon very concave surfaces; D, spoke-shave, in the nature of a small hand-plane, for smoothing and dressing off the straighter parts of spokes.

wagon-spokes, but now in woodwork of every kind.

spokesman (spōks'man), n.; pl. spokesmen (-men). [spoke's*, gen. of spoke*, var. of speech (AS. spæc, spæc), + man.] One who speaks for another or others; an advocate; a representative.

He shall be thy spokesman unto the people. Ex. iv. 16.
He is our Advocate—that is, a spokesman, comforter, intercessor, and mediator.

J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 294.

spoke-trimmer (spōk'trim'er), n. A wheelwright's tool for trimming ends of spokes, etc., preparatory to using the spoke-pointer.

spoking-machine (spō'king-mā-shēn'), n. An apparatus for adjusting the spokes of a wheel to give them all the same inclination, and thus give the wheel a uniform dish.

spole (spōl), n. [A var. of spool.] 1. An obsolete or dialectal form of spool. Specifically—2. The small wheel near the distaff in the common spinning-wheel.

Then fly the spoles, the rapid axles glow,
And slowly circumsolve the labouring wheel below.
Darwin, Loves of the Plants, II. 103.

spolia, n. Plural of spolium.

spolia opima (spō'li-ā-ō-pi'mā), [L.: spolia, pl. of spolium, spoil; opima, neut. pl. of opimus, fat, rich, plump: see opime.] In ancient Rome, the choicest spoil taken from an enemy; hence, any valuable booty or pillage.

Milton, however, was not destined to gather the spolia opima of English Rhetoric. De Quincy, Rhetoric.

spoliary (spō'li-ā-ri), n.; pl. spoliaries (-riz). [L.: spoliarium, a room or place, as in the amphitheater, where the bodies of slain gladiators were stripped of their clothes, also a den of robbers, < spolium, spoil: see spoil.] The place in Roman amphitheaters to which slaughtered gladiators were dragged, and where their clothes and arms were stripped from their bodies.

An Act of the Senate . . . is extant in Lampridius: "Let the Enemy of his Country be deprived of all his titles; let the Parricide be drawn, let him be torn in pieces in the Spoliary."
Milton, Ans. to Salmasius.

spoliare (spō'li-ā), v.; pret. and pp. spoliated, ppr. spoliating. [L.: spoliatus, pp. of spoliare, spoil: see spoil, v.] I. trans. To plunder; pillage; despoil.

The other great Whig families, . . . who had done something more for it than spoliare their church and betray their king.
Disraeli, Sybil, I. 3.

II. intrans. To engage in robbery; plunder.
spoliation (spō'li-ā-shōn), n. [F.: spoliation = Pr. expoliatio = Sp. expoliacion = It. spogliagione, < L.: spoliatio (-n), plundering, a spoiling, < spoliare, plunder, spoil: see spoliare, spoil, v.] 1. The act of pillaging, plundering, or spoiling; robbery; plunder.

He [Hastings] . . . declared that, if the spoliation which had been agreed upon were not instantly carried into effect, he would himself go to Lucknow, and do that from which feebler minds recoil with dismay.
Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. The act or practice of plundering in time of war, especially of plundering neutrals at sea under authority.—3. Eccles., the act of an incumbent in unlawfully taking the fruits of a benefice under a pretended title.—4. In law, intentional destruction of or tampering with (a document) in such way as to impair evidentiary effect.—French Spoliation Act, a United States statute of 1885 (23 Stat. at Large, 283) providing for the ascertainment of the French spoliation claims.—French spoliation claims, certain claims of citizens of the United States, or their representatives, against France for illegal captures, etc., prior to the treaty of 1800-1 between the United States and France. By this treaty these claims were assumed by the United States. The first appropriation for the payment of them was made in 1891.—Writ of spoliation, a writ obtained by one of the parties to a suit in the ecclesiastical courts, suggesting that his adversary has wasted the fruits of a benefice, or unlawfully taken them to the complainant's prejudice.

spoliative (spō'li-ā-tiv), a. [= F.: spoliative; as spoliare + -ive.] Tending to take away or diminish; specifically, in med., lessening the mass of the blood.

spoliator (spō'li-ā-tōr), n. [= F.: spoliator = Sp. expoliator, plunderer, < L.: spoliator, a plunderer, < spoliare, spoil: see spoliare.] One who commits spoliation; a despoiler; a robber.

spoliatores (spō'li-ā-tō'rez), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L.: spoliator, a plunderer: see spoliator.] In Macgillivray's system of classification, an order of birds, the robbers, as the jagers. [Not in use.]

spoliatory (spō'li-ā-tō-ri), a. [< spoliare + -ory.] Consisting in spoliation; causing spoliation. Quarterly Rev., XLVII. 416.

spolium (spō'li-um), n.; pl. spolia (-ā). [ML. use of L.: spolium, spoil: see spoil.] In eccles. law, the property of a beneficed ecclesiastic which could not be legally disposed of by will at death.—Jus spoli, originally, the right claimed in the middle ages by those present at the deathbed of a beneficed ecclesiastic to seize and carry off any portable property of the deceased. This led to such scandals that finally the right was vested by papal constitutions in the church, and all spolia belong to the papal treasury.

spont, n. A Middle English form of spoon 1.

spondaic (spōn-dā'ik), a. [< OF. spondaique, F.: spondaique = Sp. spondaique = Pg. spondaique = It. spondaique, < L.: spondaique*, incorrect form of spondiacus, < Gr.: σπονδαῖος, of or pertaining to a spondee, < σπονδή, a spondee: see spondee.] In anc. pros.: (a) Of or pertaining to a spondee; constituting a spondee; consisting of spondees. (b) Having a spondee in the fifth place: noting a dactylic hexameter of the exceptional form

— ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞ | — ∞

the fifth foot being regularly a dactyl.

spondaic (spōn-dā'ik), a. [< spondaique + -al.] Same as spondaique.

spondal (spōn'dal), n. An obsolete erroneous form of spondyl.

spondee (spōn'dē), n. [Formerly also spondæ (also, as L.: spondeus = D. G. Dan. spondeus; = Sw. sponde, < F. spondee = Sp. Pg. spondeo = It. spondee, < L.: spondeus, spondæus, < Gr.: σπονδαῖος, a spondee, so called as used (probably as double spondee) in hymns accompanying libations, prop. adj. (sc. πῶς, a foot), of or pertaining to a libation, < σπονδή, a drink-offering, libation to the gods, pl. σπονδαί, a solemn treaty, a truce, < σπένδω, pour out, make a libation; root uncertain. Cf. L. spondere, answer: see sponsor.] In anc. pros., a foot consisting of two long times or syllables, one of which constitutes the thesis and the other the arsis: it is accordingly tetrasemic and isorhythmic. The spondee is principally used as a substitute for a dactyl or an anapest. In the former case it is a dactylic spondee (— — — for — — —), in the latter an anapestic spondee (— — — for — — —). An irrational spondee represents a trimeter foot, trochee, or iambus (— — — for — — —, or — — — for — — —). It is found in the even places of trochaic lines and in the odd places of iambic lines, also in iambic verses, especially as representing the initial trochee ("basis"). A foot consisting of two spondees is called a dispondee.—Double spondee, greater spondee, in anc. pros., a foot consisting of two tetrasemic longs (— — — —), and accordingly double the magnitude of an ordinary (single) spondee (— — —).

Spondiaceæ (spōn-di-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Kunth, 1824), < Spondias + -aceæ.] Same as Spondiææ.

Spondias (spōn'di-as), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < Gr.: σπονδιός, a false reading of σπονδιός, a tree supposed to be the bullace.] A genus of polypetalous trees, of the order Anacardiaceæ, type of the tribe Spondiææ. It is characterized by polygamous flowers with eight or ten stamens and four or five styles which are free at the apex. There are 5 species, dispersed through tropical regions of both hemispheres. They bear alternate odd-pinnate leaves, often crowded at the ends of the branches, with opposite and often very taper-pointed leaflets. The small short-pedicelled flowers form spreading terminal panicles. Each flower contains four or five spreading petals and a free ovary of as many cells, which becomes in fruit a fleshy drupe with a thick stone. The leaves and bark often yield medicinal and principally astringent preparations; the fruit is often astringent and laxative; that of S. tuberosa is valued in Brazil as a remedy in fevers. The fruits of several species are known as hog-plums. S. purpurea, the purple or Spanish plum, is often cultivated in the West Indies, and is readily propagated by cuttings. S. lutea, a tree resembling the ash and reaching 40 or 50 feet, bears yellowish flower-buds, used as a sweetmeat with sugar, and a yellow oval fruit known as Jamaica plum or golden apple. S. dulcis, a similar tree abundant in most Polynesian islands, and known as Otaheite apple, yields a large yellow fruit with the smell of apples and an agreeable acid flavor, to the eye contrasting handsomely with the dark-green foliage. The tree is widely cultivated elsewhere in the tropics. A Brazilian tree, reported as S. tuberosa, produces long aerial roots which descend and form at the ground large black hollow and cellular tubers containing about a pint of water, supplying in dry weather the needs both of the tree and of travelers. S. mangifera of India is the source of a gum resembling gum arabic, known as hog-gum, and of several medicinal remedies. Its smooth yellowish-green fruit is known as wild mango, or amra, and is eaten parboiled or pickled or made into curries.

Spondiææ (spōn-di-ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1862), < Spondias + -ææ.] A tribe of polypetalous plants, of the order Anacardiaceæ, distinguished from the other tribe, Mangiferiææ, by an ovary with from two to five cells (instead of one), the ovules usually or always pendulous. It includes 47 genera, of which Spondias is the type. They are mainly tropical or South African, and are mostly trees with pinnate leaves. Also Spondiæææ, Spondiææ.

spondil, n. An obsolete spelling of spondyl.

spondulics (spōn-dū'liks), n. [Also spondoolics, spondoolix; origin obscure.] Originally, paper money; now, any money; funds. [Slang, U.S.]

spondyl, spondyle (spōn'dil), n. [Formerly also spondil, spondal, spondile; < F.: spondyle, < L.: spondylus, < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, less correct form of σπόνδυλος, a joint of the spine, a vertebra, joint, round stone, etc.] 1. A joint, or joining of two pieces.

Great Sir, the circles of the divine providence turn themselves upon the affairs of the world so that every spondyl of the wheels may mark out those virtues which we are then to exercise. Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, Ded.

2. A joint of the backbone; a vertebra.

A kind of rack

Runs down along the spondyls of his back.

B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, II. 2.

spondylalgia (spōn-di-lal'ji-ā), n. [NL., < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ἀλγος, pain.] Pain in the spine; rachialgia.

spondylarthritis (spōn'di-lār-thrī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + NL.: arthritis, q. v.] Inflammation of the vertebral articulations.

spondylarthrosis (spōn-di-leks-ār-thrō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ἐξάρθρωσις, dislocation, < ἐξ, out, + άρθρον, a joint.] Dislocation of the vertebræ.

Spondylidæ¹ (spōn-dil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1826), < Spondylus + -idææ.] A family of marine bivalves, related to the Limidææ and to the scallops, typified by the genus Spondylus; the thorn-oysters. The valves are dissimilar, the right one being the larger, and attached at the beak, the left generally flat or concave; the ligament is internal. About 70 species are known, inhabiting chiefly tropical seas. The extinct species are numerous. Formerly also Spondylidææ. See cut under Spondylus.

Spondylidææ² (spōn-dil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Spondylis + -idææ.] In entom., a family of phytophagous coleopterous insects, typified by the genus Spondylis, having deeply impressed sensitive surfaces of the antennæ, and the tarsi not dilated. The family was erected by Le Conte and Horn to receive all the aberrant Cerambycidææ of Lacordaire, probably representing in the modern fauna remnants of the undifferentiated types of a former geologic age. The genera and species are few. Also Spondylidææ.

Spondylis (spōn'di-lis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1775), < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, joint: see spondyl.] A genus of phytophagous beetles, typical of the family Spondylidææ.

spondylitis (spōn-di-li'tis), n. [NL., < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + -itis.] Arthritis of a vertebra.—Spondylitis deformans, arthritis deformans involving the vertebræ.

spondylolisthesis (spōn-di-lol-is-thē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + ὀλισθησις, a slipping, < ὀλισθαίνω, slip, < ὀλισθος, slipperiness.] A displacement forward of the last lumbar vertebra on the sacrum.

spondylolisthetic (spōn-di-lol-is-thet'ik), a. [< spondylolisthesis (-et-) + -ic.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or affected with spondylolisthesis.

spondylopathia (spōn'di-lō-path'i-ā), n. [NL., < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, + πάθος, suffering.] Disease of the vertebræ.

spondylous (spōn'di-lus), a. [< spondyl + -ous.] Of or pertaining to a spondyl; like a vertebra; vertebral.

Spondylus (spōn'di-lus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1758), < L.: spondylus, < Gr.: σπόνδυλος, σπόνδυλος, a vertebra, joint: see spondyl.] 1. A genus of bivalves, representing the family Spondylidææ, formerly referred to the Ostræidææ or Pectinidææ. They are remarkable for the character of their spines and the richness of their coloring. Some are known as thorn-oysters, spring-oysters, and water-clams.

Thorn-oyster (Spondylus princeps).

2. [L. c.] An oyster of this genus.—3. [L. c.] A vertebra.

sponet, n. A Middle English form of *spoon*¹.

spong (spong), n. [Prob. a form of spang, a clasp, brooch (taken as a point, a gore f): see *spang*¹.] A projection of land; an irregular, narrow, projecting part of a field. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

The tribe of Judah with a narrow spong confined on the kingdom of Edom.

Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. iv. 2. (Trench.)

sponge (spunj), n. [Formerly also spunge; < ME. sponge, spunge, spounge (= D. spongie, spons), < OF. esponge, F. éponge = Pr. esponja, esponga = Sp. Pg. esponja = It. spugna, spugna = AS. sponge = Gael. Ir. sponc, < L. spongia, < Gr. σπγγία, also σπόγγος (Attic σπόγγος), a sponge, any spongy substance, = L. fungus, a mushroom, fungus; perhaps akin to Gr. σπογγός, spongy, porous, and to Dan. Sw. svamp, a sponge, fungus, = Icel. svöppr, a sponge, and so to Goth. swammis, a sponge, = OHG. swam, swamp, MHG. swam, swamp (swamb-), G. schwamm = MLG. swam, swamp, LG. swamm, swamp, a sponge, fungus: see swamp, and cf. spunk and fungus.]

1. A fixed aquatic organism of a low order, various in form and texture, composed of an aggregate of amebiform bodies disposed about a common cavity provided with one or more inhalant and exhalant orifices (ostioles and oscules), through which water pours in and out. The proper sponge-substance is traversed by a water-vascular system or set of irrigating canals, and in nearly all cases is supported and strengthened by a skeleton in the form of horny fibers, or siliceous or calcareous spicules. The streaming of the water is kept up by the vibration of cilia in the water-vascular system—that is, by the lashing of flagella borne upon the individual sponge-cells. These so much resemble flagellate infusorians that some naturalists regard sponges as compound infusorians, and consequently as protozoans. Those cells which have definite form are spindle-shaped, or flask-shaped, and provided with flagella, round the base of which there may be a little rim or collar, as in those infusorians known as collar-bearing monads, or Choano-flagellata. Sponges propagate by budding or gemmation, a process involving cell-fission or ordinary division of cells. They also reproduce sexually by ova and spermatozoa. Sponge-germs resulting from fission are called gemmules. The spermatozoa are spindle-shaped. The ova are like ordinary amebiform cells, and are usually shed into the canals and pass out of the system to be developed; in some species they develop in the substance of the parent. The embryo forms a hollow ball with a ciliated cavity, and then acquires inhalant and exhalant pores. The living tissue proper of sponges is disposed in three layers or sets of cells, as in all higher animals. These are an ectoderm, cuticle, or out-layer; an endoderm, innermost layer, or in-layer; and a mesoderm, middle layer, or mid-layer, which may be quite thick. It is from the mid-layer that the reproductive elements, and all the many forms of skeletal elements, are derived. Special sense-organs have been described in some sponges. (See cut under synoeci.) Sponges as a class or phylum of animals have many technical names—as Aenidophora, because they have no cnidae or stinging-organs (compare Cnidaria); Amorphozoa, from their shapelessness, or rather their many shapes; Parazoa, from their position with respect to both Protozoa and Metazoa; Porifera, Poriferata, Porozoa, and Polystonata, from their many pores or openings (see cut under Porifera); Spongia, Spongiaria, Spongiida, Spongi-ozoa, etc. They are divided into various primary groups, the most tangible of which are two—the chalk-sponges, or Calcispongiae, and the fibrous and flinty sponges, or Silicispongiae. But the leading authorities differ irreconcilably in the arrangement and nomenclature of the many orders, families, and genera they respectively adopt; and the opinion has been expressed that the sponges are not susceptible of satisfactory treatment by the ordinary methods of zoological classification. See also cuts under ribate, Spongilla, monadiform, Euplectella, and Hyalonemidae.

2. The fibrous framework of a colony of sponge-animalcules, from which the animalcules themselves have been washed out, and from which the gritty or sandy parts of the colony, if there were any, have been taken away. See skeleton, 1 (b). The framework of sponges is of different characters in the several orders. The slime-sponges have none, or scarcely any. In the ordinary fibrous sponges the skeleton is a quantity of interlacing fibers and layers, forming an intricate network. This is further strengthened in the chalky and glassy sponges by hard spicules, either separately embedded in the general skeletal substance, called ceratoids, or solidified in a kind of latticework. (See Calcispongiae, Silicispongiae.) The chalk-needles or calcareous spicules are either straight or oftener rayed in three-armed or four-armed crosses. The sand-needles or siliceous spicules present an extraordinary and beautiful variety. Among them are many starry figures and wheel-like forms, resembling snow-crystals; others are still more curious, in the forms of crosses, anchors, grapnels, shirt-studs, bodkins, etc. The six-rayed star is the characteristic shape in the glass-sponges. (See Hexactinellida.) Sponge-spicules are named in an elaborate special vocabulary. (See sponge-spicule.) The glass-sponges have some commercial value from their beauty as objects of curiosity; but a few of the fibrous sponges are the only others out of many hundreds of species, both fossil and recent, of any economic importance. Sponges, when wetted, swell to a much greater size, and become very flexible; they are therefore used as vehicles and absorbents of water and other liquids, in wiping or cleansing surfaces, erasing marks, as from a slate, etc. See bath-sponge, Euspongia, and Hippospongia.

Ascidia primordialis, one of the Chalk-sponges: a part of one side of the body removed, exposing the ventriculus. a, osculum, mouth, or exhalant aperture; b, one of the many ostioles or inhalant pores; c, endoderm; d, ectoderm, in which triradiate spicules are embedded; e, ova.

The Sponge, and the Reed, of the whiche the Jewes zaven oure Lord Eyselle and Galle, in the Cros. Maundeville, Travels, p. 10.

3. Any sponge-like substance. (a) In baking, dough before it is kneaded and formed, when full of globules of carbonic acid generated by the yeast or leaven. (b) A metal when obtained in a finely divided condition, the particles having little coherence, and the mass more or less of a spongy texture. Thus, a "metallic sponge" of iron is obtained by the reduction of brown hematite ore by cementation with charcoal in the so-called "Chenot process" for the manufacture of steel. Spongy iron is also prepared on a large scale by the reduction of various ores, and in this form is used for purifying water. Platinum-sponge may be prepared by gently heating the double chloride of platinum and ammonium. Platinum-black is a black powder not differing much in its properties from platinum-sponge, except that it is less dense; it may be made to take on the spongy character by repeated ignition in a mixture of air and a combustible gas: both are used as oxidizing agents.

4. A tool for cleaning a cannon after its discharge. The sponge used for smooth-bore guns consists of a cylinder of wood covered with sheepskin or some similar woolly fabric, and fitting the bore of the gun rather closely; this is secured to a long handle, or, for field-guns, to the reverse end of the rammer. For modern rifled guns and breech-loaders, sponges of different forms and materials have been introduced. A common form is a cylinder to which bristles are fixed, forming a cylindrical brush, the rounded end being also covered with the bristles. See cut under gun-carriage.

5. Figuratively, one who or that which absorbs without discrimination, and as readily gives up, when subjected to pressure, that which has been absorbed.—6. One who persistently lives upon others; a sycophantic or cringing dependent; a hanger-on for the sake of maintenance; a parasite.

Better a penurious Kingdom then where excessive wealth flows into the gracelesse and injurious hands of common sponges to the impoverishing of good and loyal men. Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

7. In the manège, the extremity or point of a horseshoe answering to the heel.—8. The coral, or mass of eggs, under the abdomen of a crab. [Chesapeake Bay.]—Bahama sponge, one of three species or varieties of bath-sponges procured from the Bahamas.—Burnt sponge, sponge that has been burnt, used in the treatment of gonorrhea and scrofulous swellings.—Calcareous sponge, a chalk-sponge.—Crumb-of-bread sponge. See Halichondria.—Dog-head sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, Spongia agaricina punctata.—Fibrous sponge, any horny sponge.—Glove-sponge, a finger-sponge; a reef-sponge.—Hardhead sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, the hardhead, Spongia dura.—Holy sponge, in the Gr. Ch., a piece of compressed sponge which the deacon uses in the office of prothesis to gather together the portions in the disk under the holy bread, and with which he wipes the disk after communion.—Honeycomb sponge, the grass-sponge, Spongia equina cerebri-formis.—Horny sponge, a fibrous or fibrosiliceous sponge; a sponge of the group Cerataea, as distinguished from a chalk-sponge or glass-sponge.—Pyrotechnical sponge. Same as amadou.—Red sponge, Microcinea prolifera, the red beard of the oyster of the northern United States.—Reef-sponge, a kind of bath-sponge, Spongia officinalis, var. tubulifera, growing on the Florida reefs and in the West Indies.—Sheepswool sponge. See sheepswool.—Sponge tent. See tent.—Toilet-sponge, a bath-sponge of fine quality; a Turkish sponge.—To set a sponge, in baking, to leaven a small mass of dough, to be used in leavening a larger quantity.—To throw up the sponge, in pugilism, to toss up the sponge used to freshen a fighter, in acknowledgment of his defeat; hence, in general, to acknowledge that one is conquered or beaten; submit; give up the contest or struggle. [Slang.]—Turkey cup-sponge, Spongia adriatica.—Vegetable sponge. See sponge-gourd.—Velvet sponge, a fine soft sponge of the West Indies and Florida, Spongia equina, var. meandrina.—Vitrescent sponge, a glass-sponge.—Waxed sponge. Same as sponge tent.—Yellow sponge, zinnocap sponge. See bath-sponge. (See also boring-sponge, cup-sponge, finger-sponge, flint-sponge, glass-sponge, grass-sponge, horse-sponge, wool-sponge.)

sponge (spunj), v.; pret. and pp. sponged, ppr. sponging. [Formerly also spunge; = D. sponzen = F. éponger = Sp. esponjar, sponje, < LL. spongiare, wipe off with a sponge; cf. Gr. σπογγίζω, sponge; from the noun.] I. trans. 1. To cleanse or wipe with a sponge: as, to sponge the body; to sponge a slate or a cannon. Brush thou, and sponge thy cloaths to, That thou that day shalt weare. Babbes Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 73.

2. To wipe out with a sponge, as letters or writing; efface; remove with a sponge; destroy all traces of: with out, off, etc.

Every little difference should not seem an intolerable blemish necessarily to be sponged out.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 19.

Specifically.—3. To dampen, as in cloth-manufacturing.—4. To absorb; use a sponge, or act like a sponge, in absorbing: generally with up: as, to sponge up water that has been spilled.

They sponged up my money while it lasted, borrowed my coats and never paid for them, and cheated me when I played at cribbage.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxvii.

5. To gain by sycophantic or mean arts.

Here went the dean, when he's to seek,

To sponge a breakfast once a week,

Swift, Richmond Lodge and Marble Hill.

"What else have you been sponging?" said Maria. . . . "Sponging, my dear! It is nothing but four of those beautiful pheasants' eggs, which Mrs. Whitaker would quite force upon me." Jane Austen, Mansfield Park, x.

6. To drain; harass by extortion; squeeze; plunder.

How came such multitudes of our own nation . . . to be sponged of their plate and money?

South, Sermons, I. xii.

7. In baking, to set a sponge for: as, to sponge bread.

II. intrans. 1. To gather sponges where they grow; dive or dredge for sponges.

There were a few small open boats engaged in sponging from Apalachicola, which were not entered upon the custom-house books. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 824.

2. To live meanly at the expense of others; obtain money or other aid in a mean way: with on.

She was perpetually plaguing and sponging on me.

Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, April 24, 1736.

sponge-animalcule (spunj'an-i-mal'kūl), n. A sponge-cell. See cut under monadiform.

sponge-bar (spunj'bār), n. A sand-bar or rock bottom on which sponges grow. [Florida.]

sponge-cake (spunj'kāk'), n. A very light sweet cake made of flour, eggs, and sugar, flavored with lemon: so called from its light, spongy substance.

sponge-crab (spunj'krab), n. A crab with which a sponge is habitually cancrisocial, as a member of the genus Dromia. See cut under Dromia.

sponge-cucumber (spunj'kū'kum-bēr), n. Same as sponge-gourd.

sponge-diver (spunj'di'vēr), n. One who dives for sponges; a sponge-fisher.

sponge-farming (spunj'fär'ming), n. The industry of breeding and rearing sponges. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 428.

sponge-fisher (spunj'fish'ēr), n. One who fishes for sponges, or is engaged in the sponge-fishery.

sponge-fishery (spunj'fish'ēr-i), n. The process or occupation of fishing for sponges.

sponge-glass (spunj'glās), n. 1. A bucket with a glass bottom, used in searching for sponges. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 179.—2. The flint-sponge, Hyalonema mirabilis, found on the coast of Japan.

sponge-gourd (spunj'gōrd), n. The washing- or towel-gourd, Luffa cylindrica (L. Ægyptiaca), also L. acutangula. The netted fiber from the interior of the fruit is used for washing and other purposes, hence called vegetable sponge or dish-rag. See Luffa and strainer-vine.

sponge-hook (spunj'hūk), n. See hook.

spongelet (spunj'let), n. [< sponge + -let.] 1. A little sponge. Encyc. Dict.—2. In bot., same as spongiote.

sponge-moth (spunj'mōth), n. The gipsy-moth. [Eng. and (recently) U. S.]

spongeous (spunj'jus), a. [< sponge + -ous. Cf. spongiuous.] Same as spongy.

sponger (spunj'jēr), n. [Formerly also spunger; < sponge + -er.] 1. One who uses a sponge.

—2. A person or vessel engaged in fishing for sponges. Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 823.—3. In cloth-manuf., a machine in which cloth is dampened previous to ironing. It has a perforated adjustable cylinder, which is filled with steam, and about which the cloth is rolled.—4. A parasitical dependent; a hanger-on for maintenance; a sponge.

Trencher-flies and spongers.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

sponge-spicule (spunj'spik'ul), n. One of the calcareous or siliceous spicules peculiar to sponges. They generally appear in more or less modified geometrical figures, with definite axes represented by a non-skeletal rod or axial canal, around which the lime or silica is deposited in concentric layers. There may be one such axis or several. Sponge-spicules are either calcareous or siliceous; according to their position and relations, they are either supporting-spicules or skeleton-spicules (megascleres), or flesh-spicules or tension-spicules (microacleres). Schulze has classified them, according to position, more elaborately into spicula autodermaia, autogastralia, basalia, etc. They are also grouped primarily according to their axes, next according to their rays, and finally ac-

Various Spicules from Glass-sponges (Hexactinellida).
1, oxydiact; 2, echinate oxydiact; 3, echinate hexact; 4, amphiact; 5, anact; 6, tetract; 7, oxyhexact; 8, discalhexact; 9, triact.

According to their many individual figures. Thus, both calcareous and siliceous spicules are monaxon, diaxon, triaxon, or tetragon. Some siliceous spicules are anaxon or polyact, giving stellate figures, either regular, as the oxyaster, euastr, and sterraster, or irregular, as the spiraster, spirula, and corona. These anaxon spicules are always flesh-spicules or microscleres. The monaxon spicules are either megascleres or microscleres; of the former are the strongylus or strongylon, oxystrongylus, oxyus or oxyon, tylotus, and tylostylus; of the latter are the toxus or toxon, toxodragma, sigma, sigmadragma, isochela, anisochela, dianciatra, trichodragma, etc. Of triaxon siliceous forms are the oxyhexact, oxytetract, oxydiact; the hexaster, oxyhexaster, discohexaster, graphiohexaster, floricome, and plumicome; the pinula, scopula, amphidisk, uncinate, and clavula. The tetragon spicules are divided into monactinal, diactinal, triactinal, and tetractinal. The above names and classes (excepting those from Schulze) are substantially according to Lendenfeld. Sollas, the monographer of the sponges in the ninth edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica," uses a similar set of terms and many others. Among the terms employed by these investigators may be noted acrella, amphaster, amphistrella, amphitrad, amphitriene, anatriene, anthaster, arculus, aster, calthrops, candelabrum, chela, chiaster, cladome, cladus, cymba, desma, dianciatron, dichotriene, echinella, ectaster, endaster, hexaster, meniscoid, microhabd, microstrongylon, microzoen, orthotriene, pentact, polyact, polyaxon, protriene, pterocymba, pycnaster, rhabd, or rhabdus, sanidaster, sigmapire, simella, spheraster, spherula, spinispirula, spirastrella, stellate (n.), stylus, tetract, triact, triene, trichie, trichotriene, triona, tylon, etc. Sponge-spicules are occasionally absent, as in gelatinous sponges. They are small or few in horny sponges, such as are used for the bath. In the glass-sponges they make magnificent structures, like spun glass, of elegant figures, and constitute most of the bulk of the sponge. See also cuts under Haliphysema, Euplectella, Hyalonemidae, and sponge.

sponge-tongs (spun'j' tóngz), n. sing. and pl. Tongs used for taking sponges.

sponge-tree (spun'j' tré), n. An evergreen shrub or small tree, Acacia Farnesiana, widely diffused through the tropics, and found in the United States along the Gulf of Mexico. It has slender zigzag branches, bipinnate leaves, stipular spines, and bright-yellow heads of very fragrant flowers, much used by perfumers. It is often planted for ornament.

spongewood (spun'j' wúd), n. 1. The hat-plant, Eschynomene aspera, or its pith. See hat-plant and Eschynomene.—2. A plant with spongy bark, Gastonia cutispungia, of the Araliaceae, the only species of its genus. It is an erect shrub with pinnate leaves and a panicle a foot long consisting of crowded branches with the flowers umbels at the ends.

Spongiae (spun'ji-é), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. spongia, a sponge; see sponge.] Sponges; the mesodermal class of Coelentera, having a branching canal-system (the organs of which are developed from cells of the mesogloea, or primary mesoderm), simple epithelia, endodermal collar-cells, and no cnidoblasts or movable appendages. The class is divided by Lendenfeld into two sub-classes: the Calcarea, with one order, Calcispongia; and the Silicea, with three orders, Hexactinellida, Chondrospongiae, and Cornuspongiae, with many suborders, tribes, etc., and about fifty living families, besides several fossil ones. The class dates back to the Silurian. See sponge.

spongian (spun'ji-an), n. [Spongiae + -an.] A member of the Spongiae; any sponge.

spongi-cell (spun'ji-sel), n. [L. spongia, a sponge, + cella, a cell.] A sponge-cell.

spongi-colous (spun-jik'ô-lus), a. [L. spongia, a sponge, + colere, inhabit.] Inhabiting sponges.

Spongidae, Spongidæ (spun'ji-dé, spun-jí-i-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Spongiae + -idæ.] 1. Sponges; the Spongiae.—2. A family of horny or fibrous sponges, typified by the genus Spongia, to which various limits have been assigned. In the most restricted sense the family is represented by such forms as the bath-sponges, and now called Euspongidæ.

spongi-form (spun'ji-fôrm), a. [L. spongia, a sponge, + forma, form.] 1. Having the form or structure of a sponge; periferous, as a member of the Spongiae; or of pertaining to the Spongiae. Hence—2. Sponge-like; spongy; soft, elastic, and porous, like an ordinary bath-sponge: noting various objects or substances not sponges.

—Spongi-form quartz, floatstone.
Spongilla (spun-jil'î), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1816), dim. of Spongia, the sponges; see sponge.] The only genus of fresh-water sponges, belonging to the group Fibrospongiae. The type-species is S. fluviatilis, which grows on the banks of rivers and ponds,

A Small Fresh-water Sponge, Spongilla fluviatilis, with one exhalant aperture, seen from above.
a and b, ostioles, or inhalant apertures; c, ciliated chambers; d, osculum, or exhalant aperture. (Arrows indicate the direction of the current of water.)

on submerged timber and other supports, forming thick greenish incrustations. It represents a highly specialized and somewhat aberrant family, Spongillidae. See also cuts under ciliate and Porifera.

Spongillidae (spun-jil'î-dé), n. pl. [NL., < Spongia + -idæ.] The only family of sponges which are not marine, characterized by their gemmules, and typified by the genus Spongilla.
Spongi-line (spun'ji-lin), a. [Spongia + -ine.] Pertaining to the Spongillidae, or having their characters.

spongin (spun'jin), n. [sponge + -in.] The proper horny or fibrous substance of sponges; ceratose or ceratode. Also spongiolin.

sponginblast (spun'jin-blást), n. [spongin + Gr. blastos, a germ.] One of the cells of sponges from which spongin is produced; the formative blastema in which spongin arises. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 420. Also spongioblast.

spongin-blastic (spun-jin-blas'tik), a. [sponginblast + -ic.] Producing spongin, as a sponginblast; formative or germinating, as spongin.

spongin-ness (spun'ji-nes), n. The state or character of being soft and porous, or spongy; porosity: said of various objects and substances not sponges.

sponging-house (spun'jing-hous), n. [Formerly also sponging-house; < sponging, verbal n. of sponge, v., 6, + house.] A victualing-house or tavern where persons arrested for debt were kept by a bailiff for twenty-four hours before being lodged in prison, in order that their friends might have an opportunity of settling the debt. Sponging-houses were usually the private dwellings of bailiffs, and were so named from the extortionate charges made upon prisoners for their accommodation therein.

A bailiff by mistake seized you for a debtor, and kept you the whole evening in a sponging-house. Swift, Advice to Servants (General Directions).

Spongiocarpeæ (spun'ji-ô-kär'pë-è), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. spongiid, a sponge, + karpos, a fruit, + -æ.] An order of florideous algae, founded upon a single species, Polyides rotundus. The fronds are blackish-red, cylindrical, cartilaginous, from 3 to 6 inches long, and attached by a disk, with an undivided stipe, which becomes repeatedly dichotomous above. The cystocarps are in external flesh-colored wart-like protuberances, which are borne on the upper parts of the frond. It grows on stones in deep water.

spongi-ole (spun'ji-ôl), n. [= F. spongi-ole, < L. spongiola, dim. of spongia, a sponge; see sponge.] In bot., a former name of the spongy tissue of a root-tip, from its supposed property of sucking up moisture like a sponge. Also called spongelet.

spongi-olin (spun'ji-ô-lin), n. [spongi-ole + -in.] Same as spongin. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 416.

spongiolite (spun'ji-ô-lit), n. [Gr. spongiolion, dim. of spongi-ole, (see sponge), + lithos, stone.] A fossil sponge-spicule; one of the minute siliceous elements of a sponge in a fossil state.

spongiolitic (spun'ji-ô-lit'ik), a. [spongiolite + -ic.] Of the nature of a spongiolite; containing spongiolites, or characterized by their presence: as, spongiolitic flint.

spongiopiline (spun'ji-ô-pi'lin), n. [Gr. spongiolion, dim. of spongi-ole, sponge, + pilos, felt, + -ine.] A substitute for cataplasms. It is a thick cloth into which sponge is incorporated in the weaving, in a manner analogous to that of pile-weaving, to form a uniform pile, and coated on the opposite side with rubber.

spongioplasm (spun'ji-ô-plazm), n. [Gr. spongiolion, dim. of spongi-ole, sponge, + plasma, anything formed or molded; see plasm.] The substance, resembling neuroglia, which supports the so-called "primitive tubules" or subdivisions of nerve-fiber containing hyaloplasm. Nansen, 1886.

The primitive tubes are the meshes in a supporting substance designated as "spongioplasm," a substance described as similar to the neuroglia which forms the sheath of the nerve tube or fibre. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 487.

spongioplasmic (spun'ji-ô-plaz'mik), a. [spongioplasm + -ic.] Of the nature of, or pertaining to, spongioplasm. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 487.

spongi-ose (spun'ji-ôs), a. [L. spongi-ose; see spongi-ous.] Same as spongy.

spongi-ous (spun'ji-us), a. [F. spongieux = Sp. Pg. esponjoso = It. spongi-oso, < L. spongi-oso, spongi-oso, porous, < spongia, a sponge; see sponge.] Spongy.

spongi-ozoön (spun'ji-ô-zô'on), n.; pl. spongi-ozoa (-ô). [NL., < Gr. spongi-ozoön, a sponge, + ζῷον, an animal.] A sponge. Also spongi-ozoön.

spongi-ite (spun'jit), n. [L. spongia, sponge, + -ite.] A fossil sponge.

spongi-tic (spun-jit'ik), a. [spongi-ite + -ic.] Of the nature of a fossil sponge; containing or characterized by the fossil remains of sponges.
spongi-blast (spun'gi-blást), n. [Gr. spongi-ozoön, sponge, + blastos, germ.] Same as spongi-blast.

Spongi-dia (spun-gi-di'è-è), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. spongi-dia, spongi-dia, sponge-like, spongy (see spongioid), + -æ.] An order of siphonocladaceous algae, typified by the genus Codium. They form spongy spherical or cylindrical floating masses, consisting of branched tubes.

spongi-oid (spun'gi-oid), a. [Gr. spongi-oides, spongi-oides (also spongi-oides, spongi-oides), sponge-like, < spongi-ozoön, sponge, + ειδός, form.] Spongi-form, in any sense; spongy.

spongi-ological (spun-gi-ol'ôj-i-kal), a. [spongi-ology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to spongiology, or the science of sponges.

spongi-ologist (spun-gi-ol'ô-jist), n. [spongi-ology + -ist.] One who is versed in the science of sponges.

spongi-ology (spun-gol'ô-ji), n. [Gr. spongi-ozoön, a sponge, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak; see -ology.] The science of sponges; the study of the Spongiæ, and the body of knowledge thence obtained.

spongi-omere (spun-gi-ô-mër-è), a. [spongi-omere + -al.] Of or pertaining to a spongiomere; choanosomal, as that part of a sponge which is characterized by flagellated chambers.

spongi-omere (spun-gi-ô-mër), n. [Gr. spongi-ozoön, a sponge, + μέρος, a part.] The upper, choanosomal part of a sponge, characterized by the presence of flagellated chambers: distinguished from hypomere. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 415.

spongi-ozoön (spun-gi-ô-zô'on), n. [Gr. spongi-ozoön, sponge, + ζῷον, animal.] Same as spongi-ozoön. Hyatt.

spongy (spun'ji), a. [Formerly also spungy; < sponge + -y.] 1. Of the nature or character of a sponge; spongi-form or spongioid.—2. Resembling a sponge in certain particulars; soft or elastic and porous; of open, loose, compressible texture, like a bath-sponge; punky, pithy, or soft-grained, as wood; boggy or soggy, as soil; absorbent; imbibitive. See cuts under cellular and cystolith.

That sad breath his spongy lungs bestow'd.
Shak., Lover's Complaint, l. 326.

Here pits of crag, with spongy, plashy base,
To some enrich th' uncultivated space.
Crabbe, Works, II. 9.

3t. As it were soaked with drink; drunken. [Rare.]

What not put upon
His spongy officers, who shall bear the guilt
Of our great quell?
Shak., Macbeth, I. 7. 71.

4t. Moist; wet; rainy.
Thy banks with plowed and twilled brims,
Which spongy April at thy heat betrimms,
To make cold nymphs chaste crowns.
Shak., Tempest, iv. 1. 65.

Spongy bones, cancellated bones; specifically, the sphenoturbinals.—Spongy cartilage. Same as elastic carti- lage (which see, under elastic).—Spongy platinum, platinum-sponge. See sponge, n. 3.

spongy-pubescent (spun'ji-pū-bes'ent), a. In entom., having a very compact pubescence, resembling the surface of a sponge.

spongy-villous (spun'ji-vil'us), a. In bot., so thickly covered with fine soft hairs as to be spongy or to resemble a sponge.

spunk, n. An obsolete form of spunk.

spennent, spennet, v. Obsolete forms of the preterit plural and past participle of spin.

sponsal (spon'sal), a. [L. sponsalis, pertaining to betrothal or espousal, < sponsus, a betrothal: see spouse.] Relating to marriage or to a spouse. Bailey, 1731.

sponsible (spon'si-bl), a. [An aphetic form of responsible.] 1. Capable of discharging an obligation; responsible. Scott, Rob Roy, xxvi.—2. Respectable; creditable; becoming one's station.

sponsing (spon'sing), n. Same as sponson.

sponson (spon'shon), n. [L. sponsio(n)], a solemn promise or engagement, security, < spondere, pp. sponsus, engage oneself, promise solemnly: see sponsor.] 1. The act of becoming surety for another.—2. In international law, an act or engagement made on behalf of a state by an agent not specially authorized. Such conventions must be confirmed by express or tacit ratification.

sponsional (spon'shon-al), a. [L. sponsion + -al.] Responsible; implying a pledge. [Rare.]

He is righteous even in that representative and sponsional person he put on. Abp. Leighton, Sermons, v.

sponson (spon'son), n. [Also sponsing; origin obscure.] Naut., the curve of the timbers and planking toward the outer part of the wing, a, a, Sponson.

before and abaft each of the paddle-boxes of a steamer; also, the framework itself.—Sponson-beams, the projecting beams which contribute to form sponsons.

sponsor (spon'sor), n. [L. sponsor, a surety, LL. a sponsor in baptism, < spondere, pp. sponsus, promise; cf. Gr. σπονδαί (pl. of σπονδή), a truce, < σπένδω, pour a libation, as when making a solemn treaty: see spondee. From L. spondere are also ult. despond, respond, correspond, spouse, espousal, etc.] 1. A surety; one who binds himself to answer for another, and is responsible for his default; specifically, one who is surety for an infant at baptism, professing the Christian faith in its name, and guaranteeing its religious education; a godfather or godmother. The custom of having sponsors in baptism is as old as the second century. See godfather.—2. [cap.] [NL.] In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

spontaneity (spon-tā-nē'i-ti), n. [F. spontanéité = Sp. espontaneidad = Pg. espontaneidade = It. spontaneità, < ML. spontaneita(t)-s*, < LL. spontaneus, spontaneous: see spontaneous.] 1. Spontaneous character or quality; that character of any action of any subject by virtue of which it takes place without being caused by anything distinguishable from the subject itself. Spontaneity does not imply the absence of a purpose or external end, but the absence of an external incitement or external efficient cause.

2. In biol., the fact of apparently automatic change in structure, or activity in function, of animals and plants, whereby new characters may be acquired, or certain actions performed, under no influence of external conditions or stimulus; animal or vegetable automatism. (a) The inherent tendency of an individual organism to vary in structure without reference to its conditions of environment, as when a plant or animal sports; spontaneous variability. Some of the most valuable strains of domestic animals and cultivated plants have arisen thus spontaneously. (b) The tendency to purposeless activity of the muscular system of animals, whereby they execute movements independent of external stimulus.

Such actions, though voluntary, lack recognizable motive, and appear to depend upon the tension of a vigorous nervous system refreshed by repose. Such spontaneity is notable in the great activity of children and the gambols of young animals.—Spontaneity of certain cognitive faculties, in the philosophy of Kant, the self-activity of those faculties which are not determined to act by anything in the sense-impressions on which they act. But the conception is not made very clear by Kant.

spontaneous (spon-tā-nē-us), a. [= F. spontané = Sp. Pg. espontáneo = It. spontaneo, < LL. spontaneus, willing, < *L. spont-], will, only in gen. spontis and abl. sponte, of one's own will, of one's own accord.] 1. Proceeding from a conscious or unconscious internal impulse; occurring or done without the intervention of external causes; in a restricted sense, springing from one's own desire or volition, apart from any external suggestion or incitement. Of late the employment of spontaneous in the sense of 'irreflexive' or 'not controlled by a definite purpose' is creeping in from the French; but this is an objectionable use of the term.

The spontaneous grace with which these homely duties seemed to bloom out of her character.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, v.

Now my speculation is that advantageous permanent changes are always produced by the spontaneous action of the organism, and not by the direct action of the environment.

W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 101.

A man whose nature leads him to a spontaneous fulfillment of the Divine will cannot be conceived better.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 277.

2. Growing naturally, without previous human care.

Spontaneous flowers take the place of the finished parterre.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, xxxi.

3. Growing as native; indigenous. [Rare.]

Whence they had their Indian corn I can give no account; for I don't believe that it was spontaneous in those parts.

Beverley, Hist. Virginia, iv. ¶ 20.

4. In biol., instinctive or automatic, as some actions of animals which depend upon no external stimulus and are performed without apparent motive or purpose; uninfluenced by external conditions, as a change in structural character. Compare spontaneity, 2. Spontaneous actions may be either voluntary, in a usual sense, as the gambols of puppies or kittens, or involuntary and quite uncontrollable by the will. Of the latter class, some are abnormal, as spontaneous (in distinction from induced) somnambulism, and these are also called idiopathic.—Center of spontaneous rotation. See rotation.—Spontaneous axis, an axis of rotation of a body under instantaneous forces, in case there is no translation in the first instant.—Spontaneous cause, a cause that is moved to causing by the end or the object.—Spontaneous combustion. See combustion.—Spontaneous dislocation. See dislocation, 2(a).—Spontaneous energy, free energy, unrepressed and unforced.—Spontaneous evolution, in obstet., the spontaneous expulsion of the fetus in a case of shoulder presentation, the body being delivered before the head.—Spontaneous generation. See generation and abiogenesis.—Spontaneous suggestion, suggestion by the action of the laws of association, without the intervention of the will.—Syn. 1. Willing, etc. (see voluntary), instinctive, unbidden.

spontaneously (spon-tā-nē-us-li), adv. In a spontaneous manner; with spontaneity.

spontaneousness (spon-tā-nē-us-ness), n. The character of being spontaneous; spontaneity.

spoon (spon-tōn), n. [Formerly also espon-ton; = G. sponton, < F. sponton, espon-ton, F. dial. ésponton = Sp. espon-ton = Pg. espon-tão, < It. spontone, spuntone, a sharp point, a bill, javelin, pike, spoutoon; cf. spuntare, shoot forth, break off the point, blunt; puntone, a point, < punto, a prick, a point: see point.] A kind of halberd or partizan formerly serving as the distinguishing arm for certain officers of the British infantry. Compare half-pike. Also called demipike.

spook (spōk), n. [Also spuke; < D. spook, MD. spoecke = MLG. spōk, spūk, LG. spook = G. spuch (obs. except in dial. use), also spuk (after LG.) = Sw. spōke (cf. D. spooksel, MD. spooksel, Dan. spøgelse), a spook, ghost. There is nothing to show any connection with Ir. puca, elf, sprite, = W. puca, pucci: see puck, pugl.] A ghost; a hobgoblin. [Now colloq.]

Woden, who, first losing his identity in the Wild Huntman, sinks by degrees into the mere spook of a Suabian baron, sinfully fond of field-sports.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 118.

spook (spōk), v. i. [= D. spoken = MLG. spoken = G. spuken, spucken = Sw. spōka = Dan. spøge; from the noun.] To play the spook. [Rare.]

Yet still the New World spooked it in his veins,

A ghost he could not lay with all his pains.

Lowell, Fitz Adam's Story.

spookish (spōk'ish), a. [L. spook + -ish.] 1. Like a spook or ghost; ghostly.—2. Given over to spooks; congenial to ghosts; haunted: as, a spookish house.—3. Affected by a sense or fear of ghosts; suggestive of the presence or agency of spooks: as, a spookish circumstance; a spookish sensation. [Colloq. in all uses.]

spooky (spō'ki), a. [L. spook + -y.] Same as spookish, in any sense. [Colloq.]

spool (spōl), n. [ME. spole (not in AS.), < MD. spoel, D. spoel, a spool, quill, = MLG. spōle, LG. spole = OHG. spuolō, spuolā, MHG. spuole, G. spule, a spool, bobbin, = Icel. spōla = Sw. Dan. spole, a spool (cf. It. spola, spuola, bobbin, OF. epolet, spindle, < Teut.).] 1. A small cylinder of wood or other material (with a projecting disk at each end), upon which thread or yarn is wound; a reel.—2. The revolving metal shaft of an anglers' reel, upon which the fishing-line is wound. See cut under reel.

spool (spōl), v. t. [L. spool, n.] To wind on a spool.

spool-cotton (spōl'kot'n), n. Cotton thread wound on spools.

spooler (spō'lér), n. [L. spool + -er.] One who winds, or a machine used in winding, thread or yarn on spools. Ure, Diet., IV. 122.

spool-holder (spōl'hōl'dér), n. 1. A stand for one or more spools of sewing-thread, on which the spools are mounted on pins, so as to turn freely as the thread is unwound. Also spool-stand.—2. In warping, a reel on which spools are placed on skewers.

spooling-machine (spō'ling-mā-shēn'), n. A machine for winding thread on spools.

spooling-wheel (spō'ling-hwēl), n. Same as spole, 2. Halliwel.

spool-stand (spōl'stānd), n. Same as spool-holder, 1.

spoom (spōm), v. [Supposed to be a var. of spume, q. v. Cf. spoon.] I. intrans. Naut., to sail steadily and rapidly, as before the wind.

We'll spare her our main-top sail;

She shall not look us long, we are no starters.

Down with the fore-sail too! we'll spoom before her.

Fletcher, Double Marriage, li. 1.

II. trans. To cause to scud, as before the wind.

Spoom her before the wind, you'll lose all else!

Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, iii. 4.

spooming (spō'ming), p. a. Rushing before the wind: in the quotation perhaps used erroneously in the sense of 'foaming,' 'surging,' 'roaring.'

O Moon! far spooming Ocean bows to thee.

Keats, Endymion, iii.

spoon¹ (spōn), n. [ME. spoon, spone, span, < AS. spōn, a splinter of wood, chip, = OFries. spōn, span = D. spaan, spaan = MLG. spōn, LG. spoon = MHG. spān, G. span, a thin piece of wood, shaving, chip, = Icel. spānn, spōnn = Sw. spån = Dan. spaan, a chip; root uncertain. Cf. span-new, spick-and-span-new.] 1†. A thin piece of wood; a splinter; a chip.

A fyre of sponys, and lowe of gromls

Full soun will be att a nende [an end]

Books of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), p. 41.

2. A utensil consisting of a bowl or concave part and a handle, used for conveying liquids or liquid food to the mouth. Spoons were originally of wood, later of horn or metal. They are now made usually of silver, gold, iron, or mixed metal, of wood, horn, shell, or other materials, in various sizes and shapes, and for a great variety of purposes. Compare dessert-spoon, egg-spoon, table-spoon, etc.

He must have a long spoon that must eat with the devil.

Shak., C. of E., iv. 3. 82.

3. Something wholly or in part like a spoon (def. 2) or the bowl of a spoon in shape. Specifically—(a) The blade of an oar when broad and slightly curved, or an oar with such a curved blade. (b) A bright spoon-shaped piece of metal or other substance, swiveled above hooks, used as a lure or decoy in fishing. It revolves as it is drawn through the water. (c) A piece cut from the horn of an ox or bison, in the shape of an elongated bowl of a spoon, six to eight inches in length. It is used in gold-washing, and for testing the value of any kind of detrital material or pulverized ore. (d) A club the striking-surface of which is somewhat hollowed, used in the game of golf. (e) The spoonbill or paddle-fish. (f) In ornith., the spatulate dilatation at the end of the bill of a spoon-billed bird. (g) In cotton-manuf., a weighted gravitating arm in the stop-motion of a drawing-frame. One of these is held in position by the tension of each aliver, and in case the aliver breaks or the can becomes empty, and the tension is thus relieved, it falls, and, actuating a belt-shifter, causes the driving-belt to slip from the fast pulley to the loose pulley, thus stopping the machine. (h) In archery, same as petticoat, 5.—Apostle's spoon. See apostle-spoon.—Bag and spoon. See bag.—Deflagrating-spoon, a small spoon of metal, upon which a substance which is to be deflagrated is subjected to the action of heat.—Eucharistic spoon. Same as labis.—Maidenhead spoon. See maidenhead.—To be born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. See born.—Wooden spoon. (a) At Cambridge University, the student whose name stands last in the Mathematical Tripos. (b) At Yale, formerly, the student who took the last appointment at the Junior Exhibition; later, the most popular student in a class.

spoon¹ (spōn), v. [*< spoon*¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To take up or out with a spoon or ladle; remove with a spoon; empty or clean out with a spoon: often with up: as, to spoon up a liquid.

Ours, . . .
An age of scum, spooned off the richer past.
Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, v.

2. To lie close to, the face of one to the back of the other, as the bowl of one spoon within that of another. Compare spoon-fashion. [Colloq.]

"Now spoon me." Sterling stretched himself out on the warm flag-stone, and the boy nestled up against him.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 49.

II. intrans. 1. In croquet, to use the mallet as a spoon; push or shove the ball along with the mallet instead of striking it smartly as is required by the strict rules of the game.

Belabour thy neighbour, and spoon through thy hoops.
F. Locker, Mr. Placid's Flirtation.

2. To fish with spoon-bait.—3. To lie spoon-fashion. Compare I., 2. [Colloq.]

Two persons in each bunk, the sleepers spooning together, packed like sardines. Harper's Mag., LXXIV. 781.

spoon² (spōn), v. i. [A var. or corruption of spoon.] Same as spoom.

Such a storm did arise, they were forced to let slip Cable and Anchor, and put to sea, spooning before the wind.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 52.

spoon³ (spōn), n. [Usually assumed to be a particular use of *spoon*¹; but rather a back-formation from spoon, orig. in allusion to the use of a spoon in feeding an infant.] 1. A foolish fellow; a simpleton; a spoony; a silly lover. [Colloq.]

A man that's fond precociously of stirring Must be a spoon. Hood, Morning Meditations.
What a good-natured spoon that Dodd is!
C. Reade, Hard Cash, Prol.

2. A fit of silliness; especially, a fit of silly love. [Colloq.]—To be spoons on, to be silly in love with. [Slang.]

W. D. Whitney, Amer. Jour. Philol., V. 287.

sporal (spō'ral), a. [*< spore*² + -al.] Relating to or resembling spores.

sporang (spō-ranj'), n. [< sporangium.] In bot., same as sporangium.

sporangia, n. Plural of sporangium.

sporangial (spō-ran'ji-āl), a. [< sporangium + -al.] 1. Of or relating to the sporangium: as, the sporangial layer.—2. Containing spores; having the character of a sporangium; pertaining to sporangia.

sporangidium (spō-ran-jid'i-um), n.; pl. sporangidia (-iā). [NL., dim. of sporangium.] In bot.: (a) The columella in mosses. (b) A sporangium.

sporangiferous (spō-ran-jif'e-rus), a. [< NL. sporangium + L. ferre = E. *bear*¹.] In bot., bearing or producing sporangia.

sporangiform (spō-ran'ji-fōrm), a. [< NL. sporangium + L. forma, form.] In bot., having the form or appearance of a sporangium.

sporangiod (spō-ran'ji-oid), a. [< NL. sporangium + Gr. εἶδος, appearance.] In bot., having the appearance of a sporangium.

sporangiole (spō-ran'ji-ōl), n. [< NL. sporangiolium.] In bot., same as sporangiolium.

sporangiolium (spō-ran'ji-ō-lum), n.; pl. sporangiola (-iā). [NL., dim. of sporangium.] In bot., a small sporangium produced in certain genera of Mucorini in addition to the large sporangium. The spores are similar in both. The term has also been used as a synonym for ascus.

sporangiphore (spō-ran'ji-ō-fōr), n. [< NL. sporangiphorum, < sporangium + Gr. -φορος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*¹.] In bot., the axis or receptacle which bears the sporangia; a sporophore bearing sporangia. See sporophore.

sporangiphorum (spō-ran'ji-ō-fōr), n.; pl. sporangiphora (-rā). [NL.: see sporangiphore.] In bot., same as sporangiphore.

sporangiospore (spō-ran'ji-ō-spōr), n. [< Gr. σπορά, σπόρος, seed, + ἀγγεῖον, vessel, + σπόρα, σπόρος, seed.] In bot., one of the peculiar spores of the Myxomycetes. See Myxomycetes.

sporangium (spō-ran'ji-um), n.; pl. sporangia (-iā). [NL., < spora, a spore, + Gr. ἀγγεῖον, vessel.] 1. In bot., a spore-case; the case or sac in cryptogamous plants in which the spores, which are the analogues of the seeds of the higher or flowering plants, are produced endogenously. The sporangium receives different names, in accordance with the kind of spores produced: as, macrosporangium, microsporangium, oösporangium, zoösporangium, etc. In mosses sporangium is usually the same as capsule, but by some authors it is restricted to the spore-case or sac lining the cavity of the capsule. See spore-sac.

2. In zoöl., the spore-capsule or spore-receptacle of the Mycetozoa. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 334.

Also sporange.

sporation (spō-rā'shon), n. [*< spore*² + -ation.] In biol., a mode of generation which consists in the interior division of the body into a mass sporophyas (spō-rof'i-as), n. [NL. (A. Braun), < spora, spore, + Gr. φύειν, produce.] Same as sporophydium.

sporophydium (spō-rō-fid'i-um), n.; pl. sporophydia (-ā). [NL. (T. F. Allen, 1888), < spora, spore, + Gr. φύειν, produce, + -ιδιον, dim. suffix.] In bot., in the Characeæ, a term applied to the whole fruit, including the spore proper, its basal cell, and the enveloping cells. It is the same, or nearly the same, as the antheridium of Sachs and Goebel, the sporophyll of Braun, the "enveloped oogonium" of Celakowsky, and the sporangium of authors in general. See spermiocarp.

sporophyll, sporophyll (spō-rō-fil), n. [NL. sporophyllum, < spora, spore, + Gr. φύλλον, a leaf.] In bot., the leaf or leaf-like organ which bears the spores, or receptacles containing the spores, in many of the vascular cryptogams. It is usually more or less modified and unlike the normal leaves, as in the spikes of Lycopodium, Selaginella, Ophioglossum, etc. See cuts under these words, also under Osmunda, Polypody, and Sorus.

sporophyte (spō-rō-fit), n. [NL. spora, spore, + Gr. φύτον, plant.] In bot., the segment or stage of the life-cycle of the higher cryptogams (Paridophyta, Bryophyta) in which the non-sexual organs of reproduction are borne. It is a stage in what has been called the alternation of generations, and is the fern-plant, club-moss plant, etc., of popular language. It bears the spores in countless numbers. By some authors the word sporophore is used for sporophyte. Compare ophyte and ophore. See Musc.

sporophytic (spō-rō-fit'ik), a. [NL. sporophyte + -ic.] In bot., belonging to, resembling, or characteristic of a sporophyte.

sporosac (spō-rō-sak), n. [NL. spora, spore, + L. saccus, sack; see sack.] 1. In Hydrozoa, a degenerate medusiform person; one of the simple generative buds or gonophores of certain hydrozoans in which the medusoid structure is not developed. Encyc. Brit., XII. 554. — 2. In Ferms, a sporocyst or redia. See sporocyst (b).

sporostegium (spō-rō-stē'ji-um), n.; pl. sporostegia (-ā). [NL. < spora, spore, + Gr. στέγιν, cover, roof.] In bot., in the Characeæ, the characteristic spirally twisted or furrowed shell of the oöspore. It is thick and hard, usually black or brown in color, and consists of five cells which arise from the base of the spore. It is the so-called Chara-fruit.

sporous (spō-rus), a. [NL. spora, spore, + -ous.] In bot., of or pertaining to a spore.

Sporozoa (spō-rō-zō'ii), n. pl. [NL. < Gr. σπορά, seed, + ζωον, an animal.] 1. Mouthless parasitic ciliate protozoans, a class of Protozoa, synonymous with Gregarinida, but more comprehensive, including many organisms not ordinarily classed with the gregarines. They are parasitic, and occur in almost all animals. Most are very minute, but some attain the largest size by far known among protozoans. The Sporozoa have been divided into four subclasses, Gregarinidea, Coccididea, Myxosporidia, and Sarcocystidia. Also called Cyrtosia. 2. [l. c.] Plural of sporozoön.

sporozoan (spō-rō-zō'an), a. and n. [NL. < Sporozoa + -an.] 1. a. Having the characters of the Sporozoa; pertaining to the Sporozoa. 2. n. A member of the Sporozoa.

sporozoic (spō-rō-zō'ik), a. [NL. < Sporozoa + -ic.] Same as sporozoan.

sporozooid (spō-rō-zō'oid), n. [NL. < Gr. σπόρος, seed, + zoid.] In biol., a zoöspore.

sporozoön (spō-rō-zō'on), n.; pl. sporozoa (-ā). [NL.: see Sporozoa.] An individual of the Sporozoa; a sporozoan.

sporrán (spor'an), n. [Gael. sporan = Ir. sparan, a purse, pouch.] In Highland costume, the purse hanging down from the belt in front of the kilt. It is commonly of fur. In its present form, as a large and showy adjunct to the dress, it is not very old. See also cut under purse.

sport (spōrt), v. [ME. sport-en; by apheresis from disport.] 1. trans. 1. To amuse; divert; entertain; make merry; commonly with a reflexive object.

7. Play; idle jingle.

An author who should introduce such a sport of words upon the stage even in the comedy of our days would meet with small applause.
W. Broom, Notes on Pope's Odyssey, IX. 432.

8. In zool. and bot., an animal or a plant, or any part of one, that varies suddenly or singularly from the normal type of structure, and is usually of transient character, or not perpetuated. A sport is generally an individual variation of apparently spontaneous origin. The difference from the normal type is usually slight, but may be quite marked; in either case its tendency is to disappear with the individual in which it arises, though some sports repeat themselves, or may be preserved by careful selection. If perpetuated, it becomes a strain, breed, or variety. Sports are observed chiefly among domesticated animals and cultivated plants. Many of the beautiful or curious hothouse-flowers are mere sports, that are produced by high cultivation, crossing, or accident, and some valued breeds of domestic animals have arisen in like manner. Monstrous characters are sometimes acquired, but mere monstrosities or malformations are not usually called sports. Compare spontaneity, 2 (a), and freak of nature (under freak).

9. A sporting man; one who is interested in open-air sports; hence, in a bad sense, a betting man; a gambler; a blackleg. [Colloq.]

"The sports," by which is meant those who like fast living.
Contemporary Rev., LIII. 228.

In sport, in jest; in play; jesting. — To make sport of or (formerly) at, to laugh at; mock at; deride.

It were not good
She knew his love, lest she make sport at it.

spout (spout), v. [< ME. spouten, spouten = MD. spuyten, D. spuiten, spout, = Sw. sputa, a dial. var. of spruta, squirt, spout, sprout, etc.: see sprout.] A similar loss of r occurs in spout. Cf. sputter.] 1. intrans. 1. To issue with force, as a liquid through a narrow orifice, or from a spout; spurt: as, blood spouts from an artery.

Like a raving torrent, struggling amongst the broken rocks and lesse free passages, at length he spouts down from a wonderfull height into the valley below. Sandys, Travailes, p. 73.

2. To discharge a fluid in a jet or continuous stream; send out liquid as from a spout or nozzle; specifically, to blow, as a whale.

With youre mouthe ye vse nowther to squyr nor spout. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 135.

When the larger Cetacea come up to breathe, the expired vapor suddenly condenses into a cloud; and, if expiration commences before the spiracle is actually at the surface, a certain quantity of spray may be driven up along with the violent current of the expelled air. This gives rise to the appearance termed the spouting of Whales, which does not arise, as it is commonly said to do, from the straining off of the sea-water swallowed with the food, and its expulsion by the nostrils. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 348.

3. To speak volubly and oratorically; talk or recite in a declamatory manner, especially in public; speechify. [Colloq.]

For anything of the acting, spouting, reciting kind I think he has always a decided taste. Jane Austen, Mansfield Park, xiii.

Shak., R. and J., I. 5. 140.

9t. To come into view or notice; be spread by popular report; gain fame or prevalence.

Thus withinne a while his name is spronge
 Bothe of his dedes and his goode tonge.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, I. 579.

The word shal *sprung*en of him into Coloyne.
Flemish Insurrection (Child's Ballads, VI. 271).

10. To rise above a given level; have a relatively great elevation; tower.

Up from their midst springs the village spire,
 With the crest of its cock in the sun afire.
Whittier, Prophecy of Samuel Sewall.

Above this springs the roof, semicircular in general section, but somewhat stilted at the sides, so as to make its height greater than the semi-diameter.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 119.

11. To warp, or become warped; bend or wind from a straight line or plane surface, as a piece of timber or plank in seasoning.

The battens are more likely to sprung fairly than when the curves are nearly straight. Thearle, Naval Arch., § 21.

12. To bend to the oars and make the boat leap or spring forward, as in an emergency: often in the form of an order: as, "Sprung ahead hard, men!"—Sprunging bow. In violin-playing, a staccato passage, produced by dropping the bow on the strings so that it rebounds by its own elasticity, is said to be played with a sprunging bow. Also called spiccato, and, when the bow rebounds to a considerable distance, sallato. = Syn. Leap, Jump, etc. See skip, v. i.

II. trans. 1. To cause to leap or dart; urge or launch at full speed.

So they spede at the spoures, they sprangene theire horses,
 Hyres theme hakenayes hastily there aftyre.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 483.

I sprung my thoughts into this immense field.

J. Hervey, Meditations, II. 129.

2. To start or rouse, as game; cause to rise from the earth or from a covert; flush: as, to sprung a pheasant.

The men sprange the birdes out of the bushes, and the haukes sorynge ouer them bete them doune, so that the men mought easily take them.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, I. 18.

Here's the master fool, and a covey of coxcombs; one wise man, I think, would sprung you all.
Greene, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

3. To bring out hastily or unexpectedly; produce suddenly; bring, show, contrive, etc., with unexpected promptness, or as a surprise.

I may perhaps sprung a wife for you anon.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, v. 3.

Surprised with fright,
 She starts and leaves her bed, and springs a light.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., x. 153.

The friends to the cause sprung a new project. Swift.
 It's a feast at a poor country labourer's place when he springs sixteen north of fresh herrings.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 53.

4. To jump over; overleap.

Far be the spirit of the chase from them [women]!
 Uncomely courage, unbecoming skill;
 To sprung the fence, to rein the prancing steed.
Thomson, Autumn, I. 575.

5t. To cause to spring up or arise; bring forth; generate.

Two wells there bethe, I telle thee,
 That sprung the oyle, there men may see.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 142.

Their indulgence must not sprung in me
 A fond opinion that he cannot err.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, I. 1.

6t. To scatter as in sowing; strew about; shed here and there; sprinkle (a liquid).

Before these Ydoles men slean here Children many tymes, and *sprung*en the Blood upon the Ydoles; and so thei maken here Sacrifice.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 170.

7. To sprinkle, as with fine drops, particles, or spots; especially, to moisten with drops of a liquid: as, to sprung clothes. [Now only prov. Eng.]

With holi water thou schalt me sprunge,
 And as the snowe I schal be whyt.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 253.

8. To shiver; split; crack: as, to sprung a bat; the mast was sprung.

Our shippes [were] in very good plight, more then that the Mary Rose, by some mischance, either sprung or spent her fore-yarde.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 609.

9. To cause to burst or explode; discharge.

I sprung a mine, whereby the whole nest was overthrown.
Addison, Spectator.

10. To shift out of place; relax; loosen.

The lynch-pins of the wagon are probably lost, and the tire of the wheels sprung. H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 178.

Specifically—11. To relax the spring of; cause to act suddenly by means of a spring; touch off, as by a trigger: as, to sprung a trap; to sprung a rattle; also figuratively: as, to sprung a plot or a joke.

He shall weave his snares,
 And sprung them on thy careless steps.
Bryant, Antiquity of Freedom.

12. To bend by force, as something stiff or strong.—13. To insert, as a beam in a place too short for it, by bending it so as to bring the ends nearer together, and allowing it to straighten when in place: usually with in: as, to sprung in a slate or bar.—14. In arch., to commence from an abutment or pier: as, to sprung an arch.—15. Naut., to haul by means of springs or cables: as, to sprung the stern of a vessel around.—16. In carp., to unite (the boards of a roof) with bevel-joints in order to keep out wet.—To sprung a butt (naut.). See *butt*².—To sprung a leak. See *leak*².—To sprung her luff (naut.). See *luff*².

spring (spring), n. and a. [ME. spring, springe, a leap, sprung, springe, a spring (of water), a rod, a sprig, < AS. spring, spring, a leap, a spring, fountain, ulcer, = OS. spring (in ahospring = AS. ē-spring, a well, 'water-spring') = OFries. spring (in spedelspring) = MLG. sprink = OHG. spring, sprung, MHG. sprinc, sprunc, G. spring, a spring of water (cf. sprung, a leap), = Sw. Dan. spring, a leap, run, spring (cf. Sw. språng, a leap, bound, water-spring); from the verb: see spring, v.] I. n. 1. The act of springing or leaping. (a) A leaping or darting; a vault; a bound.

The Indian immediately started back, whilst the lion rose with a spring, and leaped towards him.
Addison, Spectator, No. 56.

(b) A flying back; the resilience of a body recovering its former state by its elasticity.

The bow well bent, and smart the spring.
Cowper, Human Frailty.

2. The act or time of springing or appearing; the first appearance; the beginning; birth; rise; origin: as, the spring of mankind; the spring of the year; the spring of the morning or of the day (see dayspring). [Archaic except as in def. 3 and its figurative use.]

Men, if we view them in their spring, are at the first without understanding or knowledge at all.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, I. 6.

This river taketh spring out of a certain lake eastward.
B. Jonson, Masque of Blackness.

So great odds there is between the Spring and Fall of Fortune.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 126.

At morning spring and even-fall
 Sweet voices in the still air singing.
Whittier, Moss Megone, II.

Specifically—3. The first of the four seasons of the year; the season in which plants begin to vegetate and rise; the vernal season (see season); hence, figuratively, the first and freshest period of any time or condition.

Rough winter spent,
 The pleasant spring straight draweth in ure.
Surrey, The Lower Comfortheth Himself.

My hastid days fly on with full career,
 But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.
Milton, Sonnets, II.

4. That which springs or shoots up. (a) A sprout; shoot; branch; sapling.

Springs and plantes, any spryge that growt out of any tree.
Arnold's Chron., p. 168.

This canker that eats up Love's tender spring.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, I. 656.

(b) A young wood; any piece of woodland; a grove; a shrubbery. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

When the spring is of two years' growth, draw part of it for quick-sets.
Evelyn, Sylva, III. viii. § 23.

(c) A rod; a switch.

For ho so spareth the spring spilthe hus children;
 And so wrot the wise to wissen us alle.
Piers Plowman (C), vi. 139.

5t. A youth; a springal.

The one his bowe and shafts, the other Spring
 A burning Teade about his head did move.
Spenser, Mulopotmos, I. 292.

Ca' me nae mair Sir Donald,
 But ae spring Donald your son.
Lizzie Lindsay (Child's Ballads, IV. 65).

6t. Offspring; race.

Who on all the human spring conferred confusion.
Chapman, (Imp. Dict.)

7. Water rising to the surface of the earth from below, and either flowing away in the form of a small stream or standing as a pool or small lake. Rivers are chiefly fed, both before and after being joined by their various affluents, by underground springs, and some pools of water large enough to be called ponds or even lakes are supplied in the same way. The conditions under which springs are formed are exceedingly variable, at once as regards the quantity of water, its temperature, the amount and nature of the gaseous and solid substances which it holds in solution, and the manner in which it is delivered at the surface: hence springs are variously designated in accordance with these peculiarities, the most familiar terms used for this purpose being shallow, simple, common, or surface; hot, boiling, thermal; mineral, medicinal; and spouting, or geyser, as this kind of spring is more generally called. Shallow or surface springs ordinarily furnish water which is pretty nearly pure, can be used for drinking, and does not differ much in temperature from the mean of the locality where they occur. They are due to the fact that the water falling on the surface in the form of rain, or furnished by melting snow, sinks to a certain depth (according as the soil and underlying rocks are more or less porous or permeable), where it is held in greater or less quantity according to the amount of rainfall and the thickness and relative position of the various permeable and impermeable formations with which it is brought in contact, but seeks under the influence of gravitation to escape, and makes its appearance at the surface when the topographical or geological conditions are favorable. Thus, a bed of gravel or sand resting on a mass of clay (the former being very permeable, the latter almost impermeable) will become saturated with water below a certain depth, the distance from the surface of the saturated sand or gravel, or the line of saturation, as it is called, varying with the climate and season. If, however, there be an adjacent ravine or valley which is cut deep enough to expose the line of junction of the permeable and impermeable formations, the water will escape along this line in greater or less quantity, giving rise to springs, which will vary in number and copiousness with the varying conditions which present themselves. The water of such springs, not having descended to any great depth, will not vary much in temperature from the mean of the locality. Very different are the conditions in the case of thermal or hot springs, which may have any temperature up to boiling, and of which the water may have been heated either by coming from great depths or by contact with volcanic rocks; hence thermal springs are phenomena very characteristic of volcanic and geologically disturbed or faulted regions, and those hot springs which are of the geyser type (see geyser) are most interesting from the scenic point of view. The medicinal properties and curative effects of various hot springs are of great practical importance; and many such springs, in Europe and the United States, are places much resorted to by invalids and pleasure-seekers. The variety of constituents, both solid and gaseous, held in solution by different hot springs is very great. From the medicinal point of view, springs are variously classined, and without regard to temperature, because the nature and quantity of the substances which the water contains are not by any means entirely dependent on temperature, although in general the hotter the water the larger the amount of foreign matter likely to be held in solution, while a high temperature is undoubtedly in many cases an important element in the therapeutic effect produced. A convenient classification of mineral waters, from the medicinal point of view, is into (a) indifferent, (b) earthy, (c) sulphurous, (d) saline, (e) alkaline, (f) purgative, (g) chalybeate. Indifferent waters are such as contain but a small amount of foreign matter—often so little, indeed, that they might well be classed as potable, but they are usually thermal. Their mode of therapeutic action is not well understood, and by some the imagination is thought to play an important part as a curative agency. Examples of well-known and much-visited springs of this class are Schlangenbad in Nassau; Gastein in Salzburg; Teplitz in Bohemia; Plombières in France; Lebanon, New York; Hot Springs, Bath Court House, Virginia; Clarendon Springs, Vermont; Hot Springs, Arkansas, etc. Earthy waters contain a large amount of mineral matter in solution, calcium sulphate predominating in quantity. Examples: Leuk, Switzerland; Bagnères-de-Bigorre, France; Bath, England; Sweet Springs and Berkeley Springs, West Virginia. Sulphurous waters are weak solutions of alkaline sulphurets, the mineral constituents ranging from a few grains to a hundred or more in the gallon, and the sulphur from a trace to 4 parts in 10,000; some are cold, others hot. Examples: many of the most frequented springs of the Pyrenees, as Cauterets, Eauz-Bonnes, Eauz-Chaudes, Bagnères-de-Luchon; Aix-la-Chapelle, Prussia; Harrogate, England; White Sulphur, West Virginia; and many others. Saline springs: these are very numerous, both hot and cold, common salt being the predominant ingredient; but besides this there are usually present salts of lime, magnesia, soda, iron, iodine, and bromine. Examples: Kissingen, Bavaria; Wiesbaden, Baden-Baden, Niederselters, in Germany; St. Catherine's, Canada; Saratoga, New York. Alkaline waters: these contain salts of soda, potash, lime, and magnesia; also, more or less commonly, lithia, strontia, and traces of iodine, bromine, fluorine, and arsenic. Examples: Vichy in France; Billin in Bohemia; Heilbrunn, Ems, in Germany. Purgative waters, containing especially the sulphate of magnesia, and also of soda, often in large quantity, as in the case of the Pullna water, which has 1,980 grains to the gallon, mostly sodium and magnesium sulphates. Examples: Sedlitz, Carlsbad, and Pullna, Bohemia; Cheltenham and Scarborough, England. Chalybeate waters, in which salts of iron are the essential ingredient. Examples: Schwalbach, Nassau; Spa, Belgium; Pymont, Germany.

8. Figuratively, any fount or source of supply.

Macb. The spring, the head, the fountain of your blood is stopp'd; the very source of it is stopp'd.
Macd. Your royal father's murder'd.

Shak. Macbeth, II. 3. 103.

9. An elastic body, as a strip or wire of steel coiled spirally, a steel rod or plate, strips of steel suitably joined together, a mass or strip of india-rubber, etc., which, when bent or forced from its natural state, has the power of recovering it again in virtue of its elasticity. Springs are used for various purposes—as for diminishing concussion, as in carriages; for motive power, as in clocks and watches; for communicating motion by sudden release from a state of tension, as a bow, the spring of a gun-lock, etc.; for measuring weight and other force, as in the spring-balance; as regulators to control the movement of wheel-works, etc.

To the trunk again, and shut the spring of it.

Shak. Cymbeline, II. 2. 47.

10. In entom., a special elastic organ by which an insect is enabled to spring into the air. (a) The springing-organ of species of the family Poduridae. It consists of several bristle-like appendages at the end of the abdomen, which are united at their bases and bent under the body. In leaping, the end of the abdomen is first bent down and then suddenly extended, bringing the elastic bristles with great force against the ground. See cut under springtail. (b) The springing-organ of a skipjack beetle, or elater. It consists of a spine extending backward from the prosternum and received in a cavity of the mesosternum. When the insect is placed on its back, it extends the prothorax so as to bring the spine to the edge of the mesosternal cavity; then, suddenly relaxing the muscles, the spine descends violently into the cavity, and the force given by this sudden movement causes the base of the elytra to strike against the supporting surface with such power that the body is thrown into the air. See cut under click-beetle.

11. Any active or motive power, physical or mental; that by which action is produced or propagated; motive.

Self-love, the spring of motion, acts the soul.

Pope, Essay on Man, II. 59.

12. Capacity for springing; elastic power; elasticity, either physical or mental.

Heav'n's! what a spring was in his arm!

Dryden.

Th' elastic spring of an unwearied foot,

That mounts the stile with ease, or leaps the fence.

Cowper, Task, I. 135.

13. Naut.: (a) The start, as of a plank; an opening in a seam; a leak.

Each petty hand

Can steer a ship becalmed; but he that will Govern and carry her to her ends must know . . .

Where her springs are, her leaks; and how to stop 'em.

B. Jonson, Catiline, III. 1.

(b) A crack in a mast or yard, running obliquely or transversely. (c) A line made fast to the bow or quarter of a ship, in order to pull the head or stern in any required direction. (d)

A rope extending from some part of a ship to another ship, or to a fixed object, to cant or move the ship by being hauled upon.—14. A quick and cheerful tune; a skip. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

We will meet him,

And strike him such new springs, and such free welcomes,
Shall make him scorn an empire.

Fletcher (and another?), Prophetess, v. 2.

Last night I play'd . . .

"O'er Bogie" was the spring.

Ramsay, Gentle Shepherd, I. 1.

15. In falconry, a collection of teal.

A spring of teals. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 97.

Presently surprising a spring of teal.

Daily Telegraph, Dec. 26, 1885. (Encyc. Dict.)

Atmospheric, bituminous, boiling, caballine spring. See the adjectives.—Backlash-spring. See backlash.—C-spring. See C-spring.—Carbonated springs. See carbonate.—Compound spring, a spring in which springs of different types are combined.—Intermittent or intermittent spring. See intermittent.—Platform-spring, a form of spring used for heavy vehicles, consisting of four semi-elliptical steel springs arranged as a sort of resilient skeleton platform.—Pneumatic spring, a device in which air is confined and made by its elasticity to perform the functions of a spring. It may be a simple air-bag or a cylinder with a close-fitting piston, etc. Also called air-spring, air-cushion.—Spiral spring, a coiled spring used chiefly where the pressure to be resisted is direct and in line with the axis of the spring. See cut under coil.—Spring of a beam or of a deck, the curve of a beam or deck upward from a horizontal line.—Spring of pork, the lower part of the fore quarter, which is divided from the neck, and has the leg without the shoulder.—Syn. 7. Fountain, etc. See well.

II. a. Pertaining to, suitable for, or occurring in the spring of the year: as, spring fashions; spring wheat.—Spring canker-worm. See canker-worm.—Spring cress, an American bitter-cress, Cardamine rhomboides, common in wet places, bearing white flowers in early spring.—Spring crocus, an early crocus, Crocus vernus, having blue, white, or partly-colored flowers, perhaps the most common garden species.—Spring fare, the first fare of fish taken any year. Fishermen make about two fares of cod in a year, and the first or spring fare, which commences early in April, is of a superior quality. [New England.]—Spring fever. See fever.—Spring grinder. See grinder.—Spring lobster. See lobster.—Spring mackerel. See mackerel.—Spring safety-valve. See safety-valve.—Spring snowflake. See snowflake.

springal¹, springald¹ (spring'al, -ald), n. [ME. springal, spryngal, spryngold, springold = MHG. springal, springolf, < OF. espringale, espringalle (A.F. also springalde), also espringalle, espringuale, and also espringole, espringarde, espingarde (= Pr. espingala = Sp. Pg. espingarda = It. spingarda, ML. spingarda), a military engine, also a dance, < espringuier, espringhier, espringier, espinguer, espinguier, spring, dance (= It. springare, spingare, kick about), < OHG. springan, spring, jump: see spring.] A military engine, resembling the ballista, used in Europe in the middle ages.

Eke withynne the castelle were Spryngoldes, gunnes, and bows, archers.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 4191.

springal², springald² (spring'al, -ald), n. [Also springel, springall, springold, springow, < spring + -ald, equiv. to -ard (the word being then perhaps suggested by springal¹, springald¹), or else + -al, equiv. to -el, -le, AS. -ol, as in E. brittle, newfangle, etc. Cf. spring, n., 5, springer, I (b).] A young person; a youth; especially, a young man. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

A Springald, adolescence.

Levin's, Manlyp. Vocab. (E. E. T. S.), p. 16.

Ha, well done! excellent boy! dainty, fine springal!

Middleton, More Dissemblers Besides Women, v. 1.

springard¹ (spring'ärd), n. Same as springal¹.
spring-back (spring'bäc), n. In bookbinding, a false back put on the sewed sections of a book, which springs upward when the book is opened flat, but returns to its proper position when the book is closed. The outer or true back does not change its outward curve, being kept stiff on library books by sheets of stiff paper, in large blank books by molded pasteboard or sheets of thin steel.

spring-balance (spring'bal'äns), n. See balance.

spring-band (spring'bänd), n. In a vehicle, a loop or strap used to unite the arms of an elliptic spring.

spring-bar (spring'bär), n. In a vehicle, a bar upon the ends of which the body is supported. It lies parallel with the axle, and rests upon the center of the elliptic spring.

spring-beam (spring'bēm), n. 1. A beam reaching across a wide space, without a central support.—2. In ship-building, a fore-and-aft timber uniting the outer ends of the paddle-box beams, and carrying the outboard shaft-bearing.—3. An elastic bar at the top of a tilt-hammer, jig-saw, or mortising-machine, to accelerate the fall, or afford return motion.—4. In a railroad-car, one of two heavy timbers resting on the springs of a six-wheel car-truck, and serving to support the bolster-bridges, which, through the bolster, support the car-body.—5. In carp., the tie-beam of a truss.

spring-beauty (spring'bū'ti), n. 1. A common American wild flower of the genus Claytonia, especially C. virginica, a low, succulent herb, sending up from a deep-set tuber in early spring a simple stem bearing a pair of narrow leaves and a loose gradually developing raceme of pretty flowers, which are white or rose-colored with deeper veins. See cut under Claytonia. The smaller C. caroliniana, with spatulate or oval leaves, is more northern except in the mountains.—2. In entom., a beautiful little butterfly of America, Erora læta, which appears in spring, and has the hind wings in the male brown bordered with blue, in the female mostly blue. S. H. Scudder. [Recent.] spring-bed (spring'bed), n. 1. A mattress formed of spiral springs or a fabric woven of coiled spiral wire, set in a wooden frame.—2. In a cloth-shearing machine, a long elastic plate of steel fastened to the framing of the machine to press the fibers of the cloth within the range of the cutting edges.

spring-beetle (spring'bē'tl), n. A beetle of the family Elateridae; an elater; a click-beetle. See cut under click-beetle. Also springing-beetle. See spring, n., 10 (b).

spring-bell (spring'bel), n. A species of rush-lily, Sisyrinchium grandiflorum. See rush-lily.

spring-block (spring'blok), n. 1. Naut., a common block or deadeye connected to a ring-bolt by a spiral or india-rubber spring. It is attached to the sheets, so as to give a certain amount of elasticity.—2. In a vehicle, a piece of wood fixed on the axle as a support for the spring.—3. In a car-truck, a distance-piece placed above or below an elliptic spring.

spring-board (spring'bōrd), n. An elastic board used in vaulting, etc.

springbok (spring'bok), n. [< S. African D. springbok (= G. spring-bock), a wild goat, < spring, = E. spring, + bok = E. buck.] A beautiful gazel, Gazella eucore, so called by the Dutch colonists of South Africa, where it abounds, Springbok (Gazella eucore).

from its agility in springing upward when alarmed or as it scours the plain in escaping from its pursuers. It is of lithe and graceful form and handsome coloration, in which a rich tawny brown is varied with pure-white and black. Also spring-boc, spring-buck, sprink-buck, and springer.

spring-box (spring'boks), n. 1. The box which contains the mainspring of a watch or other mechanism; the barrel.—2. A box or some similar receptacle closed by a lid which opens or shuts by the elasticity of a spring or some similar device. See palpal.—3. In upholstery, the wooden frame within which the springs, as of a mattress or of the seat of a sofa, are contained.

spring-buck (spring'buk), n. Same as springbok. Imp. Dict.

spring-carriage (spring'kar'āj), n. A wheeled carriage mounted upon springs.

spring-cart (spring'kärt), n. A light cart mounted upon springs.

springe¹ (sprinj), v. t.; pret. and pp. springed, ppr. springeing. [< ME. sprengen, < AS. sprengan, causal of springan, spring: see spring, and cf. spreng (of which springe is the proper form (cf. singe, as related to sing), now only dialectal.) To sprinkle. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

springe² (springj), n. [ME. springe, < springen, spring: see spring, v. Cf. springle, and D. spring-net, a spring-net, OHG. springa, MHG. springke, a bird-snare.] A noose or snare for catching small game; a gin. It is usually secured to an elastic branch, or small sapling, which is bent over and secured by some sort of trigger which the movements of the animal will release, when it flies up and the noose catches the game.

A woodcock to mine own springe.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 317.

I will teach thee a springe, Tony, to catch a pewit.

Scott, Kenilworth, xii.

springe² (springj), v.; pret. and pp. springed, ppr. springeing. [*< springe*², n.] I. trans. To catch in a springe.

We springe ourselves, we sink in our own bogs.

Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, iv. 4.

II. intrans. To set springes; catch game by means of springes.

springe³ (springj), a. [< spring, v.] Active; nimble; brisk; agile. [Prov. Eng.]

The squire's pretty springe, considering his weight.

George Eliot, Silas Marner, xi.

springer (spring'er), n. [< spring + *-er*¹.] 1. One who or that which springs, in any sense. (a) A growing plant, shrub, or tree; a sapling.

The young men and maidens go out into the woods and coppices, cut down and spoil young springers to dress up their May-booths.

Keelyn, Sylva, IV. iv. § 4.

(b) A youth; a lad. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] 2. In arch.: (a) The impost or place where the vertical support to an arch terminates, and the curve of the arch begins. (b) The lower voussoir or bottom stone of an arch, which lies immediately upon the impost. (c) The bottom stone of the coping of a gable. (d) The rib of a groined roof or vault. See cross-springer.

3. A dog of a class of spaniels resembling the cocker, used, in sporting, to spring or flush game. See spaniel.

The Springer is smaller than the former (the Water Spaniel), of elegant form, gray aspect, and usually white with red spots, black nose and palate.

Quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 376.

4. The springbok.—5. A grampus.—Springer antelope, the springbok.

Springfield gun, rifle. See *gun*¹, *rifle*², also cut under bullet.

spring-flood (spring'flud), n. [< ME. spring-flood (= D. spring-vloed = G. spring-fluth = Sw. Dan. spring-flod); as spring + flood.] Same as springtide.

Than shal she [the moon] been evens atte fulle alway,
And spring-flood laste bothe nyght and day.

Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 342.

spring-fly (spring'fli), n. A caddis-fly.

spring-forelock (spring'fôr'lok), n. A cotter-key having a spring in the entering end to prevent its accidental withdrawal. E. H. Knight.

spring-garden (spring'gär'dn), n. A word of doubtful meaning, possibly a corrupt form; perhaps, according to Nares, a garden where concealed springs were made to spout jets of water upon the visitors.

Sophocles [bound]. Thy slave, proud Martius?

... not a vein runs here
From head to foot, but Sophocles would unseam, and Like a spring-garden shoot his scornful blood
Into their eyes durst come to tread on him.

Beau. and Fl., Four Plays in One, Play 1st.

spring-gun (spring'gun), n. A gun which is discharged by the stumbling of a trespasser upon it, or against a wire connected with the trigger; also, a gun similarly set for large animals, as bears or wolves.

spring-haas (spring'häs), n. [< S. African D. spring-haas, < spring (= E. spring) + haas, a hare, = E. hare: see spring and *hare*¹.] The Cape jumping-hare, Pedetes caffer, a kind of jerboa, of the family Dipodidae. See cut under Pedetes.

spring-halt (spring'hält), n. [Also, corruptly, string-halt; < spring + *halt*¹.] An involuntary convulsive movement of the muscles of either hind leg in the horse, by which the leg is suddenly and unduly raised from the ground and lowered again with unnatural force; also, the nervous disorder on which such movements depend, and the resulting gait.

One would take it,

That never saw 'em pace before, the spavin
Or springhalt reign'd among 'em.

Shak., Hen. VIII., l. 3. 13.

spring-hammer (spring'ham'er), n. A machine-hammer in which the blow is partly or wholly made by a spring to which tension has been imparted by mechanism during the lift of the hammer-head. In some hammers the spring is a volume of confined and compressed air. In the accompanying cut a is the anvil-block; b, anvil; c, frame; d, guides for hammer; e, piston-rod; f, cylinder; g, hammer; h, crank (driven by the pulley i) which lifts the hammer, at the same time compressing the air in the air-spring cylinder f; j, idler-pulley which tightens the driving-belt k when pressed against the belt by the action of the rock-lever l, the rod n, and the foot-lever or treadle o—the rock-lever l being pivoted to the frame at m, while the treadle is pivoted to it at p. Pressure upon the treadle by the foot tightens the belt, and the hammer is then raised. The treadle is then relieved from pressure, the belt is slackened on the pulley i, and the compressed air, acting on the piston, delivers the blow, the belt then slipping easily over the pulley i.

Spring-hammer.

spring-hanger (spring'hang'er), n. A U-shaped strap of iron serving to support the end of a semi-elliptical car-spring.

spring-head (spring'hed), n. 1. A fountain-head; a source.

Water will not ascend higher than the level of the first spring-head from whence it descendeth.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, l.

2. A clutch, button, or other connecting device at the end of an elliptic carriage-spring.

spring-headed (spring'hed'ed), a. Having heads that spring afresh. [Rare.]

Spring-headed Hydres, and sea-shouldring Whales.

Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 23.

spring-hook (spring'hük), n. 1. In locomotives, a hook fixing the driving-wheel spring to the frame.—2. A latch or door-hook having a spring-catch for keeping it fast in the staple.—3. A fish-hook set like a spring-trap, with a supplementary hook, which, on being released, fixes itself in the fish; a snap-hook. Also called spear-hook.

spring-house (spring'haus), n. A small building constructed over a spring or brook, where milk, fresh meat, etc., are placed in order to be kept cool in or near the running water. [U. S.]

As I was a-settin' in the spring-house, this mornin', a-workin' my butter, I says to Dinah, "I'm goin' to carry a pot of this down to Miss Scudder."

H. B. Stowe, Minister's Wooling, iv.

springiness (spring'ines), n. 1. The state or property of being springy; elasticity.

The air is a thin fluid body endowed with elasticity and springiness, capable of condensation and rarefaction.

Bentley.

2. The state of abounding with springs; wetness; sponginess, as of land.

springing (spring'ing), n. [< ME. springing, springynge; verbal n. of spring, v.] 1. The act or process of leaping, arising, issuing, or proceeding; also, growth; increase.

The Poo out of a welle smal

Taketh his firste springing and his sors.

Chaucer, Prol. to Clerk's Tale, l. 49.
Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it. . . Thou makest it soft with showers; thou blessest the springing thereof.

Pa. lxx. 10.

2. In arch., the point from which an arch springs or rises; also, a springer.

springing (spring'ing), p. a. Liable to arise; contingent: as, springing uses. See use.

springing-beetle (spring'ing-bē'tl), n. Same as spring-beetle.

springing-course (spring'ing-körs), n. See *course*¹.

springing-hairs (spring'ing-härz), n. pl. The locomotory cilia of some infusorians, as the Halteridae, by means of which these animalcules skip about.

springing-line (spring'ing-lin), n. The line from which an arch springs or rises; the line in which the springers rest on the imposts, and from which the rise or versed sine is calculated.

springing-time (spring'ing-tim), n. [< ME. springing time; < springing + time.] The time of the new growing of plants; spring-time; spring.

[The first age of man Icoond & light,

The springynge tyme clepe "ver."

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 160.

springing-tool (spring'ing-töl), n. In iron-working, same as hauling-tool.

springing-wall (spring'ing-wäl), n. In building, a buttress.

spring-jack (spring'jak), n. In teleg., a device for inserting a loop in a line-circuit. It usually consists of a plug to be inserted between two spring-contacts, the ends of the loop being joined to metallic strips fixed to the opposite sides of the insulating plug. If the latter is entirely of insulating material, it becomes a spring-jack cut-out.

spring-latch (spring'lach), n. A latch that snaps into the keeper after yielding to the pressure against it. See cuts under latch.

springle (spring'l), n. [= D. G. sprengel, a noose, snare, springe, = Sw. spränkla, a springle, = Dan. sprinkel, trellis; a dim. of spring, springe, in similar senses: see spring, *springe*².] 1. A springe.

They [woodcocks] arrive first on the north coast, where almost euerle hedge seruth for a roade and euerle plashoots for springles to take them.

R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 25.

2. A rod about four feet in length, used in thatching. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

springless (spring'les), a. [< spring + -less.] Lacking springs or spring. (a) Having no springs, or natural fountains of water. (b) Lacking elastic springs: as, a springless wagon.

springlet (spring'let), n. [< spring + -let.] A little spring; a small stream.

But yet from out the little hill

Oozes the slender springlet still.

Scott, Marjorie, vi. 37.

spring-ligament (spring'lig'a-ment), n. The inferior calcaneoscaphoid ligament of the sole of the foot, connecting the os calcis or heel-bone with the scaphoid, supporting the head of the astragalus, and forming part of the articular cavity in which the latter is received.

springlike (spring'lik), a. Resembling spring; characteristic of spring; vernal: as, springlike weather; a springlike temperature.

There the last blossoms spring-like pride unfold.

Savage, Wanderer, v.

spring-line (spring'lin), n. In milit. engin., a line passing diagonally from one pontoon of a bridge to another.

spring-lock (spring'lok), n. A lock which fastens itself automatically by a spring when the door or lid to which it is attached is shut. Also called latch-lock.

spring-mattress (spring'mat'res), n. See mattress and spring-bed.

spring-net (spring'net), n. A bird-net which can be shut by means of a spring and trigger; a flap-net. A net of similar form is used for trapping rabbits.

springold¹, n. Same as *springall*¹.

springold², springowt, n. Same as *springal*².

spring-oyster (spring'ois'ter), n. A thorn-oyster. See cut under Spondylus.

spring-padlock (spring'pad'lok), n. A padlock which locks automatically by means of a spring when the hasp is pressed into its seat.

spring-pawl (spring'päl), n. A pawl actuated by a spring.

spring-plank (spring'plangk), n. A transverse timber beneath a railway truck-bolster, forming a support for the bolster-springs. E. H. Knight.

spring-pole (spring'pöl), n. A pole fastened so that its elasticity can be used for some mechanical purpose.—Spring-pole drilling, a method of boring holes in rock for oil, water, or any other purpose, in which the rods and drill are suspended from a spring-pole, which by its elasticity lifts them up after every stroke. The down motion is effected by hand-power, or sometimes a stirrup is added to enable the driller to use his feet. Prospecting-holes of from two to three inches in diameter can be bored with this simple apparatus to the depth of one or two hundred feet, or even more.

spring-punch (spring'punch), n. A punch which has a spring to throw it back after it has been driven down by pressure. This is usually done only in quick-working punches which are driven by the blows of a hammer, or in hand-punches such as those used by shoemakers, railway conductors, etc.

spring-searcher (spring'ser'cher), n. A tool having steel prongs projected by springs, used to detect defects in a cannon-bore.

spring-shackle (spring'shak'l), n. 1. A shackle closed by a spring.—2. A shackle connecting two springs, or connecting a spring to a rigid part: used in vehicles, etc.

spring-stay (spring'stä), n. Naut. See *stay*¹.

spring-stud (spring'stud), n. A rod passed through the axis of a coil-spring to hold the spring in place. The upper end works in a guide. See cut under oiler.

springtail (spring'tāl), n. 1. A collembolous thysanurous insect which leaps or skips about by means of abdominal hairs acting like a spring, as any poduran. In these creatures the anal bristles are united and bent under the body, forming a spring by the aid of which they leap to a great height. They are found in gardens, in hotbeds, on manure-heaps in winter, and on snow, and may also be seen on the surface of water in quiet pools. See Collembola, 2, Podura, and Thysanura. 2. A thysanurous insect of the suborder Cinura, oftener called bristletail. See Cinura, Lepisma, and cut under silverfish.—3. One of certain minute neuropterous insects of the panorpide genus Boreus, found in moss and on the surface of snow; a snow-fly. This insect springs, but not by means of anal appendages.

Springtails.
1, Degeeria nitidus; 2, a poduran; both greatly enlarged.

spring-tailed (spring'tāld), a. Springing by means of the tail, or having a spring on the tail, as a collembolous insect; thysanurous; podorous.

spring-tide (spring'tid), n. [= D. spring-tij, spring-tide, = G. spring-zeit, high tide, = Sw. Dan. spring-tid, spring-tide; as spring, v., rise, + tide.] 1. The tide which occurs at or soon after the new and full moon, and rises higher than common tides, the ebb sinking correspondingly lower. At these times the sun and moon are in a straight line with the earth, and their combined influence in raising the waters of the ocean is the greatest, consequently the tides thus produced are the highest. See tide. Hence—2. Figuratively, any great flood or influx.

Yet are they doubly replenished by the first and latter spring-tides of devotion. Sandys, Travails, p. 160.

springtide (spring'tid), n. [< spring, n., 3, + tide.] Springtime.

Sounds as of the springtide they, . . .
While the chill months long for May.
D. G. Rossetti, Love's Nocturn.

springtime (spring'tim), n. Spring.

Primrose, first-born child of Ver,
Merry spring-time's harbringer, Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, I. 1.

spring-tool (spring'töl), n. A light tongs closing by a spring, used by glass-blowers.

spring-trap (spring'trap), n. 1. A trap working by a spring, which may cause a door or bar to fall when the detent is released by the moving of the bait, or may throttle the victim, as in an ordinary form of mouse-trap, etc.—2. A form of steam-trap. E. H. Knight.

spring-valve (spring'valv), n. 1. A valve fitted with a spring, which holds it to its seat except when it is opened by extraneous force.—2. A safety-valve with which is connected a spring-balance, graduated to any required number of pounds, and acting as a check on the valve until the determined pressure is attained. See cut under safety-valve.

spring-wagon (spring'wag'on), n. A wagon the bed of which rests on springs.

spring-water (spring'wā'tēr), n. Water issuing from a spring: in contradistinction to river-water, rain-water, etc.

Spare Diet, and Spring-water clear,
Physicians hold are good.
Prior, Wandering Pilgrim.

spring-weir (spring'wēr), n. A kind of weir arranged to drop to the bottom at low water, and allow the fish to pass over it with the incoming tide, while at high water it is lifted up. It is worked from the shore by means of capstans and ropes, so that it forms an impassable barrier to the fish, which are retained as the tide passes out, and are thus taken in large numbers. [Malne.] spring-worm (spring'wōrm), n. A pin-worm, as Oxyuris vermicularis; a small threadworm. See cut under Oxyuris.

springwort (spring'wört), n. [< ME. spryng-wurt, springwort; < spring + wort.] In European folk-lore, a plant to which various magical virtues were attributed, among them that of drawing down the lightning and dividing the storm: identified by Grimm with the caperspurge, Euphorbia Lathyris. Dyer, Folk-lore of Plants.

springy (spring'i), a. [< spring + -y.] 1. Having elasticity like that of a spring; elastic; light: as, springy steel; a springy step.

Which vast contraction and expansion seems unintelligible by feigning the particles of air to be springy and ramous. Newton, Opticks, III. query 31.

2. Abounding with springs or fountains; wet; spongy: as, springy land.

sprink (springk), v. t. [A dial. var. of spring; cf. sprinkle.] To sprinkle; splash. Halliwel. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

sprink (springk), n. [< sprink, v.] 1. A sprinkle; a drop, as of water. Howell, Arbor of Amittie (1568). (Nares.)—2. A crack or flaw. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] sprink-buck (spring'buk), n. Same as spring-bok.

sprinkle (spring'kl), v. i. pret. and pp. sprinkled, ppr. sprinkling. [Early mod. E. sprengle, sprengyll, < ME. sprengelen, sprenglen, sprenggolen (= MD. sprengelen, sprengelen, D. sprengelen = G. sprengeln), sprinkle; freq. of ME. sprengen, < AS. sprengan, causal of sprengan, sprengan, spring: see spreng and spring. Cf. sprink.] I. trans. 1. To scatter in drops or particles; let fall in minute quantities here and there; strew.

To sprengyll; speregere, fundere. Cath. Ang., p. 356.
Take to you handfuls of ashes of the furnace, and let Moses sprinkle it toward the heaven in the sight of Pharaoh. Ex. ix. 8.

2. To besprinkle; bespatter or bestrew; overspread with drops or particles, as of a powder, liquid, coloring matter, etc.

Valerianus . . . at last was flayed alive, and sprinkled with salt. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 357.

3. To cleanse with drops, as of water; wash; purify.

Having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience. Heb. x. 22.

4. To distribute here and there; diffuse.

Upon the heat and flame of thy distemper
Sprinkle cool patience. Shak., Hamlet, III. 4. 124.

These and such other reflections are sprinkled up and down the writings of all ages. Steele, Spectator, No. 11.

5. To diversify by objects placed here and there over the surface; dot.

Spacious meads, with cattle sprinkled o'er.
Conquer, Task, I. 164.

II. intrans. 1. To issue in fine drops or particles; be sprinkled.

It will make the water sprinkle up in a fine dew. Bacon.

2. To send out sparks; scintillate; sparkle.

Toward the lady they come fast rennyng,
And sette this whele upon her hede,
As any hote yren yt was sprynggolyng rede.
M.S. Laud. 416, f. 70. (Halliwel.)

3. To rain slightly: used impersonally: as, does it sprinkle?—4. To scatter a liquid or any fine substance so that it may fall in small particles.

The priest . . . shall sprinkle of the oil with his finger. Lev. xiv. 16.

5. To dart hither and thither.

The sluier scallt fychsis on the grete,
Ouer thowrt clere strenes sprinkilland for the hete,
With fynnyss schinad and broun as synopare.
Gavin Douglas, tr. of Virgil, p. 400.

sprinkle (spring'kl), n. [< ME. sprynkil, sprengyll, sprengyle (cf. MHG. G. sprengel) from the verb.] 1. A utensil for sprinkling; a sprinkler; specifically, a brush for sprinkling holy water; an aspersorium.

And the litil sprinkil of ysop wetith in bloode, that is in the nethir threswold, and sprengith of it the ouerthreswold, and either post. Wyckif, Ex. xii. 22.

She alway smyld, and in her hand doth hold
An holy-water-sprinkle, dipt in dewe.
Spenser, F. Q., III. xii. 13.

2. A sprinkling, or falling in drops; specifically, a light rain.

He meets the first cold sprinkle of the world,
And shudders to the marrow.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 213.

3. That which is sprinkled about; hence, a scattering or slight amount; a sprinkling.—4. A light tinkling sound; a tinkle. [Rare.]

At Sorrento you hear nothing but the light surges of the sea, and the sweet sprinkles of the guitar.
Landon, Imag. Conv., Tasso and Cornelia.

5. Milit., same as morning-star, 2.

sprinkled (spring'kld), a. [< sprinkle + -ed.] Marked by small spots; appearing as if sprinkled from a wet brush: specifically noting a kind of decoration of pottery, the edges of cheaply bound books, etc.

sprinkler (spring'klér), n. [< sprinkle + -er.] 1. One who or that which sprinkles. Especially —(at) A spherical or barrel-shaped vase having a small spout. Such vases were grasped in the hand, and the liquid contents thrown out with a jerking motion. (b) A brush for sprinkling holy water. Compare aspersorium, 1. (c) A device for spraying water over plants, or over a lawn, etc.

2. Milit., same as morning-star, 2.—Holy-water sprinkler. See holy.

sprinkling (spring'klng), n. [Verbal n. of sprinkle, v.] 1. The act of one who sprinkles, in any sense of the word; aspersion.

Your uncleanly unctions, your crossings, creepings, censings, sprinklings. Ep. Hall, Epistles, I. 1.

2. A small quantity falling in distinct drops or parts, or coming moderately: as, a sprinkling of rain or snow. Hence—3. A small amount scattered here and there, as if sprinkled.

We have a sprinkling of our gentry, here and there one, excellently well learned. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 197.

4. In bookbinding, the operation of scattering a shower of fine drops of color on the trimmed edges of the leaves to produce a mottled effect. It is done by striking a brush charged with color against a rod held above the edges of the book to be sprinkled.

sprint (sprint), v. i. [Also dial. sprunt; a later form of sprent¹, q. v. Cf. spurt², spurt².] To run at full speed, as in a short-distance foot-race. Nineteenth Century, XXI. 520.

sprint (sprint), n. [< sprint, v.] A run at full speed, as in a short-distance foot-race.

sprinter (sprin'tér), n. A contestant in a sprint-race; a short-distance runner. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 61.

sprinting (sprin'ting), n. [Verbal n. of sprint, v.] The act or the sport of running at full speed, as in a short-distance foot-race.

sprint-race (sprin'trás), n. A short-distance foot-race.

sprint-runner (sprin'trun'ér), n. Same as sprinter. The Century, XL. 206.

sprit¹ (sprit), v. [< ME. sprutten, < AS. spritan, sprytan (= LG. sprutten = G. spritzen, sprützen), sprout, a secondary form of spreotan, sprout: see sprout. Cf. spirt¹, spurt¹.] I. intrans. To sprout; bud; germinate, as barley steeped for malt.

The witht thet sprutleth ut. Ancren Riwe, p. 86.

II. trans. To throw out with force from a narrow orifice; eject; spurt. Sir T. Broune.

sprit¹ (sprit), n. [Early mod. E. also spret; < ME. spret, sprete, spreot, a pole, < AS. spreót, a pole, orig. a sprout, shoot, branch of a tree (= D. spriet, > G. spriet, a sprit), < spreotan, sprout: see sprit¹, v., and sprout. Cf. bowsprit.] 1. A sprout; a shoot.

The barley, after it has been couched four days, will sweat a little, and shew the chit or sprit at the root-end of the corn. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Hastill hent eche man a spret or an ore.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 2754.

3. Naut.: (a) A small pole, spar, or boom which crosses the sail of a boat diagonally from the mast to the upper aftmost corner, which it is used to extend and elevate. The lower end of the sprit rests in a becket, called the moller, which encircles the mast at that place. See cuts under moller² and spritail. (b) The bowsprit.

sprit² (sprit), n. [Appar. a particular use of sprit¹, a sprout. Cf. sprot¹, sprat¹.] 1. A rush: same as sprat¹, 1.—2. See the quotation.

The object of the rubbing [in the modern Irish process of bleaching linen], which is so essential for many qualities of goods, is to remove small specks of brownish matter called sprits, which may appear here and there throughout the piece. Spence, Encyc. Manuf., I. 518.

sprit³ (sprit), v. i. [A corruption of split, simulating split¹.] To split. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] sprite¹ (sprit), n. [Early mod. E. also spright (erroneously conformed to the spelling of light, night, etc.); < ME. sprite, spryte, sprit, spreit, < OF. esprit, esprit, F. esprit = Sp. espíritu = Pg. espirito = It. spirito, spirito, spirit, < L. spiritus, spirit: see spirit. Doublet of spirit.] 1. The breath; the vital principle; the spirit.

I thus beheld the king of equal age
Yield up the sprite with wounds so cruelly.

Surrey, Æneid, II.

2. A disembodied soul; a ghost; a shade.

Thy haire vpon thy head doth stand vpright,
As if thou hadst been haunted with a sprite.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 102.

3. An elf; a fairy; a goblin.

Of these am I, who thy protection claim,
A watchful sprite, and Ariel is my name.
Pope, R. of the L., I. 106.

4. The faculty of thought and feeling; the wit; the mind.

When the frantic fitt inflam'd his spright.
His force was valua. Spenser, F. Q., II. iv. 7.
5t. Frame of mind; mood; humor; spirits:
sometimes in the plural.
With weary sprite he stretcht him up, and thus he told his plaint. Surrey, Complaint of a Dying Lover.
Come, sisters, cheer we up his sprites.
Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1. 127.

Holy Spritet. Same as Holy Spirit (which see, under spirit).
sprite¹ (sprīt), v. t. [*< sprite*¹, n.] To haunt,
as a sprite.

I am sprited with a fool. Shak., Cymbeline, II. 3. 144.
sprite², n. [Also spright; a var. form of *sprit*¹.] A short arrow intended to be fired from a musket.

We had in use at one time for sea-fight short arrows, which they called sprights, without any other heads save wood sharpened; which were discharged out of muskets, and would pierce through the sides of ships where a bullet would not. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 704.

sprite³ (sprīt), n. [A corruption of *spite*², prop.
spright*, a var. of speight: see speight.] The green woodpecker, Geococcyx viridis. Also wood-spite, wood-spake. See cut under popinjay.
[Prov. Eng.]

sprited (sprīt'ed), a. [Early mod. E. spright-ed; *< sprite*¹ + *-ed*².] Mentally gifted; quick-witted.

A well sprighted man and wise, that by his wisdom wrought . . . well. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 75.

spriteful, spritefully, etc. See sprightly, etc.

spriteliness, spritely. See sprightliness, etc.

spriting (sprīt'ing), n. Same as spriting.

spritishtly (sprīt'ish-ly), adv. [*< spritish (*< sprite*¹ + *-ish*¹ + *-ly*²).] In the manner of a sprite or an elf; hence, mischievously; impishly. G. Harvey, Four Letters.

spritsail (sprīt'sāl), n. Naut.: (a) A sail exsprittail (sprīt'tāl), n. The pintail duck, Dafila acuta. Also spreetail. [Local, U. S.]

sprittle (sprīt'l), v. t. Same as sprutle.

spritty (sprīt'i), a. [Also (Sc.) sprithy; *< sprit*²
+ *-y*¹.] Abounding in sprits or sprats (rushes).
[Scotch.]

His dead master . . . was lying in a little sprithy hollow. Blackwood's Mag., XIII. 319.

sprocket (sprōk'et), n. [Origin obscure.] 1.
One of a series of projections in a grooved recess round the lower part of a ship's capstan, by which the chain-cable is grasped while heaving up anchor.—
2. One of the projections on a sprocket-wheel which engage the chain.

sprocket-wheel (sprōk'et-hvēl), n. [< sprocket + wheel.] In mach., a wheel upon which are radial projections that engage the links of a chain passing over it.

sprong¹. An old preterit of spring.

Sprocket-wheel.

sprong² (sprōng), n. [Appar. a var. of *prong*².]

1. A prong of a fork, etc.—2. The stump of a tree or a tooth. [Prov. Eng. in both uses.]

sprong³ (sprōng), n. [Cf. sprug, *sprig*³.] The sparrow, Passer domesticus. [Prov. Eng.]

Spruce, Prussia, was not only used in the phrase Spruce leather, or Pruce leather, but also in connection with fashionable apparel ("appar-reyled after the manner of Prussia or Spruce," Hall, Henry VIII., an. 1), and also allusively, somewhat like Cockayne, as a land of luxury ("He shall lue in the land of Spruce, milke and hony flowing into his mouth sleeping"—Chapman, "Masque of Middle Temple and Lincoln's Inn"). Hence prob. the adj. *spruce*². Cf.
*spruce*².] Prussian leather. Compare Pruce.

spruce² (sprōs), a. [Sc. also sprush; prob. an extended use of *spruce*¹, in allusion to fashionable apparel: see *spruce*¹. This adjective cannot be derived, as some attempt to derive it, from ME. prou, preus, < OF. proz, F. preux, brave, etc. (see *prou*²), or from E. dial. *sprug*¹ or sprack.] 1. Smart in dress and appearance; affecting neatness or dapperness, especially in dress; trim; hence often, with a depreciatory force, dandified; smug.

Now, my spruce companions, is all ready, and all things neat? Shak., T. of the S., iv. 1. 116.

Be not in so neat and spruce array

As if thou mean'st to make it holiday.

dyish.

spruce² (sprōs), v.; pret. and pp. spruced, ppr.
sprucing. [*< spruce*², a.] I. trans. 1. To make spruce; trim or dress so as to present a smart appearance: sometimes followed by up.

Salmacis would not be seen of Hermaphroditus till she had spruced up her self first. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 335.

2. To brown, as the crust of bread, by heating the oven too much. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. To become spruce; assume or affect an air of smartness in dress: often followed by up. [Chiefly colloq.]

But two or three years after, all of a sudden, Dench, he seemed to kind o' spruce up and have a deal o' money to spend. H. B. Stone, Oldtown, p. 193.

spruce³ (sprōs), n. [An abbr. of spruce-fir.]
A coniferous tree of the genus Picea; a spruce-fir. The species are handsome evergreens of a conical habit, often of great economic worth. Some related trees are also called spruce. See specific names below.

Brussels Sprouts (Brassica oleracea, var. gemmyfera).

For masts, &c., those [firs] of Prussia which we call spruce and Norway are the best. Etelyn, Sylva, I. xlii. § 2.

Black spruce, Picea nigra, a species of spruce growing 50 or 60 feet high, found through British America, the northern United States, and in the Alleghanies to North Carolina. Its light soft wood is largely made into lumber, and is used in construction, in ship-building, for piles, etc. An essence of spruce is obtained from its branches, used in making spruce-beer. — Blue spruce. Same as white spruce (c). — Double spruce, the black spruce. — Douglas spruce, Pseudotsuga Douglasii. See Pseudotsuga, and Oregon pine (under pine). — Essence of spruce, a thick liquid with a bitterish acidulous astringent taste, obtained by boiling and evaporation from the young branches of the Norway spruce, the black spruce, and perhaps other species. It is used in making spruce-beer. — Hemlock spruce. See hemlock-spruce. — Himalayan or Indian spruce, Picea Morinda, of the temperate Himalayas and Afghanistan, a tree 150 feet high, affording a pale straight-grained timber, durable only under shelter. — New Zealand spruce, the imou-pine, or red pine, Dacrydium cupressinum, a beautiful tree with long weeping branches. From the young growth Captain Cook made an antiscorbutic spruce-beer. See imou-pine. — Norway spruce, Picea excelsa, a spruce of middle and northern Europe and northern Asia. It attains a height of 150 feet, forms extensive forests, endures severe cold, and on mountains reaches an elevation of 4,500 feet. Its tough and elastic wood is the white deal of Europe, excellent for building, furniture, masts, spars, etc. It is the source of Burgundy pitch. See pitch. — Oil of spruce, oil of hemlock. — Red spruce, a stunted variety (P. rubra) of the black spruce, growing in swamps. — Single spruce. Same as white spruce (a). — Spruce bud-louse, an aphid of the subfamily Chermesinae, Adelges abieticola, which deforms the end-shoots of the spruce in the United States, producing large swellings sometimes mistaken for the natural cones. In Europe A. coccineus and A. strabulobius have the same habit. — Spruce bud-worm, the larva of a tortricid moth, as Tortrix fumiferana, which eats the end-buds of the spruce in northeastern parts of the United States, especially in Maine. Other spruce bud-worms are the reddish-yellow, Steganopteryx ratzeburgiana; the black-headed, Teras varians; and the red, Gelechia obliquistrigella. — Spruce cone-worm, the larva of a phycid moth, Pinipsecta reticulata, which bores the fresh young cones of spruces in the United States. — Spruce leaf-hopper, an oblong shining-black leaf-hopper, Athyas abietis, which punctures spruce-needles in May and June in the United States. — Spruce plume-moth, Oxyptilus nigrocostatus. Its larva feeds on spruce, and it is the only member of the Pterophoridae known to infest any conifer. — Spruce saw-fly, a common saw-fly, Lophyrus abietis, whose pale-green larva defoliate spruce, fir, pine, and cedar in the United States, but especially spruce. — Spruce timber-beetle, Xyloterus bivitatus, the most injurious of several scolytids which attack the spruce in the United States. Others are Xyloterus (or Xyleborus) caelatus, Crypturgus atomus, Pityophthorus materiarius, and Hylurgops pinifex. — Tideland spruce, Picea Sitchenis, a spruce found from Alaska to California near the coast, best developed near the mouth of the Columbia river, where for 50 miles in each direction it forms a forest-belt 10 or 15 miles wide. It grows from 140 to 180 feet high, and furnishes an important light, soft, and straight-grained timber, largely manufactured into lumber, and used for construction, inside finish, cooperage, dunnage of vessels, etc. Sargent. — White spruce. (a) Picea alba, the most important timber-tree of subarctic America, extending into northern New England, and at its best in northern Montana. Its timber in commerce is not distinguished from that of the black spruce. Also single spruce. (b) P. engelmannii, the most valuable timber-tree of the central Rocky Mountain region, where it forms extensive forests. Its wood is of a white or pale-yellow color, light and soft, in Colorado affording lumber, fuel, and charcoal. The bark is rich in tannin, which is locally utilized. (c) P. pungens, a rare and local mountain species of the western United States. Also called blue spruce, Colorado blue spruce. Sargent.

spruce⁴ (sprös), n. An abbreviation of spruce-beer. [Colloq.]

"Come, friend," said Hawk-eye, drawing out a keg from beneath a cover of leaves, . . . "try a little spruce; 'twill . . . quicken the life in your bosom."

Branchlet, with Cone, of Norway Spruce (Picea excelsa).

spruce-beer (sprös'bär), n. [A partial translation and accommodation (as if 'beer of spruce' or spruce-fir (< spruce³ + beer¹), or as if Spruce beer, i. e. 'beer of Spruce' or Prussia (< Spruce, or Pruce, Prussia (see spruce¹), + beer¹)) of G. sprossen-bier, lit. 'sprouts-beer,' obtained from the young sprouts of the black spruce-fir, < sprossen, pl. of spross, a sprout (= E. sprout), + bier = E. beer: see sprout¹ and beer¹.] A beer made from the leaves and small branches of the spruce-fir, or from the essence of spruce, boiled with sugar or molasses, and fermented with yeast. There are two kinds, the brown and the white, of which the latter is considered the better, as being made with white sugar instead of molasses. Spruce-beer is an agreeable and wholesome beverage, and is useful as an antiscorbutic.

spruce-duff (sprös'duf), n. Duff formed by spruce-trees. See duff, 3. [Local, U. S.]

The soil . . . consisted of from two to four feet of what is known among the woodsmen of northern New York as spruce-duff, which is composed of rotten spruce-trees, cones, needles, etc. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 289.

spruce-fir (sprös'fēr), n. [A partial translation and accommodation (as if 'fir of Spruce' or Prussia, < Spruce, or Pruce, Prussia, + fir¹: see spruce³, and the quot.) of the G. sprossen-fichte, the spruce-pine or -fir, whose sprouts furnish the beer called spruce-beer, < sprossen, pl. of spross, a sprout, + fichte, pine, fir. Cf. spruce-beer.] Same as spruce³: applied somewhat specifically to the Norway spruce.

spruce-grouse (sprös'grous), n. The Canada grouse. See grouse, and cut under Canace.

spruce-gum (sprös'gum), n. A resinous exudation from the balsam-fir, Abies balsamea, used as a masticatory.

spruce-leather (sprös'leth'er), n. Same as spruce¹.

sprucely (sprös'li), adv. In a spruce manner; smartly; trimly; smugly.

spruceness (sprös'nes), n. The state or character of being spruce; smartness of appearance or dress.

spruce-ocher (sprös'ō'kēr), n. [Appar. < Spruce, Prussia (see spruce¹), + ocher.] Brown or yellow ocher.

spruce-partridge (sprös'pär'trij), n. The spotted or Canada grouse, Canace or Dendragapus canadensis: so called in New England, Canada, etc., in distinction from the ruffed grouse, there known as the partridge, and because the bird is highly characteristic of the coniferous woods. See cut under Canace.

spruce-pine (sprös'pin), n. See *pine*¹. sprucify (sprös'si-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. sprucified, ppr. sprucifying. [*Spruce*² + -i-fy.] To make spruce or fine; smarten. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, iii. 37. (Davies.) [Rare.]

sprue¹ (sprö), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. In casting metal, one of the passages leading from the "skimming-gate" to the mold; also, the metal which fills the sprue or sprue-gate after solidification: same as dead-head, 1 (a). Also called sprue-gate. — 2. A piece of metal or wood used by a molder in making the ingate through the sand. E. H. Knight.

sprue², n. See sprew. sprue-hole (sprö'höl), n. In casting metal, the gate, ingate, or pouring-hole.

sprug¹ (sprug), v.; pret. and pp. sprugged, ppr. sprugging. [Cf. *sprag*³, sprack.] I. trans. To make smart.

II. intrans. To dress neatly; generally with up. [Prov. Eng.]

sprug² (sprug), n. [Cf. *sprig*², sprong, and spug, a sparrow; origin uncertain.] The sparrow, Passer domesticus. [Scotch and prov. Eng.] sprung (sprung), 1. Preterit and past participle of sprung. — 2. Tipsey; drunk. [Colloq.]

Captain Tuck was borne dead drunk by his reeling troops to the Tavern. Ex-Corporal Whiston with his friends sallied from the store well sprung. S. Judd, Margaret, i. 13.

sprunk¹, n. [Origin obscure. Cf. *sprunt*².] A concubine (Child); a sweetheart.

With fryars and monks, and their fine sprunks, I make my chiefest prey.

The King's Disguise (Child's Ballads, V. 378).

sprunny (sprun'i), a. and n. [Cf. *sprunt*².] I. a. Neat; spruce. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

II. n.; pl. sprunnies (-iz). A sweetheart. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Where, if good Satan lays her on like thee, Whipp'd to some purpose will thy sprunny be.

Collins, Miscellaneous (1762), p. 111.

sprunt¹ (sprunt), v. i. [A var. of sprent: see *sprent*¹, sprint.] 1. To spring up; germinate. — 2. To spring forward or outward.

See; this sweet simpering babe, Dear image of thyself; see! how it sprunts With joy at thy approach!

Somerville, Hobbinol, iii. 393.

To sprunt up, to bristle up; show sudden resentment. [Colloq., U. S.]

sprunt¹ (sprunt), n. [*Sprunt*¹, v. Cf. sprint.] 1. A leap; a spring; a convulsive struggle. — 2. A steep ascent in a road. [Prov. Eng.] —

St. Anything short and not easily bent, as a stiff curl.

"This sprunt its pertness sure will lose

When laid," said he, "to soak in ooze."

Congreve, An Impossible Thing.

sprunt² (sprunt), a. [Cf. ME. sprind, < AS. sprind, agile; cf. also *sprint*¹.] Active; vigorous; strong; lively; brisk. E. Phillips, 1706. spruntly (sprunt'li), adv. 1. Vigorously; youthfully; like a young man. Imp. Dict. — 2. Neatly; gaily; bravely.

How do I look to-day? am I not drest

Spruntly!

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, iv. 1.

sprusadot, n. [Spruce, with Spanish-seeming term. -ado.] A spruce fellow; a dandy.

The answer of that sprusado to a judge in this Kingdom, a rigid censor of men's habits; who, seeing a neat finical divine come before him in a cloak lined through with plush, encountered him.

Comm. on Chaucer, p. 19 (Todd's Johnson), 1665.

sprush (sprush), a. and v. A Scotch form of *spruce*².

spruttle (sprut'l), v. t. [Also sprittle; freq. of sprout: see sprout, and cf. spurtle.] To spurt; sprinkle. [Prov. Eng.]

spry (sprī), a. [Also obs. or dial. sprey; < Sw. dial. spryg, very active, skittish; akin to Sw. dial. språg, språk, spirited, mettlesome; see sprack.] Active, as in leaping or running; nimble; vigorous; lively. [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

The lady liked our Margaret very well. "She was so feat, and spry, and knowin', and good-natered," she said, "she could be made of some use to somebody."

S. Judd, Margaret, i. 4.

spt. An abbreviation of spiritus, spirit.

spud (spud), n. [Spruce, < ME. spudde, knife; perhaps < Dan. spyd, a spear: see *spit*¹. Prob. not connected with spade.] 1. A stout knife or dagger.

The one within the lists of the amphitheatre . . . with a spud or dagger was wounded almost to death.

Holland, tr. of Ammianus Marcellinus (1600). (Nares.)

2. A small spade, or a spade having a small blade, with a handle of any length; a small cutting-blade fixed in the axis of its handle, somewhat like a chisel with a very long handle, for cutting the roots of weeds without stooping.

Every day, when I walk in my own little literary garden-plot, I spy some [weeds], and should like to have a spud, and root them out.

Thackeray, De Finibus.

3. A spade-shaped tool for recovering lost or broken tools in a tube-well. E. H. Knight. —

4. A nail driven into the timbers of a drift or shaft, or fastened in some other way, so as to mark a surveying-station. [Pennsylvania anthracite region.] — 5. spumiferous (spū-mif'e-rus), a. [= Pg. espumifero = It. spumifero, < L. spumifer, frothing, foaming, < spuma, froth, foam, + ferre = E. bear¹.] Producing foam. Imp. Dict.

spuminess (spū'mi-nes), n. [Cf. spumy + -ness.] The state or character of being spumy. Bailey.

spumous (spū'mus), a. [= F. spumeux = Pr. spumos = Sp. Pg. espumoso = It. spumoso, < L. spumousus, full of froth or foam, < spuma, froth, foam; see spume.] Consisting of froth or scum; foamy. Arbuthnot.

spumy (spū'mi), a. [Cf. spume + -y.] Foamy; covered with foam.

The Tiber now their spumy keels divide.
Brooke, Constantia.

Under the black cliff's spumy base.
Cotton (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 217).

The spumy waves proclaim the wat'ry war. Dryden.

spun (spun). Preterit and past participle of spin.

spungot, spungert, etc. Obsolete spellings of sponge, etc.

spunk (spungk), n. [Formerly also sponk; < Ir. Gael. spunc, sponge, spongy wood, touchwood, tinder, < L. spongia, a sponge, < Gr. σπγγιά, σπγγος, a sponge; see sponge.] 1. Touchwood; tinder; a kind of tinder made from a species of fungus; amadou. Also called punk.

Spunk, or touch-wood prepared, might perhaps make it [powder] russet.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., II. 5.

2. A very small fire; a fiery spark or small flame; also, a lucifer match. [Scotch.]

Oh for a spunk o' Allan's glee!
Burns, First Epistle to Lapraik.

A spunk o' fire in the red-room.
Scott, Guy Mannering, XI.

3. Mettle; spirit; pluck; obstinate resistance to yielding. [Colloq.]

The Squire has got spunk in him.
Goldenith, She Stoops to Conquer, I. 2.

Parsons is men, like the rest of us, and the doctor had got his spunk up.
H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 67.

spunk (spungk), v. i. [Cf. spunk, n.] To kindle; show a flame or spark: used in phrases.—To spunk out, to come to light; be discovered. [Scotch.]

But what if the thing spunks out?
Noctes Ambrosianæ, Sept., 1832.

To spunk up, to show spirit, energy, or obstinate endurance amid difficulties. [Colloq., U. S.]

spunkie (spung'ki), n. [Cf. spunk + dim. -ie.] 1. A small fire; a spark.—2. The ignis fatuus, or will-o'-the-wisp.—3. A person of a fiery or irritable temper. [Scotch in all uses.]

spunky (spung'ki), a. [Cf. spunk + -y.] 1. Showing a small fire or spark. [Scotch.]—2. Haunted: noting a place supposed to be haunted from the frequent appearance of the ignis fatuus. [Scotch.]—3. Having spunk, fire, spirit, or obstinacy; spirited; unwilling to give up, or to acknowledge one's self beaten. [Colloq.]

Erskine, a spunkie Norland billie.
Burns, Prayer to the Scotch Representatives.

There are grave dons, too, in more than one college, who think they are grown again as young and spunky as undergraduates.

Landor, Imag. Conv., William Penn and Lord Peterborough.

spun-out (spun'out), a. Lengthened; unduly protracted.

We can pardon a few awkward or tedious phrases, a few spun-out passages.
Grove, Dict. Music, I. 645.

spur (spër), n. [Cf. ME. spure, spore, < AS. spora, a spur (hand-spora, 'hand-spur', talon), = MD. spore, D. spoor, a spur, also a track, = MLG. spore = OHG. sporo, MHG. spore, spor, G. sporn = Icel. spori = Sw. sporre = Dan. spore, spur (cf. OF. esporon, esperon, F. éperon = Pr. espero = OSP. esporon, Sp. espolon = Pg. esporão = It. sporon, sporne (> E. obs. sporon), also without the suffix, OSP. espuera, Sp. espuela = Pg. espora, a spur, < OHG. sporo, acc. sporon); orig. 'kicker', from its use on the heel; from the root of spurn, v. Cf. *speer*¹, spoor, sporon, from the same ult. root.] 1. A pointed instrument worn on the heel by a horseman to goad the horse. The earliest medieval spurs were without rowels (see prick-spur, goad-spur); another form had a ball from which a short point projected, and was called the ball-and-spoke spur. The rowel was first introduced in the thirteenth century, but was not common until the beginning of the fourteenth. The spurs of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are sometimes of extraordinary length on account of the projection of the steel flanchers which kept the heel far from the horse's side. See rowel-spur (with cut), also cut under prick-spur.

Forms of Spurs.
a, knight's spur (12th or 13th century); b, brass spur (Henry IV.); c, long-necked rowel-spur (Edward IV.); d, long-necked brass spur (Henry VII.); e, steel spur (Henry VIII.).

Wyth-oute spores other spere spakliche he loked.
Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 12.

Mount thou my horse, and hide thy spurs in him,
Till he have brought thee up to yonder troops,
And here again. Shak., J. C., v. 8. 15.

2. Anything which goads, impels, or urges to action; incitement; instigation; incentive; stimulus: used in this sense in the phrase on or upon the spur of the moment—that is, on a momentary impulse; suddenly; hastily; impromptu.

What need we any spur but our own cause
To prick us to redress? Shak., J. C., II. 1. 123.

If you were my counsel, you would not advise me to answer upon the spur of the moment to a charge which the basest of mankind seem ready to establish by perjury.
Scott, Guy Mannering, Ivi.

3. Some projecting thing more or less closely resembling a horseman's spur in form or position. (a) A root of a tree; a large lateral root.

By the spurs pluck'd up
The pine and cedar. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 47.
Yet is thy root sincere, sound as the rock,
A quarry of stout spurs and knotted fangs.
Cowper, Yardley Oak, I. 117.

(b) pl. Short small twigs projecting a few inches from the trunk. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] (c) A snag; a spine; spee cifically, in herpet.: (1) An anal spur. (2) A calcar of some frogs. (d) In entom., a spine or stiff bristle on the leg. (e) In ornith.: (1) A horny modification of the integument of a bird's foot, forming an outgrowth of the nature of a claw, usually sharp-pointed and supported on a bony core, and used as a weapon of offense and defense; a calcar. Such a spur differs from a claw mainly in not ending a digit, but being an offset from the side of the metatarsus; it is also characteristic of though not confined to the male, and is therefore a secondary sexual character. It is familiar as occurring on the shank of the domestic cock and other gallinaceous birds, and is sometimes double or treble, as in Pavo bicinctatus and in the genera Galloperdix, Ithaginis, and Polyplectron. See cuts under calcarate, Galloperdix, Ithaginis, pea-fowl, Polyplectron, Rasores, and tarsometatarsus. (2) A similar horny outgrowth on the pinion-bone of the wing in various birds, resembling a claw, but differing in being a lateral offset not terminating a digit. It occurs in certain geese, plovers, pigeons, and juncos, and is double in the screamer. See cuts under jacana, Palamedea, and spur-winged. (f) In sporting, a gaff, or sharp piercing or cutting instrument fastened upon the natural spur of a game-cock in the pit. (g) In mammal, the calcar of some bats. (h) In phys. geog., a ridge or line of elevation subordinate to the main body or crest of a mountain-range; one of the lower divisions of a mountain-mass, when this, as is frequently the case, is divided by valleys or gorges. See mountain-chain.

The ground-plan of the latter massif [Mont Blanc] is one long ridge, which, except at the two extremities, preserves a very uniform direction, and throws out a series of long spurs to the north-west.

Bonney, The Alpine Regions, p. 25.

(i) A climbing-iron used in mounting telegraph-poles and the like. (j) In carp., a brace connecting or strengthening a post and some other part, as a rafter or cross-beam. (k) In arch., any offset from a wall, etc., as a buttress; specifically, the claw or griffe projecting from the torus at each of the angles of the base of early Pointed medieval columns. (l) In bot., a calcar; a slender hollow projection from some part of a flower, as from the calyx of columbine and larkspur and the corolla of violets. It is usually nectariferous, being the nectary (nectarium) of Linnaeus. The term is also rarely applied to a solid spur-like process. See also cuts under nectary, columbine, and Delphinium. (m) In fort., a wall that crosses a part of the rampart and joins it to an anterior work; also, a tower or blockhouse placed in the outworks before the port. (n) In ship-building: (1) A shore or piece of timber extending from the bilgeways, and fayed and bolted to the bottom of the ship on the stocks. (2) A curved piece of timber serving as a half beam to support the deck where a whole beam cannot be placed. (3) A heavy timber extended from a pier or wharf against the side of a ship to prevent the ship from striking against the pier. (o) In hydraul. engin., a wing-dam, or projection built out from a river-bank to deflect the current. (p) On a casting, a fin, or projection of waste metal. (q) A small piece of refractory clay ware with one or more projecting points, used in a kiln to support or separate articles in a saggar during firing, and to prevent the pieces from adhering to the saggar and to each other. Also called still. E. H. Knight.

(r) In an auger, a projecting point on the edge, which makes the circular cut, from which the chip is removed by the lip. E. H. Knight. See cut under auger. (s) The prong on the arms of some forms of patent anchors, for the purpose of catching on the bottom and making the fluke bite or take hold more quickly. See cut under anchor. (t) In printing, a register-point. [Eng.] (u) In anat., the angle at which the arteries leave a cavity or trunk. Dunghison. (v) In mining, a branch of a vein; a feeder or dropper.—Anal spurs. See anal.—Hot o' the spur. See hot.—Order of the Golden Spur, an old order of the papal court, of which the badge was a Maltese cross with rays between the arms, and having a small spur hanging from it. Having sunk into neglect, it was superseded in 1841 by the Order of St. Sylvester.—Scotch spur, in her., a bearing representing a prick-spur without rowel.—Spur-pepper. See Capsicum.—Spur system, in hort., a method of pruning grape-vines in which the ripened wood of the preceding season is cut back close to the old stem or arm, so as to leave spurs bearing one, two, or three buds, the spurs being so selected as to provide for shoots at equal distances. The growing shoots are trained to a position at right angles to the arm, whether this is horizontal or vertical, and are topped after the formation of one, two, or three bunches of grapes upon each.—Spur valerian. See Centranthus.—To win one's spurs, to gain a title to knighthood (because spurs were given as a reward for gallant or valiant action); hence, to establish a title to honorable recognition and reward.—With spur and yard, with whip and spur—that is, at once.

Trusteth wel that I
Wol be hire champion with spore and yerde,
I raughte noght though alle hire foos it herde.
Chaucer, Troilus, II. 1427.

spur (spër), v.; pret. and pp. spurred, ppr. spurring. [Cf. ME. sporen, sperren, sperien, spurien = OHG. sporôn, MHG. sporen, sporn, G. spornen = Sw. sporra = Dan. spore, spur; from the noun. Cf. AS. spyrian, spirian, sperian, etc., track, follow out, E. speer: see *speer*¹.] 1. trans. 1. To prick or rasp with the point or rowel of a spur.

He spurred his horse, and theder toke the way.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), I. 217

s, Spur in the flowers of (1) Impatiens fulva, (2) Tropaeolum Moritzianum, (3) Orchis mascula, and (4) Aloysurus minimus.

He spurred the old horse, and he held him tight.
Kingsley, The Knight's Leap.

2. Figuratively, to urge or incite.

Remember yet, he was first wrong'd, and honour
 Spurr'd him to what he did.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, l. 3.

3. To hasten. [Rare.]

Lovers break not hours,
 Unless it be to come before their time;
 So much they spur their expedition.
Shak., T. G. of V., v. 1. 6.

4. (a) To fasten spurs to, as a horseman's boot, or a solleret. (b) To furnish with spurs, as a rider: as, booted and spurred; to furnish with a spur or gaff, as a game-cock.—5. To prop; support. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. 1. To prick one's horse with the spur; ride in haste.

Now spurs the lated traveller apace
 To gain the timely inn.

Shak., Macbeth, III. 3. 7.

2. Figuratively, to press forward.

Some bold men, though they begin with infinite ignorance and error, yet, by spurring on, refine themselves.
Grew.

spur-blind, a. [Appar. a var. of purbblind, simulating spur.] Purbblind.

Madame, I crave pardon, I am spur-blind, I could scarce see.
Lyly, Sapho and Phao, II. 2.

spur-bunting (spér'bun'ting), n. A spur-heeled bunting; a lark-bunting.

spur-flower (spér'flou'ér), n. A plant of the genus Centranthus.

spur-fowl (spér'foul), n. A gallinaceous bird of the genus Galloperdix. There are several Indian and Ceylonese species. See cut under Galloperdix.

spur-gall (spér'gál), n. A sore or callous and hairless place, as on the side of a horse, caused by use of the spur.

spur-gall (spér'gál), v. t. [< spur-gall, n.] To make a spur-gall on, as a horse.

And yet I beare a burthen like an Asse.
Spur-gall'd and tyrd by launcing Bullingbrooke.
Shak., Rich. II. (folio 1623), v. 5. 94.

spur-gally (spér'gá'li), a. [< spur-gall + -y¹.] Spur-galled; wretched; poor. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

spurge¹ (spérj), v. [< ME. spurgen, spourgen, spourgen, < OF. espurger, espurger = Sp. Pg. expurgar = It. spurgare, < L. expurgare, purge, cleanse: see expurgate, and cf. purge.] I. trans. To purge; cleanse; rid.

Of flies men mow hem weyl spurge.
Rob. of Brunne, Handlyng Synne, l. 10918.

II. intrans. To purge; froth; emit froth; especially, to work and cleanse itself, as ale.

By reason that . . . the ale and byere haue palled, and were nought by cause such ale and biere hathe taken wynde in spurgyn.
Arnold's Chron., p. 85.

spurge² (spérj), n. [< ME. sporgen, spourge, < OF. spurge, espurge, spurge, < OF. espurger, purge: see spurge¹.] A plant of the genus Euphorbia. Several species have special names, chiefly used in books; a few related or similar plants also are called spurge. Exotic species are better known as euphorbias.—Alleghany-mountain spurge. See Pachysandra.—Branched spurge, a rubaceous shrub, Ernodea littoralis, of the sea-shores of the West Indies and Florida, a prostrate smooth plant with four-angled branches, and yellowish flowers sessile in the upper axils.—Cap-spurge, Euphorbia Lathyris, a smooth glaucous herb native in southern Europe and western central Asia, cultivated in gardens, thence sometimes escaping. It is singular in the genus for its opposite leaves, and has a four-rayed, then forking, umbel. Its young fruit is sometimes substituted for capers, and its seeds contain an oil formerly used in medicine. Also wild caper, mole-tree, and myrtle-spurge.—Cypress-spurge, a common garden plant, Euphorbia Cyparissias, with tufted stems and yellowish inflorescence, cultivated for its foliage, which consists of crowded linear leaves suggesting cypress. It is a native of Europe, running wild in the eastern United Flowering Spurge (Euphorbia corollata).

a, a leaf; b, a flower-cluster of five male and one female flower; c, flower-cluster, but younger, showing the cup-like base; d, part of the involucre, showing the gland at its base; e, a male flower; f, the fruit, consisting of three carpels.

States.—Flowering spurge, a conspicuous species, Euphorbia corollata, of eastern North America, a rather slender plant 2 or 3 feet high, with an umbel of about five forks, the rays repeatedly forking into twos or threes. The involucre has five white appendages appearing like petals. The root has properties similar to those of the ipeacac-spurge. Also (with other species) called milk-weed.—Hyssop-spurge, the purple spurge, Euphorbia Peplis, a European maritime species spreading flat on the sand.—Indian tree-spurge. Same as milk-hedge.—Ipecac-spurge, ipecacuanha-spurge, Euphorbia Ipecacuanha, found in the United States from Connecticut to Florida, a plant with many low stems from a long perpendicular root. The root has an active emetic and purgative property, but in large doses tends to produce excessive nausea and purging, and is inferior to true ipeacac.—Irish spurge. See makinboy.—Leafy spurge, Euphorbia Esula, an Old World species resembling the cypress-spurge, but larger, with commonly lanceolate leaves.—Myrtle-spurge. See caper-spurge.—Petty spurge, a low branching European species, Euphorbia Peplis.—Purple spurge. See hyssop-spurge.—Sea-spurge, or seaside spurge, Euphorbia Paralias, of European sea-sands.—Slipper-spurge, the slipper-plant. See Pedicularis.—Spotted spurge, a prostrate American species, Euphorbia maculata, with a dark spot on the leaf; also called milk-purslane. The large spotted spurge is E. Preslii, sometimes called black spurge or purslane. See purslane.—Spurge hawk-moth, a handsome sphinx, Deliphris euphorbiae, whose larva feeds on the sea-spurge; an English collector's name.—Sun-spurge, Euphorbia Helioscopia, an erect annual 6 or 8 inches high, whose flowers follow the sun. Also called cat's-milk, little-good (Scotland), and wartweed or wartwort (Prov. Eng.).—Wood-spurge, Euphorbia amygdaloides, of Europe and western Asia.

spur-gear (spér'gér), n. Same as spur-gearing.

spur-gearing (spér'gér'ing), n. Gearing in Spur-gearing.

which spur-wheels are employed. See gearing, 2.

spurge-creeper (spérj'kré'pér), n. A nettle-creeper: same as nettle-bird.

spurge-flax (spérj'flaks), n. A shrub, Daphne Gnidium, a native of southern Europe: so called from its acrid property and fibrous bark.

spurge-laurel (spérj'lá'rel), n. A laurel-like shrub, Daphne Laureola, of southern and western Europe. It has an acrid property suggesting spurge; its fibrous bark is utilized for paper-making.

spurge-nettle (spérj'net'l), n. A plant, Jatropha urens. See Jatropha.

spurge-olive (spérj'ol'iv), n. The mezereon.

spurgewort (spérj'wért), n. [< late ME. spurge-wort: see spurge² and wort¹.] 1. Any plant of the order Euphorbiaceae. Lindley.—2. The fetid iris, Iris fetidissima.

spurgin (spér'jng), n. [Verbal n. of spurge¹, v.] Purging. B. Jonson, Masque of Queens.

spur-hawk (spér'hák), n. A dialectal form of sparhawk for sparrow-hawk. [Eng.]

spur-heeled (spér'héld), a. In ornith., having a very long straightened hind claw; lark-heeled: specifically noting the coucals or cuckoos of the genus Centropus.

spuriæ (spú'ri-è), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (sc. penæ, feathers) of spurius, spurious: see spurious.] The packet of feathers growing on the bastard wing, winglet, or alula; the bastard quills, composing the alula. See cut under alula.

spurious (spú'ri-us), a. [= Sp. Pg. espurio = It. spurio, < L. spurius, of illegitimate birth, hence in gen. not genuine, false; perhaps akin to Gr. σπυρίων, seed, offspring, < σπείρειν, sow: see spore².] 1. Not legitimate; bastard: as, spurious issue.

Her spurious first-born.

Milton, S. A., l. 391.

2. Not proceeding from the true source or from the source pretended; not being what it pretends or appears to be; not genuine; counterfeit; false; adulterated.

Spurious gems our hopes entice,
 While we scorn the pearl of price.

Cowper, Self-diffidence (trans.).

3. In zool.: (a) False; resembling a part or organ, but not having its function: as, spurious eyes or limbs. (b) Having the functions of an organ, but morphologically different from it: as, the spurious legs, or prolegs, of a caterpillar.

(c) Aborted or changed so that the normal functions no longer exist: as, the spurious or aborted front legs of certain butterflies. (d) Erroneous; incorrectly established: as, a spurious genus or species. See pseudogenus.—4. In bot., false; counterfeit; apparent only.—Spurious Baltimore, the orchard-oriole, Icterus spurius, formerly supposed to be a variety of the Baltimore oriole. Also called bastard Baltimore.—Spurious claw, in entom., same as empodium.—Spurious dissepiment, in bot., a partition in an ovary or pericarp not formed by parts of the carpels, but by an outgrowth commonly from the back of the carpel. See dissepiment.—Spurious hermaphrodites. See hermaphrodite, 1.—Spurious ocellus, a circular spot of color without any well-defined central spot or pupil.—Spurious pareira. See pareira.—Spurious primary, in ornith., the first or outermost primary or remex of a bird's wing which has at least ten primaries and the first one very short, rudimentary, or functionless. Also called spurious quill.—Spurious proposition, rainbow, stemma, etc. See the nouns.—Spurious sarsaparilla. See Hardenbergia.—Spurious vein, in entom., a faintly indicated vein or nervure of the wing, traceable only by a strong reflected light, particularly of certain hymenoptera.—Spurious wing, in ornith., the ala spuria, or bastard wing; the alula. See spuriæ, and cut under alula. [This use of spurious has no reference to the condition of a first primary so called. See above.]—Syn. 2. Spurious, Supposititious, and Counterfeit agree in expressing intent to deceive, except that counterfeit may be used with figurative lightness where no dishonorable purpose is implied. Spurious, not genuine, expresses strong disapprobation of the deception, successful or attempted. Supposititious applies only to that which is substituted for the genuine; it thus expresses a class under the spurious: a supposititious work of Athanasius is not one that is supposed to have been written by him, but one that is palmed off upon the public as being the genuine text of a work that he is known to have written; a supposititious child is a changeling; was the Tichborne claimant the genuine or a supposititious Sir Roger? Counterfeit applies also to a class under the spurious—namely, to that which is made in attempted imitation of something else: as, a counterfeit coin, bank-note, signature. Chatterton's manuscripts were spurious, but not supposititious; as they were not exact imitations of any particular manuscripts of early days, they would hardly be called counterfeit. See factions.

spuriously (spú'ri-us-li), adv. In a spurious manner; counterfeitedly; falsely.

spuriousness (spú'ri-us-nes), n. 1. Illegitimacy; the state of being bastard, or not of legitimate birth: as, spuriousness of issue.—2. The state or quality of being spurious, counterfeit, false, or not genuine: as, the spuriousness of drugs, of coin, or of writings.

spur-leather (spér'leth'ér), n. A strap by which a spur is secured to the foot.

I could eat my very spur-leathers for anger!
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, II. 1.

spur-legged (spér'leg'ed or -legd), a. Having spurs or spines on the legs or feet. The Leptidæ are known as spur-legged flies.

spurless (spér'les), a. [< spur + -less.] Without a spur, in any sense.

spurling (spér'ling), n. A spelling of sparling.

spurling-line (spér'ling-lin), n. Naut.: (a) A line connected with the axis of a wheel by which a telltale or index is made to show the position of the helm. (b) A rope stretched across between the two forward shrouds, having thimbles spliced into it to serve as fair-leadings for the running rigging.

spur-money (spér'mun'i), n. Money exacted for wearing spurs in church. See the quotation.

Our cathedrals (and above all St. Paul's) were, in Jonson's time, frequented by people of all descriptions, who, with a levity scarcely credible, walked up and down the aisles, and transacted business of every kind, during divine service. To expel them was not possible; such, however, was the noise occasioned by the incessant jingling of their spur-rows, that it was found expedient to punish those who approached the body of the church, thus indecently equipped, by a small fine, under the name of spur-money, the exaction of which was committed to the beadles and singing-boys.

Gifford, Note to B. Jonson's Every Man out of his Humour, II. 1.

spurn¹ (spérn), v. [*< ME. spurnen, spornen, < AS. speornan ("spornan, ge-speornan, ge-spornan, spurnan, in Somner, not authenticated), also in comp. æt-speornan, æt-spornan (pret. spearn, pl. spurnon, pp. spornen) = OS. spurnan = OHG. spurnan = Icel. sporna, spyrna, also spærna, kick against, spurn with the feet, = L. spernere, despise; ult. connected with spur.] I. trans. 1. To kick against; kick; drive back or away with the foot.

And Galashin with his fote spurned his body to ground.
Martin (E. E. T. S.), II. 199.

Am I so round with you as you with me,
 That like a football you do spurn me thus?

Shak., C. of E., II. 1. 83.

2. To strike against.

Angulis in hondis schullen beere thee,
 Lest thou spurne thi foot at a stoon.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 43.

3. To reject with disdain; scorn to receive or consort with; treat with contempt.

O how my soul would spurn this ball of clay,
And loathe the dainties of earth's painful pleasure!
Quarles, Emblems, v. 13.

II. intrans. 1. To kick.

I purpose not to spurn against the prick, nor labour to set up that which God pulleth down.

Bp. of Ely, in J. Gairdner's Richard III., iv.

2†. To dash the foot against something; light on something unexpectedly; stumble.

No wight on it sporneth
That erst was nothyng, into nought it torneth.

Dan. spergel), < ML. spergula, spurry; origin obscure.*] A plant of the genus Spergula. The common species is S. arvensis, the corn-spurry, from whose seeds a lamp-oil has sometimes been extracted. Knotted spurry, more properly called knotted pearlwort, is Sagina nodosa. The lawn-spurry (or properly lawn-pearlwort) is Sagina glabra. The sand-spurry is of the genus Spergularia. See Spergula.

Spurrie [F.], spurry, or frank; a Dutch herb and an excellent fodder for cattle.

spur-shell (spér'shel), n. A shell of the genus Imperator (formerly called Calcar): so named from its resemblance to the rowel of a spur. The term extends to some similar trochiform shells. See cut under Imperator.

spur-shore (spér'shór), n. Naut., same as spur, 3 (m) (1).

spurt¹, spirt¹ (spért), v. [Both spellings are in use, spirt being etymologically more correct, and spurt appar. the more common spelling; a transposed form of spirt¹ (like bird¹, bird², transposed forms of bird, bride¹): see spirt¹. The word is prob. confused with spurt², spirt².] I. intrans. 1†. To sprout; shoot.

Shall a few sprays of us, . . .
Our scions, put in wild and savage stock,
Spirt up so suddenly into the clouds,
And overlook their grafters?

Shak., Hen. V., iii. 5. 8.

Did you ever see a fellow so spurted up in a moment? He has got the right ear of the duke, the prince, princess, most of the lords, but all the ladies.

Marston, The Fawne, ii. 1.

2. To gush or issue out suddenly in a stream, as liquor from a cask; rush with sudden force from a confined place in a small jet or stream.

Thus the small jet, which hasty hands unlock,
Spirts in the gardener's eyes who turns the cock.

Pope, Dunciad, ii. 178.

The Prince's blood spirted upon the scarf.

Tennyson, Geraldine.

II. trans. To throw or force out in a jet or stream; squirt; as, to spurt water from the mouth; to spurt liquid from a tube.

With tongue three forked furth spirts fyre.
Stanhurst, Æneid (ed. Arber, p. 59), ii.

Toads are sometimes observed to exclude or spirt out a dark and liquid matter behind.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 13.

spurt¹, spirt¹ (spért), n. [< spurt¹, spirt¹, v. Cf. sprout, spirt¹, spirt¹, n.] 1†. A shoot; a sprout; a bud.

These nuts . . . have in the mids a little chit or spirt.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, xv. 22.

2. A forcible gush of liquid from a confined place; a jet.

Water, dash'd from fishy stalls, shall stain
His hapless coat with spirts of scaly rain.

Gay, Trivia, iii. 106.

3. A brief and sudden outbreak.

A sudden spurt of woman's jealousy.

Tennyson, Merlin and Vivien.

Spur-royal of James I.—British Museum. (Size of the original.)

(for *sprenta) (pret. spratt, for *sprant), start, spring, also sprout, spout, = Sw. spritta, start, startle, = MHG. sprezen, spout, crack; the orig. nasal appearing in sprent, ME. sprenten, bound, leap, and the noun sprint, dial. sprunt, a convulsive struggle, etc.: see sprent, sprint.] To make a short, sudden, and exceptional effort; put forth one's utmost energy for a short time, especially in racing.

Cambridge sprinted desperately in turn, . . . and so they went, fighting every inch of water. C. Reade, Hard Cash, l.

spurt², spirt² (spért), n. [Cf. Icel. sprettr, a spurt, spring, bound, run; from the verb. Cf. spurt¹, spirt¹.] 1. A short, sudden, extraordinary effort for an emergency; a special exertion of one's self for a short distance or space of time, as in running, rowing, etc.: as, by a fine spurt he obtained the lead.

The long, steady sweep of the so-called paddle tried him almost as much as the breathless strain of the spurt.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, I. vi.

In the race of fame, there are a score capable of brilliant spurts for one who comes in winner after a steady pull with wind and muscle to spare.

Lovell, Study Windows, p. 281.

2†. A short period; a brief interval of time.

spur-tree (spér'trê), n. A West Indian shrub or small tree, Petitia Domingensis. Also called yellow fiddlewood.

spurway (spér'wâ), n. A horse-path; a narrow way; a bridle-road; a way for a single beast. [Prov. Eng.] spur-whang (spér'hwang), n. A spur-leather. Scott, Monastery. [Scotch.] spur-wheel (spér'hwél), n. The common form of cog-wheel, in which the cogs are radial and peripheral, and made to engage corresponding cogs on another wheel. Compare cut under pinion. E. H. Knight.

Spur-wheel.

spurwing (spér'wing), n. A spur-winged bird. Especially—(a) A jacana, or any bird of the family Jacacidae or Pardidae, of which the spur on the wing is a characteristic. See cut under jacana. (b) A spur-winged goose. See cut under Plectropterus. (c) A spur-winged plover. See Chettusia and spur-winged.

spur-winged (spér'wingd), a. Having a horny spur on the pinion, as various birds. It is a weapon of offense and defense. It is sometimes double, as is well shown in the cut under Palamedea. See also cuts under jacana and Plectropterus.—Spur-winged goose, a species of Plectropterus, as P. gambeli.—Spur-winged plovers, those plovers or lapwings, of the family Charadriidae, and of several different genera, in which a spur is developed on the wing (including some species of those genera in which such a spur fails to develop). Wing-spurs are more frequent in this than in any other family of birds (excepting the related Jacacidae or Pardidae). None occur, however, in the true plovers (of the genera Chara- drilus, Agriolites, Eudromia, Squatarola, etc.); they are commonest among those plovers which are related to the lapwing of Europe (Vanellus cristatus, which, however, has none), and which have a hind toe and often wattles on the face. The presence of spurs and wattles is often coincident. South American spur-winged plovers, with hind toe and no wattles, constitute the genus Belonopterus; they are two, the Cayenne and the Chilean lapwings, B. cayennensis and B. chilensis; both are crested. The type of the genus Hoplopterus is the Egyptian spur-winged plover, H. spinosus, with large spurs, a crest, no hind toe, and no wattles; it has when adult the whole crown, chin, throat, breast, flanks, and legs black, and the greater wing-coverts and some other parts white. It inhabits especially northern Africa, abounds in Egypt and Nubia, and extends into parts of Europe and Asia. It is among the birds supposed to have been a basis of the trochilus of the ancients (compare crocodile-bird, micoc, and cut under Pluranius). It is represented in South Africa by the black-backed spurred lapwing, H. speciosus, with large spurs and the top of the head white. The Indian spurred-winged lapwing, H. ventralis, has a black cap, a black patch on the belly in white surroundings, and large spurs. Two South American forms, with spurs, but no wattles, crest, or hind toe are the Peruvian bronze-winged lapwing, H. resplendens, and the little white-winged, H. cayennensis or stotatus, if the term cayennensis be thought too near cayennensis: each of these has been made the basis of a different generic name. In the type of the genus Chettusia, C. gregaria (see cut under Chettusia), and several related species, a hind toe is present, and neither spurs nor wattles are developed; but the name has been used to cover various species with wattles and spurs, more properly separated under the term Lobiraniellus. In this group it is the rule that large wattles are associated with well-developed spurs, for in those species which have very small wattles the spurs are almost or quite obsolete. Variations in these respects, and in the presence or absence of the hind toe, have caused the erection of other genera. (See Sarcophorus, Xiphiropterus.) Five of the best-marked species of Lobiraniellus proper, with large spurs, large wattles, and a hind toe, are the following: L. senegalensis, of the Ethiopian region north of the equator; L. lateralis, of South Africa; L. cucullatus, of Java, Sumatra, etc.; L. personatus, of northern Australia, New Guinea, and some other islands; and L. lobatus, of eastern Australia from Rockingham Bay to Tasmania (see cut under wattled).

spurwort (spér'wért), n. [< spur + wort]. The field-madder, Sherardia arvensis: so called from its whorls of leaves, likened to the rowel of a spur.

Thus sourly wall'd he, sputt'ring dirt and gore;
A burst of laughter echo'd through the shore.
Pope, Iliad, xxiii. 921.

2. To emit in small particles or amounts with slight explosions: as, the candle sputters smoke; a green stick sputters out steam.—3. To utter rapidly and with indistinctness; jabber.

In the midst of carresses . . . to sputter out the basest accusations!
Swift.

sputter (sput'er), n. [< sputter, v.] 1. The act of sputtering.—2. That which is thrown off or ejected in sputtering.

She pouted out her blubber-lips, as if to bellows up wind and sputter into her horse-nostrils.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. vii. (Davies.)

3. The noise made by a person who or a thing which sputters; hence, bustle; ado; excited talk; squabble.

What a deal of Pother and Sputter here is, between my Mistress and Mr. Myrtle, from there Punctilio!

Steele, Conscious Lovers, iv. 1.

sputterer (sput'er-ér), n. One who or that which sputters.

sputum (spü'tum), n.; pl. sputa (-tä). [NL., < L. sputum, that which is spit out, spittle, < spuere, pp. sputus, spit: see spew.] 1. Spit; a salivary discharge from the mouth.—2. In pathol., that which is expectorated or ejected from the lungs: used also in the plural, in designation of the individual masses.—Eruginous sputa, very green expectoration.—Globular sputa, nummular sputa.—Rusty sputa, sputa tinged with blood, and characteristic of some stages of pneumonia.—Sputum coctum, purulent, loose sputum, forming itself into masses, as of the later stages of bronchitis.—Sputum crudum, scant, tenacious, mucous sputum, as of the early stage of bronchitis.

spy (spi), v.; pret. and pp. spied, ppr. spying. [< ME. spyen, spien, by apheresis from espieren, espieren, < OF. espier = It. spiare = MD. spien, < OHG. spehōn, MHG. spehen, G. spähen = Ice. speja, spēja, watch, observe, spy, = L. specere, look, = Gr. σκέπτεσθαι, look, = Skt. √ spaç, √ paç, see. Walpole, To Mann, July 25, 1756. (Davies.)

3. Unfedged, newly hatched, or not yet having attained the full growth, as a dove or a pigeon.

Why must old pigeons, and they stale, be drest,
When there's so many squab ones in the nest?
W. King, The Old Cheese.

Hence—4. Shy, as from extreme youth; coy.

Your demure ladies that are so squob in company are devils in a corner.

N. Lee, Princess of Cleve, ill. 1. (Encyc. Dict.)

II. n. 1. A young animal in its earliest period; a young bear or bird before the hair or feathers appear. (a) Specifically, a young unfledged pigeon or dove. A young pigeon is properly a squab as long as it sits in the nest; as soon as it can utter its Squabs of Domestic Pigeon.

querulous cries for food it becomes a squealer or squeaker, and so continues as long as it is fed by the parents, which is generally until it is fully fledged; but it continues to be called squab as marketable for its flesh. (b) Figuratively, a young and inexperienced person.

Brit. I warrant you, is he a trim youth?

Mon. We must make him one, Jack; 'tis such a squab as thou never sawest; such a lumpe, we may make what we will of him. Brome, Sparagus Garden, II. 2.

2. A short, fat, flabby person: also used figuratively.

*Gorgonius sits, abdominous and wan,
Like a fat squab upon a Chinese fan.*

Cowper, Progress of Error, I. 218.

We shall then see how the prudes of this world owed all their fine figure only to their being a little straiter laced, and that they were naturally as arrant squabs as those that went more loose.

Pope, To Lady M. W. Montagu, Aug. 18, 1716.

3. (a) A thickly stuffed cushion, especially one for a piece of furniture, as an upholstered chair or sofa, to which it may or may not be attached. Hence—(b) A sofa in which there is no part of the frame visible, and which is stuffed and caught through with strong thread at regular intervals, but so as to be very soft.

Bessie herself lay on a squab, or short sofa, placed under the window.

Mrs. Gaskell, North and South, xlii.

(c) An ottoman.

I have seen a folio writer place himself in an elbow-chair, when the author of duodecimo has, out of a just deference to his superior quality, seated himself upon a squab.

Addison, Spectator, No. 529.

squab² (skwob'), v. t.; pret. and pp. squabbed, ppr. squabbling. [< squab², n.] To stuff thickly and catch through with thread at regular intervals, as a cushion. A button or soft tuft is usually placed in the depressions to hide the stitches. Furniture upholstered in this manner is said to be squabbed.

squabash (skwa-bash'), v. t. [Appar. an arbitrary formation, or an extension of squab¹.] To crush; squash; quash: also used as a noun. [Slang.]

His [Gifford's] satire of the Baviad and Mæviad squabashed, at one blow, a set of coxcombs who might have humbugged the world long enough.

Scott, Diary, Jan. 17, 1827. (Lockhart.)

squabbish (skwob'ish), a. [< squab² + -ish¹.] Thick; fat; heavy.

Diet renders them of a squabbish or lardy habit of body.

Harvey.

squabble (skwob'l), v.; pret. and pp. squabbed, ppr. squabbling. [*< Sw. dial. skvabla, dispute (skrabbel, a dispute), freq. of skvappa, chide, lit. make a splashing, < skvapp, a splash: see swab, swap.] I. intrans. To engage in a noisy quarrel or row; wrangle; quarrel and fight noisily; brawl; scuffle.

Drunk? and speak parrot? and squabble? swagger? swear?

Shak., Othello, II. 3. 279.

We should squabble like Brother and Sister.

Steele, Tender Husband, I. 1.

=Syn. To jangle. See quarrel¹, n.

II. trans. In printing, to disarrange and mix (lines of composed types) when they are standing on their feet.

The letters do not range well, giving an irregular or squabbed appearance to the line.

Science, VIII. 254.

squabble (skwob'l), n. [< Sw. dial. skvabbel, a dispute; from the verb.] A wrangle; a dispute; a brawl; a scuffle; a noisy quarrel.

Pragmatic fools commonly begin the squabble, and crafty knaves reap the benefit.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

This contrariety of humours betwixt my father and my uncle was the source of many a fraternal squabble.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, I. 21.

=Syn. Brawl, Wrangle, etc. See quarrel¹.

squabblor (skwob'lér), n. [< squabble + -er¹.] One who squabbles; a contentious person; a brawler; a noisy disputant.

squabby (skwob'i), a. [< squab² + -y¹.] Thick; resembling a squab; squat.

A French woman is a perfect architect in dress; . . . she never tricks out a squabby Doric shape with Corinthian finery.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 2.

squab-chick (skwob'chik), n. A chick, or young chicken, not fully feathered; a fledgling. [Prov. Eng.]

squab-pie (skwob'pi), n. 1. A pie made of squabs; pigeon-pie.—2. A pie made of fat mutton well peppered and salted, with layers of apple and an onion or two. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

Cornwall squab-pye, and Devon white-pot brings;

And Leicester beans and bacon, food of kings!

W. King, Art of Cookery, I. 165.

squacco (skwak'ō), n. [A native name, prob. imitative (cf. quack¹, quail³).] A small rail-like heron of Europe, Asia, and Africa, Ardea or Ardeola comata, ralloides, castanea, or squaiotta, of a white color, much varied with chestnut or russet-brown and black. The head is crested, with six long black and white plumes; the bill is cobalt-blue, Squacco (Ardeola comata).

tipped with black; the lores are emerald-green; the feet flesh-colored, with yellow soles and black claws; and the irides pale-yellow. The squacco nests in heronries, usually on a tree, and lays four to six greenish-blue eggs. It is rare in Europe north of the Mediterranean basin, but common in most parts of Africa, and extends into a small part of Asia.

squad¹ (skwod), n. [(OF. vernacular esquarre, esquare, > ME. square < OF. esquadre, escadre, F. escadre = Sp. escuadra = Pg. esquadra, < It. squadra, a squad, squadron, square: see square¹, and cf. squadron.] 1. Milit., any small number of men assembled, as for drill, inspection, or duty.—2. Any small party or group of persons: as, a squad of navvies; a set of people in general: usually somewhat contemptuous.—Awkward squad, a body of recruits not yet competent, by their knowledge of drill and the manual of arms, to take their place in the regimental line.

squad¹ (skwod), v. t.; pret. and pp. squadded, ppr. squadding. [< squad¹, n.] To draw up in a squad.

Squad your men, and form up on the road.

Lever, Charles O'Malley, lxxxvi. (Encyc. Dict.)

squad² (skwod), n. [Origin obscure; perhaps a dial. var. of shode, ult. < AS. scēdan, scādan, separate: see shode.] 1. Soft, slimy mud. [Prov. Eng.]-2. In mining, loose ore of tin mixed with earth. [Cornish.]

squaddy (skwod'i), a. [A var. of squatty.] Squabby. [Old Eng. and U. S.]

A fatte squaddy monke that had been well fedde in some cloyster.

Greene, News both from Heaven and Hell (1593). (Nares.)

I had hardly got seated when in came a great, stout, fat, squaddy woman.

Major Downing, May-Day. (Bartlett.)

squadron (skwod'ron), n. [= D. escadron = Dan. eskadron, < OF. esquadron, F. escadron = Sp. escuadra = Pg. escuadrão (= G. schwadrone = Sw. squadron, < It. squadrone, a squadron, aug. of squadra, a squad, a square: see squad¹, square¹.] 1. A square.

Six dayes journey from Bezenerge is the place where they get Diamonds; . . . it is a great place, compassed with a wall, and . . . they sell the earth within the wall for so much a squadron, and the limits are set how deepe or how low they shall digge. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 221.

2. A body of soldiers drawn up in a square, or in regular array, as for battle; specifically, in modern armies, the principal division of a regiment of cavalry. This corresponds more or less closely to a company in the infantry, and consists of two troops, each commanded by a captain. The actual strength of a squadron varies from 120 to 200 men.

The Ordovices, to welcome the new General, had hewn in peeces a whole Squadron of Horse.

Milton, Hist. Eng., II.

3. A division of a fleet; a detachment of ships of war employed on a particular service or station, and under the command of a flag-officer.—4. Generally, any ranked and orderly body or group.—5. In early New England records (1636), one of four divisions of town land, probably in the first instance a square. The records show that squadron was used later in other senses: (a) A division of a town for highway care.

Agreed upon by the selectmen for the . . . calling out of their men to work, that is within their several squadrons.

Town Records, Groton, Mass., 1671.

(b) A school district.

Voted and chose a committee of seven men to apportion the school in six societies or squadrons, . . . taking the northwesterly corner for one squadron.

Town Records, Marlborough, Mass., 1749.

Sometimes spelled squadrant.

squadron (skwod'ron), v. t. [< squadron, n.] 1. To form into squadrons, as a body of soldiers. Hence—2. To form in order; array.

They gladly hither haste, and by a quire

Of squadron'd angels hear his carols sung.

Milton, P. L., xii. 367.

squail, squale (skwāl), n. [Also scale; perhaps a dial. var. of skail, in pl. skails, formerly skayles, a var. of kail²: see kail² and skayles.] 1. A disk or counter used in the game of squails.

Urge, towards the table's centre,

With unerring hand, the squail.

C. S. Calverley, There Stands a City.

2. pl. A game in which disks or counters are driven by snapping them from the edge of a round board or table at a mark in the center.—3. pl. Ninepins. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

squail, squale (skwāl), v. [< squail, n.] I. intrans. To throw a stick, loaded stick, disk, flat stone, or other object at a mark: often applied to the throwing of sticks at cocks or geese on Shrove Tuesday, a sport formerly popular in England. Grose. [Prov. Eng. and New Eng.]

II. trans. To aim at, throw at, or pelt with sticks or other missiles.

"Squailing a goose before his door, and tossing dogs and cats on Shrove Tuesday" (Mr. Hunt's "Bristol"). The allusion is to the republican mayor of the city in 1651.

N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 169.

squail-board (skwāl'bōrd), n. The round board upon which the game of squails is played.

squaller (skwāl'ér), n. A kind of throwing-stick, an improvement on that used formerly in squailing cocks or geese.

Armed with squallers, an ingenious instrument composed of a short stick of plant cane and a leaded knob, to drive the harmless little squirrel from tree to tree, and lay it a victim at the feet of a successful shot.

Daily Telegraph, Nov. 30, 1881. (Encyc. Dict.)

squaimoust, a. See squeamoust.

squaint, n. An obsolete dialectal form of swain.

squalder (skwol'dér), n. A kind of jelly-fish. See the quotation.

I have oftentimes mett with two other entitles which seeme to bee of a congenerous substance with the aforementioned gellies, both of them to bee found in the salt water. One is flat and round, as broad as a mans palme, or broader, and as thick as the hand, cleare and transparent, convex on one side and somewhat like the gibbous part of the human liver, on the other side concave with a contrivance like a knott in the very middle thereof, but plainly with circular fibers about the verge or edge of it (where it is growne thin) which suffer manifest constriction and dilatation, which doe promote its natation, which is also perceptible, and by which you may discern it to advance towards the shore, or recede from it. About us they are generally called squalders, but are indeed evidently fishes, although not described in any Ichthyology I have yet mett with. Dr. R. Robinson, To Sir T. Browne, Dec. 12, 1659 (in Sir T. Browne's Works, I. 423).

squale, n. and v. See squail.

Squali (skwā'li), n. pl. [NL. (Müller, 1835), pl. of L. squalus, a shark: see Squalus.] In ichth., a section of elasmobranchiate fishes, or selachians, having the gill-slits lateral and plural, five, six, or seven in number; the sharks proper, as distinguished from the Raiæ (rays or skates, with ventral gill-slits) and from the Holocephali (chimeras, with gill-slits a single pair). The name has been used for groups of various extent; it is now generally restricted to the plagiostomous fishes with lateral branchial apertures and the pectoral fins regularly curved backward from the base of insertion. The Squali are divided into about 12 families and many genera, the nomenclature of which is by no means fixed. See Selachii and shark¹, and cuts under selachian and dogfish.

squalid (skwol'id), a. [< L. squalidus, foul, filthy, < squalere, be stiff, rough, or dry (with anything), esp. be stiff or rough from negligence or want of care, be foul; cf. Gr. σκιώδης, be dry (see skelet, skeleton).] 1. Foul; filthy; extremely dirty: as, a squalid beggar; a squalid house.

Uncombed his locks, and squalid his attire.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., l. 539.

2†. Rough; shaggy. [Rare.]

Squalidæ (skwāl'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Squalus + -idæ.] A family of sharks, typified by the genus Squalus, to which various limits have been assigned. By Bonaparte the name was used for all true sharks. By some other writers it has been used instead of Acanthiidae. See dogfish and picked.

squalidly (skwōl'id-li), adv. In a squalid or filthy manner. Imp. Dict.

squalidness (skwōl'id-nes), n. Squalidity. Bailey.

squaliform (skwā'li-fōrm), a. [< L. squalus, a shark, + forma, form.] Of, or having the characters of, the Squali; resembling a shark.

Squalius (skwā'li-us), n. [NL. (Bonaparte, 1837), < L. squalus, a shark. The European dace was at one time called, for no obvious reason, Squalus minor.] A genus of small cyprinoid fishes, many of which are known as dace. The type is the European dace, Cyprinus leuciscus of the Linnean system, now called Squalius leuciscus or Leuciscus vulgaris. Numerous American species fall in this genus, and are loosely known as minnows, shiners, chubs, mullets, etc. See cut under dace.

squall¹ (skwāl), n. [< Sw. squall, a rush of water (squall-regn, a violent shower of rain, a squall) (= Norw. skval, a gushing, rippling, rinse-water; cf. Dan. skyl, also skyl-regn, a violent shower of rain). < skrala, dial. skvala, skråla, gush out, = Norw. skrala, gush out, splash, ripple; also in secondary forms, Norw. skrelja, gush, splash; Norw. skola, wash, gush, = Icel. skola, wash; Icel. skyla = Norw. skylja = Dan. skylle, wash. The word is generally assumed to be connected with *squall*².] A sudden and violent gust of wind, or a succession of such gusts, usually accompanied by rain, snow, or sleet. In a ship's log-book abbreviated q.

A lowering squall obscures the southern sky.
Falconer, Shipwreck, ii. 145.

No gladder does the stranded wreck
See thro' the gray skirts of a lifting squall
The boat that bears the hope of life approach.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

Arched squall, a remarkable squall occurring near the equator, in which a mass of black clouds collects and rapidly rises, forming a vast arch, or ring-shaped bed of cloud. The ring of cloud enlarges, and above it masses of cloud rise higher and higher until they reach the zenith. Then usually, though not invariably, a violent thunder-storm breaks forth, with vivid zigzag lightning, deafening peals of thunder, and torrents of rain, lasting, perhaps, for half an hour. The phenomenon varies in its details in different seas, but occurs most frequently and on the grandest scale in the southern part of the China Sea, the Gulf of Siam, the Sulu Sea, and particularly in the Straits of Malacca.—Black squall, a squall attended with a specially dark cloud.—Bull's-eye squall, a white squall of great violence on the west coast of Africa.—Heavy squall, a squall in which the wind blows with much force.—Line-squall, a squall accompanying the passage of the trough of a V-shaped barometric depression: so named because the squalls form a line coincident with the axis of the trough, which sweeps across the country, broadside on, with the progressive motion of the depression.—Thick squall, a squall in which the rain or snow obscures the view.—To look out for squalls, to be on one's guard; be on the watch against trouble or danger. (Colloq.)—White squall, a whirlwind of small radius arising suddenly in fair weather without the usual formation of clouds. The only indication of its development is the boiling of the sea beneath the current of ascending air around which the rapid gyrations take place, together with a patch of white cloud, generally formed above it at the level of condensation. These are also the conditions of a waterspout, which may or may not be completely formed, according to the energy of the whirl and the amount of vapor in the atmosphere. White squalls are infrequent, and rarely occur outside of the tropics; in general they are dangerous only to sailing vessels and small craft. = Syn. Gale, etc. See *wind*².

squall¹ (skwāl), v. i. [< *squall*¹, n.] To blow a squall: used chiefly impersonally; as, it squalled terribly. [Colloq.]

And the quarter-deck tarpauling
Was shivered in the squalling.
Thackeray, The White Squall.

squall² (skwāl), v. [Early mod. E. also squael; < Icel. skvala, scream, = Sw. dial. skvala, skråla, cry out, chatter, = Dan. (freq.) skvaldre, clamor; cf. Icel. skella (pret. skall), resound, = G. schallen, resound (see scold); cf. Sc. squalloch, skel-loch, cry shrilly, Gael. sgal, howl. Cf. *squall*¹, and see *squall*¹.] 1. intrans. To cry out; scream or cry violently, as a frightened woman or a child in anger or distress: used in contempt or dislike.

You can laugh, and squall, and romp in full security.
Swift, Advice to Servants (General Directions).

"Send that squalling little brat about his business, and do what I bid ye, sir," says the Doctor.
Thackeray, Henry Esmond, iii. 5.

II. trans. To utter in a discordant, screaming tone.

And pray, what are your Town Diversions? To hear a parcel of Italian Eunuchs, like so many Cats, squall out somewhat you don't understand.

Tunbridge Walks, in Ashton's Queen Anne, l. 328.

squall² (skwāl), n. [< *squall*², v.] A harsh cry; a loud and discordant scream; a sound intermediate in character between a squawk and a squeal.

There oft are heard the notes of infant woe,
The short thick sob, loud scream, and shriller squall.
Pope, Imit. of Spenser, The Alley.

squall³ (skwāl), n. [Perhaps a particular use of *squall*².] A baby; pet; minx; girl: used vaguely, in endearment or reproach.

A pretty, beautiful, juicy squall.
Middleton, Michaelmas Term, i. 2.

The rich gull gallant call's her deare and love.
Ducke, lambe, squall, sweet-heart, cony, and his dove.
Taylor's Works (1630).

squally² (skwā'li), a. [Perhaps a dial. var. of *squally*¹.] 1. Having unproductive spots interspersed throughout: said of a field of turnips or corn. [Prov. Eng.].—2. Badly woven; showing knots in the thread or irregularities in the weaving: said of a textile fabric.

squaloid (skwā'lōid), a. [< NL. Squalus + Gr. eidōs, form.] Like a shark of the genus Squalus; selachian or plagiostomous, as a true shark; of or pertaining to the Squalidæ; squaliform.

squalor (skwōl'or or skwā'lōr), n. [< L. squalor, roughness, filth, < squalere, be stiff or rough, as with dirt: see squalid.] Foulness; filthiness; coarseness.

Nastiness, squalor, ugliness, hunger. Burton.

Squalor carceris, in Scots law, the strictness of imprisonment which a creditor is entitled to enforce, in order to compel the debtor to pay the debt, or disclose funds he may have concealed.

Squalus (skwā'lus), n. [NL. (Linneus, 1748), < L. squalus, a kind of sea-fish.] A genus founded by Linneus, including all the sharks and shark-like selachians known to him (15 species in 1766). See Acanthias, and cut under dogfish.

squam (skwam), n. [< Annisquam, a fishing-boat in Massachusetts.] An oilskin hat worn originally by fishermen and deep-water sailors; a cheap yellow sou'wester. [U. S.]

squama (skwā'mā), n.; pl. squamæ (-mē). [NL., < L. squama, a scale: see squame.] 1. In bot., a scale of any sort, usually the homologue of a leaf.—2. In anat. and zool.: (a) A scale, as of the epidermis. (b) A thin, expansive, scale-like part of a bone: as, the squama of the temporal bone (the squamosal); the squama of the occipital bone (the supra-occipital).—3. In ornith., a scale-like feather, as one of those upon a penguin's wing or the throat of a humming-bird. See cut under Squamipinnes.—4. In entom., an elytrium.—Squama frontalis, the vertical part of the frontal bone.—Squama occipitis, the thin expanded part of the occipital bone; the supra-occipital.—Squama temporalis, the thin shell-like part, or the squamous portion, of the temporal bone.

squamaceous (skwā-mā'shius), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + -aceus.] Same as squamous or squamosæ.

Squamata (skwā-mā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. squamatus, scaly: see squamate.] 1. In herpet., the scaly reptiles. (a) An order of Reptilia, established by Oppel in 1811. It was composed of the saurians or lizards (including crocodiles) and snakes or ophidians, divided accordingly into Saurii and Ophidii. Its contents were the modern orders Crocodylia, Lacertilia, and Ophidia, with, however, one foreign element (Amphisbæna). (b) In Merrem's system of classification (1820), same as Oppel's Squamata exclusive of the crocodiles, or Loricata of Merrem. It formed the third order of Pholidota or scaly reptiles, divided into Gradientia, Reptentia, Serpentia, Incedentia, and Preidentia. Also called Lepidosauria, and formerly Saurophidia.

2. In mammal., scaly mammals; a group of the Entomophaga or insectivorous edentates, containing the single family Manidae, the scaly ant-eaters, or pangolins, in which the body is squamated, being covered with horny overlapping scales. The group is now usually ranked as a suborder.

squamate (skwā'māt), a. [< L. squamatus, scaly, < L. squama, a scale: see squame.] 1. In zool., scaly; covered with scales or squamæ; squamose or squamigerous; specifically, of or pertaining to the Squamata, in any sense.—2. In anat., scale-like; forming or formed like a scale; squamous or squamiform: as, a squamate bone; squamate scales of cuticle.—3. In bot., same as squamosæ.

squamated (skwā'mā-ted), a. [< squamate + -ed.] Same as squamate.

squamation (skwā-mā'shon), n. [< squamate + -ion.] In zool., the state or character of being squamate, squamose, or scaly; the collection or formation of scales or squamæ of an animal: as, the squamation of a lizard, snake, or pangolin. Compare desquamation.

squamelliferous (skwam-e-lif'e-rus), a. [< NL. squamella, a little scale, + L. ferre = E. bear.] In bot., furnished with or bearing squamellæ.

Squamifera (skwā-mif'e-rā), n. pl. [NL., < F. Squamifères (De Blainville, 1816), < L. squama, a scale, + ferre = E. bear.] Squamous or scaly reptiles; Reptilia proper, as distinguished from Nudipellifera or Amphibia: also called Ornithoides.

squamiferous (skwā-mif'e-rus), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + ferre = E. bear.] 1. Provided with squamæ or scales; squamate; squamigerous.—2. In bot., bearing scales: as, a squamiferous catkin.

squamiflorous (skwā'mi-flō-rus), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + flos (flor-), flower.] In bot., having flowers like scales; also, having scales bearing flowers, as in the Conifere.

squamiform (skwā'mi-fōrm), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + forma, form.] Having the shape, character, or appearance of a scale; squamate in form or structure; scale-like.

squamigerous (skwā-mij'e-rus), a. [< L. squamiger, scale-bearing, < squama, a scale, + gerere, bear, carry.] Provided with squamæ; squamose; squamiferous.

squamipen (skwā'mi-pen), n. Any fish of the group Squamipinnes or Squamipinnes.

squamipennate (skwā-mi-pen'āt), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + penna, a wing: see pennate.] Having scaly feathers, as a penguin.

Squamipinnes (skwā-mi-pen'ēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. squama, a scale, + penna, a wing, fin: see *pen*².] 1. In ichth., same as Squamipinnes.—2. In ornith., the penguins, or Sphenisci: so called from the scale-like character of the plumage.

[Rare.] Squamipinnes (skwā-mi-pin'ēz), n. pl. [NL. (Cuvier, spelled Squamipinnes): see Squamipinnes.] In ichth.: (a) In Cuvier's system of classification, the sixth family of acanthopterygian fishes: so called because the soft and frequently the spinous parts of their dorsal and anal fins are covered with scales, which render it difficult to distinguish them from the body. The body is generally much compressed; the intestines are long, and the cæca numerous. The group included the families Chetodontidae, Ephippidae, Zanclidae, Scatopha-

Squamipinnes.—Scaly feather from anterior edge of wing of penguin (Aptenodytes longirostris, enlarged 8 times).

gidae, Platacidæ, Paetidae, Pimelepteridæ, Bramidæ, Pempheridæ, and Toxotidæ. (b) In Günther's system, a family of Acanthopterygii perciformes, nearly the same as (a), but without the Zanclidæ, Platacidæ, Psettidæ, Bramidæ, Pempheridæ, and typical Pimelepteridæ.

squamoid (skwā'mōid), a. [< L. squama, a scale, + Gr. eidos, form.] 1. Resembling a squama; squamiform; scale-like.—2. Squamous; scaly; squamate.

squamomandibular (skwā'mō-man-dib'ū-lār), a. [< squamo(us) + mandibular.] Of or pertaining to the squamosal and the mandible, or lower jaw-bone: as, the squamomandibular articulation, characteristic of mammals. In human anatomy this joint is commonly called temporomaxillary.

squamomastoid (skwā-mō-mas'toid), a. [< squamo(us) + mastoid.] Of or pertaining to the squamous and mastoid elements of the temporal bone: as, a squamomastoid ankylosis.

squamoparietal (skwā'mō-pā-rī'e-tāl), a. [< squamo(us) + parietal.] Of or pertaining to the squamosal and parietal bones: as, the squamoparietal suture, shortly called squamous.

squamopetrosal (skwā'mō-pe-trō'sāl), a. [< squamo(us) + petrosal.] Of or pertaining to the squamosal and petrosal elements of the temporal bone: as, squamopetrosal ankylosis.

squamosal (skwā-mō'sāl), a. and n. [< squamosa + -al.] 1. a. Scale-like or squamous: noting only the squamosal. See II.

II. n. In zool. and anat., the squamous division of the temporal bone; the thin, expansive, scale-like element of the compound temporal bone; a membrane-bone, morphologically distinct from other parts of the temporal, filling a gap in the cranial walls, articulating in man and mammals with the lower jaw, in birds and reptiles with the suspensorium (quadrate bone) of the lower jaw, effecting squamous suture with various cranial bones, and forming by its zygomatic process in mammals a part of the zygoma, or jugal bar. It is remarkably expansive in man. See cuts under Acipenser, acrodont, Bale-nidae, craniofacial, Crotalus, Cyododus, Felidae, Gallinae, Ichthyosauria, Ophidia, Phryner, Pythonidae, Rana, and skull.

squamosa (skwā'mōs), a. [< L. squamosus, full of scales, covered with scales, < squama, a scale: see squame.] 1. In bot., scaly; furnished with small appressed scales or squamæ; also, scale-like. Also squamate, squamous.—2. In zool., squamous; squamiferous or squamigerous; covered with scales; scaly; specifically, in entom., covered with minute scales, as the wings of lepidopterous insects; lepidopterous; squamulate.

squamosphenoidal (skwā'mō-sfē-noi'dal), a. [< squamo(us) + sphenoidal.] Pertaining to the squamous part of the temporal bone and the sphenoid bone: as, the squamosphenoidal suture. Also squamosphenoid.

squamotemporal (skwā-mō-tem'pō-rāl), a. [< squamo(us) + temporal.] Squamosal, as a part of the temporal bone. Owen.

squamotympanic (skwā'mō-tim-pan'ik), a. Of or pertaining to the squamosal and tympanic bones: as, a squamotympanic ankylosis.

squamous (skwā'mus), a. [< L. squamosus, covered with scales: see squame.] 1. In zool. and anat.: (a) Covered with scales; scaly; squamate; squamous; squamiferous or squamigerous. (b) Scale-like; squamoid; squamiform; specifically, of a bone, same as squamomandibular.—2. In bot., same as squamosa.—Squamous bone, the squamosal.—Squamous bulb, in bot., a bulb in which the outer scales are distinct, fleshy, and imbricated; a scaly bulb. See bulb.—Squamous cells, flattened, dry, thin cells, as seen in the superficial layers of the epidermis.—Squamous epithelium, epithelium composed of thin scale-like cells, either in a single layer (tessellated epithelium) or in several layers (stratified scaly epithelium). See epithelium.—Squamous portion of the temporal bone, the squamosal: opposed to petrosal and mastoid portions of the same compound bone.—Squamous suture, in anat., a fixed articulation or synchrosis, in which the thin beveled edge of a squamous bone overlaps another; specifically, the squamoparietal suture and squamosphenoidal suture, those by which the squamosal articulates with the parietal and alisphenoidal bones respectively. See cut under parietal.

squamozygomatic (skwā-mō-zī-gō-mat'ik), a. and n. [< squamo(us) + zygomatic.] 1. a. In anat., noting the squamous and zygomatic parts of the temporal bone: as, a squamozygomatic center of ossification.

II. n. A squamozygomatic bone; the squamosal together with its zygomatic process.

squamula (skwam'ū-lā), n.; pl. squamulæ (-læ). [L., dim. of squama, a scale: see squame.] 1.

A little scale. Specifically, in entom.: (a) One of the flattened scale-like hairs or processes which in many cases clothe the lower surfaces of the tarsal joints. (b) The tegula or scale covering the base of the anterior wing of a hymenopterous insect.

2. In bot.: (a) A scale of secondary order or reduced size. (b) Same as lodicule. Also squamella.

Also squamule.

squamulate (skwam'ū-lāt), a. [*< NL. squamulatus, < L. squamula, a little scale: see squamule.] Having little scales; covered with squamules; minutely scaly or squamose. Also squamellate, squamulose.

squamule (skwam'ūl), n. [< L. squamula, a little scale, dim. of squama, a scale: see squame.] In bot. and zool., same as squamula.

squamuliform (skwam'ū-li-fōrm), a. [< L. squamula, a little scale, + forma, form.] Having the form or character of a squamule.

squamulose (skwam'ū-lōs), a. [*< NL. squamulosus, < L. squamula, a little scale: see squamule.] Same as squamulate.

squander (skwon'dēr), v. [Not found in early use; perhaps a dial. form, a variant, with the common dial. change of initial sw- to sq-, of swadder*, which is perhaps a nasalized form of scadder*, orig. scatter as water (?) (cf. MD. swadder, dabble in water, = Sw. dial. skvadra, gush out, as water), itself a variant of E. dial. swatter, Sc. squatter, throw (water) about, scatter, squander, < Sw. dial. squättra, squander; freq. of E. dial. swat, var. squat, throw down forcibly; cf. Icel. skvætta = Sw. skvätta, throw out, squirt, = Dan. skvætte, squirt, splash, squander: see *squat*², squatter, *swat*², swatter. The word may owe its nasalization to AS. swindan (pret. swand), vanish, waste, OHG. swantian, G. ver-schwenden, squander, etc.] I. trans. 1. To scatter; disperse. [Archaic.]

Other ventures he hath squandered abroad.

Shak., M. of V., I. 3. 22.

They drive and squander the huge Belgian fleet.

Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, st. 67.

The fallen timber obstructed the streams, the rivers were squandered in the reedy morasses.

C. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 223.

2. To spend lavishly, profusely, or prodigally; dissipate; use without economy or judgment; lavish: as, to squander one's money or an estate.

How much time is squandered away in Vanity and Folly?

Stillingfleet, Sermons, III. x.

Is he not a gay, dissipated rake, who has squandered his patrimony?

Sheridan, The Duenna, II. 3.

II. intrans. 1. To disperse; wander aimlessly; go at random. [Archaic.]

The wise man's folly is anatomized

Even by the squandering glances of the fool.

Shak., As you Like it, II. 7. 57.

2. To waste one's substance; go to wasteful expense; spend recklessly.

He was grown needy by squandering upon his vices.

Swift, Change in Queen's Ministry.

squander (skwon'dēr), n. [< squander, v.] The act of squandering. Imp. Dict. [Rare.]

squanderer (skwon'dēr-ēr), n. [< squander + -er.] One who squanders; one who spends his money prodigally; a spendthrift; a prodigal; a waster; a lavisher.

I say he is an unthrift, a Squanderer, and must not expect supplies from me. Brome, Sparagus Garden, III. 5.

squanderingly (skwon'dēr-ing-li), adv. In a squandering manner; by squandering; prodigally; lavishly. Imp. Dict.

squan-fish (skwon'fish), n. A cyprinoid fish, Ptychochilus lucius. See *pike*², n., 2 (a).

squanter-squash (skwon'tēr-skwoš), n. Same as *squash*². See the quotation.

Yet the clypeate are sometimes called cymnells (as are some others also), from the lenten cake of that name, which many of them very much resemble. Squash, or squanter-squash, is their name among the northern Indians, and so they are called in New York and New England.

Beverley, Hist. Virginia, IV. ¶ 18.

squap (skwop), v. [A dial. var. of swap.] To strike. [Prov. Eng.]

squap (skwop), n. [< squap, v.] A blow. [Prov. Eng.]

squarable (skwār'a-bl), a. [*< square*¹ + -able.] In math., capable of being squared. Hutton's Recreations, p. 169.

square¹ (skwār), n. [Formerly also (esp. in def. 5) squire, quier; < ME. square, squar, square, sware, a square, squire, sqyre, squyre, sqyzer, a carpenter's square, < OF. esquare, esquarre, escaire, esquierre, esquire, a square, squariness, F. équerre = Sp. escuadra, a square, squad, squadron, = Pg. esquadra, a squadron, esquadria, a square, a rule, esquadro, a right angle drawn on a board, = It. squadra, a square, also a squad or squadron of men (orig. a square); variant forms, with initial s due to the verb (see *square*¹, v.), of OF. quarre = Sp. cuadra = Pg. It. quadra, a square, < L. quadra, a square, fem. of (LL.) quadrus, square, four-cornered, < quatuor, four, = E. four: see four, *quadra*¹, quadrate, *squad*¹, squadron. Cf. *square*¹, a.] 1. In geom., a four-sided plane rectilinear figure, having all its sides equal, and all its angles right angles.

I have a parlour

Of a great square, and height as you desire it.

Tomkis (?), Albumazar, II. 3.

The hard-grained Muses of the cube and square.

Tennyson, Princess, ProI.

2. A figure or object which nearly approaches this shape; a square piece or part, or a square surface: as, a square of glass.

A third court, to make a square with the front, but not to be built, nor yet enclosed with a naked wall.

Bacon, Building (ed. 1887).

He bolted his food down his capacious throat in squares of 3 inches.

Scott.

The casement slowly grows a glimmering square.

Tennyson, Princess, IV. (song).

Specifically—(a) In printing, a certain number of lines forming a part of a column nearly square: used chiefly in reckoning the prices of newspaper advertisements. (b) A square piece of linen, cloth, or silk, usually decorated with embroidery, fringe, or lace: as, a table-square.

3. A quadrilateral area, rectangular or nearly so, with buildings, or sites for buildings, on every side; also, an open space formed by the intersection of streets; hence, such an area planted with trees, shrubs, or grass, and open to the public for recreation or diversion; a public park among buildings; a common; a green: as, Union Square in New York; Lafayette Square in Washington; Trafalgar Square in London.

The statue of Alexander the Seventh stands in the large square of the town.

Addison, Remarks on Italy (Works, ed. Bohn, I. 401).

4. An area bounded by four streets; a block: as, the house is four or five squares further up-town.—5. An instrument used by artificers, draftsmen, and others for trying or describing right angles. It consists of two rules or branches fastened perpendicularly at one end of their extremities so as to a, carpenter's square (of iron or steel); b, draftsman's T-squares of wood, b' having an blade adjustable at any angle; c, bevel-square, the blade of which can be set either square or at any angle; d, center-square; e, miter-square; f, carpenter's try-square; g, square with adjustable heads and with vernier scale for measuring diameters, also called vernier calipers.

form a right angle. Sometimes one of the branches is pivoted, so as to admit of measuring other than right angles. When one rule is joined to the other in the middle in the form of a T, it is called a T-square.

Thou shalt me fynde as just as is a squire.

Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, I. 358.

Of all kyne craftes ich contreeued here tooles, Of carpentrie, of kerueres, and contreeued the compas, And cast out by squire both lyne and leuell.

Piers Plowman (C), xli. 127.

A poet does not work by square or line,

As smiths and joiners perfect a design.

Couper, Conversation, I. 780.

Hence—6. A true measure, standard, or pattern.

This cause I'll argue,

And be a peace between ye, if 't so please you,

And by the square of honour to the utmost.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Pilgrimage, II. 1.

Religion being, in the pretence of their Law, the square of all their (otherwise civil) actions.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 183.

7. In arith. and alg., the number or quantity derived from another (of which it is said to be the square) by multiplying that other by itself: thus, 64 is the square of 8, for $8 \times 8 = 64$; x^2 or $x \times x$ is the square of x .

Light diminishes in intensity as we recede from the source of light. If the luminous source be a point, the intensity diminishes as the square of the distance increases. . . . This is the meaning of the law of inverse squares as applied to light. Tyndall, Light and Elect., p. 15.

8. Rule; regularity; exact proportion; hence, integrity of conduct; honest dealing. See phrases on the square (c), out of square, etc.

Read not my blemishes in the world's report:
I have not kept my square; but that to come Shall all be done by the rule.

Shak., A. and C., ii. 3. 6.

9. A body of troops drawn up in quadrilateral form. The formation used in the sixteenth century and afterward was a nearly solid body of pikemen, to which the harquebushers, crossbowmen, etc., formed an accessory, as by being posted on the flanks, etc. In Shakspeare's time troops drawn up in battle array were primarily in squares. At the present time the square is a hollow formation, composed of four fronts, each from two to five ranks deep, having the officers, colors, etc., in the center. This formation is used to repel cavalry, or to resist any superior force which outflanks or surrounds the body of troops. See hollow square, below.

He alone
Dealt on lieutenantry, and no practice had
In the brave squares of war.

Shak., A. and C., iii. 11. 40.

Dash'd on every rocky square,
Their surging charges foam'd themselves away.

Tennyson, Death of Wellington.

10. A name given to various squared projections or shanks to which other parts of machines may be fitted.—11†. Level; equality; generally with the. See on the square (b), below.—12. In astron., quartile; the position of planets distant 90 degrees from each other. See aspect, 7.

Their planetary motions, and aspects,
In sextile, square, and trine.

Milton, P. L., x. 659.

13†. Opposition; enmity; quarrel. See *square*¹, v. i., 2.—14. A part of a woman's dress. (a) The yoke of a chemise or gown: so called because often cut square or angular. [Still in provincial use.]

The sleeve-hand, and the work about the square on 't
[a smock]. Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 212.

(b) A square opening in the upper part of the front of a bodice, or other garment covering the throat and neck. It is usually filled in with another material, except for evening dress.

A round Sable Tippet, about 2 yards long, the Sable pretty deep and dark, with a piece of black Silk in the Square of the neck.

Advt. quoted in Ashton's Reign of Queen Anne, I. 173.

15. A puzzle or device consisting of a series of words so selected that when arranged in a square they may be read alike across and downward. Also called word-square.—16. In bookbinding, the parts of the cover of a bound book that project beyond the edge of the leaves.—17. The square end of the arbor designed to receive the winding-key of a watch, or the similar part by which the hands of the watch are set.—18. In flooring, roofing, and other branches of mechanical art, an area 10 feet square; 100 square feet.—19. In her., a bearing representing a carpenter's square. (See def. 5.) It is represented with or without the scale.—20. In organ-building, a thin piece of wood, in or nearly in the shape of a right-angled triangle, pivoted at the right or largest angle and connected with trackers at the other angles. It serves to change the direction of the tracker-action from vertical to horizontal, or vice versa.—A deep square, a long projection.—A small square, a narrow projection.—At square†, in opposition; at enmity.

Marry, she knew you and I were at square;
At least we fell to blows.

Promos and Cassandra, ii. 4. (Nares.)

She falling at square with hir husband.

Holinshead, Hist. Eng., iv. 8.

By the square, exactly; accurately.
Not the worst of the three but jumps twelve foot and a half by the squier.
Why, you can tell us by the square, neighbour,
Whence he is call'd a constable.

B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, iv. 2.

Cyclical square. See cyclical.—Face of a square. See *face*¹.—Geometrical square. Same as quadrat, 2.—Gunnery square. Same as quadrant, 5.—Hollow square, a body of infantry drawn up in square with a space in the middle to receive baggage, colors, drums, etc. When orders or proclamations are to be read to troops, it is usual to form a hollow square, with the files facing inward. See def. 9.—Incuse square. See incuse.—In square†, square.

Then did a sharped spyre of Diamond bright,
Ten fettee each way in square, appeare to mee.

Spenser, Visions of Bellay, I. 30.

Magic square. See magic.—Method of least squares, the method used by astronomers, geodesists, and others of deducing the most probable or best result of their observations, in cases in which the arithmetical mean of a number of observations of the same quantity is the most probable or best value of that quantity. The adoption of the mean value of a number of observations may be considered as the simplest application of the method of least squares. When the observed values depend upon several unknown quantities, the rule which results from the principle of the arithmetical mean is to adopt such values for the unknown quantities as to make the sum of the squares of the residual errors of the observations the least possible. When there are certain conditions that must be fulfilled, as for example, in geodesy, that the sum of the angles of each triangle must equal two right angles plus the spherical excess, the rules become still more complicated. There are also rules for calculating probable errors, etc.—Nasik squares. See the quotation.

Squares that have many more summations than in rows, columns, and diagonals have been investigated by the Rev. A. H. Frost (Cambridge Math. Jour., 1857), and called Nasik squares from the town in India where he resided; and he has extended the method to cubes (called Nasik cubes), various sections of which have the same singular properties. Encyc. Brit., XV. 215.

Naval square, a rectilinear figure painted on a ship's deck in some convenient place, for the purpose of aiding in taking the bearings of other ships of a squadron or of objects on shore.—Normal square, the mathematical instrument called a square, for determining right angles.—On or upon the square. (a) At right angles; straight: as, to cut cloth on the square, as opposed to bias. Hence, figuratively.—(b) On an equality; on equal terms.

They [the Presbyterians] chose rather to be lorded over once more by a tyrant . . . than endure their brethren and friends to be tyrant upon the square with them.

Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, x.

We live not on the square with such as these;

Such are our betters who can better please.

Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, iii. 179.

(c) Honest; just; fairly; honestly.

Keep upon the square, for God sees you; therefore do your duty.

Penn., To his Wife and Children.

"Was the marriage all right, then?" "Oh, all on the square—civil marriage, church—everything."

George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxi.

Optical square, an instrument used in surveying for laying out lines at right angles to each other. It consists of a circular brass box containing two principal glasses of the sextant, viz. the index- and horizon-glasses, fixed at an angle of 45°. The method of using this instrument is obvious. If the observer moves forward or backward in the straight line AB, until the object B seen by direct vision coincides with another object C, seen by reflection, then a straight line drawn to C from the point at which he stands, as D, when the coincidence takes place will be perpendicular to AB.—Out of square. (a) Not drawn or cut to right angles. (b) Out of order; out of the way; irregular; incorrect or incorrectly.

Herodotus, in his Melpomene, scorneth them that make Europe and Asia equal, affirming that Europe . . . passeth them in latitude, wherein he speaketh not greatly out of square. R. Eden, tr. of Francisco Lopez (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 346).

In St. Paul's time the integrity of Rome was famous; Corinth many ways improved; they of Galatia much more out of square. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 1.

Reducing squares, a method of copying designs or drawings on a different scale. The original is divided into squares by lines drawn at right angles to one another. The surface on which the copy is to be made is divided into the same number of squares, smaller or larger, according to the scale desired, and the lines of the design are drawn on the squares of the copy in the same relative positions that they occupy in the original. Instead of marking the original design with lines, a frame in which crossed threads or wires are set may be laid over it; or such a frame may be used in a similar way in drawing a landscape or any other subject from the original.—Rising-square, a square having a tongue and two arms at right angles to it, used in molding the floor-timbers in wooden ships. The tongue is in width equal to the siding size of the keel; and the seat and throat of the floor-timbers are squared across it, the risings of the floor at the head being squared across the arms. The timber-mold applied to the seating on the tongue and rising on the arm gives the shape of one side of the floor-timber: the mold reversed gives the other.—Solid square (milit.), a square body of troops; a body in which the ranks and files are equal.—Square of an anchor, the upper part of the shank.—Square of sense†. See the quotation.

I profess
My selfe an enemy to all other joyes,
Which the most precious square of sense professes,
And find I am alone felicitate
In your deere Highnesse loue.

Shak., Lear (folio 1673), I. 1. 76.

[This phrase has been variously interpreted by commentators: Warburton refers it to the four nobler senses—sight, hearing, taste, and smell; Johnson makes it mean 'compass or comprehension of sense'; R. G. White, 'the entire domain of sensation'; Schmidt, 'the choicest symmetry of reason, the most normal and intelligent mode of thinking.']—To break no square†, to make no difference. See the next phrase.—To break or breed squares†, to break the square†, to throw things out of due or just relation and harmony; make a difference.—To reduce the square (milit.). See reduce.—To see how the squares go, to see how the game proceeds, or how matters are going on.

At length they, having an opportunitie, resolved to send Mr. Winslow, with what beaver they had ready, into England, to see how ye square recents.

Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 263.

One frog looked about him to see how squares went with their new king.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

square¹ (skwâr), a. [< ME. square, square, sware, orig. two syllables, < OF. esquarre, escarre (equiv. to quarré, carré, F. carré), *< ML. exquadratus (equiv. to quadratus), squared, square, pp. of exquadrare*, make square: see *square*¹, v., and cf. *square*¹, n., and quadratus, quarry.] 1. Having four equal sides and four right angles; quadrate; rectangular and equilateral: as, a square room; a square figure.

Thurgh a wyndow thikke, of many a barre

Of iren greet, and square as any sparre.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, I. 218.

A massy slab, in fashion square or round.

Cowper, Task, I. 21.

2. Forming a right angle; having some part rectangular: as, a table with square corners.

Square tools for turning brass are ground in the same manner as triangular tools.

O. Byrne, Artisan's Handbook, p. 29.

3. Cut off at right angles, as any body or figure with parallel sides: as, a square apse or transept; a square (square-headed) window.

The east ends in this architecture [early Pointed in England] are usually square.

C. H. Moore, Gothic Architecture, p. 158.

4. Having a shape broad as compared with the height, with rectilinear and angular rather than curved outlines: as, a man of square frame.

Brode shoulders above, big of his army,

A harde brest hade the buerne, & his back square.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 3867.

squash² (skwosh), n. [An abbr. of squanter-squash, squonter-squash, < Amer. Ind. askuta-squash; asquash, pl. of asq, raw, green.] The fruit of an annual plant of the gourd kind, belonging to one of several species of the genus Cucurbita; also, the plant itself. The very numerous and divergent varieties of the cultivated squash are reduced by good authority to three species—C. maxima, the great or winter squash; C. Pepo, including the pumpkin and also a large part of the ordinary squashes; and C. moschata, the musky, China, or Barbary squash. The last has a club-shaped, pear-shaped, or long cylindrical fruit with a glaucous-whitish surface. The other squashes may for practical purposes be divided into summer and winter kinds. Among the latter is the C. maxima, of which the fruit is spheroidal in form and often of great size, sometimes weighing 240 pounds. A variety of this is the crowned or turban squash, whose fruit has a circular projection at the top, the mark of the adherent calyx-tube. Other winter squashes are of moderate size, and commonly either narrowed toward the base into a neck which in the "crook-necks" is curved to one side, or egg-shaped and pointed at the ends, as in the (Boston) marrow, long a standard in America, or the still better Hubbard squash. The winter squash can be preserved through the season. The summer squash has a very short vine, hence sometimes called bush-squash. Its fruit is smaller, and is either a crook-neck or depressed in form, somewhat hemispherical with a scalloped border (see minion); it is colored yellow, white, green, or green and white. Squashes are more grown in America than elsewhere, but also, especially the winter squashes, in continental Europe, and generally in temperate and tropical climates. In Great Britain the only ordinary squash is the vegetable marrow (see marrow), or succade gourd. The summer squash is eaten before maturity, prepared by boiling. The winter squash is boiled or roasted; in France and the East it is largely used in soups and ragouts, in America often made into pies. It is also used as food for animals.

Askitasquash, their Vine-apple, Which the English, from them, call Squashes.

Royer Williams, Key to Lang. of America (ed. 1843), xvi. [(Rhode Isl. Soc. Coll.).]

squeezer (skwē'zēr), n. [< squeeze + -er¹.] 1. One who or that which squeezes. Specifically—(a) In iron-working, a machine employed in getting the puddled ball into shape, or shingling it, without hammering. (See puddling.) Squeezers are of two kinds, reciprocating and rotary. The essential feature of the reciprocating form is that a movable arm or lever works against a corresponding fixed jaw, the former representing the

a, ridged eccentric casing; b, ridged roller. The ball of metal enters at c, in the direction shown by the arrow, and emerges at c'.

hammer, the latter the anvil, of the old method of shingling with the hammer. In the rotary squeezer the puddled ball is brought into shape by being passed between a cast-iron cylinder and a cylindrical casing, the former being placed eccentrically within the latter so that the distance between their surfaces gradually diminishes in the direction of the rotation. The ball, being introduced at the widest part of the opening, is carried forward and finally delivered at the narrower end, reduced in size and ready for rolling. (b) In sheet-metal working, a crimping-machine for forcing the tops and covers of tin cans over the cylinders which form the sides of the cans. (c) A lemon-squeezer.

2. pl. A kind of playing-cards in which the face-value of each card is shown in the upper left-hand corner, and can readily be seen by squeezing the cards slightly apart, without displaying the hand.—Alligator squeezer. Same as crocodile squeezer.—Crocodile squeezer, a peculiar form of squeezer, having a long projecting upper jaw armed with teeth. It is used in the manufacture of iron.

squelet, v. A Middle English form of squeal.

squleri, squleryt, n. Middle English forms of *sculler*², scullery.

squench (skwench), v. t. [A var., with intensive prefix s-, of quench.] To quench. Beau. and Fl. [Obsolete or vulgar.]

squerelt, squerrelt, sqerrilt, n. Obsolete forms of squirrel.

squeteague (skwe-tēg'), n. [Also squettee, squitee, squt; of Amer. Ind. origin.] A salt-water sciaenoid fish, Cynoscion regalis (formerly Otolithus regalis), also called weakfish, sea-salmon, and sea-trout in common with some other members of the same genus. It is silvery, darker above, with many irregular, small, dark blotches tending to form oblique undulating bars. It is common from Cape Cod southward, and is a valued food-fish. A more distinctly marked fish of this kind is C. maculatus, the spotted squeteague, weakfish, or sea-trout, of more southerly distribution. See Cynoscion, and cut under weakfish.

sqib (skwib), v.; pret. and pp. sqibbed, ppr. sqibbing. [A var. of sqip*, < ME. sqippen, a var. of swip (ME. swippen), move swiftly, sweep, dash: see swip, swipe.] I. intrans. 1. To move swiftly and irregularly.

A battered unmarried beau, who squbs about from place to place.

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, lxxxviii.

2. [< sqib, n., 3.] To make a slight, sharp report, like that of an exploding sqib.—3. [< sqib, n., 4.] To resort to the use of sqibs, or petty lampoons.

II. trans. 1. To throw (in or out) suddenly; explode.

Thou wouldst neuer squb out any new Salt-petre

Iestes against honest Tucca.

Dekker, Humorous Poet (Works, ed. Pearson, i. 236).

He [Mr. Brian Twyne] squbs in this parenthesis.

Fuller, Hist. Cambridge University, i. § 52.

2. [< sqib, n., 4.] To attack in sqibs; lampoon.

sqib (skwib), n. [< sqib, v.] 1. A ball or tube filled with gunpowder, sent or fired swiftly through the air or along the ground, exploding somewhat like a rocket.

Like a Squib it falls,

Or fire-wing'd shaft, or sulph'ry Powder Ball.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

Nor nimble sqib is seen to make afraid

The gentlewomen.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, Prol.

So squbs and crackers fly into the air,

Then, only breaking with a noise, they vanish

In stench and smoke. Ford, Broken Heart, ii. 2.

2. A reed, rush, quill, or roll of paper filled with a priming of gunpowder; a tube of some kind used to set off a charge of gunpowder, as at the bottom of a drill-hole. Also called mote, train, and match.—3. A fire-cracker, especially one broken in the middle so that when it is fired the charge explodes without a loud report.—4. A petty lampoon; a short satirical writing or sketch holding up a person or thing to ridicule.

Allowing that . . . [the play] succeeds, there are a hundred sqibs flying all abroad to prove that it should not have succeeded.

Goldsmith, Polite Learning, x.

5†. One who writes lampoons or sqibs; a petty satirist; a paltry, trifling fellow.

The sqibs are those who, in the common phrase of the word, are called libellers, lampooners, and pamphleteers.

Steele, Tatler, No. 88.

6. A kind of cheap taffy, made of treacle.

And there we had a shop, too, for lollipops and sqibs.

Hood, Lines by a Schoolboy.

sqibbish (skwib'ish), a. [< sqib + -ish¹.] Flashy; light. T. Mace, Music's Monument. (Davies.)

squid (skwid), n. [Origin unknown.] 1. A kind of cuttlefish or calamary; a dibranchiate cephalopod with ten arms, especially of the family Loliginidae or Teuthidae. The name is most frequently given to the small, slender calamaries, a few inches long and with a caudal fin, which are much used as bait, but is extended (with or without a qualifying term) to many other species of different genera and families, some of which, as the giant squids, are the largest of cephalopods. See cut under Architeuthis, calamary, Demoteuthis, Loliginidae, Sepioida, and Spirula, and compare those under Dibranchiata, cuttlefish, and Sepia.

2. An artificial bait or lure of metal, ivory, etc., used in angling or trolling for fish, often simply a fish-hook on the shank of which a mass of lead is melted in cylindrical or tapering form to imitate a squid (def. 1).—False squids, the Loligopidae.—Flying squids, the Ommastrephidae.—Giant squids, the very large cephalopods of the genus Architeuthis, as A. harveyi of the Atlantic coast of North America, among those called devil-fish. See cut under Architeuthis.—Long-armed squids, the Chroteuthidae.—Long-finned squids, species of Loliginidae.—Short-finned squids, species of Ommastrephes, as O. illecebrosus, common in New England seas and northward, and a principal source of bait.

squid (skwid), v. t.; pret. and pp. squidged, ppr. squidding. [< squid, n.] To fish with a squid or spoon-bait.

squidding (skwid'ing), n. [Verbal n. of squid, v.] The act, art, or practice of fishing with a squid.

squid-fork (skwid'fôrk), n. An instrument used by fishermen in baiting with a squid.

squid-hound (skwid'hound), n. The striped-bass, Roccus lineatus. See cut under bass.

squid-jig (skwid'jig), n. A squid-jigger.

squid-jigger (skwid'jig'er), n. A device for catching squids, consisting of a number of hooks soldered together by the shanks so that the points radiate in all directions. It is dragged or jerked through the water.

squid-jigging (skwid'jig'ing), n. The act of jigging for squids; the use of a squid-jigger; squidding.

squid-thrower (skwid'thrô'er), n. A device, on the principle of the catapult, used in trolling to cast a fishing-line seaward. E. H. Knight.

squier¹, n. An obsolete spelling of *squire*¹.

squier², n. An obsolete form of *square*¹.

squieriet, n. An obsolete spelling of squyry.

squiggle (skwig'gl), v. t.; pret. and pp. squiggled, ppr. squiggling. [Appar. a var., with intensive prefix s-, of wiggle*, E. dial. queegle, a var. of wiggle: see wiggle.] 1. To shake a fluid about in the mouth with the lips closed. [Prov. Eng.—2. To move about like an eel; squirm; wriggle. [Colloq., U. S.] squiller, n. A Middle English form of *sculler*².

squillgee (skwil'jē), n. [Also squillagee, squillgee, also squeegce, squeegce (see squeegce); origin obscure; perhaps connected with swill, swile, wash, rinse; but the term is not explained.] 1. Naut.: (a) An implement somewhat resembling a wooden hoe, with an edge of india-rubber or thick leather, used to scrape the water from wet decks. (b) A small swab. (c) A becket and toggle used to confine a studding-sail while setting it.—2. One of several implements constructed like the nautical implement above defined (1 (a)), used for washing glass, in photographic work, etc. See squeegce, 2.

squillgee (skwil'jē), v. t. [< squillgee, n.] Naut., to scrape (the wet decks of a ship) with a squillgee.

The washing, swabbing, squillgeeing, etc., lasts, or is made to last, until eight o'clock, when breakfast is ordered, fore and aft. R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 100.

squillgee-toggle (skwil'jē-tog'gl), n. A toggle with a small line fastened to it, used to secure a strap round a studdingsail while being set, so that by pulling out the squillgee when the sail is hoisted far enough the sail is released.

squill¹ (skwil), n. [*< ME. squille, squylle, squyle, squyle, < OF. squille, scille, F. squille, scille = Sp. esquila = Pg. scilla = It. squilla, < L. squilla, scilla, squill, = Gr. σκίλλα, squill, perhaps for *σκιόλα (as equiv. σκίος for σκιδρος), and so called from its splitting easily into scales, < σκί-ζω, split: see schism.] 1. The medicinal bulb of Urginea Scilla, or the plant itself; the official squill. See Urginea.—2. Any plant of the genus Scilla (which see). S. nutans is commonly called bluebell, or wild hyacinth. The spring squill, S. verna, and the autumn squill, S. autumnalis, are small European wild flowers of no great merit in cultivation. The star-flowered squill, S. amana, is a distinct early species, the flowers indigo-blue with large yellowish-green ovary, less attractive than the species following. The early squill, S. bifolia, produces rich masses of dark-blue flowers very early in the spring. The Spanish squill, S. Hispanica (S. campanulata), is a fine species of early summer, with a strong pyramidal raceme of large pendent usually light-blue flowers; also called Spanish bluebell. The Italian squill, S. Italica, has pale-blue flowers with intensely blue stamens. The pyramidal or Peruvian squill, S. Peruviana, not from Peru, but from the Mediterranean region, has pale-blue flowers with white stamens, the flowers very numerous in a regular pyramid. The Siberian squill, S. Sibirica (S. amoenula), not from Siberia, but from southern Russia, is a very choice small early-flowering species, the blossom of a peculiar porcelain-blue. These are all hardy except the pyramidal squill.—Chinese squill, a species of Scilla, S. Chinensis, once classed as Barnardia.—Compound syrup of squill. See syrup.—Oxymel of squill. See oxymel.—Pancreatic squill, a variety of the official squill said to be milder in its action.—Roman squill, the Roman hyacinth, Hyacinthus Romanus, once classed as Scilla, also as Bellerophon.—Wild squill, the American wild hyacinth, or eastern camass, Camassia (Scilla) Fraseri.

Squill (Urginea Scilla).

squill² (skwil), n. [< L. squilla, scilla, a small fish of the lobster kind, a prawn, shrimp, so called from a supposed resemblance to the bulb or plant of the same name: see *squill*¹.]

1. A stomatopodous crustacean of the genus Squilla or family Squillidae; a mantis-shrimp or squill-fish. See cuts under mantis-shrimp and Squillidae.—2. An insect so called from its resemblance to the preceding; a mantis. Also called squill-insect.

Squilla (skwil'ä), n. [NL. (Fabricius), < L. squilla, scilla, a prawn: see *squill*².] 1. The representative genus of Squillidae, containing such crustaceans as S. mantis, the common mantis-shrimp or locust-shrimp. The southern squill of the United States is Coronis glabriuscula. See cuts under mantis-shrimp and Squillidae.—2. [i. c.] Same as *squill*², 1.—3. [i. c.] Same as *squill*², 2.

The Squilla, an insect, differs but little from the fish Squilla. Mouset, Theater of Insects, II. xxxvii.

squillagee (skwil'a-jē), n. Same as squillgee.

squillante (skwil-lân'te), a. [It., ppr. of squillare, clang, ring.] In music, ringing; bell-like in tone.

squill-fish (skwil'fish), n. A squill, or some similar crustacean.

squillian (skwil'i-an), a. [= F. squillien; as L. squilla, squill (see *squill*²), + -ian.] Of or pertaining to a squill; belonging or relating to the Squillidae.

Squillidae (skwil'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Squilla + -idae.] A family of stomatopod crustaceans, Locust-shrimp (Squilla scabricauda), in longitudinal vertical section.

I-XX, the somites; I'-XX', their appendages, of most of which the bases only are seen. Al, alimentary canal; C, heart; An, anus; T, telson; br, branchiae; p, penis.

typified by the genus Squilla, to which the Stomatopoda are sometimes restricted; the mantis-shrimps or gastrurans. The pseudogenus Alima and at least two other spurious genera were named from larval forms of this family. Other good genera than the type are Coronis and Gonodactylus. Also called Squilloidea.

squill-insect (skwil'in'sekt), n. Same as *squill*², 2. N. Grev.

squillitic (skwil-it'ik), a. [*< L. squilliticus, scil-liticus, < Gr. σκυλλητικός, pertaining to the squill: see squill*².] Of, pertaining to, or obtained from squills.

A decoction of this kind of worms sodden in squillitic vinegre. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxx. 3.

squimble-squamblet, adv. Same as skimble-scamble. Cotgrave.

squint (skwin), v. i. and t. [Also squean, skeen, sken, also squinky, formerly squiny; cf. squint.] To squint.

As doctors in their deepest doubts Stroke up their foreheads hie;
Or men amaze their sorrow founts
By squeaning with the eye.

Armin's Italian Taylor and his Boy (1609). (Nares.)

squincet (skwin'ans), n. Same as squincancy, 1.

squincancy (skwin'an-si), n. [Also contr. squincy, squinsky; < ME. squinacie, squinacie, < OF. esquinacie, squinacie, quinsky: see quinsky.] 1. Quinsky.

Diseases that be verie perillous: . . . to wit, the Pleuresie, Squinacie, inflammation, sharpe Feuer, or Apoplexie. Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 235.

2. The quinskywort.

squincancy-berry (skwin'an-si-ber'i), n. Same as quinsky-berry.

squincancy-wort (skwin'an-si-wert), n. Same as quinskywort.

squinct, n. [Early mod. E. squynce; var. of squincy, etc.] Same as squincancy.

Diseases and sicknesses, as squynces. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, III. 22.

squinch¹ (skwinch), n. [A var. of *sconce*².] In arch., a small arch, or a series of arches, corbeled out, thrown across an angle, as in a square tower to support the side of a superimposed octagon. In Western architecture it is frequent as performing the function of the Eastern pendentive. The application of the term may be due to the resemblance of this structure to a corner cupboard, which was also called squinch or sconce. See cut in next column.

squinch² (skwinch), n. A dialectal variant of quince.

Squinch.

squincy, n. [A contraction of squincancy: see squincancy, quinsky.] Quinsky.

Shall not we be suspected for the murder,
And choke with a hempen squincy?

Randolph, Jealous Lovers, III. 14.

squin-eyet, n. A squinting eye.

squink (skwingk), v. i. [A dial. form of wink: see squint and wink.] To wink. [Prov. Eng.] squinky (skwin'i), v. i. [Formerly also squiny: see squin.] To squint. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

I remember thine eyes well enough. Dost thou squiny at me? Shak., Lear, IV. 6. 140.

squint (skwint), a. and n. [Not found in ME., except as in asquint, askew; appar. an extension of the obs. or dial. squin, squean, sken, prob. connected with D. schuinen, slant, slope, schuin, slant, sloping; perhaps associated with E. dial. squink, wink, partly a var. of wink, partly < Sw. svinka, shrink, finch, nasalized form of svika, balk, finch, fail; cf. Dan. svigte, bend, fail, forsake; AS. swican, escape, avoid. The history of the word is meager, and the forms appar. related are more or less involved.] I. a. 1. Looking different ways; characterized by non-coincidence of the optic axes; affected with strabismus: said of eyes.

Some things that are not heard

He mutters to himself, and his squint eye

Cast towards the Moone, as should his wits there lye.

Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 190).

2. That looks or is directed obliquely; looking askance; indirect; oblique; sinister.

The pleasure I shall live in, and the freedom,
Without the squint eye of the law upon me,
Or prating liberty of tongues that envy!

Fletcher, Rule a Wife, III. 1.

I incline to hope, rather than fear,
And gladly banish squint suspicion.

Milton, Comus, I. 418.

Squint quoin, in arch., an external oblique angle.

II. n. 1. An affection of the eyes, consisting in non-coincidence of the optic axes; a squint eye; strabismus (which see).

He's blue eyes, and not to be called a squint, though a little cast he's certainly got. Hood, The Lost Heir.

2. An oblique or furtive look; a furtive glance; hence (colloquially), a leaning, an inclination: as, he had a decided squint toward democracy.—3. In arch., an oblique opening through the walls of some old churches, usually having for its object to enable a person in the transepts or aisles to see the elevation of the host at the high altar. The usual situation for a squint is on one or both sides of the chancel arch; but they are also found in other positions, though always directed toward an altar. Generally they are not above a yard high, and 2 feet wide, but sometimes they form narrow arches 10 or 12 feet in height, as at Minster-Lovel, Oxfordshire. The name hagioSCOPE is sometimes applied to them.—Braid's squint, the turning of the eyes simultaneously upward and inward, as if trying to look at the middle of one's own forehead, as a means of producing a hypnotic state.

squint (skwint), v. [< squint, n.] I. intrans. 1. To look askew, or with the eyes differently directed; look askance.
He gets a crick in his neck off-times with squinting up at windows and balconies.
Brome, Sparagus Garden, III. 4.
Some can squint when they will. Bacon.

2. To be affected with strabismus.—3. To run or be directed obliquely; have an indirect reference or bearing.
Not a period of this epistle but squints towards another over against it. Pope.

Squints, Minster-Lovel Church, Oxfordshire, England.

A A, squints; B B, transepts; C, chancel; D, altar.

Not meaning . . .
His pleasure or his good alone,
But squinting partly at my own.
Cowper, To Rev. W. Bull, June 22, 1782.

II. trans. 1. To render squint or oblique; affect with strabismus.

Let him but use
An unsuited eye, not squinted with affections.
Heywood, Dialogues (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, VI. 226).
He gives the web and the pin, squints the eye, and makes the hare-lip. Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 122.

2. To turn, cast, or direct obliquely.

Perkin . . . raised his Siege, and marched to Taunton; beginning already to squint one eye upon the crowne and another upon the sanctuary.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 183.

squinter (skwin'tér), n. [squint + -er]. One who squints; a cross- or squint-eyed person.

I pass over certain difficulties about double images, drawn from the perceptions of a few squinters.
W. James, Mind, XII. 523, note.

squint-eyed (skwin'tíd), a. 1. Having eyes that squint; having eyes with non-coincident axes.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 103.
—2. Oblique; indirect; sinister; malignant.

This is such a false and squinteyed praise,
Which, seeming to look upwards on his glories,
Looks down upon my tears.

Sir J. Denham, The Sophy. (Latham.)

3. Looking obliquely or by side-glances: as, squint-eyed jealousy or envy.

The hypocrite . . . looks squint-eyed, aiming at two things at once: the satisfying his own lusts, and that the world may not be aware of it.
Rec. T. Adams, Works, I. 494.

squintifegot (skwin-ti-fē'gō), a. [squint +
-ifego, an arbitrary termination.] Squinting.

The timbrel, and the squintifego maid
Of Ials, awe thee.

Dryden, tr. of Persius's Satires, v. 271.

squinting (skwin'ting), n. [Verbal n. of squint,
v.] The act or habit of looking asquint; strabismus.

squintingly (skwin'ting-li), adv. With squint look; by side-glances.

squint-minded (skwin'min'ded), a. Deceitful; crooked-minded. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 34. [Rare.]

squiny, v. i. See squinky.

squir (skwér), v. t. and i. [Also squirr; a var.
of quir* for whirr: see whirr.] To throw with a jerk. [Prov. Eng.]

I saw him squir away his watch a considerable way into the Thames.

Boys squir pieces of tile or flat stones across ponds or brooks to make what are denominated ducks and drakes.
Halliwell.

squiralty (skwir'al-ti), n. [squirel + -alty, after the analogy of loyalty.] Same as squirearchy. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, I. xviii.
[Rare.]

squirarchy, n. See squirearchy.

squire¹ (skwir), n. [Also dial. square; early mod. E. also squier; < ME. squier, squyer, squier, scwier, swyere, by apheresis from esquire: see esquire]. 1. An esquire; an attendant on a knight.

Than tolde Grisandolus how he dide laugh before the abbey and in the chapel, for the squyer that hadde smyten his maister, and the dyuerse wordes that he hadde spoken.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 428.

The rest are princes, barons, lords, knights, squires,
And gentlemen of blood. Shak., Hen. V., iv. 8. 94.

2. A gentleman who attends upon a lady; an escort; a beau; a gallant.

And eke himselfe had craftily devised
To be her Squire, and do her service well aguisid.
Spenser, F. Q., II. 1. 21.

3. A person not noble nor a knight, but who has received a grant of arms.—4. In England, a landed proprietor who is also justice of the peace: a term nearly equivalent to lord of the manor, as meaning the holder of most of the land in any neighborhood.—5. In the United States, in country districts and towns, a justice of the peace, a local judge, or other local dignitary: chiefly used as a title.—Broom-squire.
See the quotation.

"Broom-squires?" "So we call in Berkshire squatters on the moor who live by tying heath into brooms."

Kingdely, Two Years Ago, xiv.

Squire of dames, a man very attentive to women and much in their company.

Marry, there I'm call'd
The Squire of Dames, or Servant of the Sex.
Massinger, Emperor of the East, i. 2.

Squire of the body, a personal attendant, originally on a knight, but later on a courtier; a pimp.—Squire of the pad, a footpad; a highwayman.

Sometimes they are Squires of the Pad, and now and then borrow a little money upon the King's High Way, to recruit their losses at the Gaming House.

Tom Brown, Works (ed. 1705).

squire¹ (skwir), v. t.; pret. and pp. squired, ppr.
squiring. [< ME. "squier, squeren; < squirel, n.] 1. To attend and wait upon, as a squire his lord.—2. To attend, as a gentleman a lady; wait upon or attend upon in the manner of a squire; escort.

For he squiereth me bothe up and down,
Yet hastow caught a fals suspecion.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 305.

To squire women about for other folks is as ungrateful an employment as to tell money for other folks.

Wycherley, Country Wife, iv. 3.

squire², n. An old form of square.

squireage (skwir'āj), n. [*< squire*¹ + -age.]
The untitled landed gentry; the squires of a country taken collectively. De Morgan, Budget of Paradoxes, p. 46. [Rare.]

squirearch (skwir'ärk), n. [< squirearch-y.] A member of the squirearchy.

Man is made for his fellow-creatures. I had long been disgusted with the interference of those selfish squire-archs. Bulwer, Caxtons, II. 11.

squirearchal (skwir'är-käl), a. [< squirearch
+ -al.] Of or pertaining to a squirearchy.
Imp. Dict.

squirearchical (skwir'är-ki-käl), a. [< squire-arch-y + -ic-al.] Of, pertaining to, or characteristic of squirearchy or a squirearch. Bulwer, My Novel, i. 10.

squirearchy (skwir'är-ki), n. [Also squirarchy; *< squire*¹ + Gr. ἀρχία, rule (after analogy of monarchy, etc.).] 1. In England, government by the squires, or "country gentlemen"—that is, the large landed proprietors, most of whom are justices of the peace, and who, before the Reform Bill of 1832, and to a certain extent after it, had great influence in the House of Commons. Hence—2. The squires themselves collectively.

squireen (skwir'ën'), n. [*< squire*¹ + -een, common in Ir. words.] In Ireland, a small landed proprietor: usually contemptuous.

Squireens are persons who, with good long leases or valuable farms, possess incomes of from three to eight hundred a year, who keep a pack of hounds, take out a commission of the peace, sometimes before they can spell (as her ladyship said), and almost always before they know anything of law or justice. Miss Edgeworth, Absentee, vii.

squirehood (skwir'hüd), n. [*< squire*¹ + -hood.]
The state of being a squire; the rank or position of a squire. Swift, Letter to the King at Arms.

squirelet, n. An obsolete form of squirrel.

squirelet (skwir'let), n. [*< squire*¹ + -let.] A petty squire; a squirreling. Carlyle, Misc., iii.
56. (Davies.)

squirreling (skwir'ling), n. [*< squire*¹ + -ling.]
A petty squire; a squirelet.

But to-morrow, if we live,
Our ponderous squire will give
A grand political dinner
To half the squirrelings near.

Tennyson, Maud, xx. 2.

squirely (skwir'li), a. [*< squire*¹ + -ly.] Befitting or characteristic of a squire.

One very fit for this squirely function.

Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, I. 4. (Latham.)

How could that oligarchy (the Southern States of the United States), with its squirely tastes, its free wasteful outdoor life, its love of landed property, and its contempt for manual labour, become a trading community?

The Academy, July 20, 1880, p. 32.

squireship (skwir'ship), n. [*< squire*¹ + -ship.]
Same as squirehood. Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, i. 4. (Latham.)

squiness (skwir'es), n. [*< squire*¹ + -ess.] The wife of a squire. Bulwer, Pelham, vii. (Davies.)
[Colloq., Eng.]

squirm (skwärm), v. i. [Prob. a var. of squir, throw with a jerk, influenced by association with swarm and worm: see squir.] 1. To wrig-gle or writhe, as an eel or a worm; hence, to writhe mentally.

You never need think you can turn over any old falsehood without a terrible squirming and scattering of the horrid little population that dwells under it.

O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, v.

They [worms in the pupa state] only squirm a little in a feeble way now and then, and grow stiffer, till they can't squirm at all, and then they're mummies, and that's the end of it till the butterflies are born.

Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, viii.

2. To climb by wriggling; "shin": as, to squirm up a tree.

squirm (skwärm), n. [< squirm, v.] 1. A wriggling motion, like that of a worm or an eel.—
2. Naut., a twist in a rope.

squirr, v. See squir.

squirrel (skwur'el or skwir'el), n. [Early mod.
E. also squirril, squerrel, squirrel, squiril; < ME.

skug, a squirrel, lit. 'shade': see skug.] 1. A rodent quadruped of the family Sciuridæ and genus Sciurus, originally and specifically Sciurus vulgaris of Europe. Squirrels have pointed ears and a long bushy tail; they are of active arboreal habits, and are able to sit up on their hind quarters and use the fore paws like hands. S. vulgaris, called in England skug, is a squirrel 8 or 10 inches long (the tail being nearly as much more), with an elegant reddish-brown coat, white below, and the ears tufted or pencilled. It lives in trees, is very agile and graceful in its movements, feeds on all kinds of small hard fruits, nests in a hole, hibernates to some extent in the colder latitudes, and brings forth usually three or four young. It is readily tamed, and makes an interesting pet. The North American squirrel nearest to this one is the chickaree, or red squirrel, S. hudsonius.

(See cut under chickaree.) The common gray squirrel of the United States is S. carolinensis. (See cut under Sciurus.) Fox- or cat-squirrels are several large red, gray, or black species of North America. (See cut under fox-squirrel.) North America (including Mexico and Central America) is very rich in squirrels; southern Asia and Africa are less rich, while South America and Europe have each but a single species of Sciurus proper. In the extension of the name squirrel to other genera of the family, the species of Tamias, Spermophilus, and Cynomys are distinguished as ground-squirrels or prairie-squirrels, and some of them are also called marmot-squirrels (see cuts under chipmunk, Spermophilus, oid, and prairie-dog);
those of Sciuropterus and Pteromys are flying-squirrels (see cuts under flying-squirrel and Sciuropterus). The scale-tailed squirrels of Africa belong to a different family, Anomaluridæ. (See cut under Anomaluridæ.) Certain Australian marsupials, as phalangers or petaurists, which resemble squirrels, are improperly so called. (See cut under Acrobates.) Some Sciuridæ have other vernacular names, as skug, assapan, taguan, jelerang, hackee, chick-aree, gopher, sisel, suslik, prairie-dog, wishtomish, etc.; but squirrel, without a qualifying term, is practically confined to the genus Sciurus, all the many members of which resemble one another too closely to be mistaken. See the technical names, and cut under Xerus.

2. In cotton-manuf., one of the small card-covered rollers used with the large roller of a carding-machine. Also called urchin.—Barking squirrel, the prairie-dog: an early name of this animal as brought to notice by Lewis and Clarke in 1814.— Burrowing squirrel, Lewis and Clarke's name (1814) of a prairie-dog, or some related prairie-squirrel.—Chipping-squirrel, the chipmunk.—Federation squirrel, the thirteen-lined spermophile, or striped gopher: so called in allusion to the thirteen stripes of the flag of the original States of the American Union. S. L. Mitchell, 1821. See cut under Spermophilus.—Hunt the squirrel. See hunt. (See also flying-squirrel, prairie-squirrel, sugar-squirrel.)

squirrel-bot (skwur'el-bot), n. A bot-fly, Cutiterbra emasculator, whose larvæ infest the genital and axillary regions of various squirrels and gophers in the United States, particularly the scrotum and testicles of the male of Tamias striatus, the striped chipmunk.

squirrel-corn (skwur'el-körn), n. A pretty spring wild flower, Dielytra (Dicentra) Canadensis, of eastern North America. It has elegant dissected leaves, graceful racemes of a few cream-colored heart-shaped blossoms, and separate yellow tubers which resemble kernels of Indian corn. See Dicentra. Less commonly called turkey-corn.

squirrel-cup (skwur'el-kup), n. The hepatica or liverleaf.

squirrel-fish (skwur'el-fish), n. 1. Any fish of the family Holocentridæ, and especially of the genus Holocentrus. The numerous species are remarkable for the development of sharp spines almost everywhere on the surface of the body. The name refers to the noise they make when taken out of the water, which suggests the bark of a squirrel. H. pentacanthus of the West Indies, occasional on the United States coast, is chiefly of a bright-red color, with streaks shining lengthwise; its bright tints and quick movements make it one of the most conspicuous denizens of rocky tide-pools.
See cut under Holocentridæ.

2. The serrano, Diplectrum fasciculare, distinguished by the segregation of the serræ at the angle of the preoperculum into two groups. It is common in the West Indies, and also along the southern United States coast to North Carolina.—3. A local name of the pinfish, Lagodon rhomboides.

squirrel-grass (skwur'el-gräs), n. Same as squirreltail.

squirrel-hake (skwur'el-häk), n. A gadoid fish, Phycis chuss; the white hake. See chuss, *hake*², 2, and cut under Phycis.

squirrel-hawk (skwur'el-häk), n. The ferruginous rough-legged hawk, Archibuteo ferrugineus, the largest and handsomest bird of its genus, found in California and most other parts of western North America from British America southward: so called because it preys extensively upon ground-squirrels and related rodents. It is 23 inches long and 55 in extent; when adult the under parts are nearly white, with rich chestnut flags barred with black; the tail is mostly white, clouded with silver-gray, and tinged with bay; and the dark upper parts are much varied with brownish red.

squirrel-lemur (skwur'el-lēm'r), n. A lemur of the subfamily Galagininae, and especially of the genus Galago. See cut under Galago.

squirrel-lock (skwur'el-lok), n. Squirrel-fur from the under sides of the body. In gray squirrels it is pale-yellow, and it is used for lining winter garments.

squirrel-monkey

(skwur'el-mung'-ki), n. One of many kinds of small South American monkeys with a long, bushy, and non-prehensile tail: so called from their general aspect. (a) Any member of the family Haplorhina or Midiæ; a marmoset. See cut under Haplorhina. (b) Especially, a saimiri or titi of the genus Chrysothrix, as the death's-head, C. acureus. See saimiri, and compare saguin.

squirrel-mouse (skwur'el-mous), n. Same as dormouse.

squirrel-petaurist (skwur'el-pe-tā'rist), n. A squirrel-phalanger.

squirrel-phalanger (skwur'el-fā-lan'jēr), n. An Australian flying-phalanger, or petaurist, as Petaurus (Belideus) sciureus, a marsupial mammal resembling a squirrel in some respects.

squirrel-shrew (skwur'el-shrō), n. A small insectivorous mammal of the family Tupaia, as a banxring or a pentail. See cuts under Tupaia and Ptilocercus.

squirreltail (skwur'el-tāl), n. One of several grasses of the genus Hordeum. (a) In Great Britain, H. maritimum, and sometimes H. murinum, the wall-barley, and H. secalinum (H. pratense), the meadow-barley. (b) In the United States, chiefly H. jubatum, but in California also H. murinum, there naturalized and, as elsewhere, a pest, infesting wool, also the throats, etc., of animals, with its long barbed awns.

squirt (skwért), v. [E. dial. also swirt; perhaps < LG. swirtjen, squirt. The equiv. verb squitter can hardly be connected.] I. trans. 1. To eject with suddenness and force in a jet or rapid stream from a narrow orifice: as, to squirt water in one's face.

The hard-featured miscreant . . . coolly rolled his tobacco in his cheek and squirted the juice into the fire-grate. Scott, Guy Mannering, xxiii.

2. To spatter or bespatter.

Squirrel-monkey (Chrysothrix sciureus).

They know I dare
To spurn or baffle them, or squirt their eyes
With ink. B. Jonson, Apol. to Poetaster.

II. intrans. 1. To issue suddenly in a thin jet or jet-like stream, as from a syringe, or a narrow orifice suddenly opened; spurt.

The oars seemed to lash the water savagely, like a connected row of swords, and the spray squirted at each vicious stroke. C. Reade, Hard Cash, I.

2†. To prate; blab. [Old slang.]—squirting cucumber. See Ecballium.

squirt (skwért), n. [< squirt, v.] 1. An instrument with which a liquid may be ejected in a strong jet-like stream; a syringe.

His weapons are a pin to scratch and a squirt to bespatter. Pope.

2. A small jet; as, a squirt of water.—3. A system of motion of a fluid, where the motion is everywhere irrotational, and where there is no expansion except at isolated points.—4. Looseness of the bowels; diarrhea. [Low.]—5. A small, insignificant, but self-assertive fellow; an upstart; a cad. [Colloq.]—6. A hasty start or spurt. [Colloq.]

How different from the rash jerks and hare-brain'd squirts thou art wont, Tristram, to transact it with in other humours—dropping thy pen, spurning thy ink about thy table and thy books. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, III. 28.

7. A sea-squirt; an ascidian or tunicary.

squitter (skwér'tér), n. [< squirt + -er]. One who or that which squirts. O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast-Table, v.

squirt-gun (skwér'tün), n. A kind of squitter or syringe used as a toy by boys.

squiry (skwír'i), n. [< ME. squierie, < OF. escurie, escuierie, escuyerie, escuerie, escurie, < escuier, a squire: see squire]. 1†. A number of squires or attendants collectively. Rob. of Brunne, Chronicles.—2. The whole body of landed gentry.

stab (stab), v.; pret. and pp. stabbed, ppr. stabbing. [*< ME. staben (found in the noun); perhaps < Ir. Gael. stob, thrust, push, stab, fix a stake in the ground, < stob, a stake, pointed iron or stick, stub; cf. staff.] I. trans. 1. To puncture, pierce, or wound with or as with a pointed weapon, especially with a knife or dagger.

I fear I wrong the honourable men Whose daggers have stabbed Caesar. Shak., J. C., III. 2. 157.

He was not to be torn in pieces by a mob, or stabbed in the back by an assassin. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

2. To thrust or plunge, as a pointed weapon. [Rare.]

If we should recount
Our baleful news, . . .
Stab poniards in our flesh till all were told,
The wounds would add more anguish than the wounds. Shak., 3 Hen. VI., II. 1. 88.

3. Figuratively, to pierce or penetrate; inflict keen or severe pain upon; injure secretly, as by slander or malicious falsehoods: as, to stab one in the back (that is, to slander one behind his back).

Her silence stabbed his conscience through and through. Lowell, A Legend of Brittany, II. 24.

4. In masonry, to pick (a brick wall) so as to make it rough, and thereby afford a hold for plaster.—To stab armst. See armst.—To stab out, to cut a continuous incision in with a sharp edge like that of a chisel, by making one cut in line with and in continuation of another, the first guiding the second, and so on.

II. intrans. 1. To aim a blow with a dagger or other pointed weapon, either literally or figuratively: as, to stab at a person.

None shall dare
With shortened sword to stab in closer war. Dryden, Pal. and Arc., III. 509.

2. To wound; be extremely cutting.

She speaks poniards, and every word stabs. Shak., Much Ado, II. 1. 255.

stab (stab), n. [< stab, v.] 1. A thrust or blow with the point of a weapon, especially a dagger.

Hee neuer reuengeth with lesse than the stab. Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 25.

To fall beneath a base assassin's stab. Rowe, Ambitious Step-Mother, II. 2.

2. A wound made with a sharp-pointed weapon.

His gash'd stabs look'd like a breach in nature
For ruin's wasteful entrance. Shak., Macbeth, II. 3. 119.

3. A wound given in the dark; a treacherous injury.

This sudden stab of rancour I misdoubt. Shak., Rich. III., III. 2. 89.

Stabat Mater (stā'bat mā'tér). [So called from the first words of the Latin text, Stabat mater, 'The mother (sc. of Jesus) was standing': L. stabdt, 3d pers. sing. imperf. ind. of stare, stand (see stand); mater = Gr. μήτηρ = E. mother: see mother.] 1. In the Rom. Cath. liturgy, a sequence on the Virgin Mary at the crucifixion, written about 1300 by Jacobus de Benedictis (Jacopone da Todi). It has also been ascribed to Innocent III. and others, and was probably modeled on older hymns such as the staurtheotokia of the Greek Church. It is sung after the Epistle on the Feasts of the Seven Dolours of the Blessed Virgin Mary on the Friday before Good Friday and on the third Sunday in September.

2. A musical setting of this sequence. Famous examples have been written by Palestrina, Pergolesi, Rossini, Dvořák, and others.

stabber (stab'ér), n. [< stab + -er]. 1. One who stabs; one who murders by stabbing.

A lurking, waylaying coward, and a stabber in the dark. Dennis (?), True Character of Mr. Pope (1716).

stabbing-press (stab'ing-pres), n. In bookbinding, same as stabbing-machine.

stably, adv. An old spelling of stably.

stabilify (stā-bil'i-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. stabilified, ppr. stabilifying. [< L. stabilis, steadfast, steady (see *stable*²), + facere, make.]. To render stable, fixed, or firm; establish. [Rare.]

Render solid and stabilify mankind. Browning, (Imp. Dict.) stabiliment (stā-bil'i-ment), n. [< L. stabilimentum, a stay, support, < stabilire, make firm, fix: see *stable*², v.] 1. Stabilishment; establishment. [Rare.]

If the apostolate, in the first stabiliment, was this eminency of power, then it must be so. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 32.

2. Support; prop. [Rare.]

They serve for stabiliment, propagation, and shade. Derham.

stabilisation, stabilise. See stabilization, stabilize.

stabilitate (stā-bil'i-tāt), v. t. [< L. stabilita(t)-s, steadfastness, firmness (see stability), + *-ate*².] To make stable; establish.

The soul about it self circumgyrates
Her various forms, and what she most doth love
She oft before her self stabilitates. Dr. H. More, Psychathanasia, I. II. 43.

The work reserved for him who shall come to stabilite our empire in the East, if ever he comes at all.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 180.

stability (stā-bil'ī-ti), n. [In ME. stabilite, stablete; < OF. stablete, F. stabilité = Sp. estabilidad = Pg. estabilidade = It. stabilità, < L. stabilitas (t-), firmness, steadfastness, < stabilis, firm, steadfast: see stable.] 1. The state or property of being stable or firm; strength to stand and resist overthrow or change; steadiness; firmness: as, the stability of a building, of a government, or of a system.

Take myn herte in-to thi ward,
And sette thou me in stabilite!
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 26.

What I see in England, in America, in Switzerland, is stability, the power to make changes, when change is needed, without pulling the whole political fabric down on the heads of the reformers.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 306.

2. Steadiness or firmness, as of purpose or resolution; fixity of character; steadfastness: the opposite of fickleness and inconstancy.

The natural generation and process of all things receive their order of proceeding from the settled stability of divine understanding.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, I. 3.

3. Fixedness, as opposed to fluidity.

Fluidness and stability are contrary qualities. Boyle.

4. Continuance in the same state: permanence; specifically, an additional or fourth vow of continuance in the same profession, and residence for life in the same monastery, imposed upon monks by the Benedictine rule.—5. That character of equilibrium, or of a body in equilibrium, in virtue of which, if the position is disturbed, it tends to be restored. The term is especially used in this sense with reference to ships and floating bodies, in which the distance of the center of gravity below the metacenter is the measure of the stability. This may be considered as the difference between the distance of the center of flotation from the metacenter, called the stability of figure, and the distance of the center of gravity from the metacenter, called the stability of load. The stability under sail is also considered.—Moment of stability. See moment. = Syn. 1 and 2. Immobility, permanence. See stable.

stabilization (stā-bil-i-zā'shən), n. [< stabilize + -ation.] The act of rendering stable; establishment. Also spelled stabilisation.

The transformation of "stable" matter into "unstable" that takes place during the assimilation of food is necessary, because, during the activity of the organism, forces are constantly becoming "fixed," and with this "fixation of force" goes "the stabilisation of matter."
Mind, XII. 602.

stabilize (stā-bil-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. stabilized, ppr. stabilizing. [< L. stabilis, firm (see stable), + -ize.] To render stable. Also spelled stabilise.

A written literature, the habit of recording and reading, the prevalence of actual instruction, work yet more powerfully in the same direction; and when such forces have reached the degree of strength which they show in our modern enlightened communities, they fairly dominate the history of speech. The language is stabilized, especially as regards all those alterations which proceed from inaccuracy. Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 153.

stablete, n. A Middle English form of stability.
stable¹ (stā'bl), n. [< ME. stable, stabil, < OF. estable, F. étable = Pr. estable = Sp. establo = Pg. estabulo = It. stabbio, a stable, stall, < L. stabulum, a standing-place, abode, habitation, usually in the particular senses, an inclosure for animals, as for cows (a stall), sheep (a fold), birds (an aviary), bees (a beehive), etc., also poet. a flock, herd, also a public house, tavern; < stare, stand: see stand. Cf. stall.] 1. A building or an inclosure in which horses, cattle, and other domestic animals are lodged, and which is furnished with stalls, troughs, racks, and bins to contain their food and necessary equipments; in a restricted sense, such a building for horses and cows only; in a still narrower and now the most usual sense, such a building for horses only.

Richard the Redcress, I. 10.

stable-boy (stā'bl-boi), n. A boy who is employed about a stable.

stable-call (stā'bl-kāl), n. A trumpet-signal in the cavalry and light artillery services, to assemble the troop or battery for the purpose of watering and grooming the horses; hence, the assembling of a troop for this purpose.

Will you go down to stable-call and pick out a mount?
The Century, XXXVII. 900.

stable-fly (stā'bl-flī), n. 1. The biting house-fly, Stomoxys calcitrans, common to Europe and North America. It much resembles the common house-fly, Musca domestica, but bites severely and is often very troublesome. As it enters houses before storms, it has given rise to the expression "flies bite before a storm." 2. Another fly, Cyrtoneura stabulans, common to Europe and North America.

stablely, adv. A Middle English form of stably.

stable-man (stā'bl-mān), n. A man who attends in a stable; an ostler; a groom.

stability (stā'bl-nes), n. [< ME. stabilnesse, stabilnes, stabilnesse; < *stable*² + -ness.] The state, character, or property of being stable, in any sense of the word.

stabler (stā'bl-er), n. [< ME. stabler, stabyller, < OF. stablier = Sp. establero, a stable-boy, < L. stabularius, a stable-boy, also a host, a taverner, landlord, prop. adj., pertaining to a stable or to a public house, < stabulum, a stable, a public house: see *stable*¹.] A person who stables horses, or furnishes accommodations and food for them.

There came a man to the stabler (so they call the people at Edinburgh that take in horses to keep), and wanted to know if he could hear of any returned horses for England.
Defoe, Col. Jack, p. 240. (Davies.)

stable-room (stā'bl-rōm), n. Room in a stable; room for stables.

stable-stand (stā'bl-stand), n. In old Eng. law, the position of a man who is found at his place in the forest with a crossbow bent, or with a long-bow, ready to let fly at a deer, or standing near a tree with greyhounds in a leash ready to slip. This is one of the four presumptions that a man intends stealing the king's deer.

stablete, n. A Middle English form of stability.

stabling (stā'bling), n. [Verbal n. of *stable*¹, v.] 1. The act of putting horses or other beasts into a stable.—2. Stable accommodation; shelter for horses and other beasts; stables.

Her terrour once on Afric's tawny shore,
Now smok'd in dust, a stabling now for wolves.
Thomson, Liberty, iii. 372.

The villas look dreary and lonesome, . . . with their high garden walls, their long, low piles of stabling, and the passé indelicacy of their nymphs and fauns.
Howells, Venetian Life, xxi.

stablish (stab'lish), v. t. [< ME. stabilishen, stabilishen, stabilishen, < OF. establiss, stem of certain parts of establir, F. établir, < L. stabilire, make firm or steadfast: see *stable*², v. Cf. establish.] To make stable or firm; establish; set up; ordain. [Archaic.]

Deyne thowht . . . stabilishen many manere gyses to thinges that ben to done. Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 6.

To stop effusion of our Christian blood,
And stablish quietness on every side.
Shak., I Hen. VI., v. 1. 10.

Let a man stablish himself in those courses he approves.
Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 238.

stablishment (stab'lish-ment), n. [< stablish + -ment. Cf. establishment.] Establishment.

For stint of strife and stablishment of rest.
Spenser, F. Q., V. viii. 21.

stably (stā'bli), adv. [< ME. stably, stably; < *stable*² + -ly.] In a stable manner; firmly; fixedly; securely.

God disponith in his purvyance syngulerly and stably the thinges that ben to done.
Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 6.

Thay salde a sterne, with lemys bright,
Owte of the East shulde stably stonde.
York Plays, p. 126.

stabulation (stab-ū-lā'shən), n. [< L. stabulatio (n-), a place where cattle are housed, < stabulari, pp. stabulatus, stable, lodge: see *stable*¹, v.] 1. The act of stabling beasts.—2. A place or room for stabling beasts.

stabwort (stab'wört), n. The wood-sorrel, Oxalis Acetosella: so called as being considered good for wounds.

stabyll, n. A Middle English form of *stable*¹, *stable*².

stacca (stāk'ā), n. A Welsh dry measure, equal to three Winchester bushels.

staccatissimo (stāk-kā-tis'i-mō), a. [It., superl. of staccato, detached: see staccato.] In music, very staccato.

staccato (stāk-kā-tō), a. [< It. staccato, pp. of staccare, for distaccare, separate, detach: see detach.] In music, detached; disconnected; abrupt; separated from one another by slight pauses: used both of single tones in a melody and of chords: opposed to legato. Three grades of staccato are sometimes recognized—the slightest being marked by dots over or under the notes with a sweeping curve (a), the next by dots without the curve (b), and the greatest by pointed strokes instead of dots (c). In each case something is subtracted from the duration of each note, and given to a rest or silence. On keyboard-instruments like the pianoforte and organ, a staccato effect is produced by a variation of the usual touch in the action either of the fingers, of the wrist, or of the forearm; in bow-instruments like the violin, by an abrupt detached motion of the bow, or by a springing bow; in wind-instruments, by stopping the mouthpiece with the tongue (sometimes called tuonging); and in the voice, either by a detached action of the breath or by a closing of the glottis. The word is also used sometimes to note an abrupt emphatic style of speaking or writing.—Staccato mark, in musical notation, a dot or pointed stroke added over or under a note to indicate a staccato rendering.—Staccato touch, in playing the pianoforte or organ, a touch designed to produce a clear and musical staccato effect.

stacher (stāch'ér), v. t. A Scotch form of *stacker*¹.

Stachydeæ (stā-kid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham, 1836), < Stachys (assumed stem Stachyd-) + -æ.] A tribe of gamopetalous plants, of the order Labiatae. It is characterized by a five- or ten-nerved or -veined calyx, a corolla with the upper lip erect, concave, and commonly galeate or arched, the lower lip three-cleft and spreading, four perfect ascending or included stamens, with the forward pair longer, and a four-parted ovary forming in fruit four dry outlets fixed by a small basal or slightly oblique scar. It includes 30 genera (of which Stachys is the type), classed in the subtribes Scutellariææ, Melittæ, Marrubieæ, and Lamiæ; other important genera are Physostegia, Brinella (Prunella), Phlomis, Sideritis, Ballota, Galopsis, Lamium, Leonurus, and Moluccella. See cut under self-head.

Stachys (stă'kis), n. [NL. (Rivinus, 1690), < L. stachys, < Gr. στάχυς, a plant, woundwort, Stachys arvensis, so called from the spiked flowers; a particular use of στάχυς, an ear of corn, a spike, in gen. a plant.] A genus of plants, of the order Labiata, type of the tribe Stachydeæ. It is characterized by flowers with the five calyx-teeth equal or the posterior larger, the corolla-tube somewhat cylindrical and either included in or exerted from the calyx, the upper lip usually entire and arched, the anther-cells usually diverging, and the ovary forming nutlets which are obtuse or rounded at the top. Over 200 species have been described, of which about 170 are now thought to be distinct. They are widely dispersed through the temperate zones, occur within the tropics on mountains, and extend in a few cases into frigid and subalpine regions. They are lacking in Australia and New Zealand, and nearly so in Chili and in South Africa. Sixteen species occur in the United States; 5 are eastern, of which S. aspera is the most common, and S. palustris the most widely diffused. Several species, especially S. sylvatica of Europe, are known as heiligennette, and several others as woundwort, particularly S. Germanica. For S. hibernica see betony, and for S. palustris see cloven-head. Several species are occasionally cultivated for ornament, as S. lanata, a woolly-leaved plant much used for edgings, S. affinis (S. tuberosa), an esculent recently introduced from Japan, cultivated in France under the name of crown, produces numerous small white tubers which may be eaten boiled or fried or prepared as a preserve. The tubers are said to decay rapidly if exposed to the air, and are kept in the ground or packed in sand; their taste is compared to that of the sweet potato, followed by a peculiar piquant flavor.

Stachytarpheta (stak'ti-tär-fë'tü), n. [NL. (Vahl, 1804), so called from the thick flower-spikes; prob. an error for Stachytarpheta*, < Gr. στάχυς, a spike, + ταρφεύς, thick, dense, < τρίφειν, thicken.] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Verbenaceæ and tribe Verbenææ. It is characterized by sessile spiked flowers with a narrow five-ribbed five-nerved calyx, a corolla with five spreading lobes, two perfect stamens with divaricate anther-cells, and a two-celled ovary ripening into two hard dry oblong or linear one-seeded nutlets. There are about 45 species, natives of tropical and subtropical America, with one species, S. indica, also dispersed through tropical Africa and Asia. They are herbs or shrubs bearing opposite or alternate toothed and commonly rugose leaves. The flowers are white, blue, purple, or scarlet, solitary in the axils of bracts, and sessile or half-immersed in the axis of the more or less densely crowded terminal spikes. The species are sometimes called bastard or false vervain. S. Jamaicensis (now identified with S. indica) is the gerroa (which see), from its use sometimes called Brazilian tea. This and other species, as S. mutabilis, a handsome ever-blooming shrub, are occasionally cultivated under glass.

stack¹ (stak), n. [ME. stack, stacke, stakke, stak, stac, < Icel. stakkr, a stack of hay (cf. stakka, a stump), = Sw. stack = Dan. stak, a stack, pile of hay; allied to stakel, and ult. from the root of *stick*¹. Hence *staggard*².] 1. A pile of grain in the sheaf, or of hay, straw, pease, etc., gathered into a circular or rectangular form, often, when of large size, coming to a point or ridge at the top, and thatched to protect it from the weather.

The whole prairie was covered with yellow wheat stacks. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 531.

2. A pile of sticks, billets, poles, or cordwood; formerly, also, a pyre, or burial pile.

Against every pillar was a stack of billets above a man's height, which the watermen that bring wood down the Seine . . . laid there. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 249.

3. A pile or group of other objects in orderly position. (a) In printing, a flat pile of paper, printed or unprinted, in a press-room or bindery. (b) Milit., the pyramidal group formed by a number of muskets with fixed bayonets when stacked. (c) In paper-making, four or more calendering-rolls in position. (d) In libraries, a set of book-shelves one above the other, whether placed against a wall or standing in the middle of a room.

4. A number of funnels or chimneys standing together.—5. A single chimney or passage-way for smoke; the chimney or funnel of a locomotive or steam-vessel: also called smoke-stack. See cuts under passenger-engine and puddling-furnace.—6. A high detached rock; a columnar rock; a precipitous rock rising out of the sea. The use of the word stack with this meaning is very common on the coast of Scotland and the adjacent islands (especially the Orkneys), and is almost exclusively limited to that region.

Here [in Shetland] also, near 200 yards from the shore, stands the Stack of Snaila, a grand perpendicular column of rock, at least sixty, but more probably eighty, feet high, on the summit of which the eagle has annually nested from time immemorial. Shirreff, Shetland, p. 5.

7. A customary unit of volume for fire-wood and coal, generally 4 cubic yards (108 cubic feet). The three-quarter stack in parts of Derbyshire is said to be 105 or 106 cubic feet.—8. pl. A large quantity; "lots": as, stacks of money. [Slang.] = syn. 1. Shock, etc. See *sheaf*¹.

stack¹ (stak), v. t. [ME. stakken (= Sw. stacka = Dan. stakke), stack; from the noun.] 1. To pile or build in the form of a stack; make into a regularly formed pile: as, to stack grain.

Your hay is well brought in, and better stacked than usual. Swift, To Dr. Sheridan, Sept. 19, 1725.

2. To make up (cards) in a designed manner, so as to secure an unfair advantage; pack.—To stack arms, to stand together muskets or rifles with fixed bayonets in definite numbers, as four or six together, so that they form a tent-shaped group.

stack² (stak). An obsolete or dialectal pret-erit of *stick*¹ (and *stick*²).

stackage (stak'aj), n. [< *stack*¹ + -age.] 1. Grain, hay, etc., put up in stacks. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.—2. A tax on things stacked. Imp. Dict.

stack-borer (stak'bör'er), n. An instrument for piercing stacks of hay, to admit air, where the hay is in danger of damage from heating.

stacken-cloud (stak'n-klood), n. A cumulus cloud.

The rapid formation and disappearance of small cumuli is a process constantly going on in particular kinds of weather. These little stacken-clouds seem to form out of the atmosphere, and to be resolved again as rapidly into it. Forster, Atmospheric Phenomena, p. 58.

stacker¹ (stak'er), v. i. [See also stakker, stacher; < ME. stakeren, also stakelen, < Icel. stakra, push, stagger, freq. of staka, push, punt; cf. stjaka, punt, push with a stake (stjaki, a punt-pole), = Dan. stage = Sw. staka, push, punt with a stake, = MD. staken, stacken, set stakes, dam up with stakes, give up work, = E. stakel: see stakel, v. Doublet of stagger.] 1. To stagger. [Prov. Eng.]

She rist her up, and stakereth heer and ther. Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2637.

2†. To stammer. Prompt. Parv., p. 471.
stacker² (stak'er), n. [< *stack*¹ + -er.] An attachment to a threshing-machine for raising and delivering the straw from the machine, either upon a wagon or upon a stack. It consists of an endless-belt elevator running in a trough that can be placed at any angle, the whole being mounted on wheels, and connected by belting with the thresher, or with the engine or other motor. Also called straw-hay-elevator, and stacking-machine. Another form of stacker consists of a portable derrick used with a hay-fork, and commonly called a stacking-derrick.

stacket (stak'et), n. [< G. staket, a palisade, stockade; appar. connected with *stack*¹.] A stockade. Scott.

stack-funnel (stak'fun'el), n. A pyramidal open frame of wood in the center of a stack. Its object is to allow the air to circulate through the stack, and prevent the heating of the grain. See stack-stand.

stack-guard (stak'giird), n. A covering for a haystack or rick, whether for the top or the exposed side. Sometimes it is suspended from posts temporarily set up.

Stackhousia (stak-hou'si-ä), n. [NL. (Sir J. E. Smith, 1798), named after John Stackhouse, an English botanist (died 1819).] A genus of plants, type of the order Stackhousiæ. It consists of about 20 species, all Australian except 2, which are natives, one of New Zealand, the other of the Philippine Islands. They are small herbs with a perennial herbaceous or woody rootstock, producing unbranched or slightly divided flower-bearing stems and alternate linear or spatulate leaves, which are entire and slightly fleshy or coriaceous. The flowers are white or yellow, borne in spikes terminating the branches, or in clusters along the main stem. Each flower consists of a small three-bracted calyx, an elongated often gamopetalous corolla with five included stamens, a thin disk, and a free ovary with from two to five styles or style-branches.

Stackhousiæ (stak-hou-si'ë-ë), n. pl. [NL. (H. G. L. Reichenbach, 1828), < Stackhousia + -æ.] An order of plants, of the polypetalous series Discifloræ and cohort Celastrales. It is characterized by a hemispherical calyx-tube, having five imbricated lobes, five erect imbricated and often united petals, and as many alternate stamens. From the related orders Celastrinæ and Rhamnaceæ it is especially distinguished by its lobed ovary, which is sessile, roundish, and from two- to five-celled, and ripens from two to five indehiscent globose or angled one-seeded carpels, which are smooth, reticulated, or broadly winged. It consists of the genus Stackhousia and the monotypic Australian genus Macgregoria. Also Stackhousiæ.

stacking-band (stak'ing-band), n. A band or rope used in binding thatch or straw on a stack.

stacking-belt (stak'ing-belt), n. Same as stacking-band.

stacking-stage (stak'ing-stäij), n. A scaffold or stage used in building stacks.

stack-room (stak'röm), n. In libraries, a room devoted to stacks of book-shelves; a book-room.

stack-stand (stak'stand), n. A basement of timber or masonry, sometimes of iron, raised on props and placed in a stack-yard, on which to build a stack. Its object is to keep the lower part of the stack dry, and exclude vermin. Such stands are more common in European countries than in the United States.

stack-yard (stak'yärd), n. [< *stack*¹ + *yard*². Cf. *staggard*².] A yard or inclosure for stacks of hay or grain.

stacte (stak'të), n. [< L. stacte, stacta, < Gr. στακτή, the oil that trickles from fresh myrrh or cinnamon, fem.

of στακτός, dropping, oozing out, < σάκνιν, drop, let fall drop by drop.] One of the sweet spices which composed the holy incense of the ancient Jews. Two kinds have been described—one, the fresh gum of the myrrh-tree, Balsamodendron Myrrha, mixed with water and squeezed out through a press; the other, the resin of the storax, Styrax officinale, mixed with wax and fat.

Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and galbanum. Ex. xxx. 34.

stactometer (stak-tom'e-tër), n. [Also stactometer; < Gr. στακτός, dropping, oozing out (see stacte), + μέτρον, a measure.] A glass tube having a bulb in the middle, and tapering to a fine orifice at one end, used for ascertaining the number of drops in equal bulks of different liquids. Also called stalagmometer.

stad†. A Middle English form of the past participle of stead.

stadda (stad'ä), n. [Origin obscure.] A double-bladed hand-saw, used for cutting comb-teeth. Also called steady.

staddle (stad'l), n. [Also stadle, and more orig. stathel, Sc. stathle, contr. stail, stale, < ME. stathel, < AS. stathol, stathul, stathel, a foundation, base, seat, site, position, firmament (= OS. stadal = OFries. stathul = MLG. stadel = OHG. stadal, MHG. G. stadel, a stall, shed, = Icel. stöð-hull = Norw. stöldul, stodul, contr. stöul, staul, stöl, stul, usually stöl, a milking-shed); with formative -thol (-dle) (akin to L. stabilum, a stable, stall, with formative -bulum), from the root sta of stand: see stand, and cf. stead. See stalworth.] 1†. A prop or support; a staff; a crutch.

His weak steps governing
And aged limbs on cypresse staddle stout.
Spenser, F. Q., I. vi. 14.

2. The frame or support of a stack of hay or grain; a stack-stand.

Oak looked under the staddles and found a fork.
T. Hardy, Far from the Madding Crowd, xxxvi.

3. A young or small tree left uncut when others are cut down.

It is commonlie scene that those young staddles which we leave standing at one & twentie yeeres fall are usuallie at the next sale cut downe without any danger of the statute, and serue for fire bote, if it please the owner to burne them.

W. Harrison, Descrip. of England, li. 22. (Holinshed.)

At the edge of the woods a rude structure had been hastily thrown up, of staddles interlaced with boughs.

S. Judd, Margaret, li. 5.

4. In agri., one of the separate plots into which a cock of hay is shaken out for the purpose of drying.

staddle (stad'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. staddled, ppr. staddling. [Also stadle; < staddle, n.] 1. To leave the staddles in, as a wood when it is cut.

First see it well fenced, ere hewers begin.
Then see it well staddled, without and within.
Tusser, April's Husbandry.

2. To form into staddles, as hay.

staddle-roof (stad'l-röf), n. The roof or covering of a stack.

stadel (städ), n. Same as stathle.

stade² (städ), n. [In ME. stadie, q. v.; = F. stade = Sp. estadio = Pg. estadio = It. stadio, < L. stadium, a furlong: see stadium.] A furlong; a stadium.

The greatness of the town, by that we could judge, stretcheth in circuit some forty stades.
Donne, Hist. Septuagint (1633), p. 71. (Latham.)

stadholder (stad'höl'dër), n. [Also spelled stadtholder (= F. stadhouder); a partial accommodation of MD. stadhouder, a deputy, legate, vicar, substitute, lieutenant, esp. a viceroy, a governor of a province, esp. in Holland, in later use (D. stadhouder = G. statthalter), a governor, a chief magistrate, lit. 'stead-holder', lieutenant, "locum-tenens" (Kilian); < MD. stad, stede, D. stede, stee (= OHG. MHG. stat, G. statt, place, = AS. stede, E. stead, place), + holder = G. halter = E. holder: see stead and holder. In another view, reflected in the false spelling stadtholder, the first element is supposed to be D. stad = G. stadt, a town, city (a particular use of the preceding); but this is an error, due to the fact that D. stad, in its lit. sense 'place,' is now obsolete; moreover, a stadholder is not the 'keeper of a city.' Formerly, in the Netherlands, (a) the governor or lieutenant-governor of a province; (b) the chief magistrate of the United Provinces of the Netherlands.

Stack-stand with Stack-funnel.

stadholderate (stad' hól' dër-ät), n. [Also spelled stadtholderate (= F. stathoudérat); < stadholder + -ate.] The office of a stadholder. The Academy, July 20, 1889, p. 32.

stadholdership (stad' hól' dër-ship), n. [Also spelled stadtholdership; < stadholder + -ship.] Same as stadholderate.

stadia (stá'di-ä), n. [< ML. stadia, a station, a fem. form, orig. pl. of the neut. stadium, a stage, station, stadium: see stadium.] 1. A station temporarily occupied in surveying.— 2. An instrument for measuring distances by means of the angle subtended by an object of known dimensions. The instrument commonly so called, intended for rough military work in action, consists of a small glass plate with figures of horsemen and foot-soldiers as they appear at marked distances, or with two lines nearly horizontal but converging, crossed by vertical lines marked with the distances at which a man appears of the height between the first lines.

3. In civil and topographical engin., the method or the instruments by which what are called stadia measurements are made. This use is almost exclusively limited to the United States, where this method of measuring distances is extensively employed. Stadia measurements are based on the geometrical principle that the lengths of parallel lines subtending an angle are proportioned to their distances from the apex of that angle. The essential appliances for this kind of work are a pair of fine horizontal wires (which are usually of platinum, but which may be spider-webs, or even lines ruled or photographed on the glass), in addition to the ordinary horizontal and vertical wires in the diaphragm of a telescope, and a staff or graduated rod (the stadia rod)—these giving the means of measuring with considerable precision the angle subtended by the whole or any part of a vertical staff, and thus furnishing the data for determining the distance of the rod from the point of sight. This may be accomplished by making the subtending angle variable (that is, by making the wires movable) and the space on the staff fixed in length, or by having the angle constant (that is, the wires fixed in position) and reading off a varying length on the staff; the latter is the method now most generally used. The wires may be applied to the telescope of any suitable instrument, as a theodolite or transit-theodolite; but the method is specially well adapted for use in plane-tableing, the wires being inserted in the telescope of the alidade. This arrangement has been extensively used in the United States, and has given excellent results. The intervals between the wires are frequently arranged so that at a distance of 100 feet a space of one foot shall be intercepted on the rod; but there are also instruments made in which the number of wires is increased, the method of reading varying accordingly.

stadief, n. [ME., < L. stadium, a race-course, a furlong: see stade, stadium.] A race-course; a stadium.

If a man renneth in the stadie or in the forlonge for the corone, than lieth the mede in the corone for whiche he renneth. Chaucer, Boethius, iv. prose 3.

stadimeter (stá'di-om'e-tèr), n. [< Gr. στάδιον (see stadium) + μέτρον, measure.] A modified theodolite in which the directions are not read off, but marked upon a small sheet, which is changed at each station. The distances as read on the telemeter can also be laid down. The stadimeter differs from the plane-table in that the alidade cannot be moved relatively to the sheet.

stadium (stá'di-um), n.; pl. stadia (-ä). [< L. stadium, < Gr. στάδιον, a fixed standard of length, specifically 600 Greek feet (see def. 1), a furlong (nearly), hence a race-course of this length, lit. 'that which stands fast,' < ιστάται (√ στα), stand: see stand. Cf. stade, stadie.] 1. A Greek itinerary unit, originally the distance between successive stations of the shouters and runners employed to estimate distances. The stadium of Eratosthenes seems to have been short of 520 English feet; but the stadium at the race-course at Athens has been found to be between 603 and 610 English feet. The Roman stadium was about the same length, being one eighth of a Roman mile.

Hence—2. A Greek course for foot-races, disposed on a level, with sloping banks or tiers of seats for spectators rising along its two sides and at one end, which was typically of semi-circular plan. The course proper was exactly a stadium in length. The most celebrated stadia were those of Olympia and Athens.

3. A stage; period; in med., a stage or period of a disease, especially of an intermittent disease.

Mohammed was now free once more; but he no longer thought of carrying on his polemic against the Meccans or of seeking to influence them at all. In his relations to them three stadia can be distinguished, although it is easier to determine their character than their chronology. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 550.

stadlet, n. An obsolete form of staddle.

Stadmannia (stad-man'i-ä), n. [NL. (Lamarek, 1823), named after Stadmann, a German botanical traveler.] A genus of trees, of the order Sapindaceæ and tribe Nephelieæ. It is distinguished from the nearly related genus Nephelium (which see) by the absence of petals and by a somewhat spherical calyx with five broad obtuse teeth, by warty branches, and by small velvety plum-like berries. The only species, S. Sideroxylon, is a native of Mauritius and Bourbon. It has alternate abruptly pinnate leaves with from three to six pairs of oblong obtuse leaflets, oblique at the base, each leaflet narrow, entire, smooth, and finely reticulated. The small pedicelled flowers form axillary branching panicles, with conspicuous long-exserted erect stamens. It is known as Bourbon ironwood. See Macassar oil, under oil.

stadtholder, stadtholderate (stat' hól' dër, -ät), etc. Erroneous spellings of stadholder, etc.

staff (stáf), n.; pl. staves, stoffs (stävz, stáfs). [< ME. staff, staffe, staf (gen. staves, dat. stave, pl. stafas, a stick, staff, twig, letter (see etym. of book); = OS. staf = OFries. stef = D. staf = MLG. LG. staf = OHG. Not connected with L. stipes, a stock, post, which is cognate with E. stiff. Hence stave, q. v.] 1. A stick or pole. Specifically—(a) A stick used as a walking-stick, especially one five or six feet long used as a support in walking or climbing.

In his hand a staff. Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 495.

He [the pilgrim] had a long staffe in his hand with a nobbe in the middle, according to the fashion of those Pilgrims staffes. Coriart, Crudities, l. 20.

(b) A stick used as a weapon, as that used at quarter-staff; a club; a cudgel.

A god-to-hand staffe therowt he hent,
Efor Roben he lepe.

Robin Hood and the Potter (Child's Ballads, V. 20).

The wars are doubtful;
And on our horsemen's staves Death looks as grimly
As on your keen-edg'd swords.

Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant, l. 1.

(c) A stick used as an ensign of authority; a baton or scepter. Compare baton, club, mace.

The Earl of Worcester

Hath broke his staff, resign'd his stewardship.
Shak., Rich. II., li. 2. 59.

(d) A post fixed in the ground; a stake.

The rampant bear chain'd to the ragged staff.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 203.

(e) A pole on which to hoist and display a flag; as, a flag-staff; an ensign-staff; a jack-staff.

The flag of Norway and the cross of St. George floated from separate staves on the lawn.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 295.

(f) The pole of a vehicle; a carriage-pole.

His newe lady holdeth him so narrow
Up by the brydel, at the staves ende,
That every word he dreed it as an awe.

Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 184.

(g) The long handle of certain weapons, as a spear, a halberd, or a poleax.

There stuck no plume in any English crest
That is removed by a staff of France.

Shak., K. John, li. 1. 318.

Their staves upon their rests they lay.

Drayton, Nymphidia.

(h) A straight-edge for testing or truing a line or surface: as, the proof-staff used in testing the face of the stone in a grind-mill. (i) In surv., a graduated stick, used in leveling. See cross-staff, Jacob's-staff, and cut under leveling-staff. (j) One of several instruments formerly used in taking the sun's altitude at sea: as, the fore-staff, back-staff, cross-staff. See these words. (k) In ship-building, a measuring and spacing rule. (l) The stilt of a plow. 2. In surv., a grooved steel instrument having a curvature, used to guide the knife or gorget through the urethra into the bladder in the operation of lithotomy.—3. In arch., same as rudenture.—4. Something which upholds or supports; a support; a prop.

He is a stafe of stedfastnes bothe erly & latte
To chastes sicke knyghtes as don ayenst the lawe.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 3.

The boy was the very staf of my age, my very prop.

Shak., M. of V., li. 2. 70.

Bread is the staff of life.

Swift, Tale of a Tub, iv.

5†. A round of a ladder. Latham.—6. A body of assistants or executive officers. (a) Milit., a body of officers who are not in command of troops, but who act as the assistants of an officer in high command, sometimes including that officer himself. Thus, the regimental staff consists of the colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, and adjutant, or the officers corresponding to these ranks: the brigade staff and division staff are composed of aides-de-camp, commissaries, quartermasters, and the like; and the staff of a general commanding an army-corps, or an army composed of several army-corps, includes these last-named officers and also a chief of staff, a chief of artillery, a chief engineer, and the like. The general staff is a body of officers forming the central office of the army of a nation, and it acts, in a sense, as the personal staff of the commander-in-chief, or of the king or other chief ruler. In the United States navy, staff-officers are the non-combatants, comprising the medical corps, the pay-corps, the steam-engineering corps, and chaplains, of those who go to sea, as well as civil engineers, naval constructors, and professors of mathematics. (b) A body of executive officers attached to any establishment for the carrying out of its designs, or a number of persons, considered as one body, intrusted with the execution of any undertaking: as, the editorial and reporting staff of a newspaper; the staff of the Geological Survey; a hospital staff.

The Archbishop [Becket] had amongst his chaplains a staff of professors on a small scale.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 143.

7†. A letter of the alphabet. See etymology of book.

The first staff iss nemmedd I. Ormulum, l. 4312.

8†. A line; a verse; also, a stanza.

Nerehande stafes by staf, by gret diligence, Sanyng that I most metre apply to;
The wordes meue, and sett here & ther.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 6555.

If we consider well the form of this Poetical staffe, we shall finde it to be a certain number of verses allowed to go altogether and ioyne without any intermission, and doe or should finish vp all the sentences of the same with a full period.

Pattenham, Arts of Eng. Poesie, p. 54.

I can sing but one staff of the ditty neither.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, li. 1.

Cowley found out that no kind of staff is proper for a heroic poem, as being all too lyrical.

Dryden.

9. In musical notation, a set of five horizontal lines on which notes are placed so as to indicate the pitch of intended tones. Both the lines and the spaces between them are significant, and are called degrees: they are numbered from below upward. When the nine degrees of the staff are not sufficient for the notation of a melody or chord, it is extended by means of added or leger lines above or below. In general, the successive degrees of the staff are understood to correspond to the successive degrees of the scale or to the successive white keys of the keyboard, irrespective of the fact that the intervals thus indicated are not equal to each other. An absolute pitch for the staff-degrees is indicated by a clef placed at the beginning. (See clef.) Gregorian music is customarily written on a staff of four lines, and the only clef used is the C clef. The staff with its appropriate notation is a development from the early medieval neumes, which were originally dots, dashes, or compound marks, whose relative position or shape indicated the relative pitch of successive tones. To make this notation more precise a horizontal line was drawn across the page to mark the pitch of some given tone, as C or F, and the neumes were arranged above or below this line. Later, a second line was added, and then others, only the lines being at first regarded as significant. What was called the great or grand staff was such a staff of eleven lines. In harmonic or concerted music, two or more staves are used together, and are connected by a brace. See brace, 5, and score, 9. Also stave, especially in Great Britain.

10. In her., same as fissure, 5.—Bishop's staff. See crozier, 1.—Cantoral staff, cantor's staff, the official staff of a cantor or precentor: it is primarily the baton with which he beats time, but is often large, and elaborately ornamented, becoming a mere badge of office. Also called baton.—David's staff, a kind of quadrant formerly used in navigation.—Episcopal staff, in her., the representation of a bishop's or pastoral staff, usually entwined with a bandlerole which is secured to the shaft below the head. See cut under bandlerole.—Folliferous staff. See foliiferous.—Jeddart staff, a form of battle-ax used by mounted men-at-arms: so named from the town of Jedburgh, in Scotland, the arms of which bear such a weapon. Also called Jedwood ax.—Fairholt.—Marshall's staff. See marshal.—Northern staff, a quarter-staff.—Palmer's staff, in her., same as bourdon, 3.—Papal staff, in her., a staff topped with the papal cross of three cross-bars.—Pastoral staff, a staff borne as an emblem of episcopal authority by or before bishops, archbishops, abbots, and abbesses. In the Western Church it is usually headed with a volute, suggesting a shepherd's crook, and in the Greek Church it generally has a T-shaped head, often curved upward and inward at the ends; in the Roman Catholic and some other churches it bears a cross in the case of an archbishop, and a double cross in the case of a patriarch. See cambrica, crozier, paterassa, sudarrium.—Pilgrim's staff. See pilgrim.—Red staff, in mill, a straight-edge used to test the dress of a millstone. It is so called because it is rubbed with red chalk or ochre, by means of which inequalities on the surface of the stone are detected.—Ring-and-staff investiture. See ecclesiastical investiture, under investiture.—Short staff, the cudgel used in ordinary cudgel-play, similar to the modern single-stick as distinguished from quarter-staff.—Staff raguly, in her., either a pallet couped raguly, or the representation of a trunk of a tree with short projections on the opposite sides, as of limbs sawed off.—

To argue from the staff to the corner, to raise some other question than that under discussion. Abp. Bramhall, Works, II. 94. (Davies.)—To break a staff. Same as to break a lance (which see, under break).

A pulany tilter, that . . . breaks his staff like a noble goose. Shak., As you like it, III. 4. 47.

To go to sticks and staves. See stick.—To have the better or worse end of the staff, to be getting the best or worst of a matter.

And so now ours seem to have the better end of the staff. Court and Times of Charles I., II. 94.

To set down (or up) one's staff, to stop and rest, as a traveler at an inn; abide for a time. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 185. (Davies.)—Syn. 1. A staff is a substantial support for one who is in motion; a stay or prop would ordinarily be used to support a thing in its place, but figuratively might be a support to a person. A cane or stick is ornamental or defensive. See definitions of crook, crozier, crutch.

staff-angle (stáf'áng'gl), n. In plastering, a square rod of wood, standing flush with the wall on each of its sides, at the external angles of plastering, to protect them from injury.

staff-bead (stáf'bed), n. In arch., an angle-bead.

staff-captain (stáf'kap'tán), n. The senior grade in the navigating branch of the British navy.

staff-commander (stáf'kò-mán'dér), n. The second grade in the navigating branch of the British navy. See master, 1 (b).

staff-degree (stáf'dē-grē'), n. In musical notation, a degree of a staff, whether line or space.

staff-duty (stáf'dū'ti), n. The occupation or employment of an officer who serves on a staff, especially of one who, not originally a staff-officer, has been detached from his regiment, and attached to a staff.

staffed (stáf't), a. [< staff + -ed]. 1. In her., surrounded or combined with staffs: as, an annulet staffed, a ring from which staffs or scepters radiate.—2. Provided with a staff or body of officers; officered. [Recent.]

A powerful church of the new type, staffed by friends and pupils of Pusey, rose in the centre of R.—Mrs. Humphry Ward, Robert Elsmere, xxxiii.

staffelite (stáf'e-lit), n. [< Staffel (see def.) + -ite]. A somewhat altered apatite, occurring in botryoidal reniform shapes of a green color, incrusting the phosphorite found at Staffel, near the Lahn, in Prussia.

staff-herding (stáf'hér'ding), n. In old Eng. forest law, the grazing of cattle in charge of a herdsman. This was restrained or forbidden as more injurious to the herds of deer than if there were no herdsman to drive away the deer, and the cattle had to find their own feeding-ground.

staff-hole (stáf'höl), n. In metal, a small hole in a puddling-furnace through which the puddler heats his staff. Wcale.

staffier (stáf'ier), n. [= D. staffier, an attendant, < OF. estaffier, a lackey, footboy that runs by the stirrup, etc., < It. staffiere, staffiero, a lackey, footboy, < staffa, a stirrup (ML. staffa) (> dim. staffeta, a little stirrup, a courier, > Sp. Pg. estafeta = F. estafette, > D. estafette = G. staffette = Sw. stafett = Dan. stafet, a courier, < OHG. staffo, staffi, MHG. G. staffe, a footstep (also a stirrup), < OHG. MHG. staf-fen, also OHG. staphon, MHG. stapfen, step, tread, = E. step: see step, and cf. OBulg. stopa, a spur. The notion reflected on the def. as given in most dictionaries, that staffier means a 'staff-bearer,' and is connected with staff, is erroneous.] A footman; an attendant.

Before the dame, and round about,
March'd whiffers and staffiers on foot,
With lackies, grooms, valets, and pages,
In fit and proper equipages.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. II. 650.

staffish (stáf'ish), a. [In Sc. corruptly staffage; < staff + -ish]. Like a staff; rigid; hence, intractable. Ascham, Toxophilus (ed. 1864), p. 111.

staff-man (stáf'mán), n. A workman employed in silk-throwing.

staff notation (stáf'nō-tā'shon), n. In musical notation, the entire system of signs used in connection with the staff: opposed, for example, to the tonic sol-fa notation, in which no staff is used.

staff-officer (stáf'of'is-ér), n. An officer forming part of the staff of a regiment, brigade, army, or the like; in the United States navy, an officer not exercising military command.

staff-sergeant (stáf'sür'jént), n. A non-commissioned officer having no position in the ranks of a company, but attached to the staff of a regiment. In the United States service the staff-sergeants are the sergeant-major, ordnance-sergeant, hospital-steward, quartermaster-sergeant, and commissary-sergeant.

staff-sling (stáf'sling), n. [ME. staffeslynge, staffslyng; < staff + sling]. A weapon consisting of a sling combined with a short staff. The staff was held with both hands and whirled around. The weapon seems to have thrown larger missiles than the ordinary sling and with greater force. Distinguished from cord-sling. Also called fustibale, fustibalus.

This gaunt at him stones caste
Out of a fel staf-slyng.
Chaucer, Sir Thopas, l. 118.

staff-stone (stáf'stôn), n. Same as baulite.

staff-striker (stáf'stri'-kér), n. A sturdy beggar; a tramp.

Many became staf-strikers,
... and wandered in parties of two, three, and four from village to village. R. Eden, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 53.

staff-surgeon (stáf'sér'jón), n. A senior grade of surgeons in the British navy.

staff-tree (stáf'trē), n. A vine or tree of the genus Celastrus. The best-known species is the American C. scandens, a twiner with ornamental fruit, otherwise named climbing bitter-sweet, waxwork, staff-vine, and ferretwig (see the last, and cut under bitter-sweet). The seeds of the East Indian C. paniculata have long been in repute among Hindu physicians for their stimulating and acid properties, and are applied externally or internally for the relief of rheumatism, etc. They yield an expressed oil, also an empyreumatic, known as oleum nigrum.

staff-vine (stáf'vin), n. See staff-tree.

stag (stag), n. [E. dial. also steg, Sc. also staig; early mod. E. stagg, stagge; < ME. steg, stagge, < Icel. steggr, steggi, a male animal (a male fox, cat, a gander, drake, etc.), lit. 'mounter,' < stiga = As. stigan, mount: see styl]. Hence stag-gard, staggon. 1. The male of various animals, especially of the deer tribe. Specifically—

(a) The male red-deer or a deer of other large species of the genus Cervus in a restricted sense; a hart, of which the female is a hind; and particularly the adult hart, at least five years old, with antlers fully developed (compare staggon), and see cuts under antler; in heraldry, a horned deer with branched antlers. The stag of Europe is Cervus elaphus, now found wild in Great Britain only in the Highlands of Scotland. It is a magnificent animal, standing 4 feet high at the shoulder, with the antlers 3 feet long, having sometimes ten points and palmated at the crown: sometimes known as a stag of ten. The hind is hornless and smaller. The corresponding animal in North America is the wapiti, there called elk (Cervus canadensis), larger than the European stag, with much-branched antlers sometimes upward of 4 feet long, not palmated at the end. (See cut under wapiti.) There are several Asiatic stags, among them the rusine deer (see kuai, sambar). (b) A bull castrated when half-grown or full-grown; a bull-stag; a bull-segg. (c) A male fox; a dog-fox. (d) A young horse; a colt (sometimes a filly). (e) A gander. (f) A drake. (g) A pit or exhibition game-cock less than one year old; the cocker of the game-fowl. (h) A turkey-cock. (i) The wren. [Local, Eng.] (j) A stag-beetle. [In most of these uses prov. Eng.]

2. In com. slang: (a) An outside irregular dealer in stocks, not a member of the exchange. (b) A person who applies for the allotment of shares in a joint-stock company, not because he wishes to hold the shares, but because he hopes to sell the allotment at a premium. If he fails in this he forbears to pay the deposit, and the allotment is forfeited.—3. A romping girl; a hoyden. [Prov. Eng.]—4t. The color of the stag; a red dirty-brown color.

Come, my Cub, doe not scorne mee because I go in Stag,
In Buife; heer's velvet too; thou seest I am worth this much in bare velvet.
Dekker, Satiromastix, I. 220 (ed. Pearson).

Royal stag, a stag that has antlers terminating in twelve or more points.

stag (stag), v.; pret. and pp. staggd, ppr. stagg-ing. [< stag, n.] I. intrans. In com. slang, to act as a stag on the stock exchange. See stag, n., 2.

II. trans. To follow warily, as a deer-stalker does a deer; dog; watch. [Slang.]

So you've been *stagg*ing this gentleman and me, and listening, have you?
H. Kingsley, Geoffrey Hamlyn, v. (Davies.)

stagarth, n. An obsolete spelling of staggard.

stag-beetle (stag'bē'tl), n. A lamellicorn coleopterous insect of the genus Lucanus or restricted family Lucanidae (which see), the males of which have branched mandibles resembling the antlers of a stag. L. cervus is the common stag-beetle of Eu-

Staff-sling, about the 16th century. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dictionnaire du Mobilier français.") rope, and L. elaphus is the stag-beetle of the United States. The former is one of the largest of British beetles, distinguished by the enormous size of the horny and toothed mandibles in the male, and by the rather long elbowed antennae, which end in a perfoliated club, and are composed of ten joints, the first being very long. It is common in some localities in the neighborhood of London, and is often 2 inches long, of a black color. Other species are numerous in various parts of the world. See also cut under Platycerus.

stag-bush (stag'bush), n. The black haw, Viburnum prunifolium.

stag-dance (stag'dans), n. A dance performed by men only. [Colloq., U. S.]

stage (stāj), n. [< ME. stage, < OF. estage, estauge, estauge, astage, etc., a story, floor, stage, a dwelling-house, F. étage, story, stage, floor, loft, = Pr. estage, a stage, = It. staggio, a stake, prop, banisters (ML. reflex stagium, estagium), *< ML. statiūm, lit. 'a place of standing,' or (as in It. staggio) 'that which stands,' < L. stare, pp. status, stand: see state, stand. Cf. étagère. In the sense of 'the distance between two points,' the word was prob. confused with OF. estage, < L. stadium, < Gr. στάδιον, a measure of distance: see stadium, stadē, stadie.] 1t. A floor or story of a house.

The Erle ascended into this tour quickly,
As soon as he might to hiest stage came.
Rom. of Parthenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 4925.

Litil John stode at a window in the mornynge,
And lokid forth at a stage.
Robin Hood and the Monk (Child's Ballads, V. 8).

2t. A house; building.

Ther buth serlains in the stage
That serueth the maidenes of parage.
King Horn (E. E. T. S.), p. 58.

3. In arch., the portion between a projection and the retreat next above it in a medieval buttress; also, one of the horizontal divisions of a window separated by transoms.—4. A floor or platform elevated above the ground or common surface, for the exhibition of a play or spectacle, for public speakers or performers, or for convenience of view, use, or access: as, a stage for a mountebank; a stage for speakers in public.

Give order that these bodies
High on a stage be placed to the view.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 389.

Specifically—(a) A floor elevated for the convenience of performing mechanical work and the like; a scaffold; a staging: as, seamen use floating stages, and stages suspended by the side of a ship, for calking and repairing. (b) In printing, a low platform on which stacks of paper are piled. (c) A shelf or horizontal compartment, as one of the steps of a court-cupboard.

The number of stages in the buffet or sideboard indicates the rank of the owner.

S. K. Handbook, Corporation and College Plate.

(d) The platform on which an object is placed to be viewed through a microscope. (e) A wooden structure on a beach to assist in landing; a landing-place at a quay or pier. It sometimes rises and falls with the tide, or is lowered or raised to suit the varying height of the water.

Getting ye starte of ye ships that came to the plantation, they took away their stage, & other necessary provisions that they had made for fishing at Cap-Anne ye year before.
Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 186.

(f) A raised platform on which theatrical performances are exhibited; the flooring in a theater on which the actors perform. In modern theaters the stage includes not only the part which can be seen from the auditorium, but also the spaces on each side, behind the proscenium-arch, which are used for shifting the wings or side-scenes, and are themselves called the wings. The part extending back from the orchestra to the proscenium-arch is called the proscenium. That side of the stage which is on the extreme left of the spectator is called the prompt-side, because in theaters which have no prompt-box the prompters stand there. The corresponding position to the spectator's right is called the opposite-prompt-side (or, briefly, o.-p.-side). Half-way between the center and the prompt-side is the prompt-center, the corresponding position to the stage

Floor-plan of Stage.

A, proscenium; B, C, D, first, second, and third prompt-entrances respectively; B', C', D', first, second, and third opposite-prompt-entrances respectively; E, wings; a, center; b, prompt-side; c, c, o.-p.-side; d, prompt-center; e, e, o.-p.-center.

right being called the opposite-prompt-center (or, briefly, o.-p.-center). The stage is thus divided laterally into five parts, called in order the prompt-side, the prompt-center, the center, the o.-p.-center, and the o.-p.-side, and these designations extend through the whole depth of the stage, as well as up into the flies: thus the five ropes by which a drop-scene is raised or lowered are known as the prompt-side ropes, prompt-center rope, center-rope, etc. As regards depth, the stage is divided into entrances varying in number according to the number of the wings or side-scenes. That between the proscenium and the first wing is called on one side the first prompt-entrance, and on the other the first o.-p.-entrance. From the first wing to the next is the second prompt-entrance, or second o.-p.-entrance, and so on. Everything above the stage from the top of the proscenium-arch upward is called the flies, and includes the borders, border-lights, all needed ropes, pulleys, and cleats, the beams to which these are attached, and the fly-galleries, from the lowest of which the drop-scenes are worked. The ancient Greek theater in its original form, as developed in the fifth century B. C., had no raised stage, the actors appearing in the orchestra amid the chorus.

Section of Stage, as seen from Prompt-side.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players.
Shak., As you like it, II. 7. 139.

Mirth. Pray you help us to some stools here.

Pro. Where, on the stage, ladies?

Mirth. Yes, on the stage; we are persons of quality, I assure you, and women of fashion, and come to see and to be seen.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, Ind.

Hence—5. With the definite article, the theater; the drama as acted or exhibited, or the profession of representing dramatic compositions: as, to take to the stage; to regard the stage as a school of elocution.

There were also Poets that wrote onely for the stage, I means plays and interludes, to recreate the people with matters of disporte.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 20.

Lo! where the stage, the poor degraded stage,
Holds its warped mirror to a gaping age.

Sprague, Curiosity.

6. A place where anything is publicly exhibited; a field for action; the scene of any noted action or career; the spot where any remarkable affair occurs.

When we are born, we cry that we are come
To this great stage of fools. Shak., Lear, IV. 6. 187.

7. A place of rest on a journey, or where a relay of horses is taken, or where a stage-coach changes horses; a station.

I have this morning good news from Gibson; three letters from three several stages, that he was safe last night as far as Royston, at between nine and ten at night.
Pepys, Diary, June 14, 1667.

Hence—8. The distance between two places of rest on a road: in some countries a regular unit.

'Tis strange a man cannot ride a stage
Or two, to breathe himself, without a warrant.
Beau. and Fl., Philaster, II. 4.

Our whole Stage this day was about five hours, our Course a little Southerly of the West.

Maunderell, Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 2.

9. A single step of a gradual process; degree of advance or of progression, either in increase or decrease, in rising or falling, or in any change of state: as, stages of growth in an animal or a plant; the stages of a disease; in biol., a state or condition of being, as one of several successive steps in a course of development: as, the larval, pupal, and imaginal stages of an insect; several stages of an embryo.

A blisful lyf thou says I lede,
Thou woldest know ther-of the stage.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), l. 410.

These three be the true stages of knowledge.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II.

stagger

stage-micrometer (stāj'mi-krom'e-ter), n. In microscopy, a micrometer attached to the stage, and used to measure the size of an object under examination.

stage-plate (stāj'plāt), n. A glass plate with a narrow ledge along one edge, used on the stage of a microscope to hold an object when the microscope is inclined, and sometimes as the bottom plate of a growing-slide. E. H. Knight.

stage-play (stāj'plā), n. Originally, a dramatic performance; hence, a play or drama adapted for representation on the stage, as distinguished from a reading- or closet-play.

If the devil, or his instruments, should then tell him [a dying man] of a cup of sack, of merry company, of a stage-play, or a morris-dance, do you think he would then be so taken with the motion? Baxter, Saints' Rest, IV. 3.

stage-player (stāj'plā'er), n. An actor on the stage; one whose occupation is to represent characters on the stage.

Among slaves who exercised polite arts none sold so dear as stageplayers or actors. Arbutnot, Ancient Coins.

stager (stāj'ēr), n. [< stage + -er.] 1. A player.

Dare quit, upon your oaths,

The stagers and the stage-wrights too (your peers).

B. Jonson, Just Indignation of the Author.

2. One who has long acted on the stage of life; a person of experience, or of skill derived from long experience: usually with old.

Here let me, as an old stager upon the theatre of the world, suggest one consideration to you.

Chesterfield, To his Son, Dec. 20, O. S. 1748.

3. A horse used for drawing a stage-coach.

stage-right (stāj'rit), n. The proprietary right of the author of a dramatic composition in respect to its performance; the exclusive right to perform or to authorize the performance of a particular drama. Compare copyright.

stagerite, n. [< stager + -ite.] with a pun on Stagrite.] A stage-player. [Humorous.]

Thou hast forgot how thou amblest . . . by a play-wagon, in the high way, and took't mad Jeronimoes part, to get service among the Mimicks; and when the Stager-ites banish't thee into the Isle of Dogs, thou turn'dst Ban-dog.
Dekker, Satiromastix, I. 229 (ed. Pearson).

stagery (stāj'ēr-i), n. [< stage + -ery.] Exhibition on the stage.

Likening those grave controversies to a piece of Stagery, or Scene-work. Milton, An Apology, etc.

stage-setter (stāj'set'er), n. One who attends to the proper setting of a play on the stage.

M. Sardou is a born stage-setter, but with a leaning to "great machines," numbers of figurants, and magnificence.
The Century, XXXV. 544.

stage-struck (stāj'struk), a. Smitten with a love for the stage; possessed by a passion for the drama; seized by a passionate desire to become an actor.

"You are a precious fool, Jack Bunce," said Cleveland, half angry, and, in despite of himself, half diverted by the false tones and exaggerated gesture of the stage-struck pirate.
Scott, Pirate, xxxix.

stag-evil (stag'ē'vl), n. Tetanus or lockjaw of the horse.

stage-wagon (stāj'wag'on), n. 1. A wagon for conveying goods and passengers, by stages, at regularly appointed times.—2. A stage-coach.

Landor, Imag. Conv., Galileo, Milton, and a Dominican.
 2. To hesitate; begin to doubt or waver in purpose; falter; become less confident or determined; waver; vacillate.

He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief.
Rom. iv. 20.

It was long since resolved on,
 Nor must I stagger now in't.

The enterprise of the . . . newspapers stops at no expense, staggers at no difficulties.
Massinger, Unnatural Combat, ii. 1.

Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 687.
 =Syn. 1. Totter, etc. See reel 2.

II. trans. 1. To cause to reel, totter, falter, or be unsteady; shake.

I have seen enough to stagger my obedience.

Fletcher, Valentinian, iii. 1.
 Strikes and lock-outs occur, which stagger the prosperity, not of the business merely, but of the state.
N. A. Rev., CXXXIX. 516.

2. To cause to hesitate, waver, or doubt; fill with doubts or misgivings; make less steady, determined, or confident.

The question did at first so stagger me.

Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 4. 212.

'Tis not to die, sir,

But to die unreveng'd, that staggers me.

Fletcher, Double Marriage, iv. 1.

3. To arrange in a zigzag order; specifically, in wheel-making, to set (the spokes) in the hub alternately inside and outside (or more or less to one side of) a line drawn round the hub. The mortise-holes in such a hub are said to be dodging. A wheel made in this manner is called a staggered wheel. The objects sought in this system of construction are increased strength and stiffness in the wheel.

stagger (stag'ér), n. [< stagger, v.] 1. A sudden tottering motion, swing, or reel of the body as if one were about to fall, as through tripping, giddiness, or intoxication.

Their trepidations are more shaking than cold ague-fits; their staggers worse than a drunkard's.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 127.
 The individual . . . advanced with a motion that alternated between a reel and a stagger.

G. A. Sala, Dutch Pictures, The Ship-Chandler. (Latham.)

2. pl. One of various forms of functional and organic disease of the brain and spinal cord in domesticated animals, especially horses and cattle: more fully called blind staggers. A kind of staggers (see also gid and sturdy) affecting sheep is specifically the disease resulting from a larval brain-worm. (See cœnure and Tœnia.) Other forms are due to disturbance of the circulation in the brain, and others again to digestive derangements. See stomach-staggers.

How now! my galloway nag the staggers, ha!

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, iv. 3.

Hence—3. pl. A feeling of giddiness, reeling, or unsteadiness; a sensation which causes reeling.

Johnp. And a kind of whimsie—

Mere. Here in my head, that puts me to the staggers.

B. Jonson, Fortunate Isles.

4. pl. Perplexities; doubts; bewilderment; confusion.

I will throw thee from my care for ever,
 Into the staggers and the careless lapse
 Of youth and ignorance.

Shak., All's Well, ii. 3. 170.

Blind staggers. See def. 2, above.—Grass-staggers, the loco-disease in horses. See loco, 2, and loco-weed.

Stagger-bush (Andromeda Mariana). 1, flowering branch; 2, the fruit.

stagger-bush (stag'ér-bûsh), n. The shrub Andromeda (Pieris) Mariana of the middle and southern United States, whose leaves have been supposed to give the staggers to animals. Its fascicles of waxy pure-white or pinkish urn-shaped flowers are very beautiful, the habit of the bush less so. See cut in preceding column.

staggerer (stag'ér-ér), n. [< stagger + -er]. 1. One who or that which staggers.—2. A statement or argument that staggers; a poser; whatever causes one to stagger, falter, hesitate, or doubt. [Colloq.]

This was a staggerer for Dive's literary "gent," and it took him nearly six weeks to get over it and frame a reply.
Athenæum, Oct. 26, 1889, p. 560.

stagger-grass (stag'ér-gràs), n. The atamascolily, Zephyranthes Atamasco: so called as supposed to cause staggers in horses.

Stanislaus, Descrip. of Eng., iii. 4.

stag-headed (stag'héd'ed), a. Having the upper branches dead: said of a tree.

They were made of particular parts of the growth of certain very old oaks, which had grown for ages, and had at length become stag-headed and half-dead.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 787.

stag-horn (stag'hörn), n. 1. A common clubmoss, Lycopodium clavatum. Also stag's-horn.
 Or with that plant which in our dale
 We call stag-horn, or fox's tail.

Wordsworth, Idle Shepherd-Boys.

2. A madrepora coral, Madrepora cervicornis and related species, used for ornament. See cut under Madrepore.—Stag-horn fern, a fern of the genus Platynerium, but especially P. alcicornis: so called from the fact that the fertile fronds are dichotomously forked like a stag's horn. The genus is small but widely diffused. The name is also sometimes applied to certain species of Ophioglossum.—Stag-horn moss. Same as stag-horn, 1.—Stag-horn sumac. See sumac.

stag-horned (stag'hórn'd), a. Having long serrate antennæ, as the longicorn beetle Acanthophorus serraticornis.

staghound (stag'hound), n. A hunting-dog able to overtake and cope with a stag. (a) The Scotch deerhound or wolf-dog, of great speed, strength, and courage, standing 28 inches or more, with a shaggy or wiry coat, usually some shade of gray. They hunt chiefly by sight, and are used in stalking the red deer, for running down the game. (b) A large kind of fox-hound, about 25 inches high, trained to hunt deer by scent.

staginess (stá'ji-nes), n. [< staggy + -ness]. 1. Stagy or exaggerated character or style; conventional theatricality. Also stageyness.—2. A certain stage or state of an animal; by implication, that stage when the animal is out of condition, as when a fur-bearing animal is shedding. [Colloq.]

Those signs of shedding and staginess so marked in the seal.
Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 488.

staging (stá'jing), n. [Verbal n. of stage, v.]

1. A temporary structure of posts and boards for support, as in building; scaffolding.—2. The business of running or managing stage-coaches, or the act of traveling in them.

stagiont, n. [Appar. an altered form of staging, simulating station (ME. stacion, < OF. station, estaçon, estachon, estagon, etc.): see station.] Stage; a staging; a pier.

In these tydes there must be lost no lot of time, for, if you arrive not at the stagions before the tyde be spent, you must turne backe from whence you came.

Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 234.

Stagirite (staj'i-rit), n. [Also, erroneously, Stagyrite; = F. Stagyrite = Sp. Pg. Estagirita = It. Stagirita, < L. Stagirites, Stagerites, < Gr. Σταγίριτης, an inhabitant or a native of Stagira (applied esp. to Aristotle), < Σταγείρα, Σταγείρος (L. Stagira), a city of Macedonia.] A native or an inhabitant of Stagira, a city of Macedonia (Chalcidice), situated on the Strymonic Gulf; specifically, Aristotle, the "prince of philosophers" (384–322 B. C.), who was born there, and is frequently referred to as "the Stagirite."

The mighty Stagyrite first left the shore,
 Spread all his sails, and durst the deep explore;
 He steer'd securely, and discover'd far,
 Led by the light of the Mæonian star.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 645.

stagnancy (stag'nán-si), n. [< stagnan(t) + -cy]. 1. The state of being stagnant or without motion, flow, or circulation, as a fluid; stagnation.

There is nowhere stillness and stagnancy.
The Century, XXVII. 174.

2. Pl. stagnancies (-siz). Anything stagnant; a stagnant pool.

Though the country people are so wise
 To call these rivers, they're but stagnancies, Left by the flood.

Cotton, Wonders of the Peaks (1681), p. 55.

stagnant (stag'nant), a. [< F. stagnant = It. stagnante, < L. stagnan(t)-s, ppr. of stagnare, form a pool of standing water, cause to stand; see stagnate.] 1. Standing; motionless, as the water of a pool or lake; without current or motion, ebb or flow: as, stagnant water; stagnant pools.

Where the water is stopped in a stagnant pond
 Danced over by the midge.

Browning, By the Fireside.

2. Inert; inactive; sluggish; torpid; dull; not brisk: as, business is stagnant.

The gloomy slumber of the stagnant soul. Johnson.

stagnantly (stag'nant-li), adv. In a stagnant or still, motionless, inactive manner.

stagnate (stag'nát), v. i.; pret. and pp. stagnated, ppr. stagnating. [< L. stagnatus, pp. of stagnare (> It. stagnare = F. stagner), form a pool of standing water, stagnate, be overflowed, < stagnum, a pool, swamp. Cf. stank.] 1. To cease to run or flow; be or become motionless; have no current.

I am fifty winters old;
 Blood then stagnates and grows cold.

Cotton, Anacreontic.

In this flat country, large rivers, that scarce had declivity enough to run, crept slowly along, through meadows of fat black earth, stagnating in many places as they went.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, I. 372.

2. To cease to be brisk or active; become dull, inactive, or inert: as, business stagnates.

Ready-witted tenderness . . . never stagnates in vain lamentations while there is room for hope. Scott.

stagnatet (stag'nát), a. [< L. stagnatus, pp.: see the verb.] Stagnant.

To drain the stagnate fen.

Somerville, The Chase, iii. 440.

stagnation (stag-ná'shon), n. [= F. stagnation; as stagnate + -ion.] 1. The condition of being stagnant; the cessation of flow or circulation in a fluid; the state of being without flow, or of being motionless.

Th' icy touch
 Of unprolific winter has impress'd
 A cold stagnation on th' intestine tide.

Cowper, Task, vi. 139.

In . . . [suffocation] life is extinguished by stagnation of non-arterialized blood in the capillaries of the lungs, and by the changes that result from the failure of the function of the pulmonary system.

J. M. Carnochan, Operative Surgery, p. 306.

2. Lack or absence of briskness or activity; inertness; dullness.

The decay of my faculties is a stagnation of my life.
Steele, Spectator, No. 260.

stagnicolous (stag-nik'ô-lus), a. [< L. stagnum, a pool, + colere, inhabit.] Living in stagnant water; inhabiting swamps or fens; paludicole, as a bird.

staid (stăd), a. [Formerly also stayed; an adj. use of staid, pp.] Sober; grave; steady; sedate; regular; not wild, volatile, flighty, or fanciful: as, a staid elderly person.

Put thyself
Into a haviour of less fear, ere wildness
Vanquish my staid senses.
Shak., Cymbeline, III. 4. 10.

The tall fair person, and the still staid mien.
Crabbe, Works, IV. 143.

staidly (stăd'li), adv. [Formerly also stayedly.] In a staid manner; calmly; soberly.

'Tis well you have manners,
That curt'ly again, and hold your countenance staidly.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, IV. 2.

staidness (stăd'nes), n. [Formerly also stayedness; < staid + -ness.] The state or character of being staid; sobriety; gravity; sedateness; steadiness: as, staidness and sobriety of age.

The love of things ancient doth argue staidness, but levity and want of experience maketh apt unto innovations.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 7.

Brought up among Quakers, although not one herself, she admired and respected the staidness and outward peacefulness common among the young women of that sect.
Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xxxii.

staid (stăd), n. [A var. of staid.] A young horse; a stallion. [Scotch.]

stail (stăil), n. A spelling of *stale*².

stain (stăin), v. [< ME. steinen, steynen (> leel. steina), by apheresis from distainen, disteynen, desteynen, desteynen, E. distain: see distain.] I. trans. 1. To discolor, as by the application of some foreign matter; make foul; spot: as, to stain the hand with dye, or with tobacco-juice; to stain the clothes.

An image like thyself, all stain'd with gore.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, I. 664.

2. To soil or sully with guilt or infamy; tarnish; bring reproach on; corrupt; deprave: as, to stain the character; stained with guilt.

Never believe, though in my nature reign'd
All frailties that besedge all kinds of blood,
That it could so preposterously be stain'd,
To leave for nothing all my sum of good.
Shak., Sonnets, cix.

3. To deface; disfigure; impair, as shape, beauty, or excellence.

But he's something stain'd
With grief that's beauty's canker, thou mightst call him
A goodly person.
Shak., Tempest, I. 2. 414.

We were all a little stained last night, sprinkled with a cup or two.
B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, I. 1.

4. To color by a process other than painting or coating or covering the surface. (a) To color (as glass) by something which combines chemically with the substance to be colored. (b) To color by the use of a thin liquid which penetrates the material, as in dyeing cloth or staining wood. (c) In microscopy, to impregnate with a substance whose chemical reaction on the tissue so treated gives it a particular color. The great value of staining for this purpose results from the fact that some tissues are stainable by a certain reagent to which others respond but feebly or not at all, so that some points, as the nucleus of cells, etc., may be more distinctly seen by the contrast in color. Many different preparations are used for the purpose in different cases.

5. To print colors upon (especially upon paper-hangings). [Eng.]—6. To darken; dim; obscure.

Clouds and eclipses stain both moon and sun.
Shak., Sonnets, xxxv.

Hence—7. To eclipse; excel.

O voyce that doth the thrush in shrillness stain.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, III.

Her beauty shin'd most bright,
Far staining every other brave and comely dame
That did appear in sight.
Patient Griseld (Child's Ballads, IV. 200).

stained cloth. Same as painted cloth (which see, under cloth).—Stained glass. See glass.

II. intrans. 1. To cause a stain or discoloration.

As the berry breaks before it staineth.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, I. 460.

2. To take stains; become stained, soiled, or sullied; grow dim; be obscured.

The only soil of his fair virtue's gloss,
If virtue's gloss will stain with any soil,
Is a sharp wit match'd with too blunt a will.

stain (stăin), n. [< stain, v.] 1. A spot; a discoloration, especially a discoloration produced by contact with foreign matter by external causes or influences: as, mildew-stains.

You do remember
This stain [a mole] upon her?
Shak., Cymbeline, II. 4. 139.

Swift trouts, diversifed with crimson stains.
Pope, Windsor Forest, I. 145.

2. A blot; a blemish; a cause of reproach or disgrace: as, a stain on one's character.

Hereby I will lead her that is the praise and yet the stain of all womankind.
Sir P. Sidney.

I say you are the man who denounced to my uncle this miserable stain upon the birth of my betrothed.
L. W. M. Lockhart, Fair to See, xxii.

3. In entom., a well-defined spot of color which appears to be semi-transparent, so that it merely modifies the ground-color: it may be produced by very fine dots, as on a butterfly's wing.—4. Taint; tarnish; evil or corrupting effect: as, the stain of sin.—5. Slight trace; tinge; tincture.

You have some stain of soldier in you; let me ask you a question.
Shak., All's Well, I. 1. 122.

6. Coloring matter; a liquid used to color wood, ivory, etc., by absorption.

The ivory is invariably again placed in cold water that Stake him to the ground, like a man that had hang'd himself.

Shirley, Love Tricks, II. 1.

'Twas pity that such a delicate inventive witt should be staked in an obscure corner.

Aubrey, Lives (Francis Potter).

His mind was so airy and volatile he could not have kept his chamber, if he must needs be there, staked down purely to the drudgery of the law.

Roger North, Lord Guilford, I. 15. (Davies.)

2. To support with stakes; provide with supporting stakes or poles: as, to stake vines.—3. To defend, barricade, or bar with stakes or piles.

Then caus'd his ships the river up to stake,
That none with victual should the town relieve.

Drayton, Battle of Agincourt, st. 89.

4. To divide or lay off and mark with stakes or posts: with out or off: as, to stake off a site for a school-house; to stake out oyster-beds.

The modest Northerners who have got hold of it [Florida], and staked it all out into city lots, seem to want to keep it all to themselves.

C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 49.

When, therefore, M. Naville disbanded his men at the close of the fourth week, he had not only found a large number of very precious monuments in a surprisingly short space of time, but he left the ground chronologically staked out.

The Century, XXXIX. 333.

5. To stretch, scrape, and smooth (skins) by friction against the blunt edge of a semicircular knife fixed to the top of a short beam or post set upright.

The [calf-skins . . .] are staked by drawing them to and fro over a blunt knife fixed on the top of a post.

Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 367.

stake² (stāk), n. [= MD. stack, a stake for which one plays; a particular use of stake, a stake, pole, appar. as 'that which is fixed or put up': see *stake*¹, *stick*³.] 1. That which is placed at hazard as a wager; the sum of money or other valuable consideration which is deposited as a pledge or wager to be lost or won according to the issue of a contest or contingency.

'Tis time short Pleasures now to take,
Of little Life the best to make,
And manage wisely the last Stake.

Cowley, Anacreontics, v.

Whose game was empires, and whose stakes were thrones.

Byron, Age of Bronze, iii.

stalactite (stāk-lak'tit), n. [= F. stalactite, NL. stalactites, Gr. σταλακτός, dropping, oozing out in drops: see stalactite.] 1. A deposit of carbonate of lime, usually resembling in form a huge icicle, which hangs from the roof of a cave or subterranean rock-opening, where it has been slowly formed by deposition from calcareous water trickling downward through cracks or openings in the rocks above. Water containing carbonic acid in solution, which it has gained in filtering through the overlying soil, has the power of dissolving carbonate of lime, which it deposits again upon evaporation; stalactites are hence common in regions of limestone rocks. They are sometimes white, and nearly transparent, showing the broad cleavage-surfaces of the calcite, as those of the cave near Matanzas in Cuba; but commonly they have a granular structure with concentric bands of pale-yellow to brown colors. In some caverns the stalactites are very numerous and large, and of great beauty in their endless variety of form, especially in connection with the stalagmites, the corresponding depositions accumulated beneath the stalactites upon the floor of the caverns. The caves of Adelsberg in Carniola and of Luray in Virginia are among the most celebrated for the beauty of their stalactites.

The grotto is perfectly dry, and there are no petrifications or stalactites in it.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 41.

2. A similar form of some other mineral species, such as are occasionally observed, for example, of chalcodony, limonite, etc., but only sparingly and on a small scale. — 3. A like form of lava sometimes observed in connection with volcanic outflows. Lava stalactites have been noted hanging from the roofs of lava caverns in the crater of Kilauea in Hawaii; and slender forms of a nearly uniform diameter of one fourth of an inch, and from a few inches to 20 or 30 inches in length, ornament the roofs of caverns in the lava stream which descended from Mauna Loa in the same island in 1881. Stalagmites of lava rise from the lava floor beneath.

stalactited (stāk-lak'ti-ted), a. [stalactite + -ed.] Covered with stalactites; also, formed in more or less semblance of stalactites. — Stalactited work. See rustic work, under rustic.

stalactitic (stal-ak-tit'ik), a. [stalactite + -ic.] Containing stalactites; having the form of stalactites: as, in mineralogy, the stalactitic structure of limonite, chalcodony, and other species.

stalactitical (stal-ak-tit'i-kal), a. [stalactitic + -al.] Same as stalactitic.

Stalactitic Structure of Limonite.

stalactitiform (stāk-lak'ti-ti-fōrm), a. [NL. stalactites + L. forma, form.] Same as stalactitiform.

stalagmite (stāk-lag'mit), n. [F. stalagmite, Gr. σταλαγμός, dropping or dripping, σταλάζειν, that which drops, σταλάζειν, drop, let fall drop by drop: see stalactite.] Carbonate of lime deposited on the floor of a cavern. See stalactite.

stalemate (stäl'mät), n. [*Prob. < stale*³ (but the first element is doubtful) + *mate*³.] In chess, a position in which a player, having to move in his turn, and his king not being in check, has no move available with any piece: in such a case the game is drawn; figuratively, any position in which no action can be taken.

It would be disgraceful indeed if a great country like Russia should have run herself into such a stale-mate position.

Contemporary Rev., l. 444.

stalemate (stäl'mät), v. t.; pret. and pp. stalemated, ppr. stalemating. [< stalemate, n.] 1. In chess, to subject to a stalemate: usually said of one's self, not of one's adversary: as, white is stalemated. Hence—2. To bring to a standstill; nonplus.

I had regularly stalemated him.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, II. xviii.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Fred, . . . "I like neither Bulstrode nor speculation." He spoke rather sulkily, feeling himself stalemated.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, xii.

staleness (stäl'nes), n. The state of being stale, in any sense.

stalk¹ (stāk), v. [< ME. stalken, < AS. stælcian, stælcian, walk warily, = Dan. stalke, stalk: (a) lit. walk stealthily, steal along; with formative -k, from the root of stelan (pret. stæl), steal: see *steal*¹, and cf. *stale*¹, n. (b) In another view the AS. stælcian, stælcian, is connected with stealc, high, and means 'walk high,' i. e. on tiptoe, being referred ult. to the same source as *stalk*², and perhaps stilt. For the form stalk as related to *stale*¹ (and *steal*¹), cf. talk as related to tale (and tell).] I. intrans. 1. To walk cautiously or stealthily; steal along; creep.

In the night ful theefly gan he stalke.

5. Sturdy and steadfast in partizanship: in U. S. politics [cap.], noting various sections of the Republican party. See the phrase.

The epithet Stalwart as applied to a class of politicians was first used by Mr. Blaine in 1877 to designate those Republicans who were unwilling to give up hostility and distrust of the South as a political motive. In the present contest at Albany it has by a curious transformation been appropriated by the followers of Mr. Conkling to distinguish politicians faithful to his Machine.

The Nation, June 16, 1881.

Stalwart Republican, in U. S. hist., a decided or thorough-going member of the Republican party; specifically, a member of that wing of the Republican party in the State of New York which in 1880 advocated the renomination of Grant as President for a third term and in 1881 supported Rosecrans in his opposition to the administration of Garfield, and antagonized the "Half-Breeds" in 1881 and following years. = Syn. 4. Stout, Sturdy, etc. (see robust), sinewy, brawny, muscular, strapping, powerful, valorous, resolute.

II. n. 1. A strong or sturdy person.

His opinion is not favourable, Emin's stalcarts, whose praises had been so loudly trumpeted in Europe, proving to be for the most part brutal ruffians and abject cravens in the presence of danger. The Academy, Jan. 3, 1891.

2. A stout and steadfast partizan; specifically [cap.], same as Stalwart Republican. See above.

stalwarth, a. Same as stalworth, stalwart.

stalwartism (stál'wart-izm), n. [< stalwart + -ism.] In U. S. politics, the principles or policy of the Stalwarts; partizan devotion. The Nation, Nov. 27, 1879, p. 355.

stalwartness (stál'wart-nes), n. Stalwart character or quality; sturdiness; stoutness; strength. Athenæum, Jan. 14, 1888, p. 57.

stalworth (stál'werth), a. [Early mod. E. also stalworth, stalworthe; < ME. stalworth, stalward, stalworth, stalwurthe, stalcworth, stalcwurthe, stalcwurthe, also stalworthy, stalwurthy (see stalworth), < AS. stælwyrthe, found only once, in pl. stælwyrthe, in the sense 'good' or 'serviceable,' applied to ships; a compound peculiar to AS.: (a) prob. a contraction of stathwyrthe*, lit. 'steadfast,' 'well-based,' 'firm-set,' etc., hence 'stout,' < stathol, stathel, foundation, base, seat, site, position, E. staddle, Sc. also contracted stale, stail (cf. AS. stælan, contracted from statholian, found, establish), + wyrthe, worthe, wurth, good, excellent, worth; see staddle and worth. Cf. the equiv. stathol-fæst, steadfast, firm, stable (< stathol, foundation, + fæst, firm, fast), and stedfast, E. stead- fast (the AS. worthe and fæst as the second element of adj. compounds being used rather as adj. formatives than as independent words). Such contraction is not common in AS., and the form stælwyrthe has generally been otherwise explained: (b) < stalu (in comp. stæl-), stealing, theft, + worthe, wurth, worth, worthy (see *stale*¹ and *worth*²), but the sense 'worthy of theft,' 'worth stealing,' hence 'worth taking for use' ('captu dignæ,' Gibson), cannot apply to man, and the sense 'good at stealing,' suggested by some, even if it were etymologically admissible, could not apply to ships. (c) In another view, lit. 'worthy of place,' i. e. fit for its place or use, serviceable, < AS. stæl, steall, also sometimes, esp. in comp., stæl, a place, stall, + worthe, wurth, worth, worthy (see *stall*¹ and *worth*²). The full form stal- occurs in ME. stalworthly, a var. of stalworthy, and in the mod. surname Stalworthly. In any view, the ME. forms staleworth, stalewurthe, stalcwurthe, stalcwurthe, with medial e, must be regarded as irregular. In fact the orig. meaning of the compound appears to have been lost, and the ME. variations must be due to simulation of one or other of the words above considered. Hence, by further variation, stalwarth, and now stalwart, which is no longer regarded as a compound.] 1^t. Steadfast; firm-based.

That stalworth the sted (Constantinople) so strong was founded,

Sydney Smith, To Lady Holland, Feb. 2, 1816.

4. In bot., the male or fertilizing organ of flowering plants. It is situated immediately within the inner circle of floral envelopes, or petals when they are present, and consists of two parts, the filament, which is the stalk or support, and the anther, which is a double Stamens.

1. Of Isopyrum biternatum (a, the anther; c, the connective; f, the filament). 2. Of Oryza sativa. 3. Of Liriodendron Tulipifera. 4. Of Allium Porrum. 5. Of Kosmarinus officinalis. 6. Of Berberis Canadensis. 7. Of Vaccinium Myrtillus. 8. Syngenesious stamens of Carduus crispus. 9. Monadelphous stamens of Nopsea dioica. 10. Diadelphous stamens of Gentiana tinctoria. 11. Tetrastemonous stamens of Cratogeomys chrysomela. 12. Didynamous stamens of Plumus Serpyllum. 13. Stamen in gynoecious flower of Epipactis palustris. 14. Transverse section of the anther of Isopyrum, showing the dehiscence and the pollen grains.

sac or body of two cells placed side by side and filled with a powdery substance, the pollen. This pollen, when mature, is discharged from the anther through various openings or pores. Theoretically the stamen is the homologue of a leaf, in which the two cells of the anther represent the infolded halves of the blade, while the connective represents the midrib and the filament the petiole of the leaf. The pollen represents the parenchyma of the leaf. The stamens of a flower are collectively called the androecium. When both stamens and pistils are present in the same flower it is said to be hermaphrodite or perfect; when only stamens are present the flower is said to be staminate or male. The number of stamens varies in different plants from one to one hundred or more, but is generally constant for the same species, and forms an important element in the system of classification. The classes in the Linnean sexual system were based upon the number and position of the stamens; and in the natural system they are still an important factor. In regard to their insertion, stamens may be hypogynous, epigynous, or perigynous, or the flower may be gynandrous (see these words). See also cut under anther, anthophore, diadelphous, epigynous, extrorse, introrse, and many plant-names.—Barren stamen. Same as sterile stamen.—Included stamens. See include.—Stamina of reason, first truths.—Sterile stamen, in bot., an organ or body which belongs to the series of stamens, or androecium, but which does not produce pollen; an imperfect stamen, as that produced by certain plants of the family Scrophulariaceae; a staminodium.

Stamerynge in goyng, idem quod stakerynge, waverynge.
Prompt. Parv., p. 472.

= Syn. 1. Falter, Stammer, Stutter. He who falters weakens or breaks more or less completely in utterance; the act is occasional, not habitual, and for reasons that are primarily moral, belong to the occasion, and may be various. He who stammers has great difficulty in uttering anything; the act may be occasional or habitual; the cause is confusion, shyness, timidity, or actual fear; the result is broken and inarticulate sounds that seem to stick in the mouth, and sometimes complete suppression of voice. He who stutters makes sounds that are not what he desires to make; the act is almost always habitual, especially in its worst forms; the cause is often excitement; the result is a quick repetition of some one sound that is initial in a word that the person desires to utter, as c-c-c-c-catch.—Stammering bladder, a bladder whose muscles act irregularly and spasmodically, causing painful urination. Page.

II. trans. To utter or pronounce with hesitation or imperfectly; especially, to utter with involuntary breaks or catches: frequently with out.

It is a direct-action stamp, the stem of the stamp being the continuation of the piston-rod of the steam-engine which is the motive power.—Leavitt stamp, an improved form of Ball stamp, used chiefly in the Lake Superior mines. One head is capable of crushing 250 tons of ore in 24 hours. This stamp works like the Nasmyth hammer, the force of gravity being aided by steam-pressure.—Stamp Act, an act imposing or regulating the imposition of stamp-duties; in American colonial history, an act, also known as Grenville's Stamp Act, passed by the British Parliament in 1765, providing for the raising of revenue in the American colonies by the sale of stamps and stamped paper for commercial transactions, real-estate transfers, lawsuits, marriage licenses, inheritances, etc.: it also provided that the royal forces in America should be billeted on the people. The act was to go into effect November 1st, 1765, but it aroused intense opposition, led by the assemblies of Virginia, Massachusetts, and other colonies. A "Stamp Act Congress," with delegates from many of the colonies, met at New York in October, 1765, and a petition against this and other repressive measures was sent to England. The Stamp Act was repealed in March, 1766, but the agitation was one of the leading causes in effecting the revolution.—To put to stamp, to put to press; begin printing. Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 25.

stampage (stamp'pāj), n. [< stamp + -age.] An impression; a squeeze.

No copy [of the rock inscription] was obtained until October, 1838, when the traveller Masson most carefully and perseveringly made a calico stampage and an eye-copy. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 118.

stamp-album (stamp'al'bum), n. A blank book or album used by collectors for the classification and display of postage- and revenue-stamps.

stamp-battery (stamp'bat'ér-i), n. A series of stamps in a machine for comminuting ores. E. H. Knight.

stamp-block (stamp'blok), n. A hollow wooden block in which mealies are pounded before being cooked. [South Africa.]

stamp-collecting (stamp'kò-lek'ting), n. The act or practice of collecting postage- or revenue-stamps. See philately.

stamp-collector (stamp'kò-lek'tor), n. 1. A collector or receiver of stamp-duties.—2. One who collects postage- or revenue-stamps as articles of interest or curiosity; a philatelist.

stamp-distributor (stamp'dis-trib'ù-tér), n. An official who issues or distributes government stamps.

stamp-duty (stamp'dü'ti), n. A tax or duty imposed on the sheets of parchment or paper on which specified kinds of legal instruments are written. Stamp-duties on legal instruments, such as conveyances and deeds, are chiefly secured by prohibiting the reception of them in evidence unless they bear the stamp required by the law. Stamp-duties were first levied in England in the reign of William and Mary.

stampede (stamp-péd'), n. [Formerly also stampado; < Amer. Sp. estampida, a stampede, a particular use of Sp. estampida, estampido (= Pg. estampido), a crack, crash, loud report; connected with estampar, stamp; see stamp, v.] 1. A sudden fright seizing upon large bodies of cattle or horses, and causing them to run for long distances; a sudden scattering of a herd of cattle or horses; hence, any sudden flight or general movement, as of an army, in consequence of a panic.

With every herd this stampede occurs; and, watching the proceedings, I hold that a drover ought to have rather more patience than Job.

Mortimer Collins, Thoughts in my Garden, II. 131.

2. Any sudden unconcerted movement of a number of persons actuated by a common impulse: as, a stampede in a political convention for a candidate who seems likely to win. Stampedes in American politics have been common since the Democratic convention of 1844.

At the first ring of the bell a general stampede took place; some twenty hungry souls rushed to the dining-room. L. M. Alcott, Hospital Sketches, p. 63.

stampede (stamp-péd'), v.; pret. and pp. stamp-peded, pp. stamp-peding. [< stampede, n.] I. intrans. 1. To become generally panic-stricken; take suddenly to flight, as if under the influence of a panic; scamper off in fright: said of herds or droves.—2. To move together, or take the same line of conduct, under the influence of any sudden and common impulse. See stampede, n., 2.

II. trans. 1. To cause to break and run as if panic-stricken; disperse or drive off suddenly through panic or terror.

Those most trying times when . . . the cattle are stamp-peded by a thunder-storm at night.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 7.

2. To cause to move or act in a mass through some sudden common impulse: as, to stampede a political convention for a candidate.

stampedo (stamp-pé'dò), n. Same as stampede. A sudden stampedo or rush of horses. Irving.

stamper (stamp'pér), n. [< stamp + -er.] 1. One who stamps: as, a stamper in the post-office.—2. An instrument for stamping; a stamp.—3. pl. The feet; also, shoes. [Old slang.]

Strike up, Piper, a merry, merry dance,
That we on our stampers may foot it and prance.

Brome, Jovial Crew, l.

4. A stamping-machine. (a) A machine for cleaning textile fabrics, consisting of a tub revolving horizontally, and a series of wooden stamps or pestles operated by suitable machinery. (b) In gunpowder-manuf., a machine used in small mills, consisting of ten or twelve stamps of hard wood, arranged in a row, each stamp having a bronze shoe. The material to be pulverized is placed in cavities in a block of solid oak. (c) In porcelain-manuf., a mill for pulverizing calcined flints preparatory to treatment in the grinding-vat.

5. pl. In ornith., the Calcatores.

stamp-hammer (stamp'ham'ér), n. A direct-acting hammer where the hammer-block is lifted vertically, either by cams or friction-rollers, or, as is more commonly the case, by steam- or water-pressure acting on a piston in a closed cylinder. Percy.

stamp-head (stamp'hed), n. In a stamp, the rectangular or cylindrical mass of iron at the end of the stamp-stem, which by its weight gives force to the blow. To the lower end of the stamp-head is attached the shoe, a thinner piece of chilled iron or steel, which can easily be replaced, when too much worn for service, without the necessity of replacing the whole stamp-head.

stamping (stamp'ping), n. [< ME. stampyng; verbal n. of stamp, v.] 1. The act of pounding, beating, or impressing as with a stamp.—2. Something stamped, or made by stamping-machinery.

Groups of U-shaped soft iron stampings. Electrical Rev., XXII. 174.

3. Same as blocking, 1 (a). stamping-ground (stamp'ping-ground), n. A place of habitual resort; a customary haunt. [Slang, U. S.]

It's with them fellows as it is with wild animals. You can just keep clear of them if you want, stay far out of their stamping-ground, hold yourself aloof all the time. W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 176.

stamping-machine (stamp'ping-ma-shén'), n. A machine for forming articles of hard materials, as metal, whether for the first rough shaping, or for decorative finishing.

stamping-mill (stamp'ping-mil), n. Same as stamp-mill, 1.

stamping-press (stamp'ping-pres), n. 1. In sheet-metal work, a power-machine for making hollow ware, as pans, bowls, kitchen-utensils, etc. Machines of this class are a development of the earlier stamping-machines, the direct blow or stamp having been replaced in many instances by a continuous pressure. The essential features of the machine are two dies brought one over the other by a direct blow or by pressure. Where a continuous pressure is used by the employment of a screw, cam, toggle-joint, or eccentric, forcing one die slowly upon the other, the sheet of metal is pressed and stretched into shape. The dies are often compound—one part cutting out the blank from the sheet and another part compressing it gradually into shape—or so arranged that one part takes the blank, and holds it firmly by the edges, while a central part stretches it to the required shape. In some forms of these machines a series of dies are used successively, the blanks being pressed in part, then annealed and re-pressed until the final shape is secured. Also called stamping-machine.

2. A small hand-press or seal-press used by public officials and others for impressing stamps upon or affixing them to documents, either in obedience to legal requirement or as a matter of convenience or custom. Compare seal-press.—3. Same as blocking-press. See also arming-press.

stamp-machine (stamp'ma-shén'), n. In paper-manuf., a machine for beating rags, etc., into pulp. It consists of a number of rods fixed into a stout oak beam, and working alternately with a set below, the water passing off through an opening covered with a fine sieve. The machine is of German origin, and is used only in small factories.

stamp-mill (stamp'mil), n. 1. In metal, a crushing-mill employing stamps or pestles to crush ores or rock to powder preparatory to treatment for extracting metals. The stamps, which are often of great size and weight, are arranged in a, undershot water-wheel; b, shaft; c, cams; d, wipers; e, lifters of pine, beach, or oak, with chilled cast-iron stamps; f, kofers (otherwise called mortars or battery-boxes) which receive the "stuff" or broken ore and retain it until reduced to the required degree of fineness. The ore is fed to the stamps from an inclined platform at the rear of the kofers.

a row, and are usually raised by means of wipers and cams on a revolving shaft turned by steam- or water-power. The cams release the stamps in turn, and they fall on the ore placed in chambers below, the sides of these chambers being perforated to allow the escape of the crushed material as soon as reduced to the required fineness, while a stream of water sweeps the slimes away as they are produced. Such a row of stamps is also called a stamp-battery. In another form of stamp-mill the stamp is placed at the end of the piston-rod of a steam-cylinder, on the principle of the steam-hammer. Also called stamping-mill.

2. An oil-mill employing a pestle or pestles to crush seeds and fruits.

stamp-note (stamp'not), n. In com., a memorandum delivered by a shipper of goods to the searcher, which, when stamped by him, allows the goods to be sent off by lighter to the ship, and is the captain's authority for receiving them on board. Simmonds.

stamp-office (stamp'of'is), n. An office where government stamps are issued, and stamp-duties and taxes are received.

stance (stans), n. [Early mod. E. also staunce; < OF. stance, estance, a station, situation, condition, also a stanchion, = Pr. estansa, station, condition, = Sp. Pg. estancia, a dwelling, = It. stanza, a station, stanza, etc., < ML. stantia, a chamber, a house, lit. a standing, < L. stan(t)-s, ppr. of stare, stand: see stand. Cf. stanza.] 1. A station; a site; an area for building; a position; a stand. [Scotch.]

Immediately her issue of blood stanch'd. Lake VIII. 44.

2†. To stop; cease.

And the wynde stanchede and blew no more,

And the meyst trunde into a brygt cloude.

Chron. Vilodun., p. 127. (Hallivell.)

stanch¹, staunch¹ (stanch, stanch), n. [*ME. stanch*¹, *staunch*¹, v.] That which stanches; that which quenches or allays.

O frendship, flour of flowers, O lively sprite of lyfe,
O sacred bond of blissful peace, the stalworth stanch of strife.

Poems of Vncertaine Auctors, On Frendship. (Richardson.)

stanch² (stanch), n. [An assimilated form of *stank*¹; < OF. estanche, a pool, fish-pond, etc.: see *stank*¹.] A flood-gate in a river for accumulating a head of water to float boats over shallows; a weir. See *stank*¹. E. H. Knight.

Formerly rivers used to be penned in by a series of stanches near shoal places, which held up the water, and, when several boats were collected in the pool above a stanch, it was suddenly opened, and the sudden rush of water floated the boats over the shallows below.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 573.

stanch³, staunch² (stanch, stanch), a. [*ME. stanch*³, < OF. estanc, fem. estanche, estenc, estenk, estain, dried, dry, exhausted, wearied, tired, vanquished, F. étanche, stanch, water-tight, = Pr. estanc, still, unchangeable, = Sp. estanco = Pg. estanque, stanch, water-tight, = It. stanco, tired; from the verb shown under *stanch*¹, *staunch*¹. And then in a stand o' water.
The Young Tamlane (Child's Ballads, I. 122).
Here, Will Perkins, take my purse, fetch me
A stand of ale, and set in the market-place,
That all may drink that are athirst this day.
Greene, George-a-Greene (Works, ed. Dyce, II. 200).

Band-stand, a balcony or raised platform in a hall or park for the accommodation of a band or company of musicians. — Brazier-stand, a stand, usually consisting of a ring mounted on three feet, to support a brazier. — Conducting-stand, a rack or frame of wood or metal for holding a score for the conductor of a chorus or an orchestra. — Grand stand, in any place of public resort, the principal stand from which spectators view races, games, or any other spectacle.

We . . . will follow Mr. Egremont to the grand stand, where ladies now sit in their private boxes much as they sat some eighteen hundred years ago to smile on the dying gladiator in the amphitheatres.

Whyte Melville, White Rose, II. iv.

Stand of ammunition. See ammunition. — Stand of armor, stand of arms, a suit of armor and weapons taken together, or, in modern times, the arms and accoutrements sufficient for one man. See arm², n. — Stand of colors, a single color or flag. Wilhelm. — To be at a stand, to be brought to a standstill; be checked and prevented from motion or action. — To get a stand. See the quotation.

Occasionally these panic fits . . . make them [buffalo] run together and stand still in a stupid, frightened manner. . . . When they are made to act thus it is called in hunters' parlance getting a stand on them; and often thirty or forty have been killed in one such stand, the hunter hardly shifting his position the whole time.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, p. 274.

To make a stand. (a) To come to a stop; stand still. When I beheld this hill, and how it hangs over the way, I suddenly made a stand, lest it should fall on my head.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 95.

(b) To take a position for defense or resistance; stop and fight. — To put to a stand, to stop; arrest by obstacles or difficulties; as, he was put to a stand for want of men and money.

standage[†] (stan'dāj), n. [stand + -age.] 1†. A stall.

Such strawe is to bee given to the draughte oxen and cattell at the standage [read standage] or the barnedores. Archæologia, XIII. 383.

2. In mining, a place underground for water to stand or accumulate in; a lodge or sump.

standard¹ (stan'djärd), n. [Early mod. E. also standerd; < ME. standerd, standerd, standerd, < late AS. standard (= MD. standaerd, D. standaerd = MLG. stanthart, LG. standare = MHG. standert, stanthart, G. standarte (perhaps < It.) = Sw. standar = Dan. standart), < OF. estandard, estandard, an ensign, standard, a point of rallying, F. étendard, an ensign, standard, flag, = Pr. estandard, estandard = Sp. estandarte = It. standardo, an ensign, standard (cf. OF. estandard, estandelle, standale = It. stendale, an ensign); ML. standardum, an ensign, standard (cf. standardus, a stronghold, a receptacle of water): (a) either < OHG. stantan (MHG. stenden), stand, = E. stand, etc., + -art, or (b) < ML. stendere* (It. stendere = OF. estendre, etc.), < L. extendere, spread out, extend: see extend. The connection with stand is certain in the other uses: see standard², standard³.] 1. Milit., a distinctive flag; an ensign. Specifically — (a) The principal ensign of an army, of a military organization such as a legion, or of a military chieftain of high rank. In this sense it may be either a flag or a solid object carried on a pole, as the Roman eagle, or the dragon shown in the Bayeux Tapestry, or a combination of a flag with such an object. (b) A large flag, long in the fly in proportion to its hoist, carried before princes and nobles of high rank, especially when in military command or on occasions of ceremony. A standard of Edward III. was shaped like a long pennon, swallow-tailed, and bearing the royal arms at the hoist, the rest of the pennon being covered with fleurs-de-lis and lions semé. A standard of the Earl of Warwick, carried during the Wars of the Roses, had a cross of St. George, with the rest of the flag covered with small copies of the badge of the Nevilles, a bear and ragged staff. At the present time the word is used loosely. The so-called royal standard of Great Britain, though a standard in function, is properly a banner in form. The flags of the British cavalry regiments are called standards, to distinguish them from the colors of the infantry regiments. In the United States army a silk standard goes to every mounted regiment; it bears the national arms on a blue ground, with the number and name of the regiment underneath the eagle. See cut under tabarum.

2. In bot., same as banner, 5. — 3. In ornith.: (a) Same as rexillum. (b) A feather suggesting a standard by its shape or position. See cuts under Semioptera and standard-bearer. — 4†. A standard-bearer; an ensign or ancient. [Rare.] Thou shalt be my lieutenant, monster, or my standard. Shak., Tempest, III. 2. 18.

To slope the standard. See slope.

standard² (stan'djärd), n. and a. [*ME. standerd, < OF. estandard, estandard, also (AF.) estander, ML. (AL.) standardum, standard of weight and measure; appar. a particular use in England of OF. estandard, etc., an ensign, standard, as 'that to which one turns,' or, as in standard³, 'that which is set up': see stan- dard¹, standard³.] I. n. 1. A weight, measure, or instrument by comparison with which the accuracy of others is determined; especially, an original standard or prototype, one the weight or measure of which is the definition of a unit of weight or measure, so that all standards of the same denomination are copies of it. The only original standard of the United States is a troy pound. See pound, yard, meter.

It is . . . necessary to have recourse to some visible, palpable, material standard, by forming a comparison with which all weights and measures may be reduced to one uniform size. Blackstone, Comm., I. vii.

2. In coinage, the proportion of weight of fine metal and alloy established by authority. The standard of gold coins in Great Britain is at present 22 carats — that is, 22 parts of fine gold and 2 of alloy; and the sovereign should weigh 123.274 grains troy. The standard of silver coins is 11 ounces 2 pennyweights of pure silver and 18 pennyweights of alloy, making together 1 pound troy; and the shilling should weigh 87.273 grains. The gold and silver coins in current use in the United States are all of the fineness 900 parts of the precious metal in 1,000, the gold dollar weighing 25.8 grains, and the silver dollar 412.5 grains.

That precise weight and fineness, by law appropriated to the pieces of each denomination, is called the standard. Locke, Considerations concerning Raising [the Value of Money].

3. That which is set up as a unit of reference; a form, type, example, instance, or combination of conditions accepted as correct and perfect, and hence as a basis of comparison; a criterion established by custom, public opinion, or general consent; a model.

Let the judgment of the judicious be the standard of thy merit. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., II. 8.

Let the French and Italians value themselves on their regularity; strength and elevation are our standard. Dryden, Epic Poetry.

J. M. Carmichael, Operative Surgery, p. 126.

Measuring other persons' actions by the standards our own thoughts and feelings furnish often causes misconception. H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 114.

4. A grade; a rank; specifically, in British elementary schools, one of the grades or degrees of attainment according to which the pupils are classified. The amount of the parliamentary grant to a school depends on the number of children who pass the examination conducted by government inspectors — the rate per pupil differing in the different standards.

Every boy in the seventh and sixth standards would have held out his hand, as they had been well drilled on that subject. N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 51.

Average standard, in copper-mining. See average². — Double standard, a monetary standard based upon both gold and silver as the materials of the circulating medium, as distinguished from a single standard based upon either gold or silver. — Dutch standard, a set of samples of sugar put up in bottles bearing the official seal and label of the Dutch government (whence the name), and recognized as the standard of the commercial world in fixing the quality of sugars. The set comprises 16 different grades, numbered, according to the different colors of the samples, from 5 (the darkest color) to 20 (the most refined) inclusive. The quality of the sugar to be tested is determined by comparison with the samples or the standard, and the sugar is named accordingly as No. 10, 13, etc., Dutch standard. — Gold standard, a monetary standard based upon gold as the material of the unit of value. — Metallic standard, a gold or silver standard. — Multiple standard, a monetary standard representing a considerable number of important articles in frequent use, the fluctuations in their value neutralizing one another and thus causing a substantial uniformity of value among them. — Mural standard, any standard set up on a wall, as, for instance, a standard of measurement for convenience in testing rules, tapes, measuring-chains, etc. — Photometric standard. See photometric. — Silver standard, a monetary standard based upon silver as the material of the monetary unit. — Single standard. See double standard. — Tabular standard. Same as multiple standard.

II. a. Serving as a standard or authority; regarded as a type or model; hence, of the highest order; of great worth or excellence.

See compass. — Standard pitch. See pitch, 3. — Standard solution, a standardized solution (which see, under solution). — Standard star, a star whose position and proper motion is particularly well known, and on that account is recommended for use in determining the positions of other stars, instrumental constants, time, latitude, and the like. — Standard time, the reckoning of time according to the local mean time on the nearest or other conventionally adopted meridian just an even number of hours from the Greenwich Royal Observatory. See time.

standard² (stan'djärd), v. t. [< standard², n.] To bring into conformity with a standard; regulate according to a standard.

To standard gold or silver is to convert the gross weight of either metal, whose fineness differs from the standard, into its equivalent weight of standard metal.

Bithell, Counting-House Dict. (Encyc. Dict.)

standard³ (stan'djärd), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also standerd, standert; < ME. standard* (?), < MD. standaerd, a post, pillar, column, mill-post, trophy (cf. OF. estandard, a kind of torch, < D.); a var., conformed to standaerd, an ensign, etc., of stander, a post, mill-post, etc.: see stander. The E. standard³ is thus a var. of stander, with various senses, mostly modern. It has been more or less confused with standard¹ and standard².] I. n. 1. If the "landed gentry" were stand-offish, and . . . did not put themselves out of the way to cultivate Miss Shalton's acquaintance, that young lady was all the more grateful for their reserve.

F. W. Robinson, Her Face was her Fortune, v.

stand-offishness (stand'ôf'ish-nes), n. The character of being repellent; the disposition or tendency to hold others at a distance. [Colloq.]

I told him I did not like this pride and stand-offishness between man and man, and added that if a duke were to speak to me I should try to treat him civilly.

D. C. Murray, Weaker Vessel, xxii.

stand-pipe (stand'pīp), n. 1. A vertical pipe erected at a well or reservoir, into which water is forced by mechanical means in order to obtain a head-pressure sufficient to convey it to a distance.—2. A small pipe inserted into an opening in a water-main.—3. An upright gas-pipe connecting the retort and the hydraulic main.—4. In a steam-engine, a boiler supply-pipe elevated enough to cause water to flow into the boiler in spite of the pressure of steam.—5. A pipe on the eduction-pipe of a steam-pump to absorb the concussions due to the pulsation and irregularities caused by the necessary use of bends and changes in the direction of pipes.—6. An upright pipe, open at the top, used in connection with a hot-water heating system to allow room for the expansion of the water when heated; an expansion-pipe.—7. A portable pipe used to afford a high head of water at fires. One section of a pipe is secured to trunnions, while other sections are kept in a rack, and attached when required. When the hose is coupled, the long pipe is raised by means of a wheel, and the lower end is connected with the water-supply. Another more recent form is a derrick, elevated by two cylinders and pistons analogous in construction to these parts in a steam-engine; but the pistons are moved by the pressure of carbonic acid gas, generated, immediately as wanted, from the reaction of sulphuric acid upon a solution of sodium bicarbonate in a suitable generator. The pipe is elevated above the derrick by a wire rope, pulleys, and a hand-winch. A movable butt or nozzle, which can be inclined to any desired angle up or down, or turned in any direction horizontally, is controlled by a man on the lower platform of the derrick, and a copious stream can thus be poured into or upon the top of a tall building. Also called water-tower.

standpoint (stand'point), n. [Tr. G. standpunkt; as stand + point.] A word objected to by purists. The point at which one stands; especially, the position from which one's observations are taken and one's opinions formed or delivered; the point of view; the mental situation.

The attraction of different speakers from Sunday to Sunday stimulates thought, each treating his theme from his own standpoint.

A. B. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 91.

The great snare of the psychologist is the confusion of his own standpoint with that of the mental fact about which he is making his report.

W. James, Prin. of Psychol., I. 196.

stand-rest (stand'rest), n. A stool, bracket, or the like serving to support a person in an almost upright position, as the miserere in medieval stalls: applied especially to a contrivance like a high stool, but with the top or seat sloping instead of horizontal.

standstill (stand'stil), n. and a. [< stand still: see stand, v., and still, a.] I. n. A halt; a pause; a stop, especially in consequence of obstruction, exhaustion, or perplexity.

In consequence of this fancy the whole business was at a standstill.

Greville, Memoirs, Nov. 29, 1823.

II. a. Deficient in progress or advancement; unprogressive: as, a standstill policy.

stand-up (stand'up), a. 1. Standing; erect; upright; high.

He was a tall youth now; . . . he wore his tail-coat and his stand-up collar, and watched the down on his lip with eager impatience.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, II. 7.

2. Specifically, in pugilism, noting a fair boxing-match, where the combatants stand manfully to each other, without false falls: as, a fair stand-up fight.

His face marked with strong manly furrows, records of hard thinking and square stand-up fights with life.

O. W. Holmes, Poet at the Breakfast Table, I.

stane (stān), n. An obsolete and dialectal (Scotch) form of stone.

stane-raw (stān'rā), n. [Also staniraw, stein-raw, stane-rag, rock-liverwort, appar. < stane, stone, + raw (origin obscure).] A foliaceous lichen, Parmelia saxatilis, used in the Scotch Highlands for dyeing brown; black crotches. [Orkney.]

stang (stang), n. [< ME. stange (prob. in part < Scand.), < AS. steng, steng, stengc, a pole, rod, bar, stick, stake, = MD. stanghe, D. stang = MLG. stange = OHG. stanga, MHG. stange. G. stange, a pole, = Ice. stöng (stang) = Sw. stång = Dan. stang, a pole, stang (cf. It. stanga, a bar, spar, < G.); < stingan (pret. stang), pierce, sting: see sting. Cf. stang.] 1. A wooden bar; a pole. [Obsolete or prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

He halchez al hole the haluez to-geder, & sythen on a stif stang stoutly hem henges.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 1614.

"Ye strike over hard, Steenie—I doubt ye foundered the child." "N'er a bit," said Steenie, laughing: "he has brow broad shouthers, and I just took the measure o' them wi' the stang."

Scott, Antiquary, xvi.

2†. The bar of a door. Florio.—3. A rod, pole, or perch used in the measurement of land. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, i. 2. [Prov. Eng.]—Riding the stang, in Scotland and the north of England, a mode of punishing brutal or unfaithful (or, sometimes, henpecked) husbands, or other offenders, by carrying them mounted on a stang through the town, with an accompaniment of jeers and rough music. The culprits have sometimes suffered by proxy, or, latterly, only in ethy.

stang (stang), v. t. [< stang, n.] To cause to ride on a stang.

This Word Stang, says Ray, is still used in some Colleges in the University of Cambridge, to stang Scholars in Christ-mass Time being to cause them to ride on a Colt-staff or Pole, for missing of Chapel.

Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 410.

stang (stang), n. [< ME. stange, a sting; < sting (pret. stang), sting: see sting.] 1. A sting. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

Queen the stanged must se
The nadder on the tree ther hange,
Thai were al warisht of their stange.

Holy Kood (ed. Morris), p. 117.

My curse upon thy venom'd stang,
That shoots my tortured gums along.

Burns, Address to the Toothache.

2. The weever, a fish. Also stangster. [Prov.] stang (stang), r. [< Ice. stanga, sting, goad, < stong, a pole, stake: see stang, n., and cf. stang.] I. trans. To sting.

Holy Kood (E. E. T. S.), p. 117.

II. intrans. 1. To throb with pain; sting. Hallucell.—2. To cause a sharp, sudden pain; inflict a sting.

But for how lang the flee may stang,

Let inclination law that.

Burns, Jolly Beggars.

[Obsolete or dialectal in all uses.]

stang (stang), n. An obsolete or dialectal preterit of sting.

stang (stang), n. An obsolete form of stank.

Stangeria (stan-jé'ri-ä), n. [NL. (T. Moore, 1853), named after Dr. Stanger of Natal, one of the first to collect specimens of the plant.] A genus of gymnospermous plants, of the order Cycadaceæ and tribe Zamiæ, made by some a tribe Stangeriæ. It is characterized by a strobile with scales imbricated in alternating series, a thick naked napiform caudex, and leaf-segments with a strong midrib and numerous unbranched or forking nerves. There are one or two species, natives of Natal. They are singular plants with the smooth irregular trunk only about a foot high or nearly subterranean, from which rise a few coarse long-stalked pinnate fern-like leaves, inflexed in the bud, the leaflets straight in the bud, linear-lanceolate, scalloped, spiny-toothed or cleft, and traversed by parallel forking veins. The fruit, a thick downy strobile or cone, is borne on a stalk surrounded by circular concave woolly bracts overlapping in two or three ranks. The male plants bear cylindrical cones with numerous stamens on the under side of their compound scales. S. paradoxa, in allusion to its thick, round caudex, is called Hottentot's-head; small articles, as necklaces and snuff-boxes, are sometimes made from its seeds.

stanhope (stan'höp), n. [So called after a Mr. Stanhope, for whom it was orig. contrived.] A light two-wheeled carriage without a top.

When the carriages met again, he stood up in his stan-hope, . . . ready to doff his hat.

Thackeray, Vanly Fair, xix.

Stanhopea (stan-hö'pë-ä), n. [NL. (Frost, 1829), named after Philip Henry, Earl Stanhope, president of the London Medico-botanical Society.] A genus of orchids, of the tribe Vandæ, type of the subtribe Stanhopeiæ. It is characterized by a loose raceme of a few large flowers with spreading and nearly equal sepals, a thick fleshy lip which is commonly wavy or twisted, a straight erect or incurved column usually prolonged and two-winged above, and pollinia with flattened stalks and scale-shaped glands. The peculiar lip is highly polymorphous and complex, bearing lateral lobes which are often thickened into a solid mass forming a spherical, oblong, or sacate hypochilium, a middle lobe or epichilium which is itself often three-lobed and attached by a distinct joint, and sometimes at its base other appendages, lobes or horns—the metachilium. There are about 20 species, natives of tropical America from Brazil to Mexico. They are epiphytes with very short stems bearing many sheaths and a single large plicate leaf. The stem soon thickens into a fleshy pseudobulb, from the base of which the flower-stem proceeds. The flowers are very remarkable for their structure, size, and rich colorings, usually brown-spotted, yellow, or purple; for their great fragrance, whence the recently introduced perfume called stanhopea; and for their growth downward, not upward as in ordinary plants—a habit first discovered by the accidental breaking of a flower-pot in which the blossoms had buried themselves in the earth. They are now cultivated under glass in hard-wood baskets with interstices through which the flowers protrude.

Stanhope lens, press. See lens, press.

stanhoscope (stan'hö-sköp), n. [< Stanho (pe lens) + Gr. skopeiv, view.] A form of simple magnifying-glass, a modification of the Stanhope lens, in which the surface away from the eye is plane instead of convex.

staniel (stan'yel), n. [Also stanyel, stannyel, also (with the consonant i or y following n assimilated to n) stannel, formerly stannell, or assimilated to ch, stanchel, stanchil: < ME. staniel, stanyel, earlier stanzelle*, < AS. stāngella, stāngilla, a kestrel (erroneously used to gloss L. pellicanus) (= G. steingall, a staniel), < stān, stone, rock, + gella*, gilla*, < gellan, gillan, giellan, yell, scream, a secondary form related to gulan, sing: see stone and yell, gale.] The word is thus nearly similar in its second element to nightingale. The E. form stone-gall is partly from the AS. with the long vowel retained, and partly (as to the 2d element) due to the G. form; the form standgall, with the same terminal syllable, simulates stand, and the form standgale (as if equiv. to windhover) is a simulated form, as if < stand + gale.] The kestrel or windhover, Falco tinnunculus or Tinnunculus alaudarius. See cut under Tinnunculus.

Fab. What a dish o' poison has she dressed him!

Sir To. And with what wing the staniel checks at it!

Shak. T. N., II. 5. 124.

stanielry (stan'yel-ri), n. [< staniel + -ry.] The act or practice of hawking with staniels; ignoble falconry. Lady Alimony, sig. I. 4. (Nares.) stank (stangk), n. [E. dial. also assimilated stanch (see stanch); < ME. stank, stanc, stauke, stang, < OF. estang, F. étang (Walloon estanke, stunke) = Pr. estanc = Sp. estanque = Pg. tanque (ML. stanca), a dam to hem in water, < L. stagnum, a pool of stagnant water: see stagnate, stagnant. Cf. stanch; also cf. tank.] 1. A body of standing water; a pool; a pond. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

And alle be it that men clepen it a See, zit is it nouthur See ne Arm of the See; for it is but a Stank of fresche Watir, that is in lengthe 100 Furlonges.

Manderly, Travels, p. 115.

Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

2. A tank; a ditch. [Prov. Eng. or Scotch.] stank (stangk), v. t. [< stank, n., or perhaps an unassimilated form of the related verb stanch, q. v.] To dam up. Fletcher, Poems, p. 154. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

stank (stangk), a. [Early mod. E. also stanch, stanche; < OF. estanc, tired, = Pr. estanc, still, immovable, = It. stanco, tired; cf. Sp. estanco, = Pg. estanque, water-tight, stanch: see stanch.] Exhausted; weary. Florio; Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

stank (stangk), Old preterit of stink.

stank-hen (stangk'hen), n. [< stank + hen.] The moor-hen or gallinule, Gallinula chloropus. [Scotch.]

stankie (stangk'ki), n. Same as stank-hen. [Scotch.]

stannaburrow (stan'a-bur'ō), n. [Prop. stannerburrow, < stanner + burrow, 1, 2.] See the quotation (the etymology there suggested is erroneous).

Leaving the stream a little to the right, we shall notice several small heaps of stones placed at intervals along the slope. These little mounds, which are met with in various parts of Dartmoor, are called by the moor-men stannaburrows, which name is probably derived from the same root as the word stannary, and they were probably tin bounds set up by the miners.

W. Crossing, Ancient Crosses of Dartmoor, p. 69, quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., V. 45.

stannary (stan'a-ri), a. and n. [Also stannery; < ML. stannaria, a tin-mine, < L. stannum, tin: see stannum.] I. a. Relating to tin, tin-mines, or the working of tin: as, "stannary courts," Blackstone, Com., III. vi.—Stannary court, a court instituted at a very early period in English history for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the tin-mines and tin-miners of Cornwall.

II. n.; pl. stannaries (-riz). A region or district in which tin is mined: the English form of the Latin stannaria (or stannaria, as written in a charter of the third year of King John, 1201). The miners themselves were called stannatores or (rarely) stannatores.

For they wrongfully claim all the County of Devon to be their Stannary.

Petition to Parliament, 1 Ed. III., MS. in Rec. Office, [quoted in De La Reche's Geol. Rep. on Cornwall.]

If by public laws the mint were ordained to be only supplied by our stannaries, how currently would they pass for more precious than silver mines!

Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 17.

stannate (stan'āt), n. [< stann (ic) + -ate.] A salt of stannic acid.

stannel (stan'el), n. See staniel.

stanner (stan'er), n. [Origin obscure.] A small stone; in the plural, gravel. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

stannery¹, a. and n. See stannary.

stannery² (stan'ér-i), a. [ME. stann(e)ry; < stanner + -y.] Gravelly; stony. Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 86. [Obsolete or Scotch.]

stannic (stan'ik), a. [= F. stannique; < L. stannum, tin, + -ic.] Of or pertaining to tin; procured from tin: specifically applied to those compounds in which tin appears as a quadrivalent atom: as, stannic acid, $\text{SnO}(\text{OH})_2$, a hydrate obtained from stannous acid, which unites with bases to form salts called stannates.

stanniferous (sta-nif'ér-us), a. [L. stannum, tin, + ferre = E. bear.] Containing or affording tin.

stannine (stan'in), n. [L. stannum, tin, + -ine.] A brittle steel-gray or iron-black ore of tin, of a metallic luster, consisting of the sulphides of tin, copper, and iron, and generally zinc, found in Cornwall; tin pyrites. Also called, from its color, bell-metal ore.

stannite (stan'it), n. [L. stannum, tin, + -ite.] Same as stannine.

stannotype (stan'ô-tip), n. [L. stannum, tin, + Gr. τύπος, type.] In photog., a picture taken on a tin plate; a tin-type or ferrotype. Imp. Dict.

stannous (stan'us), a. [L. stannum, tin, + -ous.] Of, pertaining to, or containing tin: specifically applied to those compounds in which tin appears as a bivalent atom: as, stannous acid, or protoxide of tin (SnO).

stannum (stan'um), n. [L. stannum, stagnum, tin, also an alloy of silver and lead (> It. stagno = Sp. estaho = Pg. estanho = Pr. estanh = F. étain, tin, tin); perhaps the same as L. stagnum, pool, applied to a mass of fluid metal: see stank, stagnate. Cf. Bret. stean = Corn. stean = W. ystaen = Gael. staoín = Manx stainny, tin (< L. f): see tin.]

stannyl, n. See staniel.

stant¹. A contracted form of standeth, third person singular present indicative of stand.

stant² (stant), n. Same as *stent*².

stantion (stan'shon), n. [Appar. a var. of stanchion.] Same as stemson.

stanza (stan'zä), n. [Formerly also stanzo, stanze (Sp. estancia = G. stanz = F. stanze), in def. 2; < It. stanza, OIt. stantia, prop. an abode, lodging, chamber, dwelling, stanza, also a stanza (so called from the stop or pause at the end of it), < ML. stantia, an abode: see stance.] 1. Pl. stanze (-ze). In arch., an apartment or division in a building; a room or chamber: as, the stanze of Raphael in the Vatican.—2. In versification, a series of lines arranged in a fixed order of sequence as regards their length, metrical form, or rimes, and constituting a typical group, or one of a number of similar groups, composing a poem or part of a poem. Stanza is often used interchangeably with strophe—strophe, however, being used preferably of ancient or quantitative, and stanza of modern or accentual and rime poetry. In the latter the stanza often consists of lines identical in form throughout, the arrangement of rimes alone defining the group of lines. Such a stanza is not properly a strophe. A couplet is not regarded as a stanza, and a triplet is rarely so designated. Compare verse. Abbreviated st.

Horace . . . confines himself strictly to one sort of verse, or stanza, in every Ode. Dryden, Misc., Pref.

stanzaed (stan'zad), a. [L. stanza + -ed.] Having stanzas; consisting of stanzas: as, a two-stanzaed poem.

stanzaic (stan-zä'ik), a. [L. stanza + -ic.] Consisting of or relating to stanzas; arranged as a stanza. E. C. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 381.

stanzic (stan'zik), a. [L. stanz-a + -ic.] Same as stanzaic. E. Wadham, Eng. Versification, p. 92.

stanzo (stan'zō), n. An obsolete form of stanza. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 5. 18.

stapet, a. See stapen.

stapedial (stā-pē'di-äl), a. [NL. stapedius + -al.] 1. Stirrup-shaped: as, the stapedial bone of the ear.—2. Pertaining to the stapes or its representative, whatever its form.—Stapedial ligament, the annular ligament of the stapes, connecting the foot or base of the stirrup with the margin of the fenestra ovalis.—Stapedial muscle, the stapedius.—Stapedial nerve, a tympanic branch of the facial which innervates the stapedial muscle.

Stapedifera (stap-ē-dif'ē-rä), n. pl. [NL. (Thacher, 1877), neut. pl. of stapedifer: see stapediferous.] Those animals which have a stapes, as mammals, birds, reptiles, and amphibians; all vertebrates above fishes.

stapediferous (stap-ē-dif'ē-rus), a. [NL. stapedifer, < ML. stapes, a stirrup, + L. ferre =

E. bear.] Having a stapes; of or pertaining to the Stapedifera.

stapedius (stā-pē'di-us), n.; pl. stapedii (-i). [NL., < ML. stapes, a stirrup: see stapes.] The stapedial muscle; a muscle of the tympanum actuating the stapes of some animals. In man the stapedius arises from a cavity hollowed out in the pyramid of the petrosal bone; its tendon passes out of a little hole in the apex of the pyramid, and is inserted into the neck of the stapes. Its action draws the head of the stapes backward, and also causes the stapes to rotate a little on a vertical axis drawn through its own center. The name is correlated with incudius and malleolus. See cut under hyoid.

Stapelia (stā-pē'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after J. B. van Stapel, a Dutch physician and botanist (died 1636).] A genus of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceæ, type of the tribe Stapelieæ. It is characterized by flowers with a wheel-shaped or reflexed corolla without appendages between the five valvate lobes, and with the tube short and broadly bell-shaped or almost wanting, and by a double corona, the outer of five horizontally spreading lobes alternate with the anthers, the inner of five scales produced into erect or arching horns. There are over 70 species, natives of South Africa. Their short fleshy leafless stems are produced into four prominent angles, which are coarsely toothed, sometimes bearing transient rudiments of leaves at the apex of the new growths. Numerous dark tubercles give the stems a grotesque appearance. Some are cultivated under glass for their beautiful and varied flowers, which are commonly very large, some reaching 12 inches (S. gigantea sometimes 14 inches) in diameter, of singular structure and often exquisitely marbled or dotted. In other species they are dingy or unattractive, usually coarse, thick, fleshy, and short-lived, and in most species exhale transiently a fetid odor as of carrion, attracting flies, which deposit their eggs upon them in large quantities. Their colors are largely the livid-purple and lurid-reddish, yellow, and brownish hues which are associated with disagreeable odors also in Rafflesia, Aristolochia, Amorophallois, and others of the largest flowers. They are sometimes called carrion-flowers; S. bufonia is known, from its blotches, as toad-flower; and S. Aderias, from its spreading narrow-parted corolla, as starfish-flower.

Stapelieæ (stap-ē-li'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Stapelia + -eæ.] A tribe of gamopetalous plants, of the order Asclepiadaceæ. It is characterized by valvate and commonly fleshy corollalobes, waxy erect or laterally placed pollen-masses solitary in each anther-cell, and obtuse or retuse unappendaged anthers, closely incumbent over the disk of the stigma or partly immersed in it. The 16 genera are plants commonly with short, thick, fleshy stems, coarsely angled or tubercled, without leaves except in the East Indian genus Frerea; one genus, Boucerosia, extends into Europe in Spain and Sicily; the others, as Stapelia, the type, are mostly South African.

stapent, stapet, a. Stepped; advanced. Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 270.

stapes (stā'pēz), n. [NL., < ML. stapes, a stirrup, < OHG. stapf, staph = D. stap, etc., a step: see step, and cf. staffier.] In zool. and anat., the inmost one of the three auditory ossicles of man and other mammals, situated in the tympanum, or middle ear. The stapes is connected on the one hand with the incus, and on the other with the fenestra ovalis, and is moved by a small muscle called the stapedius. The name is derived from the close resemblance in shape of the human stapes to a stirrup.

1. Of Man (the surface of its foot separately shown). 2. Of Seal (Phoca vitulina). 3. Of Chick (its foot separately shown, and cartilaginous parts in dotted outline): m.st., mediostapedial part, forming with s.st. the stapes proper (columella); e.st., extrastapedial part; i.st., infrastrapedial part; s.st., suprastapedial part.

In man the bone presents a head, with a little fossa for movable articulation with the orbicular incudal bone; a neck or constricted part; two branches, legs or crura; and an oval base or foot. This bone is morphologically one of the proximal elements of the hyoidean arch. The corresponding element in birds and reptiles is very differently shaped, and is sometimes called stapes, oftener columella. It is rod-like or columellar, with an expanded base fitting the fenestra ovalis, the other end usually showing a cross-bar. Parts of such a stapes are distinguished as mediostapedial, the main shaft; extrastapedial, the part beyond the cross-bar; infrastrapedial, the lower arm of the cross-bar; and suprastapedial, the upper arm of the cross-bar—the last being supposed to represent the incus of mammals. Some of these parts may be wanting, or only represented by a ligament, or coalesced with a part of the mandibular arch. The stapes or columella furnishes the primitive actual or virtual connection of the hyoidean arch with the petrotic capsule. See stapedial, columella, & (b), and cuts under hyoid, Pythionideæ, and tympanic.—Annular ligament of the stapes. See ligament and stapedial.

Staphisagria (staf-i-sag'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Tragus, 1546), < ML. staphisagria, staphysagria, stafisagria, etc.; prop. two words, staphis agria, < Gr. as if σταφίς ἀγρία*; σταφίς, a dried grape, a raisin, also (in L. staphis) the plant stavesacre; ἀγρία, fem. of ἀγριος, wild, < ἀγρός, a field, the country. The E. form of the name is stavesacre, q. v.] A former genus of polypetalous plants, of the order Ranunculaceæ. It is now classed as a section of the genus Delphinium, and as such distinguished by a short spur, from three to five ovaries forming bladderly few-seeded capsules, and biennial habit. See Delphinium and stavesacre, also ointment of stavesacre (under ointment).

staphisagrine (staf-i-sag'rin), n. [L. Staphisagria + -ine.] A poisonous amorphous alkaloid, soluble in ether and in water, obtained from Delphinium Staphisagria, or stavesacre.

staphyle (staf'i-lē), n. [NL., < Gr. σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, also the uvula when swollen.] The uvula.

Staphylea (staf-i-lē'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), abridged from Staphyloendron (Tournefort, 1700), < L. staphyloendron, a shrub thought to have been S. pinnata; prob. so named from its clustered fruit, < Gr. σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, + δένδρον, a tree.] A genus of polypetalous plants, type of the order Staphyleaceæ. It is characterized by an ovary which is two- or three-parted to the base, contains numerous biserial ovules, and ripens into an inflated and bladderly membranous capsule, discharging its few seeds at the apex of the two or three lobes. There are 4 species, natives of Europe, the Himalayas, Japan, and North America. They are shrubs with numerous roundish branches, bearing opposite stipulate leaves, each composed of from three to five leaflets, which are involute in the bud and are furnished with stipels. The white flowers, with five erect petals, hang from nodding panicles or racemes. The large and peculiar fruit is the source of the common name bladder-nut. (See cut under nectary.) S. pinnata, also called bag-nut, common in hedgerows and thickets in Europe, bears hard smooth nuts sometimes used for rosaries.

Staphyleaceæ (staf'i-lē-ä'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1825), < Staphylea + -aceæ.] An order of polypetalous plants, of the cohort Sapindales, long classed as a suborder of the Sapindaceæ, from which it is distinguished by its regular bisexual flowers with the five stamens inserted outside of the base of the disk, by albuminous and sometimes arillate seeds with a straight embryo, and by opposite simple or compound leaves. It includes 16 species, of 4 genera, of which Staphylea is the type; of the others, Turpinia includes a number of small trees and shrubs with roundish berry-like fruit, mostly of tropical Asia and America, and Euscaphis a few Japanese shrubs bearing coriaceous foli- cles. See cut under bladder-nut.

staphyline (staf'i-lin), a. [L. σταφίλιος, of or pertaining to a bunch of grapes, < σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes, also the uvula.] 1. Having the form of a bunch of grapes; botryoidal.—2. Pertaining to the uvula or to the entire palate.—Staphyline glands, palatine glands.

staphylinid (staf-i-lin'id), n. and a. I. n. A rove-beetle, as a member of the Staphylinidæ.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the family Staphylinidæ; staphylinine.

Staphylinidæ (staf-i-lin'i-dä), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Staphylinus + -idæ.] A large and important family of brachelytrous elavicorn beetles, commonly called rove-beetles. They resemble the Pselaphidæ in having short elytra, but differ in having the abdomen flexible and consisting of eight ventral segments. The antennæ are generally eleven-jointed, the labial palpi three-jointed, and the maxillary four-jointed. The short truncate elytra usually leave most of the abdomen exposed, and this, when the beetles are disturbed, is turned up over the back, as if the insects were about to sting. A familiar example is the Ocyptus olens, known as the cocktail and devil's coach-horse. (See Goerius, and cut under devil.) Some species discharge an odoriferous fluid from the tip of the abdomen. The larvae resemble the adults, and are found under bark, in fungi, decaying plants, and the excrement of animals, in ants' nests, hornets' nests, and the nests of certain birds. It is one of the largest and most wide-spread of the families of Coleoptera. About 1,000 species are known in America north of Mexico, and about 5,000 in the whole world. Also Staphylinidæ, Staphylini, Staphylinæ, Staphylinida, Staphylinii, Staphylinidæ. See cuts under Homalium and rove-beetle.

staphyliniform (staf-i-lin'i-fôrm), a. [L. Staphylinus, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Resembling a rove-beetle; related to the Staphylinidæ.

staphylinine (staf-i-lin'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Staphylinidæ.

Staphylinus (staf-i-lī'nus), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1758), < Gr. σταφύλιος, a kind of insect, < σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes.] The typical genus of the family Staphylinidae, formerly corresponding to that family in a broad sense. Used with various limitations, it is now made type of the restricted family, and characterized by having the maxillary palpi with the fourth joint equal to or longer than the third, the marginal lines of the thorax united near the apex, the ligula emarginate, the middle coxae slightly separate, and the abdomen narrowed at the tip. The species are numerous, and among them are the largest forms in the family. Twenty-one are known in America north of Mexico, and about 100 in the whole world.

staphylion (stā-fil'ī-on), n. [NL., < Gr. σταφύλιον, dim. of σταφύλη, the uvula: see staphyle.] The median point of the posterior nasal spine. Török.

staphylitis (staf-i-lī'tis), n. [< staphyle, the uvula, + -itis.] Uvulitis.

staphyloma (staf-i-lō'mā), n.; pl. staphylomata (-mā-tā). [NL., < Gr. σταφύλωμα, a defect in the eye, < σταφύλη, a bunch of grapes.] A name given to certain local bulgings of the eyeball. — Staphyloma corneae, a protrusion involving more or less of the cornea, such as may result from preceding ulceration. Also called anterior staphyloma. — Staphyloma corneae pellucidum, conical cornea. Also called staphyloma pellucidum. — Staphyloma posticum, posterior staphyloma; sclerochoroiditis in the back part of the eye, resulting in a thinning of the coats and consequent bulging and progressive myopia.

staphylomatic (staf'i-lō-mat'ik), a. [< staphyloma (-t-) + -ic.] Characterized or affected by staphyloma.

staphylomatous (staf-i-lō-mā'tus), a. [< staphyloma (-t-) + -ous.] Pertaining to or of the nature of staphyloma.

staphyloplasty (staf'i-lō-plas'ti), n. [< Gr. σταφύλη, the uvula, + πλάσσειν, form, shape: see plastic.] In surg., an operation for restoring the soft palate when it is defective.

staphylorrhaphy (staf-i-lor'ā-fī), n. [< Gr. σταφύλη, the uvula, + ράφω, a sewing.] In surg., the plastic operation for cleft palate, consisting in uniting the mucous membrane across the cleft. Also called cionorrhaphia, palatorrhaphy.

staphylotome (staf'i-lō-tōm), n. [< Gr. σταφύλωμα, a knife for excising the uvula, < σταφύλη, the uvula, + τέμνειν, ταμείν, cut.] In surg., a knife for operating upon the uvula or the palate.

staphylootomy (staf-i-lōt'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. σταφύλωμα, the excision of the uvula, < σταφύλη, the uvula, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμείν, cut: see -otomy.] In surg., amputation of the uvula.

staple¹ (stā'pl), n. [< ME. stapel, stapil, stapyle, stapul, < AS. stapel, stapol, stapul, a prop, post (= OS. stapal = OFries. stapul, stapel = MD. stapel, D. stapel, a prop, foot-rest, a seat, pile, heap, = MLG. Cf. *staple*².] 1. A post; a prop; a support.

Under ech stapel of his bed,
That he niste, four thai hid.

The Secyn Sages, 201. (Halliwell.)

2. A loop of metal, or a bar or wire bent and formed with two points, to be driven into wood to hold a hook, pin, or bolt.

Massy staples,
And corresponsive and fulfilling bolts.

Shak., T. and C., Prol., l. 17.

3. In founding, a piece of nail-iron with a flat disk riveted to the head, and pointed below, used in a mold to hold a core in position. E. H. Knight. — 4. Of a lock, same as *box*², 13. — 5. In musical instruments of the oboe class, the metallic tube to which the reeds are fastened, and through which the tone is conveyed from them into the wooden body of the instrument. — 6. In coal-mining, a shallow shaft within a mine. [North. Eng.] — Seizin by hasp and staple. See hasp. — Staple of a press, the frame or uprights of a hand printing-press. C. T. Jacob, Printers' Vocab.

staple² (stā'pl), v. t.; pret. and pp. stapled, ppr. stapling. [< *staple*¹, n.] To support, attach, or fix by means of a staple or staples. Elect. Rev., XVI, 5.

staple² (stā'pl), n. and a. [Early mod. E. staple; < OF. estaple, estape, F. étape (ML. stapula), a market, store, store-house, = G. stapel (Sw. stapel, Dan. stabel, in comp.), < MD. stapel = MLG. LG. stapel, a market, emporium, appar. a particular use of stapel, a pile, heap: see *staple*¹.] I. n. 1. A settled mart or market; an emporium: a town where certain commodities are chiefly taken for sale. In England, formerly, the king's staple was established in certain ports or towns, and certain goods could not be exported without being first brought to these ports to be rated and charged with the duty payable to the king or the public. The principal commodities on which customs were levied were wool, skins, and leather, and these were originally the staple commodities.

The first ordination of a Staple, or of one onely settled Mart-towne for the vttering of English woolls & woollen fells, instituted by the sayd K. Edward.

Hakluyt's Voyages, To the Reader.

Hence — 2. A general market or exchange.

Tho. O sir, a Staple of News! or the New Staple, which you please.

P. Jun. What's that?

Fash. An office, sir, a brave young office set up. . . .

P. Jun. For what?

Tho. To enter all the News, sir, of the time.

Fash. And vent it as occasion serves.

B. Jonson, Staple of News, l. 1.

3. A commercial monopoly formed by a combination of merchants acting under the sanction of the royal privilege of fairs and markets. Foreign staple was the system of trade carried on by this monopoly on the continent; home staple was the business organized by it in leading towns in England.

Their ayme in this edict is, if possible, to draw for the loue of currents the staple of diuers merchandise to that city.

Sir Thomas Roe, Negotiations (London, 1740).

4. The principal commodity grown or manufactured in a locality, either for exportation or home consumption — that is, originally, the merchandise which was sold at a staple or mart.

The prices of bread-stuffs and provisions, the staples of the North, and of cotton and tobacco, the staples of the South, were high, not only absolutely, but relatively.

Tausig, Tariff History, p. 19.

5. The principal element of or ingredient in anything; the chief constituent; the chief item.

He has two very great faults, which are the staple of his bad side.

Dickens, Martin Chuzzlewit, vi.

Politics, theology, history, education, public improvements, personal matters, are conversational staples.

Harper's Mag., LXXX, 466.

6. The material or substance of anything; raw or unmanufactured material. — 7. The fiber of any material used for spinning, used in a general sense and as expressive of the character of the material: as, wool of short staple; cotton of long staple, etc. — Corrector of the staple. See corrector. — Merchant of the staple. See merchant. — Ordinance of Staple. Same as Statute of Staple. — Staple of land, the particular nature and quality of land. — Statute of Staple, or Ordinance of Staple, an English statute of 1353 (27 Edw. III., st. 2), recognizing the ancient custom of staple, and confirming the rights and privileges of merchants under it. — Statute staple. See statute.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to or being a mart or staple for commodities: as, a staple town. Flanders is Staple, as men tell mee,
To all nations of Christiantie.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 189.

2. Mainly occupying commercial enterprise; established in commerce: as, a staple trade. —

3. According to the laws of commerce; marketable; fit to be sold.

Will take off their ware at their own rates, and trouble not themselves to examine whether it be staple or no.

Swift.

4. Chief; principal; regularly produced or made for market: as, staple commodities.

staple² (stā'pl), v.; pret. and pp. stapled, ppr. stapling. [< *staple*¹, n.] I. intrans. To erect a staple; form a monopoly of production and sale; establish a mart for such purpose. Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 437. [Rare.]

II. trans. 1. To furnish or provide with a staple or staples.

Fleeces stapled with such wool
As Lemnster cannot yield more finer stuff.

Greene, Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay.

2. To sort or classify according to the length of the fiber: as, to staple wool.

staple-house (stā'pl-hous), n. [MD. stapel-huys; as *staple*² + *house*¹.] A warehouse where commodities chargeable with export duties were stored. See *staple*², n., 1.

In their large staple-house on the Thames . . . were stored the collections of raw produce — wool, tin, and hides the chief of them — which England sent away to foreign countries.

F. Martin, Hist. of Lloyd's, p. 2.

staple-punch (stā'pl-punch), n. A bifurcated punch used for pricking holes in blind-slats and rods for the reception of staples.

stapler (stā'plēr), n. [< *staple*² + *-er*¹.] 1. A merchant of the staple; a monopolist. See *staple*², 3.

You merchants were wont to be merchant staplers.

Middleton, Family of Love, l. 3.

2. One employed in assorting wool according to its staple.

Mr. Gregg retired from active business as a wool-stapler.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, l. 12.

staple-right (stā'pl-rit), n. A right, possessed by municipalities of the Netherlands, and thence introduced into the New Netherlands (New York), of compelling passing vessels either to stop and offer their merchandise for sale first of all in the market-place of the town, or to pay a duty.

star¹ (stār), n. [(a) < ME. starre, sterre, storre, steorre (pl. starres, sterres, steores, sterren, steorren), < AS. steorra = OS. sterro = OFries. stera = MD. sterre, starre, D. ster, star = MLG. sterre = OHG. sterro, MHG. sterre, a star; with formative -ra (perhaps orig. -na, -r-na being assimilated to -ra, the word being then orig. ult. identical with the next). If, as has been often conjectured, star has a connection with strew, it must be rather as 'strown' or 'sprinkled' over the sky than as 'sprinkler' of light.] 1. Any celestial body which appears as a luminous point. In ordinary modern language star is frequently limited to mean a fixed star (see below). In astrology the stars, especially the planets, are supposed to exercise an influence upon human destinies.

His eye twynkled in his heed alyght,

As doon the sterres in the frosty nyght.

Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 268.

There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars.

Luke xxi. 25.

The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,

But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

Shak., J. C., l. 2. 140.

You are, thanks to your stars, in mighty credit.

Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, p. 114.

Hence — 2. Destiny. [Rare.]

I was not born unto riches, neither is it, I think, my star to be wealthy. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ll. 13.

3. Anything which resembles a star.

His charger trampling many a prickly star

Of sprouted thistle on the broken stones.

Tennyson, Geraint.

Specifically — (a) A star-shaped figure made of silver, gold, or both, sometimes set with jewels, worn usually upon the breast as one of the insignia of a higher class of an honorary order. See insignia, and cuts under bath, garter, and Order of St. Michael (under order).

While peers, and dukes, and all their sweeping train,

And garters, stars, and coronets appear.

Pope, R. of the L., l. 85.

(b) The asterisk (*). See asterisk. (c) In pyrotechny, a small piece of inflammable composition, which burns high in air with a colored flame, and presents the appearance of a star. (d) A group of cracks or flaws radiating from a center.

Three times slipping from the outer edge,

I bump'd the ice into three several stars.

Tennyson, The Epic.

(e) A spot of white or light color on the forehead of an animal.

Onward, caballito mio,

With the white star in thy forehead!

Longfellow, Spanish Student, lll. 6.

(f) In zool.: (1) A star-animal; a starfish, or other echinoderm of obviously radiate figure, as a brittle-star, feather-star, lily-star, sand-star, or sun-star. See the compounds. (2) A stellate sponge-spicule; an aster. (g) In a copper-plate or lithographic printing-press, the radial spokes on the roller, which serve as handles. E. H. Knight.

4. Figuratively, a person of brilliant or attractive qualities; one who shines preëminently; specifically, the chief and preëminent actor or actress of a dramatic or operatic company.

Sole star of all that place and time,

I saw him — in his golden prime,

The Good Haroun Alraschid.

Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

If I were now to receive a message from the planet Mars offering me a star engagement, I could not be more astonished than I was on that day. J. Jefferson, Autobiog., lll.

5. In her., same as estoile. — 6. In fort., a small fort having five or more points, or salient and reëntering angles flanking one another. Also called star-fort. — 7. An additional life bought by a player in the game of pool. [Eng.]

Only one star is allowed in a pool; and when there are only two players left in, no star can be purchased.

To the naked eye the brighter stars appear to have radiating lines of light; but these are due to imperfections of vision, and are different for different observers. All the fixed stars twinkle (see twinkling). In a good telescope on a fine night a star shows a minute round disk surrounded by concentric rings; but these phenomena are mere effects of diffraction, and no instrument yet constructed can enable the eye to detect a fixed star's real breadth. The stars differ in brilliancy, and in this respect are said to have different magnitudes (see magnitude, 5). These in many cases are changeable (see variable star). The number of stars in the whole heavens brighter than a given magnitude m may be approximately calculated by the formula $(3.3)^{m-1}$. The stars are very irregularly distributed in the heavens, being greatly concentrated toward the Milky Way. This is particularly true of first-magnitude stars, and again of faint telescopic stars. There are many clusters of stars, among which the Pleiades, the Hyades, Praesepe, Coma Berenices, and the cluster in the sword-handle of Perseus are visible to the naked eye. Other stars are associated in systems of two, three, or more. (See multiple star.) To most eyes the stars appear yellow, but some are relatively pale, others chromatic yellow, and still others ruddy. There are many ruddy stars in the part of the Galaxy near Lyra. L. M. Rutherford of New York first showed that in reference to their spectral lines the fixed stars fall under several distinct types. Type I, according to the usual nomenclature, embraces spectra showing strong hydrogen-lines, all others being very faint. These belong without exception to pale stars, such as Sirius, Vega, Procyon, Altair, Spica, Fomalhaut, Regulus, Castor. Type II embraces spectra showing many strong metallic lines, like the sun. Almost all such stars are chrome, as Arcturus, Capella, Aldebaran, Pollux; but a few are pale, as Deneb and Elwaid, and a few ruddy. Type III consists of banded spectra, the bands shading away toward the red. These stars are all ruddy, and probably all variable. They embrace Betelgeuze, Antares, Mira Ceti, Sheat, Menkar, Pishpai, Rasalgethi. Type IV consists of spectra having three broad bands shaded away toward the blue end. These all belong to very ruddy stars, of which none are bright, and none seem to be variable. Type V consists of spectra showing bright lines. Such stars are few; their magnitudes and colors are variable. Upon careful comparison of the spectra of stars with those of the chemical elements they contain, it is found that the lines are shifted a little along the spectrum toward one end or the other, according as the star is receding from or approaching the earth. The apparent places of the fixed stars are affected in recognized ways by diurnal motion, precession, nutation, aberration, and refraction. In addition, each star has a very slow motion of its own, called its proper motion. There are very few cases in which this is so great as to have carried the star over the breadth of the moon's disk since the beginning of the Christian era. Many stars in one neighborhood of the heavens show, in many cases, like proper motions—a phenomenon first remarked by R. A. Proctor, and termed by him star-drift. But the average proper motion of the stars is away from a radiant under the left hand of Hercules, showing that the solar system has a relative motion toward that point. This is sufficient to carry a sixth-magnitude star 4" in a century. The parallax (that is to say, the amount by which the angle at the earth between the star and the sun falls short of 90° when the angle at the sun between the star and the earth is equal to 90°) has been measured only for a few stars, and these few have been selected with a view of finding the largest parallaxes. That of a Centauri, which is the largest, is nearly a second of arc. It is so difficult to measure parallax otherwise than relatively, and to free its absolute amount from variations of latitude, diurnal nutation, refraction, etc., that very little can be said to be known of the smaller parallaxes. It appears, however, that small stars have nearly as great parallaxes as bright ones where the proper motions are not large. The various methods of ascertaining the distances of the stars depend upon three independent principles. The first method is from the parallax, by means of which the distance of the star is calculated by trigonometry. The second method depends on the ascertaining of the speed at which the star is really moving by the shifting of the spectral lines, and then observing its angular motion. In the case of a double star, its motion in the line of sight at elongation can be measured with the spectroscopic; and from this, its orbit being known, its rate of motion at conjunction can be deduced. The third method supposes the ratio of the amount of light emitted by the star to that emitted by the sun to be known in some way, whereupon the ratio of apparent light will show the relative distances. All these methods show that even the nearest stars are hundreds of thousands of times as remote as the sun. In order to reach more exact results it may be necessary to combine two methods so as to determine and eliminate the constant of space, or the amount by which the sum of the angles of a triangle of unit area differs from two right angles. For the present, no decisive result has been reached. The distances of stars having been ascertained, the weights of double stars may be deduced from their elongations and periods. These weights seem to be of the same order of magnitude as that of the sun, not enormously greater or smaller.—French stars, three asterisks arranged in this form , used as a mark of division between different articles in print.—Gloaming, golden, informed, lunar, Medicean star. See the adjectives.—Lone Star State, the State of Texas.—Meridian altitude of a star. See altitude.—Morning star, a planet, as Jupiter or Venus, when it rises after midnight. Compare evening star.—Multiple star, a group of two to six fixed stars within a circle of 15' radius; in a few cases, however, stars distant a minute or more from one another are considered to form a double star. Thus, ϵ and 5 Lyrae, distant from one another upward of 3', and separable by the naked eye, each of these consisting of two components distant about $\frac{3}{4}$ " from one another, with some other stars between them, are sometimes called collectively a multiple star. The multiple stars are distinguished as double (tr. of Gr. $\delta\iota\alpha\sigma\tau\epsilon\iota\varsigma$), triple, quadruple, quintuple, and sextuple. Many of the double stars are merely the one in range of the other, without having any physical connection, and these are called optical doubles. The components of other double stars revolve the one round the other, apparently under the influence of gravitation, forming systems known as binary stars. The orbits of about forty of these are known. Thus, the two stars of a Centauri, distant from one another by 17", revolve in about 80 years. In many cases the two components of a double star have complementary colors.—Nebulous star. See nebula.—North star, the north polar star. These stars are of five classes. Class I comprises the "new" or temporary stars, about a dozen in number, which have suddenly appeared very bright, in several cases far outshining Sirius, and after a few months have faded almost entirely away. All these stars have appeared upon the borders of the following semicircle of the Milky Way. They show bright lines in their spectra, indicating incandescence of hydrogen. Such was the star which appeared 133 B. C. in Scorpio, and led Hipparchus to the study of astronomy, thus inaugurating sound physical science; others appeared in 1572, 1604, and 1668. Class II embraces stars which go through a cycle of changes, more or less regular, in from four to eighteen months, most of them being at least a hundred times as bright at their maxima as at their minima. These stars are for the most part ruddy. Class III embraces irregularly variable stars, without any definite periods, and commonly undergoing very moderate changes. Class IV embraces stars which in a few days, or a month at most, go through changes of one or two magnitudes, sometimes with two maxima and two minima. Class V embraces stars which remain of constant brightness for some time, and then almost suddenly, at regular intervals, are nearly extinguished, afterward as quickly regaining their former brilliancy.

star¹ (stär), v.; pret. and pp. starred, ppr. starring. [stär¹, n.] I. trans. 1. (a) To set with stars, literally or figuratively.

Budding, blown, or odour-faded blooms,
Which star the winds with points of coloured light.
Shelley, Prometheus Unbound, III. 3.

Fresh green turf, starred with dandelions.
B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 231.

Hence—(b) To set with small bright bodies, as gems, spangles, or the like. (c) To set with figures of stars forming a sowing or sprinkle.—2. To transform into a star or stars; set in a constellation. [Rare.]

Or that star'd Ethiop queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The Sea-Nymphs, and their powers offended.
Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 19.

3. To affix a star or asterisk to (a written or printed word) for a distinctive purpose, especially, in a list, to distinguish the name of a deceased person. [Collog.]—4. To crack so as to produce a group of radiating lines.—To star a glass, to cut out a pane of glass. Tyfts, Glossary, 1798. [Thieves' jargon.]

II. intrans. 1. To shine as a star; be brilliant or prominent; shine above others; specifically (theat.), to appear as a star actor.

Doggett . . . had been playing for a week (1699) at the above [Lincoln's Inn Fields] theatre for the sum of £30. This is the first instance I know of the starring system.
Doran, Annals of the Stage, I. 186.

2. In the game of pool, to buy an additional life or lives. Encyc. Brit., III. 677. [Eng.]—To star it (theat.), to appear as a star, especially in a provincial tour.

star² (stär), n. [Also starr; Heb. (Chal.) shetar, shlar, a writing, deed, or contract, < shätar, cut in, grave, write.] An ancient name for all deeds, releases, or obligations of the Jews, and also for a schedule or inventory. See star-chamber. Also spelled starr.

star-animal (stär'an'i-mäl), n. A radiate, especially a starfish.

star-anise (stär'an'is), n. 1. The aromatic fruit of a Chinese shrub or small tree long supposed to be the Illicium anisatum of Linnaeus, but recently determined to be a distinct species, I. verum (named by J. D. Hooker). The fruit is a stellate capsule of commonly eight carpels, each of which contains a single brown shining seed. The seeds contain four per cent. of a volatile oil with the odor and flavor of aniseed, or rather of fennel. Star-anise is used in China as a condiment and spice, and in continental Europe to flavor liquors. Also Chinese anise. 2. The tree which yields star-anise.—Star-anise oil, the aromatic essential oil of star-anise seed. The commercial anise-oil is chiefly obtained from the star-anise.

Star-apple (Chrysophyllum Cainito).
a, the fruit, transverse section.

star-apple (stär'ap'l), n. The fruit of the West Indian Chrysophyllum Cainito, or the tree which produces it. The fruit is edible and pleasant, of the size of an apple, a berry in structure, having ten or eight cells, which, when cut across before maturity, give the figure of a star. Also called cainito.

starbeam (stär'bēm), n. A ray of light emitted by a star. Watts, Two Happy Rivals. [Rare.] star-bearer (stär'här'ēr), n. Same as Bethlehemite, 3 (a).

star-blasting (stär'bläs'ting), n. The pernicious influence of the stars. Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 60.

starblind (stär'blind), a. [*ME. *starblind, < AS. stærblind (= OFries. starblind, stareblind, starubind = MD. D. sterblind = MLG. starblind = OHG. starablint, MHG. starblint, G. starblind = Icel. starblindr (in starblinda, blindness) = Sw. stærblind = Dan. starblind, stærblind), < stær (= MD. ster = MLG. star = OHG. stura, MHG. stare, star, G. staar = Sw. starr = Dan. stær), catarract of the eyes, + blind, blind: see stær and blind.] Seeing obscurely, as from catarract; purblind; blinking.

starboard (stär'börd or -börd), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also starboord, steereboord; < ME. sterebourde, stereburde, < AS. stærbörd (= MD. stierboord, stuyrbord, D. stuurbord = MHG. stürbort, G. steuerbord, = Icel. stjörnborthi = Sw. Dan. styrbord), < stær, a rudder, paddle, + bord, side: see stær¹, n., and board, n. Hence (< Teut.) OF. estribord, stribord, F. tribord = Sp. estribord, estribor = Pg. estibordo = It. stribordo, starboard.] I. n. That side of a vessel which is on the right when one faces the bow: opposed to port (larboard). See *port*⁴.

He took his voyage directly North along the coast, having upon his steereboard always the desert land, and upon the leereboard the maine Ocean. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 4.

II. a. Naut., pertaining to the right-hand side, or being or lying on the right side, of a vessel. starboard (stär'börd or -börd), v. t. [< starboard, n.] To turn or put to the right or starboard side of a vessel: as, to starboard the helm (when it is desired to have the vessel's head go to port).

starboard (stär'börd or -börd), adv. [< starboard, a.] Toward the right-hand or starboard side. Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Trophies.

starbowliness (stär'bō'linz), n. pl. Naut., the men of the starboard watch.

starbright (stär'brit), a. Brilliant; bright as a star. Emerson, The Day's Ration.

star-bush (stär'būsh), n. A middle-sized South African evergreen, (Grewia occidentalis).

star-buzzard (stär'buz'ärd), n. An American buteonine hawk of the genus Asturina, having a system of coloration similar to that of the goshawks or star-hawks, but the form and proportions of the buzzards. The star-buzzards are a small group of handsome hawks peculiar to America. The gray star-buzzard, Asturina plagiata, is found in the United States.

Gray Star-buzzard (Asturina plagiata).

star-capsicum (stär'kap'si-kum), n. See Solanum.

star-catalogue (stär'kat'a-log), n. An extended list of fixed stars, as complete as possible within specified limits of magnitude, place, etc., with their places and magnitudes.

starch¹ (stärch), a. [*< ME. *starche, sterch, assimilated form of stark, sterk, strong, stiff: see stark*¹.] 1†. Strong; hard; tough.

Nis non so strong, ne sterch, ne kene,
That mai ago deatnes wither blench.

M.S. Cott. Caty., A. ix. f. 243. (Halliwell.)

2. Rigid; hence, precise.

When tall Susannah, maiden starch, stalk'd in.

Crabbe, Works, IV. 85.

starch² (stärch), n. [*< ME. starche (= MHG. sterke, G. stärke), starch; so called from its use in stiffening; < starch*¹, a., stiff: see starch¹, a.]

1. A proximate principle of plants, having the formula $C_6H_{10}O_5$, or a multiple of that formula. It is a white opaque glistening powder, odorless, tasteless, and insoluble in cold water, alcohol, or ether. Aqueous solutions containing free iodine impart to starch an intense and very characteristic blue color. It is not crystalline, but occurs naturally in fine granules, which are always made up of fine concentric layers. Whether the grains contain a small quantity of another chemical body, allied to but not identical with starch, called starch cellulose or farinose, is a disputed question. When heated with water to 60°-70° C., starch swells up and forms a paste or jelly. When heated in the dry state to 150°-200° C., it is converted into dextrine, a soluble gum-like body much used as a cheap substitute for gum arabic. Heated with dilute mineral acids, or digested with saliva, pancreatic juice, diastase, or certain other enzymes, starch dissolves, and is resolved into a number of products, which are chiefly dextrine, maltose, and dextrose—the last two being fermentable sugars. The malting of barley by brewers effects this change in the starch of the grain, and so prepares it for vinous fermentation. Starch is widely distributed, being formed in all vegetable cells containing chlorophyll-grains under the action of sunlight, and deposited in all parts of the plant which serve as a reserve store of plant-food. Hence grains and seeds contain an abundance of it, also numerous tubers and rhizomes, as the potato and the arrowroot, and the stem and pith of many plants, as the sago-plant. The chief commercial sources of supply are wheat, corn, and potatoes. From these it is manufactured on an extensive scale, being used in the arts, for laundry purposes, sizing, finishing calicoes, thickening colors and mordants in calico-printing, and for other purposes. Starch forms the greatest part of all farinaceous substances, particularly of wheat-flour.

Cells of Potato (Solanum tuberosum) filled with starch-granules; a, granules. (All greatly magnified.)

2. A preparation of commercial starch with boiling (or less frequently cold) water, used in the laundry or factory for stiffening linen or cotton fabrics before ironing. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the starch used for ruffs, cuffs, etc., was frequently colored, yellow being at one time extremely fashionable. Blue starch was affected by the Puritans.

A certain kind of liquid matter which they call starch, wherein the devil hath willed them to wash and dive their ruffs, which, when they be dry, will then stand stiffe and inflexible about their necks. Stubbes, Anat. of Abuses.

3. A stiff, formal manner; starchedness. [Colloq.]

This professor is to give the society their stiffening, and infuse into their manners that beautiful political starch which may qualify them for levees, conferences, visits.

Addison, Spectator, No. 305.

The free-born Westerner thinks the blamed Yankee puts on a yard too much style—the Boys don't approve of style—and suavely proposes to take the starch out of him. Great American Language, Cornhill Mag., Oct., 1888, p. 375.

Animal starch. Same as glycogen, 1.—Glycerite of starch, one part of starch and nine of glycerin, triturated into a smooth mixture.—Poland starch, blue starch.—Starch bandage, a bandage stiffened, after application, with starch.—Starch bath, a hot-water bath containing starch, used in eczema.

starch² (stärch), v. t. [*< starch*², n.] To stiffen with starch.

She made her wash, she made her starch.

Queen Eleanor's Fall (Child's Ballads, VII. 206).

star-chamber (stär'chäm'bër), n. [Early mod. E. starre-chamber (poetically chamber of starres (Skelton), late AF. chambre des estoilles), < late ME. sterre-chambre (Rolls of Parliament, 1450-1460, cited by Oliphant, in "New English," I. 293), also sterred chamber, i. e. 'starred chamber' (ML. camera stellata); so called because the roof was orig. ornamented with stars, or for some other reason not now definitely known (see the quot. from Minshew); *< star*¹ + chamber. The statement, made doubtfully by Blackstone and more confidently by other writers (as by J. R. Green, "Short Hist. of the Eng. People," p. 115), that the chamber was so called because it was made the depository of Jewish bonds called stars or starrs (< Heb. she'tar) rests on no ME. evidence, and is in-
