KEY TO PRONUNCIATION.

a as in fat, man, pang.
 ā as in fate, mane, dale.
 ā as in far, father, guard.
 ā as in fall, talk, naught.
 ā as in aak, fast, ant.
 ā as in fare, hair, bear.
 e as in met, pen, bless.
 ē as in mete, meet, meat.
 é as in her, fern, heard.
 i as in pin, it, biscuit.
 ī as in pine, flight, file.
 o as in not, on, frog.
 ō as in note, poke, floor.
 ō as in move, spoon, room.
 ô as in nor, song, off.
 u as in tub, son, blood.
 ū as in mute, acute, few (also new, tube, duty: see Preface, pp. ix, x).

û as in pull, book, could.
 ü German ü, French u.
 oi as in oil, joint, boy.
 ou as in pound, proud, now.

A single dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates its abbreviation and lightening, without absolute loss of its distinctive quality. See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

ā̇ as in prelate, courage, captain.
 ē̇ as in ablegate, episcopal.
 ō̇ as in abrogate, eulogy, democrat.
 ū̇ as in singular, education.

A double dot under a vowel in an unaccented syllable indicates that, even in the mouths of the best speakers, its sound is variable to, and in ordinary utterance actually becomes, the short u-sound (of but, pun, etc.). See Preface, p. xi. Thus:

ā̈ as in errant, republican.
 ē̈ as in prudent, difference.
 ī̈ as in charity, density.
 ō̈ as in valor, actor, idiot.
 ṻ as in Persia, peninsula.
 ṻ as in the book.
 ṻ as in nature, feature.

A mark (˘) under the consonants t, d, s, z indicates that they in like manner are variable to ch, j, sh, zh. Thus:

ť as in nature, adventure.
 đ as in arduous, education.
 š as in leisure.
 ž as in seizure.

th as in thin.
 ʒh as in then.
 ch as in German ach, Scotch loch.
 ʁ French nasalizing n, as in ton, en.
 ly (in French words) French liquid (mouillé) l.
 ' denotes a primary, " a secondary accent. (A secondary accent is not marked if at its regular interval of two syllables from the primary, or from another secondary.)

SIGNS.

< read from; i. e., derived from.
 > read whence; i. e., from which is derived.
 + read and; i. e., compounded with, or with suffix.
 = read cognate with; i. e., etymologically parallel with.
 √ read root.
 * read theoretical or alleged; i. e., theoretically assumed, or asserted but unverified, form.
 † read obsolete.

SPECIAL EXPLANATIONS.

A superior figure placed after a title-word indicates that the word so marked is distinct etymologically from other words, following or preceding it, spelled in the same manner and marked with different numbers. Thus:

back¹ (bak), n. The posterior part, etc.
 back¹ (bak), a. Lying or being behind, etc.
 back¹ (bak), v. To furnish with a back, etc.
 back¹ (bak), adv. Behind, etc.
 back^{2†} (bak), n. The earlier form of bat².
 back³ (bak), n. A large flat-bottomed boat, etc.

Various abbreviations have been used in the credits to the quotations, as "No." for number, "st." for stanza, "p." for page, "l." for line, ¶ for paragraph, "fol." for folio. The method used in indicating the subdivisions of books will be understood by reference to the following plan:

Section only..... § 5.
 Chapter only..... xiv.

| | |
|--------------------------------------|-----------------|
| Canto only..... | xiv. |
| Book only..... | iii. |
| Book and chapter..... | |
| Part and chapter..... | |
| Book and line..... | |
| Book and page..... | iii. 10. |
| Act and scene..... | |
| Chapter and verse..... | |
| No. and page..... | |
| Volume and page..... | II. 34. |
| Volume and chapter..... | IV. iv. |
| Part, book, and chapter..... | II. iv. 12. |
| Part, canto, and stanza..... | II. iv. 12. |
| Chapter and section or ¶..... | vii. § or ¶ 8. |
| Volume, part, and section or ¶..... | I. i. § or ¶ 6. |
| Book, chapter, and section or ¶..... | I. i. § or ¶ 6. |

Different grammatical phases of the same word are grouped under one head, and distinguished by the Roman numerals I., II., III., etc. This applies to transitive and intransitive uses of the same verb, to adjectives used also as nouns, to nouns used also as adjectives, to adverbs used also as prepositions or conjunctions, etc.

The capitalizing and italicizing of certain or all of the words in a synonym-list indicates that the words so distinguished are discriminated in the text immediately following, or under the title referred to.

The figures by which the synonym-lists are sometimes divided indicate the senses or definitions with which they are connected.

The title-words begin with a small (lower-case) letter, or with a capital, according to usage. When usage differs, in this matter, with the different senses of a word, the abbreviations [cap.] for "capital" and [l.c.] for "lower-case" are used to indicate this variation.

The difference observed in regard to the capitalizing of the second element in zoological and botanical terms is in accordance with the existing usage in the two sciences. Thus, in zoology, in a scientific name consisting of two words the second of which is derived from a proper name, only the first would be capitalized. But a name of similar derivation in botany would have the second element also capitalized.

The names of zoological and botanical classes, orders, families, genera, etc., have been uniformly italicized, in accordance with the present usage of scientific writers.

1. The seventeenth letter and thirteenth consonant in the English alphabet. It had a corresponding position in the early Greek and in the Latin alphabet, as also in the Phœnician, where it was the nineteenth character. Its value in Phœnician was that of a deeper or more guttural k; and a like distinction of two k's, less and more guttural (ka and go), is still made in the Semitic languages generally. But in Greek and Latin there was no such distinction to be maintained; hence the sign was abandoned in Greek (being retained only as an epistemon, or sign of number, in its old place between π and ρ, and called koppa); while in Latin, on the other hand, it was kept, though without a value different from that of k, in the combination qu, equivalent to our kw; and so we have it also in English as a superfluous letter, simply because it existed in Phœnician with a real office. The comparative table of early forms (as given for the other letters: see especially A) is as follows:

Q occurs in English, as in Latin, only before a u that is followed by another vowel. The combination quis pronounced either as kw (for example, quinquennial), or the u being silent, as k simply (for example, quiver). The words containing it are nearly all of Latin or French origin; but there are a few common words (as queen, quench, quack, quoth) in which qu has been substituted for the equivalent Anglo-Saxon cw or Teutonic kw, and a number of other words (Asiatic, African, American, etc.) in which qu represents a like combination. In the transliteration of some Oriental alphabets (Arabic, Persian, Turkish, etc.), q represents the more guttural form of k. See qu.

2. As a medieval Roman numeral, 500.—3. An abbreviation: (a) [l. c.] of quadrans (a farthing); (b) [l. c.] of query; (c) [l. c.] of question; (d) of queen; (e) [l. c.] in a ship's log-book, of squalls; (f) in Rom. lit. and inscriptions, of Quintus.—4t. A half-farthing: same as *cue*², 2 (a).

Rather pray there be no fall of money, for thou wilt then go for a q.
Lily, Mother Bombe, iv. 2. (Nares.)

To mind one's q's and q's. See mind.

qabbalah, n. See cabala.

Q. B. An abbreviation of Queen's Bench.

Q. C. An abbreviation: (a) of Queen's Council or Queen's Counsel; (b) of Queen's College.

Q. d., or q. d. An abbreviation of the Latin phrase quasi dicat, as if he should say.

qd. An old contraction for quod or quoth. Hallivell.

Q. e., or q. e. An abbreviation of the Latin phrase quod est, which is.

Q. E. D. An abbreviation of the Latin phrase quod erat demonstrandum, which was to be demonstrated.

Q. E. F. An abbreviation of the Latin phrase quod erat faciendum, which was to be done.

Q. E. I. An abbreviation of the Latin phrase quod erat inveniendum, which was to be found out.

Q. M. An abbreviation of quartermaster.

qm., or qm. An abbreviation of the Latin word quomodo, by what means.

Q. M. G. An abbreviation of quartermaster-general.

qr., or qr. An abbreviation: (a) of quarter (28 pounds); (b) of quadrans (farthing); (c) of quire.

Q. S. An abbreviation of quarter-sessions.

Q. s., or q. s. An abbreviation: (a) of quarter-section; (b) of the Latin phrase quantum sufficit.

Qt., or qt. An abbreviation: (a) of quart; (b) of quantity.

qut, n. An obsolete spelling of queue or *cue*¹.

In 1724 the peruke-makers advertised "full-bottom tyes, . . . qu perukes, and baggy wigs" among the variety of artificial head-gear which they supplied.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 580.

qu. [(1) < ME. qu-, qu-, < OF. qu-, F. qu- = Sp. cu- = Pg. cu-, qu- = It. qu-, < L. qu- = Gr. κ (κ), sometimes π = Skt. kr-, k-, etc. (2) < ME. qu-, kw-, ku-, cu-, cw-, < AS. cw- = OS. kw- = OFries. kw- = D. kw- = OHG. kw-, cw-, MHG. kw-, qu-, G. qu- = Icel. kv- = Sw. kr-, qu- = Dan. kr- = Goth. kw- (by Germans often written kr-, also rendered by q or qu-; the Goth. character being single, namely, u—the resemblance to the Roman u being accidental). (3) < ME. qu-, qu-, qu-, wh-, hw-, < AS. hw- = OS. OFries. hw- = D. w- = G. w- = Icel. Sw. Dan. hv-, etc.: see wh-. (4) Of various origin, ult. due to c- or k- or ch-.] 1. An initial and medial sequence in words of Latin origin, as in *quarrel*¹, *quarrel*², quadrant, query, etc.—2. An initial sequence in some words of Anglo-Saxon (or other Teutonic) origin, properly written kw-, or as originally cw-, but altered in the Middle English period to qu- in conformity with the spelling of French and Latin words with qu- (see 1). It occurs in *quail*¹, quake, quailm, queen, quell, quick, etc. It does not occur medially except in composition.—3. An initial sequence in some Middle English or modern dialectal (Scotch) variants of words regularly spelled with wh-, as in quail, quayle, quhal, for whale; quhik for whilk (which), quhyp for whip, etc.—4. An initial sequence of various origin other than the above, as in quaint, quassia, quay, quince, quip, *quiver*¹, *quiver*², quoin, quoit, etc. See the etymology of these words.

qu. An abbreviation: (a) of queen, quarterly; (b) of question, or quære, query.

qua¹, pron. An old Scotch form of who.

Qua herd ever a warr aunter,
That he that nocht hadd bot of him
Agayn him suld becom sua grim?
MS. Coll. Vespas. (A), iii. f. 4. (Hallivell.)

qua² (kwä), adv. [L. quä (often written quä), as far as, so far as, as, at or in which place, in what manner, how, orig. abl. fem. of qui, who, which: see who.] As being; so far as.

I know what that man's mind, quä mind, is, well enough.
M. Arnold, Friendship's Garland, vi.

The first thing to notice about this position is, that the Darwinian, quä Darwinian, has nothing to do with it.
Nature, XXXVII. 291.

qua³ (kwä), n. [Appar. a var. of quadrant, *quod*².] A jail; quod. Tufts's Glossary of Thieves' Jargon, 1798. [Thieves' jargon.]

quab¹, quob (kwob), v. i. [Var. of the earlier quap, quop: see *quap*¹, *quop*¹, and cf. quare.] To shake; tremble; quiver; throb; flutter.

After when the storme ys al ago,
Yet wol the watir quappe a day or two.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 1767.

But, zealous sir, what say to a touch at praiser?
How quaps the spirit? In what garb or ayre?
Fletcher, Poems, p. 203. (Hallivell.)

O, my eyes grow dim! my heart quabs, and my back acheth.
Dryden, Limberham, iii. 2.

quab¹ quob (kwob), n. [*quab*¹, v. Cf. quavemire.] A bog or quagmire. Hallivell.

quab² (kwob), n. [Early mod. E. quabbe; < MD. quabbe, quappe, D. kwab, kwabbe = OLG. quappa, MLG. quappe, LG. quabbe, quappe, an eel-pout, = G. quabbe, quappe, an eel-pout, tadpole, = Sw. quabba = Dan. krabbe, a burbot; so called from its active motions; from the verb represented by *quab*¹, *quap*¹. Cf. *quap*².] 1. A fish, the eel-pout or miller's-thumb. Minshew.—2. A gudgeon. Also quabling and quap.

A quabling or little quabbe, a fish, . . . goulion.
Minshew.

quab³ (kwob), n. [*quab*¹, v., as *squab*² < *squab*¹, v.] 1. A squab, or other unfledged young bird. See *squab*².—2. Something immature or crude.

A trifle of mine own brain, . . . a scholar's fancy,
A quab—'tis nothing else—a very quab.
Ford, Lover's Melancholy, iii. 3.

qua-bird (kwä'bërd), n. [qua (imitative, like equiv. quark, quark) + *bird*¹.] The American night-heron, Nycticorax grisea nœvia.

quacha (kwä'chij), n. Same as quagga. Imp. Dict.

quachi, n. Same as coati.

quachil, n. [Native name.] A large pocket-gopher, Geomys hispidus (formerly Saccophorus quachil). It inhabits Central America and some parts of Mexico, and is larger than any of the United States species, being nearly or quite a foot long, with the tail three inches more; the tail and feet are nearly naked; the pelage is harsh and lusterless, of a uniform dull chocolate-brown, merely paler or grayer below; the upper incisors have each one deep furrow lying wholly in the inner half of the tooth. Its nearest relative is the Mexican tucan, G. mericanus.

quack¹ (kwak), v. i. [*ME. quakken (f), queken = MD. quacken, quacken, croak, quack, cry as a frog, goose, or quail, later krakken, krakken, D. kwaken, croak, as a frog, = MLG. quaken = G. quacken, quaken, quack, croak, babble, quäcken, quäken, cry, scream, = Icel. kraka = Sw. gräka = Dan. krakke, croak, quack; cf. L. conzare, croak, Gr. koāē, a quacking (see coarzone); all imitative words. Hence freq. *quackle*¹, and ult. *quail*³.] 1. To utter a harsh, flat, croaking sound or cry, as a goose or duck; croak; now, usually, to cry as a duck.

He toke a gese fast by the nek,
And the goose thoo begam to quæk.
Rel. Antiq., i. 4. (Hallivell.)

There were thirteen ducks, and . . . they all quacked very movingly.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, x.

2. To make an outcry: said of persons. [Prov. Eng.]

He slew the captain where he stood,
The rest they did quack an' roar.
Willie Wallace (Child's Ballads, VI. 235).

quack¹ (kwak), n. [ME. quakke, quæke = G. quack, quak = Dan. krak; from the verb.] 1. A harsh, croaking sound.

He speketh thurgh the nose,
As he were on the quakke or on the pose.
Chaucer, Reeve's Tale, l. 282.

2. The cry of a duck; a quacking.

He gave me a look from his one little eye, . . . and then a loud quack to second it.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, x.

quack² (kwak), v. [A particular use of *quack*¹, now associated with *quack*², n., which is in part an abbr. of quacksalver.] I. intrans. 1. To talk noisily and ostentatiously; make vain and loud pretensions.

Seek out for plants with signatures,
To quack of universal cures.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. i. 323.

2. To play the quack; practise arts of quackery, as a pretender to medical skill.

Hitherto I had only quack'd with myself, and the highest I consulted was our apothecary.
B. Mandeville, Hypochondrical Disorders (1730), p. 7. (Latham.)

II. trans. 1. To treat in the manner of a quack; play the quack with.

If he [Monro] has any skill in quacking madmen, his art may perhaps be of service now in the Pretender's court.
Walpole, Letters, II. 6.

Quackery, and the love of being quacked, are in human nature as weeds are in our fields.
Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., Int., p. 32.

2. To tamper with dishonestly; use fraudulently.

Mallet. My third Son . . . has an admirable knack at quacking Titles. . . . They tell me, when he gets an old good-for-nothing Book, he claps a new Title to it, and sells off the whole Impression in a Week.
Mrs. Centlivre, Gotham Election, l. 1.

quack² (kwak), n. and a. [Partly < *quack*², v., partly an abbr. of quacksalver, q. v.] I. n. 1. An impudent and fraudulent pretender to medical skill; a mountebank; a knavish practitioner of medicine.

Quacks in their Bills, and Poets in the Titles of their Plays, do not more disappoint us than Gallants with their Promises.
Wycherley, Love in a Wood, iii.

A potent quack, long versed in human ills,
Who first insults the victim whom he kills.
Crabbe, Works, l. 14.

These, like quacks in medicine, excite the malady to profit by the cure, and retard the cure to augment the fees. Irring, Knickerbocker, p. 229.

Hence — 2. One who pretends to skill or knowledge of any kind which he does not possess; an ignorant and impudent pretender; a charlatan.

Men that go mincing, grimacing, with plausible speech and brushed raiment; hollow within! quacks political; quacks scientific, academical.

Carlyle, French Rev., II. III. 2.

= Syn. Quack, Empiric, Mountebank, Charlatan. A quack is, by derivation, one who talks much without wisdom, and, specifically, talks of his own power to heal; hence, any ignorant pretender to medical knowledge or skill. Empiric is a more elevated term for one who goes by mere experience in the trial of remedies, and is without knowledge of the medical sciences or of the clinical observations and opinions of others; hence, an incompetent, self-confident practitioner. A mountebank is generally a quack, but may be a pretender in any line. Charlatan (literally 'chatterer') is primarily applied, not to a person belonging to any particular profession or occupation, but to a pretentious cheat of any sort.

II. a. Pertaining to or characterized by quackery of any kind; specifically, falsely pretending to cure disease, or ignorantly or fraudulently set forth as remedies: as, a quack doctor; quack medicines.

If all understood medicine, there would be none to take his quack medicine. Whately.

The attractive head
Of some quack-doctor, famous in his day.

Wordsworth, Prelude, vii.

In the eighteenth century men worshipped the things that seemed; it was a quack century.

Caroline Foz, Journal, p. 111.

They're set to the doing of quack work, and paid wages for dishonesty. New Princeton Rev., II. 7.

quackened (kwak'nd), a. [Var. of querkened, quackened, quackled. See querken.] Almost choked. [Prov. Eng.] quackery (kwak'eri), n.; pl. quackeries (-iz). [< quack + -ery.] The boastful pretensions or knavish practice of a quack, particularly in medicine; empiricism; charlatanism; humbug.

Such quackery is unworthy any person who pretends to learning. Forson, Letters to Travis, p. 41, note.

An epoch when puffery and quackery have reached a height unexampled in the annals of mankind.

Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, I. 2.

quack-grass (kwak'gräs), n. Same as quack-grass, quitch-grass.

quackhood (kwak'hüd), n. [< quack + -hood.] Quackery. Carlyle, Past and Present, iii. 13. [Rare.]

quacking-cheat (kwak'ing-chêt), n. [< quacking, ppr. of quack, v., + cheat.] A quack. Dekker (1616). (Halliwel). [Old slang.]

quackish (kwak'ish), a. [< quack + -ish.] Like a quack or charlatan; dealing in quackery; humbugging.

The last quackish address of the National Assembly to the people of France.

Burke, To a Member of the Nat. Assembly, note.

quackism (kwak'izm), n. [< quack + -ism.] The practice of quackery. Carlyle, Cagliostro.

quackle (kwak'l), v. i.; pret. and pp. quackled, ppr. quackling. [Freq. of quack.] To quack; croak. [Prov. Eng.]

Simple ducks in those royal waters quackle for crumbs from young royal fingers.

Carlyle, French Rev., XI. I. 1. (Davies.)

quackle (kwak'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. quackled, ppr. quackling. [Freq. of quack*, imitative, like choke, of the sound of choking. Cf. quackened.] To suffocate; strangle; choke. [Prov. Eng.]

As he was drinking, the drink, or something in the cup, quacked him, stuck so in his throat that he could not get it up nor down, but strangled him presently.

Rev. S. Ward, Sermons, p. 153.

quacksalve (kwak'säiv), n. [*< quacksalve (D. kwakzalven), a verb assumed from quacksalver.] A quacksalver.

A quacksalve,

A fellow that does deal with drugs.

Manning, Parliament of Love, iv. 5.

quacksalver (kwak'sal-vér), n. [< D. kwakzalver (= LG. quacksalver, > G. quacksalber = Sw. quacksalvare = Dan. kvacksalver), a quacksalver, < kwaken, quack, + salver, salver: see salver.] One who boasts of his skill in medicines and salves, or of the efficacy of his nostrums; a charlatan; a quack.

And of a Physician, That he is a Quack-salver, which signifieth a Quick Healer, yet for the common acception adjudged actionable. Jos. Keble (1685), Reports, I. 62.

They are quacksalvers,

Fellows that live by venting oils and drugs.

B. Jonson, Volpone, II. 1.

These are not physicians indeed, but Italian quack-salvers, that, having drunk poison themselves, minister it to the people. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 390.

quacksalving (kwak'sal-ving), a. [Ppr. of quacksalve*, v., implied in quacksalve, n., and quacksalver.] Quackish; humbugging.

Tut, man, any quacksalving terms will serve for this purpose. Middleton, Mad World, II. 6.

Quacksalving, cheating mountebank!

Manning, Virgin-Martyr, iv. 1.

quad¹, a. and n. See qued.

quad² (kwod'), n. [Abbr. of quadrangle.] 1. A quadrangle or court, as of a college. [Colloq.]

The quad, as it was familiarly called, was a small quadrangle. Troloope, Warden, v.

2. The quadrangle of a prison where prisoners take exercise; hence, a prison; a jail. More commonly spelled quod. [Slang.]

Fancy a nob like you being sent to quod? Fiddlededee! You see, sir, you weren't used to it.

Dierckx, Henrietta Temple, vi. 21.

My dear Arminius, . . . do you really mean to maintain that a man can't put old Diggs in quod for snaring a hare without all this elaborate apparatus of Roman law?

M. Arnold, Friendship's Garland, vii.

quad² (kwod'), v. t. [*< quad*², n.] To put in prison.

He was quodded for two months.

Hewitt, College Life, xxix. (Hoppe.)

quad³ (kwod'), v. t.; pret. and pp. quadded, ppr. quadding. [*< quad*³, n.] In printing, to fill with quadrats: as, to quad out a line.

quad⁴ (kwod'), n. An abbreviation of quadruplex in telegraphy.

quaddy (kwod'i), a. [Prob. for quatty*, < quat + -y.] Short and thick. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] quader, v. t. [< ME. quaden, < quad, bad: see qued.] To spoil or destroy. Halliwel.

Thine errors will thy works confounde,

And all thine honour quade.

Halle's Historical Exposition (1565). (Nares.)

quader¹ (kwä'dér), v. i. [< OF. quadrer, F. cadrer = Sp. cuadrar = Pg. quadrar = It. quadrare, < L. quadrare, make square or four-cornered: see quadrare.] To quadrare; match.

The x doth not quader well with him, because it sounds harshly. Hist. Don Quixote (1675), p. 88.

quader² (kwä'dér), n. [G., square, < MHG. quäder, < L. quadrus (sc. lapis), square: see quadrat.] The German name of a division of the Cretaceous: an abbreviation of quadersandstein, paving-sandstone. It is divided into Unter-, Mittel-, and Oberquader. The last is the equivalent of the Upper Chalk of England and France, and is familiar as being the rock which, by its peculiar erosion, has given rise to the picturesque scenery of Saxon Switzerland.

quader³ (kwä'dér), n. [< L. quadratus, pp. of quadrare, make square: see quadrare.] In anat., the quadrate lobule, or præcuneus.

quadrance, n. See quadrance.

quadrant¹ (kwod'rät'), n.; pl. quadræ (-rê). [< L. quadra, a square, a plinth, a fillet; fem. of (LL.) quadrus, square: see quadrare and square.] In arch., etc.: (a) A square frame or border in-Quadrangle.—"Annunciation," by Luca della Robbia, in the Borgo San Jacopo, Florence.

quadrant² n. See cuadra.

quadrable (kwod'rä-bl), a. [< L. as if quadrabilis*, < quadrare, square: see quadrare, v.] In geom., capable of being squared; having an area exactly equal to that of an assignable square; also, capable of being integrated in finite terms; capable of having its definite integral expressed in exact numerical terms.

quadrat (kwod'rad), n. [< L. quattuor (quadr-), = E. four, + -ad.] Same as tetrad.

quadragesimarius (kwod'rä-jè-nä'ri-us), a. [= F. quadragesimaire = Sp. cuadragesimario = Pg. It. quadragesimario, < L. quadragesimarius, pertaining to the number forty, consisting of forty, < quadragesimarius, forty each: see quadragesimarius.] Consisting of forty; forty years old. Imp. Dict.

quadragesima (kwod'rä-jèn), n. [< L. quadragesima, forty each, distributive of quadragesima, forty, = E. forty.] A papal indulgence for forty days; a remission of the temporal punishment due to sin corresponding to the forty days of the ancient canonical penance. Imp. Dict.

You have with much labour and some charge purchased to yourself so many quadragesimas, or lents of pardon: that is, you have bought off the penances of so many times forty days! Jer. Taylor, Discursive from Popery, I. ii. § 4.

Quadragesima (kwod'rä-jès'i-mä), n. [= F. Quadragesime = Sp. cuadragesima = Pg. It. quadragesima, < ML. quadragesima, Lent, < L. quadragesima, fem. of quadragesimus, quadragesimus, fortieth, < quadragesima, forty, = E. forty.] Lent: so called because it continues forty days. See Lent. — Quadragesima Sunday, the first Sunday in Lent.

quadragesimal (kwod'rä-jès'i-mäl), a. and n. [= F. quadragesimal = Sp. cuadragesimal = Pg. quadragesimal = It. quadragesimale, < ML. quadragesimalis, pertaining to Lent, < L. quadragesima, Lent: see Quadragesima.] I. a. Pertaining to the forty days of Lent; belonging to Lent; used in Lent; Lenten.

Quadragesimal wits, and fancies lean
As ember weeks. W. Cartwright, Ordinary, III. 5.

This quadragesimal solemnity, in which, for the space of some weeks, the church has, in some select days, enjoined a total abstinence from flesh. South, Sermons, IX. 134.

II. n. An offering formerly made to a mother church by a daughter church on Mid-Lent Sunday.

quadragesimist, n. [< L. quadragesimus, fortieth: see Quadragesima.] A name for a section of the fourth volume of the English Law Reports of the time of Edward III., covering the last twelve years of his reign.

quadrangle (kwod'rang-gl), n. [< F. quadrangle = Sp. cuadrangulo = Pg. quadrangulo = It. quadrangolo, < LL. quadrangulum, a four-cornered figure, a quadrangle, neut. of L. quadrangulus, quadrangulus, four-cornered, < quattuor (combining form quadr-, quadr-, quadr-, the adj. quadrus, square, being later), + angulus, an angle, a corner: see angle.] 1. A plane figure having four angles; a four-square figure; a quadrilateral; in mod. geom., a plane figure formed by six lines intersecting at four points. — 2. A square or oblong court nearly or quite surrounded by buildings: an arrangement common with public buildings, as palaces, city halls, colleges, etc.

My choler being over-blown

With walking once about the quadrangle.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., I. 3. 156.

At the Palais Royale Henry IV. built a faible quadrangle of stately palaces, arched underneath.

Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 4, 1644.

Julian hardly stopped to admire the smooth green quadrangle and lofty turrets of King Henry's College.

Farrar, Julian Home, v.

3. In palmistry, the space between the line of the heart and that of the head. — Axis of a quadrangle, one of the three lines passing each through two centers of the quadrangle. — Center of a quadrangle, one of the three points in which opposite sides of a quadrangle meet. — In quadrangle, in her., arranged, as charges or groups of charges, so that four will occupy the four quarters of the escutcheon, with no lines of division between the quarters: as, or, four lions in quadrangle gules.

quadrangular (kwod'rang-gü-lär), a. [= F. quadrangulaire = Sp. cuadrangular = Pg. quadrangular = It. quadrangolare, < L. quadrangulus, four-cornered: see quadrangle.] Four-cornered; four-angled; having four angles.

That the college consist of three fair quadrangular courts and three large grounds, enclosed with good walls behind them. Cowley, The College.

As I returned, I diverted to see one of the Prince's Palaces. . . . a very magnificent cloyster'd and quadrangular building. Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 1, 1641.

Quadrangular lobe, the quadrate lobe of the cerebellum.

quadrangularly (kwod'rang-gü-lär-li), adv. In the form of a quadrangle.

quadrans (kwod'ranz), n.; pl. quadrantes (kwod-ran'tèz). [L., a fourth part, a quarter, a coin, weight, and measure so called: see quadrant.] In Rom. antiq., a copper (or, strictly, bronze) coin, the fourth part of the as. It bore on the obverse the head of Hercules, and on the reverse (like the other coins of the libral series) a prow. It also bore three pellets, to indicate that it was (nominally) of the weight of three unciae (ounces).—Quadrans Muralis, the Mural Quadrant, an obsolete constellation, introduced by Lalande (1795).

quadrant (kwod'rant), n. and a. [ME. quadrant, < AF. quadrant, a farthing, OF. quadrant, a Roman coin (quadrans), also quadrant, cadran, a sun-dial, F. cadran, a sun-dial, dial, = Sp. cuadrante = Pg. It. quadrante = D. kwadrant = G. quadrant = Sw. quadrant = Dan. kvadrant, a quadrant, < L. quadrans (-t)-s, a fourth part, a quarter, applied to a coin (see quadrans), a weight (a fourth of a pound), a measure (a fourth of a foot, of an acre, of a sextarius), < quattuor (quadr-) = E. four: see four.] I. n. 1. The fourth part; the quarter.

The sunne, who in his annual circle takes A day's full quadrant from the ensuing yeere, Bepayes it in foure yeeres, and equal makes
The number of the dayes within his sphere.

Sir J. Beaumont, End of his Majesty's First Year.

In sixty-three years there may be lost almost eighteen days, omitting the intercalation of one day every fourth year allowed for this quadrant, or six hours supernumerary.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

2. The quarter of a circle; the arc of a circle containing 90°; also, the figure included between this arc and two radii drawn from the center to each extremity; the division of angular magnitude from zero to a right angle, or 90°.—3. An astronomical instrument for measuring altitudes, of ancient origin, and consisting of a graduated arc of 90°, with a movable radius carrying sights, or the quadrant, carrying sights, might turn about a fixed radius. Picard in 1669 substituted a telescope for the sights, and Flamsteed (1689) introduced spider-lines in the focal plane of the object-glass. The quadrant was superseded by the mural circle, and this by the meridian circle.

Howe it commeth to passe that, at the beginnyng of the evening twilight, it (the pole-star) is cleave in that Region only fyve degrees in the month of June, and in the morning twilight to bee cleave xij. degrees by the same quadrante, I doo not understande.

R. Eden, tr. of Peter Martyr (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 90].

Those curious Quadrants, Chimes, and Dials, those kind of Waggon which are used up and down Christendom, were first used by them. Howell, Letters, I. ii. 15.

The astrolabe and quadrant are almost the only astronomical instruments used in Egypt.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 277.

4. An instrument of navigation, for measuring the altitude of the sun, distinctively called the reflecting quadrant. It was invented by Thomas Godfrey of Philadelphia in 1730, whence called Godfrey's bow, and perhaps independently by Hadley, an instrument-maker of London, about the same time. Among Hadley's papers after his death was found a description of a similar instrument by Newton, of earlier date. The quadrant is now nearly superseded by the sextant.

5. An instrument used in giving a cannon or mortar the angle of elevation necessary to the desired range. In the older forms it has a graduated arc, and a plumb-line which indicates the angle of elevation upon the arc. In a more finished and accurate form a spirit-level is substituted for the plumb, and one of the branches of the instrument is pivoted and slides over the face of the arc so as to show the elevation. Also called gunners' quadrant and gunners' square.

6. In elect., a name suggested for the practical unit of self-induction. Its value is 10⁹ centimeters.—Adams's quadrant, Coles's quadrant, varieties of the back-staff, or Davis's quadrant.—Collins's quadrant, an instrument for finding the time of day at a fixed latitude, from the date and the altitude or azimuth of the sun, by means of a stereographic projection of a quarter of the celestial zone between the tropics.—Davis's quadrant, the back-staff, originally described by John Davis, the discoverer of Davis's Straits, in 1594, and still called by his name, though modified by Hooke, Bouguer, and others. The observer stood with his back to the sun, and, looking through sights, brought the shadow of a pin into coincidence with the horizon.—Godfrey's quadrant, Hadley's quadrant. See def. 4.—Gunter's quadrant, a quadrant made of wood, brass, or other material—a kind of stereographic projection on the plane of the equator, the eye being supposed to be in one of the poles. It is used to find the hour of the day, the sun's azimuth, etc., as also to take the altitude of an object in degrees.—Horodictical quadrant, a sort of movable sun-dial. Upon the plane of the dial are described, first, seven concentric quadrantal arcs marked with the signs of the zodiac, or days of the year, and, secondly, a number of curves the intersections of each of which with the circles are at the same angular distances from one radius that the sun is above the horizon at a given hour of the day in each of the declinations represented by the circles. The radius 90° from that first mentioned carries sights, and from the center hangs a plumb-line whose intersection with the proper circle marks the time of day.—Mural quadrant. See mural.—Quadrant electrometer. See electrometer.—Quadrant electroscope. See electroscope.—Quadrant of altitude, an appendage of the artificial globe, consisting of a slip of brass of the length of a quadrant of one of the great circles of the globe, and graduated. It is fitted to the meridian, and can be moved round to all points of the horizon. It serves as a scale in measuring altitudes and other great circles.—Sinical quadrant, a diagram, with or without a movable arm, for solving plane triangles. An octant is sufficient.—Spirit-level quadrant, an instrument for determining altitudes by the use of a spirit-level.—Sutton's quadrant. Same as Collins's quadrant.

II. t. a. Four-sided; square. [Rare.]

The bishop with Gilbert Bourne his chaplaine, Robert Warrington his commissarie, and Robert Johnson his register, were tarying in a quadrant void place before the doore of the same chamber.

Foote, Martyrs, p. 1206, an. 1550.

Cross nowy quadrant. See cross.

quadrantal (kwod'ran-tal), a. [= Sp. cuadrantal = Pg. cuadrantal, < L. quadrantal, containing the fourth part of, < quadrans (-t)-s, a fourth part, a quarter: see quadrant.] 1. Pertaining to a quadrant; included in the fourth part of a circle: as, a quadrantal space.

Problems in Dialling, both Universal and Particular, and performed by the Lines inscribed on the Quadrantal Part of the Instrument.

Quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 244.

2. Pertaining to the quadrans; of the value of a quadrans.—Quadrantal dial. See dial.—Quadrantal triangle, in trigon., a spherical triangle which has one side equal to a quadrant, or 90°.

quadrantal (kwod'ran-tal), n. [L. quadrantal, a liquid measure containing eight congi, also a cube, die, < quadrantal, containing a fourth: see quadrantal, a.] 1. A liquid measure used by the Romans, equivalent to the amphora.—2. A cube. [Rare.]

quadrant-compass (kwod'rant-kum'pas), n. A carpenters' compass with a curved arm or are, and a binding-screw to hold the limbs in any position.

quadrantes, n. Plural of quadrans.

quadrantid (kwod'ran-tid), n. [NL. Quadrantid (-t)-s, sc. Muralis (see quadrans), + -id.] One of a shower of shooting-stars appearing January 2d and 3d, and radiating from the old constellation Quadrans Muralis.

quadrat (kwod'rat), a. and n. [Another form of quadrante; as a noun, in def. 1, < F. quadrat, cadrat, a quadrat, lit. a square: see quadrante.] I. t. a. See quadrante.

II. n. 1. In printing, a blank type for the larger blank spaces in or at the end of printed lines, cast lower in height, so that it shall not be inked or impressed: made in four forms for all text type—en, two-em, three-em. Usually abbreviated to quad.

en quad. em quad. 2-em quad. 3-em quad.

The low quadrat, for letterpress work, is about three fourths of an inch high; the high quadrat, for stereotype work, is about ten twelfths of an inch high.

In the lower case, having fifty-four boxes, are disposed the small letters, together with the points, spaces, quadrats, etc.

Ure, Dict., III. 643.

2. An instrument furnished with sights, a plummet, and an index, and used for measuring altitudes, but superseded by more perfect instruments in modern use. Also called geometrical square, and line of shadows.—3. A series or set of four.

quadrata, n. Plural of quadratum.

quadrante (kwod'rāt), a. and n. [Formerly also quadrat; < OF. quadrat (F. quadrat, cadrat, as a noun: see quadrat); OF. vernacularly quarre (> E. quarry), F. carré = Sp. cuadrato = Pg. quadrado = It. quadrato = D. kwadraat = G. Sw. quadrat = Dan. kvadrat, a square; < L. quadratus, square (neut. quadratum, a square, quadrante), pp. of quadrare, make four-cornered, square, put in order, intr. be square, < quadra, a square, later quadrus, square, < quattuor = E. four: see four. Cf. quarry, a doublet of quadrante; cf. also square.] I. a. 1. Having four equal and parallel sides; square; arranged in a square; four-sided.

And they followed in a quadrat array to the entent to destroy kyng Henry.

Hall's Union (1548), Hen. IV., f. 13. (Hallivell.)

And searching his books, [he] found a book of astronomy . . . with figures, some round, some triangle, some quadrata.

Foote, Martyrs, an. 1568.

2. Square by being the product of a number multiplied into itself.

Quadrata and cubical numbers.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

3. Square, as typifying justice according to the Pythagoreans; well-balanced.

The Moralist tells us that a quadrat solid wise Man should involve and tackle himself within his own Virtue.

Howell, Letters, I. vi. 68.

4. Fitted; suited; applicable.

The word consumption, being applicable . . . to a true and bastard consumption, requires a generic description quadrata to both.

Harvey, Consumptions.

5. In her., of square form, or having square corners: thus, a cross quadrante in the center has four rectangular projections in its reentrant angles. Also quarter-angled.—Quadrante bone, in zool., the special bone by the intervention of which the lower jaw of birds, reptiles, etc., articulates with the skull, thus distinguishing them from mammals, in which the lower jaw articulates directly with the squamosal. See II. 3.—Quadrante cartilages, small quadrangular cartilages often found in the nasal alve.—Quadrante gyrus or lobule. See gyrus, and cut under cerebral.—Quadrante line, lobe, pronator, etc. See the nouns.—Quadrante muscle, in anat.: (a) The quadratus femoris, or square muscle of the femur, of man, one of the six muscles collectively known in human anatomy as the rotatores femoris, arising from the ischium and passing to the intertrochanteric part of the femur, which bone it rotates outward. (b) The quadratus lumborum, or square muscle of the loins, lying on each side of the lumbar region, between the lower ribs and the pelvis. (c) The square muscle of the chin, which draws down the lower lip: commonly called depressor labii inferioris. (d) The quadratus nictitantis, one of the two muscles (the other being the pyramidal) on the back of the eyeball of birds, etc., subserving the movements of the nictitating membrane, or third eyelid. See third cut under eye.¹

a, shaft or body of the bone; ap, pterygoid apophysis for muscular attachment; pa, articular facet for pterygoid bone; ia, ea, internal and external condyles for articulation with the lower jaw, separated by ig, trochlear groove; qjc, quadratojugal cup for articulation of quadratojugal bone; hi, ae, internal and external capitulum for articulation with squamosal bone, separated by eg, capitular groove.

II. n. 1. A plane figure with four equal sides and four equal angles; a square. The one imperfect, mortal, feminine, Th' other immortal, perfect, masculine; And twixt them both a quadrante was the base, Proportioned equally by seven and nine.

Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 22.

The powers militant
 . . . in mighty quadrante join'd.

Milton, P. L., vi. 62.

2. In astrol., an aspect of two heavenly bodies in which they are distant from each other ninety degrees, or the quarter of a circle; quartile.—3. In zool. and anat.: (a) The os quadratum, or quadrante bone (see I.); the os pedicellatum, or pedicellate bone; the suspensorium, or suspensor bone of the mandible, or that one which is in connection with the lower jaw, in vertebrates below mammals. Also called by Owen and others the tymppanic bone, and considered to represent that bone of a mammal; by most zoologists now identified with the malleus or greater part of the malleus of Mammalia, formed about the proximal extremity of the Meckelian cartilage. In birds and reptiles the quadrante is a remarkably distinct bone, generally shaped something like an anvil or a molar tooth, with normally four separate movable articulations—with the squamosal above, the mandible below, the pterygoid internally, and the quadratojugal externally. Such vertebrates are hence called Quadrantifera. (See cuts under Galline, and quadrante, a.) Below reptiles the quadrante or its equivalent assumes other characters, and its homologies are then disputed; so the bone which has at any rate the same function, that of suspending the lower jaw to the skull, is usually called by another name. See epitymppanic and hyomandibular, and cuts under hyoid and palatograde. See also cuts under Python, poison-fang, Crotalus, Petromyzon, teleost, palatograde, and acrodont. (b) Any quadrante muscle.—4. In musical notation: (a) Same as natural, ♮: so called because derived from B quadratum (which see, under B). (b) Same as breve, 1.

To square; adjust; trim, as a gun on its carriage.—2. To divide into four equal parts; quarter. Moore, Hindu Pantheon (1810), p. 249.

II. intrans. To square; fit; suit; agree: followed by with.

One that . . . has a few general rules, which, like mechanical instruments, he applies to the works of every writer, and as they quadrante with them pronounces the author perfect or defective. Addison, Sir Timothy Tittle.

But we should have to make our language over from the beginning, if we would have it quadrante with other languages.

F. Hall, False Philol., p. 85.

quadrated (kwod'rāt-ed), p. a. [quadrante, v.] In quadrature.

What time the moon is quadrated in Heaven.
Poe, Al Aaraaf, II.

quadrati, n. Plural of quadratus.

quadratic (kwod'rat'ik), a. and n. [quadrante + -ic.] I. a. 1. In alg., involving the square and no higher power of the unknown quantity or variable of the second degree; of two dimensions.—2. In crystal, tetragonal or dimetric: applied to the system that includes the square prism and related forms. See crystallography.—Quadratic equation, group, logarithm, mean, modulus, etc. See the nouns.—Quadratic figure, a figure of two dimensions; a superficial figure. See cubical.—Quadratic reciprocity, the relation between any two prime numbers expressed by the law of reciprocity (which see, under lanc).—Quadratic residue, a number left as remainder after dividing some square number by a given modulus to which the quadratic residue is said to belong. Thus, 1, 3, 4, 5, and 9 are quadratic residues of 11, for $1 = 1^2 - 0 \cdot 11$, $3 = 5^2 - 2 \cdot 11$, $4 = 9^2 - 7 \cdot 11$, etc.; but 2, 6, 7, 8, and 10 are quadratic non-residues of 11.

II. n. 1. In alg., an equation in which the highest power of the unknown quantity is the second, the general form being

$$ax^2 + 2bx + c = 0.$$

Such an equation has two solutions, real, equal, or imaginary, expressed by the formula

$$x = \frac{-b \pm \sqrt{b^2 - ac}}{a}.$$

2. pl. That branch of algebra which treats of quadratic equations.—Adfected quadratic, a quadratic equation having a term containing the unknown to the first degree, and another not containing the unknown.—Simple quadratic. See simple.

quadratically (kwod-rä-ti-käl-i), adv. To the second degree.—To multiply quadratically, to raise to the second power.

Quadratifer (kwod-rä-tif'e-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of quadratis: see quadratisferus.] Those vertebrates which have a distinct quadrate bone, as birds and reptiles; a series of Vertebrata intermediate between the higher Mallefera (mammals) and the lower Lyrifera (fishes proper and selachians).

quadratiferous (kwod-rä-tif'e-rus), a. [NL., neut. pl. of quadratis: see quadratisferus.] Having a distinct quadrate bone, as an animal or its skull; of or pertaining to the Quadratifer.

quadratisformis (kwod-rä-ti-för'mis), n.; pl. quadratisformes (-mëz). [NL., < L. quadratus, the quadrate muscle, + forma, form.] The square muscle of the coxal group; the quadratus femoris. Coues.

quadratispronator (kwod-rä-ti-prō-nä'tor), n. [NL., < L. quadratus, square, + NL. pronator, q. v.] A square pronator of the forearm: same as pronator quadratus. See pronator. Coues.

quadrato-cubic (kwod-rä-tō-kū'bik), a. Of the fifth degree.—Quadrato-cubic root, the fifth root.

quadratojugal (kwod-rä-tō-jō'gäl), a. and n. 1. a. Connected with or representing elements of the quadrate and of the jugal or malar bone; common to these two bones: as, the quadratojugal arch; the quadratojugal articulation.

II. n. A bone of the zygomatic arch of birds, etc., interposed between the quadrate bone behind and the jugal or malar bone before: generally a slender rod forming the hinder piece of the zygoma. By some it is identified with the squamosal of mammals—a determination to which few now assent. See cuts under Gallinæ, girdle-bone, temporomastoid, and Trematosauros.

quadratomandibular (kwod-rä-tō-man-dib'ū-lär), a. Of or pertaining to the quadrate bone and the lower jaw: as, the quadratomandibular articulation. See cut under Lepidosiren.

quadratopterygoid (kwod-rä-tō-ter'i-goid), a. Of or pertaining to the quadrate and pterygoid bones: as, the quadratopterygoid articulation.

quadratoquadratic (kwod-rä-tō-kwōd-rä'tik), a. Of the fourth degree.—Quadratoquadratic root, the fourth root.

quadrator (kwod-rä'tor), n. [NL., < L. quadrator, a squarer (used only in sense of 'stone-cutter, quarrier': see quarrier), < L. quadrare, square: see quadrare.] A circle-squarer.

quadratosquamosal (kwod-rä-tō-skwa-mō'säl), a. In anat., of or pertaining to the quadrate and the squamosal: as, the quadratosquamosal articulation.

quadratrix (kwod-rä'triks), n. [NL. (tr. Gr. τετραγωνιστρια), fem. of LL. quadrator, squarer: see quadrator.] In geom., a curve by means of which can be found straight lines equal to the circumference of circles or other curves and their several parts; a curve employed for finding the quadrature of other curves.

Quadratrix of Dinostratus.

Dinostratus, to whom is ascribed the invention of the quadratrix for solving the two famous problems—the trisection of the angle and the quadrature of the circle.

The Academy, June 1, 1889, p. 381.

Quadratrix of Dinostratus, a curve probably invented by Hippias of Elis about 430 B. C., and named by Dinostratus a century later. Its equation is $r \sin \theta = a\theta$.—Quadratrix of Tschirnhausen (named from its inventor, Count E. W. von Tschirnhausen, 1651-1708), a curve of sines, having the distance between two successive intersections with the line of abscissas equal to the greatest difference of the ordinates.

quadratum (kwod-rä'tum), n.; pl. quadrata (-tā). [L., neut. of quadratus, square: see quadrare, a. v.] 1. In zool., the quadrate bone: more fully called os quadratum.—2. In medieval music, a breve.

quadrature (kwod-rä'tūr), n. [= F. quadrature = Sp. cuadratura = Pg. It. quadratura, < LL. quadratura, a making square, a squaring, < L. quadrare, pp. quadratus, square: see quadrare.] 1. In geom., the act of squaring an area; the finding of a square or several squares equal in area to a given surface.—2. A quadrate; a square space. [Rare.]

There let him (God) still victor sway,
And henceforth monarchy with thee divide
Of all things, parted by the empirical bounds,
His quadrature, from thy orbicular world.

Milton, P. L., x. 381.

3. The relative position of two planets, or of a planet and the sun, when the difference of their longitudes is 90°.

But when armillæ were employed to observe the moon in other situations . . . a second inequality was discovered, which was connected, not with the anomalistical, but with the synodical revolution of the moon, disappearing in conjunctions and oppositions, and coming to its greatest amount in quadratures. What was most perplexing about this second inequality was that it did not return in every quadrature, but, though in some it amounted to 2° 30', in other quadratures it totally disappeared. Small, Account of the Astronomical Discoveries (of Kepler (London, 1804), § 11.

Neptune . . . is in quadrature with the sun on the 23d. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 64.

4. A side of a square. [Rare.]

This citie (Cambalu) is foure square, so that every quadrature or syde of the wall hath in it three principal portes or gates. R. Eden, tr. of Sebastian Munster (First Books [on America, ed. Arber, p. 25].

Indefinite quadrature, a rule for the quadrature of the circle, applicable to any sector of it.—Mechanical quadrature, an approximate quadrature of a plane surface, effected by the division of it by parallel lines into parts so small that they may be regarded as rectilinear or other quadrable figures; also, the integration of any expression by an analogous method.—Method of quadratures, the approximate integration of an expression between given numerical limits by the summation of parts in each of which the difference between the limits is so small that the integral is practically equal to that of some integrable expression.—The problem of the quadrature, or the quadrature of the circle, the problem of squaring the circle, of which there are two varieties: first, the arithmetical quadrature, exactly to express in square measure the area of a circle whose radius is some exact number in long measure; second, the geometrical quadrature, to describe or draw with the rule and compasses alone a square equal in area to a given circle. Both problems have been proved to be insoluble.

quadratus (kwod-rä'tus), n.; pl. quadrati (-tī). [NL., sc. musculus, the square muscle: see quadrare.] In zool. and anat., the musculus quadratus or quadrate muscle of (a) the femur; (b) the loins; (c) the chin; (d) the nictitating membrane. See quadrare muscle, under quadrare.—Quadratus femoris, a muscle situated at the back of the hip-joint, arising from the tuberosity of the ischium and inserted into a line running from the posterior intertrochanteric ridge.—Quadratus labii inferioris. Same as depressor labii inferioris (which see, under depressor).—Quadratus labii superioris, the combined levator labii superioris alioque nasi, levator labii superioris proprius, and zygomaticus minor muscles, the three different parts being called caput angulare, caput infraorbitale, and caput zygomaticum respectively.—Quadratus lumborum. See lumbus.—Quadratus menti. See mentum.

quadrauricular (kwod-rä-rik'ū-lär), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), four, + auricula, auricle: see auricle.] Having four auricles, as the heart of a nautilus.

quadrel (kwod'rel), n. [ML. quadrellus, dim. of L. quadrum, a square: see quarrel.] 1. In arch., a square stone, brick, or tile. The term is sometimes restricted in its application to a kind of artificial stone formed of a chalky earth molded to a square form and slowly and thoroughly dried in the shade.

2. A piece of turf or peat cut in a square form. [Prov. Eng.]

quadrelle (kwod-rel'), n. [OF. quadrelle, an arrow, shaft, var. of quarele, f., quarel, m., an arrow, crossbow-bolt, etc.: see quarrel.] A square-headed or four-edged missile.

quadrennial (kwod-ren'i-äl), a. and n. [For quadriennial, q. v.] 1. a. Comprising four years: as, a quadrennial period.—2. Occurring once in four years: as, quadrennial elections.

Both States (Montana and Washington) provide for a quadrennial election of a governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, state treasurer, state auditor, attorney-general, and superintendent of public instruction. The Century, XXXIX. 506.

II. n. A fourth anniversary, or its celebration.

quadrennially (kwod-ren'i-äl-i), adv. Once in four years.

quadrenniate (kwod-ren'i-ät), n. [NL., < quadrennium + -ate.] A period of four years; a quadrennium.

quadrennium (kwod-ren'i-um), n. [For quadriennium, q. v.] A period of four years.

Burdening girls, after they leave school, with a quadrennium of masculine college regimen.

E. H. Clarke, Sex in Education, p. 125.

quadreivalent (kwod-rē-kwiv'a-lent), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + E. equivalent.] Same as quadrivalent.

quadri-. [L., also quadrus, sometimes quatri, combining form of quattuor, = E. four (the independent adj. quadrus or quadrus, four-cornered, square, fourfold, < quattuor, four, being of later use): see four.] An element in many compounds of Latin origin or formation, meaning 'four.' In quadrangle, quadrangular (as in Latin), and in quadrennial, quadrennium, it is reduced to quadr-.

quadrarticulate (kwod'ri-är-tik'ū-lät), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + articulatus, pp. of articulare, divide into single joints: see articulate.] Having four articulations or joints.

quadribasic (kwod-ri-bä'sik), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + E. basic.] In chem., noting an acid which has four hydrogen atoms replaceable by basic atoms or radicals.

quadriblet (kwod'ri-bl), a. [Irreg. for the later quadrable, q. v.] Capable of being squared. [Rare.]

Sir Isaac Newton had discovered a way of attaining the quantity of all quadrable curves analytically, by his method of fluxions, some time before the year 1688.

Berham, Physico-Theol., v. 1, note y.

quadric (kwod'rik), n. and a. [NL., < L. quadrus, square (< L. quattuor = E. four), + -ic.] 1. n. In alg., a homogeneous expression of the second degree in the variables. Ternary and quaternary quadrics, equated to zero, represent respectively curves and surfaces which have the property of cutting every line in the plane or in space in two points, real or imaginary, and to such surfaces the name quadric is also applied.—Modular method of generation of quadrics. See modular.

II. a. In alg. and geom., of the second degree; quadrate. Where there is only one variable, the word quadratic is usually employed: in plane geometry, conic; and in solid geometry and where the number of non-homogeneous variables exceeds two, quadric. Thus, we say quadric cone, not quadratic cone.—Quadratic inversion. See inversion.—Quadratic surface, a surface of the second order.

quadricapsular (kwod-ri-kap'sū-lär), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + capsula, capsule: see capsule, capsular.] In bot., having four capsules.

quadricarinate (kwod-ri-kar'i-nät), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + carina, keel: see carina, carinate.] In entom., having four carinae, or longitudinal raised lines: specifically said of the face of an orthopterous insect when the median carina is deeply sulcate, so that it forms two parallel raised lines, which, with the two lateral carinae, form four raised lines.

quadricellular (kwod-ri-sel'ū-lär), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + NL. cellula, cellule: see cellular.] Having or consisting of four cells.

quadricentennial (kwod'ri-sen-ten'i-äl), a. and n. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + ML. centennis, a hundred years old: see centennial.] 1. a. Pertaining to or consisting of a period of four hundred years.

II. n. The commemoration or celebration of an event which occurred four hundred years before: as, the Luther quadricentennial.

quadriceps (kwod'ri-seps), n. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + caput, head: see biceps.] In anat., the quadriceps extensor cruris of the thigh; the great muscle which extends the leg upon the thigh, considered as consisting of the rectus, crureus, and vastus internus and externus. Called triceps extensor cruris when the crureus is regarded as a part of the vastus internus, or when the rectus is separately enumerated. This great muscle forms nearly all the flesh upon the front of the thigh. See cuts under musculi.—Quadriceps suræ, the combined gastrocnemius externus and internus, soleus, and plantaris, forming the bulk of the muscle of the calf.

quadricilliate (kwod-ri-sil'i-ät), a. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri), = E. four, + NL. ciliium + -ate.] Having four cilia, or flagelliform appendages.

M. Thuret informs us that he has seen the bicilliate spores germinate as well as the quadricilliate.

M. J. Berkeley, Introd. to Cryptog. Bot., p. 137.

quadricinium (kwod-ri-sin'i-um), n.; pl. quadricinia (-iā). [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + canere, sing.] In music, a composition for four voices. Also quatricinium.

quadricapital (kwod-ri-sip'i-tal), a. [< quadri- (-cipit-) + -al.] Having four heads or origins, as a muscle; of or pertaining to the quadricaps.

quadricone (kwod'ri-kōn), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + conus, cone: see cone.] A quadric cone, or surface generated by the motion of a line through a fixed point, one point of which describes a conic section.

quadricorn (kwod'ri-kōrn), a. and n. [< NL. quadricornis, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, Quadricorn Sheep (Ovis aries, var. quadricornis).

+ cornu = E. horn.] I. a. Having four horns or horn-like parts, as antennae; quadricornous. II. n. A quadricorn animal.

quadricornous (kwod-ri-kōr'nus), a. [< quadricorn + -ous.] Having four horns; quadricorn.

quadricostate (kwod-ri-kos'tāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + costa, rib: see costa, costate.] Having four ribs or costae, in any sense.

quadricrescentic (kwod'ri-kre-sen'tik), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + E. cre-scent + -ic.] Having four crescents; quadricrescentoid.

quadricrescentoid (kwod-ri-kres'en-toid), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + E. cre-scent + -oid.] In odontog., having four crescentic folds: noting a pattern of selenodont dentition.

quadricuspidal (kwod-ri-kus'pi-dal), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + cuspid (cuspid-), a point: see cuspidal.] A ruled surface of the eighth order.—Limited quadricuspidal, a ruled surface of the fourth order, generated by the motion of a straight line cutting two given straight lines and touching a given quadric surface.

quadricuspidate (kwod-ri-kus'pi-dāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + cuspid (cuspid-), a point: see cuspid, cuspidate.] Having four cusps, as a tooth. W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV, 402.

quadricycle (kwod'ri-si-kl), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + L. cyclus, cycle: see cycle.] A four-wheeled vehicle intended to be propelled by the feet of the rider.

A Quadricycle for pedal propulsion on railways. The Engineer, LXV, 109.

quadridentate (kwod-ri-den'tāt), a. [< L. quadriden (-t-), having four teeth, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + den (-t-) = E. tooth: see dentate.] Having four teeth or tooth-like parts, as serrations.

quadriderivative (kwod'ri-dē-riv'a-tiv), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + E. derivative.] A derivative invariant of the second order.

quadridigitate (kwod-ri-dij'i-tāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + L. digitus, finger or toe: see digit, digitate.] Having four digits, whether fingers, toes, or other digitate parts; tetradactyl; quadrisulcate, as a hoofed quadruped.

quadriennial (kwod-ri-en'i-āl), a. [= F. quadriennal, quatriennal = Sp. cuadrienal = Pg. quadriennal, < L. quadriennis, of four years, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + annus, a year.] Quadrennial.

quadriennially (kwod-ri-en'i-āl-i), adv. Quadrennially.

quadriennium (kwod-ri-en'i-um), n. [L. quadriennium, a space of four years, < L. quadrien- nis, of four years: see quadriennial.] A quadriennium.—Quadriennium utile, in Scots law, the four years allowed after majority within which may be instituted an action of reduction of any deed done to the prejudice of a minor.

quadrifarious (kwod-ri-fā'ri-us), a. [< LL. quadrifarius, fourfold, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + -farius, as in bifarius, etc. (see bifarious).] Set, arranged, or disposed in four rows or series: correlated with unifarious, bifarious, trifarious, and multifarious.

quadrifariously (kwod-ri-fā'ri-us-li), adv. In a quadrifarious manner.

quadrifid (kwod'ri-fid), a. [< L. quadrifidus, split into four parts, four-cleft, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + findere (√fid), cleave, split.] Four-cleft; deeply cut, but not entirely divided, into four parts: correlated with bifid, trifid, and multifid.

The mouth of the animal, situated at one of the poles, leads first to a quadrifid cavity.

W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 530.

Quadrifidæ (kwod-rif'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of L. quadrifidus, four-cleft: see quadrifid.] In entom., a section of noctuid moths; one of the two prime divisions of noctuid moths in Guenée's classification. It includes all those families in which the median vein of the hind wings has four branches. It contains the largest of the noctuids, and the forms are mainly American and East Indian. The character which gives the name is not a stable one, and the term has nearly fallen into disuse.

quadrifocal (kwod-ri-fō'kal), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + focus, focus: see focus, focal.] Having four foci.

quadrifoliate (kwod-ri-fō'li-āt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + folium, leaf: see foliate.] In bot., four-leaved. (a) Having the leaves whorled in fours. (b) Same as quadrifoliolate: an incorrect use.

quadrifoliolate (kwod-ri-fō'li-ō-lāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + foliolus, leaflet.] In bot., having four leaflets: said of a compound leaf.

quadriform (kwod'ri-fōrm), a. [< LL. quadri-formis, four-formed, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + forma, form.] Having a fourfold aspect, as in shape, arrangement, etc.

We can also apply the principle of group-flashing as easily to a fourfold light as to a single light. According to the number of tiers employed, the arrangement may be named Biform, Triform, Quadriform.

Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII, 815.

quadrifrons (kwod'ri-fronz), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + frons (front-), front: see front.] Having four faces. See bifrons.

quadrifurcate (kwod-ri-fēr'kāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + furca, fork: see furca, furcate.] Having four forks, tines, or branches; twice-forked; doubly dichotomous: correlated with bifurcate and trifurcate.

quadrifurcate (kwod-ri-fēr'kā-ted), a. [< quadrifurcate + -ed.] Same as quadrifurcate.

quadriga (kwod-ri-gā), n.; pl. quadrigæ (-jē). [L., usually in pl. quadrigæ, contr. from quadrigæ, a team of four, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + jugum (= Gr. ζυγόν), a yoke, pair, team: see yoke.] In classical antiq., a two-wheeled chariot drawn by four horses, which were harnessed all abreast. It was used in racing in the Greek Olympic games, and in the circensian games of the Romans. The quadriga is often met with as the reverse type of Greek coins, especially those of Sicily, and is of frequent occurrence in sculpture and vase-painting.

The quadriga for which Praxiteles was said to have made the driver.

A. S. Murray, Greek Sculpture, I, 182.

quadrigemina (kwod-ri-jem'i-nā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. quadrigeminus, fourfold: see quadrigeminous.] The quadrigeminous bodies of the brain, more fully called corpora quadrigemina. Below mammals they are represented by the corpora bigemina, or twin bodies. See corpus.

quadrigeminal (kwod-ri-jem'i-nal), a. [< quadrigeminus + -al.] Fourfold; especially, pertaining to the corpora quadrigemina.

Other fibres, arising in the optic thalamus and quadrigeminal body, descend, which preside over the reflex motions. Frey, Histol. and Histochem. (trans.), p. 504.

quadrigeminate (kwod-ri-jem'i-nāt), a. [< quadrigeminus + -ate.] 1. In bot., growing in fours, as the cells of certain algæ.—2. In anat., same as quadrigeminous.

quadrigeminous (kwod-ri-jem'i-nus), a. [< L. quadrigeminus, fourfold, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + geminus, twin-born, twin: see Gemini, geminat.] 1. Consisting of four similar parts; having four parts, as one and the same thing; fourfold; quadrigeminal.—2. In anat. and zool., specifically, pertaining to the optic lobes or corpora quadrigemina of any mammal, known in human anatomy as the nates and testes, which appear as two pairs of lobes or tubercles on the morphologically superior surface of the midbrain or mesencephalon, close to the pineal gland, behind the third ventricle, over the aqueduct of Sylvius. See corpus and quadrigemina.

quadrigenarius (kwod'ri-jē-nā'ri-us), a. [< L. quadrigeni, quadrigeni, four hundred each, distributive of quadrigeni, four hundred, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + centum = E. hundred.] Consisting of four hundred.

quadrijugate (kwod-ri-jō'gāt or -rij'ō-gāt), a. [< quadrijugus + -ate.] In bot., pinnate with four pairs of leaflets: as, a quadrijugate leaf.

quadrijugous (kwod-ri-jō'gus or -rij'ō-gus), a. [< L. quadrijugus, belonging to a team of four, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + jugum (= Gr. ζυγόν), a yoke. Cf. quadriga.] Same as quadrijugate.

quadrilaminar (kwod-ri-lam'i-nār), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + lamina, a thin plate: see lamina, laminat.] Same as quadrilaminat.

quadrilaminat (kwod-ri-lam'i-nāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + lamina, a thin plate: see lamina, laminat.] Having four laminae, layers, or plates; four-layered.

Quadrilatera (kwod-ri-lat'e-rā), n. pl. [NL., < L. quadrilaterus, four-sided: see quadrilateral.] In Crustacea, a group of crabs having a quadrate or cordate carapace. Latreille.

quadrilateral (kwod-ri-lat'e-rāl), a. and n. [< L. quadrilaterus, four-sided, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + latus (later-), side, flank: see lateral.] I. a. Having four sides; composed of four lines.—Quadrilateral map-projection. See projection.

II. n. 1. A figure formed of four straight lines. In the old geometry the lines are supposed to terminate at four intersections; in modern geometry the lines are regarded as infinite, and a plane quadrilateral as having six angles. Such a figure has three diagonals or axes, being straight lines through opposite vertices, and three centers, which are the intersections of the axes.

2. Milit., the space inclosed between, and defended by, four fortresses: as, the Bulgarian quadrilateral. The most famous quadrilateral was that in northern Italy, inclosed by the fortresses of Peschiera, Mantua, Verona, and Legnago.

Field Marshal Radetzky . . . had collected under his own command all the Austrian forces scattered over the Lombardo-Venetian provinces, and had concentrated them within the well-nigh impregnable stronghold formed in the very heart of these provinces by the fortresses of the Quadrilateral. E. Dicey, Victor Emmanuel, p. 85.

Inscriptible quadrilateral. See inscriptible.—Plane quadrilateral, a quadrilateral lying in a plane.—Skew quadrilateral, a quadrilateral that does not lie in a plane.

quadrilateralness (kwod-ri-lat'e-rāl-nes), n. The property of being quadrilateral.

quadrilateral (kwod-ri-lit'e-rāl), a. and n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + littera, litera, letter: see lateral.] I. a. Consisting of four letters, or of only four constant letters or consonants.

II. n. A word or a root consisting of four letters or containing four consonants.

Arabic roots are as universally (i. e., almost universally) trilateral. . . . If we suppose ten thousand of them (without reckoning quadrilaterals) to exist, and each of them to admit only five variations, . . . even then a perfect Arabic dictionary ought to contain fifty thousand words.

Sir W. Jones, Asiatic Dissertations, I, 125.

Complete Quadrilateral.

quadrille (kwod-ril' or ka-dril'), n. and a. [< F. quadrille, m., a game at cards, a square dance, music for such a dance, < Sp. cuadrillo, m., a small square (cf. F. quadrille, f., a troop of horsemen, < Sp. cuadrilla, a troop of horsemen, a meeting of four persons, < It. quadriglia = Pg. quadriglia, a troop of horsemen), dim. of cuadro, m., cuadra, f., < L. quadram, n., quadra, f., a square: see quadrum, quadra. Cf. quarrel.] I. n. 1. A game played by four persons with forty cards, which are the remainder of the pack after the tens, nines, and eights are discarded.

They taught him with address and skill
To shine at ombre and quadrille.

Cavorthorn, Birth and Education of Genius.

Quadrille, a modern game, bears great analogy to ombre, with the addition of a fourth player, which is certainly a great improvement. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 496.

2. A square dance for four couples, consisting regularly of five parts or movements, each complete in itself—namely, le pantalon, l'été, la poule, la trévisse (or la pastourelle), and la finale. These parts are adaptations of popular society dances. They were combined in their present order about 1800, and were soon adopted in France, England, and Germany, giving rise to a quadrille mania similar to the later polka mania.

3. Any single set of dancers or maskers arranged in four sets or groups. [Rare.]

At length the four quadrilles of maskers, ranging their torch-bearers behind them, drew up in their several ranks on the two opposite sides of the hall.

Scott, Kenilworth, xxxvii.

4. Any square dance resembling the quadrille.—5. Music for such square dances. For the movements of the quadrille proper the rhythm is either sextuple or duple, and each section is usually 32 measures long. Quadrille music is usually adapted or arranged, not specially written for the purpose.

II. a. Same as quadrillé.

quadrille (kwod-ril' or ka-dril'), v. i.; pret. and pp. quadrilled, ppr. quadrilling. [< quadrille, n.] 1. To play at quadrille. Imp. Dict.—2. To dance quadrilles.

While thus, like motes that dance away
Existence in a summer ray,
These gay things, born but to quadrille,
The circle of their doom fulfil.

Moore, Summer Fête.

quadrillé (ka-dré-lyá'), a. [*F., < quadrille, a small square, < Sp. cuadrillo, a small square: see quadrille.] Divided or marked off into squares; having a pattern composed of small squares: said of textile fabrics, writing-papers ruled with lines crossing at right angles, and the like.

quadrillion (kwod-ril'yón), n. [< F. quadrillion, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + F. (m)illion, > E. million.] The fourth power of a million according to the system of numeration called English; but the fifth power of a thousand according to the French system, commonly used in the United States.

quadrilobate (kwod-ri-ló'bát), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + NL. lobus, lobe.] In bot. and zool., having four lobes or lobules.

quadrilobed (kwod-ri-ló'bd), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + NL. lobus, lobe, + -ed.] Same as quadrilobate.

quadrilocular (kwod-ri-lok'ū-lār), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + locus, a cell.] 1. In bot., having four cells or compartments; four-celled: as, a quadrilocular pericarp.—2. In anat. and zool., having four cavities or compartments: chiefly an epithet of the heart of mammals and birds.

quadriloculate (kwod-ri-lok'ū-lāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + locus, a cell: see locus, loculate.] Same as quadrilocular.

quadriloge (kwod-ri-lój), n. [= OF. quadriloge, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + Gr. λόγος, a saying, speaking, discourse: see Logos.] 1. A book written in four parts, as "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage."—2. Any narrative depending on the testimony of four witnesses, as the four Gospels.—3. Any work compiled from four authors, as the "Life of Thomas a Becket." Brewer. [Rare in all senses.]

The very authors of the quadriloge itself . . . do all, with one pen and mouth, acknowledge the same. Lambrde, Perambulation (1566), p. 615. (Halliwell.)

Quadrinani (kwod-rim'a-ni), n. pl. [NL., pl. of quadrinanus: see quadrinanus.] In Latreille's system of classification, a group of caraboid beetles, typified by the genus Harpalus, having the four anterior tarsi dilated in the males: distinguished from Simplicinani and Patellinani. See Harpalinæ.

quadrinanus (kwod-rim'a-nus), a. [< NL. quadrinanus, four-handed, < L. quattuor (quad- ri-), = E. four, + manus, hand. Cf. quadrumanous.] Same as quadrumanous.

At this malicious game they display the whole of their quadrinanus activity.

Burke, Rev. in France, Works, III. 190.

quadrinembrat (kwod-ri-mem'brāl), a. [< L. quadrinembris, four-limbed, four-footed, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + membrum, a limb, a member.] Having four members (or parts) as limbs: as, most vertebrates are quadrinembrat.

quadrinet (kwod'rín), n. [< ML. quadrinus (1); cf. L. quadrat(t)-s, the fourth part of an as: see quadrans, quadrant.] A mite; a small piece of money, in value about a farthing.

One of her paramours sent her a purse full of quadrines (which are little pieces of copper money) instead of silver. North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 722.

quadrinomial (kwod-ri-nō'mi-nāl), a. and n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + nom(en), name (see nomen), + -al. Cf. binomial, etc.] I. a. In alg., consisting of four terms.

II. n. In alg., an expression consisting of four terms.

quadrinomial (kwod-ri-nō'mi-nāl), a. [As quadrinomial (ial) + -ic-al.] Quadrinomial.

quadrinomial (kwod-ri-nō'mi-nāl), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + nomen (nomin-), name: see nomen, nominal.] Having four terms; quadrinomial.

quadrinucleate (kwod-ri-nū'klē-āt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + nucleus, a nucleus: see nucleate.] In bot., having four nuclei, as the spores of some fungi.

quadrinvariant (kwod-rin-vā'ri-ant), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + E. invariant.] An invariant of the second order in the coefficients.

quadrinpara (kwod-rip'a-rā), n. [NL., < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + parere, bring forth, bear.] A woman who is bearing a child for the fourth time.

Quadrirapæ (kwod-rip'a-rē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of quadrirapæ: see quadrirapæ.] A group of birds proposed by E. Newman in 1875, being those which lay four eggs, and only four, and place them with the small ends together in the middle of the nest: it includes snipes, sandpipers, plovers, etc., and is practically equivalent to Limicolæ, 1.

quadrirapite (kwod-ri-pār'tit), a. and n. [= OF. quadrirapite, quadrirapite, < L. quadrirapitus, quadrirapitus, divided into four parts, fourfold (LL. also as a finite verb, quadrirapire, divide into four), < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + partitus, pp. of partire, divide, separate, distribute: see part, v., partie, etc.] I. a. Divided into four parts; specifically, in bot. and zool., parted into four; divided to the base or entirely into four parts; in arch., divided, as a vault, by the system of construction employed, into four compartments. Such a vault is the cardinal type of mediæval Pointed vaulting.

Squire Headlong . . . was quadrirapite in his locality: that is to say, he was superintending the operations in four scenes of action—namely, the cellar, the library, the picture-gallery, and the dining-room.

Peacock, Headlong Hall, II.

II. n. A book or treatise divided into four parts or treatises; a tetrabiblion: as, the last two books of Ptolemy's Quadrirapite; the quadrirapite (four Gospels) of the New Testament. quadrirapitely (kwod-ri-pār'tit-lī), adv. In four divisions; in a quadrirapite distribution.

quadrirapition (kwod-ri-pār'tish'ōn), n. [< L. quadrirapitio(n)-, a division into four, < quadrirapitus, divided into four: see quadrirapite.] A division by four or into four parts.

Nor would it, perhaps, be possible to entirely deny the position of one who should argue that this convenient quadrirapition of the month was first in order of time. Contemporary Rev., L. 528.

quadrirapennate (kwod-ri-pen'āt), a. and n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + penna, wing: see penna, pennate.] I. a. In entom., having four wings—that is, four functional wings, an anterior pair being not converted into elytra or wing-cases.

II. n. A four-winged or quadrirapennate insect.

quadriraphyllous (kwod-ri-fil'ūs), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + Gr. φύλλον, L. folium, leaf.] In bot., having four leaves; quadriraphyllate.

quadriraplanar (kwod-ri-plā'nār), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + NL. planum, a plane: see plane, planar.] Formed by four planes.—Quadriraplanar coordinates. See coordinate.

quadriraplicate (kwod-rip'li-kāt), a. and n. Same as quadriraplicate.

quadriraplicated (kwod-rip'li-kā-ted), a. Same as quadriraplicate.

quadrirapulmonary (kwod-ri-pul'mō-nā-ri), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + L. pulmon(n)-, lung: see pulmonary.] In Arachnida, having two pairs of pulmonary sacs; tetrapneumonous: opposed to bipulmonary.

quadrirapadric (kwod-ri-kwōd'rik), a. and n. [< quadri(c) + quadric.] I. a. Of the second degree in each of two variables or sets of variables.

II. n. A skew quartic curve, the intersection of two quadric surfaces. There are other quartics not of this description.

quadriradiatæ (kwod-ri-rā'di-āt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + radius, ray (> radius, radiatæ): see radiatæ.] Having four rays, as a fish's fin; tetractinal, as a sponge-spicule; in bot., having four radii or prolongations: as, a quadriradiatæ mass of chlorophyll.

quadrirapeme (kwod-ri-rēm), n. [< L. quadrirapemis (LL. also quadrirapemis), a vessel fitted with four banks of oars, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + remus, oar: see oar.] A galley with four banks of oars or rowers, mentioned as in use occasionally among the ancient Greeks and Romans.

quadrirapementalist (kwod-ri-sak-ra-men'tal-ist), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + sacramentum, sacrament, + -al + -ist.] Same as quadrirapementarian.

quadrirapementarian (kwod-ri-sak'ra-men-tā'ri-an), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + sacramentum, sacrament, + -arian.] One of a small body of German Protestants in the middle of the sixteenth century, who held that the four sacraments of baptism, the eucharist, holy orders, and absolution are requisite for salvation.

quadrirapesection (kwod-ri-sek'shōn), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + sectio(n)-, a cutting: see section.] A section into four equal parts.

quadriraperial (kwod-ri-sē'ri-al), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + series, a row: see serial.] Set or arranged in four rows or series; four-rowed; quadriraperial; tetrastichous.

The production of the ambulacral element in some starfishes is much more rapid than general growth, thus producing a crushing together of the plates in the direction of the length, in some cases carried to such an extent that the tube-feet in each furrow become quadriraperial. Amer. Nat., Feb., 1890, p. 161.

quadrirapetose (kwod-ri-sē'tōs), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + seta, seta, a bristle: see seta, setose.] In entom., bearing four setae or bristles.

quadrirapiral (kwod-ri-spi'ral), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + spira, a coil, a spire: see spire, spirat.] In bot., having four spirals.

Elaters [of Fimbriaria] rather short, uni-quadrirapiral. Underwood, Hepaticæ of N. A., p. 39.

Quadrirapulcata (kwod-ri-sul-kā'tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of quadrirapulcatus: see quadrirapulcate.]

A group of hoofed quadrupeds having four toes; the quadriscutate ungulate mammals.

quadriscutate (kwod-ri-sul'kat), a. [< NL. quadriscutatus, < L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + sulcus, a furrow: see sulcus, sulcate.] Having four grooves, furrows, or sulci; specifically, in mammal, having a four-parted hoof; four-toed; quadrigitate.

quadrissylic (kwod'ri-sil'ik), a. [< quadrissylic(e) + -ic.] Consisting of four syllables; pertaining to or consisting of quadrissylics.

quadrissylic (kwod'ri-sil'ik), a. [< quadrissylic + -al.] Same as quadrissylic.

quadrissylic (kwod-ri-sil'ik-bl), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + syllaba, syllable: see syllable.] A word consisting of four syllables.

A distinction without a difference could not sustain itself; and both alike disguised their emptiness under this pompous quadrissylic.

De Quincy, Roman Meals. (Davies.)

quadrilateral (kwod-ri-tak'tik), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + (Gr. taktikós, pertaining to arrangement: see tactic.] Of the nature of a point on a surface or skew curve where four consecutive points are in one plane.—Quadrilateral point. See trilateral point, under point.

quadrilateral (kwod'ri-tū-bér'kū-lār), a. Same as quadrilateral.

By the suppression of one of the primitive cusps we arrive at the quadrilateral tooth. Nature, XLII. 467.

quadrilateral (kwod'ri-tū-bér'kū-lāt), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + tuberculum, tubercle: see tubercle, tuberculate.] Having four tubercles: as, a quadrilateral molar.

quadrivalent (kwod-riv'ā-lent), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + valens(-t)s, ppr. of valere, be strong.] In chem., noting an atom the equivalence of which is four, or an element one atom of which is equivalent, in combining power, to four atoms of hydrogen; tetradic; tetratomic.

quadrivalve (kwod'ri-valv), a. and n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + valva, a door: see valve.] I. a. Same as quadrivalvular.

II. n. One of a set of four folds or leaves forming a door.

quadrivalvular (kwod-ri-val'vū-lār), a. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + NL. valvula, dim. of L. valva, valve: see valve.] In zool. and bot., having four valves or valvular parts.

quadrivium, n. Plural of quadrivium.

quadrivium (kwod-riv'ā-l), a. and n. [< L. quadrivius, having four ways, + -al. Cf. trivial.] I. a. 1. Having four ways meeting in a point; leading in four directions.

A forum, with quadrivium streets. B. Jonson, Expostulation with Inigo Jones.

2. Belonging to the quadrivium: thus, quadrivium astrology is astrology in the sense in which astrology is a branch of the quadrivium—that is, astronomy.

II. n. One of the four arts constituting the quadrivium.

The quadrivium—I mean arithmetike, musike, geometrie, and astronomie—& with them all skill in the perspectives, are now small regarded in either of them [the universities]. Holinshed, Descrip. of England, il. 3.

quadrivium (kwod-riv'ā-l), a. [< L. quadrivius, of the cross-roads, lit. having four ways, < quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + via = E. way.] Going in four directions.

When the cheese was so rotten with them [vermin] that only the twigs and string kept it from tumbling to pieces and walking off quadrivium, it came to table. C. Reade, Cloister and Hearth, xxiv.

quadrivium (kwod-riv'ā-l), n.; pl. quadrivia (-ā). [< LL. quadrivium, quadrivium, the four branches of mathematics, a particular use of L. quadrivium, a place where four ways meet, neut. of quadrivius, having four ways: see quadrivius. Cf. trivial.] The collective name of the four branches of mathematics according to the Pythagoreans—arithmetic (treating of number in itself), music (treating of applied number), geometry (treating of stationary number), and astronomy (treating of number in motion). This Pythagorean quadrivium, preceded by the trivium of grammar, logic, and rhetoric, made up the seven liberal arts taught in the schools of the Roman empire.

quadrivoltine (kwod-riv'ol'tin), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-), = E. four, + It. volta, turn, time, + -ine2.] A silkworm which yields four crops of cocoons a year.

quadron (kwod-rōn'), n. [An alteration (simulating words in quadri-, quadru-) of quar-teroon, < Sp. cuarteron, a quadron, one who is one fourth black; also, a fourth part; < cuarto, a fourth: see quart, quarter.] The offspring of a mulatto and a white person; a person having one fourth African blood.

quadro-quadro-quartic (kwod' rō-kwōd' rō-kwārt'ik), n. [< quadric + quadric + quartic.] A non-plane curve formed by the intersection of two quadric surfaces.

quadoxid, quadoxide (kwod-rok'sid, -sid or -sid), n. [< L. quattuor (quadri-, quadru-), = E. four, + oxid, oxide.] In chem., a compound of four equivalents of oxygen and one of another element, or a simple oxid containing four atoms of oxygen.

quadrūm (kwod'rūm), n. [L., square, anything square in form, neut. of (L.L.) quadrus, four-cornered, square: see quadr, quadr.] In music, same as natural, 7.

quadruman, quadrumane (kwod'rō-man, -mān), n. [< F. quadrumane, < NL. quadrumanus, four-handed: see quadrumanous.] A four-handed quadruped; an animal capable of using all four feet as hands; specifically, a member of the Quadruman.

Quadrumana (kwod-rō-mā-nā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of quadrumanus, four-handed: see quadrumanous.] An order of Mammalia named by Blumenbach in 1791, including all kinds of apes, monkeys, and lemurs; the quadrumanous mammals: so called because their hind as well as fore feet can be used as hands. The term is scarcely used now, being superseded by Primates; but Primates includes both the Bimana (man alone) and the Quadrumana of the earlier systems. When the name was in vogue the Quadrumana were usually divided into Calarrhini, Old World apes and monkeys; Platyrrhini, New World monkeys; and Strepsirrhini, lemurs.

quadrumanous (kwod-rō-mā-nus), a. [< NL. quadrumanus, four-handed, < L. quattuor (quadru-), = E. four, + manus, hand: see main3.] Four-handed; having all four feet fitted for use as hands: said of mammals, as opossums, etc.; specifically, of or pertaining to the Quadrumana. Also quadrumanous.

The strongly convex upper lip frequently seen among the lower classes of the Irish is a modified quadrumanous character. E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 291.

quadruped (kwod'rō-ped), a. and n. [= F. quadrupède = Pr. quadrupèdi = Sp. cuadrupede, cuadrupede = Pg. cuadrupede = It. quadrupede, quadrupedo, < L. quadrupes, quadrupes (-ped-), having four feet, a four-footed creature, < quattuor (quadru-), = E. four, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] I. a. Four-footed; having four limbs fitted for sustaining the body and for progression; habitually going on all fours: opposed to aliped and biped: correlated with quadrumanous and pedimanous: chiefly said of mammals, but also of four-footed reptiles, as lizards and tortoises. Compare quadrumanous.

II. n. A four-footed or quadruped animal; especially, a four-footed mammal, as distinguished from a biped, as man or a bird.

quadrupedal (kwod'rō-ped-al), a. and n. [= OF. quadrupedal = Sp. cuadrupedal = Pg. quadrupedal; as quadruped + -al.] I. a. Quadruped or four-footed; especially, going on all fours, or adapted or restricted to that mode of progression: as, the quadrupedal shape; quadrupedal locomotion.

II. n. A quadruped. [Rare.]

The coldest of any quadrupedal. Howell, Parly of Beasts, p. 11.

quadrupedated (kwod'rō-pe-dā-ted), a. [< quadruped + -ate1 + -ed2.] Made or become four-footed or like a beast; turned into a quadruped. [Rare.]

Deformed and luxate with the prosecution of vanities; quadrupedated with an earthly, stooping, grovelling covetousness. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 399.

quadrupedism (kwod'rō-ped-izm), n. [< quadruped + -ism.] The state of being a quadruped; the condition of being four-footed, as a beast. [Rare.]

Among the Mahometans . . . quadrupedism is not considered an obstacle to a certain kind of canonisation. Southey, The Doctor, cxcix. (Davies.)

quadruplane (kwod'rō-plān), n. [< L. quattuor (quadru-), = E. four, + planum, a plane: see plane1.] A plane quadrilateral having its opposite or alternate sides equal and one pair of these crossing each other.

quadruple (kwod'rō-pl), a. and n. [< F. quadruple = Sp. cuádruplo = Pg. It. quadruplo, < L. quadruplus, fourfold, quadruplum, a fourfold quantity, < quattuor (quadru-), = E. four, + -plus, -fold: see -fold.] I. a. Fourfold; four times told.

A law that to bridle theft doth punish thieves with a quadruple restitution hath an end which will continue as long as the world itself continueth.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 10.

A quadruple Jacquard, or four separate Jacquards fixed in one frame. A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 275.

Quadruple counterpoint, in music, counterpoint in which four melodies are so contrived as to be mutually usable above or below one another by transposition. Twenty-four different dispositions of such melodies are possible. Compare double and triple counterpoint (which see, under counterpoint, 3).—Quadruple crown, a size of printing-paper, 30 × 40 inches. [Eng.]—Quadruple demy, a size of printing-paper, 35 × 45 inches. [Eng.]—Quadruple foolscap, a size of printing-paper, 27 × 34 inches. [Eng.]—Quadruple medium, a size of printing-paper, 38 × 48 inches. [Eng.]—Quadruple post, a size of printing-paper, 32 × 40 inches. [Eng.]—Quadruple pot, a size of printing-paper, 26 × 32 inches. [Eng.]—Quadruple quaver, in musical notation, same as hemidemisemiquaver.—Quadruple ratio. See ratio.—Quadruple rhythm or time, in music, rhythm or time characterized by four beats or pulses to the measure. See rhythm.—Quadruple royal, a size of printing-paper, 40 × 50 inches. [Eng.]

II. n. A number, sum, etc., four times as great as that taken as the standard: as, to receive the quadruple of a given sum.

quadruple (kwod'rō-pl), v.; pret. and pp. quadrupled, ppr. quadrupling. [< F. quadrupler, < LL. quadruplare, make fourfold, < L. quadruplus, fourfold: see quadruple, a.] I. trans. To make four times as much or as many; multiply by four; repeat four times; make, do, or cause to happen four times over.

The trade of Scotland has been more than quadrupled since the first erection of the two public banks. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, il. 2.

II. intrans. To become four times as much or as many; repeat itself four times.

quadruplet (kwod'rō-plet), n. [< quadruple + -et.] I. Any combination of four objects or parts grouped, united, or acting together: as, a quadruplet of springs, consisting of four elliptic springs coupled together and acting as one spring. quag (kwag), n. [Abbr. of quagmire.] A shaking, marshy soil; a quagmire.

On the left hand there was a very dangerous quag, into which if even a good man falls, he can find no bottom for his foot to stand on. Into that Quag King David once did fall.
Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, pt. I.

With packhorse constancy we keep the road,
Crooked or straight, through quags or thorny dells.
Cowper, Tirocinium, l. 253.

= Syn. See marsh.

quagga (kwag'gā), n. [Also quacha; appar. S. African.] 1. An African solidungulate quadruped of the horse family, Equus or Hippotigris quagga, related to the ass and zebra, but not fully striped like the latter, not being banded on the hind quarters and legs. The ears are short, the head is comparatively small, the tail is tufted, and the color is a dark brown on the head, neck, and shoulders, the back and hind quarters being of a lighter brown, the croup of a russet-gray, and the under parts of the body white. It will breed with the horse, and a mixed race of this kind existed in England some years ago. By the natives the flesh is esteemed palatable.

2. Burchell's zebra, Equus or Hippotigris burchelli, closely related to the above, but striped throughout like the zebra: more fully called bonte-quagga. See cut under dauw.

Collins, Superstitions of the Highlands.

The quaggy soil trembles to a sound like thunder of breakers on a coast.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 783.

quagmire (kwag'mir), n. [Appar. a var. of the earlier quakemire: see quakemire.] Soft, wet, boggy land that trembles under the foot; a marsh; a bog; a fen.

Whom the foul fiend hath led through fire and through flame, and through ford and whirlpool, o'er bog and quagmire.
Shak., Lear, III. 4. 54.

Faith, I have followed Cupid's Jack-a-lantern, and find myself in a quagmire at last. Sheridan, The Rivals, III. 4.

= Syn. Slough, Bog, etc. See marsh.

quagmire (kwag'mir), v. t.; pret. and pp. quagmired, ppr. quagmiring. [< quagmire, n.] To entangle or sink in or as in a quagmire. [Rare.]

When a reader has been quagmired in a dull heavy book, what a refreshing sight it is to see finis!

Laconics (1701), p. 120. (Latham.)

A man is never quagmired till he stops; and the rider who looks back has never a firm seat.

Lander, Imaginary Conversations, Wellington and Sir [Robert Inglis, p. 376.]

quagmire (kwag'mir-i), a. [< quagmire + -y.] Like a quagmire; boggy; marshy; fenney; quaggy. [Rare.]

Shall be thy recompense!

Wordsworth, Eccles. Sonnets, l. 39.

quail² (kwāl), v. i. [ME. quaylen, qualen, < OF. coailier, F. cailler = Sp. cuajar = Pg. coailhar = It. quagliare, cagliare, < L. coagulare, curdle, coagulate: see coagulate.] To curdle; coagulate. Palsgrave.

The cream is said to be quailed when the butter begins to appear in the process of churning.

Batchelor, Orthoep. Anal., p. 140. (Halliwel.)

quail³ (kwāl), n. [Early mod. E. also quayle, Sc. quailzie; < ME. quaille, quayle, quayle, < OF. quaille, F. caille = Pr. calha = OSP. coalla = It. quaglia, < ML. quaquila, also quaquara, quaquadra, quisquila (also, after OF., etc., qualia), < MD. quakele, quackel, D. kwakel (MD. also quartel, D. kwartel) = MLG. quackele, LG. quackel, a quail; so called in reference to its cry, < MD. quacken, D. kwaken = MLG. quaken, quack: see *quack*¹.] 1. A small gallinaceous bird of the Old World, related to the partridge, and belonging to the genus Coturnix. The common Messina or migratory quail of Europe and Africa is C. coturnix or C. dactylomanus, highly esteemed for the table.

Quahog (Venus mercenaria).

Common Migratory or Messina Quail of Europe (Coturnix coturnix).

The bill is much smaller and weaker than in the partridge, and the nasal fossæ are mostly feathered. The wings are pointed by the first, second, and third quills: the first is emarginate on the inner web; the tail is very short, soft, and slight, not half as long as the wing. The feet are small, with the tarsus shorter than the middle toe and claw, and slightly feathered above. The length of the bird is about 7 inches. The plumage is much variegated, the most conspicuous markings being sharp lance-linear stripes, whitish or buff, over most of the upper parts. This quail has several times been imported into the United States, but has failed thus far to become naturalized. There are many other quails of the same genus in various parts of the Old World, but none are indigenous to the New.

2. One of the various small gallinaceous birds more or less closely resembling the quail proper: loosely applied, with or without a qualifying term, especially in the United States, to all the species of Ortyx or Colinus, Lophortyx, Oreortyx, Callipepla, Cyrtonyx, and other genera of American Ortygine or Odontophorine.

Bob-white, or Common Quail of America (Ortyx virginiana).

Among such, the species of bob-white, as Ortyx virginiana, the common partridge or quail of sportsmen, are the nearest to the Old World species of Coturnix. In the United States, wherever the ruffed grouse, Bonasa umbellus, is called pheasant, the bob-white is called partridge: where that grouse is called partridge, the bob-white is known as quail. See also cuts under Callipepla, Cyrtonyx, Lophortyx, and Oreortyx.

A certain minister in Bremen, . . . reproached with the name of Quaker, because of his singular sharpness against the formal lifeless ministers and Christians in the world.

Encyc. Brit., XX. 17.

4. In logic, the attaching of quality, or the distinction of affirmative and negative, to a term.—

5. A qualifying—that is, partially negating or extenuating—circumstance; modification; restriction; limitation; allowance; abatement: as, to assert something without any qualification.

It may be laid down as a general rule, though subject to considerable qualifications and exceptions, that history begins in novel and ends in essay.

Macaulay, History.

But, all qualifications being made, it is undeniable that there is a certain specialization of the (nervous) discharge, giving some distinctiveness to the bodily changes by which each feeling is accompanied.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 495.

6†. Appeasement; pacification.

Out of that will I cause these of Cyprus to mutiny; whose qualification shall come into no true taste again but by the displanting of Cassio.

Shak., Othello, ii. 1. 282.

Property qualification, the holding of a certain amount of property as a condition to the right of suffrage or the exercise of some other public function. This condition in the case of suffrage has been common in ancient and modern times, and still prevails to a considerable extent in Europe. In the United States it has disappeared in the different States—the last one, Rhode Island, having abolished it (with a few exceptions) in 1888. In many States a small property qualification is a condition of service as a juror.

qualificative (kwol'i-fi-kā-tiv), a. and n. [= F. qualificatif = Pg. qualificativo; < NL. qualificativus, < ML. qualificare, qualify: see qualify.] 1. a. Serving to qualify or modify, or having the power to do so; qualifying.

qualifier (kwol'i-fi-er), n. [< qualify + -er, Cf. qualificator.] One who or that which qualifies; that which modifies, reduces, tempers, or restrains; specifically, in gram., a word that qualifies another, as an adjective a noun, or an adverb a verb, etc.

Your Epitheton or qualifier, wherof we spake before, . . . because he serves also to alter and enforce the sense, we will say somewhat more of him.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 152.

Qualifiers of the Holy Office, a body of monks, in the service of the Inquisition, who examined the evidence in regard to accused persons, and made reports to the tribunals.

Encyc. Brit.

qualify (kwol'i-fi), v.; pret. and pp. qualified, ppr. qualifying. [< OF. qualifier, callifier, qualificar, F. qualifier = Sp. calificar = Pg. qualificar = It. qualificare, < ML. qualificare, < L. qualis, of what kind, + -ficare, < facere, make: see quality and -fy.] I. trans. 1. To note the quality or kind of; express or mark a quality of.—2. To impart a certain quality or qualification to; fit for any place, office, or occupation; furnish with the knowledge, skill, or other accomplishment necessary for a purpose.

I determined to qualify myself for engraving on copper.

Hogarth, in Thackeray's Eng. Humourists, Hogarth, [Smollett, and Fielding, note.]

Misanthropy is not the temper which qualifies a man to act in great affairs, or to judge of them.

Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

3. Specifically, to make legally capable; furnish with legal power or capacity: as, to qualify a person for exercising the elective franchise.

The first of them, says he, that has a Spaniel by his side, is a Yeoman of about an hundred Pounds a Year, an honest Man; He is just within the Game Act, and qualified to kill an Hare or a Pheasant.

Addison, Spectator, No. 122.

In 1432 it was ordered that the qualifying freehold should be within the county.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 368.

4. In logic, to modify by the negative particle or in some similar way.—5. In gram., to express some quality as belonging to; modify; describe: said of an adjective in relation to a noun, of an adverb in relation to a verb, etc.—6. To limit or modify; restrict; limit by exceptions; come near denying: as, to qualify a statement or an expression; to qualify the sense of words or phrases.

Sometimes words suffered to go single do give greater sense and grace than words qualified by attributions do.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 152.

7. To moderate; soothe; abate; soften; diminish; assuage: as, to qualify the rigor of a statute.

I do not seek to quench your love's hot fire,
But qualify the fire's extreme rage.

Shak., T. G. of V., II. 7. 22.

Although the seat of the Town be excessive hot, yet it is happily qualified by a North-east gale that bloweth from sea.

Sandys, Travails, p. 5.

8. To modify the quality or strength of; make stronger, dilute, or otherwise fit for taste: as, to qualify liquors.

I have drunk but one cup to-night, and that was craftily qualified too.

Shak., Othello, II. 3. 41.

A set of fears and bonnet lairds who . . . contrived to drink twopenny, qualified with brandy or whisky.

Scott, Sir R. Conan's Well, I.

9. To temper; regulate; control.

This is the master-piece of a modern politician, how to qualify and mould the sufferance and subjection of the people to the length of that foot that is to tread on their necks.

Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

It [the bitter] hath no fit larynx or throat to qualify the sound.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 27.

10. In Scotch law, to prove; authenticate; confirm.

The other [half of the goods forfeited] to be given to him who delates the receptors and qualifies the same.

Spalding, Hist. Troubles in Scotland, I. 273. (Jamieson.)

If any individual could qualify a wrong, and a damage arising from it.

Thurloe, quoted in Boswell's Johnson (an. 1776).

=Syn. 2. To prepare, capacitate. See qualified.—6 and 7. To reduce.

II. intrans. 1. To take the necessary steps for rendering one's self capable of holding any office or enjoying any privilege; establish a claim or right to exercise any function.—2. To take the oath of office before entering upon its duties.—3. To make oath to any fact: as, I am ready to qualify to what I have asserted. [U. S.]

qualitative (kwol'i-tā-tiv), a. [= F. qualitatif = Sp. cualitativo = It. qualitativo, < LL. qualitativus, < L. qualitas (t)-s, quality: see quality.] Originally, depending upon qualities; now, non-quantitative; relating to the possession of qualities without reference to the quantities involved; stating that some phenomenon occurs, but without measurement. The word occurs, according to Dr. Fitzedward Hall, in Gaule's Πισ-μαρία (1652).

After this quantitative mental distinction [between men and women], which becomes incidentally qualitative by telling most upon the most recent and most complex faculties, there come the qualitative mental distinctions consequent on the relations of men and women to their children and to one another.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 374.

Qualitative analysis, in chem. See analysis.—Qualitative atrophy, degeneration of tissue combined with atrophy.—Qualitative definition, a definition by means of accidental qualities.

qualitatively (kwol'i-tā-tiv-ly), adv. In a qualitative manner; with reference to quality; in quality.

qualified (kwol'i-tid), a. [< quality + -ed.] Disposed as to qualities or faculties; furnished with qualities; endowed.

Besides all this, he was well qualified.

Chapman, Illad, xiv. 104.

A dainty hand, and small, to have such power
Of help to dizzy height; and qualified Divinely.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 184.

quality (kwol'i-ti), n.; pl. qualities (-tiz). [< OF. qualite, F. qualité = Sp. cualidad, calidad = Pg. qualidade = It. qualità, < L. qualitas (t)-s, property, nature, state, quality (Cicero, tr. Gr. ποιότης), < qualis, interrog., of what kind, of what sort; rel., of such a kind, of such sort, such as, as; indef., having some quality or other; < quis, fem. abl. quā, who, what: see who.] 1. That from which anything can be said to be such or such; a character expressible by an adjective admitting degrees of comparison, but not explicitly relative nor quantitative: thus, blueness, hardness, agility, and mirthfulness are qualities. The precise meaning of the word is governed by its prominence in Aristotelian philosophy, which formed part of a liberal education till near the end of the seventeenth century, though the modified doctrine of Ramus was taught at Cambridge. Aristotle makes quality one of his categories, or highest genera, and thereby distinguishes it absolutely from substance, quantity, and relation, as well as from place, time, action, passion, habit, and posture. A quality is further said by Aristotle to be something which has a contrary, which admits of degree, and which is a respect in which things agree and also differ. But no writers, not even Aristotle himself, have strictly observed these distinctions; and Cicero, much followed by the Ramists, uses the word quite loosely. Quality has, however, always been opposed to quantity; and few writers call the universal attributes of matter or those of mind qualities.

There is somewhat contrarie unto qualitie, as vertue is contrarie unto vice, wit unto folly, manhood unto cowardise.

ise. The thing containing or receiving any qualitie male be said to receive either more or less. As one man is thought to be wiser than another, not that wisdom it self is either greater or lesse, but that it male bee in some manne more and in some manne lesse. By qualitie things are computed either like or unlike. Those things are like which are of like qualitie and have proprieties bothe accordingly.

Wilson, Rule of Reason (1651).

Our good or evil estate after death dependeth most upon the quality of our lives.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 46.

Every sin, the oftener it is committed, the more it acquieth in the quality of evil.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, I. 42.

Qualities do as well seem to belong to natural bodies generally considered as place, time, motion, and those other things.

Boyle, Origin of Forms, Pref.

The power to produce any idea in our mind, I call quality of the subject wherein that power is.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. viii. 8.

The three qualities which are usually said to distinguish atom from atom are shape, order, and position.

W. Wallace, Epicureanism, p. 174.

2. One of those characters of a person or thing which make it good or bad; a moral disposition or habit. This use of the word, which comes from Aristotle, was much more common and varied down to the end of the eighteenth century than now. Good characters were called qualities more often than bad ones.

All the qualities that man

Loves woman for. Shak., Cymbeline, v. 5. 166.

You must now speak Sir John Falstaff fair;

Which swims against your stream of quality.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 2. 34.

To-night we'll wander through the streets, and note The qualities of people.

Shak., A. and C., I. 1. 54.

You never taught me how to handle cards,

To cheat and cozen men with oaths and lies;

Those are the worldly qualities to live.

Beau. and FL., Honest Man's Fortune, IV. 1.

You must observe all the rare qualities, humours, and compliments of a gentleman.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, I. 1.

Thou hast that pretty Quality of the familiar Pops of the Town, who, in an Eating-House, always keep Company with all People in 't but those they came with.

Wycherley, Plain Dealer, v. 1.

He is very great, and a very delightful man, and, with a few bad qualities added to his character, would have acted a most conspicuous part in life.

Sydney Smith, To Lady Holland.

3. A distinguished and characteristic excellence or superiority: as, this wine has quality.

We find spontaneity, also, in the rhymes of Allingham, whose "Mary Donnelly" and "The Fairies" have that intuitive grace called quality—a grace which no amount of artifice can ever hope to produce.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 258.

In character the setter should display a great amount of quality, a term which is difficult of explanation, though fully appreciated by all experienced sportsmen. It means a combination of symmetry, as understood by the artist, with the peculiar attributes of the breed under examination, as interpreted by the sportsman.

Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 102.

4. Degree of excellence or fineness; grade: as, the food was of inferior quality; the finest quality of cloth.—5. A title, or designation of rank, profession, or the like.

When ye will speake giuing every person or thing besides his proper name a quality by way of addition, whether it be of good or of bad, it is a figurative speech of audible alteration.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 147.

6. Rank; profession; occupation; function; character sustained.

A man of such perfection

As we do in our quality much want.

Shak., T. G. of V., IV. 1. 58.

I am weary of this trade of fortune-telling, and mean to give all over when I come into England; for it is a very ticklish quality.

Fletcher (and another), Fair Maid of the Inn, v. 2.

Kneeling is the sinner's posture; if thou come hither in the quality of a sinner, . . . put thyself into the posture of a sinner, kneel.

Donne, Sermons, VII.

The saints would often leave their cells,

And stroll about, but hide their quality,

To try good people's hospitality.

Swift, Baucis and Philemon.

A marriage, at the Halifax parish church, between John Bateman, of Hipperholme, in that parish, and a Margaret Aldersleye (no address or quality given).

N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 189.

7. Persons of the same calling or fraternity. [Rare.]

To thy strong bidding task

Ariel and all his quality. Shak., Tempest, I. 2. 193.

8. Nobility or gentry, either abstractly (as, persons of quality) or concretely (as, the quality). But the former is obsolescent, the latter obsolete or now vulgar.

Gentlemen of blood and quality.

Shak., Hen. V., IV. 8. 95.

Two or three great silver flagons, made with inscriptions as gifts of the King to such and such persons of quality as did stay in town the late great plague, for the keeping things in order in the town.

Pepps, Diary, III. 120.

A nymph of quality admires our knight;

He marries, bows at Court, and grows polite.

Pope, Moral Essays, III. 385.

9. Character in respect to dryness or moisture, heat or cold, these being the elemental qualities from which it was supposed other properties, especially those of drugs and the temperaments, were compounded.

The burning quality

Of that fell poison. Shak., K. John, v. 7. 8.

10. Cause; occasion: an incorrect use.

My brother Troilus lodges there to-night:

Rouse him and give him note of our approach,

With the whole quality wherefore.

Shak., T. and C., IV. 1. 44.

11. In logic: (a) The character of a proposition as affirmative or negative. [This use comes from Appuleius, a Latin writer of the second century.]

How is a simple proposition divided according to quality? Into an affirmative and negative proposition.

Blundeville, Arte of Logick, III. 1.

(b) The character of apprehension as clear and distinct or obscure and confused. [This use is due to Kant.]

In relation to their subject, that is, to the mind itself, they [concepts] are considered as standing in a higher or a lower degree of consciousness—they are more or less clear, more or less distinct; this . . . is called their quality.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, VIII.

Accidental quality, a quality not distinguishing one species from another, but such that its subject might lose it without ceasing to be the same kind of substance.—

Active, alterative, or alterant quality, a quality by force of which a body acts; thus, heat is an active quality of fire.—

Affective quality. Same as affection, 6.—

Categories of quality. See category.—

Contingent quality, a derivative quality not necessarily involved in any primitive quality.—

Contrariety of quality. See contrariety.—

Corporeal quality, a natural quality of a kind of substance.—

Cosmical quality, a quality of a body dependent upon the presence of some unperceived thing, as its color upon the presence of the luminiferous ether.—

Elemental or first quality (tr. Gr. πρώτη διαφορά), one of the four qualities, hot and cold, moist and dry, which, according to Aristotle, distinguish the four elements, earth being dry and somewhat cold, water cold and somewhat moist, air moist and somewhat hot, fire hot and somewhat dry.

Of these qualities, hot and cold are active, moist and dry passive. The hot segregates different kinds of substance, the cold brings them together: the moist has no definite boundary of its own, but readily receives one; the dry has its own boundary, and does not easily receive another. The effort of the Aristotelians constantly was to account for the properties of compound bodies by these first qualities, and this was especially done by physicians in regard to drugs.—

Essential quality, a quality the essential difference of some species.—

Imputed quality. See impute.—

Intentional quality, a character the predication of which states a fact, but not the true mode of existence of that fact: thus, it is a fact that the celestial bodies are accelerated toward one another; but, if action at a distance be not admitted, attraction is an intentional quality.—

Logical quality. See def. 10, above.—

Manifest, occult, original qualities. See the adjectives.—

Mechanical quality, a quality explicable upon the principles of mechanics.—

Patible quality (tr. Gr. ποιότης παθήναι), one that directly affects one of the senses.—

Predicamental quality, quality in the strict sense, in which it is one of the ten predicaments or categories of Aristotle.—

Primary quality, one of the mathematical characters of bodies, not strictly a quality, and not the object of any single sense exclusively. Locke enumerates these as solidity, extension, figure, motion or rest, and number.—

Primitive quality, a quality which cannot be conceived to be a result of other qualities.—

Quality of a sound. See timbre.—

Quality of estate, in law, the manner in which the enjoyment of an estate is to be exercised while the right of enjoyment continues.—

Real quality. (a) A quality really existing in a body, and not intentional. (b) A quality really existing in a body, and not imputed.—

Secondary quality. (a) A patible quality. (b) A derivative quality.—

Secundo-primary quality, a character which in being known as it affects us is ipso facto known as it exists, as hardness.—

Sensible or sensile quality. Same as patible quality.—

Tactile quality. (a) A quality known by the touch. (b) A patible quality.—

The quality, persons of high rank, collectively. [Now vulgar.]

I shall appear at the next masquerade dressed up in my feathers and plumage like an Indian prince, that the quality may see how pretty they will look in their travelling habits.

Addison, Guardian, No. 112.

The quality, as the upper classes in rural districts are designated by the lower.

Trollope, Barchester Towers, xxxv.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Quality, Property, Attribute, Accident, Characteristic, Character, Affection, Predicate, Mark, Difference, Diathesis, Determination. Quality is that which makes or helps to make a person or thing such as he or it is. It is not universal, and in one popular sense it implies an excellence or a defect. In popular speech a quality is intellectual or moral; in metaphysics it may be also physical.

A property is that which is viewed as peculiarly one's own, a peculiar quality. An attribute is a high and lofty character: the attributes of God are natural, as omniscience, omnipotence, etc., and moral, as holiness, justice, mercy, etc. "Accident" is an abbreviated expression for accidental or contingent quality.—

(Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., vi.) Characteristic is not a term of logic or philosophy: it stands for a personal, peculiar, or distinguishing quality: as, yellow in skin, horn, milk, etc., is a characteristic of guiney cattle. Characteristics may be mental, moral, or physical.

Character is the most general of these words: a character is anything which is true of a subject. In another sense character (as a collective term) is the sum of the characteristics of a person or thing, especially the moral characteristics.

The word always views them as making a unit or whole, and has lower and higher uses. The other words are somewhat technical. Affection is used in various senses. Predicate and mark are very general words in logic. Difference is a character distinguishing one class of objects from others. Diatheisis, the corresponding Greek form, is applied in medicine to peculiarities of constitution. Determination is a more recent philosophical term denoting a character in general.

It would be felt as indecorous to speak of the qualities of God, and as ridiculous to speak of the attributes of matter.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., vi.

Property is correctly a synonym for peculiar quality; but it is frequently used as co-extensive with quality in general.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., vi.

We have no direct cognizance of what may be called the substantive existence of the body, only of its accidents.

J. H. Newman, Parochial Sermons, I. 273.

Affability is a general characteristic of the Egyptians of all classes.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 261.

To judge human character, a man may sometimes have very small experience, provided he has a very large heart.

Bulwer, What will he do with it? v. 4.

quality-binding (kwol'î-ti-bin'ding), n. A kind of worsted tape used for binding the borders of carpets and similar work. Simmonds.

quallet, n. A Middle English form of whale 1.

qualm (kwäm), n. [Also dial. calm; < ME. qualm, quelm, pestilence, death, < AS. cwælm, death, slaughter, murder, destruction, plague, pestilence (= OS. qualm, death, destruction, = D. kwalm, suffocating vapor, smoke, = OHG. qualm, cwælm, MHG. qualm, twælm, slaughter, destruction, G. qualm, suffocating vapor, steam, damp, smoke, nausea, = Sw. qualm, suffocating air, sultriness, = Dan. krælm, suffocating air, krælm, nausea), < cwælm, die, whence cwællan, cause to die, kill: see quail 1, and cf. quale 1 and quell.] 1†. Illness; disease; pestilence; plague.

A thousand slain, and not of qualme ystorve.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, I. 1156.

2. A sudden attack of illness; a turn of faintness or suffering; a throe or throb of pain.

Some sudden qualm hath struck me at the heart,
And dimm'd mine eyes. Shak., 2 Hen. VI., I. 1. 54.

3. Especially, a sudden fit or seizure of sickness at the stomach; a sensation of nausea.

Falstaff. How now, Mistress Doll!

Hostess. Sick of a calm. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., II. 4. 40.

For who without a qualm hath ever look'd
On holy garbage, though by Homer cook'd?

Roscommon, Translated Verse.

4. A scruple or twinge of conscience; compunction; uneasiness.

Some seek, when queasy conscience has its qualms,

To lull the painful malady with alms.

Cowper, Charity, I. 447.

5†. The boding cry of a raven.

As ravenes qualm, or schrychynge of these owls.

Chaucer, Troilus, v. 382.

qualm (kwäm), v. i. [< qualm, n.] 1. To be sick; suffer from qualms. [Rare.]

Above the rest,
Let Jesse's sov'reign flow'r perfume my qualming breast.

Quarles, Emblems, v. 2.

2. To cause pain or qualms.

Solitude discomposes the head, jealousy the heart;
envy qualms on his bowels, prodigality on his purse.

qualmire (kwäl'mîr), n. [A var. of quavemire, appar. simulating quail 1, qualm.] Same as quavemire.

Whosoever seeketh it in any other place, and goeth about to set it out of men's puddles and qualmires, and not out of the most pure and cleare fountaine itselfe.

Bp. Gardiner, True Obedience, fol. 9.

qualmish (kwä'mish), a. [< qualm + -ish 1.] 1. Sick at the stomach; inclined to vomit; affected with nausea or sickly languor.

I am qualmish at the smell of leek.

Shak., Hen. V., v. 1. 22.

2. Uneasy.

Elizabeth was not desirous of peace. She was qualmish at the very suggestion. Motley, Hist. Netherlands, I. 521.

qualmishly (kwä'mish-li), adv. In a qualmish manner.

qualmishness (kwä'mish-nes), n. The state of being qualmish; nausea.

quamash (kwa-mash'), n. Same as camass.

quamash-rat (kwa-mash-rat), n. Same as camass-rat.

quamoclit (kwam'ô-klit), n. [Mex.] 1. The cypress-vine, Ipomœa quamoclit.—2. [cap.] [NL.] A section of the genus Ipomœa, including the cypress-vine, formerly regarded as a genus.

quam proxime (kwam prok'si-mê). [L.: quam, as; proxime, most nearly, < proximus, nearest: see proxime.] As near as may be; nearly.

quandang (kwän'dang), n. [Australian.] A small Australian tree, Fusanus acuminatus, or its fruit. The latter, called native peach, is said to be almost the only Australian fruit relished by Europeans. The kernel of the seed (quandang-nut) as well as the pulp is edible. Also quandang and quandong.

quandary (kwon'da-ri or kwon'da'ri), n.; pl. quandaries (-riz). [Origin unknown; perhaps a dial. corruption (simulating a word of L. origin with suffix -ary) of dial. wandreth, evil, plight, peril, adversity, difficulty: see wandreth. The change of initial w- to wh- (hw-) occurs in some dialectal forms, e. g. in whant, a frequently heard pron. of want (as, I don't whant it). Medial w often suffers dialectal change to qu (as in quique for sweet), and instances of the change of wh- to qu- are numerous (Se. qua, quha, for who, quhar for where, etc.). The notion that quandary comes from F. qu'en dirai-je, 'what shall I say of it,' is absurd.] A state of difficulty or perplexity; a state of uncertainty, hesitation, or puzzlement; a pickle; a predicament.

I leave you to judge . . . in what a quandary . . . Pharies was brought. Greene, Mamillia.

That much I fear forsaking of my diet
Will bring me presently to that quandary
I shall bid all adieu.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, I. 1.

We are in a great quandary what to do.

Peggy, Diary, I. 245.

quandary (kwon'da-ri or kwon'da'ri), r.; pret. and pp. quandered, ppr. quandering. [< quandary, n.] 1. trans. To put into a quandary; bring into a state of uncertainty or difficulty.

Metinks I am quandary'd, like one going with a party to discover the enemy's camp, but had lost his guide upon the mountains. Quay, Soldier's Fortune, iii.

II. intrans. To be in a difficulty or uncertainty; hesitate.

He quanderes whether to go forward to God, or, with Demas, to turn back to the world.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 505. (Davies.)

quandy (kwän'di), n.; pl. quandies (-diz). [Origin obscure.] A duck, the oldwife or south-southerly, Harelda glacialis. See cut under Harelda. [Massachusetts.]

quannet (kwän'et), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. A kind of file, used especially for scraping zinc plates for the process denominated anastatic printing. Ure.—2. A flat file set in a frame like a plane, used in the manufacture of combs.

Tortoise-shell handles . . . are smoothed with a float or single cut file, technically known as a quannet.

O. Byrne, Artisan's Handbook, p. 410.

quanon, n. Same as kanun.

quant (kwant), n. [Also quant; < ME. quante, whante, a pole, stick, rod; cf. kent 1.] 1. A walking-stick. [Prov. Eng.].—2. A pushing-pole with a flat board or cap at one end to prevent it from sinking into the mud, used by bargemen; also, a jumping-pole, similarly fitted, used in marshes. The name is also given to the cap. [Prov. Eng.]

quanta, n. Plural of quantum.

quantitative (kwon'tä-tiv), a. Same as quantitative.

The notions of quantity, and of the two most simple differences of quantitative things, rarity and density.

Sir K. Digby, Treatise of Bodies (1644), iv.

quantie (kwon'tik), n. [< L. quantus, how great, how much (see quantity), + -ic.] In math., a rational integral homogeneous function of two or more variables. Quanties are classified according to their dimensions, as quadratic, cubic, quartic, quintic, etc., denoting quanties of the second, third, fourth, fifth, etc., degrees. They are further distinguished as binary, ternary, quaternary, etc., according as they contain two, three, four, etc., variables. The word was introduced by Cayley in 1854.—Order of a quantie, the degree of a quantie.—The equation of a quantie. See equation.

quantical (kwon'ti-käl), a. Relating to quanties.

quantification (kwon'ti-fi-kä'shon), n. [< NL. as if quantificatio(n-), < quantificare, quantify: see quantify.] 1. The act of attaching quantity to anything: as, the quantification of the predicate.—2. The act of determining the quantity.—Quantification of the predicate, the attaching of the signs of logical quantity, every and some, to the predicates of propositions. The resulting propositional forms, according to Hamilton, the protagonist of the opinion that this should be done in formal logic, are: All A is all B; any A is not any B; all A is some B; any A is not some B; some A is all B; some A is not any B; some A is some B; some A is not some B. But these forms include but one decidedly useful addition to the usual scheme (all A is all B), and are systematic only in appearance, as De Morgan has abundantly shown. The doctrine essentially implies that the copula should be considered as a sign of identity; the usual doctrine makes it a sign of inclusion. According to the most modern school of formal logicians, the question is not of great importance, but should be decided against the quantification of the predicate. Aristotle examined and rejected the quantification of the predicate, on the ground that Every A is every B can be true only if A and B are one individual.

The doctrine of the quantification of the predicate, set forth in 1827 by Mr. George Bentham, and again set forth under a numerical form by Professor De Morgan, is a doctrine supplementary to that of Aristotle.

H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 223.

quantify (kwon'ti-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. quantified, ppr. quantifying. [*< NL. quantificare, < L. quantus, how much, how many, + -ficare, < facere, make: see quantity and -fy.] To determine the quantity of; modify or determine with regard to quantity; mark with the sign of quantity: as, to quantify a syllable or a verse: more especially a term in logic.—Quantified proposition. See proposition.

quantitative (kwon'ti-tä-tiv), a. [= F. quantitatif = Pr. quantitativ = Sp. cuantitativo = Pg. It. quantitativo, < ML. quantitativus (Abelard), < L. quantita(t)-s, quantity: see quantity.] Relating or having regard to quantity or measurement.

If the thing may be greater or less, . . . then quantitative notions enter, and the science must be Mathematical in nature. Jecons, Pol. Econ., Int., p. 8.

Perhaps the best quantitative verses in our language . . . are to be found in Mother Goose, composed by nurses wholly by ear and beating time as they danced the baby on their knee. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 296.

The logic of probability is related to ordinary syllogistic as the quantitative to the qualitative branch of the same science. C. S. Peirce, Theory of Probable Inference.

Quantitative analysis, in chem. See analysis.—Quantitative atrophy. Same as simple atrophy.—Quantitative feet, meters. See accidental feet, under accidental.—Quantitative geometry. Same as metric geometry (which see, under geometry).—Quantitative logic, the doctrine of probability.

quantitatively (kwon'ti-tä-tiv-li), adv. In a quantitative manner; with regard to quantity.

quantitativeness (kwon'ti-tä-tiv-nes), n. The state or condition of being quantitative.

In Geology, in Biology, in Psychology, most of the previsions are qualitative only; and where they are quantitative their quantitativeness, never quite definite, is mostly very indefinite. H. Spencer, Study of Sociol., p. 45.

quantitative (kwon'ti-tiv), a. Same as quantitative. [Rare.]

Compounding and dividing bodies according to quantitative parts. Sir K. Digby, Man's Soul, iii.

quantitively (kwon'ti-tiv-li), adv. So as to be measured by quantity; quantitatively.

quantity (kwon'ti-ti), n.; pl. quantities (-tiz). [< ME. quantitee, quantite, < OF. quantite, F. quantité = Sp. cantidad = Pg. quantidade = It. quantità, < L. quantita(t)-s, relative greatness or extent (tr. Gr. ποσότης), < quantus, how much, how many, < quam, how, in what manner, < qui, who, = E. who: see who, what, how.] 1. The being so much in measure or extent; technically, the intrinsic mode by virtue of which a thing is more or less than another; a system of relationship by virtue of which one thing is said to be more or less than another; magnitude.

Thy zodiak of thin Astralable is shapen as a compass wich that containeth a large brede, as after the quantite of thin astralable. Chaucer, Astralable, I. 21.

Quantity and number differ only in thought (ratione) from that which has quantity and is numbered.

Descartes, Prin. of Philos. (tr. by Veitch), II. § 8.

The science of number is founded on the hypothesis of the distinctness of things: the science of quantity is founded on the totally different hypothesis of continuity. W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 337.

2. In the concrete, an object regarded as more or less; a quantum; any amount, magnitude, or aggregate, in a concrete sense: as, a quantity of water: sometimes erroneously used to denote that which should be enumerated rather than measured: as, a quantity of people. Any perfectly regular system of objects whose relations are definable in advance, and capable of construction in the imagination, forms a system of quantity capable of being dealt with by mathematical reasoning. The quantities of the mathematician, being constructed according to a definition laid down in advance, are imaginary, and in that sense abstract: but as being objects of the imagination, and not merely of the discursive reason, they are concrete. Mathematical quantities are either discrete (as whole numbers) or continuous. They may also be multiple, as vectors.

Their don rightfull Ingegnetes in every cause, bothe of riche and pore, smale and grete, afre the quantitee of the trespas that is mys don. Manderile, Travels, p. 287.

Forty thousand brothers

Could not, with all their quantity of love,

Make up my sun. Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 293.

There is a farre greater quantity of buildings in this [Exchange] then in ours. Coryat, Crudities, I. 212.

Where the ground is seen burning continually about the quantity of an acre. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 19.

Heat, considered with respect to its power of warming things and changing their state, is a quantity strictly capable of measurement, and not subject to any variations in quality or in kind. Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 57.

3. A large or considerable amount.

Warm antiscorbutical plants taken in quantities will occasion stinking breath. Arbutus, Alimenta, vi. 7, § 2.

4. A piece or part, especially a small portion; anything very little or diminutive.

Away, thou rag, thou quantity, thou remnant. Shak., T. of the S., iv. 3. 112.

5. Proportion; correspondent degree.

Things base and vile, holding no quantity,
Love can transmute to form and dignity.
Shak., M. N. D., I. 1. 232.

6. In anc. orthoëpy, pros., and metrics, the relative time occupied in uttering a vowel or a syllable; that characteristic of a vowel or a syllable by which it is distinguished as long or short; syllabic measure or time; prosodic length. In ancient Greek and Latin pronunciation a long vowel or syllable occupied nearly, or in deliberate enunciation fully, twice the time of a short vowel or syllable, and the grammarians accordingly assumed the average short vowel or syllable as the prosodic unit (mora), and taught that a long vowel or syllable was equal to two short ones. Some vowels or syllables varied in time between these two limits and were called common, admitting of metrical use as either longs or shorts. In certain situations (elision, ecclipsis) vowels were much shorter in pronunciation than the average short, and, although audible, were disregarded in metrical measurement. A syllable was long either by nature or by position (see long), a, 5 (a). In the English pronunciation of Latin and Greek, quantity in the proper sense is entirely disregarded, except in so far as the length of the penult affects the accent according to the Latin rule; and English writers use the phrase false quantity for a false accentuation. Thus, to pronounce rec-ti-gal rec-ti-gal is called a "false quantity," but to pronounce the a alike in pater and maier is not so designated.

All composed in a metre for Catullus,
All in quantity, careful of my motion.
Tennyson, Experiments, Heptasyllabica.

7. In logic, that respect in which universal and particular propositions differ. See proposition, and logical quantity, below.—8. In elect., the amount of electricity which passes through any section of a circuit in a unit of time; more exactly termed the strength of the current. A battery is arranged for quantity when the positive poles of all the cells are connected and all the negative poles are connected, so that the current is the maximum when the external resistance is small.—Absolute quantity, quantity considered as belonging to an object in itself, without reference to any other.—Auxiliary quantity. See auxiliary.—Broken quantity, discrete quantity.—Categorical quantity, that accident which has parts outside of one another; the quantity of which Aristotle treats in his book of the Categories.—Categories of quantity. See category, 1.—Commensurable quantities, quantities having a common measure.—Complex quantity, a multiple quantity, or one which requires two or more numbers to state it; especially, an imaginary quantity of the form $A + Bx$, where $x = -1$.—Compound quantity. See compound.—Constant quantities, in math., a quantity which remains invariably the same while others increase or decrease; a quantity which, though it may be indeterminate, is not studied in reference to its progressive variation.—Continuous or continued quantity, a system of concatenated quantity which includes the limit of every convergent series of quantities it contains. See continuity, 2.—Corporeal quantity, quantity of space or spatial extension, as length, area, volume, etc.—Definite quantity, in logic, the quantification of a proposition in a more definite way than by the distinction of "some" and "all." There are various systems of definite quantity.—Dimensive quantity. Same as corporeal quantity.—Discrete quantity, quantity proceeding by discrete steps, belonging to a system such that its quantities are susceptible of being connected, one to one, with the whole or a part of the series of whole numbers. The system of ordinal numbers is the most familiar example of discrete quantity; another example is the system of quantities such that no one is a real multiple of another.—Dual quantity, a system of quantity having only two values in any one direction, as in the Boolean algebra.—Elliptic quantity, a system of quantity (as the quantity of angles) in which there are no real infinite distances, but in which any quantity on being sufficiently increased returns into itself: so called because the ellipse has no real point at infinity.—Extensive quantity. See extensive.—External or extrinsic quantity. See external.—Flowing quantity. See flowing.—Heterogeneous quantities. See heterogeneous.—Hyperbolic quantity, a system of quantity containing such quantities that there are, in some directions at least, two different absolute limits, generally $+\infty$ and $-\infty$. Thus, if it were the property of a yardstick to shorten on receding from a fixed center, this might happen according to such a law that no finite number of layings down of the yardstick could carry the measurement beyond two limits in every, or in some, directions. Points lying beyond these, if such there were, would be at imaginary distances. Such measurement would make a system of hyperbolic quantity.—Imaginary quantity. See imaginary.—Impossible quantity. Same as imaginary quantity.—Improper quantity. Same as improper quantity. Reid defines improper quantity as that which cannot be measured by its own kind—that is, everything not extension, duration, number, nor proportion.—Incommensurable quantities. See incommensurable.—Indeterminate quantity. See indeterminate.—Inference of transposed quantity. See inference.—Infinite quantity, a quantity infinitely greater than every measurable quantity. See infinite.—Infinitesimal quantity, a quantity infinitely less than every measurable quantity. See infinitesimal, n.—Intensive quantity. See intensive.

Internal quantity. See internal.—Intrinsic quantity, the older name of intensive quantity.—Irrational quantity, a quantity not expressible by any whole number or fraction, but usually by means of a square or higher root of a rational quantity; in Euclid, however, by an irrational quantity is meant one incommensurable with the unit of the same kind. In this phrase, irrational (tr. Gr. ἀλογος) means 'inexpressible'; it does not mean 'absurd,' though these quantities are called surds.—Like quantities, quantities one of which multiplied by a scalar quantity gives the other.—Limited quantity, a system of quantities all finite, and having an absolute maximum and minimum in every direction.—Logical quantity, that character by virtue of which one term contains or is contained by another, and that in three senses: (a) Quantity of extension, or logical breadth, a relative character of a term such that when it is in excess the term is predicable of all the subjects of which another is predicable, and of more besides; or a relative character of a concept such that when it is in excess the concept is applicable in all the cases in which another is applicable. (b) Quantity of comprehension or intension, or logical depth, a relative character of a term such that when it is in excess the term has all the predicates of another term, and more besides; or a relative character of a proposition such that when it is in excess the proposition is followed by all the consequents of another proposition, and more besides. (c) Quantity of science (Aquinas) or of information, a relative character of a concept such that when it is in excess it has all the subjects and predicates of another concept, and more besides, owing to its being in a mind which has more knowledge. Logical quantity is to be distinguished from the quantity of a proposition.—Mathematical quantities. See mathematical.—Measurable quantity, a system of quantities every one of which can be stated to any desired degree of approximation by the sums of numerical multiples and submultiples of a finite number of units; a system of quantities embracing only finite quantities together with certain isolated infinities.—Measure of a quantity. See measure.—Multiple quantity, a quantity which can be exactly expressed only by means of two or more numbers, as a geographical position.—Natural quantity, quantity in a sense more concrete than the mathematical; quantity as joined to sensible matter, as when we speak of two different but equal quantities of water or lead.—Negative quantity, a fictitious quantity in mathematics, in most cases inconceivable, but never involving any logical contradiction in itself, supposed to belong to a line of quantity continuing the line of ordinary or positive quantity below zero for an infinite distance. In many cases a negative quantity has an interpretation: thus, the negative of a dollar owned is a dollar owed, the negative of a temperature above zero is the same degree of temperature below zero, etc.—Numerical quantity, number.—Parabolic quantity, a quantity belonging to such a system of quantity that on increasing through infinity it immediately reappears on the negative side of zero. Such are Cartesian coordinates in ordinary geometry.—Permanent quantity. See permanent.—Physical quantity, any character in nature susceptible of more or less, such as velocity, atomic weight, elasticity, heat, electric strength of current, etc.—Positive quantity. See positive.—Predicamental quantity. See predicamental.—Proper quantity. Same as extensive quantity.—Propositional quantity, the quantity of a proposition in logic. See logical quantity, above.—Protensive quantity, duration in time.—Quantity of action, the line-integral of the momentum.—Quantity of an eclipse. See eclipse.—Quantity of curvature, the reciprocal of the radius of curvature.—Quantity of electricity, in electrodynamics, the amount of electricity upon a charged body. It depends upon the capacity of the body, which, in the case of a sphere, is proportional to the radius (see capacity), and upon the potential of the electricity. It is numerically equal to the product of these two factors. In electrodynamics it is measured (in coulombs) by the amount of electricity furnished by a current in one second.—Quantity of estate, in law, the time during which the right of enjoyment of the property in question is to continue.—Quantity of heat. See heat, 2.—Quantity of magnetism, the strength of a magnetic pole; the force it exerts upon an equal pole at the unit distance.—Quantity of matter, the mass, as measured by weighing in a balance.—Quantity of motion. See motion.—Quesitive quantity, quantity expressed by an interrogative numeral.—Radical quantities. See radical.—Rational quantity, a quantity expressible by a whole number or fraction multiplied by the unit of the same kind; in Euclid, a commensurable quantity.—Real quantity, that kind of quantity which extends from zero to infinity, and from infinity through the whole series of negative values to zero again.—Reciprocal of a quantity. See reciprocal.—Reciprocal quantities. See reciprocal.—Scalar quantity, the ratio between two quantities of the same kind; a real number. This is the definition of Hamilton, but subsequent writers sometimes include imaginaries among scalars.—Semi-infinite quantity, a system of quantity which is limited at one end and extends to infinity in the other.—Similar quantities, quantities of the same kind whose ratios are numbers.—Sophistic quantity, an imaginary quantity.—Superinfinite quantity, a system of quantity which extends through infinity into a new region. Hyperbolic quantity is a special kind of superinfinite quantity in which there are only two regions.—Synkategorematic quantity, quantity as expressed by a synkategorematic word, or generally by any word not a noun.—Terminal quantity, in logic, the quantity of a term, as opposed to the quantity of a proposition.—Transcendental quantity, intensive quantity as opposed to predicamental quantity: so called because different from the quantity treated by Aristotle under the category of quantity.—Transposed quantity, logical quantity transposed from one subject in the premise to another in the conclusion.—Unidimensional quantity, a system of quantities all of the same kind, otherwise called simple quantity.—Unlike quantities, quantities which have not a numerical ratio between them.—Unlimited quantity, a system of quantities such that, any two A and B being given, a third C exists such that B lies between A and C; a system of quantity which has no absolute maximum nor minimum in any direction.—Unreal quantity, an imaginary quantity.—Variable quantity, a quantity whose progressive changes are under consideration.—Vec- tor quantity, the quantity which belongs to a right line considered as having direction as well as length, but which is equal for all parallel lines of equal length: any quantity capable of representation by a directed right line, without considering its position in space; a quantity whose square is a negative scalar.—Virtual quantity. Same as intensive quantity.

quantity-culture (kwon'ti-ti-kul'tūr), n. See the quotation.

Quantity-culture . . . means a culture, whether pure or not, where a great quantity or bulk of bacteria are growing. Hueppe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 5.

quantity-fuse (kwon'ti-ti-fūz), n. See fuse, 2.

quantivalence (kwon-tiv'a-lens), n. [quantivalence (t) + -ce.] In chem., the combining power or value of an atom as compared with that of the hydrogen atom, which is taken as the unit of measure: same as valence. Also called atomicity.

quantivalency (kwon-tiv'a-len-si), n. [As quantivalence (see -cy).] Same as quantivalence.

quantivalent (kwon-tiv'a-lent), a. [L. quantus, how much, how many (see quantity), + valen (t)-s, ppr. of valere, be strong; see valiant.] Chemically equivalent; having the same saturating or combining power.—Quantivalent ratio. Same as oxygen ratio (which see, under ratio).

quantoid (kwon'toid), n. [As quant (ic) + -oid.] The left-hand side of a linear differential equation whereof the right-hand side is zero.

quantong, n. Same as quantang.

quantum (kwon'tum), n.; pl. quanta (-tū). [L., neut. sing. of quantus, how much, how many; see quantity.] 1. That which has quantity; a concrete quantity.

The objects of outer sense are all quanta, in so far as they occupy space, and so also are the objects of inner sense, in so far as they occupy time.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 411.

2. A prescribed, proper, or sufficient amount.

In judging the quantum of the church's portion, the world thinks every thing too much.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 78.

Quantum meruit, as much as one has merited or deserved; the measure of recovery in law for services the price of which was not fixed by contract.—Quantum sufficit, as much as is sufficient. Abbreviated q. s., or quant. suff.—Quantum valebat, as much as it was worth; the measure of recovery in law for goods sold when no price was fixed by the contract.

quap¹, quop¹ (kwop), v. i. [< ME. quappen = Norw. kreppa (pret. krapp, kropp), shake, quake, rock; akin to quare, quaver. Hence later quab, quob¹, q. v.] Same as quab¹. [Prov. Eng.] quap², n. Same as quab², 2.

Gō, gōi (It.), a fish called a quap [a quap-fish, ed. 1611], which is poison to man, and man to him. Florio, 1598.

quaquaversal (kwā-kwā-vēr'sal), a. [< NL. quaquaversus, < L. quaquā, wheresoever, abl. fem. sing. of quisquis, whoever, whatever (< quis, who, + quis, who), + versus, pp. of vertere, turn, incline (see verse), + -al.] Inclined outward in all directions from a central point or area: used chiefly in geology, as in the phrase quaquaversal dip, a dipping in all directions from a central area.

quaquaversally (kwā-kwā-vēr'sal-i), adv. In a quaquaversal manner; in all directions from a central point or area.

The outer walls are stony ridges rising from 470 to 610 feet above sea-level, and declining quaquaversally to the fertile plateau which, averaging 400 feet high, forms the body of the island. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 695.

quaquaversus (kwā-kwā-vēr'sus), a. Same as quaquaversal. Brewster, Phil. Trans., 1852, p. 472.

quaquineri, n. A form of quaviver.

There is a little fish in the form of a scorpion, and of the size of the fish quaquiner (tr. L. aranei piscis). N. Bailey, tr. of Erasmus's Colloq., p. 393. (Darvies.)

quar¹, n. [< ME. quar, quarre, etc.: see quarry, 1.] An obsolete form of quarry, 2.

When temples lye like batter'd quarrs,
Rich in their ruin'd sepulchers.

P. Fletcher, Poems, p. 136. (Hallivell.)

A chrysolite, a gem, the very agate
Of state and policy, cut from the quar
Of Machiavel. B. Jonson, Magnetic Lady, I. 1.

The whole cille [Paris], together with the suburbs, is situate upon a quarre of free stone.

Corjay, Crudities, I. 27.

quar¹, v. t. [< quar¹, n.] To block up.

But as a miller, having ground his grist,
Lets down the flood-gates with a speedy fall,
And quarring up the passage therewithal.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals.

quar², n. An obsolete form of quarry, 3.

When the Falcon (stooping thunder-like)
With sudden souse her [a duck] to the ground shall strike,
And, with the stroak, make on the sense-less ground
The gut-less Quar once, twice, or thrice rebound.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Lawe.

quar³ (kwär), v. i. [Origin uncertain.] To coagulate: said of milk in the female breast. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

[Garden mint] is very good to be applied to the breasts that are stretched forth and swollen and full of milke, for it slaketh and softeneth the same, and keepeth the mylke from quarring and crudding in the breast.
Lyte, Dodoens, p. 246 (quoted in Cath. Ang., p. 84).

quarantinable (kwor'an-tên-a-bl), a. [quarantine + -able.] Admitting of quarantine; amenable to or controlled by quarantine.

quarantine (kwor'an-tên), n. [Formerly also quarantain, quarantaine, also carantaine (Lent); = D. quarantaine, karantaine = G. quarantäne = Sw. karantän = Dan. karantäne (< F.) = Sp. cuarentena = Pg. quarentena = Pr. quarantena, carantena, < OF. quarantaine, quarentaine, quarantine, F. quarantaine = Turk. karantina, < It. quarantina, quarentina, quarantana, quarentana, a number of forty, a period of forty days, esp. such a period of forty days, more or less, for the detention and observation of goods and persons suspected of infection, < ML. quarantena, quarentena (after Rom.), a period of forty days, Lent, quarantine, also a measure of forty rods (see quarentene), < L. quadraginta (> It. quaranta = F. quarante), forty, = E. forty: see forty.] 1. A period of forty days. Specifically—(a) The season of Lent. (b) In law, a period of forty days during which the widow of a man dying seized of land at common law may remain in her husband's chief mansion-house, and during which time her dower is to be assigned. (c) See def. 2.

2. A term, originally of forty days, but now of varying length according to the exigencies of the case, during which a ship arriving in port and known or suspected to be infected with a malignant contagious disease is obliged to forbear all intercourse with the place where she arrives. The United States first adopted a quarantine law in February, 1799. This law required federal officers to assist in executing State or municipal quarantine regulations. On April 29th, 1878, a national quarantine law was enacted, authorizing the establishment in certain contingencies of national quarantines.

To perform their quarantine (for thirty days, as Sir Rd. Browne expressed it in the order of the Council, contrary to the import of the word, though in the general acceptance it signifies now the thing, not the time spent in doing it).
Pepys, Diary, Nov. 26, 1663.

We came into the port of Argostoli on the twenty-second, and went to the town; I desired to be ashore as one performing quarantine.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 179.

3. The enforced isolation of individuals and certain objects coming, whether by sea or by land, from a place where dangerous communicable disease is presumably or actually present, with a view to limiting the spread of the malady. Quain.—4. Hence, by extension: (a) The isolation of any person suffering or convalescing from acute contagious disease. [Colloq.] (b) The isolation of a dwelling or of a town or district in which a contagious disease exists.

It was . . . a relief when neighbours no longer considered the house in quarantine [after typhus].
George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxvii.

5. A place or station where quarantine is enforced.

He happened to mention that he had been three years in Quarantine, keeping watch over infected travellers.
B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 26.

6. The restriction within limits awarded to naval cadets as a punishment. [U.S.]—Quarantine flag, a yellow flag displayed by a ship, to indicate that she has been placed in quarantine or that there is contagious disease on board.—Quarantine of observation. See the quotation.

A quarantine of observation, which is usually for six or three days, and is imposed on vessels with clean bills, may be performed at any port.
Encyc. Brit., XX. 154.

Shot-gun quarantine, forcible quarantine not duly authorized by law. [U.S.]

quarantine (kwor'an-tên), v. t.; and pp. quarantined, ppr. quarantining. [quarantine, n.] 1. To put under quarantine, in any sense of that word.—2. Figuratively, to isolate, as by authority.

The business of these [ministers] is with human nature, and from exactly that are they quarantined for years.
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 13.

quaret, n. An obsolete form of quirel.
quare impedit (kwä'rë im'pë-dit). [So called from the L. words quare impedit, contained in the writ: L. quare, why (orig. two words, quä rë, for what cause: quä, abl. fem. of quis, who, what; rë, abl. of res, thing, cause); impedit, 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. of impedire, hinder, impede: see impede.] In Eng. law, the writ (requiring defendant to show why he hindered plaintiff) used to try a right of presentation to a benefice.

quarell¹, n. See quarrell¹, quarrell², quarrell³.
quarelett¹, n. An obsolete form of quarrellet.
quarellet¹, n. An obsolete form of quarrell¹.

quaretenet¹, n. [ML. quarentena (sc. terræ), a furlong, an area of forty rods: see quarantine.] A square furlong. Pearson, Historical Maps of Eng., p. 51.

quarert¹, n. Same as quarry².

quariert¹, n. See quarrier².

quark (kwärk), n. [Imitative; cf. quack.] Same as quack.

quarl¹ (kwärl), v. A dialectal form of quarrell¹.
quarl² (kwärl), n. [Prob. a contr. form of quarrel² (applied, as square is often applied, to an object of different shape).] In brickmaking, a piece of fire-clay in the shape of a segment of a circle or similar form: it is used in constructing arches for melting-pots, covers for retorts, and the like.

The erection of nine six-ton pots requires 15,000 common bricks, 10,000 fire-bricks, 160 feet of quarls, so fire-clay blocks, and 5 tons of fire-clay. Ure, Dict., III. 67.

The cover [of a retort] is usually formed of segments of stoneware, or fireclay quarls, bound together with iron.
Spence Encyc. Manuf., I. 156.

quarl³ (kwärl), n. [Origin obscure.] A medusa or jellyfish.

Some on the stony star fish ride, . . .
And some on the jellied quarl, that flings
At once a thousand streamy stings.
J. R. Drake, Culprit Fay, st. 13.

quar-mant¹, n. A quarryman.

The sturdy Quar-man with steel-headed Cones

And massive sledges slenteth out the stones.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

quarof¹, adv. An obsolete dialectal form of whereof. Halliwel.

quar-pitt¹, n. A stone-pit; a quarry. Whalley. [West of Eng.]

quarr¹, n. and v. See quarl¹.

quarrel¹, n. A Middle English form of quarry¹.

quarrel¹ (kwor'el), n. [Early mod. E. also quarrel, querel; < ME. quarrel, quarrell, quarelle, querel, querle, < OF. querelle, F. querelle = Pr. querella, querella = Sp. querella = Pg. querela = It. querela, < L. querela, a complaining, a complaint, < queri, pp. questus, complain, lament. Cf. querent¹, querimony, querulous, etc., from the same source.] 1. A complaint; a lament; lamentation.

Whennes comyn elles alle thyse foreyne Complayntes or querelles of pletynge? Chaucer, Boethius, iii. prose 3.

Thou lyf, thou luste, thou mannis hele,
Biholde my cause and my querle!

Gower, MS. Soc. Antiq. 134, l. 39. (Halliwel.)

As his frendes wepte for hym lyenge on the byre they sayd with swete and deuoute querelles, which suffred her deuoute seruant to deye without confession and penaunce.

Golden Legend, quoted in Prompt. Parv., p. 419.

If I shulde here answer to all these querels particularly and as the worthynesse of the thyng requireth, I myght fynde matter sufficient to make a volume of iuste quantite, and perhappes be tedious to summe.

R. Eden (First Books on America, ed. Arber, p. 58).

2. An accusation; in law, a complaint; an action, real or personal.

The wars were scarce begun but he, in fear

Of quarrels gainst his life, fled from his country.

Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, l. 1.

3. Cause, occasion, or motive of complaint, objection, dispute, contention, or debate; the basis or ground of being at variance with another; hence, the cause or side of a certain party at variance with another.

My quarrell is growndid vpon right,

Which geueth me corage for to fight.

Generydes (E. E. T. S.), I. 3210.

Methinks I could not die anywhere so contented as in the King's company; his cause being just and his quarrel honourable.

Shak., Hen. V., iv. l. 133.

What is your quarrel to "shallops"?

Gray, Letters, I. 301.

4. Cause in general; reason; plea; ground.

I vnderstand that Mastre Fytzwater hathe a syster, a mayd, to marry; . . . ye may telle hym, synse he wyll haue my serveyce, . . . syche a bargayn myght be mad; . . . for then he shold be swer that I shold not be flytting, and I had syche a quarrell to kepe me at home.

Paston Letters, III. 164.

Wives are young men's mistresses, companions for middle age, and old men's nurses, so as a man may have a quarrel to marry when he will.

Bacon, Marriage and Single Life (ed. 1887).

5. Altercation; an altercation; an angry dispute; a wrangle; a brawl.

If I can fasten but one cup upon him,

With that which he hath drunk to night already,

He'll be as full of quarrel and offence

As my young mistress' dog. Shak., Othello, II. 3. 52.

If upon a sudden quarrel two persons fight, and one of them kills the other, this is manslaughter.

Blackstone, Com., IV. xiv.

6. A breach of friendship or concord; open variance between parties; a feud.

The Persian Ambassador had had a quarrel with the court.

Greville, Memoirs, June 24, 1819.

7. A quarreler. [Rare.]

Though 't [pompe] be temporal,

Yet if that quarrel, fortune, do diuorce

It from the bearer, 'tis a sufferance panging.

Shak., Hen. VIII., II. 3. 14.

Double quarrel, eccles., a complaint of a clerk to the archbishop against an inferior ordinary, for delay of justice.

No double quarrel shall hereafter be granted out of any of the archbishop's courts at the suit of any minister who-soever, except he shall first take his personal oath that the said eight and twenty days at the least are expired, etc.
4th Canon of the Church of England (1603).

To pick a quarrel. See pick.—To take up a quarrel, to compose or adjust a quarrel; settle a dispute.

I knew when seven Justices could not take up a quarrel, but when the parties were met themselves, one of them thought but of an If, . . . and they shook hands.

Shak., As you Like it, v. 4. 104.

= Syn. 5 and 6. Quarrel, Altercation, Affray, Fray, Misce, Brail, Broil, Scuffle, Wrangle, Spabble, Feud. A quarrel is a matter of ill feeling and hard words in view of supposed wrong: it stops just short of blows; any use beyond this is now figurative. Altercation is the spoken part of a quarrel, the parties speaking alternately. An altercation is thus a quarrelsome dispute between two persons or two sides. Affray and fray express a quarrel that has come to blows in a public place; they are often used of the struggles of war, implying personal activity. Misce emphasizes the confusion in which those engaged in an affray or struggle are mingled. Brail emphasizes the unbecoming character and noisiness of the quarrel; while broil adds the idea of entanglement, perhaps with several: two are enough for a brail; at least three are needed for a broil; as, a brail with a neighbor; a neighborhood broil. A scuffle is, in this connection, a confused or undignified struggle, at close quarters, between two, to throw each other down, or a similar struggle of many. A wrangle is a severe, unreasoning, and noisy, perhaps confused, altercation. A spabble is a petty wrangle, but is even less dignified or irrational. A feud is a deeply rooted animosity between two acts of kindred, two parties, or possibly two persons. See animosity.

Glass-making, p. 92.

2†. A bolt or arrow with a square head: same as *quarrel*², 2.

quarry² (kwor'i), n.; pl. quarries (-iz). [*< ME. quarrye, also quar, altered, by confusion with quarry*¹, from earlier *quarrer, quarrere, quarer, quare, < OF. quarryere, F. carrière, < ML. quadraria, a quarry, a place where stones are cut or squared (suggested by L. quadratarius, a stone-cutter, lit. 'a squarer': see quarryer*¹), < L. quadratus, square, pp. of quadrare, make square, square: see quarry¹, quadrare.] A place, cavern, or pit where stones are dug from the earth, or separated, as by blasting with gunpowder, from a large mass of rock. The word mine is generally applied to the excavations from which metals, metalliferous ores, and coal are taken; from quarries are taken all the various materials used for building, as marble, freestone, slate, lime, cement, rock, etc. A quarry is usually open to the day; a mine is generally covered, communicating with the surface by one or more shafts. See *mine*².

Thet sale, a litel hem bi-side, a semliche quarriere, Vnder an heig heil, al holwe newe diked.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 2232.

quarry² (kwor'i), v. t.; pret. and pp. quarried, ppr. quarrying. [*< quarry*², n.] To dig or take from a quarry: as, to quarry marble.

Part of the valley, if not the whole of it, has been formed by quarrying away the crags of marble and conglomerate limestone.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 89.

Scarped cliff and quarried stone.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, IV.

quarry³ (kwor'i), n. [< ME. querre, kyrrre, < OF. cuiree, curee, F. curée, quarry, orig. the refuse parts of an animal slain, given to the hounds in its skin, < cuir, skin, hide, < L. corium, hide: see corium.] 1†. The refuse parts of an animal slain in the chase, given in the skin to the hounds: as, to make the quarry (to open and skin the animal slain, and give the refuse to the hounds).

And after, whenne the hert is splayed and ded, he undoeth hym, and maketh his kyrrre, and enquyrrerth or rewardeth his houndes, and so he hath gret likynge.

MS. Bodl. 546. (Hallivell).

Then feraly thay flocked in folk at the laste, & quykly of the quelled dere a quarry they maked.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), I. 1524.

2. A beast of the chase when pursued or slain; any creature hunted by men or by beasts or birds of prey, especially after it has been killed.

I watch'd his eye,
And saw how falcon-like it tower'd, and flew Upon the wealthy quarry.

Fletcher (and another), False One, IV. 1.

As a falcon from the rocky height,
Her quarry seen, impetuous at the sight,
Forth-springing instant, darts herself from high,
Shoots on the wing, and skims along the sky.

Pope, Iliad, xiii. 92.

3. Hunted or slaughtered game, or any object of eager pursuit.

And let me use my sword, I'd make a quarry
With thousands of these quarter'd slaves.

Shak., Cor., I. 1. 202.

quarry^{3†} (kwor'i), v. [*< quarry*³, n.] I. intrans. To prey, as a vulture or harpy.

Like the vulture that is day and night quarrying upon Prometheus's liver.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

II. trans. To provide with prey.

Now I am bravely quarried. Beau. and Fl.

A soldier of renown, and the first provost
That ever let our Roman eagles fly
On swarthy Egypt, quarried with her spolia.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

quarry-faced (kwor'i-fāst), a. Rough-faced, as taken from the quarry: noting a type of building-stone and masonry built of such stone.

quarry-hawk (kwor'i-hāk),

Quarry-faced or Rock-faced Masonry.

n. An old entered and reclaimed hawk. Hal-livell.

quarrying-machine (kwor'i-ing-ma-shēn'), n. A form of gang-drill for cutting channels in native rock; a rock-drill. Such machines are usually combined in construction with the motor which operates them, and are placed on a railway-track for convenience in moving them along the surface of the stone to be cut.

quarryman (kwor'i-mān), n.; pl. quarrymen (-men). [< quarry² + man.] A man who is occupied in quarrying stones.

quarry-slave (kwor'i-slāv), n. A slave compelled to work in a quarry.

Thou go not, like the quarry-slave at night, Scourged to his dungeon. Bryant, Thanatopsis.

quarry-water (kwor'i-wā-tēr), n. The water which is mechanically held between the particles of a newly quarried rock, and which gradually disappears by evaporation when this is kept from exposure to the weather. A part of this water only disappears after the rock has been heated to the boiling-point, and this is usually called hygroscopic moisture. The quantity of quarry-water held by rocks varies greatly in amount, according to their composition and texture. Some rocks which are so soft that they can be cut with a saw or chisel when freshly quarried become much harder after exposure to the air for a few weeks.

The longer the stone [limestone] has been exposed to the air, the less fuel will be consumed in driving off its inherent moisture, or quarry-water.

Spens' Encyc. Manuf., I. 619.

quart¹ (kwärt), n. [*< ME. quartē, < OF. quartē, F. quartē, f., < L. quarta (sc. pars), a fourth part; cf. OF. quart, F. quart, m., = Sp. cuarto = Pg. quarto = It. quarto, fourth, a fourth part, quarter; < L. quartus, fourth (= E. fourth), appar. for quartus, with ordinal (superl.) formative -tus (E. -th), < quattuor = E. four: see four, and compare quadrate, quarter¹, etc.] 1. A fourth part or division; a quarter.

And Camber did possess the Western quart.
Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 14.

2. A unit of measure, the fourth part of a gallon; also, a vessel of that capacity. Every gallon of liquid measure has a quart, and in the United States there is a quart of dry measure, although the use of the gallon of that measure is confined to Great Britain. In England the peck, or fourth part of a bushel, is sometimes called a quart.

1 United States liquid quart = 0.9468 liter.
1 United States dry quart = 1.1017 liters.
1 Imperial quart = 1.1359 liters.
1 Scotch quart = 3.308 liters.

Before the adoption of the metric system, there were measures of capacity corresponding to the quart in almost every part of Europe.

Go fetch me a quart of sack; put a toast in 't.
Shak., M. W. of W., III. 5. 3.

Yet would you . . . rail upon the hostess, . . .
Because she brought stone jugs and no seal'd quarts.
Shak., T. of the S., Ind., II. 89.

Glass bottles of all qualities I buy at three for a half-penny. . . but very seldom indeed 2d., unless it's something very prime and big like the old quarts.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 122.

3. In music, the interval of a fourth: prefixed to the name of an instrument, it denotes one pitched a fourth lower or a fourth higher than the ordinary instrument.

A succession of parallel quarts, quints, and octaves, which would be intolerable to modern ears.

The Academy, Jan. 18, 1890, p. 51.

4. In Gloucestershire and Leicestershire, England, three pounds of butter; in the Isle of Man, seven pounds—that is, the fourth part of a quarter.—5. A Welsh measure of length or surface; a pole of 34 to 44 yards.

quart² (kärt), n. [< F. quartē, a sequence of four cards at piquet, also a position in fencing; particular uses of quartē, a fourth: see quart¹.] 1. In card-playing, a sequence of four cards. A quart major is a sequence of the highest four cards in any suit.

If the elder hand has quart major and two other Aces, the odds are only 5 to 4 against his taking in either the Ten to his quart, or another Ace.

The American Hoyle, p. 136.

2. One of the eight thrusts and parries in fencing. A thrust in quart is a thrust, with the nails upward, at the upper breast, which is given direct from the ordinary position taken by two fencers when they engage, the left of their foils touching. A parry in quart guards this blow. It is produced by carrying the hand a few inches to the left without lowering hand or point.—Quart and tierce, practice between fencers, one thrusting in quart and terce (see terce) alternately, the other parrying in the same positions. It is confounded with tier au mur (fencing at the wall), which is simply practice for the legs, hand, and eyes against a stationary mark, usually a plastron hung on the wall.

The assassin stab of time was parried by the quart and terce of art.

How subtle at terce and quart of mind with mind!
Tennyson, In Memoriam, W. G. Ward.

quartation (kwär-tā-shon), n. [< L. quartus, fourth (see quart¹), + -ation.] The parting of gold and silver by the use of nitric acid. It is so called because an alloy consisting of more than one part of gold to three parts of silver is very little affected by the acid; hence it is necessary, in the case of alloys very rich in gold, to fuse them with so much additional silver that the gold shall form not more than a fourth of the whole.

In that operation that refiners call quartation, which they employ to purify gold, three parts of silver are so exquisitely mingled by fusion with a fourth part of gold (whence the operation is denominated) that the resulting mass acquires several new qualities by virtue of the composition.

Boyle, Works, I. 504.

quart d'écu (kür dā-kü'), [F.] An old French coin: same as cardeu.

Sir, for a quart-d'écu he will sell the fee-simple of his salvation.

4. In her., the marshaling or disposal of various escutcheons in one, in order to denote the several alliances of one family with the heiresses of others. When more than three other escutcheons are quartered with that of the family, the arms are still said to be quartered, however many compartments the shield may be divided into. The name is also given to the several different coats marshaled and placed together in one escutcheon. See quarterly.

5. In carp., a series of small vertical timber posts, rarely exceeding 4 by 3 inches, used to form a partition for the separation or boundary of apartments. They are usually placed about twelve inches apart, and are lathed and plastered in interiors, but if used for exteriors they are generally boarded. Gurll.

6. In gun., the position or placing of a piece of ordnance when it is so traversed that it will shoot on the same line, or on the same point of the compass, as that on which the ship's quarter has its bearing.—7. In mech., the adjustment of cranks on a single shaft at an angle of 90° with each other; also, the boring of holes for wrist-pins in locomotive driving-wheels at right angles with each other. E. H. Knight.

quartering (kwâr'tér-ing), p. a. [Ppr. of quarter, v.] 1. Naut.: (a) Sailing large but not before the wind. Totten. (b) Being on the quarter, or between the line of the keel and the beam, abaft the latter: as, a quartering wind. Dana.—2. In archery, making an acute angle with the range: said of the wind.

quartering-belt (kwâr'tér-ing-belt), n. Same as quarter-turn belt (which see, under belt).

quartering-block (kwâr'tér-ing-blok), n. A block on which the body of a person condemned to be quartered was cut in pieces. Macaulay.

quartering-hammer (kwâr'tér-ing-ham'ér), n. A steel hammer used to block out masses of flint for flaking.

quartering-machine (kwâr'tér-ing-mä-shén'), n. A machine for boring the wrist-pin holes of driving-wheels accurately at a distance apart of 90°.

quarter-iron (kwâr'tér-i'érn), n. Naut., a boom-iron on the quarter of a lower yard.

quarterland (kwâr'tér-land), n. A small territorial division or estate in the Isle of Man, forming a division of a treen.

quarter-light (kwâr'tér-lit), n. In a carriage, a window in the side of the body, as distinguished from the windows in the doors. Car-Builders Dict.

quarter-line (kwâr'tér-lin), n. 1. The position of ships of a column ranged in a line when one is four points forward or abaft another's beam. Also called bow-and-quarter line.—2. An additional line extending to the under side of the bag of a seine. As the bag approaches the shore, this line is from time to time drawn upon to relieve the strain upon the wings.

quarter-look (kwâr'tér-lük), n. A side look. B. Jonson.

quarterly (kwâr'tér-li), a. and n. [< quarter + -ly.] I. a. 1. Containing or consisting of a fourth part.

The moon makes four quarterly seasons within her little year or month of consecration. Holder, On Time.

2. Recurring at the end of every quarter of the year: as, quarterly payments of rent; a quarterly visitation or examination.—Quarterly conference. See conference, 2 (c) (2).

II. n.; pl. quarterlies (-liz). A publication or literary periodical issued once every three months.

So much of our reviewing is done in newspapers and critical notes in magazines and quarterlies that this sort of criticism nearly engrosses the name. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 54.

quarterly (kwâr'tér-li), adv. [< quarterly, a.] 1. In quarters; by quarters.

They tore in peeces quarterly
The corps which they had slain.
Gascoigne, Philomene (Steele Glas, etc., ed. Arber, p. 107).

2. Once in a quarter of a year: as, the returns are made quarterly.—3. In her.: (a) Arranged according to the four quarters of the shield.

(b) Arranged according to quartering, even when more than four divisions exist: as, he bears quarterly of twelve. Compare quartering, 4.—Quarterly in equerre, in her., divided into four parts by broken lines, producing an effect similar to gironny.—Quarterly in saltier, in her., same as per saltier: said of the field. See saltier.—Quarterly pierced, in her., quartered.—Quarterly quartered, in her., divided along the lines which separate the field quarterly: said of any bearing in the field.

Quarterly in Equerre.

quarterman (kwâr'tér-man), n.; pl. quarter-men (-men). An officer of a subdivision of a navy-yard working force. [U. S.]

quartermaster (kwâr'tér-mäs'tér), n. [= D. kvartermästar = G. quartiermeister = Sw. kvartermästare = Dan. kvartermester; as quarter + master.] 1. Milit., a regimental staff-officer, of the relative rank of lieutenant, whose duties are to superintend the assignment of quarters and the distribution of clothing, fuel, and other supplies, to have charge of the barracks, tents, etc., of a regiment, and to keep the regimental stores on the march: he directs the marking out of camp. In the United States army the quartermaster is appointed by the colonel of the regiment, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. In the British service the quartermaster is generally taken from the ranks, and after thirty years' service, including ten as an officer, he may retire with the honorary rank of captain. Farrow, Mil. Encyc.

2. Naut., a petty officer who has charge of the steering of the ship, the signals and soundings, and the running lights, leads, colors, log, compasses, etc., as an assistant to the navigator. Quartermasters keep regular watch during the whole time a ship is in commission, and are selected from the steadiest and most trustworthy seamen. On mail steamers the quartermasters steer and keep the flags and running lights in order.—Quartermaster's department, the staff department of the United States army which provides the quarters and transportation of the army, purchases stores, transports army supplies, and furnishes clothing, camp and garrison equipage, horses for the artillery and cavalry, straw, fuel, forage, and stationery. It disburses the appropriations for the incidental expenses of the army, such as the pursuit and capture of deserters, the burial of officers and soldiers, the extra-duty pay of soldiers, the purchase of veterinary medicines and stores, the hiring of escorts, couriers, guides, spies, and interpreters; and it has charge of the support and maintenance of the national cemeteries. Signal or chief quartermaster, in the United States navy, a petty officer who has charge of all the apparatus of navigation, as well as the flags, signals, and lights.

quartermaster-general (kwâr'tér-mäs'tér-jen'é-ral), n. Milit., in the British service, a staff-officer whose department is charged with all orders relating to the marching, embarking, disembarking, billeting, quartering, and cantoning of troops, and to encampments and camp equipage; in the United States army, a staff-officer of the rank of brigadier-general, who is at the head of the quartermaster's department.

quartermaster-sergeant (kwâr'tér-mäs'tér-sär'jént), n. Milit., a non-commissioned officer whose duty it is to assist the quartermaster.

quartern (kwâr'térn), n. [< ME. quarteroun, < OF. quarteron, F. quarteron = Pr. cartayron, cartairo = Sp. cuarteron = It. quarterone, a fourth part, < ML. quatero(n)-, a fourth part, < L. quartus, fourth: see quart, quarter. Cf. quarternoun, quadron.] 1. A fourth part; a quarter.

And there is not the mone seyn in alle the lunacoun, saf only the seconde quarternoun.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 301. (Hallivell.)

Specifically—2. The fourth part of certain British measures. (a) In liquid measure, the fourth of a pint; an imperial gill.

The waiter . . . returned with a quartern of brandy.
Sinclair, Launcelet Greaves, xvii.

(b) The fourth of a peck, or of a stone. (c) A quarter of a pound.

Applicants for quarterns of sugar.
Dickens, Sketches, Tales, iv.

quarter-netting (kwâr'tér-net'ing), n. Naut., netting on the quarter for the stowage of hammocks, which formerly in action served to arrest bullets from small-arms.

quarternion (kwâr'tér-ni-on), n. An erroneous form of quaternion.

quartern-loaf (kwâr'térn-lôf), n. A loaf weighing, generally, four pounds.

Who makes the quartern-loaf and Luddites rise?
H. Smith, Rejected Addresses, I.

In proof of their poverty they (the sweepers) refer you to the workhouse authorities, who allow them certain quartern loaves weekly.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 528.

quarter-noble (kwâr'tér-nô'bl), n. An old English coin, equal in value to the fourth part of a noble. Also ferling-noble. See noble, 2.

quarter-note (kwâr'tér-nôt), n. In musical notation, a note equivalent in time-value to one half of a half-note; a crotchet: marked by the sign ♩ or ♪. Also quarter.—Quarter-note rest. Same as quarter-rest.

quarternoun (kwâr'tér-nôn), n. [< Sp. cuarteron: see quatern and quadron.] Same as quartern.

Your pale-white Creoles have their grievances: and your yellow Quarternouns? . . . Quarternoun Oge . . . felt for his share too that insurrection was the most sacred of duties.
Carlyle, French Rev., II. v. 4. (Darvies.)

quarternoun, n. A Middle English form of quartern.

quarter-pace (kwâr'tér-päs), n. The footpace of a staircase when it occurs at the angle-turns of the stairs.

quarter-partition (kwâr'tér-pär-tish'on), n. In carp., a partition consisting of quarters. See quartering, 5.

quarter-pieces (kwâr'têr-pê'sez), n. pl. Naut., projections beyond the quarters of a ship for additional cabin accommodation.

quarter-pierced (kwâr'têr-pêrst), a. In her., pierced with a square hole not so large as in quartered or quarterly pierced. See quartered, 5. — Cross quarter-pierced. See cross.

quarter-plate (kwâr'têr-plât), n. In photog.: (a) A size of plate measuring $3\frac{1}{4} \times 4\frac{1}{4}$ inches. The half-plate measures $4\frac{1}{4} \times 5\frac{1}{4}$ inches in the United States ($4\frac{1}{4} \times 6\frac{1}{4}$ in England), and the whole-plate $6\frac{1}{4} \times 8\frac{1}{4}$ inches. (b) A plate of this size, or a picture made from such a plate.

quarter-point (kwâr'têr-point), n. Naut., the fourth part of a point, or $2^\circ 48' 45''$.

quarter-pointed (kwâr'têr-poin'ted), a. In her., representing one quarter of the field cut off saltierwise, usually that quarter which is appended to either side of the field.

quarter-rail (kwâr'têr-râil), n. Naut., that part of the rail which runs above the quarter of the ship; the rail that serves as a guard to the quarter-deck where there are no ports or bulwarks.

quarter-rest (kwâr'têr-rest), n. A rest or sign for silence, equivalent in time-value to a quarter-note; a crotchet-rest: marked || or || . Also called quarter-note rest.

quarter-round (kwâr'têr-round), n. 1. In arch., a molding whose contour is exactly or approximately a quadrant: same as ovolo.

In the quarter round of the cornish without there are spouts carved with a lip and flowers that do not project. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 109.

2. Any tool adapted for forming quarter-rounds, as an ovolo-plane. — Quarter-round tool, a chisel adapted for cutting concave or convex moldings.

quarter-saver (kwâr'têr-sû'vêr), n. A device attached to a knitting-machine to prevent the work from running off if the yarn breaks or runs out.

quarter-sawed (kwâr'têr-sâd), a. Same as quartered, 4.

quarter-seal (kwâr'têr-sêl), n. The seal kept by the director of the Chancery of Scotland. It is in the shape and impression of the fourth part of the great seal, and is in the Scotch statutes called the testimonial of the great seal. Gifts of lands from the crown pass this seal in certain cases. Bell.

quarter-section (kwâr'têr-sek'shən), n. In the United States Government Land Survey, a square tract of land containing 160 acres, and constituting one fourth of a section.

quarter-sessions (kwâr'têr-sesh'ənz), n. pl. 1. A criminal court held quarterly in England by justices of the peace in counties (in Ireland by county-court judges), and by the recorder in boroughs, and having jurisdiction of minor offenses and administration of highway laws, poor-laws, etc. In several of the United States a somewhat similar court is known by this name.

A great broad-shoulder'd genial Englishman. . . . A quarter-sessions chairman, abler none. Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

2. In Scotland, a court held by the justices of the peace four times a year at the county towns, and having power to review sentences pronounced at the special and petty sessions.

Abbreviated Q. S.

quarter-sling (kwâr'têr-sling), n. One of the supports for a yard on either side of its center.

quarter-square (kwâr'têr-skwâr), n. The fourth part of the square of a number. Tables of quarter-squares are sometimes used to replace logarithms, on account of the property that $\frac{1}{4}(x+y)^2 + \frac{1}{4}(x-y)^2 = xy$.

quarter-staff (kwâr'têr-stâf), n.; pl. quarter-staves (-stâvz). An old English weapon formed of a stout pole about $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet long. It was grasped by one hand in the middle, and by the other between the middle and the end. In the attack the latter hand shifted from one quarter of the staff to the other, giving the weapon a rapid circular motion, which brought the ends on the adversary at unexpected points.

A stout frere I met, And a quarter-staff in his hands. Plays of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 420).

Quarter-staff Dr. Johnson explains to be "A staff of defence, so called, I believe, from the manner of using it; one hand being placed at the middle, and the other equally between the end and the middle."

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 357.

The two champions, being alike armed with quarter-staves, stepped forward. . . . The miller. . . holding his quarter-staff by the middle, and making it flourish round his head. . . . exclaimed boastfully, "Come on, churl, an thou darest!" Scott, Ivanhoe, xi.

quarter-stanchion (kwâr'têr-stan'shən), n. Naut., a strong stanchion in the quarters of a square-sterned vessel, one such stanchion forming the extreme boundary of the stern on each side.

quarter-stuff (kwâr'têr-stuf), n. Plank one fourth of an inch in thickness. E. H. Knight.

quarter-tackle (kwâr'têr-tak'tl), n. A purchase sometimes used on the quarter of a lower yard to hoist boats, etc.

quarter-timber (kwâr'têr-tim'bér), n. 1. Naut., one of the framing-timbers in a ship's quarters. See cut under counter. — 2. In carp., scantling from two to six inches deep. E. H. Knight.

quarter-tone (kwâr'têr-tôn), n. In musical acoustics, an interval equivalent to one half of a semitone or half-step. The term is loosely applied to a variety of small intervals, especially to enharmonic ones.

quarter-trap (kwâr'têr-trap), n. In theaters, a small trap on each side of the stage, on a line with the first entrance.

quarter-turn (kwâr'têr-têrn), n. The arc subtending an angle of 90° ; a bend or change of direction at right angles. — Quarter-turn belt, goose-neck, etc. See belt, etc.

quarter-undulation (kwâr'têr-un-dū-lâ'shən), n. In optics, a quarter of a wave-length. — Quarter-undulation plate, a plate (as of mica) so thin as to cause in a refracted ray a retardation equal to one fourth of a wave-length. Such a plate is used in determining in the polariscope the positive or negative character of a uniaxial crystal.

quarter-vine (kwâr'têr-vin), n. An American vine, Bignonia capreolata. It is so called because, owing to the projection of medullary tissue in four wing-like layers from the middle to near the surface, a short section of the stem, when gently twisted in the hand, will divide into quarters. See cross-vine.

quarter-waiter (kwâr'têr-wâ'têr), n. An officer or gentleman usher of the English court who is one of a number in attendance by turns for a quarter of a year at a time. Also called quarterly waiter.

Gentleman Usher. "No, do as I bid thee; I should know something that have been a quarter-waiter [in the queen's service] these fifteen years."

Sir J. Davies, Dialogue, Tanner MS. 79.

quarter-watch (kwâr'têr-woch), n. Naut., one half of the watch on deck.

On the whaling ground in the southern fishery, when a ship is hove to in mid-ocean, they stand quarter-watches, one-fourth of the working hands, or half of each watch, being on duty, headed by the boat-steerers.

Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 229.

quarter-wind (kwâr'têr-wind), n. Naut., a wind blowing on a vessel's quarter.

quarter-yard (kwâr'têr-yârd), n. An old ale-measure. See ale-yard and half-yard.

quartet, quartette (kwâr'tet'), n. [It. quartetto, a quartet, < L. quartus, fourth: see quartl.]

1. In music: (a) A composition or movement for four solo parts, either vocal or instrumental, usually without accompaniment. Specifically, an instrumental work, usually for four stringed instruments, written in sonata form, and planned like a small symphony; a string-quartet. The quartet is the highest variety of chamber-music. It first reached its full development at the end of the eighteenth century. (b) A company of four singers or players who perform quartets. A mixed vocal quartet properly consists of a soprano (treble), an alto, a tenor, and a bass. A string-quartet consists of two violins, a viola, and a violoncello. (c) In an orchestra the stringed instruments collectively, and in oratorio music the principal vocal soloists, are sometimes loosely called the quartet. — 2. A stanza of four lines. — 3. Same as quadruplet. Car-Builders Dict. — Double quartet. (a) A composition for eight voices or instruments, especially for four violins, two violas, and two violoncellos. Grove. (b) The performers of such a composition, whether vocal or instrumental. — Quartet choir, a church choir consisting only of a mixed quartet, especially when made up of expert singers.

quartetto (kwâr-tet'ô), n. [It.] Same as quartet.

quartful, quartiful, a. [ME. quartifulle, quartful; < *quart*³ + -ful.] In good health; prosperous. Cath. Ang.

quartfulness, n. [ME. quartfulness; < quartful + -ness.] Prosperity. Cath. Ang.

quartic (kwâr'tik), a. and n. [L. quartus, fourth (see quartl), + -ic.] 1. a. In math., of the fourth degree; especially, of the fourth order. — Quartic symmetry, symmetry like that of a regular octagon; in general, symmetry arising from the vanishing of the cubinvariant of a quartic.

II. n. An algebraic function of the fourth degree; a quantic of the fourth degree. — Bicircular quartic. See bicircular. — Ex-cubo-quartic, a non-plane curve formed by the intersection of a quadric and a cubic surface which have, besides, two non-intersecting straight lines in common.

quartiful, a. See quartful.

quartile (kwâr'til), n. [L. quartus, fourth (see quartl), + -ile.] In astrol., an aspect of planets when their longitudes differ by 90° . See aspect, 7.

The heavens threaten us with their comets, stars, planets, with their great conjunctions, eclipses, oppositions, quartiles, and such unfriendly aspects.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 87.

Or Mars and Venus, in a quartil, move
My pangs of jealousy for Arcite's love.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., l. 500.

quartilunar (kwâr-ti-lū'nâr), a. [L. quartus, fourth (see quartl), + lunar, moon: see lunar.] Pertaining to or consisting of one fourth of a lunar month. [Rare.]

Such (tidal) waves as these may follow their causes, in periodic times, not diurnally alone, as influenced by sun and moon, but in semilunar or quartilunar intervals. Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 90.

quartine (kwâr'tin), n. [L. quartus, fourth (see quartl), + -ine.] In bot., a supposed fourth integument of some ovules, counting from the outermost. It is really only a layer of the secundine or of the nucleus.

quartinvariant (kwâr-tin-vâ'ri-ant), n. [L. quartus, fourth, + E. invariant.] An invariant of the fourth degree in the coefficients.

quartisection (kwâr-ti-sek'shən), n. [L. quartus, fourth, + E. section.] Separation into four equal parts; quadrisection.

quartisternal (kwâr-ti-stêr'nâl), n. [L. quartus, fourth, + sternum, breast-bone.] In anat., the fourth sternuber, counting from the manubrium backward; that bone of the sternum which is opposite the fourth intercostal space. [Rare.]

quartile (kwâr'til), n. [A var. of quarterl.] Same as quarterl. Hallivell.

quartlet (kwâr'tlet'), n. [ME. quartelette, < *OF. quartelet, < quart, fourth: see quartl.] A tankard or goblet holding a quart.

Item, ij. quartelettes, of dyvers sortes, weyng xlvij. unces. Paston Letters, i. 472.

quarto (kwâr'tô), n. and a. [Short for L. (NL.) in quarto: L. in, in; quarto, abl. of quartus, fourth: see quartl.] 1. n. A size of book in which the leaf is one fourth of a described or implied size of paper. The sheet folded twice in cross directions makes the square quarto, or regular quarto; folded twice in the same direction makes the long quarto. A cap quarto is $7 \times 8\frac{1}{2}$ inches; demy quarto, $8 \times 10\frac{1}{2}$ inches; folio-post quarto, $8\frac{1}{2} \times 11$ inches; medium quarto, 9×12 inches; royal quarto, 10×13 inches. The leaf of a quarto is understood to have a broad and short shape. Abbreviated 4to.

In my library there is a large copy of the Apocrypha, in what may be called elephant quarto, printed for T. Cadell and W. Davies, by Thomas Bensley, 1816.

N. and Q., 7th ser., IX. 356.

Broad quarto. See broad folio, under broad. — Small quarto, a square octavo; a book having eight leaves to a sheet but the shape of a quarto.

II. a. Noting the size of a book in which a sheet makes four leaves: as, a quarto volume; being of the size or shape of the leaves of a quarto: as, quarto paper; a quarto edition.

Quartodeciman (kwâr-tô-des'i-man), n. and a. [ML. quartadecimani, pl., < L. quarta decima (sc. dies lunæ), the fourteenth (day of the moon), fem. of quartus decimus, fourteen, < quartus, fourth, + decimus, tenth: see quartl and decimal.] 1. n. A member of one of those early Christian communities which celebrated the Paschal festival on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan (the same day as that on which the Jews celebrated their Passover), without regard to the day of the week. This practice led to great confusion and to a wide-spread controversy (the Quartodeciman controversy). In modern times this question has been much misunderstood, from a failure to distinguish the "Pascha" which was the anniversary of Christ's crucifixion from that which was the anniversary of his resurrection. The Quartodeciman usage was finally condemned by the Council of Nice, A. D. 325.

II. a. Relating to the Quartodecimans or to their practice of celebrating the Paschal feast.

As to the origin and precise nature of the Quartodeciman observance, there is not yet an entire agreement.

G. P. Fisher, Begin. of Christianity, p. 334.

Quartodecimani (kwâr-tô-des-i-mâ'ni), n. pl. [See Quartodeciman.] The Quartodecimans.

Quartodecimanian (kwâr-tô-des-i-mâ'ni-an), n. and a. [Quartodeciman + -ian.] Same as Quartodeciman. Also Quartadecimanian.

quartole (kwâr'tôl), n. [L. quartus, fourth: see quartl.] In music, a group of four notes to be performed in the time of three or six. Compare decimole, quintole, etc.

quartrain (kwâr'trân), n. An improper form of quatrain.

quartridge (kwâr'trij), n. An obsolete form of quartridge.

quartz (kwâr'tz), n. [= F. quartz = Sp. cuarzo = Pg. It. quarzo = D. kwarts = Sw. kwarts = Dan. kwarts = Russ. kwarts, < MHG. quarz (pl. querze), G. quarz, rock-crystal, quartz.] The common form of native silica, or the oxid of silicon (SiO_2). Silica is also found in nature in the minerals opal and tridymite (which see). Quartz occurs crystallized and massive, and in both states is most abundantly diffused, being one of the constituents of granite, gneiss, and many other crystalline rocks, forming quartzite and sandstone, and making up the mass of the sand of the sea-shore. When crystallized it commonly occurs in hexagonal prisms, terminated by hexagonal pyramids. It belongs, however, to the rhombohedral division of the hexagonal system, and its forms are sometimes very complex. Optically it is remarkable as exhibiting the phenomenon of circular polarization, the right- and left-handed character of the crystals optically corresponding to the arrangement of the modifying trapezohedral planes present. It scratches glass readily (hardness 7), gives fire with steel, becomes electrified by friction, and also by heating and pressure. It is infusible in the flame of the blowpipe, and insoluble in ordinary reagents except hydrofluoric acid. Its specific gravity is 2.65 when pure, and the luster vitreous or in some cases greasy to dull. The colors are various, as white or milky, gray, reddish, yellowish, or brownish, purple, blue, green. When colorless, or nearly so, and crystallized, it is known as rock-crystal (which see); here belong the "Lake George diamonds," etc. Other distinctly crystalline varieties are the pink, called rose-quartz; the milk-white, milk-quartz; the purple or bluish-violet, amethyst; the smoky, yellow or brown, smoky quartz or Cairngorm stone, called marion when black or nearly so; the yellow, false topaz or citrine; the aventurin, spangled with scales of mica or hematite; selenitic, containing acicular crystals of rutile; the cat's-eye, opalescent through the presence of asbestos fibers. The cryptocrystalline varieties are named according either to color or to structure: here belong chalcedony, agate in many forms, onyx, sardonyx, carnelian, heliotrope, prase, chrysoprase, flint, hornstone, jasper, basanite, agatized wood, etc. (see these words). The transparent varieties of quartz (amethyst, smoky quartz, etc.) are used for cheap jewelry, also when colorless for spectacles (then called pebble), and for optical instruments. Quartz prisms are useful in spectrum analysis, since quartz is highly transparent to the ultra-violet rays. (See spectrum.) Beautiful spheres of rock-crystal, sometimes several inches in diameter, occur in Japan. The massive colored kinds of quartz are much used as ornamental stones, especially the agates and agatized or fossil wood, onyx, etc. In these cases the colors are often produced or at least heightened by artificial means. Pulverized quartz is employed in making sandpaper; also when pure for glass-making, and in the manufacture of porcelain. Quartz-veins are often found in metamorphic rocks, and frequently contain rich deposits of gold; hence, in California and other gold-mining regions mining in the solid rock is commonly called quartz-mining, in contradistinction to placer and hydraulic mining. See cut under geode.—Babel quartz, a curious form of quartz crystals found at Beer Alston in Devonshire, England, the under surface of which shows the impression of the crystals of fluor-spar upon which the quartz was deposited. Also called Babylonian quartz.—Capped quartz, a variety of crystallized quartz occurring in Cornwall, England, embedded in compact quartz. When the matrix is broken the crystals are revealed, and a cast of their pyramidal terminations in intaglio is obtained. Another kind consists of separable layers or caps, due to successive interruptions in the growth of the crystal, with perhaps a deposition of a little clay between the layers.—Milky quartz. Same as milk-quartz.

quartz-crusher (kwarts'krush'er), n. A machine for pulverizing quartz.

quartziferous (kwart-sif'e-rus), a. [< quartz + -iferous.] Consisting of quartz, or chiefly of quartz; containing quartz.

quartzite (kwart'sit), n. [< quartz + -ite.] A rock composed essentially of the mineral quartz. It is a rock of frequent occurrence, and often forms deposits of great thickness. Quartzite is rarely without a granular structure, either perceptible to the naked eye or visible with the aid of the microscope. Sometimes, however, this structure is with great difficulty perceptible. It is generally held by geologists that quartzite has resulted from the alteration of quartzose sand, pressure and the presence of siliceous solutions having thoroughly united the grains of which the rock was originally composed. The quartzose material of which many veins are made up (material which must have been deposited from a solution) is not generally designated as quartzite, this sense being reserved for such quartz as is recognized by its stratigraphic position to have been formed from sedimentary material.

quartzitic (kwart-sit'ik), a. [< quartzite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to quartzite or quartz; consisting of quartzite or quartz.

quartz-liquefier (kwarts'lik'wē-fī-ēr), n. An apparatus in which comminuted auriferous quartz is dissolved to liberate the gold.

quartz-mill (kwarts'mil), n. 1. A machine for pulverizing quartz, differing in character from the ordinary mill in which the ore is pulverized by stamping, but intended to serve the same purpose. See stamp-mill.—2. An establishment where auriferous quartz is stamped or in some other way reduced to a powder, and the gold separated from it by amalgamation; a stamp-mill.

quartzoid (kwart'soid), a. [< quartz + -oid.] In crystal, a double six-sided pyramid, represented by uniting two six-sided single pyramids base to base.

quartzose (kwart'sōs), a. [< quartz + -ose.] Composed of quartz. Quartzose rocks are such as are essentially made up of the mineral quartz. Also quartzous.

quartz-porphry (kwarts'pōr'fī-ri), n. See porphyry.

quartz-reef (kwarts'rēf), n. Same as quartz-vein. [Australian.] quartz-rock (kwarts'rok), n. Quartzite.

quartz-sinter (kwarts'sin'tēr), n. Siliceous sinter.

quartz-trachyte, n. See trachyte.

quartz-vein (kwarts'vān), n. A deposit of quartz in the form of a vein. Most of the gold obtained from mining in the solid rock, and not by washing of detrital material, comes from veins of which the gangue is entirely or chiefly quartz; hence auriferous veins are often called quartz veins, and mining for gold in the rock is called quartz-mining.

quartzzy (kwart'si), a. [< quartz + -y.] Containing or abounding in quartz; pertaining to quartz; partaking of the nature or qualities of quartz; resembling quartz.

The iron ore is still further separated from its granitic or quartz matrix by washing.

Sir George C. M. Birdwood, Indian Arts, II. 4.

quas (kwas), n. Same as krass.

quash (kwosh), v. [< ME. quashen, quashen, quassen, quessen, < OF. quasser, cassier, quasser, quesser, kaiser, break in pieces, bruise, shatter, maltreat, destroy, F. cassier, break, shatter, < L. quassare, shake or toss violently, shatter, fig. shatter, impair, weaken, freq. of quater, pp. quassus, shake, shatter, break in pieces; whence also ult. E. concuss, discuss, percuss, rescue. In the fig. sense this verb (L. quassare) merges with F. cassier, annul; see quash².] I. trans. 1. To beat down or beat in pieces; crush.

Aboute scho whirles the whale, and whirles me undre, Tillicalle my quarters that while whare quaste al to peeces!
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), I. 3300.

The whales
Against sharp rocks, like reeling vessels quash'd,
Though huge as mountains, are in pieces dash'd.
Waller, Battle of the Summer Islands, II.

2. To crush; subdue; put down summarily; quell; extinguish; put an end to.

The word Puritan seems to be quash'd, and all that heretofore were counted such are now Brownists.

Milton, Church-Government, I. 6.

The Commotions in Sicily are quashed, but those of Naples increase.

Honcell, Letters, III. 1.

To doubts so put, and so quashed, there seemed to be an end for ever.

Lamb, Witches.

II. intrans. To be shaken with a noise; make the noise of water when shaken.

The erthe quook and quash't as hit quyke were.

Piers Plowman (C), xxi. 64.

A thin and fine membrane strait and closely adhering to keep it (the brain) from quashing and shaking.

Ray, Works of Creation, II.

quash² (kwosh), v. t. [*< ME. quashen, < OF. quasser, prop. cassier, annihilate, annul, F. cassier, annul, < LL. cassare, annihilate, destroy, annul, < L. cassus, empty, hollow, fig. empty, vain, useless, futile, null; see cass¹, cash¹, cassation¹, cashier¹, etc.] To make void; annul; in law, to annul, abate, overthrow, or set aside for insufficiency or other cause: as, to quash an indictment.

Pleas in abatement (when the suit is by original) conclude to the writ or declaration by praying "judgment of the writ, or declaration, and that the same may be quashed," cassatur, made void, or abated.

Blackstone, Com., III. xx.

quash³ (kwosh), n. [Perhaps so called with ref. to its being easily broken; < quash¹, r. Squash² is of Amer. Ind. origin.] 1. A pompion. Hallowell. 2. Same as squash² (†).

The Indian kale, ochro, quash, peppers, ackys, and a variety of pulse being natural to the climate of Jamaica.
T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide (1823), p. 74.

quashey (kwosh'i), n. [Cf. quash³.] A pumpkin.

With regard to those said quasheys, . . . the best way of dressing them is to stew them in cream.

Southey, Letters (1823), III. 391. (Davies.)

quashy-quasher (kwosh'i-kwosh'er), n. A small tree, Thevetia nereifolia, of the West Indies and tropical America. It has saffron-colored funnel-shaped flowers, its wood is hard and even-grained, and its seeds yield a fixed oil called exile oil.

quasi (kwā'si), conj. or adv. [L., as if, just as, as it were, about, nearly, < quam, as, how, + si, if.] As if; as it were; in a manner: used in introducing a proposed or possible explanation.

quasi- [< L. quasi, as if, as it were: see quasi.] A prefix or apparent adjective or adverb (and hence often written without the hyphen) meaning 'seeming,' 'apparent' (equivalent to 'as it were,' 'in appearance,' in predicative use), expressing some resemblance, but generally implying that what it qualifies is in some degree fictitious or unreal, or has not all the features of what it professes to be: as, a quasi-argument; a quasi-historical account. In construction and partly in sense it is like pseudo.

The popular poets always represent Macon, Apollin, Ter-vazant, and the rest as quasi-deities, unable to resist the superior strength of the Christian God.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 110.

A quasi hereditary priesthood is in each.

J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, VI. 7.

Henry . . . allowed the Archbishop of Canterbury to exercise a quasi-legatine authority under himself, and with a check in Chancery on his proceedings.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 259.

Quasi contract, a legal relation existing between parties to which the law attaches some of the characteristics of a contractual relation. See natural obligation, under natural.—Quasi corporation, delit. entail. See the nouns.

—Quasi delict (LL. quasi delictum), in Rom. law, the contravention of certain police regulations which imposed a penalty upon a person for certain acts committed by any one belonging to his family: for example, throwing of water out of the windows. The distinction between delicta and quasi delicta has been followed by some authors whose writings are based on the common law; and quasi delicta are defined as those acts by which damage is done to the obligee, though without the negligence or intention of the obligor, and for which damage the obligor is bound to make satisfaction. As, however, intention is not necessary to constitute a delict (tort), the distinction seems to be unnecessary in modern systems.

quasi-evolute (kwā'si-ev'ō-lūt), n. In math., the envelop of the quasi-normal of a curve.

quasi-fee (kwā'si-fē), n. In law, an estate gained by wrong. Wharton.

quasi-geometrical (kwā'si-jē-ō-met'ri-kal), a. Relating to hyperspace.

quasi-heirloom (kwā'si-ār'lōm), n. See heirloom, 1.

Quasimodo (kwas-i-mō'dō). [= F. quasimodo; so called because the introit for this day begins with the words "Quasi modo geniti infantes," As new-born babes (1 Pet. ii. 2): L. quasi, as if; modo, just now, lately.] Same as Low Sunday. Also called Quasimodo Sunday and Quasimodo-geniti Sunday. See low².

quasi-normal (kwā'si-nōr'mal), n. The harmonic conjugate of the tangent to a curve with respect to the lines joining its point of contact to two fixed points.

quasi-period (kwā'si-pē'ri-ōd), n. That constant which, added to the variable of a quasi-periodic function, multiplies the constant by a fixed function.

quasi-periodic (kwā'si-pē-ri-ōd'ik), a. Noting a function such that, when the variable is increased by a certain fixed amount, it has its value multiplied by a fixed function; thus, f^x is quasi-periodic, because $f^{x+1} = L f^x$.

quasi-radiate (kwā'si-rā'di-āt), a. In bot., slightly radiate; noting the heads of some composites whose ray-florets are small and inconspicuous.

quasi-realty (kwā'si-rē'al-ti), n. In law, things which are fixed in contemplation of law to realty, but are movable in themselves, as heirlooms, title-deeds, court-rolls, etc. Wharton.

quasi-tenant (kwā'si-ten'ant), n. In law, an undertenant who is in possession at the determination of an original lease, and is permitted by the reversioner to hold over. Wharton.

quasi-trustee (kwā'si-trus-tē'), n. In law, a person who reaps a benefit from a breach of trust, and so becomes answerable as a trustee. Wharton.

quasje, n. See coati.

quass¹, r. A Middle English form of quash¹.

quass² (kwas), n. Same as krass.

With spiced Meades (wholesome but deer)

As Meade Othame and Mead Cherunk,

And the base Quasse by Peasants drunk.

Pimlico or Runne tied Cap (1669), quoted in Gifford's Johnson, VII. 241.

quassation (kwa-sā'shōn), n. [< L. quassatio(n)-, a shaking or beating, < quassare, shake, shatter; see quash¹.] The act of shaking; concussion; the state of being shaken.

Continual contusions, thrashing, and quassations.

Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 68.

quassative (kwas'a-tiv), a. [< L. quassatus, pp. of quassare, shake; see quash¹.] Tremulous; easily shaken.

A Frenchman's heart is more quassative and subject to tremor than an Englishman's.

Middleton, Anything for a Quiet Life, III. 2.

Quassia (kwash'ij), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1763), named after Quassi or Coissi, a negro slave in Surinam, who used its bark as a remedy for fever. Quassi, Quassy, or Quashy was a common name of negroes.] 1. A genus of plants, of the order Simarubaceæ and tribe Simarubæ.

It is characterized by a large columnar receptacle bearing a small five-lobed calyx, five long erect petals, ten thread-like stamens, and a five-lobed ovary ripening into five fleshy drupes. There are 2 species: one, little known, is from a, a flower; b, the fruit.

tropical Africa; the other, Q. amara, is a tall and smooth tree of tropical America, with intensely bitter wood, bearing alternate pinnate leaves with a winged petiole, and having terminal racemes of large scarlet tubular flowers. 2. [l. c.] A drug, also called bitter-wood, consisting of the wood of Picræna (Quassia) excelsa, and of two or three related trees; also, a medicinal preparation from these woods. The original tree was Quassia amara, the Surinam quassia. Its wood is still in use in France and Germany, but is largely superseded by that of the more abundant Picræna excelsa, a tall tree, the bitter-ash of Jamaica and some smaller islands. A substitute for these is Simaruba amara, the mountain-damson or bitter damson or stavewood of the West Indies and northern South America. Quassia-wood is imported in billets, and appears in the shops in the form of chips, rasplings, etc. As a remedy it possesses in the highest degree the properties of the simple bitters. Its virtues are due to the principle quassin. Cups turned from the wood impart a bitter taste to their contents, and were once popular. A sweetened infusion of quassia is useful to destroy flies. Picræna excelsa has sometimes been substituted for hops in brewing, but this use is considered deleterious. See bitter ash (under ash), bitter-wood, and mountain-damson.

quassia-tree (kwash'î-trê), n. Any of the trees producing the drug quassia; a bitterwood-tree.

Quassilabia (kwass-i-lâ'bi-â), n. [NL. (Jordan and Bratton, 1878), < L. quassus, pp. of quater, shake, & labium, lip.] A genus of catostomid fishes of the United States; the hare-lip suckers.

Quassilabia lacera.

Q. lacera is the cutlips, or May, splitmouth, or rabbit-mouth sucker, a singular fish of the Ohio valley and southward, of an oliveaceous or brownish color above, the sides and belly silvery, the lower fins tinged with orange, and a peculiar formation of the mouth which has suggested both the technical and the vernacular names.

quassin (kwass'in), n. [quassia + *-in*².] The neutral bitter principle of quassia (Picræna excelsa). This substance crystallizes from aqueous solutions in very small white prisms. Its taste is intensely bitter, but it is destitute of odor. It is scarcely soluble in common ether, slightly soluble in water, and more soluble in alcohol. Also called quassin.

quassite (kwass'it), n. [quassia + *-ite*².] Same as quassin.

quasum, pron. [ME., < qua, dial. form of who, + sum, mod. E. some.] Whoso.

Quasum this tale can beter tende,
For Cristis loue he hit amende.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 120.

quat¹ (kwot), v. [OF. quatir, quattir, catir, press down, strike down, plunge, sink, hide, refl. crouch, squat, hide, = It. quattare, dial. cattare, crouch, lie close, squat, < L. coactare, press together, constrain, force, < cogere, pp. coactus, press together, urge; see cogent. Cf. squat, v., the same as quat, with a prefix; and cf. also the related *cache*¹ and *squash*¹.] I. trans. 1. To press down; subdue.

The renowne of her chastitie was such that it almost quatted those sparkes that heated him on to such lawlesse affection.

Greene, Never too Late (Works, ed. Dyce, Int., p. xxi.).

2. To oppress; satiate.

Had Philotinus been served in at the first course, when your stomach was not quatted with other daintier fare, his relish had perhaps been something loathsome.

Philotinus, 1583. (Nares.)

To the stomach quatted with dainties al delicacies seeme queasie.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 44.

3. To flatter. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. To squat.

quat² (kwot), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. A pustule or pimple.—2. Figuratively, a small, shabby, or insignificant person.

I have rubb'd this young quat almost to the sense,
And he grows angry. Shak., Othello, v. 1. 11.

quat³ (kwot), v. t. [A strong pret. and pp. of quit, used also as inf.] To quit.

quat⁴ (kwot), p. a. [See *quat*³, v.] Quit; free; released. [Scotch.]

quat⁵, pron. A dialectal form of what.

quata (kwā'tā), n. Same as coaita.

quatch¹ (kwōch), v. i. [Origin obscure.] To tell; be a telltale; peach. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

quatch¹ (kwōch), n. [*quatch*¹, v.] A word. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

Noe; not a quatch, sad poets: doubt you
There is not greife enough without you?
Bp. Corbet, Elegy on Death of Queen Anne. (Davies.)

quatch² (kwōch), a. [Cf. *quat*¹, squat (f).] Squat; flat.

It is like a barber's chair, that fits all buttocks; the pin-buttock, the quatch-buttock, the brawn buttock, or any buttock. Shak., All's Well, II. 2. 18.

quater-cousin, n. Same as cater-cousin.

quaterfoil, n. See quatrefoil.

quatern (kwā'tern), a. [L. quaterni, four each, by fours, distributive, < quattuor, four: see *quat*¹. Cf. *quire*².] Consisting of four; fourfold; growing by fours: as, quatern leaves.

quaternary (kwā'tēr-nā-ri), a. and n. [L. quaternarius, consisting of four each, containing four, < quaterni, four each, by fours: see quatern.] I. a. 1. Consisting of four; arranged or grouped in fours.

Reproductive organs . . . solitary or quaternary in the same sporangium.

Le Maout and Decaisne, Botany (trans.), p. 966.

2. [cap.] In geol., noting that part of the geological series which is more recent than the Tertiary; Post-tertiary. (See Tertiary.) The oldest and most general division of the Quaternary is into diluvial and alluvial, by which terms are meant respectively coarse detrital material and fine detrital material—the one the result of rapid, the other of slower currents of water. The former presence of ice, both fixed and floating, over a part of the northern hemisphere, and especially in the regions where geology was earliest cultivated, has greatly complicated the question of this division of the Quaternary into subgroups or epochs. Thus diluvial has come to be replaced for the most part by glacial; and some English geologists divide the Quaternary into glacial and recent, using the term Pleistocene also as the equivalent of glacial. The term recent has also as its synonym both alluvial and human. While the essential difference between Tertiary and Quaternary is theoretically supposed to be that in the former a portion of the fossil species are extinct, while in the latter all are living, this does not apply in the case of land-animals, especially the mammals. In fact, there is, over extensive areas, great difficulty in deciding the question whether certain formations shall be called Tertiary or Quaternary, as, for instance, in the case of the Pampean deposits, which, although containing great numbers of species of mammals all or nearly all extinct, are generally considered by geologists as being of Quaternary age.

3. In old chem., noting those compounds which contained four elements, as fibrin, gelatin, etc.

—4. In math., containing, as a quantic, or homogeneous integral function, four variables. A surface may be called a quaternary locus, because defined by a quaternary equation, or one equating a quaternary quantic to zero.—Quaternary cubic. See cubic.—Quaternary number, ten: so called by the Pythagoreans because equal to 1 + 2 + 3 + 4. Pythagoras, in the oath of the brotherhood, was called the revealer of the quaternary number, on account of some secret of arithmetic, possibly an abacus.—Quaternary quadrics. See quadric.

II. n. A group of four things.

The objections I made against the quaternary of elements and ternary of principles needed not to be opposed so much against the doctrines themselves.

Boyle, Works, I. 536.

quaternate (kwā'tēr-nāt), a. [NL. quaternatus, < L. quaterni, four each: see quatern.] Consisting of four.—Quaternate leaf, a leaf that consists of four leaflets.

quaternion (kwā'tēr-ni-on), n. [Also quaternion; < L. quaternion (n.), the number four, a body or group of four, < quaterni, four each, by fours: see quatern.] 1. A set, group, or body of four: applied to persons or things.

He put him in prison, and delivered him to four quaternions of soldiers.

Acts xii. 4.

Myself . . . am called Anteros, or Love's enemy; the more welcome therefore to thy court, and the fitter to conduct this quaternion. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 3.

When and where this quaternion rhyme, as it is used by Berceo, was first introduced, cannot be determined.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 27.

2. A word of four syllables; a quadrisyllable.

The triads and quaternions with which he loaded his speech. Scott.

3. A fourfold quantity capable of being expressed in the form $xi + yj + zk + w$, where x, y, z, w are scalars, or real numbers, while i, j, k are vectors, or quantities whose squares are negative scalars. The calculus of such quantities is termed quaternions.

A Quaternion is the quotient of two vectors, or of two directed right lines in space, considered as depending on a system of Four Geometrical Elements, and as expressible by an algebraical symbol of Quadrinomial Form. The science, or Calculus, of Quaternions is a new mathematical method wherein the foregoing conception of a quaternion is unfolded and symbolically expressed, and is applied to various classes of algebraical, geometrical, and physical questions, so as to discover many new theorems, and to arrive at the solution of many difficult problems.

Str W. Rowan Hamilton.

Conjugate of a quaternion. See conjugate.—Conjugate quaternions. See conjugate.—Quaternion group. See *group*¹.

quaternion (kwā'tēr-ni-on), v. t. [quaternion, n.] To divide into quaternions, files, or companies.

The Angels themselves . . . are distinguished and quaternioned into their celestiall Princedomes.

Milton, Church-Government, l. 1.

quaternionist (kwā'tēr-ni-on-ist), n. [quaternion + -ist.] A student of quaternions.

Do we depart wider from the primary traditions of arithmetic than the Quaternionist does?

J. Venn, Symbolic Logic, p. 91.

quaternity (kwā'tēr-ni-ti), n. [= F. quaternité; as quatern + -ity.] 1. The state of being four; the condition of making up the number four.

The number of four stands much admired, not only in the quaternity of the elements, which are the principles of bodies, but in the letters of the name of God.

Str T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 12.

2. A group of four.

So that their whole scale, of all that is above body, was indeed not a trinity, but a quaternity, or four ranks and degrees of beings one below another.

Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 557.

quateron, n. Same as quadron.

quatorzain (ka-tôr-zân), n. [Formerly also quaterzayn; < OF. quatorzaine, quatorsaine, the number fourteen, < quatorze, fourteen: see quatorze.] A stanza or poem of fourteen lines; a sonnet.

Put out your rush candles, you poets & rimers, and bequeath your crazed quaterzains to the chandlers; for lo! here he commeth that hath broken your legs.

Nashe, quoted in Pierce Penilesse, Int., p. xiv.

His [Drayton's] next publication is Idea's mirror; Amours in Quatorzaine, 1594. It contains fifty-one sonnets.

N. and Q., 6th ser., X. 61.

quatorze (ka-tôr-z'), n. [F. quatorze, < L. quattuordecim, fourteen, < quattuor, four, & decem, ten: see fourteen.] In the game of piquet, the four aces, kings, queens, knaves, or tens: so called because such a group of four, in the hand that holds the highest, counts fourteen points.

quatrain (kwot'rân), n. [Formerly also, improp., quartrain; < F. quatrain, a stanza of four lines, < quatre, four, < L. quattuor = E. four: see four.] A stanza of four lines rhiming alternately.

I have chosen to write my poem in quatrains, or stanzas of four in alternate rhyme, because I have ever judged them more noble, and of greater dignity both for the sound and number, than any other verse in use amongst us.

Dryden, Account of Annus Mirabillis.

Who but Lander could have written the faultless and pathetic quatrain?—

I strove with none, for none was worth my strife;
Nature I loved, and, next to Nature, Art;
I warmed both hands before the fire of life;
It sinks, and I am ready to depart.

Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 69.

quatraylet, n. [OF. quatrayle, etc., < quatre, four, + ayle, grandfather: see ayle.] A male ancestor three generations earlier than one's grandfather.

Thomas Gould, . . . who died in 1520. He was the quatrayle of Zaccheus Gould's, the New England immigrant.

New England Bibliopistis, I. 71.

quatre-cousin, n. Same as cater-cousin.

quatrefoil (kat'tēr-foil), n. [Also quaterfoil, quaterfoil; < ME. katrefoil, < OF. (and F.) quatrefeuille, < quatre, four (< L. quattuor = E. four), + feuille, leaf (< L. folium, leaf): see four and *foil*¹.] 1. A leaf with four leaflets, as sometimes that of clover.

And katrefoil, whenne thal beth up yspronge, Transplante hem into lande ydight with dounge.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 191.

2. In arch., an opening or a panel divided by cusps or foliations into four foils, or, more correctly, the figure formed by the cusps. This ornament resembles the four petals of a cruciform flower, but is certainly not derived from imitation of such a flower. Bands of small quatrefolles are much used as ornaments in the English Perpendicular style, and sometimes in the Decorated. The same name is given also to flowers and leaves of similar form carved in relief as ornaments on moldings, etc. See also cut under gallery.

ments in the English Perpendicular style, and sometimes in the Decorated. The same name is given also to flowers and leaves of similar form carved in relief as ornaments on moldings, etc. See also cut under gallery.

3. In her., a four-leaved grass, or leaf divided into four leaflets, used as a bearing. — Cross quatrefoll, 2. Cross quatrefoll. Same as eight-fol or octofol.

quartrible (kwā'ri-bl), n. [< OF. quadruble, quadrable, quadruple, a piece of music for four voices or four instruments, < quadruple, fourfold: see quadruple.] In medieval music, a descant in parallel fourths to the cantus firmus.

quartrible (kwā'ri-bl), v. i.; pret. and pp. quartrible, ppr. quartrible. [< quartrible, n.] In medieval music, to sing a descant at the interval of a fourth from the cantus firmus. See diaphony, 2. Compare quintile.

quatront, a. An obsolete variant of quatern. Halliwel.

quatto, n. Same as coaita.

quattrino (kwā-trō'nō), n. [It. (ML. quattrinus), < quattro, four: see four.] An Italian coin of about the value of a half a United States cent.

The quattrino, a square coin which was struck during his (Loredano's) reign.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 356, note.

quattrocentist (kwātrō-chen'tist), n. [= F. quattrocentista, < It. quattrocentista, quattrocentist, < quattrocento (see quattrocento) + -ist.] An Italian of the fifteenth century; specifically, an Italian artist of the style of art called quattrocento.

It was a revelation to me, and I began to trace the purity of work in the quattrocentists to this drilling of undeviating manipulation which fresco-painting had furnished to them. Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 476.

quattrocento (kwātrō-chen'tō), n. and a. [It., lit. 400 (< quattro, < L. quattuor, four, + cento, < L. centum, hundred), but used as an abbreviation of mille quattrocento, 1400, with ref. to the century (1401-1500) in question. Cf. cinquecento.] 1. n. The fifteenth century considered as an epoch of art or literature, and especially in connection with Italy: as, the sculpture of the quattrocento. The painters of the early part of the period had not yet attained the power to render their conceptions with entire freedom; but their coloring is very beautiful, and their sentiment in general nobler than that of the artists who followed them.

II. a. Belonging to, or living or produced in, the fifteenth century; of the style of the fifteenth century: as, quattrocento sculpture.

quatuor (kwā-tū'ōr), n. [< L. quatuor, prop. quatuor, = E. four: see four.] In music, a quartet.

quaught (kwācht), v. t. and i. [Early mod. E. also waught; Sc. waught, waucht; origin uncertain. Cf. quaff.] To drink; quaff.

I quaght, I drinke all out.
Will you quaght with me? Palsgrave.

Doth sell her body to relieve her want,
Yet scornes to be reputed as a quean.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. 8.), p. 45.

I never was ambitious
Of using congees to my daughter-queen —
A queen! perhaps a quean!
Ford, Perkin Warbeck, II. 2.

I see her yet, the sonse quean
That lighted up my jingle.
Burns, To the Guildwife of Wauchope House.

My young master will . . . call you slut and quean, if there be but a speck of soot upon his handbox.
Scott, Abbot, iv.

queasily (kwē'zi-li), adv. In a queasy manner; with squeamishness.

queasiness (kwē'zi-nes), n. The state of being queasy; nausea; qualmsiness; inclination to vomit; disgust.

They did fight with queasiness, constrain'd,
As men drink potions. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., l. 1. 196.
Let them live and die in servile condition and thir scrupulous queasiness, if no instruction will confirm them.
Milton, Eikonoklastes, xxviii.

queasy (kwé'zi), a. [Early mod. E. and dial. also quaisy; < ME. quaysy, quaysy, causing a feeling of nausea; prob. < Norw. kveis, sickness after a debauch, = Icel. kveisa, in comp. idhra-kveisa, colic, = Sw. dial. kvesa, soreness, blister, pimple; perhaps akin to Sw. qväsa, bruise, wound, squash, Dan. kvuse, squash, crush. Cf. AS. töcvisan, crush: see squeeze.] 1. Affected with nausea; inclined to vomit.

The Reverend Doctor Gaster found himself rather queasy in the morning, therefore preferred breakfasting in bed.
Peacock, Deadlong Hall, vil.

2. Fastidious; squeamish; delicate.

And even so in a manner these instruments make a man's wit so soft and smooth, so tender and quaisy, that they be less able to brook strong and tough study.
Ascham, Tokophilus (ed. 1864), p. 27.

I am so queasy-stomached
I cannot taste such gross meat.
Massinger, Bondman, il. 2.

Is there cause why these men should overween, and be so queasy of the rude multitude, lest their deepe worth should be undervalu'd for want of fit umpires?
Milton, Apology for Smeectymnuus.

Deprecation which is unusual even for the queasy modesty of sixteenth-century dedications.
S. Lanier, Sci. of Eng. Verse, p. vi.

3. Apt to cause nausea; occasioning uncomfortable feelings; hence, requiring to be delicately handled; ticklish; nice.

Those times are somewhat queasy to be touched.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, l. 1.

I have one thing, of a queasy question,
Which I must act. Shak., Lear, il. 1. 19.

I was not my own man again for the rest of the voyage. I had a queasy sense that I wore my last dry clothes upon my body.
R. L. Stevenson, Inland Voyage, p. 132.

Etharidge, She Would if she Could, III. 3.

Quebec group. In geol., a division of the Lower Silurian established by the Canada Geological Survey, of very uncertain value.

According to recent researches by Mr. Selwyn, the Quebec group as defined by Logan embraces three totally distinct groups of rocks, belonging respectively to Archaean, Cambrian, and Lower Silurian horizons.

Geikie, Text-Book of Geol., p. 691.

Quebec oak. See oak.

quebracho (ke-brí'chō), n. [Pg., contr. from quebra-hacho, 'ax-breaker'; so called in allusion to the hardness of the wood; < quebrar, break, + hacha, facha, ax: see hatchet.] The name of several hard-wooded South American trees of economic value. The white quebracho (quebracho blanco) is Aspidosperma quebracho, best known for its medicinal bark. (See quebracho bark, under bark.) The red quebracho (quebracho colorado) is Schinopsis (Loxopterygium) Lorentzii, of the La Plata region. Its wood and bark form an important tanning-material, very rapid in action, exported to Europe in bulk and in extract. Its timber is extremely hard and strong. Another quebracho is Podina rhombifolia of the Santalaceae (quebracho floja), its wood and bark being mixed with the last. — Quebracho gum, the dried juice or watery extract of Schinopsis Lorentzii. It is used for the relief of dyspnoea.

quebrada (ke-brá'dā), n. [Sp., broken, uneven ground, prop. fem. of quebrado, pp. of quebrar, break.] A gorge; a ravine; a defile: a word occasionally used by writers in English on Mexican and South American physical geography, and by the Spanish Americans themselves, with about the same meaning as barranca.

queen¹ (kwēn), n. [< ME. queen, quen, quene, quhene, whene, kuen, cicene, cuen, < AS. cwēn, rarely cwēn (gen. cwēne), a woman (L. femina), wife (L. uxor), queen (L. regina, imperatrix, augusta), = OS. quān, wife, = OHG. quēna, chuuēna, wife, = Icel. kvān, kvæn, wife, = Goth. kwēns, rarely kveins, wife (not recorded in the sense of 'queen').] 1. The consort of a king.

Thursdays, the laste daye of Apryll, to Lasheles, where lyethe quene Elyanour of Englonde, and in an abbey of her awne foundacyon. Sir R. Gylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 4.

I'll undertake to make thee Henry's queen.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 3. 117.

2. A woman who is the sovereign of a realm; a female sovereign. In countries under monarchical rule females are sometimes excluded from the throne, and seldom if ever succeed in direct lineal descent. In the line of succession to the British throne the eldest son of the sovereign is the heir, to the exclusion of older sisters; but a daughter who has no brothers succeeds, to the exclusion of younger brothers of her father or their male descendants. The exceptionally long reign of Queen Victoria (who succeeded in right of her deceased father, the Duke of Kent, to the exclusion of his younger brothers) has familiarized English-speaking communities of the present day with the form queen's instead of king's in such phrases as queen's counsel, the queen's English, etc.

Of lower Syria, Cyprus, Lydia,

Absolute queen. Shak., A. and C., III. 6. 11.

Now what I am ye know right well — your Queen,

To whom . . . ye did promise full

Allegiance and obedience to the death.

Tennyson, Queen Mary, II. 2.

3. Figuratively, a woman who is chief or pre-eminent among others; one who presides: as, queen of beauty; queen of the May (see May-queen).

Venus, the queen of Love, was but thy figure,

And all her graces prophecies of thine.

Shirley, Traitor, III. 3.

Isabel, thro' all her placid life,

The queen of marriage, a most perfect wife.

Tennyson, Isabel.

4. Hence, anything personified as chief or greatest, when considered as possessing female attributes.

The Cathedral Church of this Cille [Amiens] is dedicated to our Lady, being the very Queene of all the Churches in France.

Corryal, Crudities, I. 15.

Show this queen of cities that so fair

May yet be foul.

Seven hundred years and fifty-three

Had Rome been growing up to might,

And now was queen of land and sea.

Domest, Christmas Hymn.

5. In entom., a queen bee or queen ant.—6. A playing-card on which a queen is depicted.

The knave of Diamonds tries his wily arts,
And wins (oh shameful chance!) the Queen of Hearts.

Pope, R. of the L., III. 88.

7. In chess, the piece which is by far the most powerful of all for attack. See *chess*¹. Abbreviated Q.—8. A variety of roofing-slate, measuring 3 feet long and 2 feet wide. Compare duchess, 2.—Court of Queen's Bench. See Court of King's Bench, under court.—Dollar queen, in apiculture, an untested queen bee, bred from a purely bred mother that has mated with one of her own race; so called because the standard price was supposed to be one dollar. The price of dollar queens, however, varies from 75 cents to $2. Phin, Dict. of Apiculture, p. 57.—Keeper of the Queen's prison. See Marshal of the King's (or Queen's) Bench, under marshal.—Marshal of the queen's household. See marshal.—Problem of the queens. See problem.—Queen Anne's bounty. See bounty.—Queen Anne style, in arch., the style which obtained in England in the early part of the eighteenth century, and produced many commodious and dignified buildings, particularly in domestic architecture; also, specifically, a nondescript style purporting to follow the above, and reproducing some of the exterior forms and ornaments of the original, much in vogue in the United States, especially for suburban cottages, from about 1880. — Queen bee. See bee. — Queen closer. See *closer*¹ (b). — Queen consort. See *consort*¹. — Queen dowager, the widow of a deceased king. — Queen mother, a queen dowager who is also mother of the reigning sovereign. — Queen of heaven. (a) A title often given to the goddess Astarte or Ashtoreth.

The women knead their dough to make cakes to the queen of heaven, . . . that they may provoke me to anger.
Jer. vii. 18.

With these in troop

Came Ashtoreth, whom the Phenicians call'd

Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns.

Milton, P. L., l. 489.

(b) Among Roman Catholics, a title given to the Virgin Mary.—Queen of the May, a young girl crowned with flowers and enthroned as the central figure of the May-day sports.—Queen regent, queen regnant, a queen who holds the crown in her own right, or a queen who reigns as regent.—Queen's advocate. Same as lord advocate (which see, under advocate).—Queen's color, in the British army, one of the pair of colors belonging to every regiment. In the line it is a union jack charged with some regimental devices; in the Guards it is a crimson flag, sometimes having the jack in the dexter chief, but always having the royal cipher and regimental devices. See color, and pair of colors, under pair. Boutell, English Heraldry.—Queen's counsel, enam, gambit. See counsel, etc.—Queen's evidence. See king's evidence, under evidence.—Queen's gap, a gap in a dam, a style of fishway used in British waters. It has been occasionally used in America for alewives. In low dams it answers well for salmon.—Queen's herb, smuff: so called (in the latter part of the sixteenth century) because Catharine de' Medici acquired a taste for it soon after the introduction of tobacco into France.—Queen's keys. See *key*¹.—Queen's messenger. See messenger.—The queen's English. See English.—The queen's peace. See peace.

queen² (kwēn), v. [< *queen*¹, n.] I. intrans. To play the queen; act the part or character of a queen; domineer: with an indefinite it.

A three-pence bow'd would hire me,

Old as I am, to queen it.

Shak., Hen. VIII., II. 3. 87.

Xerxes went out of his way with his army to do homage to the great plane-tree that quened it in the desert alone.
P. Robinson, Under the Sun, p. 85.

Quercus (kwér'kus), n. [NL. (Malpighi, 1675), < L. quercus, an oak = E. fir, q. v.] A genus of dicotyledonous trees, the oaks, type of the apetalous order Cupulifera and of the tribe Quercineæ. It is characterized by usually slender and pendulous or erect staminate catkins, the stamens and calyx-lobes of each flower being six in number, and by the scattered or clustered fertile flowers, composed of an ovary commonly with three cells, six ovules, and a three-lobed stigma, surrounded by an involucre of more or less consolidated scales, which becomes a hardened cupule or cap around the flat or rounded base of the nut or acorn. There are about 300 species, natives of all north temperate regions, extending through Mexican mountains and the Andes into the United States of Colombia, and in the mountains of Asia to the Moluccas. They are entirely absent in South America beyond the equator, in Australasia and the Pacific Islands, and in Africa outside of the Mediterranean region. They are mainly trees of large size, hard and durable wood, and slow growth, sprouting repeatedly from the root; a few only are never more than shrubs. The characteristic oak-leaf is alternate, thin, and velvety, deeply and pinnately lobed, with the lobes either rounded, as in the white oak, or ending in bristle-points, as in the black and red oaks; but the genus includes great diversity of form, ranging to thick and entire evergreen leaves in the live-oak and others. (See cut under oak.) The fruit or acorn matures in one year in the white oak, bur-oak, post-oak, live-oak, and the chestnut-oaks; in other Atlantic species, the biennial-fruited oaks, in two. The yellowish catkins precede or accompany the leaves. The numerous American and European species all belong (with the exception of Q. densiflora, the peach-oak of California) to the subgenus Lepidobalanus (Endlicher, 1844), with slender and loose-flowered proper aments, and broad cupules with imbricated scales. Of those over 50 are found in Mexico and Central America, and about 40 within the United States, 25 of which occur only east of the Rocky Mountains, and about 15 in California. They extend in North America as far north as 45°, in Europe to 56°. The oaks of central and eastern Asia constitute five other sections, mostly with erect staminate spikes, and include about 106 species. See oak, acorn, black-jack, blue-jack, encino, holm-oak, kermes-oak, live-oak, pin-oak, post-oak, red-oak, roble, scrub-oak, shingle-oak, valonia-oak, wainscot-oak, water-oak, willow-oak.

In a work which he was, no question, acquainted with, we read . . .

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 178.

7. Judicial trial or inquiry; trial; examination.

He that was in question for the robbery.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., I. 2. 68.

Mr. Endecott was also left out, and called into question about the defacing the cross in the ensign.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 188.

8. Examination by torture, or the application of torture to prisoners under criminal accusation in order to extort confession.

Such a presumption is only sufficient to put the person to the rack or question, . . . and not bring him to condemnation.

Ayliffe, Parergon.

A master, when accused, could offer his slaves for the question, or demand for the same purpose the slaves of another; and, if in the latter case they were injured or killed in the process, their owner was indemnified.

Encyc. Brit., XXII. 132.

94. Conversation; speech; talk.

I met the duke yesterday, and had much question with him.
Shak., As you Like it, iii. 4. 39.

10. In logic, a proposition, or that which is to be established as a conclusion, stated by way of interrogation.—11. In parliamentary usage: (a) The point under discussion by the house; the measure to be voted on: as, to speak to the question. (b) The putting of the matter discussed to a vote: as, are you ready for the question?—Comparative, complex, double, Eastern question. See the adjectives.—Division of the question. See division.—Horary question, in astrology, a question the decision of which depends upon the figure of the heavens at the moment it is propounded.—Hypothetical question. See hypothetical.—In question, under consideration or discussion: indicating something just mentioned or referred to.

He is likewise a rival of mine—that is, of my other self, for he does not think his friend Captain Absolute ever saw the lady in question. Sheridan, The Rivals, ii. 1.

Mr. Wall and his ally exert themselves to make up for the painful absence in question to their utmost power.
W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 213.

Leading question, a question so put as to suggest the answer which is desired, and thus to lead to and prepare the way for such an answer. A party is not allowed to put a leading question to his own witness, except in matters purely introductory, and not touching a point in controversy; and except that if his witness is obviously hostile or defective in memory the court may in its discretion allow a leading question. A party may put leading questions in cross-examining his adversary's witness.—Mixed questions. See mixed.—Out of question, doubtless; beyond question.

Out of question, you were born in a merry hour.

Shak., Much Ado, ii. 1. 346.

Out of the question, not worthy of or requiring consideration; not to be thought of.

It is out of the question to ask the Diet for money to clear off the enormous debts; so that it is difficult to guess how the matter will end.

Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 287.

Previous question, in parliamentary practice, the question whether a vote shall be come to on the main issue or not, brought forward before the main or real question is put by the Speaker, and for the purpose of avoiding, if the vote is in the negative, the putting of this question. The motion is in the form, "that the question be now put," and the mover and seconder vote against it. In the House of Representatives of the United States (it is not used in the Senate), and in many State legislatures, the object of moving the previous question is to cut off debate and secure immediately a vote on the question under consideration; here, therefore, the mover and seconder vote in the affirmative.

The great remedy against prolix or obstructive debate is the so-called previous question, which is moved in the form "Shall the main question be now put?" and when ordered closes forthwith all debate, and brings the House to a direct vote on that main question.

J. Bryce, American Commonwealth, I. 130.

Question of fact, question of law. See fact. 3.—Question of order. See order.—Question of privilege. See privilege.—Real question. Shak., T. N., I. 4. 6.

(b) To subject to judicial interrogation.

Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day.

Acts xxiv. 21.

The governor wrote to some of the assistants about it, and, upon advice with the ministers, it was agreed to call . . . them [the offenders] in question.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 172.

To pop the question. See pop. 1.—Syn. 2. Question, Query, Inquiry, Interrogation, and Interrogatory agree in expressing a form of words used in calling for information or an answer from another. Question is the most general in its meaning, and inquiry stands next. Query stands for a question asked without force, a point about which one would like to be informed: the word is used with all degrees of weakness down to the mere expression of a doubt: as, I raised a query as to the strength of the bridge. A question may be put in order to test another's knowledge; the other words express an asking for real information. Interrogatory is a strong word, expressing an authoritative or searching question that must be explicitly answered, sometimes in law a written question. Inquiry is somewhat milder and less direct than question, the order of strength being query, inquiry, question, interrogation. There is no perceptible difference between interrogation and interrogatory, except that the former may express also the act. See ask and examination.—4 and 5. Proposition, motion, topic, point.

In ancient Rome, a member of one of two distinct classes of magistrates: (a) One of two public accusers (questores parietarii) whose duty it was to lay accusations against those guilty of murder or other capital offense, and to see to the execution of the sentence. This magistracy was in existence at the earliest historic time, but became obsolete about 366 B. C., its functions being transferred to other officers. (b) One of the officers (questores classici) having the care and administration of the public funds; a public treasurer. It was their duty to receive, pay out, and record the public finances, including the collection of taxes, tribute, etc. Questors accompanied the provincial governors, proconsuls, or pretors, and received everywhere the public dues and imports, paid the troops, etc. After Julius Cæsar, some of their functions were given to the pretors and some to the ediles. The number of questors was originally two, but was gradually increased to twenty. Under Constantine the questor sacri palatii was an imperial minister of much power and importance.

quicklime (kwik'lim), n. [*< quick + lime*¹.] Calcium oxid, CaO; burned lime; lime not yet slaked with water. Quicklime is prepared by subjecting chalk, limestone, or other natural calcium carbonate to intense heat, when carbonic acid, water, and any organic matter contained in the carbonate are driven off. It is a white amorphous infusible solid, which readily absorbs carbonic acid and water when exposed to the air. In contact with water, quicklime slakes, each molecule of the oxid combining with a molecule of water and forming calcium hydrate, Ca(OH)₂, or slaked lime. It is most largely used in making mortar and cement, but has numberless other uses in the arts.

quickling (kwik'ling), n. [*< quick + -ling*¹.] A young insect. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] quickly (kwik'li), adv. [*< ME. quykly, quicliche, ewicliche; < quick + -ly*².] 1. Speedily; with haste or celerity.

With fiery quickness.

Shak., Hamlet, IV. 3. 45.

3. Activity; briskness; promptness; readiness: as, the quickness of the imagination or wit.

John Heywood the Epigrammatist, who, for the myrth and quickness of his conceits more then for any good learning was in him, came to be well benefitted by the king.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 49.

With too much quickness ever to be taught;

With too much thinking to have common thought.

Pope, Moral Essays, II. 97.

4. Acuteness; keenness; alertness.

Would not quickness of sensation be an inconvenience to an animal that must lie still?

Locke.

In early days the conscience has in most

A quickness which in later life is lost.

Couper, Tirocinium, I. 110.

5. Sharpness; pungency; keenness.

Then would he wish to see my sword, and feel

The quickness of the edge.

Beau. and Fl., Maud's Tragedy, I. 1.

A few drops tinge, and add a pleasant quickness.

Mortimer.

= Syn. 2. Quickness, Fastness, Speed, Celerity, Swiftness, Fleetness, Rapidity, Velocity, haste, expedition, despatch, alertness, liveliness. Quickness is the generic term. Quickness, fastness, speed, and rapidity may have relation to time only, or to space passed through or over; the others apply only to space. "Swift to hear," in Jas. I. 19, is a bold figure. Celerity is swift voluntary movement; but we do not ordinarily speak of the movements of an animal as having celerity. Fleetness also is voluntary, and is applied to animals; we may speak by figure of the fleetness of a yacht. The word suggests quickness in getting over the ground by the use of the feet: we speak of the swiftness or rapidity of the swallow's or the pigeon's flight; the fleetness of Atalanta, a hound, a deer. Swiftness is presumably not too great for carefulness or thoroughness; rapidity may be too great for either. Velocity is the attribute of matter in motion; the word is especially a technical term for the rate of movement of matter, whether fast or slow. We speak also of the velocity of sound or light. Rapidity has less suggestion of personality than any of the others, except velocity. See nimble.—3. Dexterity, adroitness, expertness, facility, knack.—4. Penetration.

quicksand (kwik'sand), n. [< ME. quyksande (= D. kvikzand = G. quicksand = Icel. kviksand = Sw. quicksand = Dan. kviksand); < quick + sand.] A movable sand-bank in a sea, lake, or river; a large mass of loose or moving sand mixed with water formed on many sea-coasts, at the mouths and in the channels of rivers, etc., sometimes dangerous to vessels, and especially to travelers.

And fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands [should be cast upon the Syrtis, E. V.], [they] struck sail and so were driven.

Acts xxvii. 17.

And what is Edward but a ruthless sea?

What Clarence, but a quicksand of deceit?

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 4. 26.

quicksandy (kwik'san-di), a. [< quicksand + -y.] Containing or abounding in quicksands; consisting of or resembling quicksands.

The rotten, moorish, quicksandy grounds.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 353.

quid¹ (kwid'), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. quidded, ppr. quidding. [*< quid*¹, n.] To drop partly masticated food from the mouth: said of horses.

quid² (kwid'), n. [< L. quid, interrog. what, indef. somewhat, something, neut. (= E. what) of quis, who, = E. who: see who.] 1. What; nature; substance.

You must know my age
Hath scene the beings and the quid of things;
I know the dimensions and the termin
Of all existence. Marston, The Fawne, I. 2.

2. Something; used chiefly in the phrase tertium quid (see below). See predication.—Tertium quid, something different from both mind and matter, a representative object in perception, itself immediately known, mediating between the mind and the reality.

The Quids, in U. S. hist. from 1805 to 1811, a section of the Democratic-Republican party which was attached to extreme State-rights and democratic views, and separated itself from the administration, under the leadership of John Randolph, favoring Monroe as successor to Jefferson: supposed to have been so named as being tertium quid to the Federalists and administration Republicans. Also called Quiddists.

In his next speech he avowed himself to be no longer a republican; he belonged to the third party, the quiddists or quids, being that tertium quid, that third something, which had no name, but was really an anti-Madison movement. H. Adams, John Randolph, II. 181.

quid³ (kwid'), n. [Origin obscure.] A sovereign (£1). [Slang, Eng.]

quidam (kwí'dam), n. [L. some, a certain, < qui, who, + -dam, var. -dem, an indef. suffix.] Somebody; one unknown. [Rare.]

No quirk left, no quiddit,
That may defeat him?

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, I. 3.
By some strange quiddit, or some wrested clause,
To find him guilty of the breach of laws.

Drayton, The Owl.

quidditative (kwid'i-tā-tiv), a. [< F. quidditativ, < ML. quidditativus, < quiddita (-t), 'whatness': see quiddity.] Constituting the essence of a thing.—Quidditative being, entity. See the nouns.—Quidditative predication, the predication of the genus or species.

quiddity (kwid'i-ti), n.; pl. quiddities (-tiz). [= F. quiddité, < ML. quiddita (-t), 'whatness,' < L. quid, what (= E. what): see *quid*².] 1. In scholastic philos., that which distinguishes a thing from other things, and makes it what it is, and not another; substantial form; nature.

I dare undertake Orlando Furioso, or honest King Arthur, will never displease a Souldier: but the quiddity of Ens, and Prima materia, will hardly agree with a Coralet.

Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

Neither shal I stand to trifle with one that will tell me of quiddities and formalities.

Milton, Church-Government, II. 1.
The Quiddity and Essence of the incomprehensible Creator cannot imprint any formal Conception upon the finite Intellect of the Creature. Hovell, Letters, II. 11.

Reason is a common name, and agrees both to the understanding and essence of things as explained in definition. Quiddity they commonly call it. The intellect they call reason reasoning, quiddity reason reasoned.

Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman, L. xxi. 4.

2. A trifling nicety; a cavil; a quirk or quibble.

But she, in quirks and quiddities of love,
Sets me to school, she is so overwise.

Greene, George-a-Greene.

Evasion was his armature, quiddity his defence.

J. T. Fields, Underbrush, p. 80.

quiddle¹ (kwid'l), v. i.; pret. and pp. quiddled, ppr. quiddling. [A dim. or freq. form, appar. based on L. quid, what, as in quiddit, quiddity, etc.: see *quid*², quiddity.] 1. To spend or waste time in trifling employments, or to attend to useful subjects in a trifling or superficial manner; be of a trifling, time-wasting character.

quien, n. [F. chien, dial. quien, < L. canis, a dog: see hound.] A dog. [Thieves' cant.]

"Curse the quiens," said he. And not a word all dinner-time but "Curse the quiens!" I said I must know who they were before I would curse them. "Quiens? why, that was dogs. And I knew not even that much?"

C. Reade, Cloister and Hearth, iv.

quien sabe (kien sä'be). [Sp.: quien, who, < L. quem, acc. of quis, who; sabe, 3d pers. sing. pres. ind. of saber, know, < L. sapere, have taste or sense: see sapient.] Who knows? a form of response equivalent to 'how should I know?' or 'I do not know,' occasionally used by Americans on the Pacific coast.

quiet, n. An obsolete variant of *quire*¹.

quiesce (kwí-es'), v. i.; pret. and pp. quiesced, ppr. quiescing. [< L. quiescere, rest, keep quiet, < quies, rest, quiet: see quiet, n. Cf. acquiesce.] 1. To become quiet or calm; become silent.

The village, after a season of acute conjecture, quiesced into that sarcastic surferance of the anomaly into which it may have been noticed that small communities are apt to subside from such occasions.

Hovells, Annie Kilburn, xxx.

2. In philol., to become silent, as a letter; come to have no sound. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 282.

quiescence (kwí-es'ens), n. [< LL. quiescentia, rest, quiet, < L. quiescent (-t), ppr. of quiescere, repose, keep quiet: see quiescent.] 1. The state or quality of being quiescent or inactive; rest; repose; inactivity; the state of a thing without motion or agitation: as, the quiescence of a volcano.

'Tis not unlikely that he [Adam] had as clear a perception of the earth's motion as we think we have of its quiescence.

Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, I.

It is not enough that we are stimulated to pleasure or to pain, we must lapse into muscular quiescence to realize either.

A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 149.

quietism (kwí'et-izm), n. [= F. quietisme = Sp. Pg. It. quietismo = G. quietismus, < NL. quietismus; as quiet + -ism]. 1. That form of mysticism which consists in the entire abnegation of all active exercise of the will and a purely passive meditation on God and divine things as the highest spiritual exercise and the means of bringing the soul into immediate union with the Godhead. Conspicuous exponents of quietism were Molinos and Mme. Guyon, in the seventeenth century. See Molinist.

If the temper and constitution were cold and phlegmatic, their religion has sunk into quietism; if bilious or sanguine, it has flamed out into all the frenzy of enthusiasm.

Warburton, Alliance, I.

The Monks of the Holy Mountain (Mount Athos), from the eleventh century, appeared to have yielded to a kind of quietism, and to have held that he who, in silence and solitude, turned his thoughts with intense introspection on himself, would find his soul enveloped in a mystic and ethereal light, the essence of God, and be filled with pure and perfect happiness.

J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, I. 870, note.

2. The state or quality of being quiet; quietness. [Rare.]

He . . . feared that the thoughtlessness of my years might sometimes make me overstep the limits of quietism which he found necessary.

Some tricks, some *quillet*s, how to cheat the devil.

He is . . . swallowed in the quicksands of law-*quillet*s. Middleton, Trick to Catch the Old One, l. 1.

quill-feather (kwil'fēth'er), n. Same as *quill*¹, 5. See feather.

quilling (kwil'ing), n. [*< quill*² + *-ing*¹.] A narrow bordering of net, lace, or ribbon plaited so as to resemble a row of quills.

A plain quilling in your bonnet—and if ever any body looked like an angel, it's you in a net quilling.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, lxxx.

quill-nib (kwil'nib), n. A quill pen from which the feather and a large part of the tube have been cut away, leaving only enough of the substance to give the point of the pen sufficient consistence. This is done for ease of transportation, and the nib requires a holder like the steel pen.

quillon (kē-lyōn'), n. One of the arms or branches of the cross-guard of a sword. See cross-guard, cross-hilt, cut in next column, and cut under hilt.

quilltail (kwil'tāl), n. The ruddy duck, Eristamatura rubida. Also called quilltail coot. [New Jersey.]

quill-turn (kwil'tēr), n. A machine or instrument in which a weavers' quill is turned. Halliwel.

quill-work

(kwil'wērk), n. Embroidery with porcupine-quills, such as that made by the North American Indians. See Canadian embroidery, under Canadian.

quillwort (kwil'wērt), n. A plant, Isoetes lacustris: so called from the quill-like leaves; also, any plant of the genus Isoetes. See Isoetes and Merlin's grass.

quilly (kwil'i), a. [*< quill*¹ + *-y*¹.] Abounding in quills; showing the quills, as a bird's plumage when frayed or worn away.

His wings became quilly and dragged and frayed.

J. Owen, Wings of Hope.

quilt (kwilt), n. [< ME. quilte, quylte, < OF. cuilte, also cotre, coute, also coite, coille, coistre, a tick, mattress, = Sp. Pg. colcha = It. coltre = W. cylched, a quilt, < L. culcita, culcitra, a cushion, pillow, mattress, quilt: see cushion. Cf. *counterpane*¹. The Ir. cuille, a bed, bed-tick, is appar. from the E.] 1. A mattress or flock-bed.

Cause to be made a good thycke quylte of cotton, or els of pure flockes or of cleane wolle, and let the couerynge of it be of whyte fustyan, and laye it on the fetherbed that you do lye on.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 245.

After that thei lay down to slepe vpon the grasse, for other quyltes ne pilowes hadde thei noon.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 539.

And you have fastened on a thick quilt, or flock-bed, on the outside of the door.

B. Jonson, Epicoene, ii. 1.

2. A cover or coverlet made by stitching together two thicknesses of a fabric with some soft substance between them; any thick or warm coverlet: as, a patchwork quilt.

In both sorts of tables the beds were covered with magnificent quilts. Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins, p. 134.

There Affection, with a sickly mien, . . .

On the rich quilt sinks with becoming woe.

Pope, R. of the L., iv. 85.

3. A quilted petticoat. [Rural.]—Log-cabin quilt. See log.—Marseilles quilt, a double cotton-cloth coverlet woven in patterns which are raised in relief in parts, from having a third thickness there interposed.

quilt (kwilt), v. [< quilt, n.] I. trans. 1. To stuff or interline in the manner of a quilt; supply with stuffing.

A bag quilted with bran is very good, but it drieth too much.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

With these [verminous and polluted rags] deformedly to quilt and interlace the intire, the spotlesse, and undecaying robe of Truth.

Milton, Prelatical Episcopacy.

To Charing Cross, and there into the great new Ordinary, . . . being led thither by Mr. Beale, . . . and he sat with me while I had two quilted pigeons, very handsome and good meat.

Pepps, Diary, Sept. 26, 1668.

Dressed

In his steel jack, a swarthy vest,

With iron quilted well. Scott, Marmion, v. 3.

2. To stitch together, as two pieces of cloth, usually with some soft substance between: as, to quilt a petticoat; in general, to stitch together: said of anything of which there are at least three layers or thicknesses, the stitching often taking an ornamental character, the lines crossing one another or arranged in curves, volutes, etc.—3. To pass through a fabric backward and forward at minute intervals, as a needle and thread in the process of making a quilt.

He . . . stoops down to pick up a pin, which he quilts into the flap of his coat-pocket with great assiduity.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 1.

Quilted armor, stuffed and wadded garments of defense held in place and strengthened by quilting.—Quilted calves, sham calves for the legs, made of quilted cloth. Halliwel.—Quilted grape-shot. See grape-shot.

quilter (kwil'tēr), n. [< quilt + *-er*¹.] 1. One who quilts; one who makes quilting.—2. An attachment to sewing-machines for executing quilting upon fabrics.

quilting (kwil'ting), n. [Verbal n. of quilt, v.] 1. The act or operation of forming a quilt.—2. The material used for making quilts; padding or lining.—3. Quilted work.

Sword-hilt. a, a, quillons.

Thick quiltings covered with elaborate broiery.
Buher, Last Days of Pompeii, i. 3.

4. A kind of cloth resembling diaper, having a pattern slightly marked by the direction of the threads or raised in low relief. It is made of cotton and of linen, and is used, like piqué, for waistcoats.—5. A quilting-bee. [New Eng.]—French quilting. Same as piqué, 2 (a).

quilting-bee (kwil'ting-bé), n. A meeting of women for the purpose of assisting one of their number in quilting a counterpane: usually followed by a supper or other entertainment to which men are invited. [New Eng.]

Now [in the days of Peter Stuyvesant] were instituted quilting bees. . . and other rural assemblages, where, under the inspiring influence of the fiddle, toll was enlivened by gayety and followed up by the dance.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 406.

quilting-cotton (kwil'ting-kót'n), n. Same as cotton wadding (which see, under cotton).

quilting-frame (kwil'ting-frám), n. A frame with adjustable bars, wires, etc., used for stretching flat a fabric for quilting or for convenience in embroidering upon it.

Quimper pottery. See pottery.

quin (kwin), n. [Possibly < Ir. cuine, cun, coin, money; with ref. to the shape.] A kind of scallop or peecten. Also queen, squin. [Local, Eng.]

quina (kwí'ná or ké'ná), n. [= F. quina, < Sp. Pg. quina (NL. quina), < S. Amer. (Peruv.) quina, kina, bark.] The bark of various species of Cinchona: also applied in Brazil to some other febrifugal barks.

quinamia (kwi-ná'mí-á), n. [NL., < quina + am(ide) + -ia.] Same as quinamine.

quinamicine (kwi-nam'i-sin), n. [< quinamine: an arbitrary form.] An artificial alkaloid obtained from quinamine. Its formula is $C_{19}H_{24}N_2O_2$.

quinamidine (kwi-nam'i-din), n. [< quina + amide + -ine.] An artificial alkaloid obtained from quinamine. It is isomeric with quinamicine.

quinamine (kwi-nam'in), n. [< quina + amine.] A natural crystalline alkaloid, with the formula $C_{19}H_{24}N_2O_2$, obtained from various Cinchona barks. Also called quinamia.

quinancyt, n. An obsolete form of quinsy.

quinancy-wort, n. An obsolete form of quinsy-wort. Miller, English Plant Names.

quinaquina (ké-ná-ké'ná), n. [Also quinaquina = F. quinquina = Sp. quinaquina, < Peruv. quinaquina, the tree which yields the bark called quina: see quina.] The bark of various species of Cinchona. See kin-kina.

quinary (kwi-ná'ri-an), a. and n. [< quinary + -an.] 1. a. Quinary, as a system of classification; classified in sets of five. In zoölogy the word notes specifically the circular or so-called natural system of classification, originally propounded by Macleay in 1819, and further elaborated especially by Vigors and Swainson. As subsequently modified and formulated by Swainson in 1835, it rests substantially upon the following five propositions: (1) Every natural series of beings, in its progress from a given point, returns or tends to return to that point, thus forming a circle. (2) The primary circular divisions of every group are actually three, or apparently five. (3) The contents of such a circular group are symbolically or analogically represented by the contents of all other circles in the animal kingdom. (4) These primary divisions of every group are characterized by definite peculiarities of form, structure, and economy, which, under diversified modifications, are uniform throughout the animal kingdom, and are therefore to be regarded as the primary types of nature. (5) The different ranks or degrees of the circular groups are nine in number, each being involved within the other. None of these propositions being intelligible, the system soon fell into disuse, and is now regarded as entirely groundless and fanciful.

II. n. In zoöl., one who proposed, practised, or taught the quinary system of classification; an adherent of the quinary system.

There were not wanting other men in these islands whose common sense refused to accept the metaphorical doctrine and the mystical jargon of the Quinaryans; but so strenuously and persistently had the latter asserted their infallibility, and so vigorously had they assailed any who ventured to doubt it, that most peaceable ornithologists found it best to bend to the furious blast, and in some sort to acquiesce at least in the phraseology of the self-styled interpreters of Creative Will.

A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 16.

quinary (kwi'ná-ri), a. and n. [= F. quinaire = Sp. Pg. It. quinario, < L. quinary, containing five, < quini, five each, < quinque, five, = E. five.] I. a. 1. Divided in a set of five, as parts or organs of most radiates.

A quinary division of segments.

Adams, Manual of Nat. Hist., p. 328.

2. In zoöl., same as quinaryan.

Swainson's system of classification was peculiar. He endeavored to establish "circular" or quinary analogies throughout the animal kingdom. Amer. Nat., XXI. 889.

The mischief caused by this theory of a Quinary System (in zoölogy) was very great, but was chiefly confined to Britain. A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 15.

Quinary system, or quinary classification. See quinaryan.

II. n.; pl. quinaryies (-riz). A whole composed of five parts or elements.

Quaternaries or compounds formed of four elements, quinaryies, sextaries, etc., according as the number of the constituent elements increases.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 740.

quinate¹ (kwí'nát), a. [< L. quini, five each, + -ate.] In bot., having an arrangement of five similar parts together, as five leaflets on a petiole.

quinate² (kwí'nát), n. [< quin(ic) + -ate.] In chem., a salt of quinic acid.

quince¹ (kwins), n. [Formerly also quince; < ME. quence, an extension of quine, appar. orig. plural taken as singular: see *quince*². Cf. L. cydonia, pl., quince. Less prob. a reduction of OF. coignasse, the largest kind of quince; < coin, quince: see *quince*².] 1. The fruit of the tree Pyrus Cydonia. (See def. 2.) It is pear-shaped, or in one variety apple-shaped, large, sometimes weighing a pound, of a golden-yellow color when ripe, and very fragrant. The quince was known to the ancients, and it has been argued that the golden apples of the Hesperides were quinces. While raw it is hard and austere, but it becomes edible by boiling or baking, and is largely used for jelly, preserves, and marmalade (see etymology of marmalade), and for flavoring sauces of other fruits. The seeds of the common quince are used in medicine and the arts, on account of their highly mucilaginous coat. In decoction they afford a demulcent application, and they are sometimes used in eye-lotions. Their mucilage is employed in making bandoline and in marbling books. See bandoline.

Of ripen'd Quinces such the yellow Hue.

Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, iii.

2. The fruit-tree Pyrus Cydonia, sometimes classed as Cydonia vulgaris, the latter genus being based (insufficiently) on the many-seeded cells of the fruit. The quince is a small hardy tree, usually dwarfed, but sometimes reaching 15 or 20 feet in height, having crooked spreading branches which produce the flowers singly at their ends. Besides bearing fruit, the quince often serves as a stock for dwarfing the pear. The local origin of the quince is not clearly known, but it occurs spontaneously from northwestern India westward through the Mediterranean basin. The name quince applies also to any of the plants formerly referred to Cydonia. See the phrases below.—Bengal quince, Egle Marmelos. See Egle.—Chinese quince, a species, Pyrus Cathayensis (Cydonia Sinensis), resembling the Japanese quince, but less ornamental. Its large green egg-shaped fruit can be used to make jelly.—Japanese quince, a garden shrub, Pyrus (Cydonia) Japonica, a great favorite, on account chiefly of its abundant early large scarlet or crimson flowers, varying to white. It is well suited for ornamental hedges. The fruit, which resembles a small apple, is inedible, but is sometimes used for making jelly. Also called japonica and, locally, burning-bush. P. (C.) Maudsl. more lately from Japan, bears abundant smaller orange-scarlet flowers on every twig.—Portugal quince, a variety of the common quince, having superior finely colored fruit, but less productive than other sorts.—Quince-essence. See essence and ether, under quince.

quince² (kwins), n. [ME. quynce; appar. an abbr. form of quinsy, quinancy.] Scrofula.

For the quynce. Take horehownd and columbyne, and sethe it in wyne or ale, and so thereof let hym dryncke fyrste and laste.
MS. Rec. Med. (Halliwell.)

quince³ (kwins), n. Same as quince.

quincenary (kwin-sen'te-ná-ri), a. and n. [Irreg. < L. quinqu(e), five, + centenarius, consisting of a hundred: see centenary.] I. a. Relating to or consisting of five hundred, especially five hundred years.

II. n. 1. That which consists of or comprehends five hundred.—2. A five-hundredth anniversary.

It saves us from the reproach of having allowed the quincenary of the Canterbury Pilgrimage to pass by utterly unnoticed.
The Academy, Nov. 24, 1888, p. 351.

quince-tree (kwins'tré), n. The tree that bears the quince, Pyrus Cydonia. See *quince*¹.

quince-wine (kwins'win), n. A drink made of the fermented juice of the quince.

quinch (kwinch), v. i. [A var. of *quitch*¹, appar. simulating winch for wince.] 1. To move; stir; wince; founce.

But Cato did abide it a long time, and never quincched for it, nor shewed countenance of fear.

North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 638.

Noe parts of all that realm shall be able or dare see much as to quince.
Spenser, State of Ireland.

2. To make a noise. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

quincuncial (kwin-kun'shal), a. [= F. quincuncial = It. quincunciale, < L. quincuncialis, containing five twelfths, < quincunx, five twelfths: see quincunx.] Disposed so as to form a quincunx; arranged in a set of five; also, arranged in two sets of oblique rows, at right angles to one another, so that five together form a quincunx; in bot., sometimes noting a pentastichous arrangement of leaves; more often noting an estivation.

Now for the order of setting trees either in groves, hop-yards, or vineyards, we ought to follow the usual manner of chequer row called quincuncial.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, vii. 11.

Quincuncial estivation, the imbricated arrangement of five petals in a bud, in which the first and second are external, the fourth and fifth internal, and the third has one margin external, overlying the fifth, the other internal, overlapped by the first.—Quincuncial map-projection. See projection.

quincuncially (kwin-kun'shal-i), adv. In a quincuncial manner or order.

It is no wonder that this quincuncial order was first and still affected as grateful unto the eye: for all things are seen quincuncially.
Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, iv.

quincunx (kwin'kungks), n. [= F. quincunx = Pg. quincunx, a quincunx; < L. quincunx (quincunx), five twelfths (of anything), < quince, = E. five, + uncia, a twelfth part: see five and ounce.] 1. An arrangement of five objects in a square, one at each corner and one in the middle (thus, ✕); especially, an arrangement, as of trees, in such squares continuously. A collection of trees in such squares forms a regular grove or wood, presenting parallel rows or alleys in different directions, according to the spectator's position. See diagram under quincuncial.

Before them obliquely, in order of quincunx, were pits dug three foot deep. Bladen, tr. of Caesar's Com., vii. 31.

The single quincunx of the Hyades upon the neck of Taurus.
Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, iii.

2. In bot., same as quincuncial estivation (which see, under quincuncial).—3. In astrol., the position of planets when distant from each other five signs or 150°.

quincuncial (kwin-kungk'shal), a. An erroneous form of quincuncial.

In quincuncial restivation . . . two of the five pieces are exterior. Le Maout and Decandé, Botany (trans.), p. 86.

quindécagon (kwin-dek'á-gon), n. [< L. quindecim, = E. five, + E. decagon.] In geom., a plane figure with fifteen sides and fifteen angles.

quindécemvir (kwin-dé-sem'vēr), n. [Altered in the second vowel to suit decemvir; < L. quindécemvir, < quindécim, = E. fifteen (see quindécim), + vir, a man.] In Rom. antiq., one of a body of fifteen magistrates who, at the close of the republic, had charge of the Sibylline books. They succeeded the board of the decemvirs (decemviri sacris faciundis, or decemviri sacrorum), who were keepers of the Sibylline books from 367 B. C., and who continued the functions of the duumvirs, or two patricians of high rank who kept the books under the kings. It was the duty of the quindécemvirs to celebrate the festival of Apollo and the secular games, and they were all regarded as priests of Apollo.

quindécemvirate (kwin-dé-sem'vi-rāt), n. [< L. quindécemviratus, the dignity of a quindécemvir, < quindécemvir, the quindécemvirs: see quindécemvir.] The body or office of the quindécemvirs.

quindécim (kwin'dé-sim), n. [< LL. quindécimus (L. quintus decimus), fifteenth, < L. quindécim, fifteen, < quinque, = E. five, + decem, = E. ten.] A fifteenth part of anything.

Over and beside hath also bene declared what vnreasonable collections of monie from time to time, as quindécims, subsidies, tenths, &c. Foote, Martyrs, p. 298, an. 1257.

quindécima (kwin-des'i-mā), n. [ML., fem. of quindécimus, fifteenth: see quindécim.] 1. In music, the interval of a fifteenth, or double octave.—2. An organ-stop two octaves above the foundation-stops.

quindenet, n. [ME. quyndene, < OF. quindese (?), < ML. quindecimus, fifteenth: see quindecim. Cf. ML. quindena, a period of fifteen days.] The fifteenth day, counting inclusively from a certain date.

And that done, he toke his leue of seynt Denys about y^e quyndene of Pasche. Fabyan, Chron., II., an. 1347.

quindiamet, n. Same as quindecim.

In the parliament of 6 R. 2. pars 2 num. 11. the bishop of Norwich offered before the king and lords that, if the king would grant him the quindiamet and disme of the laity and clergy . . . Prynne, Treachery and Disloyalty, iv. 7.

quinel, n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of quean.
quinel², n. [ME. quyne, coine, coin, < OF. coin, F. coing = Pr. codoing, m., = It. cotogna, f., a quince, < L. Cydonium, Cydoneum (sc. malum), < Gr. Kydonion (sc. μήλον), a quince, lit. 'apple of Cydonia', < Kydonia, Kydonis, Cydonia, an ancient Greek city of Crete: see Cydonia. Cf. *quince*¹, quiddany.] A quince.

quine³, adv. An obsolete dialectal form of whence.

quinet (kwī'net), n. [< OF. quignet, quoignet, coignet, cuiquet, a little wedge, dim. of quoin, coin, a wedge: see *coin*¹, coign.] A wedge. Hal-liwell. [Prov. Eng.]

quinia (kwīn'i-ä), n. [NL., < quina, q. v.] An older name for quinine.

quinible (kwīn'i-bl), n. [ME. quynible, ult. < L. quinque = E. five. Cf. quatrible.] In music, an interval of a fifth; a descendant sung at the fifth.

Therto he song som tyme a loud quynible.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 146.

To sing a quinible means to descant by singing fifths on a plain-song.

Chappell, Popular Music of the Olden Time, p. 34.

quinible (kwīn'i-bl), v. i. [< quinible, n.] In music, to sing a descendant at the interval of a fifth. See diaphony, 2.

quinic (kwīn'ik), a. [< quina + -ic.] Same as kinic.

quinicia (kwī-nish'i-ä), n. [NL., < quinic, q. v.] Same as quinicine.

quinicine (kwīn'i-sin), n. [< quinic + *-ine*².] The isomeric alkaloid into which quinine or quinidine is converted by heat, differing from them in being dextrogyrate and amorphous.

quinidamine (kwīn-i-dam'in), n. [< quina + -id + amine.] An alkaloid of cinchona barks, with the formula C₁₉H₂₄N₂O₂. Also called conchinamine.

quinidine (kwīn'id-in), n. [< quina + -id + *-ine*².] A base (C₂₀H₂₄N₂O₂) isomeric with quinine, and occurring associated with it in some cinchona barks. It crystallizes in large transparent prisms, almost insoluble in water, but tolerably soluble in alcohol. It neutralizes acids, and forms salts with them which much resemble the corresponding quinine salts, but crystallize more easily. Their action on the system is similar to that of quinine, but less powerful. Also called conchinine.

quinine (kwīn'ën or ki-nën' or kwī'nīn), n. [= F. quinine = Sp. Pg. quinina = It. chinina, chinino, < NL. quinina, quinine, < quina, Peruvian bark: see quina and *-ine*².] A very important vegetable alkali (C₂₀H₂₄N₂O₂), obtained from the bark of several trees of the genus Cinchona. It is colorless, inodorous, and extremely bitter. With acids it forms crystallizable salts, the most important of which is the sulphate, extensively used in medicine. It is antiperiodic, antipyretic, antineuralgic, and tonic.

quininism (ki-nën'izm), n. [< quinine + -ism.] Same as cinchonism.

quiniretin (kwīn-i-ret'in), n. [< quinine; second element obscure.] The flocculent precipitate deposited in solutions of quinine by the action of sunlight. It has the same chemical composition as quinine, but no alkaloidal properties.

quinisext (kwīn'i-sekst), a. [< L. quini, five each, five, + sextus, sixth.] Bearing some relation to five and six or to the fifth and sixth. — Quinisext Council. See Constantinopolitan Council, under Constantinopolitan.

quinism (kwī'nizm), n. [< quina + -ism.] Same as cinchonism.

quink-goose (kwīngk'gōs), n. [< quink (imitative) + goose.] The brent-goose, Bernicla brenta. See cut under brent-goose.

quinnat (kwīn'at), n. [The native name.] The king-salmon, Oncorhynchus quinnat. Also called chavicha and equinna. See Oncorhynchus and salmon.

quina (kē'nō-ä), n. [Also quinua; Peruv.] An annual herb, Chenopodium Quinoa, native in Peru, Chili, etc., and there much cultivated for its farinaceous seeds. These afford a meal which can be made into cakes, but not into leavened bread. A favorite preparation is a kind of broth or gruel called cara-pulque, prepared from these seeds and seasoned with red pepper, etc. The quinoa is somewhat grown in England, the seed being eaten by fowls, and the leaves used like spinach. The plant resembles some common species of goose-foot or pigweed. A variety having white seeds is the one yielding food; the red seeds of another variety are used in decoction as an application for sores and bruises, and their husk has emetic and antiperiodic properties. Also called petty-rice.

They [the Incas of Peru] had also Maiz, Quinoa, Pulse, Fruit-trees, with Fruit on them all, of Gold and Silver resembling the natural.

S. Clarke, Geog. Descr. (1671), p. 281.

quinoline (kwīn'ō-lin), n. [< quina + -ol + *-ine*².] Same as chinoline. — Quinoline blue, a coal-tar color formerly used in dyeing: it is very fugitive to light.

quinologist (kwī-nol'ō-jist), n. [< quinolog + -ist.] One who is versed in quinology.

quinology (kwī-nol'ō-jī), n. [< NL. quina + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak, say.] The sum of scientific knowledge concerning quinine and other cinchona alkaloids.

quinone (kwīn'ōn), n. [< quina + -one.] 1. The general name applied to all benzene derivatives in which two hydrogen atoms are replaced by two oxygen atoms.—2. Specifically, a compound obtained by distilling kinic acid with diluted sulphuric acid and peroxid of manganese, or by the oxidation of aniline with chromic acid. It is in the form of a sublimate of fine golden-yellow crystals, slightly soluble in cold water and very volatile, and has a piercing irritating odor in the state of vapor. Also written kinone.

quinquagenarian (kwīn'kwā-je-nā'ri-an), a. and n. [= F. quinquagénaire = Sp. quinquagenario = It. quingagenario, < L. quingagenarius, consisting of fifty, < quingaginta, fifty each, < quingaginta, fifty, < quinque = E. five.] I. a. Being fifty years of age.

II. n. A person aged fifty or between fifty and sixty.

Dancers of fifty are a very different sort of quinquagenarians from sitters of fifty. The New Mirror (1843), II. 34.

quinquagesima (kwīn-kwā-jes'i-mā), n. [L., fem. of quinquagesimus, fiftieth, < quingaginta, fifty: see fifty.] A period of fifty days.—Quinquagesima Sunday, the Sunday immediately preceding Ash Wednesday, being the fiftieth day before Easter (both inclusive), and the last Sunday before Lent; Shrove Sunday.

quinquangular (kwīn-kwāng'gū-lār), a. [< LL. quingangulus, five-cornered, < L. quinque, = E. five, + angulus, corner, angle: see *angle*³.] Having five angles.

quinquarticular (kwīn-kwār'tik'ū-lār), a. [< L. quinque, = E. five, + articulus, joint, article.] Consisting of or relating to five articles.—Quinquarticular controversy, the controversy between the Arminians and the Calvinists on the "five points." See The Five Articles and The Five Points, under article.

You may perhaps be able to grapple with the difficulties of the quinquarticular controversy without discredit to yourselves. Bp. Horsley, Charge, Aug., 1806.

quinquecapsular (kwīn-kwē-kap'sū-lār), a. [< L. quinque, = E. five, + capsula, capsule.] In bot. and zool., having five capsules.

quinenerved (kwīn'kwē-nērvd), a. [< L. quinque, = E. five, + nervus, nerve, + *-ed*².] Same as quintuplennerved.

quinennalia (kwīn-kwē-nā'li-ä), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of quinennalis, that takes place every fifth year: see quinennial.] In Rom. antiq., public games celebrated every fifth year. See quinennial, n. 2.

quinenniad (kwīn-kwē-ni-ad), n. [< L. quinennium, a period of five years (see quinennium), + *-ad*¹.] A period of five years.

So sleeping, so aroused from sleep,
Thro' sunny decades new and strange,
Or gay quinennia, would we reap
The flower and quintessence of change.
Tennyson, The Day-Dream, L'Envoi.

quinennial (kwīn-kwē-ni-äl), a. and n. [For quinennial*, < L. quinennalis, occurring once in five years, < quinennis, of five years, < quinque, = E. five, + annus, year.] I. a. 1. Occurring once in five years.—2. Recurring in the fifth year, reckoning both years of occurrence; occurring every fourth year. See II., 2.

With joyous banquets had he crown'd
The great quinennial festival of Jove.
West, tr. of Pindar's Nemean Odes, xl.

3. Lasting five years.

II. n. 1. A period of five years; a quinquennial; hence, something characterized by such a period or interval, as an anniversary, or a college catalogue.—2. A festival or celebration occurring once in four years; an anniversary in the fifth year. In this sense both the first and last years of the cycle of occurrence were reckoned, as was the invariable system in antiquity. Thus, the Olympian, Pythian, and Isthmian games, all celebrated once in four years, were all quinquennials.

quinennially (kwīn-kwē-ni-äl-i), adv. Once in five years; during a period of five years.

quinennium (kwīn-kwē-ni-üm), n. [L., < quinennis, of five years: see quinennial.] A period of five years.

quinetivevular (kwin-kwē-val'vū-lār), a. [< L. quinque, = E. five, + NL. valvula, dim. of valva, valve: see valve.] Same as quinetivevalve.

quinetivevir (kwin'kwē-vēr), n.; pl. quinetiveviri (kwin-kwē-vi-ri). [< L. quinque, = E. five, + vir, a man.] In Rom. antiq., one of five commissioners who were appointed from time to time under the republic as extraordinary magistrates to carry any measure into effect, as to provide relief in time of public distress, to direct the establishment of a colony, or to provide for the repair of fortifications.

quinqi. For words so erroneously spelled, see quinque.

quina (kin'ki-nā), n. Same as quinaquina.

quinaquina (kin'ki-nō), n. [S. Amer.] A tree, Myroxylon Pereiræ, the source of the balsam of Peru. It is found on a strip along the coast of San Salvador called the Balsam Coast. It has a height of 50 feet, branching at 8 or 10 feet from the ground; the leaves are pinnate, 6 or 8 inches long, the flowers numerous in erect racemes, the pods 3 or 4 inches long, narrow at the base, broadening and winged above, containing one seed. The balsam is obtained by the natives from the trunk by a process of beating and incision. It was first exported by the way of Peru, whence its name. The fruit also yields to cold pressure a valuable white balsam, and digested in rum furnishes a medicine, balsamito, but neither of these is an article of commerce. See Myroxylon, and balsam of Peru (under balsam).

quinsy (kwin'zi), n. [Formerly also quinsey, quincy, quincy (also quincy); reduced from early quincy, quincy*, quincie, a contracted form of quinancy, < OF. squincie, squinace, squinace, F. esquinace (cf. also OF. quincatque, quincatque) = Sp. esquinacia = Pg. esquinencia = It. schinanzia, quinsy, with prosthetic s. < LL. cynanche, < Gr. κυνάγχη, a kind of sore throat, also a dog-collar, lit. 'dog-throttling,' < κυν (kyn-), dog, + ἀγχω, choke, throttle. Cf. cynanche.] Tonsillitis; specifically, a deep suppurative tonsillitis.

In steps that insolent insulter,
The cruel quincy, leaping like a vulture
At Adams' throat.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II. The Furies.

Why don't you speak out?—not stand croaking like a frog in a quincy!
Sheridan, The Rivals, iv. 2.

quinsy-berry (kwin'zi-bēr'i), n. The black currant, Ribes nigrum, of the northern Old World, often planted. Its berries are eaten, and a jelly of them is a long-known popular remedy for quinsy and sore throat.

quinsywort (kwin'zi-wért), n. [Formerly also quinancy-wort, quinancy-wort; < quinsy + wort.] A small trailing European herb, Asperula cynanchica, of the Rubiaceæ, having narrow leaves whorled in fours, and small, clustered, nearly white flowers. It was once reputed efficacious as a gargle in quinsy and sore throat, whence the common and the specific names. Also quinsy-woodruff.

quintain (kwint'tān), n. [Formerly also quinten, quintin; < ME. quynlayne, quaintan. < OF. quintaine, quintaine, etc., f., a quintain, F. quintaine = Pr. It. quintana, < ML. quintana, a quintain, also a part of a street where carriages could pass, < L. quintana, a street in a camp, between the fifth and sixth maniples, where were the market and forum of the camp, and, it is supposed, the place of martial exercises, etc., whence the ML. use; fem. (sc. ria) of quintanus, fifth: see quintan.] 1. A figure or other object to be tilted at. It was constructed in various ways. A common form in England consisted of an upright post, on the top of which Movable Quintain, 14th century.

(From Strutt's "Sports and Pastimes of the People of England.") was a horizontal bar turning on a pivot; to one end of this a sandbag was attached, to the other a broad board; and it was a trial of skill to strike or tilt at the broad end with a lance, and pass on before the bag of sand could whirl round and strike the tilter on the back.

My better parts
Are all thrown down, and that which here stands up
Is but a quintain, a mere lifeless block.

Shak., As you Like It, I. 2. 203.

The quintain in its original state was not confined to the exercise of young warriors on horseback; it was an object of practice for them on foot, in order to acquire strength and skill in assaulting an enemy with their swords, spears, and battle-axes.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 183.

2. The game or exercise of tilting at the quintain.

Somur quenes, and quaintans, & other quaint games

(and F.) quintessence* = It. quintessenza = ML. quinta essentia, fifth essence: L. quinta, fem. of quintus, fifth; essentia, being or essence: see quint and essence.] 1. The fifth essence, or fifth body, not composed of earth, water, fire, or air; the substance of the heavenly bodies, according to Aristotle, who seems in this matter to follow Pythagorean doctrine. The quintessence was situated above the four terrestrial elements, and was naturally bright and incorruptible, and endowed with a circular motion.

Forsothe philosophis clepen the purest substance of manye corruptible thingis quintessencia.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 2.

Paracelsus . . . tells us . . . the lungs consume part of the air, and proscribe the rest. So that . . . it seems we may suppose that there is in the air a little vital quintessence (if I may so call it), which serves to the refreshment and restoration of our vital spirits, for which use the grosser and incomparably greater part of the air being unserviceable. It need not seem strange that an animal stands in need of almost incessantly drawing in fresh air.
Boyle, New Experiments touching the Spring of the Air, [Exp. xli. 1.]

Hence—2. An extract from anything, containing its virtues or most essential part in a small quantity; pure and concentrated essence; the best and purest part of a thing; in old chem., an alcoholic tincture or essence often made by digestion at common temperatures or in the sun's heat, and always at a gentle heat.

To comforte the herte, putte yn oure 5 essence, the 5 essence of gold and of peerl, and he schal be deliuerid thereof [of venom] and be hood.

Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 23.

More precious I do holde
Maltes pure quintessence then king Harries golde.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 61.

The quintessence of every sprite
Heaven would in little show.

Shak., As you Like it, III. 2. 147.

The large scarlet anemone outshone even the poppy, whose color here is the quintessence of flame.

B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 116.

Pure quintessences of precious oils
In hollow'd moons of gems.

Tennyson, Palace of Art.

quintus (kwin'tus), n. [ML., < L. quintus, fifth: see quint.] In medieval music, the fifth voice or part. It either corresponded in compass to one of the other four, though independent, or strengthened the different parts in turn: hence sometimes called vaganus.

quinzain, quinzaine (kwin'zān; F. pron. kan-zān'), n. [*< ME. quinzaine, quynsynne, < OF. (and F.) quinzaine, the number of fifteen, a fortnight, < quince, fifteen: see quince.] 1. In chron., the fourteenth day after a feast-day, or the fifteenth if the day of the feast is included.

And the quynsynne after that Merlyn come to courte, and grete was the ioye the kyng made to hym.

Melton (E. E. T. S.), i. 57.

2. A stanza consisting of fifteen lines.

quinze (kwinz; F. pron. kanz'), n. [Also quince; < F. quince, fifteen, < L. quindecim, fifteen: see quindecim.] A game of cards somewhat similar to vingt-un, in which the object is to count fifteen, or as near as possible to that number without exceeding it.

Gambling the whole morning in the Alley, and sitting down at night to quinze and hazard at St. James's.

Colman, Man of Business, iv.

quinzyl, n. See quinsky.

quip (kwip), n. [< W. chwiip, a quick turn or flirt, < chwipio, whip, move briskly. Cf. whip. Hence quib, quibble.] A smart sarcastic turn; a sharp or cutting jest; a severe retort; a gibe.

Pem. Why, what's a quip?

Maner. Wee great girders call it a short saying of a sharpe wit, with a bitter sense in a sweet word.

Lyly, Alexander and Campaspe, iii. 2.

If I sent him word again it was not well cut, he would send me word he cut it to please himself. This is called the quip Modest.

Shak., As you Like It, v. 4. 79.

Haste thee, nymph, and bring with thee
Jest, and youthful jollity,
Quips, and cranks, and wanton wiles.

Milton, L'Allegro, i. 72.

quip (kwip), v.; pret. and pp. quipped, ppr. quipping. [< quip, n.] I. intrans. To use quips or sarcasms; gibe; scoff.

Are you pleasant or peevish, that you quip with such briefe girdes?

Greene, Theeves Falling Out (Harl. Misc., VIII. 383).

Ye malicious haue more minde to quip then might to cut.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 206.

II. trans. To utter quips or sarcasms on; taunt; treat with a sarcastic retort; sneer at.

The more he laughs, and does her closely quip,
To see her sore lament and bite her tender lip.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. vii. 44.

quipo, n. See quipu.

quippert (kwip'ér), n. One who jests or quips. And here, peradventure, some desperate quippert will canname my proposed comparison.

Nashe, Introd. to Greene's Menaphon, p. 14. (Davies.)

quippian (kwip'i-an), n. [So called because denoted by Q.] A curve of the third class, the left-hand member of whose equation is the quintic contravariant of a cubic.

quippish (kwip'ish), a. [< quip + -ish.] Abounding in quips; epigrammatic. [Rare.]

I prefer Fuller's [version], as more quippish and adagy.

N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 501.

quipu (ké'pō or kwip'ō), n. [Also quippu, quipo, quippo; < Peruv. quipu, a knot.] A cord about 2 feet in length, tightly spun from variously colored threads, and having a number of smaller threads attached to it in the form of a fringe: used among the ancient Peruvians and elsewhere for recording events, etc. The fringe-like threads were also of different colors and were knotted. The colors denoted sensible objects, as white for silver and yellow for gold, and sometimes also abstract ideas, as white for peace and red for war. They constituted a rude register of certain important facts or events, as of births, deaths, and marriages, the number of the population fit to bear arms, the quantity of stores in the government magazines, etc.

The mysterious science of the quipus . . . supplied the Peruvians with the means of communicating their ideas to one another, and of transmitting them to future generations.

Prescott, Conquest of Peru, i. 4.

Wampum and quipus are mnemonic records of the most elementary kind. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, i. 18.

quiquihatch (kwé'kwé-hach), n. [Amer. Ind.] The quichatch or wolverene, Gulo luscus.

quire (kwir), v. i.; pret. and pp. quired, ppr. quiring. [< quire, n.] 1. To sing in concert or chorus; chant or sing harmoniously.

There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims.

Shak., M. of V., v. 1. 62.

2. To harmonize.

My throat of war be turn'd,

Which quired with my drum, into a pipe

Small as . . . the virgin voice

That babies lulls asleep!

Shak., Cor., iii. 2. 118.

quire (kwir), n. [Early mod. E. also quier, queer, quere; < ME. quayer, quater, quair, quayre, quier, quier (= Ice. kver, a quire, a book), < OF. quier, quayer, caier, cayer, coyer, a quire (also a square lamp), F. cahier, a quire (six sheets), a copy-book, writing-book, written lectures, a memorial, = Pr. cazern = It. quaderno, a quire, a copy-book, writing-book, cash-book, two fours at dice, < ML. quaternum, a set of four sheets of parchment or paper, neut. of quaternus (> OF. quater, caier, etc., = OIt. quaderno, four-square), pl. quaterni, four at a time: see quatern. For OF. quier, quier, < L. quaternum, cf. enser, < L. infernum.] 1t. A set of four sheets of parchment or paper folded so as to make eight leaves: the ordinary unit of construction for early manuscripts and books.

The quires or gatherings of which the book was formed generally consisted, in the earliest examples, of four sheets folded to make eight leaves.

Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 144.

2. A set of one of each of the sheets of a book laid in consecutive order, ready for folding. E. H. Knight.—3t. A book.

Go, litel quayre, go unto my lyves quene.

Lydgate, Black Knight, l. 674.

4. Twenty-four sheets of paper; the twentieth part of a ream.—In quires, in sheets, not folded or bound: said of printed books.

The Imprinter to sell this Booke in Queres for two shillings and six pence, and not above.

Notice in Edward VI.'s Prayer-Book, 1549.

Inside quires, the eighteen perfect quires of a ream of paper, which were protected by outer quires of imperfect paper, one on each side of the package. This distinction between outside and inside quires is noticeable now only in hand-made papers. Machine-made papers are of uniform quality.

quire (kwir), v. t.; pret. and pp. quired, ppr. quiring. [< quire, n.] To fold in quires, or with marks between quires.

quire (kwir), a. An obsolete form of queer 1.

quirewise (kwir'wiz), adv. In printing, in single forms on double leaves of paper, so that the leaves can be quired and sewed in sections: in distinction from on single leaves, which have to be side-stitched.

Quirinalia (kwir-i-nā'li-ä), n. pl. [L., neut. pl. of quirinalis, pertaining to Quirinus or Romulus, or to the Quirinal Hill at Rome, < Quirinus, a name of Romulus deified: see Quirinus.] In ancient Rome, a festival in honor of Quirinus, celebrated on February 17th, on which day Romulus was said to have been translated to heaven.

quirister (kwir-'is-tēr), n. [Also quirrister, quer-ister, qurester; < *quire*¹, n., + -ister. Cf. chor-ister.] Same as chorister.

The clear quiristers of the woods, the birds.

Ford, Lover's Melancholy, l. 1.

The coy quiristers that lodge within Are prodigal of harmony. Thomson, Spring.

quiritarian (kwir-i-tā-'ri-an), a. [< quiritary + -an.] In Rom. law, legal; noting a certain class or form of rights, as distinguished from bonitarian. The use is equivalent to that of legal in modern law, in contradistinction to equitable.

They [the Roman lawyers] could conceive land as held (so to speak) under different legal dispensations, as belonging to one person in Quiritarian and to another in Bonitarian ownership, a splitting of ownership which, after feudalism had fallen into decay, revived in our country in the distinction between the legal and the equitable estate. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 343.

quiritary (kwir-i-tā-'ri), a. [< ML. quiritaris, < L. Quirites, the Roman citizens; see Quirites.] Same as quiritarian. Encyc. Brit., XX. 682.

quiritation (kwir-i-tā-'shən), n. [< L. quirita-tio (-n-), a cry, a shriek, < quiritare, wail, shriek; commonly explained (first by Varro) as orig. 'call upon the Quirites or Roman citizens for aid,' < Quirites, Quirites; prob. freq. of queri, complain: see *querent*¹, and cf. cry, ult. < quiritare.] A crying for help.

How is it then with thee, O Saviour, that thou thus astonishest men and angels with so wofull a quiritation:
(My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?)
Bp. Hall, The Crucifixion.

Quirite (kwir-'it), n. [< L. Quiris (Quirit-): see Quirites.] One of the Quirites.

Quirites (kwir-i-'tēz), n. pl. [L. pl. of Quiris (Quirit-), orig. an inhabitant of the Sabine town Cures, later a Roman citizen (see def.); < Cures, a Sabine town.] The citizens of ancient Rome considered in their civil capacity. The name Quirites pertained to them in addition to that of Romani, the latter designation having application in their political and military capacity.

quirk¹ (kwérk), n. [Formerly also querk; perhaps a var. of quir* (cf. *jerkl*¹, jert). < W. chwired, craft, quirk (< chuciori, turn briskly), = Gael. cuireid, a turn, wile, trick (cf. car, turn).] 1. A sharp turn or angle; a sudden twist.

Then have they neyther-stocks to these gay hosen, . . .
curiously knit, with open seams down the legges, with quirkes and clockes about the anckles, and sometime (haplie) interlaced with golde or silver threds.
Stubbes, Anat. of Abuses, p. 31. (Nares, under nether-stocks.)

Hence—2. An artful turn for evasion or subterfuge; a shift; a quibble: as, the quirks of a pettifogger.

As one said of a lawyer that, resolving not to be forgotten, he made his will so full of intricate quirks that his executors, if for nothing else, yet for very vexation of law, might have cause to remember him.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 76.

3†. A fit or turn; a short paroxysm.

I have felt so many quirks of joy and grief.

Shak., All's Well, iii. 2. 51.

4. A smart taunt or retort; a slight conceit or quibble; a quip; a flight of fancy.

I may chance have some odd quirks and remnants of wit broken on me.

Shak., Much Ado, ii. 3. 245.

Twisted quirks and happy hits,
From misty men of letters;

The tavern-hours of mighty wits.
Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

5. Inclination; turn; peculiarity; humor; caprice.

I have heard of some kind of men that put quarrels purposely on others, to taste their valour: belike this is a man of that quirk.

Shak., T. N., iii. 4. 203.

6. A sudden turn or flourish in a musical air; a fantastic phrase.

Light quirks of music, broken and uneven,
Make the soul dance upon a jig to heaven.

Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 143.

The quirks of the melody are not unlike those of very old English ballads.

Lathrop, Spanish Vistas, p. 126.

7. In building, a piece taken out of any regular ground-plot or floor, as to make a court or yard, etc.: thus, if the ground-plan were square or oblong, and a piece were taken out of the corner, such piece is called a quirk.—8. In archt., an acute angle or recess; a deep indentation; the incision under the abacus.—9. A pane of glass cut at the sides and top in the form of a rhomb. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

10. In a grooving-plane, a projecting fillet on the sole or side, arranged to serve as a fence or gage for depth or distance.—Bead and quirk, a molding the round part of which forms more than a semi-circle, and which has a sinking on the face termed the quirk.—Quirk molding. Same as quirked molding.

quirk¹ (kwérk), v. [*< quirk*¹, n.] I. intrans. To turn sharply.

II. trans. 1. To twist or turn; form into quirks.—2. To form or furnish with a quirk or channel.

In Grecian architecture, ovolos and ogees are usually quirked at the top.

Quirked molding, a molding characterized by a sharp

A, quirked ogee or cyma reversa (arch of Constantine, Rome); B, quirked ovolo; C, quirked cyma recta; D, quirked bead (E, C, D, modern colonial American woodwork). q q q q, quirks.

quirlewind, n. An obsolete dialectal form of whirlwind.

quirpele, n. [Tamil.] A name for the mon-goos: used in India. Yule and Burnell.

quirt (kwért), n. [Perhaps < Sp. cuerda, a cord, rope: see *cord*¹.] A kind of riding-whip much used in the western parts of the United States and in Spanish-American countries. It usually consists of a short stout stock, a few inches long, of wood, or of leather braided so tightly as to be rigid, and of a braided leather lash, about two feet long, flexible and very loosely attached to the stock. The quirt thus resembles a bull-whip in miniature. It is sometimes entirely braided of leather, like a small black-snake, but so as then to make a short rigid handle and long flexible lash. The quirt is often ornamented fancifully, and generally hung on the right wrist by a leather loop.

quirt (kwért), v. t. [< quirt, n.] To strike or flog with a quirt. [Western U. S.]

A first-class rider will sit throughout it all without moving from the saddle, quirting his horse all the time, though his hat may be jarred off his head and his revolver out of its sheath. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 354.

Quiscalinæ (kwis-kā-'lī-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Quiscalus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Icteridæ, typified by the genus Quiscalus, usually having a lengthened and more or less boat-shaped tail, somewhat crow-like or thrush-like bill, stout feet, and in the male the color entirely iridescent-black; the American grackles or crow-blackbirds. The species are mostly terrestrial and gregarious. See Quiscalus and Scolecophagus.

Quiscalus (kwis-'kā-lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816); appar. < ML. quiscula, quisquila, etc., a quail: see *quail*³.] The typical genus of Quiscalinæ, having the bill elongated and crow-like, the tail long, graduated or rounded, and more or less keeled or boat-shaped. Several species inhabit the United States and warmer parts of America. The common crow-blackbird, or purple grackle, is Q. purpureus (see cut under crow-blackbird); the boat-tailed grackle or jackdaw of the Southern States is Q. major (see cut under boat-shaped); the fan-tailed blackbird is Q. macrurus, inhabiting Texas and Mexico.

quishtint, n. An obsolete form of cushion.

Quisqualis (kwis-kwā-'lis), n. [NL. (Rumphius, 1747), named in allusion to its polymorphous leaves and changing colors of flowers, or from an uncertainty at first as to its classification; < L. quis, who, + qualis, of what kind.] A genus of polypetalous plants of the order Combretaceæ and suborder Combreteæ. It is characterized by a calyx with a small deciduous border and a slender tube below, far prolonged beyond the one-celled ovary; by its five petals and ten straight stamens; and by the large, hard, dry fruit with five wings, containing a single five-furrowed oblong seed and sometimes three cotyledons instead of the usual two. The 3 or 4 species are natives of tropical Asia and Africa. They are shrubby climbers with slender branchlets, opposite leaves, and handsome spiked or racemed flowers of changeable colors, passing from white or orange to red. Several species are in cultivation under glass, especially the Rangoon creeper, Q. Indica, used by the Chinese as a vernifuge.

quist (kwist), n. Same as querst. [Prov. Eng.] quistle, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of whistle.

Quivers were formerly nearly as long as the arrows, so that only the feathers projected, these being covered by a piece of leather or cloth when not likely to be required. Medieval archers in war generally used the quiver on the march only, and in battle carried their arrows secured by a strap, usually with the addition of a small socket in which the points only were covered.

But Mosco did vs more service then we expected, for, having shot away his quiver of Arrows, he ran to the Boat for more. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 186.
Now in her hand a slender spear she bore,
Now a light quiver on her shoulders wore.
Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., II.

quivered (kwiv'ér), a. [*< quiver*², n., + *-ed*².] 1. Furnished with a quiver; wearing a quiver.

Since his [Cervantes's] time, the purest impulses and the noblest purposes have perhaps been oftener stayed by the devil under the name of Quixotism than any other base name or false allegation.

Ruskin, Lectures on Architecture and Painting, II.

quixotry (kwik'sot-ri), n. [< Quixote (see quixotic) + -ry.] Quixotism; visionary notions or undertakings.

Many persons will . . . consider it as a piece of Quixotry in M'Intyre to give you a meeting [in a duel] while your character and circumstances are involved in such obscurity. Scott, Antiquary, xx.

quiz¹ (kwiz), n.; pl. quizzes (kwiz'ez). [Orig. slang; perhaps a made word, based on question (with which it is vaguely associated), or (as a school term) on the L. quæso, I ask: see *quæso, quest*¹. No reliance is to be placed on the various anecdotes which purport to give the origin of the word.] 1. A puzzling question; something designed to puzzle one or make one ridiculous; banter; railery.—2. One who quizzes.—3. One who or that which is obnoxious to ridicule or quizzing; a queer or ridiculous person or thing.

Where did you get that quiz of a hat? It makes you look like an old witch. Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, p. 33.

'Twas the Queen dressed her; you know what a figure she used to make of herself with her odd manner of dressing herself; but mamma said, "Now really, Princess Royal, this one time is the last, and I cannot suffer you to make such a quiz of yourself." . . . The word quiz, you may depend, was never the Queen's.
Mme. D'Arblay, Diary (1797), VI. 138. (Darvies).

4. An oral questioning of a student or class by a teacher, conducted with the object of communicating instruction and preparing for some examination: as, the surgery quiz; the practice quiz. quodlibetarian (kwod'li-be-tā'ri-an), n. [< ML. quodlibetarius (< quodlibetum, a quodlibet: see quodlibet) + -an.] One given to quodlibets or argumentative subtleties.

quodlibetic (kwod'li-bet'ik), a. [< ML. quodlibeticus, < quodlibetum, a quodlibet: see quodlibet.] 1. Not restrained to a particular subject; moved or discussed at pleasure for curiosity or entertainment; pertaining to quodlibets.

To speak with the schools, it is of quodlibetic application, ranging from least to greatest. Sir W. Hamilton.

2. Given to niceties and subtle points.

quodlibetical (kwod'li-bet'ik-al), a. [< quodlibetic + -al.] Same as quodlibetic. W. Watson, A Decachordon of Ten Quodlibetical Questions.

quodlibetically (kwod'li-bet'ik-al-i), adv. In a quodlibetical manner; at pleasure; for curiosity; so as to be debated for entertainment.

Many positions seem quodlibetically constituted, and, like a Delphian blade, will cut on both sides.

Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., li. § 3.

quodling, quodlint, n. See *codling*¹, 2.

Do! A fine young quodling.

Face O.

My lawyer's clerk, I lighted on last night.

B. Jonson, Alchemist, li. 1.

quod permittat (kwod pēr-mit'at). [So called from these words in the writ: L. quod, which, neut. of qui, who; permittat, 3d pers. sing. pres. subj. of permittere, permit: see permi.] In Eng. law, a writ (requiring defendant to permit plaintiff to, etc.) used to prevent interference with the exercise of a right, such as the enjoyment of common of pasture, or the abatement of a nuisance.

quod vide (kwod vī'dē). [L.: quod, which, neut. of qui, who; vide, impv. sing. of videre, see.] Which see: common, in the abbreviated form q. v., after a dictionary-word, book-title and page, or the like, to which the reader is thus referred for further information.

quohog, n. Same as quahog.

quoich, n. Same as quahog.

quoift, n. An obsolete spelling of coif.

quoiffure, n. An obsolete spelling of coiffure.

quollit, n. An obsolete spelling of coif.

quoin (koin), n. [< F. coin, an angle, a corner, a wedge: see coin.] 1. An external solid angle; specifically, in arch, and masonry, the external angle of a building. The word is generally applied to the separate stones or blocks of which the angle is formed: when these project beyond the general surface of the walls, and have their corners chamfered off, they are called rustic quoins or bougays.

2. A wedge-like piece of stone, wood, metal, or other material, used for various purposes. (a) In masonry, a wedge to support and steady a stone. (b) In printing, a short blunt wedge used by printers to secure the types in a chase or on a galley. Mechanical quoins are made of iron in many forms, pressure being applied by means of the screw or by combined wedges.

Small wedges, called quoins, are inserted and driven forward by a mallet and a shooting-stick, so that they gradually exert increasing pressure upon the type.

Encyc. Brit., XXIII, 700.

(c) In gem-cutting, any one of the four facets on the crown of a brilliant; also, any one of the four facets on the pavilion or base. These facets divide each portion of the brilliant into four parts. Also called lozenge. See cut under brilliant. (d) Saut, a wedge placed beneath a cask when stowed on shipboard, to prevent it from rolling. (e) In gun, a wooden wedge used to hold a gun at a desired elevation.—Cantick-quin. Same as canting-coin.

quoin (koin), v. t. [< quoin, n.] To wedge, steady, or raise with quoins, as a stone in building a wall, the types in a chase, etc.: generally with up. See quoin, n., 2.

"They [flat stones] are exactly what I want for my wall—just the thing for quoining up." What Mr. Grey meant by quoining up was filling in the spaces under the large stones when they did not fit exactly to those below them, and thus wedging them up to their proper level.

Jacob Abbott, Wallace, vii.

quoin-post (koin'pōst), n. In hydraulic engine, the heel-post of a lock-gate. E. H. Knight.

quoit (kwōit), v. [Also coit; < ME. coiten, coyten, < OF. coiter, coitier, quoitier, cuite, press, push, hasten, incite, prob. < L. coactare, force, freq. of cogere, compel: see cogent. Cf. quait; cf. also *quait*², ult. < L. coagulare.] I. trans. To throw as a quait; throw.

Quoit him down, Bardolph. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., li. 4. 206.

Hundreds of tarred and burning hoops were skillfully quaited around the necks of the soldiers, who struggled in vain to extricate themselves from these fiery ruffs.

Molloy, Dutch Republic, II, 468.

II. intrans. To throw quoits; play at quoits.

For Python slain, he Pythian games decreed,
Where noble youths for mastership should strive,
To quait, to run, and steeds and chariots drive.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., i. 600.

quoit (kwōit), n. [Also coit, also dial. quait; < ME. coite, coyte; cf. quoit, v.] 1. A flattish ring of iron, used in playing a kind of game. It is generally from 8½ to 9½ inches in external diameter, and between 1 and 2 inches in breadth, convex on the upper side and slightly concave on the under side, so that the outer edge curves downward, and is sharp enough to cut into soft ground.

He willed vs also himselfe to sit downe before him the distance of a quoit's cast from his tent.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I, 355.

'Tis not thine to hurl the distant dart,
The quoit to toss, the pond'rous mace to wield,
Or urge the race, or wrestle on the field.

Pope, Iliad, xxiii, 713.

Formerly in the country the rustics, not having the round perforated quoits to play with, used horse-shoes, and in many places the quoit itself, to this day, is called a shoe.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 142.

2. pl. The game played with such rings. Two pns, called hobs, are driven part of their length into the ground some distance apart; and the players, who are divided into two sides, stand beside one hob, and in regular succession throw their quoits (of which each player has two) as near the other hob as they can. The side which has the quoit nearest the hob counts a point toward game, or, if the quoit is thrown so as to surround the hob, it counts two. The game only slightly resembles the ancient exercise of throwing the discus, which has, however, been often translated by this English word.

A' plays at quoits well. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., li. 4. 206.

The game of quoits, or colts, . . . is more moderate, because this exercise does not depend so much upon superior strength as upon superior skill.

Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 141.

3. A quoit-shaped implement used as a weapon of war; a discus. Those used by the Sikhs are of polished steel with sharp edges, and are sometimes richly ornamented with damascening or the like.

quoivest, n. Plural of quoif, an old form of coif.
quo jure (kwō jō'rē). [So called from these words in the writ: L. quo, by what, abl. sing. neut. of quis, who, which, what; jure, abl. sing. of jus, law, right.] In law, a writ which formerly lay for him who had land wherein another challenged common of pasture time out of mind: it was to compel him to show by what title he challenged it. Wharton.

quokt, quoket. Obsolete strong preterits of quake.

quoll (kwol), n. [Australian.] An Australian marsupial mammal, Dasyurus macrurus.

quo minus (kwō mī'nus). [So called from these words in the writ: L. quo, by which, abl. sing. of quod, which, neut. of qui, who; minus, less: see minus.] An old English writ, used in a suit complaining of a grievance which consisted in diminishing plaintiff's resources, as for instance, waste committed by defendant on land from which plaintiff had a right to take wood or hay. The Court of Exchequer, whose original jurisdiction related to the Treasury, acquired its jurisdiction between private suitors by allowing a plaintiff by the use of this writ to allege that, by reason of the defendant's not paying the debt sued for, the plaintiff was less able (quo minus) to discharge his obligations to the crown.

quondam (kwon'dam), a. and n. [L. formerly, < quom, cum, when, + -dam, a demonstr. participle.] I. a. Having been formerly; former: as, one's quondam friend; a quondam school-master.

This is the quondam king. Shak., 3 Hen. VI., li. 1. 23.

Farewell, my hopes! my anchor now is broken:

Farewell, my quondam joys, of which no token

Is now remaining.

Beau. and FL, Woman-Hater, li. 2.

II. n. A person formerly in an office; a person ejected from an office or a position.

Make them quondams, out with them, cast them out of their office.

Latimer, 4th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

As yet there was never learned man, or any scholar or other, that visited us since we came into Bocardo, which now in Oxford may be called a college of quondams.

Bp. Ridley, in Bradford's Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II, 84.

quondamship (kwon'dam-ship), n. [< quondam + -ship.] The state of being a quondam.

As for my quondamship, I thank God that he gave me the grace to come by it by so honest a means.

Latimer, 4th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Quoniam (kwō'ni-am), n. [So called from the initial word in the L. version: L. quoniam, since now, although, < quom, cum, when, since, + jam, now.] 1. In the Rom. Cath. liturgy: (a) A part of the Gloria. (b) A musical setting of the words of the above.—2t. [L. c.] A sort of drinking-cup.

Out of can, quoniam, or jourdan.

Healy, Disc. of New World, p. 69. (Nares.)

quont, n. See quant.

quookt, quooket. Obsolete preterits and past participles of quake.

quorlt, v. A Middle English form of whirl.

quorum (kwō'rum), n. [Formerly also corum; < L. quorum, 'of whom', gen. pl. of qui, who: see who. In commissions, etc., written in Latin, it was common, after mentioning certain persons generally, to specify one or more as always to be included, in such phrases as quorum unum A. B. esse volumus (of whom we will that A. B. be one); such persons as were to be in all cases necessary therefore constituted a quorum.] 1. In England, those justices of the peace whose presence is necessary to constitute a bench. Among the justices of the peace it was formerly customary to name some eminent for knowledge and prudence to be of the quorum; but the distinction is now practically obsolete, and all justices are generally "of the quorum."

He that will not cry "amen" to this, let him live sober, seem wise, and die of the corum.

Beau. and FL, Scornful Lady, i. 2.

I must not omit that Sir Roger is a justice of the quorum.

Addison, Spectator, No. 2.

2. The number of members of any constituted body of persons whose presence at or participation in a meeting is required to render its proceedings valid, or to enable it to transact business legally. If no special rule exists, a majority of the members is a quorum; but in a body of considerable size the quorum may by rule be much less than a majority, or in a smaller one much more. Forty members constitute a quorum or "house" in the British House of Commons.

In such cases, two thirds of the whole number of Senators are necessary to form a quorum.

Cathoun, Works, I, 175.

Others [regulations] prescribe rules for the removal of unworthy members, and guard against the usurpation of individuals by fixing a quorum.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 367.

3t. Requisite materials.

Here the Dutchmen found fullers' earth, a precious treasure, whereof England hath, if not more, better than all Christendom besides; a great commodity of the quorum to the making of good cloath.

Fuller, Ch. Hist., III, ix. 12. (Darvies.)

Quorum of Twelve, or Quorum, a name given collectively to the twelve apostles in the Mormon Church. See Mormons.

quostt, n. An obsolete spelling of coast.

quota (kwō'tā), n. [< It. quota, a share, < L. quota (sc. pars), fem. of quotus, of what number, how many, < quot, how many, as many as, akin to qui.] A proportional part or share; share or proportion assigned to each; any required or proportionate single contribution to a total sum, number, or quantity.

They never once furnished their quota either of ships or men.

Sicily, Conduct of the Allies.

The power of raising armies, by the most obvious construction of the articles of the confederation, is merely a power of making requisitions upon the states for quotas of men.

A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 22.

quotability (kwō-tā-bil'i-ti), n. [< quotable + -ity (see -bility).] Capability of or fitness for being quoted; quotable quality.

It is the prosaicism of these two writers (Cowper and Moore) to which is owing their special quotability.
Poe, Marginalia, xviii. (Davies.)

quotable (kwō'tā-bl), a. [< quote + -able.] Capable of or suitable for being quoted or cited.

More vividness of expression, such as makes quotable passages, comes of the complete surrender of self to the impression, whether spiritual or sensual, of the moment.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 176.

quotableness (kwō'tā-bl-nes), n. Quotability.
Athenæum, Nov. 24, 1888, p. 693.

quotably (kwō'tā-bli), adv. So as to be quoted; in a quotable manner.

All qualities of round coal prices are weak, though not quotably lower.
The Engineer, LXV. 513.

quotation (kwō-tā'shon), n. [< quote + -ation.]
1. The act of quoting or citing.

Classical quotation is the parole of literary men all over the world.
Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1781.

Emerson . . . believed in quotation, and borrowed from everybody, . . . not in any stealthy or shame-faced way, but proudly.
O. W. Holmes, Emerson, xii.

2. That which is quoted; an expression, a statement, or a passage cited or repeated as the utterance of some other speaker or writer; a citation.

When the quotation is not only apt, but has in it a turn of wit or satire, it is still the better qualified for a medal, as it has a double capacity of pleasing.
Addison, Ancient Medals, iii.

3. In com., the current price of commodities or stocks, published in prices-current, etc.

A quotation of price such as appears in a daily price list is, if there has been much fluctuation, only a very rough guide to the actual rates of exchange that have been the basis of the successive bargains making up the day's business.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 465.

4. [Abbr. of quotation-quadrat.] In printing, a large hollow quadrat, usually of the size 3 × 4 picas, made for the larger blanks in printed matter. [U. S.]—Syn. 2. Extract. See quote.

quotation (kwō-tā'shon-al), a. [< quotation + -al.] Of or pertaining to quotations; as a quotation.

quotationist (kwō-tā'shon-ist), n. [< quotation + -ist.] One who makes quotations.

Considered not altogether by the narrow intellects of quotationists and common places.

Milton, Divorce, To the Parliament.

quotation-mark (kwō-tā'shon-märk), n. One of the marks used to note the beginning and the end of a quotation. In English, quotation-marks generally consist of two inverted commas at the beginning and two apostrophes at the end of a quotation; but a single comma and a single apostrophe are also used, especially in Great Britain. In the former case the marking of a quotation within a quotation is single; in the latter, properly double. Single quotation-marks are often used, as in this work, to mark a translation. Quotation-marks for printing in French, German, etc., are types specially cut and cast for this use; and in some fonts for printing in English characters have been made for the beginning of quotations corresponding in reverse to the apostrophes at the end.

quote (kwōt), v.; pret. and pp. quoted, ppr. quoting. [Formerly also cote; < OF. quoter, coter, F. coter, letter, number, quote (in commercial use), < ML. quotare, mark off into chapters and verses, give a reference, < L. quotus, of what number, how many, < quot, as many as.] I. trans. 1†. To note down; set down in writing; hence, in general, to note; mark; observe.

A fellow by the hand of nature mark'd, Quoted and sign'd to do a deed of shame.
Shak., K. John, iv. 2. 222.

I am sorry that with better head and judgement
I had not quoted him.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 1. 112.

Wherefore I was desirous to see it again, and to read it with more deliberation, and, being sent to me a second time, it was thus quoted in the margin as ye see.
Foote, Martyrs, p. 1110, an. 1543.

2. To adduce from some author or speaker; cite, as a passage from some author or a saying of some speaker; name, repeat, or adduce as the utterance of some other person, or by way of authority or illustration; also, to cite the words of: as, to quote a passage from Homer; to quote Shakspeare or one of his plays; to quote chapter and verse.

He quoted texts right upon our Saviour, though he expounded them wrong.
Atterbury.

As long as our people quote English standards they dwarf their own proportions.
Emerson, Conduct of Life.

3. In writing or printing, to inclose within quotation-marks; distinguish as a quotation or as quoted matter by marking: as, the dialogue in old books is not quoted.—4. In com., to name, as the price of stocks, produce, etc.; name the current price of.—Quoted matter, in printing, composed types that are inclosed by quotation-marks: thus, " " = Syn. 2. Quote, Cite, Adduce, Recite. When we quote or recite, we repeat the exact words; when we cite or adduce, we may only refer to the passage without quoting it, or we may give the substance of the passage. We may quote a thing for the pleasure that we take in it or for any other reason: as, to quote a saying of Isaac Walton's. We cite or adduce a thing in proof of some assertion or doctrine: as, to cite an authority in court; to adduce confirmatory examples. Adduce, besides being broader in its use, is stronger than cite, as to urge in proof. Recite, in this connection, applies to the quoting of a passage of some length: as, to recite a law; to recite the conversation of Lorenzo and Jessica at Belmont. It generally implies that the passage is given orally from memory, but not necessarily, as a petition recites, etc.; the others may be freely used of that which is read aloud or only written.

II. intrans. To cite the words of another; make a quotation.

quote (kwōt), n. [In def. 1, < OF. quote; in other senses < quote, v.] 1†. A note upon an author.

O were thy margents cliffs of itching lust,
Or quotes to chafe out men the way to sin,
Then were there hope that multitudes would thrust
To buy thee. C. Tourneur, Transformed Metamorphosis, Author to his Books.

2. A quotation, or the marking of a quotation.

This column of "Local Notes and Queries" . . . has been succeeded by a column entitled "Notes and Quotes."
N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 505.

3. A quotation-mark: usually in the plural. [Colloq.]—4†. A quotient. [Rare.]

quoteless (kwōt'les), a. [< quote + -less.] Not capable or worthy of being quoted; unquotable.
Wright.

quoter (kwō'tēr), n. One who quotes or cites the words of an author or a speaker.

Next to the originator of a good sentence is the first quoter of it.
Emerson, Quotation and Originality.

quoteworthy (kwōt'wēr'thi), a. Deserving of quotation. [Rare.]

In Horne's "Spirit of the Age" are some quoteworthy remarks.
The New Mirror (N. Y., 1843), III.

quoth (kwōth), Preterit of quethe. [Obsolete or archaic.]

"Good morrow, fool," quoth I. "No, sir," quoth he,
"Call me not fool till heaven hath sent me fortune."
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7. 18.

Quoth the raven, "Nevermore."
Poe, The Raven.

quotha (kwō'thi), interj. [For quoth a, and that for quoth he, a being a corruption of he: see ab.] Forsooth! indeed! originally a parenthetical phrase used in repeating the words of another with more or less contempt or disdain.

Here are ye clavering about the Duke of Argyll, and this man Martingale gaun to break on our hands, and lose us gude sixty pounds—I wonder what duke will pay that, quotha.
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xxiv.

quotidian (kwō-tid'i-an), a. and n. [< ME. cotidian, < OF. quotidian, cotidien, F. quotidian = Pr. cotidian, cotidian = Sp. cotidiano = Pg. lt. quotidiano, < L. quotidianus, cottidianus, daily, < quotidie, cottidie, cotidie, daily, < quot, as many as, + dies, day; see dial.] I. a. Daily; occurring or returning daily: as, a quotidian fever.

Common and quotidian infirmities that so necessarily attend me.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, li. 7.

Like the human body, with a quotidian life, a periodical recurrence of ebbing and flowing tides.
Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 173.

Double quotidian fever. See fever.

II. n. 1. Something that returns or is expected every day; specifically, in med., a fever whose paroxysms return every day.

He seems to have the quotidian of love upon him.
Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2. 383.

A disposition which to his he finds will never cement, a quotidian of sorrow and discontent in his house.
Milton, Divorce, li. 16.

2†. A cleric or church officer who does daily duty.—3†. Payment given for such duty.

quotient (kwō'shent), n. [= F. quotient; with accom. term. -ent, < L. quoties, quotiens, how often, how many times, < quot, how many, as many as.] In math., the result of the process of division; the number of times one quantity or number is contained in another. See division, 2.—Differential quotient. Same as differential coefficient (which see, under coefficient).

quотиety (kwō-ti'e-ti), n. [< L. quoties, how often (see quotient) + -ty.] The proportionate frequency of an event.

quosity (kwō'ti-ti), n. [< L. quot, how many, + -ity.] 1. The number of individuals in a collection.—2. A collection considered as containing a number of individuals. Carlyle, French Rev., I. ii.

quotqueant, n. A corruption of coltquean.

Don Quot quean, Don Spinsters' wear a petticoat still, and put on your smock a' Monday.
Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, li. 2.

quotum (kwō'tum), n. [L., neut. of quotus, of what number, how many, < quot, how many, as many as.] A quota; a share; a proportion. [Rare.]

The number of names which are really formed by an imitation of sound dwindles down to a very small quotum if cross-examined by the comparative philologist.
Max Müller.

quo warranto (kwō wo-ran'tō), [So called from these words in the writ: L. quo, by what (abl. sing. neut. of quis, who, which, what); ML. warranto, abl. of warrantum, warrant; see warrant.] In law, a writ calling upon a person or body of persons to show by what warrant they exercise a public office, privilege, franchise, or liberty. It is the remedy for usurpation of office or of corporate franchises, etc.—Information or action in the nature of a quo warranto, a statement of complaint by a public prosecutor or complainant to the court: now used in many jurisdictions in lieu of the ancient writ of quo warranto.

qwhatt, pron. A Middle English dialectal form of what.

qwichet, pron. An obsolete dialectal form of which.

qy, An abbreviation of query.

forms (as in the case of the other letters: see especially A) are given below:

The tag below the curve by which the English (and the Latin) R differs from the later Greek form P was added to the latter in order to distinguish it from the p-sign after this had assumed its present form; the addition was first made on Greek ground, but was abandoned there when the distinction of the p- and r-signs had become established in another way. The value of the character has always been essentially the same; it represents a continuous sonant utterance made between the tip of the tongue and the roof of the mouth, at a point more or less removed backward from the upper front teeth. The sound is so resonant and continuous as to be nearly akin with l, and r and l are to a large extent interchangeable with one another in linguistic history. It is often classed as a "liquid," along with l, m, n; less often, but more accurately, as a semivowel, with l, y, z. It also, on no small scale, answers as corresponding sonant (in languages that have no z) to s as sord, and comes from s under sonantizing influences: so in Sanskrit, in Latin (as ara from asa), and in Germanic (as in our vere, plural of veas). In Anglo-Saxon the initial r of many words was aspirated (that is, pronounced with an h before it), as hring (our ring); but the aspiration was long ago abandoned, both in pronunciation and in spelling. In Greek initial r was always thus aspirated, and the combination was transliterated in Latin by rh instead of hr: hence the frequency of rh in our words of Greek derivation. Moreover, such an r, when by infection or composition made medial, became rrh, and double r was in general viewed as rrh: whence that spelling in many of our words (for example, diarrhea, hemorrhage, catarrh, etc.); in recent scientific words and names taken from Greek, the Greek rule and Latin practice as regards the doubling and aspiration of the r are often neglected. The mode of production of the r-sound itself varies greatly in different languages and dialects. Normally its utterance is combined with a distinct trilling or vibration of the tip of the tongue, in various degrees (the sound is thence often called the "dog's letter," littera canina). But in ordinary English pronunciation this vibration is either extremely slight, or, more commonly, altogether wanting; in fact, the tip of the tongue is drawn too far back into the dome of the palate to admit of vibration; the English r is a smooth r. But further, in many localities, even among the most cultivated speakers, no r is ever really pronounced at all unless followed (in the same word, or, if final, in the word following) by a vowel (for example, in are, farther, pronounced ah, fatherr); it either simply disappears, or, as after most long vowels, is replaced by a bit of neutral-vowel sound, of u or e; and after such a long vowel, if it comes to be pronounced by the addition of a vowel, it retains the same neutral-vowel sound as transition-sound (for example, in faring, fearing, pouring, during, firing, souring: the pronunciation is indicated in this work by retaining the r in the same syllable with the long vowel: thus, faring, ferring, etc.). An r has a stronger and more frequent influence upon the character of the preceding vowel than any other consonant; hence the reduction to similarity of the vowel-sounds in such words as pert, dirt, curt, earn, myrrh. If all our r's that are written are pronounced, the sound is more common than any other in English utterance (over seven per cent.); the instances of occurrence before a vowel, and so of universal pronunciation, are only half as frequent. There are localities where the normal vibration of the tip of the tongue is replaced by one of the uvula, making a guttural trill, which is still more entitled to the name of "dog's letter" than is the ordinary r: such are considerable parts of France and Germany; the sound appears to occur only sporadically in English pronunciation.

2. As a medieval Roman numeral, 80, and with a line over it (R), 80,000.—3. As an abbreviation: (a) Of Rex or Regina, as in George R., Victoria R. (b) Of Royal, as in R. N. for Royal Navy, R. A. for Royal Academy or Academician, or for Royal Arch (in freemasonry). (c) Prefixed to a medical prescription (R), of recipe, take. (d) [l. c.] Naut.: (1) In a ship's log-book, of rain. (2) When placed against a man's name in the paymaster's book, of run away. (e) Of right (right-hand), as in R. A. for right ascension, R. II. E. for right second entrance (on the stage of a theater). (f) In math., r is generally a radius vector of coördinates, R the radius of a circle, p a radius of curvature.—The three R's, reading, writing, and arithmetic: a humorous term. It originated with Sir William Curtis (1752–1829), an eminent but illiterate alderman and lord mayor of London, who, on being asked to give a toast, said, "I will give you the three R's, Riting, Reading, and Rithmetic."

Parochial education in Scotland had never been confined to the three R's. Times (London).

rat, n. An obsolete form of rool. Chaucer.

Ra (rä), n. [Egypt.] In Egypt. mythol., the sovereign sun-god of the Memphite system, the chief Egyptian personification of the Supreme Being. He was often confounded to some extent with the Theban Amen. In art he was typically represented as a hawk-headed man bearing on his head the solar disk and the royal uræus.

R. A. An abbreviation of (a) Royal Academy; (b) Royal Academician; (c) Royal Arch; (d) right ascension.

ra- [See re-.] A prefix in some words of French origin, ultimately from re- and ad-. See rabate, rabbet, rapport, etc.

raad, n. [Ar. ra'd, thunder.] A nematog-nathous fish, Malapterurus electricus, inhabiting the Nile; the electric catfish. It reaches a length of 3 to 4 feet, and gives a sharp galvanic shock on being touched.

rab (rab), n. [Origin obscure.] A kind of loam; a coarse hard substance for mending roads. Halliwel. [Cornwall, Eng.]

rab² (rab), n. [An abbr. of rabbit.] Same as rabbit. 1.

rab³ (rab), n. [Heb.: see rabbi.] A title of respect given to Jewish doctors or expounders of the law. See rabbi.

rabanna (ra-ban'ä), n. [Native name.] Cloth or matting made from the raffia and perhaps other fibers: an article of export from Madagascar to Mauritius. See raffia.

rabat (ra-bat'; F. pron. ra-bä'), n. [F., < rabat, a turned-down collar, a band or ruff, OF. also a plasterers' beater, a penthouse, eaves, also a beating down, suppression, < rabattre, beat down, bring down: see rabate. Cf. rabato.] 1. A kind of linen collar worn by some ecclesiastics, falling down upon the chest and leaving the neck exposed.—2. A polishing-material made from unglazed pottery which has failed in baking, used by marble-workers, etc.

rabate (ra-bät'), v. t.; pret. and pp. rabated, ppr. rabating. [Early mod. E. also rabbate; < F. rabatte, OF. rabatre, beat down, bring down, < re-, back, + abatre, beat down: see abate. Cf. rebate.] 1. To beat down; rebate.

This alteration is sometimes by adding, sometimes by rabating, of a syllable or letter to or from a word either in the beginning, middle, or ending.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 184.

2. In falconry, to bring down or recover (the hawk) to the fist.

rabatet (ra-bät'), n. [rabate, v.] Abatement. And your figures of rabbate be as many. Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 185.

rabatine (rab'ä-tin), n. [*F. rabatine (f), dim. of rabat, a neck-band: see rabat, rabato.] Same as rabato.

Reform me, Janet, that precise ruff of thine for an open rabatine of lace and cut work, that will let men see thou hast a fair neck. Scott, Kenilworth, xxiii.

rabatot (ra-bä'tō), n. [Also rebato; with altered termination (as if of Sp. or It. origin), < OF. (and F.) rabat, a turned-down collar, a band or ruff: see rabat.] 1. A falling band; a collar turned over upon the shoulders, or supported in a horizontal position like a ruff.

Where is your gowne of silke, your periwigs, Your fine rebatoes, and your costly jewells? Heywood, 2 Edw. IV. (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, I. 168).

Your stiffnecked rebatoes, that have more arches for pride to row under than can stand under five London bridges. Dekker, Gull's Hornbook.

2. A wire or other stiffener used to hold this band in place.

I pray you, sir, what say you to these great ruffles, which are borne up with supporters and rebatoes, as it were with poste and raille? Devi'd Pathway, p. 42. (Halliwel.)

rabattement (ra-bat'ment), n. [F. rabatte-ment, < rabattre, beat down: see rabate.] An operation of descriptive geometry consisting in representing a plane as rotated about one of its traces until it is brought into a plane of projection, with a view of performing other operations more easily performed in such a situation, after which the plane is to be rotated back to its proper position.

rabban (rab'an), n. [Heb. rabban, lord; cf. Ar. rabban (> Pers. rabbani), belonging to a lord or the Lord, divine; as a noun, a rabbi; rab-bana (Pers.), O our Lord! etc.: see rabbi, and cf. rabbani.] A title of honor (of greater dignity than rabbi) given by the Jews to the patriarchs or presidents of the Sanhedrim—Gamaliel I., who was patriarch in Palestine about A. D. 30–50, being the first to whom it was applied.

rabbanist (rab'an-ist), n. Same as rabbinit.

rabbatet, v. t. An obsolete form of rabate.

rabbet (rab'et), v. t. [Early mod. E. also rabbot, rabot; < ME. rabeten, rabbet, < OF. (and F.) raboter, plane, level, lay even; cf. F. rabot, a joiners' plane (also a plasterers' beater, cf. OF. rabat, a plasterers' beater: see rabat); cf. F. raboteur, rugged, knotty, rough; < OF. rabouter, thrust back (= Pr. rebotar = It. ributare, push back), < re-, again, + aboter, abouter, thrust against: see re- and abut. Cf. rebut.] To cut the edge of (a board) so that it will overlap that of the next piece, which is similarly cut out, and will form a close joint with this adjoining board; cut or form a rabbet in (a board or piece of timber). See rabbet, n.—Rabbeted lock, a lock of which the face-plate is sunk in a rabbet in the edge of a door. E. H. Knight.

rabbet (rab'et), n. [ME. rabet, < OF. (and F.) rabot, a joiners' plane, < raboter, plane: see rabbet, v.] 1. A cut made on the edge of a board so that it may join by lapping with another board similarly cut; also, a rectangular recess, channel, or groove cut along the edge of a board or the like to receive a corresponding projection cut on the edge of another board, etc., required to fit into it. Rabbets are common in paneling. See also cut under match-joint.—2. Same as rabbet-plane.

rabbeting-machine (rab'et-ing-ma-shēn'), n. A machine for cutting rabbets: a form of matching-, molding-, or planing-machine. E. H. Knight.

rabbet-joint (rab'et-joint), n. A joint formed by rabbeting, as the edges of two boards or pieces of timber.

rabbet-plane (rab'et-plān), n. A plane for plowing a groove along the edge of a board.

Rabbet-planes are so shaped as to adapt them to peculiar kinds of work. In a square-rabbet plane the cutting edge is square across the sole; in a skew-rabbet plane the bit is set obliquely.

Square Rabbet-plane.

across the sole; in a side-rabbet plane the cutter is on the side, not on the sole.

rabbet-saw (rab'et-sà), n. A saw used for making rabbets. Such saws commonly have an adjustable fence or gage to insure the proper placing of the groove.

rabbi (rab'i or rab'i), n.; pl. rabbis (rab'iz or rab'iz). [Early mod. E. also rabbie, rabby; < ME. rabi, raby = OF. rabbi, rabi, raby, < LL. rabbi, < Gr. ῥαββί, < Heb. (Aramaic) rabbi, master, lord (much used in the Targums for all degrees of authority, from king and high priest down to chief shepherd), lit. 'my master' or 'my lord' (= Ar. rabbī, 'my master' or 'my lord'); with pronominal suffix -i, < rab, master, lord (= Ar. rabb, master, lord, the Lord, God, cf. rabba, mistress), < rabab, be great. Cf. *rab*², rabbīn, rabbān, rabbōnī.] Literally, 'my master': a title of respect or of office (of higher dignity than rab) given to Jewish doctors or expounders of the law. In modern Jewish usage the term is strictly applied only to those who are authorized by ordination to decide legal and ritualistic questions, and to perform certain designated functions, as to receive proselytes, etc.; but it is given by courtesy to other distinguished Jewish scholars. By persons not Hebrews it is often applied to any one ministering to a Jewish congregation, to distinguish him from a Christian clergyman.

God liketh nat that Raby men us calle.

Chaucer, Summoner's Tale, l. 479.

They said unto him, Rabbi (which is to say, being interpreted, Master (i. e., Teacher)). John I. 38.

Those whose heads with age are hoary grown,
And those great Rabbies that do gravely sit,
Revolving volumes of the highest writ.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II, The Capitaines.

rabbīn (rab'in), n. [< F. rabbīn, < LL. rabbī, < Gr. ῥαββί, rabbi: see rabbi.] Same as rabbi.

It is expressly against the laws of our own government when a minister doth serve as a stipendiary curate, which kind of service nevertheless the greatest rabbins of that part do altogether follow. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 80.

Now he [Salmasius] betakes himself to the fabulous rabbins again. Milton, Ans. to Salmasius, III. 85.

rabbinate (rab'in-āt), n. [< rabbīn + -ate.] The dignity or office of a rabbi.

Gradually the Talmud, which had been once the common pabulum of all education, passed out of the knowledge of the laity, and was abandoned almost entirely to candidates for the rabbinate. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 681.

rabbīnīc (ra-bin'ik), a. and n. [= F. rabbīnīque; as rabbīn + -ic.] I. a. Same as rabbīnical.

II. n. [cap.] The language or dialect of the rabbis; the later Hebrew.

rabbīnīcal (ra-bin'i-kal), a. [< rabbīnīc + -al.] Pertaining to the rabbis, or to their opinions, learning, and language. The term rabbīnīcal has been applied to all the Jewish exegetical writings composed after the Christian era.

We will not buy your rabbīnīcal fumes; we have one that calls us to buy of him pure gold tried in the fire. Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

It is but a legend, I know,
A fable, a phantom, a show,
Of the ancient rabbīnīcal lore.

Longfellow, Sandalphon.

Rabbīnīcal Hebrew. See Hebrew.

rabbīnīcally (ra-bin'i-kal-i), adv. In a rabbīnīc manner; like a rabbi.

rabbīnīsm (rab'in-izm), n. [< F. rabbīnisme = Sp. rabinismo; as rabbīn + -ism.] 1. A rabbīnīc expression or phrase; a peculiarity of the language of the rabbis.—2. A system of religious belief prevailing among the Jews from the return from the Jewish captivity to the latter part of the eighteenth century, the distinguishing feature of which was that it declared the oral law to be of equal authority with the written law of God.

rabbīnīst (rab'in-ist), n. [Also rabbānist; < F. rabbīniste = Sp. rabinista; as rabbīn + -ist.] Among the Jews, one who adhered to the Talmud and the traditions of the rabbis, in opposition to the Karaites, who rejected the traditions. See rabbīnīsm.

Those who stood up for the Talmud and its traditions were chiefly the rabbins and their followers; from whence the party had the name of rabbīnīsts.

Stackhouse, Hist. Bible, II. vii. 4.

rabbīnīte (rab'in-it), n. [< rabbīn + -ite.] Same as rabbīnīst.

rabbīt¹ (rab'it), n. [Early mod. E. also rabbate, rabet; < ME. rabet, rabbit, appar. < OF. rabet*, indicated in F. dial. rabotte, a rabbit; cf. OD. robbe, D. rob, a rabbit; LG. G. robbe, a sea-dog, seal; Gael. rabaid, rabait, a rabbit. Cf. F. rable, the back of a rabbit, Sp. Pg. rabo, tail, hind quarters, Sp. rabel, hind quarters. An older E. name is cony. The native name for the rabbit is hare (including hares and rabbits).]

bits).] 1. A rodent mammal, Lepus cuniculus, of the hare family, Leporidae; a kind of hare notable for burrowing in the ground. This animal is indigenous to Europe, but has been naturalized in many other countries, and is the original of all the domestic breeds. It is smaller than the common hare of Europe, L. timidus or variabilis, with shorter ears and limbs. The natural color is brownish, but in domestication black, gray, white, and pied individuals are found. The ears are naturally erect, but in some breeds they fall; such rabbits are called lopped or lop-eared, and degrees of lopping of the ears are named half-lops and full-lops. Rabbits breed in their burrows or warrens, and also freely in hutches: they are very prolific, bringing forth several times a year, usually six or eight at a litter, and in some countries where they have been naturalized they multiply so rapidly as to become a pest, as in Australia for example. The fur is used in the manufacture of hats and for other purposes, and the flesh is esteemed for food.

Hence—2. Any hare; a leporid, or any member of the Leporidae. The common gray rabbit or wood-rabbit of the United States is L. sylvaticus, also called cottontail and molly cottontail, a variety of which (or a closely related species) is the sage-rabbit of western North America, L. arizonensis. The marsh-rabbit is L. palustris; the swamp-rabbit of the Southern States is L. aquaticus. Various large long-eared and long-limbed hares of western North America are called jack-rabbits or jackaw-rabbits. The South American rabbit or hare is the tapeti, L. brasiliensis. See cuts under cottontail, jack-rabbit, and hare.—Native rabbit, in Australia, a long-eared kind of bandicoot, Macrotis lagotis.—Snow-shoe rabbit, that variety of the American varying hare which is found in the Rocky Mountains. It turns white in winter, and at that season the fur of the feet is very heavy. It has been described as a distinct species, Lepus timidus, but is better treated as a local race of L. americanus.—Welsh rabbit. [A term of jocular origin, formed after the fashion of Norfolk capon, a red herring, etc. (see quotation).] Owing to an absurd notion that rabbit in this phrase is a corruption of rarebit (as if 'a rare bit'), the word is often so written. Cheese melted with a little ale, and poured over slices of hot toast. Cream, mustard, or Worcestershire sauce are occasionally added. The name has been given to cheese toasted but not entirely melted, and laid on toast.

Welsh rabbit is a genuine slang term, belonging to a large group which describe in the same humorous way the special dish or product or peculiarity of a particular district. For examples: . . . an Essex lion is a calf; a Field-lane duck is a baked sheep's head; Glasgow magistrates or Norfolk capons are red herrings; Irish apricots or Munster plums are potatoes; Gravesend sweetmeats are shrimps. Macmillan's Mag.

rabbīt¹ (rab'it), v. i. [*< rabbīt*¹, n.] To hunt or trap rabbits.

She liked keeping the score at cricket, and coming to look at them fishing or rabbiting in her walks.

T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, II. vii.

"I suppose," pursued Mr. Morley presently, "that you have been indulging in the Englishman's usual recreation of slaughter." "I've been rabbiting, if that's what you mean," answered Sir Christopher shortly.

W. E. Norris, Miss Shafto, xix.

rabbīt² (rab'it), n. [< OF. (and F.) rabot, a plasterers' beater: see rabbet.] 1. A wooden implement used in mixing mortar. Cotgrave.—2. A wooden can used as a drinking-vessel.

Strong beer in rabbits and cheating penny cans.

Three pipes for two-pence, and such like trepans.

rabbīt³ (rab'it), v. t. [Appar. a corruption of rabate (cf. rabbet), used as a vague imprecation.] An interjectional imperative, equivalent to confound.

"Rabbit the fellow," cries he: "I thought, by his talking so much about riches, that he had a hundred pounds at least in his pocket."

Fielding, Joseph Andrews. (Latham.)

Rabbit me, I am no soldier. Scott.

rabbīt-berry (rab'it-ber'i), n. The buffalo-berry, Shepherdia argentea.

rabbīt-brush (rab'it-brush), n. A tall shrubby composite plant, Bigelovia graveolens, growing abundantly in alkaline soils of western North America, often, like the sage-brush (but at lower elevations), monopolizing the ground over large tracts. It furnishes a safe retreat for the large jack-rabbits of the plains. It is a disagreeably scented plant, with numerous bushy branches which are more or less whitened by a close tomentum, narrow leaves, and yellow flowers. There are 4 or 5 well-marked varieties, differing chiefly in the width of the leaves, in the degree of whiteness, and in size.

rabbīt-eared (rab'it-ērd), a. Having long or large ears, like those of a rabbit; lagotic: as, the rabbīt-eared bandicoot or native rabbit of Australia, Macrotis lagotis.

rabbīter (rab'i-tēr), n. One who hunts or traps rabbits.

The majority of the men engaged as rabbīters (in Australia) were making a very high rate of wages.

Sci. Amer., N. S. LVI. 294.

rabbīt-fish (rab'it-fish), n. 1. A holoccephalous fish, Chimera monstrosa. Also called king of the herrings. [Local, British.]-2. A plectognathous fish of the family Tetrodontidae and genus Lagocephalus. The name refers to the peculiarity of the front teeth, which resemble the incisors of a rabbit. The rabbīt-fish of the eastern United States is L. lagotus, also called smooth puffer and tanitor. It is mostly olive-green, but silver white below, and attains a length of 2 feet or more. The name is also extended to kindred plectognaths.

3. The streaked gurnard, Trigla lineata. [Local, Eng.]

rabbīt-foot clover. See clover, 1. and hare's-foot, 1.

rabbīt-hutch (rab'it-huch), n. A box or cage for the confinement and rearing of tame rabbits.

rabbīt-moth (rab'it-mōth), n. The bombycid moth Lago opercularis; so called from its soft furry appearance and rabbit-like coloration. See cut under stinging-caterpillar. [U. S.]

rabbīt-mouth (rab'it-mōth), n. A mouth like that of a hare; used attributively, having a formation of the jaws which suggests harelip: as, the rabbīt-mouth sucker, a catostomid fish, otherwise called splintmouth, harelip, harelippered sucker, cutlips, and Lagocheila or Quassilaba lacera. This fish has the form of an ordinary sucker, but the lower lip is split into two separate lobes, and the upper lip is greatly enlarged and not protractile. It is most common in the streams flowing from the Ozark mountains. See cut under Quassilaba.

rabbīt-rat (rab'it-rat), n. An Australian rodent of the genus Hapalotis, as H. albipes.

rabbīt-root (rab'it-rōt), n. The wild sarsaparilla, Aralia nudicaulis.

rabbītry (rab'it-ri), n.; pl. rabbītries (-riz). [*< rabbīt*¹ + -ry.] A collection of rabbits, or the place where they are kept; a rabbit-warren.

rabbīt-spout (rab'it-spout), n. The burrow of a rabbit. [Prov. Eng.]

Here they turn left-handed, and run him into a rabbīt-spout in the gorse.

Field (London), Feb. 27, 1886. (Encyc. Dict.)

rabbīt-squirrel (rab'it-skur-el), n. A South

South American Chincha or Rabbit squirrel (Lagidium chinchero).

American rodent of the family Chinchillidae and genus Lagidium, as L. curieri. Coues.

rabbīt-sucker¹ (rab'it-suk'ēr), n. 1. A sucking rabbit; a young rabbit.

I prefer an olde cony before a rabbīt-sucker, and an ancient henne before a young chicken peeper.

Lyly, Endymion, v. 2.

If thou dost it half so gravely, so majestically, both in word and matter, hang me up by the heels for a rabbīt-sucker.

Shak., 1 Hen. IV., II. 4. 480.

2. A gull; a dupe; a cony. See cony, 7.

rabbīt-warren (rab'it-wor'en), n. A piece of ground appropriated to the preservation and breeding of rabbits.

rabblē¹ (rab'l), v.; pret. and pp. rabblēd, ppr. rabblēng. [Also ravel; < ME. rabbēn, speak confusedly; cf. OD. rabbēn, chatter, trifle, toy, = G. dial. rabbēn, robbe, chatter, prattle; cf. ML. rabulare, scold, < L. rabula, a brawling advocate, a pettifogger. Cf. Gr. ῥαββάζειν, make a noise, Ir. rapal, noise, rapach, noisy, Gael. rapair, a noisy fellow. The word may have been in part confused or associated with ramble; cf. dial. rabbling, winding, rambling.] I. intrans. To speak confusedly; talk incoherently; utter nonsense.

II. trans. To utter confusedly or incoherently; gabble or chatter out.

Let thy tunge serve thyn hert in skylle,
And rable not wordes recheles out of reson.
MS. Cantab. Fl. II. 38, l. 24. (Halliwell.)

Thus, father Traves, you may see my rashness to rabble out the Scriptures without purpose, time [in other editions time], or reason.

J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 23.

[Obsolete or prov. Eng. and Scotch in both uses.]

rabble² (rab'l), n. and a. [Early mod. E. rabbe; < ME. rabet; cf. *rabble*¹, v.] I. n. 1. A tumultuous crowd of vulgar, noisy people; a confused, disorderly assemblage; a mob.

I saw, I say, come out of London, even unto the presence of the prince, a great rabbe of mean and light personae.
Aescham, The Scholemaster, l.

Then the Nabob Vizier and his rabbe made their appearance, and hastened to plunder the camp of the valiant enemies.
Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. Specifically, the mass of common people; the ignorant populace; the mob: with the definite article.

The rabbe now such freedom did enjoy
As winds at sea that use it to destroy.
Dryden, Astræa Redux, l. 43.

3. Any confused crowd or assemblage; a haphazard conglomeration or aggregate, especially of things trivial or ignoble.

This miscreant (Mahomet) . . . instituted and published a sect, or rather a rabbe, of abominable precepts and detestable counsels, thereby to change the virtuous, and therewith to delight the vicious and wicked.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 327.

For the solace they may give the readers, after such a rabbe of scholastic precepts which be tedious, these reports being of the nature of matters historically, they are to be embraced.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 221.

Flies, Butterflies, Gnats, Bees, and all the rabbes
Of other Insects.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 5.

=Syn. 1. Mob, etc. See populace.

II. a. Pertaining to or consisting of a rabble; riotous; tumultuous; disorderly; vulgar; low.

To gratify the barbarous party of my audience, I gave them a short rabbe-scene, because the mob (as they call them) are represented by Plutarch and Polybius with the same character of baseness and cowardice.
Dryden, Cleomenes, Pref.

How could any one of English education and prattique swallow such a low, rabbe suggestion?
Roger North, Examen, p. 306. (Davies.)

The victory of Beaumont proved to MacMahon that his only resource left was to abandon the attempt to reach Bazaine, and to concentrate his rabbe army around the frontier fortress of Sedan.
Lowe, Bismarck, l. 548.

rabble² (rab'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. rabbled, ppr. rabbling. [*< rabble*², n.] To assault in a violent and disorderly manner; mob. [Scotch.]

Unhappily, throughout a large part of Scotland, the clergy of the established church were, to use the phrase then common, rabbed.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xiii.

The desolation of Ireland, the massacre of Glencoe, the abandonment of the Darien colonists, the rabbling of about 300 Episcopal clergymen in Scotland . . .
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., l.

It seems but as yesterday since in the streets of Edinburgh ladies were insulted and rabbed on their way to a medical lecture-room.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 19.

rabble³ (rab'l), n. [< OF. roable, F. rabble, an implement for stirring or mixing, a poker, etc., dial. redable, < L. rotabulum, ML. also rotabulum, a poker or shovel.] An iron bar bent at right angles at one end, used in the operation of puddling for stirring the melted iron, so as to allow it to be more fully exposed to the action of the air and the lining of the furnace.

rabble³ (rab'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. rabbled, ppr. rabbling. [*< rabble*³, n.] To stir and skim with a rabble or puddling-tool, as melted iron in a furnace.

rabble-fish (rab'l-fish), n. Fish generally rejected for market, as the dogfishes, rays, gurnards, scad, and wrasses. [West of Eng.]

rabblement¹ (rab'l-ment), n. [*< rabble*¹ + -ment.] Idle, silly talk; babblement. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

rabblement² (rab'l-ment), n. [Formerly also rablement; < *rabble*² + -ment.] 1. A tumultuous crowd or assemblage; a disorderly rout; a rabble.

The first troupe was a monstrous rablement
Of fowle misshapen wightes.
Spenser, F. Q., II. xi. 8.

The rabblement hooted, and clapped their chopped hands.
Shak., J. C., l. 2. 245.

I saw . . . giants and dwarfs,
Clowns, conjurers, posture-masters, harlequins,
Amid the uproar of the rabblement, Perform their feats. Wordsworth, Prelude, vii.

2. Refuse; dregs. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]
rabblér (rab'lér), n. One who works with or uses a rabble, especially in the operation of puddling.

rabbling (rab'ling), a. Same as rambling. See ramble. [Prov. Eng.]

rabboni (ra-bō'ni), n. [Heb.: see rabbi.] Literally, 'my great master': a title of honor among the Jews; specifically, the highest title given to doctors or expounders of the law. It was publicly given to only seven persons of great eminence, all of the school of Hillel.

She turned herself, and saith unto him, Rabboni; which is to say, Master [i. e., Teacher]. John xx. 16.

rabd, rabdoid, etc. See rhabd, etc.

rabél, n. Same as rebec.

Rabelaisian (rab-e-lā'zi-an), a. [< F. rabelaisien, < Rabelais (see def.).] Of or pertaining to François Rabelais (about 1490–1553), a French priest, author of "Gargantua and Pantagruel"; resembling or suggestive of Rabelais and the characteristics of his thought and style. Compare Pantagruelism.

Gleams of the truest poetical sensibility alternate in him [John Skelton] with an almost brutal coarseness. He was truly Rabelaisian before Rabelais.

Lowell, N. A. Rev., CXX. 340.

rabet¹, n. An obsolete spelling of *rabbit*¹.

rabet², n. An obsolete spelling of rabbit.

rabit¹, n. An obsolete spelling of rabbi.

rabit² (rab'i), n. [Also written rubbee; < Hind. rabī, the spring, the crop then gathered.] The great grain-crop of Hindustan, consisting of wheat, barley, oats, and millet. It is the last of the three crops, being laid down in August and September, partly on land which has lain fallow and partly on land which has been cleared of the bhadooe or earliest crop. It furnishes about five sixteenths of the food-supply in a normal year.

rabiate (rā'bi-āt), a. [< ML. rabiatus, pp. of rabiare, go mad, rave, rage, < L. rabies, madness: see rabies. Cf. rage, *rare*¹.] Rabid; madened.

Ah! ye Jewes, worse than dogges rabiate.
Lamentation of Mary Magdalen.

rabiator (rā'bi-ā-tor), n. [< ML. rabiator, a furious man, < rabiere, rave, go mad: see rabiate. The Sc. rabiatore, a robber, bully, It. rubatore, a robber, < ML. rubator*, does not seem to be connected.] A furious animal or person; a violent, greedy person. [Scotch.]

rabic (rab'ik), a. [< rabi(es) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to rabies; affected or caused by rabies.

Of eight unvaccinated dogs, six succumbed to the intravenous inoculation of rabie matter.
Tyndall, Int. to Lady C. Hamilton's tr. of Life of Pasteur, (p. 40.)

In the interval it [a dog] manifests rabie symptoms.
Medical News, XLVIII. 223.

rabid (rab'id), a. [= OF. rabī, rabit = Sp. rábido = Pg. It. rabido, < L. rabidus, mad, furious, < rabere, be mad, rage: see rabies, and cf. rage, n.] 1. Furious; raging; mad.

With rabid hunger feed upon your kind.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xv. 258.

Like rabid snakes that sting some gentle child
Who brings them food. Shelley, Revolt of Islam, v. 7.
Sleep is the sure antidote of Insanity, the cure of idiocy. . . . without whose potent anodynes every creature would run rabid.
A. B. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 71.

2. Specifically—(a) Affected with rabies or hydrophobia, as a dog, wolf, horse, or man; hydrophobic; mad. (b) Pertaining to rabies: as, rabid virus.—3. Excessively or foolishly intense; rampant: as, a rabid Tory; a rabid teetotaler.

In the rabid desire to say something easily, I scarcely knew what I uttered at all.
Poe, Tales, l. 239.

rabidity (rā-bid'i-ti), n. [< ML. rabidita(t)-s, rabidness, < L. rabidus, rabid: see rabid.] The state of being rabid; rabidness; specifically, rabies. [Rare.]

Although the term hydrophobia has been generally applied to this terrible disease, I have preferred that of rabies, or rabidity, as being more characteristic of the chief phenomena manifested by it both in man and the lower animals.
Copland, Dict. Pract. Med., Rabies, § 2.

I fear that he [Macaulay] is one of those who, like the individual whom he has most studied, will "give up to party what was meant for mankind." At any rate, he must get rid of his rabidity. He writes now on all subjects as if he certainly intended to be a renegade.
Disraeli, Young Duke, v. 6.

rabidly (rab'id-li), adv. [< rabid + -ly.] In a rabid manner; madly; furiously.

rabidness (rab'id-nes), n. [< rabid + -ness.] The state of being rabid; furiousness; madness.

rabies (rā'bi-ēz), n. [< L. rabies, rage, madness, fury: see rage, n.] An extremely fatal infectious disease of man and many other animals, with predominant nervous symptoms. In man (where it is called hydrophobia) the period of incubation lasts in a majority of cases from three to six months or more. Cases where it is said to have lasted several years are ill sustained. The outbreak begins with malaise, anorexia, headache, and slight difficulty in swallowing. After one or two days of these prodromal symptoms the stage of tonic spasms begins, most marked at first in the pharyngeal muscles and in the attempt to swallow, especially liquids, but proceeding to involve the respiratory muscles and others of the trunk and those of the extremities. These convulsions are accompanied by extreme anxiety and oppression, and may be elicited by any stimulus, but especially by attempts to drink or by the sound or sight of liquids. They may last from a few minutes to half an hour. The pulse-rate increases, the temperature is more or less raised, and there may be decided delirium. After from one to three days the period of paralysis succeeds, followed shortly by death. The mortality after the development of the malady is nearly 100 per cent. The disease is communicated to man by inoculation from a rabid animal, usually by a dog-bite. The maximum number of inoculations occur in the early spring or winter, the minimum in late summer or fall. The saliva of rabid dogs seems to be somewhat rabigenic two or three days before the animal shows any evident signs of ill-health. Of persons bitten by rabid animals only a fraction develop rabies, estimated at from 16 per cent. for light wounds through the clothing up to 50 per cent. for wounds of exposed parts. The records of Pasteur's laboratories show a reduction to less than 1 per cent. when such persons are treated by his method. See Pasteurism.

rabietic (rā-bi-et'ik), a. [Irreg. < rabies + -et + -ic.] Pertaining or relating to rabies; of the nature of or resembling rabies.

To M. Grancher was most justly accorded the very agreeable task of expounding in a few simple and unadorned sentences the results of the anti-rabietic treatment of M. Pasteur.
Nature, XXXIX. 73.

rabific (rā-bif'ik), a. [< L. rabies, madness, + facere, make (see -fic).] Communicating rabies or canine madness; capable of causing hydrophobia.

Rabific virus is obtained from a rabbit which has died after inoculation by trepanning. Encyc. Brit., XX. 202.

rabigenic (rab-i-jen'ik), a. [< L. rabies, madness, + gignere, genere, produce, < *gen, bear, produce: see -gen.] Same as rabific.

rabinet (rab'i-net), n. [Origin obscure.] A small piece of ordnance formerly in use, weighing about 300 pounds, and carrying a ball about 1½ inches in diameter.

rabious (rā'bi-us), a. [< OF. rabieux = Sp. rabioso = Pg. raivoso = It. rabioso, < L. rabiosus, full of rage, raging, < rabies, rage, fury: see rabies and rage.] Wild; raging; fierce.

Ethelred languishing in mind and body, Edmond his sonne, surnamed Ironside (to oppose youth to youth), was employed against this rabious invader.
Daniel, Hist. Eng., p. 15. (Davies.)

rabitet, n. [ME., also rabett, rabgyhte, warhorse, < Icel. rābitr, an Arabian steed (cf. Icel. rābitar, Arabs), = MHG. rāvit, ravit, a warhorse, < OF. arabit, arabbi, an Arabian horse, < Arabe, Arab: see Arab.] A war-horse.

Syr Gye bestrode a rabgyhte,
That was moche and lyghte.
MS. Cantab. Fl. II. 38, f. 121. (Halliwell.)

rabonet, n. [= Sp. rábano = Pg. rabano, rabão, < L. raphanus, a radish: see Raphanus.] A radish. Gerard, Herball.

rabot (rab'ot), n. [< F. rabot: see rabbet.] A hard-wood rubber used in rubbing marble to prepare it for polishing. E. H. Knight.

raca (rā'kū), a. [Formerly also racha; LL. raca, < Gr. πάς, < Chal. rēkā, an insulting epithet of doubtful meaning, connected perhaps with raq, spit, spit upon (Ar. riq), or with riqā, empty, valueless (Ar. raiq, vain, futile).] Worthless; naught: a transliterated word occurring in Mat. v. 22, common among the Jews in Christ's time as an expression of contempt.

raccahout (rak'ā-höt), n. [< F. raccahout, a corruption of Ar. raqaut, raqūt, or raqaout, a nourishing starch with analgetic properties. But this Ar. word may be the F. ragout, OF. ragoust, imported into the East during the Crusades: see ragout.] A starch or meal prepared from the edible acorns of the belote oak, Quercus Ballota, sometimes recommended as a food for invalids. Mixed with sugar and aromatics, it is used by the Arabs as a substitute for chocolate. (Encyc. Diet.) The so-called raccahout des Arabes, sold in France, is a mixture made from edible acorns, salep, chocolate, potato-starch, rice-flour, vanilla, and sugar. Larousse.

raccoon, n. See raccoon.

raccourcy (ra-kör'si), a. [< OF. raccourci, pp. of raccourcir, shorten, cut off, < re-, again, + ac-courcir, shorten, < a- + court, short: see curt.] In her., same as couped.

race¹ (rās), n. [Early mod. E. also rase; < ME. rase, ras, commonly rees, res, a rush, running, swift course, swift current, a trial of speed, etc., < AS. rās, a rush, swift course, onset (cf. gār-rās, 'spear-rush,' fight with spears), = Icel. rās, a race, running, course, channel: see race¹, v., and cf. race². The AS. form rās, ME. rees, res, would produce a mod. E. rees*; the form in noun and verb, race, prop. rase, is due to the Scand. cognates, and perhaps also in part, in the verb, to confusion with race⁵, v.] 1. A rush; running; swift course.

Whenne thei were war of Moises,
Thei fleyge away all in a res,
Cursus Mundi. (Halliwell.)

That I ful ofte, in suche a res,
Am werye of myn owen lyf.

Gower, Conf. Amant.

The flight of many birds is swifter than the race of any beasts.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 681.

2. A course which has to be run, passed over, or gone through; onward movement or progression; career.

How soon hath thy prediction, Seer blest, Measured this transient world, the race of time,
Till time stand fix'd!
Milton, P. L., xii. 554.

Eternity! that boundless Race
Which Time himself can never run.
Congreve, Imit. of Horace, II. xiv. 1.

Succeeding Years their happy Race shall run,
And Age unheeded by Delight come on.
Prior, Henry and Emma.

My Arthur, whom I shall not see
Till all my widow'd race be run.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, ix.

3. A contest of speed; a competitive trial of speed, especially in running, but also in riding, driving, sailing, rowing, walking, or any mode of progression. The plural, used absolutely, commonly means a series of horse-races run at a set time over a regular course: as, to go to the races; the Epsom races.

To the bishope in a ras he ran.
Old Eng. Metr. Homilies, l. 141.

Part on the plain, or in the air sublime,
Upon the wing or in swift race contend,
As at the Olympian games.
Milton, P. L., II. 529.

The races were then called bell courses, because . . . the prize was a silver bell. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 107.

4t. Course, as of events; progress.

The prosecution and race of the war carrieth the defendant to assail and invade the ancient and indubitate patrimony of the first aggressor. Bacon, War with Spain.

5t. Struggle; conflict; tumult; trouble.

Othes hue him sworn in stude ther he was,
To buen him hold ant trewe for alies cunnes res.
Exeution of Sir Simon Fraser (Child's Ballads, VI. 276).

Hem rued the res that thei ne rest had.
Alexander of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 389.

Redeliche in that res the recuierere that me falles,
As whan i haue ani hap to here of that hame.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 439.

6t. Course; line of onward movement; way; route.

The souldier victourer is not woonte to spare any that commethe in his rase.
R. Eden, tr. of Peter Martyr (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 122]).

Consolation race. See consolation.—Flat race, a horse-race over level or clear ground, as opposed to a hurdle-race or steplechase.—Obstacle-race. See obstacle.

race¹ (rās), v.; pret. and pp. raced, ppr. racing. [ME. rasen, resen, rush, run, hasten, < AS. rās-san, rush, move violently, also rush on, attack, rush into; = OD. rāsen, rage, = MLG. rasen, MHG. G. rasen, rage, = Icel. rāsa = Sw. rasa =
Dan. rase, race, rush, hurry: see race¹, n., 1.
The form race, prop. rase, is due to the Scand.
cognates: see the noun.] I. intrans. 1. To run swiftly; run in, or as if engaged in, a contest of speed.

Saladin began to rase for ire.
Richard Coeur de Lion, l. 3633.

The racing place, call'd the Hippodromus, without the gate of Canopus, was probably in the plain towards the canal.
Pococke, Description of the East, I. 10.

To thrid the musky-circled mazes, wind
And double in and out the boles, and race
By all the fountains: fleet I was of foot.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

2. To run with uncontrolled speed; go or revolve wildly or with improper acceleration:
said of a steam-engine, a wheel, a ship's screw, or the like, when resistance is diminished without corresponding diminution of power.

No centrifugal governor could have so instantaneously cut off the steam: it would not have acted till the engine began to race.

S. P. Thompson, Dynamo-Elect. Mach., p. 98.

A big steamer in a heavy seaway often rests upon two waves, one under her bows and the other under her stern, while the 'midship section has practically no support from the water; and, again, her bows will be almost out of water and her screw racing. Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 144.

3. To practise horse-racing as an occupation; be engaged in the business of running horses.

II. trans. 1. To cause to run or move swiftly; push or drive onward in, or as if in, a trial of speed: as, to race a horse; to race steamers.—
2. To run, or cause horses, etc., to run, in competition with; contend against in a race.

Swore, boxed, fought cocks, and raced their neighbor's horses.
Irring, Knickerbocker, p. 176.

[Colloquial in both uses.]

race² (rās), n. [A particular use of race¹, as 'a swiftly running stream'; but perhaps in part due to OF. rase, raise, a ditch, channel, = Pr.
rasa, a channel; origin uncertain.] A strong or rapid current of water, or the channel or passage for such a current; a powerful current or heavy sea sometimes produced by the meeting of two tides: as, the Race of Alderney; Portland Race.

This evening the Talbot weighed and went back to the Coves, because her anchor would not hold here, the tide set with so strong a race.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 4.

Near the sides of channels and near the mouths of bays the changes of the currents are very complex; and near the headlands separating two bays there is usually at certain times a very swift current, termed a race.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 353.

(a) A canal or watercourse from a dam to a water-wheel:
specifically called the head-race. (b) The watercourse which leads away the water after it leaves the wheel:
specifically called the tail-race.

race³ (rās), n. and a. [< F. race (> G. rasse, race = Sw. ras = Dan. race, breed of horses, etc.), dial. raice = Pr. Sp. raza = Pg. raça =
It. razza, race, breed, lineage, < OHG. reiz, reiza, MHG. reiz (G. riss), line, scratch, stroke, mark, = Icel. reitir, scratch, < rita, scratch, = AS. writan = E. write: see write. No connection with race⁴, root, < L. radix, though race³ may have been influenced by this word in some of its uses: see race⁴.] I. n. 1. A genealogical line or stock; a class of persons allied by descent from a common ancestry; lineage; family; kindred:
as, the Levites were a race of priests; to be of royal or of ignoble race.

She is a gentlewoman of very absolute behaviour, and of a good race.
B. Jonson, Epicure, iii. 2.

He lvees to build, not boast, a generous race;
No tenth transmitter of a foolish face.
Savage, The Bastard.

2. An ethnical stock; a great division of mankind having in common certain distinguishing physical peculiarities, and thus a comprehensive class appearing to be derived from a distinct primitive source: as, the Caucasian race;
the Mongolian race; the Negro race. See man, 1.

I cannot with any accuracy speak of the English race; that would be claiming for ourselves too great a place among the nations of the earth.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 14.

3. A tribal or national stock; a division or subdivision of one of the great racial stocks of mankind, distinguished by minor peculiarities:
as, the Celtic race; the Finnic race is a branch of the Mongolian; the English, French, and Spaniards are mixed races.—4. The human family; human beings as a class; mankind:
a shortened form of human race: as, the future prospects of the race; the elevation of the race.

She had no companions of mortal race.
Shelley, Sensitive Plant, II. 4.

5. A breed, stock, or strain of domesticated animals or cultivated plants; an artificially propagated and perpetuated variety. Such races differ from natural species or varieties in their tendency to revert to their original characters, and lose those artificially acquired, when they are left to themselves. Many thousands of races have been produced and named.

There is a race of sheep in this country with four horns, two of them turning upwards, and two downwards.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. l. 196.

The truth of the principle of prepotency comes out more clearly when distinct races are crossed.

Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, xiv.

Specifically—(a) In zool., a geographical variety; a subspecies, characteristic of a given faunal area, intergrading with another form of the same species. (b) In bot.: (1) A variety so fixed as to reproduce itself with considerable certainty by seed. Races may be of spontaneous origin or the result of artificial selection. (2) In a broader use, any variety, subspecies, species, or group of very similar species whose characters are continued through successive generations. Bentham, Address to Linn. Soc., 1808.

6. Any fixed class of beings more or less broadly differentiated from all others; any general aggregate of mankind or of animals considered as a class apart; a perpetuated or continuing line of like existences: as, the human race: the race of statesmen; the equine or the feline race.

That provident care for the welfare of the offspring which is so strongly evinced by many of the insect race.
Say.

7t. A line or series; a course or succession:
used of things.

A race of wicked acts Shall flow out of my anger, and o'erspread
The world's wide face.
B. Jonson, Sejanus, II. 2.

8t. A strong peculiarity by which the origin or species of anything may be recognized, as, especially, the flavor of wine.

Order. There came not six days since from Hull a pipe of rich canary. . . .
Greedy. Is it of the right race?

Massey, New Way to Pay Old Debts, l. 3.

9t. Intrinsic character; natural quality or disposition; hence, spirit; vigor; pith; raciness.

Now I give my sensual race the rein.
Shak., M. for M., II. 4. 160.

I think the Epistles of Phalaris to have more race, more spirit, more force of wit and genius than any others I have ever seen.
Sir W. Temple, Anc. and Mod. Learning.

=Syn. Tribe, Clan, etc. See people.

II. a. Of or pertaining to a race. [Rare.]

The pyramids are race monuments.

New Princeton Rev., V. 235.

race⁴ (rās), n. [Formerly also raze: < OF. rais, raiz = Sp. raiz = Pg. raiz = It. radice, a root, < L. radix, a root: see radix, radish.] A root.
See race-ginger, and hand, 13 (a).

I have a gammon of bacon, and two races of ginger, to be delivered as far as Charing Cross.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., II. 1. 27.

By my troth, I spent eleven pence, beside three races of ginger.
Greene and Lodge, Looking Glass for Lond. and Eng.

race⁵ (rās), v. t. [ME. racen, rasen, by apheresis from aracen, root up: see arace¹, and cf. rash³.] To tear up; snatch away hastily.

After he be heilde towarde the fier, and saugh the flesche that the knave hadde rosted that was the Lough, and raced it off with his hondes madly, and rente it a-sunder in pieces.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 424.

And raas it frome his riche mene and ryste it in sondrye.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 392.

race⁶, v. t. An obsolete form of race¹, race¹.

race⁷ (rās), n. [Origin obscure.] A calcareous concretion in brick-earth. [Prov. Eng.]

What were at first supposed to be pebbles in one of the samples from Tintah prove on examination to be calcareous concretions (race or kunkur).
Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXIX. 213.

racé (ra-sā'), a. In her., same as indented.

race-card (rās'kård), n. A printed card containing information about the races to be run at a meeting on a race-course.

I remember it because I went to Epsom races that year to sell race cards.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 431.

race-cloth (rās'klōth), n. A saddle-cloth used in horse-racing, having pockets for the weights that may be prescribed.

race-course (rās'kōrs), n. 1. A plot of ground laid out for horse-racing, having a track for the horses, usually elliptical, and accommodations for the participants and spectators.—2. The canal along which water is conveyed to or from a water-wheel.

race-cup (rās'kūp), n. A piece of plate forming a prize at a horse-race. Originally such a piece of plate had the form of a goblet or drinking-cup, whence the name.

race-ginger (rās'jin'jēr), n. Ginger in the root, or not pulverized.

race-ground (rās'grōund), n. Ground appropriated to races.

race-horse (rās'hōrs), n. 1. A horse bred or kept for racing or running in contests; a horse that runs in competition. The modern race-horse, though far inferior to the Arab in point of endurance, is perhaps the finest horse in the world for moderate heats, such as those on common race-tracks. It is generally longer-bodied than the hunter, and the same power of leaping is not required. This animal is of Arabian, Berber, or Turkish extraction, improved and perfected by careful crossing and training. See racer, 2.
2. The steamer-duck.—3. A rear-horse; any mantis.

race-knife (rās'nif), n. A tool with a bent-over lip for scribing, marking, numbering, and other purposes. E.
H. Knight.

racemation (ras-ē-mā'shon), n. [< L.L.
racematio (n-), the gleaming of grapes, < L. racemus, a cluster of grapes: see raceme.] 1. The gathering or trimming of clusters of grapes. [Rare.]

Race-knife.

Having brought over some curious instruments out of Italy for racemation, engrafting, and inoculating, he was a great master in the use of them.

Bp. Burnet, Bp. Bedell, p. 120. (Latham.)

2. A cluster, as of grapes; the state of being racemose, or having clustered follicles, as a gland. [Rare.]

The whole racemation or cluster of eggs.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 28.

raceme (ra-sēm'), n. [= F. racème, a cluster, = Sp. Pg. racimo = It. racemo, < L. racemus, a cluster of grapes; allied to Gr. ῥάξ (gen. ῥάκος), a berry, esp. a grape. Cf. raisin, from the same source.] A cluster; specifically, in bot., a simple inflorescence of the centripetal or indeterminate type, in which the several or many flowers are borne on somewhat equal axillary pedicels along a relatively lengthened axis or rachis. Examples are furnished by the currant, the lily-of-the-valley, the locust, etc. A raceme becomes compound when the single flowers are replaced by racemes. See inflorescence, compare spike, and see cuts under Actæa, inflorescence, and Gründhagulum.

racemed (ra-sēm'd'), a. [< raceme + -ed]. In bot., disposed in racemes: said of flowers or fruits, or of the branches of a racemously compound inflorescence.

race-meeting (rās'mē'ting), n. A meeting for the purpose of horse-racing.

How many more race-meetings are there now than there were in 1850? Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 70.

racemic (ra-sēm'ik), a. [< raceme + -ic]. Pertaining or relating to grapes in clusters, or to racemes.—Racemic acid, $C_4H_4O_6$, an acid isomeric with tartaric acid, found along with the latter in the tartar obtained from certain vineyards on the Rhine. It is a modification of the ordinary tartaric acid, differing from it in its physical but not in its chemical properties. Also called paratartaric acid.

racemiferous (ras-ē-mif'ē-rus), a. [< L. racemus, a cluster (see racem), + ferre = E. bear]. Bearing racemes.

racemiform (ra-sē'mi-fōrm), a. [< L. racemus, a cluster, + forma, form]. In bot., having the form of a raceme.

racemocarbonic (ra-sē'mō-kār-bon'ik), a. [< racem + carbonic]. Formed from or consisting of racemic and carbonic acids.—Racemocarbonic acid. Same as dezoalic acid (which see, under dezoalic).

racemose (ras-ē-mōs), a. [Also racemous; = F. racemoux = Sp. Pg. racimoso = It. racemoso, < L. racemosus, full of grapes, < racemus, bunch of grapes; see raceme, raisin]. 1. In bot.: (a) Having the character or appearance of a raceme: said of a flower-cluster. (b) Arranged in racemes: said of the flowers.—2. In anat., clustered or aggregate, as a gland; having ducts which divide and subdivide and end in bunches of follicles. It is a common type of glandular structure, well exemplified in the salivary glands and the pancreas. See cut under parotid.—Racemose adenoma, a tumor originating from glandular tissue, and resembling closely the appearance and structure of a racemose gland: found in the breast and in salivary and sebaceous glands.

racemously (ras-ē-mōs-li), adv. So as to form or resemble a raceme or racemes.

racemous (ras-ē-mus or ra-sē'mus), a. Same as racemose.

racemule (ras-ē-mūl), n. [*< NL. racemulus, dim. of L. racemus, a cluster: see raceme]. In bot., a small raceme.

racemulose (ra-sēm'ū-lōs), a. [< NL. racemulosus, full of small racemes, < racemulus*, a small raceme: see racemule]. In bot., resembling a racemule, or arranged in racemules.

race-plate (rās'plāt), n. A wrought-iron or steel traversing-platform for heavy guns, upon which the gun is moved in a horizontal arc and moves backward in recoil.

racer (rā'sēr), n. [= Icel. rāsari, a racer, race-horse; as race + -er]. 1. One who races; a runner or contestant in a race or in races of any kind.

Beam'd with filth, and blotted o'er with clay,
Obscene to sight, the rueful racer lay.

Pope, Illiad, xxiii. 912.

2. A race-horse. The racer is generally distinguished by his beautiful Arabian head; his fine and finely-set-on neck; his oblique lengthened shoulders; well-bent hinder legs; his ample muscular quarters; his flat legs, rather short from the knee downwards; and his long and elastic pastern.

Quoted in T. Bell's British Quadrupeds, p. 382.

3. Hence, anything having great speed.

Coal will be transferred across the Atlantic in cargo boats for the use of the ocean racers. Engineer, LXVI. 77.

4. In a braiding-machine, a traversing support for tension and spool-holding apparatus.—5. A snake of the genus Scotophis (or Coluber), S. obsoletus, also called pilot black-snake or pilot-snake. It is black, with a mottled black and yellow belly, and has the median dorsal scales carinated.—6. A snake, Bascanion constrictor, the common black-snake of the eastern United States. It is blue or blue-black, with greenish-blue belly, and has smooth scales.—7. A poor, thin, or spent fish; a slink: applied to mackerel, shad, salmon, etc.—8. A sand-crab. See Ocyropsa.—Blue racer. See blue-racer.—race-track (rās'trak), n. The track or path over which a race is run; a race-course.

raceway (rās'wā), n. 1. An artificial passage for water flowing from a fall or dam; a mill-race. Compare mill-race. See race.—2. In fish-culture, a fishway.

racht, n. See ratch.

rachamah, n. In ornith. See Neophron.

rachet, n. See ratch.

rache, v. An obsolete form of reach.

rache, v. t. An obsolete assimilated form of reach.

rachial (rā'ki-āl), a. [< rachis + -al]. Pertaining to a rachis; rachidial. Also rachial.

rachialgia (rā'ki-āl'ji-ā), n. [< NL. prop. rachialgia, < Gr. ῥάχης, spine, + ἀλγος, pain]. Pain in the spine, especially neuralgic pain. Also rachialgia.

rachialgic (rā'ki-āl'jik), a. [< rachialgia + -ic]. Affected with rachialgia. Also rachialgic.

Rachianectes (rā'ki-ā-nek'tēs), n. [< NL. (Cope), also Rhachianectes, < Gr. ῥάχια, a rocky shore, + νῆκτις, a swimmer, < νῆξεν, swim]. A genus of whalebone whales of the family Balenopteridae and subfamily Agaphelinae, containing the gray whale of the North Pacific, R. glaucus, combining the small head, slender form, and narrow flippers of a finner-whale with the lack of a dorsal fin and absence of folds of skin on the throat of a right whale. This whale attains great size, and its pursuit is an important branch of the fisheries in the waters it is found in, sometimes attended with special dangers. The parasites chiefly affecting R. glaucus are a whale-louse, Cyanus scammoni, and a barnacle, Cryptolepas rachianecti.

Rachicallis (rā'ki-kāl'is), n. [< NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1830), < Gr. ῥάχια, a rocky shore, + καλλός, beauty]. A genus of rubiaceous shrubs belonging to the tribe Rondeletieae, differing from Rondeletia chiefly in its half-superior septicidal capsule. There is only one species, R. rupestris, called carvort, growing on the rocky coasts of the West Indies. It is a low shrub bearing narrow decussate leaves with sheathing stipules, and small solitary yellow flowers sessile in the axils.

rachides, n. Plural of rachis.

rachidial (rā'kid'i-āl), a. [Also rachidial; < Gr. ῥάχης (assumed stem ῥάχιδ-*), the spine, + -al]. Of or pertaining to a rachis, in any sense; rachial.

rachidian (rā'kid'i-an), a. [Also rachidian; < F. rachidien, < Gr. ῥάχης (assumed stem ῥάχιδ-*), the spine, + -ian]. Same as rachidial.

The teeth of the radula are divided by nearly all students of that organ into rachidian or median, lateral, and uncinal. W. H. Dall, Science, iv. No. 81, Aug. 22, 1884.

Rachidian bulb. Same as medulla oblongata.—Rachidian canal, the spinal or neural canal.

Rachiglossa (rā'ki-glos'sā), n. pl. [Also Rhachiglossa; NL., < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + γλῶσσα, tongue]. Those mollusks which are rachiglossate; specifically, a division of gastropods so characterized, including the Buccinidae, Muricidae, Volutidae, etc. See cut under ribbon.

rachiglossate (rā'ki-glos'sāt), a. [Also rachiglossate; < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + γλῶσσα, tongue]. In Mollusca, having upon the lingual ribbon or radula only a single median tooth, or a median tooth with only an admedian one on each side of it, in any one of the many transverse series or cross-rows of radular teeth. The formula is 0-I-0 or I-I-I, where the 0 is a cipher and I means one.

rachilla (rā'kil'ā), n. [Also rhachilla; NL., < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + dim. -illa]. In bot., a little rachis; a secondary rachis in a compound inflorescence, as of a spikelet in a grass.

Rachiodon (rā'ki-ō-don), n. [< NL.: see rachiodont]. The typical genus of Rachiodontidae, having a series of enamel-tipped vertebral processes projecting into the esophagus and serving as teeth: synonymous with Dasypeltis (which see). The type is R. scaber, of Africa, a snake which lives much on eggs, and has this contrivance for not smashing them till they get down its throat, when the sagacious serpent swallows the contents and spits out the shell. Also Rhachiodon.

rachiodont (rā'ki-ō-dont), a. [Also rhachiodont; < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + ὄδων (odont-) = E. tooth]. Having processes of the spinal column which function as teeth; belonging to the Rachiodontidae.

Rachiodontidae (rā'ki-ō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [< NL., < Rachiodon (-odont-) + -idae]. A family of colubiform ophidians, named from the genus Rachiodon: same as the subfamily Dasypeltinae. Also Rhachiodontidae.

Rachiopteris (rā'ki-op'te-ris), n. [< NL., < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + πτερίς, fern: see Pteris]. A name under which Schimper has grouped various fragments of the rachides or stems of fossil ferns. Specimens of this nature have been described by Lesquereux as occurring in the coal-measures of Illinois, and by Dawson as having been found in the Devonian of New York.

rachipagus (rā'kip'a-gus), n.; pl. rachipagi (-ji). [< NL., < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + πάγος, that which is fixed or firmly set, < παγνύω, make fast]. In teratol., a double monster united at the spine.

rachis (rā'kis), n.; pl. rachides (-ki-dēs). [Also rhachis; NL., < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, a ridge (of a mountain-chain), a rib (of a leaf).] 1. In bot.: (a) The axis of an inflorescence when somewhat elongated; the continuation of the peduncle along which the flowers are ranged, as in a spike or raceme. (b) In a pinnately compound leaf or frond, the prolongation of the petiole along which the leaflets or pinnae are disposed, corresponding to the midrib of a pinnately veined simple leaf. See cut under compound.—2. In zool. and anat.: (a) The vertebral column. (b) The stem, shaft, or scape of a feather, as distinguished from the web, vane, or vextillum; especially, that part of the stem which bears the vextillum, as distinguished from the calamus or quill. See quill, 4.

The differentiation of the feather into rachis and vextillum. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 419.

(c) The median part of the radula of a mollusk, usually bearing teeth which differ from those on each side of it.—3. The axial skeleton of various polyp-colonies, as of Gorgonia; some axial part, or formation like a midrib, as in crinoids.—Generative rachis, in crinoids, a cellular rod or cord which lies in the genital canal in connection with the visceral generative tissue, and the enlargements of which in the pinnules form the genital glands.

rachitic (rā'kit'ik), a. [Also rhachitic; < F. rachitique; as rachitis + -ic]. 1. In anat., of or pertaining to the spinal column; spinal; vertebral. [Rare].—2. Pertaining to or affected with rachitis; rickety.

rachitis (rā'ki'tis), n. [< NL. (Dr. Glisson, 1650, in his work "De Rachitide"), as if lit. 'inflammation of the spine' (prop. rhachitis, < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + -itis), but adopted as a Latinized form for E. rickets: see rickets]. 1. A disease of very early life, characterized by a perversion of nutrition of the bones, by which uncalcified osteoid tissue is formed in place of bone, and the resorption of bone is quickened. Hence the bones are flexible, and distortions occur, such as crooked legs, heart-shaped pelvis, or curvature of spine. See rickets. 2. In bot., a disease producing abortion of the fruit or seed.—Rachitis foetalis annularis, intra-uterine formation of annular thickenings on the diaphyses of the long bones. Also called rachitis intra-uterina annularis.—Rachitis foetalis micromelica, intra-uterine stunting of the bones in their longitudinal growth. Also called rachitis uterina micromelica.

rachitome (rak'i-tōm), n. [Also rhachitome; < F. rachitome, < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + -τομος, < τέμνω, raueiv, cut]. An anatomical instrument for opening the spinal canal, without injuring the medulla.

rachitomous (rā'kit'ō-mus), a. [Also rhachitomous; < Gr. ῥάχης, the spine, + -τομος, < τέμνω, raueiv, cut]. Segmented, as a vertebra of many of the lower vertebrates which consists of a neural arch resting on a separate piece on each side, the pleurocentrum, which in turn rests on a single median piece below, the intercentrum; having or characterized by such vertebrae, as a fish or batrachian, or the backbone of such animals. See embolomeros. E. D. Cope.

Both kinds of vertebrae (rachitomous and embolomeros) can be found in the same animal. Science, VI. 98.

racial (rā'siāl), a. [< race + -ial. Cf. facial]. Relating or pertaining to race or lineage, or to a race or races of living beings; characteristic of race or of a race.

Man, as he lived on the earth during the time when the most striking racial characteristics were being developed. W. H. Flower, Encyc. Brit., XV. 445.

racially (rā'siāl-i), adv. In a racial manner; in relation to or as influenced by race or lineage.

The unification of the racially most potent people of whom we have record. The Academy, Aug. 3, 1889, p. 66.

Rye-grass (Lolium perenne).
a. Rachis.

Raciborskia (ras-i-bôr-ski-â), n. [NL. (Berlese), < Raciborski, a Polish botanist.] A genus of myxomycetous fungi, giving name to the family Raciborskiaceæ.

Raciborskiaceæ (ras-i-bôr-ski-â-sê-ê), n. pl. [NL., < Raciborski + -aceæ.] A small family of myxomycetous fungi, taking its name from the genus Raciborskia, and having the peridium naked and distinctly stipitate, and the capillitium violaceous.

racily (râ'si-li), adv. [< racy + -ly.] In a racy manner; piquantly; spicily.

racinet, n. [ME.; < OF. racine, racine, F. racine = Pr. racina, razina, root, < ML. as if radicina*, dim. of L. radix (radic-), root: see radix. Cf. racet.] A root.

Unfelleful lust, though it be sote,
And of alle yvelle the racine.

Rom. of the Rose, l. 4881.

raciness (râ'si-nes), n. [< racy + -ness.] The quality of being racy; peculiarly characteristic and piquant flavor or style; spiciness; pungency.

racine (râ'sing), n. [Verbal n. of race, v.] The running of races; the occupation or business of arranging for or carrying on races, especially between horses.

The Queen [Anne] was fond of racine, and gave her 1000 gold cups to be run for, as now: nay more, she not only kept race horses, but ran them in her own name.

Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, l. 302.

racine-bell (râ'sing-bel), n. A girel or small bell given as a prize for a horse-race: such a prize was frequent in the sixteenth century. Bells of this form exist of silver, from an inch to two inches and a half in diameter, with inscriptions and dates.

racine-bit (râ'sing-bit), n. A light jointed-ring bit, the loose rings of which range in size from 3 to 6 inches.

racine-calendar (râ'sing-kal'en-dâr), n. A detailed list of races run or to be run.

rack (rak), v. t. [Early mod. E. also wrack (by confusion with wrack); not found as a verb in ME. or AS., except the secondary forms AS. reccan, as below, and ME. raxen, < AS. razan, racan*, stretch oneself (see rax); prob. < MD. racken, stretch, reach out, torture, rack, = G. racken, stretch, torture; a collateral form of AS. reccan (pret. rehte), stretch out, also correct, direct, rule, guide, tell, etc. (> ME. rechen, stretch, also tell: see retch and reck, reckon), = OS. rekkan, stretch, = MD. recken, D. recken = MLG. reken, stretch, = OHG. recken, MHG. recken, stretch, extend, = Icel. rekja, stretch, trace (cf. rekja, strain), = Dan. ække = Sw. ække, reach, hand, stretch, = Goth. rakjan*, in comp. uf-rakjan, stretch out; prob. = L. regere, rule, lit. 'stretch out,' 'make straight' (in por-rigere, stretch forth, e-rigere, straighten out, erect, etc.) (pp. rectus, straight, = E. right), = Gr. epi-yew, stretch, = Lith. razau, razyti, stretch, = Skt. √ arj, stretch. Akin to rake, reach, extend, but prob. not to rake, nor to reach, with which, however, rack has been partly confused. The verb and esp. the noun rack show great confusion and mixture of senses, and complete separation is difficult. In some senses the verb is from the noun.] 1. To stretch; stretch out; strain by force or violence; extend by stretching or straining.

Which yet they rack higher to foure hundred threescore and ten thousand yeares.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 54.

I know your hearts are like two lutes rack'd up To the same pitch. The Stighted Maid, p. 53. (Nares.)

Suits in love should not,

Like suits in law, be rack'd from term to term.

Shirley, Hyde Park, l. 2.

2. To strain so as to rend; wrench by strain or jar; rend; disintegrate; disjoint: as, a racking cough; to rack a ship to pieces by slanting shot.

The duke

Dare no more stretch this finger of mine than he Dare rack his own. Shak., M. for M., v. l. 317.

3. To torture by violent stretching; stretch on a frame by means of a windlass; subject to the punishment of the rack. See rack, n., 2 (b).

He was racked and miserably tormented, to the intent he should either change his opinion or confesse other of his profession. Foze, A Table of French Martyrs, an. 1551.

An answer was returned by Lord Killultagh to the effect that 'you ought to rack him if you saw cause, and hang him if you found reason.' Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 466.

Noblemen were exempt, the vulgar thought,
From racking, but, since law thinks otherwise,
I have been put to the rack.

Browning, Ring and Book, l. 202.

Hence—4. To put in torment; affect with great pain or distress; torture in any way; disturb violently.

My soul is rack'd till you dissolve my fears.

Beau. and Fl. (?), Faithful Friends, l. 1.

Lord, how my soul is rack'd betwixt the world and thee!
Quarles, Emblems, v. 9.

I will not rack myself with the Thought.

Steele, Grief A-la-Mode, v. 1.

Kinraid was racked with agony from his dangling broken leg, and his very life seemed leaving him.

Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xxxviii.

5. To strain with anxiety, eagerness, curiosity, or the like; subject to strenuous effort or intense feeling; worry; agitate: as, to rack one's invention or memory.

A barbarous phrase has often made me out of love with a good sense; and doubtful writing hath wracked me beyond my patience.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

It doth rack my brain why they should stay thus.

Shirley, Love in a Maze, v. 5.

6. To stretch or draw out of normal condition or relation; strain beyond measure or propriety; wrest; warp; distort; exaggerate; overstrain: chiefly in figurative uses.

Albeit this is one of the places that hath been racked, as I told you of racking Scriptures.

Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

For it so falls out

That what we have we prize not to the worth While we enjoy it, but, being rack'd and lost,
Why, then we rack the value.

Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1. 222.

Pray, rack not honesty. Fletcher, Loyal Subject, II. 6.

Hyperbole is racked to find terms of adoring admiration for the queen.

Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 28.

7. To exact or obtain by rapacity; get or gain in excess or wrongfully. See rack-rent. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Each place abounding with fowle injuries,
And fill'd with treasure rack'd with robberies.

Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 1306.

Why, honest master, here lies all my money,
The money I ha' rack'd by usury.

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, l. 1.

Good for nought but to persuade their lords

To rack their rents and give o'er housekeeping.

Middleton, Anything for a Quiet Life, l. 1.

8. To subject to extortion; practise rapacity upon; oppress by exaction.

The commons hast thou rack'd; the clergy's bags

Are lank and lean with thy extortions.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., l. 3. 131.

Here are no hard Landlords to rack vs with high rents, or extorting fines.

Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 156.

9. In mining, to wash on the rack. See rack, n., 5 (i).—10. To place on or in a rack or frame made for the purpose, either for storage or for temporary need, as for draining, drying, or the like.—11. To form into or as if into a rack or grating; give the appearance of a rack to.—12. Naut., to seize together with cross-turns, as two ropes.—Racking turns, turns taken alternately over and under ropes, to bind them together.—To rack a tackle, to seize two parts of a tackle together with rope-yarn or spun-yarn, so that, if the fall is let go, the strain will not be loosened.

rack (rak), n. [< ME. racke, a rack (for torture), rakke, a straight bar, a rack for hay, a framework, rekke, a bar, a framework above a manger, a bar, a rack (for torture), later rak, rack (as a roost, a frame for dishes, weapons, etc.); < MD. racke, D. rak, a rack, = LG. rakk, a shelf, = G. rack, a bar, rail, recke, a frame, trestle, rack for supporting things, dial. reck, scaffold, wooden horse; the lit. sense being either (a) active, 'that which stretches,' as an appliance for bending a bow, a frame for stretching the limbs in torture (rack in this sense also involving the sense of 'framework' merely), or (b) passive, 'that which is stretched,' hence a straight bar (cf. Icel. rakkr, rakr, straight, = Sw. rak, straight), a frame of bars (such as the grating above a manger), a framework used in torture (involving also the orig. active notion of 'stretching'), a bar with teeth, a thing extorted, etc.; from the verb. Cf. G. reckbank, a rack (means of torture), < recken, stretch, + bank, bench.] 1. A bar.

Hevie rekkes binde to hire fet.

Early Eng. Poems and Lives of Saints (ed. Furnivall), xv. [192.]

2. A frame or apparatus for stretching or straining. Specifically—(a) A windlass or winch for bending a bow; the part of the crossbow in which the gaffe moved. Halliwel.

These bows . . . were bent only by a man's immediate strength, without the help of any bender or rack.

Bp. Wilkins, Math. Magick. (Latham.)

(b) An instrument of torture by means of which the limbs were pulled in different directions, so that the whole body was subjected to a great tension, sufficient sometimes to cause the bones to leave their sockets. The form of application of the torture differed at different times. The rack consisted essentially of a platform on which the body was laid, having at one end a fixed bar to which one pair of limbs was fastened, and at the other end a movable bar to which the other limbs were fastened, and which could be forcibly pulled away from the fixed bar or rolled on its own axis by means of a windlass. See judicial torture, under torture.

Galows and racke.

Caxton, tr. of Reynard the Fox (ed. Arber), p. 24.

Take him hence; to the rack with him! We'll touse you joint by joint, but we will know his purpose.

Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 313.

3. Punishment by the rack, or by some similar means of torture.

You have found a Person who would suffer Racks in Honour's Cause.

Congreve, Way of the World, iv. 18.

Hence—4. A state of torture or extreme suffering, physical or mental; great pain; rendering anxiety; anguish. See on the rack, below.

A fit of the stone puts a king to the rack, and makes him as miserable as it does the meanest subject.

Sir W. Temple.

5. A grating or open framework of bars, wires, or pegs on or in which articles are arranged or deposited: much used in composition, as in bottle-rack, card-rack, hat-rack, letter-rack, etc. Specifically—(a) A grating on which bacon is laid. (b) An open wooden framework placed above a manger or the like, in which fodder for horses or cattle is laid.

From their full racks the generous steeds retire.

Addison.

(c) An openwork siding, high and flaring outward, placed on a wagon for the conveyance of hay or straw, grain in the sheaf, or other light and bulky material. (d) In printing, an upright framework, with side-cleats or other supports, for the storing of cases, of boards or galleys of type, etc.: distinguished as case-rack, galley-rack, etc. (e) Naut., a fair-leader for a running rigging. (f) The cob-iron of a grate. Halliwel. (g) A framework for a table aboard ship to hold dishes, etc., so as to keep them from sliding or falling off: same as fiddle, 2. (h) A frame for holding round shot in holes; a shot-rack. (i) In metal., an inclined wooden table on which fine ore is washed on a small scale. It is one of the various simpler forms of the buddle. (j) In woolen-cloth manuf., a frame in a stove or room heated by steam-pipes on which the cloth is stretched tightly after washing with fullers' earth. (k) In organ-building, one of the thin boards, with perforations, which support the upper part of the feet of the pipes.

6. In mach., a straight or very slightly curved metallic bar, with teeth on one of its edges, adapted to work into the teeth of a wheel, pinion, or endless screw, for converting a circular Rack and Worm.

Rack and Pinion.

into a rectilinear motion, or vice versa. If the rack is curved, it is called a segment-rack. If the teeth are placed on the rack obliquely and it is used with a worm instead of a wheel, it forms a rack-and-worm gear; in the cut, a is the worm, b the rack, and c a friction-wheel on which the back of b rolls, and which holds b intermeshed with a. See also cut under mutated.

7. An anglers' creel or fish-basket.—8. A fish-weir.—9. A measure of lacework counting 240 meshes perpendicularly.—10. Reach: as, to work by rack of eye (that is, to be guided by the eye in working).—11. That which is extorted; exaction.

The great rents and racks would be insupportable.

Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

In a high rack, in a high position. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]—On the rack, on the stretch by or as if by means of a rack; hence, in a state of tension or of torturing pain or anxiety.

I would have him ever to continue upon the Rack of Fear and Jealousie.

Congreve, Way of the World, ii. 1.

My Head and Heart are on the Rack about my Son.

Steele, Conscious Lovers, iv. 1.

Rack and pinion. See def. 6, above.—Rack-and-pinion jack, a lifting-jack in which power is applied by means of a rack and pinion.—Rack-and-pinion press, a press in which force is transmitted through a pinion to a rack connected with the follower. E. H. Knight.—Rack-cutting machine, a milling-machine for cutting the teeth of racks.—To live at rack and manger, to live sumptuously and recklessly without regard to pecuniary means; live on the best without regard of payment.

But while the Palatine was thus busily employ'd, and lay with all his sea-horses, unbridl'd, unsaddl'd, at rack and manger, secure and careless of any thing else but of carrying on the great work which he had begun . . .

The Pagan Prince (1690). (Nares.)

A blustering, dissipated human figure . . . tearing out the bowels of St. Edmundsbury Convent (its larders namely and cellars) in the most ruinous way, by living at rack and manger there. Carlyle, Past and Present, II. 1.

To put to the rack, to subject to the torture of the rack; cause to be racked; hence, to torment with or about anything; subject to a state of keen suffering.

rack² (rak), n. [*< ME. rakke, < AS. hreacca, hrecca, hreca, the back of the head (L. occiput; Sweet, Old Eng. Texts, p. 549).] The neck and spine of a fore quarter of veal or mutton, or the neck of mutton or pork. Halliwel.

A rack of mutton, sir.

And half a lamb. Middleton, Chaste Maid, II. 2.

rack³ (rak), v. i. [Altered, to conform to *rack*³, n., from ME. reken (pret. rac), drive, move, tend, < Icel. reka, drive, drift, toss, = Sw. raka = Dan. vrage, reject, drift, = AS. wreccan, drive, wreak, E. wreak: see wreak. Cf. *rack*³, n.] 1. To drive; move; go forward rapidly; stir.

His spere to his heorte rac. Layamon, I. 9320.

To her sone sche gan to reke. Octorian, I. 182.

Ich wule forthur reke. Owl and Nightingale, I. 1006.

2. To drive, as flying clouds.

Three glorious suns, each one a perfect sun;
 Not separated with the racking clouds,
 But sever'd in a pale clear-shining sky.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., II. 1. 27.

The clouds rack clear before the sun. B. Jonson.

rack³ (rak), n. [*< ME. rac, rak, rakke, < Icel. rek, drift, a thing drifted ashore, jetsam; cf. reki, drift, jetsam; < reka, drive, drift: see rack*³, v. Cf. *rack*⁴ = *wrack*¹, wreck.] Thin flying broken clouds; especially, detached fragments of raggy cloud, commonly occurring with rain-clouds.

There a tempest hom toke on the torres heigh:

A rak and a roye wynde rose in hor saile.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 1984.

The great globe itself,

Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve

And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,

Leave not a rack behind.

Shak., Tempest, IV. 1. 156.

The cloudy rack slow journeying in the west.

Keats, Endymion, II.

As when across the sky the driving rack of the rain-cloud Grows for a moment thin, and betrays the sun by its brightness. Longfellow, Miles Standish, IX.

rack⁴ (rak), n. [Another spelling of wrack: see *wrack*¹, n., and cf. *rack*³, from the same ult. source.] Same as *wrack*¹: now used in the phrases to go to rack, to go to rack and ruin.

We fell to talk largely of the want of some persons understanding to look after the business, but all goes to rack. Pepys.

rack⁵ (rak), n. [A var. of *rake*², a path, track: see *rake*².] 1. A rude narrow path, like the track of a small animal. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]—2. A rut in a road. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

rack⁶ (rak), v. A dialectal form of reck.

rack⁷ (rak), v. t. [A dial. form for what would be reg. retch*, < ME. reechen, racchen, rechen (pret. rahte, rehte, rauzte), rule, < AS. reccan, direct, extend, reach forth, explain, say: see *rack*¹, and cf. *retch*¹ and reckon.] To relate; tell. Halliwel.

rack⁸ (rak), v. i. [Perhaps a particular use of *rack*³, v. By some supposed to be a var. of *rock*².] To move with the gait called a rack.

His Rain-deer, racking with proud and stately pace, Giveth to his flock a right beautiful grace.

Poole, An Eclogue.

Berratto [It.], a bounting cloth, a steue; a racking of a horse. Borattare, to sift or bount meal. Also a racking between an amble and a trot. Florio.

rack⁸ (rak), n. [*< rack*⁸, v.] A gait of the horse between a trot and a gallop (or canter), in which the fore feet move as in a slow gallop, while the hind feet move as in a trot (or pace). It is usually an artificial gait, but is sometimes hereditary or natural. There is much confusion of terms in respect to this gait, due to the fact that the gait itself is somewhat varied, according as the racker carries the one or the other fore foot foremost in the galloping motion of the fore feet; that many confound the rack with the pace, the two words often being used as synonymous; and that many have mistaken the use of the words pace and amble. There is abundant evidence that the American "pace" of to-day is the "amble" of Europeans of the last century and earlier. The motion of the hind feet is the same in the trot, the pace, and the rack. In the trot the diagonal hind and fore feet move nearly simultaneously. In the pace or amble the hind and fore feet of the same side move nearly simultaneously. See cut in next column.

rack⁹ (rak), n. [A var. of *rock*³, by confusion with *rack*¹. Cf. *rack*⁸, a supposed var. of *rock*².] A distaff; a rock.

The sisters turn the wheel,

Empty the woolly rack, and fill the reel.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, IV. 423.

rack¹⁰ (rak), v. t. [Appar. first in pp. racked, rackt; < OF. raquer, pp. raqué, in vin raqué, "small or coarse wine, squeezed from the dregs of the grapes, already drained of all their best moisture" (Cotgrave); origin uncertain; according to Wedgwood, *< Languedoc araca, rack, < raco, husks or dregs of grapes; according to Skeat, for orig. *rasquer = Sp. Pg. Pr. rascar, scratch; cf. Sp. Pg. rasgar, tear apart: see rash*⁵.] To draw off from the lees; draw off, as pure liquor from its sediment: as, to rack cider or wine; to rack off liquor.

Rack wines—that is, wines cleansed and so purged that it may be and is drawn from the lees. Minsheu, 1617.

rack¹¹ (rak), n. [Partly by aphorism from arrack; cf. Sp. raque, arrack, Turk. raki, a spirituous drink, from the same ult. source: see arrack.] 1. Same as arrack.

Their ordinary drink is Tea: but they make themselves merry with hot Rack, which sometimes also they mix with their Tea. Dampier, Voyages, II. 1. 53.

2. A liquor made chiefly of brandy, sugar, lemons (or other fruit), and spices. Halliwel.—Rack punch, a punch made with arrack.

I don't love rack punch. Swift, To Stella, xxxv.

If slices of ripe pineapple be put into good arrack, and the spirit kept for a considerable time, it mellows down and acquires a very delicious flavour. This quality is much valued for making rack-punch.

Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 220.

rack¹² (rak), n. [Origin obscure.] A young rabbit. See the quotation.

Racks, or young rabbits about two months old, which have not lost their first coat. Ure, Dict., IV. 380.

rackabones (rak'a-bonz), n. [*< rack*¹, v., + a (insignificant) + bones.] A very lean person or animal. [Colloq., U. S.]

He is a little afraid that this mettlesome charger cannot be trusted going down hill; otherwise he would let go of the old rackabones that hobbles behind [the vehicle]. New York Tribune, June 13, 1862.

rackapelt (rak'a-pelt), n. [Cf. rackabones.] An idle rascal. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

rackarock (rak'a-rok), n. [*< rack*¹, v., + a + *rock*¹. Cf. rendrock.] An explosive consisting of about three parts of potassium chlorate to one part of nitrobenzol.

rack-bar (rak'bär), n. Naut., a billet of wood used to twist the bight of a rope called a swifter, in order to bind a raft firmly together.

rack-block (rak'blok), n. Naut., a range of sheaves cut in one piece of wood for running-ropes to lead through.

rack-calipers (rak'kal'i-pärz), n. pl. Calipers of which the legs are actuated by a rack-and-pinion motion. E. H. Knight.

rack-car (rak'kär), n. A freight-car roofed over and with sides formed of slats with open spaces between.

rack-compass (rak'kum'pas), n. A joiners' compass with a rack adjustment. E. H. Knight.

racker¹ (rak'er), n. [= D. rakker = MLG. rack-er, racher, LG. rakker = G. racker = Sw. rack-are = Dan. rakker; as *rack*¹, v., + *-er*¹.] 1. One who puts to the rack; a torturer or tor-mentor.—2. One who wrests, twists, or distorts.

Such rackers of orthography. Shak., L. L. L., v. 1. 21.

3. One who harasses by exactions: as, a racker of tenants. Swift.

racker² (rak'er), n. [*< rack*⁸ + *-er*¹.] A horse that moves with a racking gait.

racker³ (rak'er), n. [*< rack*¹⁰ + *-er*¹.] A device for racking liquor, or drawing it off from the lees; also, a person who racks liquors.

The filling of casks is effected by Smith's rackers.

Engineer, LXVI. 151.

racket¹ (rak'et), n. [< Gael. racaid, a noise, disturbance, < rac, make a noise like geese or ducks; Ir. racan, noise, riot. Cf. rackle.] 1. A disorderly, confusing noise, as of commingled play or strife and loud talk; any prolonged clatter; din; clamor; hurly-burly.

Pray, what's all that racket over our heads? . . . My brother and I can scarce hear ourselves speak.

Sterne, Tristram Shandy, II. 6.

2. A disturbance; a row; also, a noisy gathering; a scene of clamorous or eager merriment. [Colloq.]

Chap. Adzfish, forsooth, yonder haz been a most heavy racket; by the zide of the wood there is a curious hansom gentlewoman lies as dead as a herring, and bleeds like any stuck pig. Unnatural Mother (1698). (Nares.)

3. A clamorous outburst, as of indignation or other emotion; a noisy manifestation of feeling: as, to make a racket about a trifle; to raise a racket about one's ears. [Colloq.]—4. Something going on, whether noisily and openly or quietly; a special proceeding, scheme, project, or the like: a slang use of very wide application: as, what's the racket? (what is going on?); to go on a racket (to engage in a lark or go on a spree); to be on to a person's racket (to detect his secret aim or purpose); to work the racket (to carry on a particular scheme or undertaking, especially one of a "shady" character); to stand the racket (to take the consequences, or abide the result).

He is ready as myself to stand the racket of subsequent proceedings.

Daily Telegraph (London), Sept. 8, 1882. (Encyc. Dict.)

He had been off on the racket, perhaps for a week at a time.

Daily Telegraph (London), Nov. 16, 1885. (Encyc. Dict.)

"Lucky I learned that signal racket," said Jack, as, still at a furious pace, he made cuts in different directions with his extemporized flag. The Century, XXXIX. 527.

To give the name of legislation to the proceedings at Albany over the Fair Bill yesterday would be an abuse of language. The proper name for them was "tumbling to the racket." The Assembly passed the bill without debate and almost unanimously, much as they might pass a bill authorizing a man to change his name.

New York Evening Post, Jan. 29, 1890.

5. A smart stroke; a rap. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

racket¹ (rak'et), v. [*< racket*¹, n.] I. intrans. 1. To make a rattling or clattering noise; raise a tumult; move noisily.

The wind blazed and racketed through the narrow space between the house and the hill. S. Judd, Margaret, I. 17.

2. To engage or take part in a racket of any kind; frequent noisy or tumultuous scenes; carry on eager or energetic action of some special kind. [Colloq.]

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 753.

5. A broad wooden shoe or patten for a horse or other draft-animal, to enable him to step on marshy or soft ground.—6. A bird's tail-feather shaped like a racket; a spatule. The racket may result from a spatulate enlargement of the webs at or near the end of the feather; or from the lack, natural or artificial, of webbing along a part of the feather, beyond which the feather is webbed; or from colling of the end of the feather. These formations are exhibited in the motmots, in some humming-birds and birds of paradise, and in various others, and are illustrated in the figures under Momotus, Prioniturus, and Cincinurus. Some feathers springing from the head acquire a similar shape. See cut under Parotia.

7t. A musical instrument of the seventeenth century, consisting of a mouthpiece with a double reed, and a wooden tube repeatedly bent upon itself, and pierced with several finger-holes. Its compass was limited, and the tone weak and difficult to produce. Several varieties or sizes were made, as of the bombard, which it resembled. Early in the eighteenth century it was replaced by the modern bassoon.

8. An organ-stop giving tones similar to those of the above instrument.

racket² (rak'et), v. t. [racket², n.] To strike with or as if with a racket; toss.

rack-railway (rak'räl'wä), n. A railway operated with the aid of rack-rails.

The first rack-railway in France was opened lately at Langres.

Nature, XXXVII. 323.

rack-rent (rak'rent), n. [rack¹, v., + rent², n.] A rent raised to the highest possible limit; a rent greater than any tenant can reasonably be expected to pay: used especially of landlords in Ireland.

Some thousand families are . . . preparing to go from hence and settle themselves in America. . . the farmers, whose beneficial bargains are now become a rack-rent too hard to be borne, and those who have any ready money, or can purchase any by the sale of their goods or leases, because they find their fortunes hourly decaying.

Swift, Intelligencer, No. 19.

Rack-rent . . . is the highest annual rent that can be obtained by the competition of those who desire to become tenants. It is not a strictly legal term, though sometimes used in Acts of Parliament: in legal documents it is represented by "the best rent that can be obtained without a fine."

F. Pollock, Land Laws, p. 152.

rack-rent (rak'rent), v. [rack-rent, n.] I. trans. To subject to the payment of rack-rent.

The land-lord rack-renting and evicting him [the tenant] with the help of the civil and military resources of the law.

W. S. Gregg, Irish Hist. for Eng. Readers, p. 160.

II. intrans. To impose rack-rents.

Hence the chief gradually acquired the characteristics of what naturalists have called "synthetic" and "prophetic" types, combining the features of the modern go-between-man with those of the modern rack-renting landlord.

Huxley, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXVI. 733.

rack-renter (rak'ren'tër), n. [rack-rent + -er¹.] 1. One who is subjected to the payment of rack-rent.

The yearly rent of the land, which the rack-renter or under tenant pays.

Locke.

2. One who rack-rents his tenants.

rack-stick (rak'stik), n. A stick suitably prepared for stretching or straining a rope or the like, as in fastening a load on a wagon.—Rack-stick and lashing, a piece of two-inch rope, about 6 feet long, fastened to a picket about 15 inches long, having a hole in its head to receive the rope. Farros, Mill. Encyc.

rack-tail (rak'täl), n. In a repeating clock, a bent arm connected with the striking-mechanism, having a pin at its end which drops upon the notched wheel that determines the number of strokes.

rackwork (rak'wërk), n. A piece of mechanism in which a rack is used; a rack and pinion or the like. See cut under rack¹.

raconteur (ra-kön'tër), n. [F., < raconter, relate: see recount¹.] A story-teller; a person given to or skilled in relating anecdotes, recounting adventures, or the like.

There never was, in my opinion, a raconteur, from Charles Lamb or Theodore Hook down to Gilbert & Beckett or H. J. Byron, . . . who spoke and told anecdotes at a dinner-table, . . . that was not conscious that he was going to be funny.

Lester Wallack, in Scribner's Mag., IV. 721.

raccoon, raccoon (ra-kön'), n. [Formerly also rackoon, rackoon, by aphesis from earlier arocoon, aroughcun, aroughcond, < Amer. Ind. arathcone, arrathkunc, a raccoon. Hence, by further aphesis, coon. The F. raton, racoon, is an accom. form, simulating F. raton, a rat: see ratten.] A small plantigrade carnivorous quadruped of the arctoid series of the order Feræ, belonging to the family Procyonidae and genus Procyon. The common racoon is P. lotor, so called from its habit of dipping its food in water, as if washing it, before eating. This animal is about 2 feet long, with a stout body, a bushy ringed tail, short limbs, pointed ears, broad face, and very sharp snout, of a general grayish coloration, with light and dark markings on the face. It is common in southern parts of the United States, and feeds on fruits and other vegetable as well as animal substances. Its flesh is eatable, and the fur, much used for making caps, is called coonskin. The racoon is readily tamed, and makes an amusing pet. Other members of the genus are P. paora of California (perhaps only a nominal species) and the quite distinct P. cancrivorus, the crab-eating racoon, of the warmer parts of America, known as the agouara.

A beast they call Aroughcun, much like a badger, but vaeht to lue on trees as squirrels doe.

Capt. John Smith, Virginia, I. 124.

Quill-darting Porcupines and Rackcoones be raccoon-dog (ra-kön'dog), n. An Asiatic and Japanese animal of the family Canidae, Nyctereutes procyonoides, a kind of dog having an aspect suggesting a racoon. See cut under Nyctereutes.

raccoon-oyster (ra-kön'ois'tër), n. An uncultivated oyster growing on muddy banks exposed at low tide. [Southern coast, U. S.]

raccoon-perch (ra-kön'përçh), n. The common yellow perch, Perca americana, of the Mississippi valley: so called from bands around the body something like those of a racoon's tail. See cut under perch¹.

Racovian (ra-kö'vi-an), a. and n. [Racow (in Poland) (NL. Racoria) + -ian.] I. a. Pertaining or relating to Rakow, a town of Poland, or to the Socinians, who made it their chief seat in the first part of the seventeenth century: as, the Racovian Catechism (a popular exposition of Socinianism: see catechism, 2).

II. n. An inhabitant of Rakow, or an adherent of the Unitarian doctrines formerly taught there; specifically, a Polish Socinian.

racquet, n. See racket².

racy (rä'si), a. [race³ + -y¹.] 1. Having an agreeably peculiar flavor, of a kind that may be supposed to be imparted by the soil, as wine; peculiarly palatable.

The hospitable sage, in sign
Of social welcome, mix'd the racy wine.
Pope, Odyssey, III. 503.

2. Having a strong distinctive and agreeable quality of any kind; spirited; pungent; piquant; spicy: as, a racy style; a racy anecdote.

Brisk racy verses, in which we
The soil from whence they came taste, smell, and see.
Conley, Ans. to Verses.

His ballads are racy when brimmed with the element that most attracts the author.

E. C. Steadman, Poets of America, p. 282.

Book English has gone round the world, but at home we still preserve the racy idioms of our fathers.

R. L. Stevenson, The Foreigner at Home.

3. Pertaining to race or kind; racially distinctive or peculiar; of native origin or quality.

Yorkshire has such families here and there, . . . peculiar, racy, vigorous; of good blood and strong brain.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, ix.

The eyes [of a Gordon setter] must be full of animation, of a rich color, between brown and gold; the neck must be clean and racy.

The Century, XXXI. 118.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Racy, Spicy. These words agree in expressing a quality that is relished, physically or mentally. Literally, racy applies to the peculiar flavor which wines derive from the soil, and spicy to the flavor given to food, breezes, etc., by spice. Figuratively, that is racy which is agreeably fresh and distinctive in thought and expression; that is spicy which is agreeably pungent to the mind, producing a sensation comparable to that which spice produces in taste. Pointedness is essential to spiciness, and likely to be found in racy.

rad¹ (rad), a. [ME. rad, Ice. hræddr = Sw. radd = Dan. ræd, afraid.] Afraid; frightened. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]

We were so rad euerilkon,
When that he put besyde the stone,
We qwoke for ferd, and durst styre none,
And sore we were abast.
York Plays, p. 416.

She seyd, "Without consent of me,
That an Outlaw suld come before a King;
I am right rad of treasonrie."
Song of the Outlaw Murray (Child's Ballads, VI. 27).

rad², a. A Middle English form of *rath*¹.

rad³, a. A Middle English preterit of ride.

rad⁴, An obsolete preterit of *read*¹.

rad⁵ (rad), n. [Abbr. of radical.] A radical. [Low.]

He's got what will buy him bread and cheese when the Rads shut up the Church. Trolope, Dr. Thorne, xxv.

raddet, An obsolete preterit of *read*¹.

raddle¹ (rad'l), n. [Early mod. E. radel, redle; also (in verb) ruddle; perhaps a transposed form of hurdle; or formed from wreathe or writhe (cf. writhle, v.) and confused with hurdle, or with *riddle*³ (ME. redel, etc.), a curtain.] 1. A hurdle. [Prov. Eng.]—2. pl. Small wood or sticks split like laths to bind a wall for the plastering it over with loam or mortar. Kennett. (Hall-i-well.)

In old time the houses of the Britons were slightle set up with a few posts and many radels, with stable and all offices under one roof.

Harrison, Descrip. of Britain, II. 12. (Holinshed's Chron.)

3. A piece of wood interwoven with others between stakes to form a fence. [Prov. Eng.]—

4. A hedge formed by interweaving the shoots and branches of trees or shrubs. [Prov. Eng.]—

5. A wooden bar with a row of upright pegs, employed by domestic weavers in some places to keep the warp of a proper width, and to prevent it from becoming entangled when it is wound upon the beam.—6. In metal-working, a rable.

raddle¹ (rad'l), v. t.: pret. and pp. raddled, ppr. raddling. [Formerly also redle, ruddle; *rad-dle*¹, n.] 1. To weave; interweave; wind together; wattle.

Raddling or working it up like basket work.
Defoe, Robinson Crusoe, xxv.

2t. To "baste"; beat.

Robin Hood drew his sword so good,
The peddler drew his brand,
And he hath raddled him, bold Robin Hood,
So that he scarce can stand.
Ballad of Robin Hood.

raddle² (rad'l), n. [Var. of redle, *ruddle*¹.] 1. Same as raddle.—2. A layer of red pigment.

Some of us have more serious things to hide than a yellow cheek behind a raddle of rouge.

Thackeray, Roundabout Papers, A Medal of George the Fourth.

raddle² (rad'l), v. t.: pret. and pp. raddled, ppr. raddling. [*radle*², n.] 1. To paint with or as if with raddle; color coarsely, as with rouge.

Can there be any more dreary object than those whitened and raddled old women who shudder at the slips?

Thackeray, Newcomes, xx.

2. To get over (work) in a careless, slovenly manner. [Prov. Eng.] Imp. Dict.

raddle-hedge (rad'l-hej), n. Same as *raddle*¹, 4.

raddlemant, n. Same as reddleman. Fuller, Worthies, III. 38.

raddock (rad'ok), n. A dialectal form of raddock.

raddourt, n. See redour.

radel¹ (rad). A dialectal (Old English and Scotch) preterit of ride.

rade² (rad), n. A dialectal (Scotch) or obsolete form of road.

radeau (ra-dō'), n.; pl. radeaux (-dōz'). [F. radeau = Pr. radelh, *ML. ratellus (also, after OF., radellus, rasellus), dim. of L. ratis, raft, vessel.] A raft.

Three vessels under sail, and one at anchor, above Split Rock, and behind it the radeau Thunderer.
Irving. (Webster.)

Rademacher's plaster. See plaster.

radevoret, n. [ME. prob. of OF. origin; perhaps orig. OF. ras de Fore*: ras (Sp. It. raso), a sort of smooth cloth (see rash); de, of; Fore*, perhaps the town of Lavaur in Languedoc. Cf. F. ras de Châlons, ras de Gennes, similar cloth from the places named.] A sort of cloth or textile fabric usually explained as 'tapestry' or 'striped stuff tapestry.'

This woful lady jerned had in youthe
So that she werken and embrowden kouth,
And weven in stole the radevore,
As hyt of wymmen hath be woerd yore.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 2352.

radget (raj), n. Same as radge.

radial (rā'di-al), a. and n. [F. radial = It. radiale, NL. radialis, L. radius, ray, radius: see radius, *ray*¹.] 1. a. Of or pertaining to a ray or a radius (or radii); having the character or appearance of a ray or a radius; grouped or appearing like radii or rays; shooting out as from a center; being or moving in the direction of the radius.

At a little distance from the center the wind is probably nearly radial. Science, III. 94.

Specifically—(a) In anat., of or pertaining in any way to the radius (see radius, 2): as, the radial artery, nerve, vein; radial articulations or movements; the radial side or aspect of the arm, wrist, or hand; the radial group of muscles; the radial pronator or supinator. (b) In zool., rays, radiate, or radiating; of or pertaining to the rays, arms, or radiating processes of an animal; relating to the radially disposed or actinomorphic parts of the Radiata and similar animals. See cut under medusiform. (c) In ichth., of or pertaining to the radialis. See radiale (c).

The cartilaginous, or ossified, basal and radial supports of the fins. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 38.

(d) In bot.: (1) Belonging to a ray, as of an umbel or of a flower-head in the Compositæ. (2) Developing uniformly on all sides of the axis: opposed to bifacial or dorsiventral. Goebel.—Radial ambulacral vessels. See ambulacral.

—Radial artery, the smaller of the branches resulting from the bifurcation of the brachial artery at the elbow, extending in a straight line on the outer side of the front of the forearm to the wrist, where it turns around the radial side of the carpus and descends to the upper part of the first interosseous space, where it penetrates the palm of the hand to help form the deep palmar arch. Just above the wrist it lies subcutaneously on the ulnar side of the tendon of the long supinator, and is here commonly felt in ascertaining the pulse. Its chief branches, besides the muscular and cutaneous ones, are the radial recurrent and the anterior and posterior carpal. —Radial axle-box. See axle-box. —Radial bundle, in bot., a fibrovascular bundle in which the phloem and xylem are arranged in alternating radial. Compare closed, collateral, and concentric bundle, under bundle.

The last form is the radial, where the bundles of phloem and xylem are arranged alternately in the central fibrovascular axis. Encyc. Brit., XII. 18.

Radial cells, in entom., same as postcoelal cells (which see, under postcoelal). —Radial curve, in geom., a curve most conveniently expressed by means of the radius vector as one coordinate: spirals and the quadratrix of Dinostratus are radial curves. —Radial drilling-machine. See drilling-machine. —Radial fibers of the retina. See sustentacular fibers, under sustentacular. —Radial formula, the expression of the number of rays in the fins of a fish by the initial letters of the names of the fins and the numbers of their rays; thus, the radial formula for the yellow perch is D. XIII. + I. 14; A. II. + 7; P. 15; V. I. 5—where the Roman numerals are the spines and the Arabic the rays of the dorsal, anal, pectoral, and ventral fins respectively. —Radial nerve. See nerve. —Radial-piston water-wheel. See water-wheel. —Radial plates, in crinoids, the set or system of plates which includes the joints of the stem, arms and planulae, the centrodorsal plate, and the radial plate proper: distinguished from peristomatic plates. —Radial recurrent artery, a branch of the radial artery, given off near its origin, that turns backward to join in the anastomosis about the elbow. —Radial symmetry. See symmetry. —Radial vein. See marginal vein, under marginal.

II. n. A radiating or radial part; a ray. Specifically, in anat. and zool.: (a) A radiale. (b) In ichth., the radius or hypercoracoid (a bone). (c) One of the joints of the branches of a crinoid, between the brachials and the basals; one of the joints of the second order, or of a division of the basals. See cut under Crinoidea.

The two radials [of a crinoid] on either side of the largest basal . . . are broader than the other two. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 150.

(d) The fourth joint, counting from the base, of the pedipalp of a spider.

radiale (rā-di-ā'lē), n.; pl. radialia (-li-ā). [NL., neut. of radialis, radial: see radial.] In zool. and anat.: (a) The radiocarpal bone; that bone of the wrist which is situated on the radial side of the proximal row of carpals, in special relation with the radius. In man this bone is the scaphoid. Compare ulnare, and see cuts under hand and carpus. (b) One of the rays of the cup of a crinoid. See radial, n. (c), and cut under Crinoidea. (c) A cartilage radiating from the base of the fins of the elasmobranchiate fishes. See cut under pterygium. (d) Same as radial, n. (b). See hypercoracoid.

radialis (rā-di-ā'lis), n.; pl. radiales (-lēz). [NL. radialis (sc. musculus, etc.), radial: see radial.] In anat., a radial muscle, artery, vein, or nerve: chiefly used adjectively as a part of certain Latin phrase-names of muscles: as, flexor carpi radialis; extensor carpi radialis longior or brevior. See flexor, extensor.

radiality (rā-di-al'i-ti), n. [radial + -ity.] The character or structure of a radiate organism; formation of rays, or disposition of rayed parts; radial symmetry. Sometimes called radialness and radiism.

radialization (rā-di-al-i-zā'shən), n. [radialize + -ation.] Arrangement in radiating forms; radiation.

Thus the rocks exhibit much evidence of a silicification (and often of a radialization) possibly connected with it. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 267.

radialize (rā-di-al-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. radialized, ppr. radializing. [radial + -ize.] To render radiate; make ray-like.

One fragment exhibits part of a large radialized structure within a spherulitic matrix. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 249.

radially (rā-di-al-i), adv. 1. In a radial or radiating manner; in the manner of radii or rays: as, lines diverging radially.

As the growth [of the fungus] spreads outward radially, the inner hyphae, having sucked all the organic matter out of the ground, perish.

S. B. Herrick, Wonders of Plant Life, p. 82.

2. In entom., toward or over the radius (a vein of the wing): as, a color-band radially dilated. radian (rā'di-an), n. [radius + -an.] The angle subtended at the center of a circle by an arc equal in length to the radius. Also called the unit angle in circular measure. It is equal to 57° 17' 44".80625 nearly.

radiance (rā'di-ans), n. [F. radiance, ML. radiantia, radiance, L. radian(-t)s, radiant: see radiant.] 1. Brightness shooting in rays or beams; hence, in general, brilliant or sparkling luster; vivid brightness.

The sacred radiance of the sun. Shak., Lear, I. 1. 111.

The Son, . . .
Girt with omnipotence, with radiance crown'd
Of majesty divine. Milton, P. L., vii. 194.

Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass,
Stains the white radiance of eternity.
Shelley, Adonais, III.

2. Radiation.

Thus we have . . . (3) Theory of radiance.

J. Clerk Maxwell, in Encyc. Brit., XIX. 2.

=Syn. 1. Radiance, Brilliance, Brilliancy, Efulgence, Refulgence, Splendor, Luster. These words agree in representing the shooting out of rays or beams in an impressive way. Radiance is the most steady; it is generally a light that is agreeable to the eyes; hence the word is often chosen for corresponding figurative expressions: as, the radiance of his cheerfulness; the radiance of the gospel. Brilliancy represents a light that is strong, often too strong to be agreeable, and marked by variation or play and penetration: as, the brilliancy of a diamond or of fireworks. Hence, figuratively, the brilliancy of the scene at a wedding; the radiance of humor, the brilliancy of wit. Brilliancy is more often literal, brilliancy figurative. Efulgence is a splendid light, seeming to fill to overflowing every place where it is—a strong, flooding, but not necessarily intense or painful light: as, the efulgence of the noonday sun; the efulgence of the attributes of God. Hence a courtier might by figure speak of the efulgence of Queen Elizabeth's beauty. Refulgence is often the same as efulgence, but sometimes weaker. Splendor, which is more often used figuratively, is, when used literally, about the same as refulgence. Luster is the only one of these words which does not imply that the object gives forth light; luster may be used where the light is either emitted or reflected, but latterly more often reflected: as, the luster of silk. Luster is generally, like brilliancy, a varying light, but it may be simply two or three degrees weaker than splendor. For comparison with glister, glitter, etc., see glare, v. i.

'Twere all one
That I should love a bright particular star
And think to wed it, he is so above me.
In his bright radiance and collateral light Must I be comforted. Shak., All's Well, I. 1. 99.

There is an appearance of brilliancy in the pleasures of high life which naturally dazzles the young. Crui.

Efulgence of my glory, Son beloved.
Milton, P. L., vi. 680.

Though they fell, they fell like stars,
Streaming splendour through the sky.
Montgomery, Battle of Alexandria.
The smiling infant in his hand shall take
The crested basilisk and speckled snake, Pleased the green lustre of the scales survey,
And with their forked tongues shall innocently play.
Pope, Messiah, l. 82.

radiance (rā'di-ān-si), n. [As radiance (see -cy).] Same as radiance.

radiant (rā'di-ant), a. and n. [Early mod. E. radiant; < OF. radiant, F. radiant = Sp. Pg. radiante = It. radiante, raggiante, < L. radiant (t-s), ppr. of radiare, radiate, shine: see radiate.] I. a. 1. Darting, shooting, or emitting rays of light or heat; shining; sparkling; beaming with brightness, literally or figuratively: as, the radiant sun; a radiant countenance.

Mark, what radiant state she spreads.
Milton, Arcades, l. 14.
A sudden star, it shot through liquid air,
And drew behind a radiant trail of hair.
Pope, R. of the L., v. 28.
His features radiant as the soul within.
O. W. Holmes, Vestigia Quinque Retrorsum.

2. Giving out rays; proceeding in the form of rays; resembling rays; radiating; also, radiated; radiate: as, radiant heat.

Jonas . . . made him a shadowy place for his defence against the radiant heat of the sun in the side of an hill.
Bp. Fisher, Seven Penitential Psalms, Ps. cxxx.

The passage of radiant heat, as such, through any medium does not heat it at all.
W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature (1st ed.), p. 46.

When this [radiation of fibers] takes place in an open cavity, producing brush-like forms, they are termed radiant.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 370.

3. In her.: (a) Edged with rays: said of an ordinary or other bearing such as is usually bounded with straight lines, the rays generally appearing like long indentations. See ray, 8. (b) Giving off rays, which do not form a broken or indented edge to the bearing, but stream from it, its outline being usually perfect and the rays apparently streaming from behind it.—4. In bot., radiating; radiate.—Radiant energy. See energy.—Radiant heat. See heat. 2.—Radiant matter, a phrase used by Crookes to describe a highly rarefied gas, or "ultra-gaseous matter," which is found to produce certain peculiar mechanical and luminous effects when a charge of high-potential electricity is passed through it. For example, in a vacuum-tube exhausted to one millionth of an atmosphere (a Crookes tube) the molecules of the gas present are projected from the negative pole in streams, and if they are made to strike against a delicately poised wheel they set it in motion; if on a piece of calcite, they make it phosphorescent, etc.—Radiant neurulation, in entom., neurulation characterized by a number of veins radiating outward from a small roundish areolet or cell in the disk of the wing, as in certain Diptera.—Radiant point, in physics, the point from which rays of light or heat proceed. Also called radiating point.—Radiant veins or nervures, in entom., veins or nervures radiating from a single small wing-cell.—Syn. 1. Beaming, resplendent. See radiance.

II. n. 1. In optics, a luminous point or object from which light radiates to the eye, or to a mirror or lens; a point considered as the focus of a pencil of rays.—2. In astron., the point in the heavens from which the shooting-stars of a meteoric shower seem to proceed: thus, the radiant of the shower of November 13th is near the star ζ Leonis, and these meteors are hence called the Leonides. Similarly the meteors of November 27th (which are connected with Biela's comet, and are often called the Bielides) have their radiant not far from γ Andromedæ, and are also known as the Andromedæ or Andromedids.

radiantly (rā'di-ant-li), adv. 1. With radiant or beaming brightness; with glittering splendor.—2. By radiation; in the manner of rays; radiatingly. [Rare.]
Healthy human actions should spring radiantly (like rays) from some single heart motive.
Ruskin, Elements of Drawing, lii.

Radiaria (rā-di-ā-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of radiarius, radiate: see radiary.] 1. In Lamarck's classification (1801-12), a class of animals, divided into the orders Mollia, or acalephs, and Echinodermata (the latter including the Actinæ).—2. In Owen's classification (1855), a subprovince of the province Radiata, containing the five classes Echinodermata, Bryozoa, Anthozoa, Aculephæ, and Hydrozoa.—3. In H. Milne-Edwards's classification (1855), the first subbranch of Zoöphytes (contrasted with Sarcodaria), containing the three classes of echinoderms, aculephs, and corals or polyps.

radiary (rā'di-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. radiaire, < NL. radiarius, < L. radius, a ray, radius: see radius.] In zool., same as radiate.

Radiata (rā-di-ā-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. radius, radiate: see radiate, a.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, the fourth grand branch of the animal kingdom, containing "the radiated animals or zoöphytes." It was divided into five classes: (1) Echinodermata; (2) Entozoa, or intestinal worms; (3) Aculephæ, or sea-nettles; (4) Polyps; (5) Infusoria: thus a mere waste-basket for animals not elsewhere located to Cuvier's satisfaction. It was accepted and advocated by L. Agassiz after its restriction to the echinoderms, aculephs, and polyps, in which sense it was very generally adopted for many years. But the group has now been abolished, and its components are widely distributed in other phyla and classes of the animal kingdom, as Protozoa, Cœlentera, Echinodermata, and Vermes.

The lower groups of which he [Cuvier] knew least, and which he threw into one great heterogeneous assemblage, the Radiata, have been altogether remodelled and rearranged. . . . Whatever form the classification of the Animal Kingdom may eventually take, the (Cuvierian) Radiata is, in my judgment, effectually abolished.
Huxley, Classification (1869), p. 88.

2. In later classifications, with various limitations and restrictions of sense 1. (a) The old Radiata without the Infusoria. (b) Same as Echinodermata proper: Ambulacraria (which see) without the genus Balanoglossus. Metschnikoff. (c) In Owen's system (1855), one of four provinces of the animal kingdom, divided into Radiaria, Entozoa (celeminths and sterelminths), and Infusoria (the latter containing Rotifera and Polygastria).

radiate (rā'di-āt), v.; pret. and pp. radiated, ppr. radiating. [L. radius, pp. of radiare, furnish with spokes, give out rays, radiate, shine (> It. radiare, raggiare = Sp. Pg. radiar = F. radier, radiate, shine). < radius, a spoke, ray: see radius, ray.] I. intrans. 1. To issue and proceed in rays or straight lines from a point; spread directly outward from a center or nucleus, as the spokes of a wheel, heat and light, etc.

Light . . . radiates from luminous bodies directly to our eyes.
Locke, Elem. of Nat. Phil., xl.
But it [the wood] is traversed by plates of parenchyma, or cellular tissue of the same nature as the pith, which radiate from that to the bark.

A. Gray, Structural Botany, p. 74.
When the light diminishes, as in twilight, the circular fibers relax, the previously stretched radiating fibers contract by elasticity, and enlarge the pupil.
Le Conte, Sight, p. 39.

2. To emit rays; be radiant: as, a radiating body.—3. To spread in all directions from a central source or cause; proceed outward as from a focus to all accessible points.

The moral law lies at the center of nature, and radiates to the circumference.
Emerson, Nature, p. 51.

Enjoyment radiates. It is of no use to try and take care of all the world; that is being taken care of when you feel delight in art or in anything else.
George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxi.

II. trans. 1. To emit or send out in direct lines, as from a point or focus; hence, to cause to proceed or diverge in all directions, as from a source or cause; communicate by direct emanation: as, the sun radiates heat and light.

Donatello . . . seemed to radiate jollity out of his whole nimble person.
Hawthorne, Marble Faun, x.

The Wonder . . . looked full enough of life to radiate vitality into a statue of ice.
O. W. Holmes, A Mortal Antipathy, vi.

Mountain tops gather clouds around them for the same reason: they cool themselves by radiating their heat, through the dry superincumbent air, into space.
R. J. Mann, in Modern Meteorology, p. 23.

2. To furnish with rays; cause to have or to consist of rays; make radial.

Elsewhere, a brilliant radiated formation was conspicuous, spreading, at four opposite points, into four vast luminous expansions, compared to feather-glumes, or aligrettes.
A. M. Clerke, Astron. in 19th Cent., p. 83.

Radiating keyboard or pedals, in organ-building, a pedal keyboard in which the pedals are placed closer together in front than behind, so as to enable the player to reach them with equal ease.—Radiating point. Same as radiant point (which see, under radiant).—Radiating power. Same as radiative power (which see, under radiative).

radiate (rā'di-āt), a. and n. [L. radius, having rays, radiating, pp. of radiare, radiate, furnish with spokes: see radiate, r.] I. a. 1. Having a ray, rays, or ray-like parts; having lines or projections proceeding from a common center or surface; rayed: as, a radiate animal (a member of the Radiata); a radiate mineral (one with rayed crystals or fibers); a radiate flower-head. Specifically—(a) In zool.: (1) Characterized by or exhibiting radial symmetry, or radiation; having the whole structure, or some parts of it, radiating from a common center; radiatory; rayed; actinomorphic. (2) Of or pertaining to the (Cuvierian) Radiata: as, "the radiate moll." Huxley. (b) In bot., bearing ray-flowers: said chiefly of a head among the Compositæ, in which a disk of tubular florets is encircled by one or more rows of radially spreading ligulate florets, as in the daisy and sunflower; or in which all the florets are ligulate, as in the dandelion and chicory.

2. Constituting a ray or rays; proceeding or extending outward from a center or focus; radiating: as, the radiate fibers of some minerals and plants; the radiate petals of a flower or florets of a head.

A school-house plant on every hill, Stretching in radiate nerve-lines thence
The quick wires of intelligence.
Whittier, Snow-Bound.

3. In numismatic and similar descriptions, rep-

Radiate Head of Gallienus.—From an aureus in the British Museum. (Four times the size of the original.)

resented with rays proceeding from it, as a head or bust: as, the head of the Emperor Caracalla,

The sun-god Helios rising from the sea, showing radiate head. (Metope from New Ilum in the Troad.)

radiate; the head of Helios (the sun-god), radiate.

II. n. 1. A ray-like projection; a ray.
The tin salt crystallised out in transparent, shining needles, arranged in clusters of radiates about nuclei.
Amer. Chem. Jour., XI. 82.

2. A member of the Radiata, in any sense.
radiated (rā'di-āt-ed), p. a. [radiate + -ed².] Same as radiate.—Radiated animal. See Radiata.—Radiated falcon. See falcon.—Radiated wing-cells, in entom., wing-cells formed principally by diverging nervures, as in the earwig.

radiately (rā'di-āt-li), adv. In a radiate manner; with radiation from a common center; radially.—Radiately veined or nerved, in bot., same as palmately veined or nerved. See nervation.

radiateness (rā'di-āt-ness), n. Same as radiability.

radiate-veined (rā'di-āt-vānd), a. In bot., palmately veined. See nervation.

radiatiform (rā-di-ā-ti-fōrm), a. [L. radius, radiate, + forma, form.] In bot., having the appearance of being radiate: said of heads, as in some species of Centaurea, having some of the marginal flowers enlarged, but not truly ligulate.

radiatingly (rā'di-ā-ting-li), adv. Same as radiately.

radiation (rā-di-ā-shon), n. [F. radiation = Sp. radiacion = Pg. radiação = It. radiazione, < L. radiatio (n-), shining, radiation, < radiare, shine, radiate: see radiate.] 1. The act of radiating, or the state of being radiated; specifically, emission and diffusion of rays of light and the so-called rays of heat. Physically speaking, radiation is the transformation of the molecular energy of a hot body—that is, any body above the absolute zero (−273° C.)—into the wave-motion of the surrounding ether, and the propagation of these ether waves through space. Hence, every body is the source of radiation, but the character of the radiation varies, depending chiefly upon the temperature of the body: it is called luminous or obscure, according as it is or is not capable of exciting the sensation of light. See further radiant energy (under energy), also heat, light, spectrum.

Radiation is the communication of vibratory motion to the ether, and when a body is said to be chilled by radiation, as for example the grass of a meadow on a starlight night, the meaning is that the molecules of the grass have lost a portion of their motion, by imparting it to the medium in which they vibrate. Tyndall, Radiation, § 2.

Any substance . . . will become heated by radiation to the greatest degree when its surface is made rough and completely black, so that it can absorb all the rays falling upon it. Lommel, Light (trans.), p. 198.

2. The divergence or shooting forth of rays from a point or focus.—3. In zool., the structural character of a radiate; the radiate condition, quality, or type; the radiate arrangement of parts. Also radiism.—Direct radiation and indirect radiation, phrases used in describing the method of heating by steam-radiators, according as the radiator is actually in the room heated or is inclosed in a space beneath, from which the hot air is distributed by tin pipes, as in simple heating by a hot-air furnace. In both cases the heat is communicated by convection, and in the case of indirect radiation not at all by radiation.—Dynamic radiation, a phrase introduced by Tyndall to describe the radiation of a gas when the heat is not due to an outside source, but is developed by the molecular motion as the gas passes rapidly into an exhausted vessel.—Solar radiation, the radiation of the sun as measured by the heat which the earth receives from it.—Terrestrial radiation, the communication of heat by the earth to the surrounding ether, by means of radiation.

radiative (rā'di-ā-tiv), a. [< radiate + -ive.] Having a tendency to radiate; possessing the quality of radiation.—Radiative or radiating power, the ability of a body to radiate heat—that is, physically, to transform its own heat-energy into the wave-motion of the surrounding ether. It depends, other things being equal, upon the nature of the surface of the body, being a maximum for lampblack and a minimum for polished metallic surfaces: thus, a mass of hot water will cool more rapidly in a vessel with a dull-black surface than in one which is polished and bright, like silver. The radiative and absorbing powers of a substance are identical, and are the opposite of the reflecting power. Also called emissive power.

radiator (rā'di-ā-tor), n. [< radiate + -or.] 1. Anything which radiates; a body or substance from which rays of heat emanate or radiate.—2. A part of a heating apparatus designed to communicate heat to a room, chiefly by convection, but partly, in some cases, by radiation.

a, a direct radiator with cast-iron base m and cap n; f, vertical tubes of wrought-iron screwed into the base; g, inlet; h, outlet; d and e, detail sections of tube; i, diaphragm used in one kind of vertical-tube steam-radiators, steam passing through it, as indicated by arrow. b, a direct indirect radiator, air entering at l, and circulating upward through passages in base k. c, an indirect steam-radiator; m, base; f, tubes; cold air from without is admitted at l, and passes over radiator as indicated by arrows; h, flues up which warm air passes to register j.

A common form of radiator is a sheet-iron drum or cylinder containing deflectors or baffle-plates, placed over a fireplace to cause the volatile products of combustion to give up their heat as they pass: a heating-drum. A steam-radiator consists of a mass of coiled or flexed pipes to which steam for heating is conveyed through a continuous pipe from a boiler, and which is provided with suitable valves for the control of the steam.

radiatory (rā'di-ā-tō-ri), a. [< radiate + -ory.] Radiating; having parts arranged like rays around a center or axis; rayed; actinometric.—radical (rad'i-kal), a. and n. [< F. radical = Pr. Sp. Pg. radical = It. radicale = D. radikaal = G. Sw. Dan. radikal, < LL. radicalis, of or pertaining to the root, having roots, radical, < L. radix (radic-), root: see radix.] I. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to a root or to roots.

The cause of a thynne and watery radycall moyster to suche thynkes as drawe theyr nuryshment therof. R. Eden, tr. of Gonzalus Ovidius (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 227]).

Specifically—(a) In bot., belonging to the root: opposed to cauline. See radical leaves and radical peduncle, below. (b) In philol., of the nature of or pertaining to a root, or a primary or underived word or main part of a word: as, a radical word; a radical letter or syllable; radical accentuation. (c) In math., consisting of or indicating one of the roots of a number: as, a radical expression; the radical sign. (d) In chem., noting any atom or group of atoms which is, for the moment, regarded as a chief constituent of the molecules of a given compound, and which does not lose its integrity in the ordinary chemical reactions to which the substance is liable. Cooke, Chem. Philos., p. 108.

2. Making part of the essential nature of the subject or thing concerned; existing inherently; intrinsic; organic: as, radical defects of character; a radical fault of construction; the radical principles of an art or of religion. The Latin word first occurs, about the beginning of the thirteenth century, in the phrase humidum radicale, or radical moisture, that moisture in an animal or a plant which cannot be expelled without killing the organism which was supposed to remain unchanged throughout life, and to be the chief principle of vitality. The word seems to translate the pseudo-Aristotelian αὐτὸς τοῦ βίου πῦρ, 'as one may say, roots'—an expression applied to moisture and certain other conditions as being essential to the life of plants.

Radical moisture, or first or natural moisture, spread like a dew thorough all the parts of the bodie, wherewith such parts are nourished: which moisture, being once wasted, can never be restored. Minshew.

Whilst thus my sorrow-wasting soul was feeding Upon the radical humour of her thought. Quarles, Emblems, iv. 12.

This radical error . . . has contributed more than any other cause to prevent the formation of popular constitutional governments. Calhoun, Works, I. 30.

3. Of or pertaining to the root or foundation of the subject; concerned with or based upon fundamental principles; hence, thoroughgoing; extreme: as, a radical truth; a radical difference of opinion; radical views or measures; the Radical party in British politics.

His works . . . are more radical in spirit and tendency than any others, for they strike at all cant whatever, whether it be the cant of monarchy or the cant of democracy. Whipple, Ess. and Rev., I. 147.

4. [cap.] Of or pertaining to a political party or body of persons known as Radicals (see II., 4, below): as, a Radical candidate; the Radical program.—Radical axis of two circles. See axis.—Radical base, in music, same as fundamental bass (which see, under fundamental).—Radical cadence, in music, a cadence consisting of chords in their original position.—Radical center of three circles in a plane, the intersection of the three radical axes of the three pairs of the three circles.—Radical curve. See curve.—Radical expression, an expression containing radical signs, especially a quantity expressed as a root of another. Sometimes loosely called a radical quantity.—Radical function. See function.—Radical leaves, leaves springing from the root, or, properly, from a part of the stem near to and resembling the root. In many herbs (primrose, dandelion, etc.) all or nearly all the leaves are thus clustered at the base of the stem. See cuts under Hieracium and Ornithogalum.—Radical moisture. See above, def. 2.—Radical peduncle, a peduncle that proceeds from the axil of a radical leaf, as in the primrose and cowslip.—Radical pitch, the pitch or tone with which the utterance of a syllable begins.—Radical plane, the plane of intersection of two spheres other than the plane at infinity, whether the circle of intersection be real or not.—Radical sign, the sign $\sqrt{}$ (a modified form of the letter r, the initial of Latin radix, root), placed before any quantity, denoting that its root is to be extracted: thus, \sqrt{a} or $\sqrt{a+b}$. To distinguish the particular root, a number is written over the sign: thus, $\sqrt[3]{}$, $\sqrt[4]{}$, etc., denote respectively the square root, cube root, fourth root, etc. In the case of the square root, however, the number is usually omitted, and merely the sign written. The same sign is much used to mark a so-called root or radical element of words.—Radical stress, in elocution, the force of utterance falling on the initial part of a syllable or word.—Syn. 2. There may be a distinction between a radical reform, change, cure, or the like, and one that is thorough, entire, complete, or thoroughgoing, radical emphasizing only the fact of going to the root, whether there is thoroughness or entireness or not. Yet that which is radical is likely to be thorough, etc.

II. n. 1. In philol.: (a) A radical word or part of a word; especially, a primitive word or verbal element serving as a root of inflected or derivative words. (b) A radical letter; a letter forming an essential part of the primitive form or root of a word. Also radicle.—2. In chem., an element or group of combined elements which remains after one or more elements have been removed from a compound. (See the quotation.) The term is chiefly applied to compound radicals, which are assumed to exist in compound bodies and to remain intact in many of the chemical changes which these bodies undergo. Thus the compound radical ethyl, C_2H_5 , appears in alcohol ($C_2H_5.OH$), in ether ($(C_2H_5)_2O$), in ethylamine ($C_2H_5.NH_2$), etc., and may be transferred without change, like an element, from one of these compounds to the other. Also radicle.

The word radical stands for any atom or group of atoms which is, for the moment, regarded as a chief constituent of the molecules of a given compound, and which does not lose its integrity in the ordinary chemical reactions to which the substance is liable. . . . As a general rule the metallic atoms are basic radicals, while the non-metallic atoms are acid radicals. . . . Among compound radicals those consisting of carbon and hydrogen alone are usually basic, and those containing oxygen also are usually acid. Cooke, Chem. Philos., p. 108.

3. In music, same as root.—4. A person who holds or acts according to radical principles; one who pursues a theory to its furthest apparent limit; an extremist, especially in politics. In the political sense, in which the word has been most used, a Radical is one who aims at thorough reform in government from a liberal or democratic point of view, or desires the establishment of what he regards as abstract principles of right and justice, by the most direct and uncompromising methods. The political Radicals of a country generally constitute the extreme faction or wing of the more liberal of the two leading parties, or act as a separate party when their numbers are sufficient for the exertion of any considerable influence. The name Radical is often applied as one of reproach to the members of a party by their opponents. In the United States it has been so applied at times to Democrats, and to Republicans especially in the South about the period of reconstruction. The French Radicals are often called the Extreme Left. The British Radicals form an important section of the Liberal party.

In politics they [the Independents] were, to use the phrase of their own time, "Root-and-Branch men," or, to use the kindred phrase of our own, Radicals. Macaulay.

He [President Johnson] did not receive a single Southern vote, and was detested through every Southern State with a cordiality unknown in the case of any Northern Radical. The Nation, III. 141.

5. In alg., a quantity expressed as a root of another quantity.—Negative, organic, etc., radical. See the adjectives.

radicalise, v. See radicalize.

radicalism (rad'i-kal-izm), n. [= F. radicalisme = Sp. Pg. It. radicalismo; as radical + -ism.] The state or character of being radical; the holding or carrying out of extreme principles on any subject; specifically, extreme political liberalism; the doctrine or principle of uncompromising reform in government; the system or methods advocated by the political Radicals of a country.

Radicalism endeavours to realize a state more in harmony with the character of the ideal man. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 511.

The year 1789 is very memorable in political history, for it witnessed the birth of English Radicalism, and the first serious attempts to reform and control Parliament by a pressure from without, making its members habitually subservient to their constituents. Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xl.

radicality (rad-i-kal'i-ti), n. [< radical + -ity.] 1. The state or character of being radical, in any sense. [Rare.]—2. Origination.

There may be equivocal seeds and hermaphroditical principles which contain the radicality and power of different forms. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 17.

radicalize (rad'i-kal-iz), v.; pret. and pp. radicalized, ppr. radicalizing. [< radical + -ize.] I. trans. To make radical; cause to conform to radical ideas, or to political radicalism. [Recent.]

It is inferred . . . that Lord Salisbury means to radicalize his land programme for England. New York Tribune, Feb. 18, 1887.

II. intrans. To become radical; adopt or carry out radical principles, or the doctrines of political radicalism. [Recent.]

Indeed, it is hard to say which is the more surprising—the goodwill shown by the Russians, and even by the Russian Government, for a radicalizing Republic, or the fatuous admiration of certain French Republicans for the most autocratic State in Europe. Contemporary Rev., LIII. 303.

Also spelled radicalise. radically (rad'i-kal-i), adv. 1. By root or origin; primitively; originally; naturally. Tho' the Word [bless] be radically derived from the Dutch Word, yet it would bear good Sense, and be very pertinent to this Purpose, if we would fetch it from the French Word "blesser," which is to hurt. Howell, Letters, I. vi. 55.

These great Orbs thus radically bright. Prior, Solomon, I.

2. In a radical manner; at the origin or root; fundamentally; essentially: as, a scheme or system radically wrong or defective.

The window tax, long condemned by universal consent as a radically bad tax. S. Dowell, Taxes in England, II. 313.

radicalness (rad'i-kal-nes), n. The state of being radical, in any sense.

radicant (rad-i-kand'), n. [< L. radicans, ger. of radicare, take root: see radicate.] In math., an expression of which a root is to be extracted.

radicant (rad'i-kant), a. [< F. radican, < L. radican(t)-e, ppr. of radicare, take root: see radicate.] In bot., rooting; specifically, producing roots from some part other than the descending axis, as for the purpose of climbing. Also radicating.

radicarian (rad-i-kā'-ri-an), a. [L. radix (radic-), root, + -arian.] Of or relating to roots.

The strength of the radicarian theory is that it accords with all that we have learned as to the nature of language. Whitney, Amer. Jour. Philol., Nov., 1880, p. 338.

Radicata (rad-i-kā'-tā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. radicans, rooted: see radicate.] A division of polyzoans: same as Articulata (d): opposed to Incrustata.

radicate (rad-i-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. radicated, ppr. radicating. [L. radicans, pp. of radicare (> It. radicare = Sp. Pg. Pr. radicar), take or strike root, < radix (radic-), root: see radix.] I. intrans. To take root.

For evergreens, especially such as are tender, prune them not after planting till they do radicate. Evelyn, Sylva.

II. trans. To cause to take root; root; plant deeply and firmly.

Often remembrance to them [noblemen] of their estate may happen to radicate in their hearts intolerable pride. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, l. 4.

This medical feature in the Essenes is not only found in the Christians, but is found radicated in the very constitution of that body. De Quincey, Essenes, lll.

radicate (rad-i-kāt), a. [L. radicans, pp. of radicare, take root: see radicate, v.] 1. In zool.: (a) Rooted; fixed at the bottom as if rooted; growing from a fixed root or root-like part. (b) Specifically, in conch.: (1) Byssiferous; fixed by a byssus. (2) Adherent by the base to some other body, as a limpet to a rock. (c) Rooted and of a plant-like habit, as a polyzoan; not incrusting like a lichen; belonging to the Radicata.—2. In bot., rooted.

radicated (rad-i-kā'-tēd), p. a. [L. radicate, v., + -ed.] Rooted, or having taken root: same as radicate: as, a radicated stem.

If, therefore, you would not cheat yourselves, as multitudes in this age have done, about your love to the brethren, try not by the bare act, but by the radicated, prevalent degree of your love. Baxter, Saints' Rest, lll. 11.

radicating (rad-i-kā'-ting), p. a. In bot., same as radicant.

radication (rad-i-kā'-shn), n. [F. radication = Sp. radicacion = Pg. radicação = It. radicazione, < ML. radiciatio (n), < L. radicare, pp. radicatus, take root: see radicate.] 1. The process of taking root, or the state of being rooted.

Pride is a sin of so deep radication, and so powerful in the hearts of carnal men, that it will take advantage of any condition. Baxter, Life of Faith, lll. 15.

2. In bot., the manner in which roots grow or are arranged.—3. In zool., fixation at the base, as if rooted; the state of being radicate or radicated.

radicet, n. An obsolete form of radish.

radicel (rad-i-sel), n. [F. radicelle = It. radicella, < *NL. radicella, little root, dim. of L. radix (radic-), root.] 1. In bot., a minute root; a rootlet. Also radicle. A. Gray.—2. In zool., a rootlet or radicle.

radices, n. Plural of radix.

radicolous (rad-i-sik'-ō-lus), a. [L. radix (radic-), root, + colere, inhabit.] Living upon or infesting roots: specifically noting the root-form of the phylloxera or vine-pest: contrasted with gallicolous. See Phylloxera, 2.

radiciferous (rā-dis-i-flo'-rus), n. [L. radix (radic-), root, + flos (flor-), flower, + -ous.] Flowering (apparently) from the root. A. Gray.

radiciform (rā-dis-i-fōrm), a. [= F. It. radiciforme, < L. radix (radic-), root, + forma, form: see form.] 1. In bot., of the nature or appearance of a root. A. Gray.—2. In zool., root-like in aspect or function.

radicle (rad-i-kl), n. [= F. radicule = Sp. radicula, < L. radícula, rootlet, small root, also radish, soapwort, dim. of radix (radic-), root: see radix. Cf. radicel.] 1. In bot.: (a) A rootlet: same as radicel. (b) Specifically, same as caulicle: by late writers appropriately restricted to the rudimentary root at the lower extremity of the caulicle.—2. In anat. and zool., a little root or root-like part; a radix: as, the radicles of a vein (the minute vessels which unite to form a vein); the radicle of a nerve.—3. In philol., same as radical, 1. [Unusual.]

Radicles are elementary relational parts of words. They are generally single sounds—oftenest a consonant sound.

F. A. March, Anglo-Saxon Grammar (1869), p. 33.

4. In chem., same as radical, 2.

A radicle may consist of a single elementary atom, and it then forms a simple radicle: or it may consist of a group of atoms, in which case it constitutes a compound radicle. W. A. Miller, Elem. of Chemistry, § 1061.

Adverse, centrifugal, centripetal radicle. See the adjectives.

radicolous (rā-dik'-ō-lus), a. A contracted form of radicicolous.

radicose (rad-i-kōs), a. [= Sp. Pg. radicoso, < L. radicosus, full of roots, < radix (radic-), a root: see radix.] In bot., having a large root.

radicula (rā-dik'-ū-lā), n.; pl. radiculæ (-lē). [L.: see radicle.] In entom., a radicle.

radicular (rā-dik'-ū-lār), a. [L. radicle + -ar.] Characterized by the presence of a radicle or radicles.

As the first leaves produced are the cotyledons, this stem is called the cotyledonary extremity of the embryo, while the other is the radicular. Balfour.

Radicular odontome, an odontome formed on the neck or root of a tooth.

radicule (rā-dik'-ū-kūl), n. [F. radicule, < L. radícula, little root: see radicle.] In bot., same as radicle, 1.

radiculose (rā-dik'-ū-lōs), a. [*L. radiculosus, < L. radícula, rootlet: see radicle.] In bot., covered with radicles or rootlets.

radii, n. Plural of radius.

radiism (rā-di-izm), n. [L. radius, ray, + -ism.] In zool., same as radiation, 3. Forbes, Brit. Sea Urchins.

radiocarpal (rā-di-ō-kār'-pal), a. [L. radius, radius, + NL. carpus, the wrist: see carpal.]

1. Pertaining to the radius and the carpus or wrist: as, the radiocarpal articulation; radiocarpal ligaments.—2. Situated on the radial side of the wrist: as, the radiocarpal bone. See radiale.

Radicular arteries, the anterior and posterior carpal arteries: small branches given off from the radial at the wrist and passing to the front and back to help form the anterior and posterior carpal arches.—Radicular articulation, the wrist-joint proper: the jointing of the manus or third segment of the forelimb of any vertebrate with the second or preceding segment.

In animals whose ulna is shorter than the radius this joint is formed wholly by the radius in articulation with some or all of the proximal row of carpal bones, constituting a radiocarpal articulation in literal strictness: but the ulna often enters into this joint without altering its name. In man, whose pronation and supination are perfect, the ulna reaches the wrist, but is cut off from direct articulation with any carpal by a button of cartilage interposed between itself and the cuneiform, and the radius articulates with both the scaphoid and the semilunar, so that the human wrist-joint is properly radiocarpal.—Radiocarpal ligament, the external lateral ligament of the radiocarpal articulation. It extends from the summit of the styloid process of the radius to the outer side of the scaphoid.

Radioflagellata (rā-di-ō-flaj-e-lā'-tā), n. pl. [NL.: see radioflagellate.] An order of animalcules emitting numerous ray-like pseudopodia, after the manner of the Radiolaria, and provided at the same time with one or more flagellate appendages, but having no distinct oral aperture. They are mostly marine. In Kent's system they consist of two families, Actinomonadidae and Euchitonidae.

radioflagellate (rā-di-ō-flaj-e-lāt), a. [L. radius, ray, + flagellum, a whip: see flagellate.] Having radiating pseudopodia and flagella; of or pertaining to the Radioflagellata.

radiograph (rā-di-ō-gráf), n. [L. radius, ray, + Gr. γράφω, write.] An instrument for measuring and recording the intensity of solar radiation.

Winstanley has given his radiograph a form convenient for continuous self-records.

Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 249.

radiohumeral (rā-di-ō-hū-mē'-ral), a. [L. radius, ray, + humerus, prop. umerus, a shoulder: see humeral.] Relating to the radius and the humerus: as, the radiohumeral articulation or ligament.

Radiola (rā-di-ō-lā), n. [NL. (J. F. Gmelin, 1791), so named in reference to the many branches; < L. radiolus, a little ray, also a plant resembling a fern, dim. of radius, a ray: see radius, ray.] A genus of polypetalous plants of the order Lineæ, or flax family, and tribe Eulinee, distinguished from the nearly related genus Linum (flax) by its complete numerical symmetry in fours (instead of fives), having four toothed sepals, four twisted petals, four distinct stamens, a four-celled ovary, four styles, and an eight-celled, eight-seeded capsule. The only species, R. Millegrana, native of the temperate and subtropical parts of the Old World, is a little annual with forking stem, opposite leaves, and minute white corymbose flowers. See allseed (d) and flaxseed, 2.

Radiolaria (rā-di-ō-lā'-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of radiolaris*, < L. radiolus, a little ray: see Radiola.] A class of filose non-corticate Protozoa: a name applied by Haeckel (in 1862) to the protozoans called by Ehrenberg Polycystina. The radiolarians are marine gymnomyxine protozoans in which no contractile vacuoles are observed, having an amoebiform body of spherical or conical figure with radiant filose pseudopodia, including a similarly shaped perforated test of membranous texture called the central capsule. The intracapsular protoplasm is continuous through the perforations with that which is extracapsular, and has a large specialized nucleus or several such nuclei.

There is usually a skeleton of silicious spicules or of the substance called acanthin, and embedded in the protoplasm may be oil-globules, pigment-granules, and crystals. Most radiolarians contain peculiar nucleated yellow corpuscles regarded as parasitic algae. Reproduction both by fission and by sporulation has been observed. The Radiolaria have been divided into the subclasses Silicoskeleta and Acanthometridæ, according to the chemical composition of the skeleton, the former subclass into Peripylea, Monopylea, and Tri-pylea (or Phæodaria); into Monocystaria, with one central capsule, and Polycystaria, with several such; and in various other ways. The latest monographer arranges them under four subclasses or "legions": (1) Peripylea or Spannularia, with 32 families; (2) Actipylea or Acantharia, with 12 families; (3) Monopylea or Nassellaria, with 26 families; and (4) Cannopylea or Phæodaria, with 15 families. The term Radiolaria appears to have been first used by Johannes Müller, in 1855, for the organisms known as Polycystina, Thalassocela, and Acanthometra. The marine radiolarians all inhabit the superficial stratum of the sea, and fabricate their skeletons of the infinitesimally small proportion of silica which is dissolved in sea-water. When they die these skeletons sink to the bottom, forming geological strata. Extensive masses of Tertiary rock, such as that which is found at Oran in Algeria, and that which occurs at Blacox Hill in Barbados, are very largely made up of exquisitely preserved skeletons of Radiolaria, which are erroneously named "fossil Infusoria." But, though there can be little doubt that Radiolaria abounded in the Cretaceous sea, none are found in the Chalk, their silicious skeletons having probably been dissolved and redeposited as flint. Recent remains of radiolarians enter largely into the composition of the so-called radiolarian ooze.

Their siliceous skeletons accumulate in some localities to such an extent as to form a Radiolarian ooze.

W. B. Carpenter, Microsc., § 507.

II. n. Any member of the Radiolaria.

radioli, n. Plural of radiolus.

radiolite (rā-di-ō-lit), n. [NL. radiolites, < radiolus, dim. of L. radius, ray: see radius.] 1. A member of the genus Radiolites.—2. A variety of natrolite, occurring in radiated forms in the zircon-syenite of southern Norway.

Radiolites (rā-di-ō-lit'-ēz), n. [NL.: see radiolite.] A genus of Rudistæ, typical of the family Radiolitidae. The typical species have at maturity valves elevated in a coniform manner in opposite directions, and sculptured with radiating grooves and ridges.

Radiolitidae (rā-di-ō-lit'-i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Radiolites + -idae.] A family of Rudistæ, typified by the genus Radiolites. The shell is very inequivalve and fixed by one valve; the hinge has one cardinal tooth and two fossæ in the fixed valve, and two cardinal teeth in the free; the external layer of the shell is thick and the internal thin; the summit of the free valve is nearly central in the adult, but submarginal in the young. The family is characteristic of the Cretaceous period.

radiolus (rā-di-ō-lus), n.; pl. radioli (-li). [NL., dim. of L. radius, a ray: see radius.] In ornith., one of the barbules, or rays of the second order, of the main shaft of a feather.—Radioli accessori, the barbules of the aftershaft or hypoptilium of a feather.

radiometer (rā-di-om'-e-tēr), n. [= F. radiomètre = Sp. radiómetro, < L. radius, a ray, + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] 1. An old instrument for measuring angles; the cross-staff. The end of the staff was held to the eye, and the crosspiece was shifted until it just covered the angle to be measured, when the latter was read off on the longitudinal staff.

2. An instrument which serves to transform radiant energy into mechanical work. It consists of four crossed arms of very fine glass, supported in the center by a needle-point, and having at the extreme ends thin vertical disks or squares of pitch, blackened on one side. When placed in a glass vessel nearly exhausted of air, and exposed to rays of light or heat, the blackened surfaces absorb the radiant energy and become heated, the molecules of the air remaining in the vessel striking against them gain from them greater velocity, and there results an increased pressure, causing a more or less rapid revolution of the arms. By varying the conditions as to degree of exhaustion, size of bulb, etc., a number of experiments are performed with the radiometer which serve to illustrate the mechanical effects of the rapidly moving molecules of a gas.

Crookes's Radiometer.

radiometric (rā'di-ō-met'rik), a. Pertaining to the radiometer, or to the experiments performed by it.

radiomicrometer (rā'di-ō-mi-krom'e-tēr), n. [L. radius, ray, + E. micrometer.] An instrument serving as a very delicate means of measuring small amounts of heat. It consists essentially of an antimony-bismuth thermo-electric couple of very small dimensions, with the ends joined by a hoop of copper wire, and suspended by a slender thread in a powerful magnetic field. It is claimed for it that it can be made even more sensitive than Langley's bolometer.

radiomuscular (rā'di-ō-mus'kū-lār), a. [L. radius, radius, + musculus, muscle; see *muscle*¹, muscular.] In anat., pertaining to the radius and to muscles: specifically noting muscular branches of the radial artery and of the radial nerve. Cones.

radiophone (rā'di-ō-fōn), n. [L. radius, ray, + Gr. φωνή, voice, sound; see *phone*¹.] An instrument in which a sound is produced by the successive expansions and contractions of a body under the action of an intermittent beam of radiant heat thrown upon and absorbed by it.

radiophonic (rā'di-ō-fon'ik), a. [radiophone + -ic.] Pertaining to radiophony, or the production of sound by the action of a beam of light and heat; relating to the radiophone, or produced by it.

radiophonics (rā'di-ō-fon'iks), n. [Pl. of radiophonic (see -ics).] Same as radiophony.

radiophony (rā'di-ō-fō-ni), n. [L. radius, ray, + Gr. φωνή, voice, sound; see *phone*¹.] The production of sound by the action of an intermittent beam of radiant heat; that branch of acoustics which considers sound so produced. For example, if the beam from a lime-light is thrown upon a rotating disk perforated with a series of holes, and, after thus being rendered intermittent, is made to fall upon a confined mass of a liquid or gas capable of absorbing radiant heat, a musical note is obtained from the latter whose pitch depends upon the rapidity of the rotation. Similar results are obtained with a plate of an appropriate solid, as hard rubber. Radiophony also includes the more complex case where an intermittent beam of light, falling upon a substance like selenium (also in a less degree sulphur), serves to vary its electrical resistance, and hence the strength of current passing through it, so as to produce a corresponding sound in a telephone-receiver placed in the circuit. This is illustrated in the photophone.

radio-ulnar (rā'di-ō-ul'nār), a. [L. radius, radius, + ulna, ulna; see ulna, ulnar.] Of or belonging to the radius and the ulna: as, the radio-ulnar articulation.—Radio-ulnar fibrocartilage. See Abrocartilage.

radious (rā'di-us), a. [ME. radious, radyous, radius, *< OF. radius, F. radieux = Sp. Pg. It. radoso, < L. radiosus, radiant, beaming, < radius, a ray; see radius.] 1. Consisting of rays, as light. Berkeley.—2. Radiating; radiant.

His radious head with shameful thorns they tear.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph over Death, st. 35.

3. In bot., same as radiant. [Rare.]

radish (rad'ish), n. [Formerly also raddish (also dial. redish, redish, appar. simulating reddish, of a red color); early mod. E. radice, radyce; < ME. radish = D. radijs = LG. radys = G. radies = Dan. radis = Sw. rädisa, radis, radisa, < OF. radis, F. radis, a radish, < Pr. raditz, a root, a radish, = OF. rais, raiz (also radice), a root, = It. radice, a root, radish, = AS. rædic, radic, erroneously hrædic, ME. radik = MLG. redik, redek, redich = OHG. rätih, rätich, MHG. rætich, rätich, retich, G. rettich, rettig =

Dan. räddike = Sw. rättika, a radish, < L. radix (radic-), a root, in particular an edible root, esp. a radish; see radix.] 1. A plant, Raphanus sativus, cultivated for its edible root; also other species of the same genus. (See phrases below.) The radish of cultivation is unknown in a wild state, but is thought by many to be derived from the wild radish, R. Raphanistrum. It has been highly prized from the days of ancient Egypt for its crisp fleshy root, which is little nutritious, but pleasantly pungent and antiscorbutic, and is mostly eaten raw as a relish or in salads. The radish commonly must be young and fresh, but some varieties are grown for winter use. The root varies greatly in size (but is ordinarily eaten when small), in form (being long and tapering, turnip-shaped, olive-shaped, etc.), and also in color (being white, scarlet, pink, reddish-purple, yellowish, or brown). The leaves were formerly boiled and eaten, and the green pods make a pickle somewhat resembling capers.

2. A root of this plant.

When a' was naked, he was, for all the world, like a forked radish, with a head fantastically carved upon it with a knife.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ill. 2. 334.

3. Same as water-radish.—Horse radish. See horse-radish.—Rat-tail radish, a species (Raphanus caudatus) or perhaps a variety of the common radish, a curiosity from the East Indies, with narrow pods a foot or more long, which are boiled or pickled for the table.—Sea-radish, or seaside radish, a variety of the wild radish, sometimes regarded as a species (Raphanus maritimus) found on European coasts.—Wild radish, a noxious field-weed, Raphanus Raphanistrum, resembling charlock, but having necklace-formed pods, and hence sometimes called jointed charlock. It has rough lyrate leaves, and yellowish petals turning whitish or purplish. It is adventive in the eastern United States.

radish-fly (rad'ish-flī), n. An American dipterous insect, Anthomyia raphani, injurious to the radish.

radius (rā'di-us), n.; pl. radii (-ī). [L. radius, a staff, rod, spoke of a wheel, a measuring-rod, a semidiameter of a circle (as it were a spoke of the wheel), a shuttle, spur of a bird, sting of a fish, the radius of the arm; by transfer, a beam of light, a ray. Cf. *ray*¹ (a doublet of radius) and the derived radiant, radiate, irradiate, etc.] 1. In math., one of a number of lines proceeding from a center; a ray; especially, a line drawn from the center to the periphery of a circle or sphere; also, the measure of the semidiameter.—

2. In anat. and zool., the outer one of the two bones of the forearm, or corresponding part of the fore leg; the bone on the thumb side of the forearm, extending from the humerus to the carpus, and bearing upon its distal end the manus or hand: so called from its revolving, somewhat like a spoke, about the ulna, as in man and other mammals whose fore limb exhibits the motions called pronation and supination. In most animals, however, the radius is motionless, being fixed in a state of pronation, when it appears as the inner rather than the outer of the two bones, or as by far the larger bone of the forearm, the ulna being often much reduced. In man the radius is as long as the ulna without the olecranon, and somewhat stouter, especially in its distal parts. It presents a small, circular, cupped and button-like head, for articulation with the capitulum of the humerus and lesser sigmoid cavity of the ulna, following which is a constriction termed the neck, and next to this a tubercle for the insertion of the biceps muscle. The shaft enlarges from above downward, and is of somewhat prismatic form, with the sharpest edge of the prism presenting toward the ulna. The lower end has two large articular facets for articulation with the scaphoid and lunar bones (forming the radiocarpal articulation, or wrist-joint), a lateral facet for the radio-ulnar articulation, and a stout projection called the styloid process, for the insertion of the supinator longus muscle. The radius is pronated by the pronator radii teres and pronator quadratus, and supinated by the supinator longus and supinator brevis, assisted by the biceps. Quite a similar form and disposition of the radius characterize various mammals which use their fore paws like hands, as monkeys, mice, squirrels, opossums, etc. The radius of others, as the horse and ox, is more different, and associated with a much reduced and ankylosed ulna. In birds the radius is so peculiarly articulated with the humerus that it slides lengthwise back and forth upon the ulna in the opening and closing of the wing, pronation and supination being absent in this class of animals. See pronation and supination, and cuts under carpus, Catarrhina, Equidae, forearm, ox, pinion, Plesiosaurus, and soldungulate.

3. In ichth., a bone of the pectoral arch, wrongly identified by some naturalists with the radius of higher vertebrates. The one so called by Cuvier is the hypercoarctoid, and that of Owen is the hypocoarctoid.—4. In entom., a vein of the wing of some insects, extending from the pterostigma to the tip of the wing.—5. [cap.] In conch., a genus of Oculidae. R. volva is the shuttle-shell or weaver-shell.—6. pl. In ornith., the barbs of the main shaft of a feather; the rays of the first order of the rachis.—7. In arachnology, one of the radiating lines of a geometrical spider's web, which are connected by a single spiral line.—8. In echinoderms, one of the five radial pieces of the dentary apparatus of a sea-urchin, being an arched rod-like piece articulated at its base with the inner extremity of each rotula, running more or less nearly parallel with the rotula, and ending in a free bifurcated extremity. Also called the compass of the lantern of Aristotle (which see, under lantern). See also cut B under lantern.—9. pl. Specifically, in irripedia, the lateral parts of the shell, as distinguished from the paries, when they overlap: when overlapped by others, they are called alæ.—10. In bot., a ray, as of a composite flower, etc.—11. The movable limb or arm of a sextant; also, a similar feature in any other instrument for measuring angles.—12. In fort., a line drawn from the center of the polygon to the end of the outer side.—Auricular radii. See auricular.—Geometrical radius of a cog-wheel, the radius of the pitch-circle of the wheel, in contradistinction to its real radius, which is that of the circle formed by the crests of the teeth.—Oblique line of the radius. See oblique.—Pronator radii quadratus. See pronator quadratus, under pronator.—Pronator radii teres. See pronator.—Proportional radii, in a system of gears, or in a set of gears of the same pitch, radii proportioned in length to the number of teeth in the respective wheels. The proportional radii of any two geared wheels, when taken together, are equal to the line connecting the centers of the wheels, which line is the basis of computation in determining them. Also called primitive radii.—Radii accessori, the barbs of the aftershaft or hyporachis of a feather.—Radii astronomici. Same as radiometer, 1.—Radius of concavity. Same as radius of curvature.—Radius of curvature, the radius of the circle of curvature—that is, of the osculating circle at any point of a curve. In the cut, AHBC is the primitive curve (in this case an ellipse); KHJ, the circle of curvature, osculating the primitive curve at H; T, the center of curvature; TH, the radius of curvature; GFTED, the locus of centers of curvature, or the evolute. The radius of curvature wrapping itself upon the evolute gives the primitive curve.—Radius of dissipation. See dissipation.—Radius of explosion. See *mine*², 2 (b).—Radius of gyration, in mech., the distance from the axis to a point such that, if the whole mass of a body were concentrated into it, the moment of inertia would remain unchanged. If the axis is a principal axis, this radius becomes a principal radius of gyration.—Radius of rupture. See *mine*², 2 (b).—Radius of the evolute. Same as radius of curvature.—Radius of torsion, the element of the arc of a curve divided by the angle of torsion.—Radius vector (pl. radii vectores), the length of the line joining a variable point to a fixed origin: in astronomy the origin is taken at the sun or other central body. See vector.—Real radius. See geometrical radius.

Radius of Curvature.

radius-bar (rā'di-us-bār), n. In a steam-engine, one of a pair of rods pivoted at one end and connected at the other with some concentrically moving part which it is necessary to keep at a definite distance from the pivot or center. Also called radius-rod and bridle-rod. See cuts under grasshopper-beam and paddle-wheel.—radius-saw (rā'di-us-sā), n. A circular saw journaled at the end of a swinging frame or radial shaft, used in cross-cutting timber.

radix (rā'diks), n.; pl. radices (rā'di'sēz). [< L. radix (radic-), a root, = Gr. ῥαδίς, a branch, rod. Hence ult. E. race⁴ and radish (doublets of radix), radical, radicle, radicle, radicle, radicate, eradicate, arace¹, etc.] 1. The root of a plant: used chiefly with reference to the roots of medicinal plants or preparations from them. Hence—2. The primary source or origin; that from which anything springs, or in which it originates. [Rare.]

Her wit is all spirit, that spirit fire, that fire flies from her tongue, able to burne the radix of the heat invention; in this element she is the abstract and briefe of all the eloquence since the incarnation of Tully.

Heywood, Fair Maid of the Exchange (Works, 1874, II. 54).

Judaism is the radix of Christianity—Christianity the integration of Judaism.
De Quincey, Esquisses, iii.

3. In etym., a primitive word or form from which spring other words; a radical; a root.—4. In math., a root. (a) Any number which is arbitrarily made the fundamental number or base of any system of numbers, to be raised to different powers. Thus, 10 is the radix of the decimal system of numeration (Briggs's). In the common system of logarithms, the radix is also 10; in the Napierian it is 2.7182818284; every other number is considered as some power of the radix, the exponent of which power constitutes the logarithm of that number. (b) The root of a finite expression from which a series is derived.

5. In zool. and anat., a root; a rooted or root-like part; a radicle; as, the radix or root of a tooth; the radix of a nerve.—Radix cerebelli, the posterior peduncle of the cerebellum.—Radix motoria, the smaller motor root of the trigeminal nerve.—Radix sensoria, the larger sensory root of the trigeminal nerve.

radlyt, adv. See rathly.

radness (rad'nes), n. [ME., < rad + -ness.] Fear; fright; terror.

The Romaynes for radness ruschte to the erthe, Ffiorde ferdnesse of hys face, as they fey were, Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), i. 120.

radoub (ra-döb'), n. [F., repairs made on a vessel, < radoub, formerly also redoub, mend, repair: see redub.] In mercantile law, the repairing and refitting of a ship for a voyage. Wharton.

radula (rad'ü-lä), n.; pl. radulæ (-lë). [NL., < L. radula, a scraper, scraping-iron, < radere, scrape: see rasel, razel.] In conch., the tongue or lingual ribbon of a mollusk, specifically called odontophore, and more particularly, the rasping surface or set of teeth of the odontophore, which bites like a file.

A, median tooth and teeth of one row of right half of radula of Trochus cinerarius. B, one row of radular teeth of Cypræa europæa. A is rhynchoglossate, and B is tzenioglossate.

This structure is highly characteristic of the cephaloporous classes, among which it presents great diversity in detail. It bears the numerous small chitinous processes or teeth of these mollusks, which serve to triturate food with a kind of filing or rasping action. According to the disposition of the teeth in any one of the many cross-rows which beset the length of the radula, mollusks are called rachyglossate, tenuiglossate, rhynchoglossate, tozoglossate, plenoglossate, and dacoglossate. See these words, and odontophore.

radular (rad'ü-lär), a. [< radula + -ar.] Pertaining to the radula: as, radular teeth.

radulate (rad'ü-lät), a. [< radula + -ate.] Provided with a radula, as a cephaloporous mollusk; raduliferous.

raduliferous (rad'ü-lif'e-rus), a. [< NL. radula + L. ferre = E. bear.] Bearing a radula; radulate.

raduliform (rad'ü-li-förm), a. [< L. radula, a scraper, + forma, form.] Rasp-like; having the character or appearance of the teeth of a file; cardiform: specifically noting, in ichthyology, the conical, sharp-pointed, and close-set teeth of some fishes, resembling villiform teeth, but larger and stronger.

rae (rä), n. A Scotch form of roe.

rafer. A Middle English preterit of reave.

raff (raf), v. t. [< OF. raffer, rafer, catch, snatch, slip away, = It. raffare*, in comp. ar-raffare, snatch, seize, = MHG. raffen, reffen, G. raffen, snatch, sweep away, carry off suddenly, = MLG. LG. rapen, snatch, = Sw. rappa, snatch, seize, = Dan. rappe, hasten: see *rap*², from the Scand. form cognate with the G. Hence ult. raff.] To sweep; snatch, draw, or huddle together; take by a promiscuous sweep.

Their causes and effects . . . I thus raff vp together. R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, fol. 60.

raff (raf), n. and a. [< ME. raffe, raf, esp. in the phrase rif and raf (now rifraff), < OF. rif et raf, every bit, in which raf is due to the verb raffer, snatch: see raff, v. Cf. rifraff.] Cf. It. raffola, a crowd, press. I. n. 1. A promiscuous heap or collection; a jumble; a medley. [Obsolete or archaic.]

The synod of Trent was convened to settle a raff of errors and superstitions. Barrow, Unity of the Church.

2. Trashy material; lumber; rubbish; refuse. [Old and prov. Eng.]

And maken of the rym and raf
Suche gylours for pompe and pride.
Appendix to W. Mapes, p. 340. (Halliwell.)

Let raff be rife in prose and rhyme,
We lack not rhymes and reasons,
As on this whirlingig of Time
We circle with the seasons.
Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

3. Abundance; affluence. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]—4. A worthless or disorderly person; a rowdy; a scapegrace: now applied to students of Oxford by the townspeople. Halliwell.

Myself and this great peer
Of these rude raffs became the jeer.
W. Combe, Dr. Syntax, i. 20. (Davies.)

One of the raffs we shrink from in the street,
Wore an old hat, and went with naked feet.
Leigh Hunt, High and Low. (Davies.)

5. Collectively, worthless persons; the scum or sweepings of society; the rabble. Compare rifraff.

"People, you see," he said, "won't buy their 'accounts' of raff; they won't have them of any but respectable."
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, i. 325.

II. a. Idle; dissolute. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Raffaelsque, a. See Raphaellesque.

raffe, raffie (raf'f), n. [Origin obscure.] Naut., a three-cornered sail set on schooners when before the wind or nearly so. The head hoists up to the foretopmast-head and the clues haul out to the square-sail yard-arms. It is rarely used except on the Great Lakes of North America. Sometimes it is in two pieces, one for each side of the mast.

raffia, roffia (raf'i-ä, rof'i-ä), n. [Malagasy.] 1. A palm, Raphia Ruffia, growing in Madagascar.

It bears pinnate leaves 20 or 30 feet long upon a moderate trunk. The cuticle is peeled from both sides of the leaf-stalk, for use as a fiber, being largely made into matting, and also applied by the natives to finer textile purposes. (See rabanna.) It is now somewhat largely used for agricultural tie-bands, as is also a similar product of the Jupati-palm, R. tædiger, included under the same name. Also spelled raphia.

2. The fiber of this plant.

raffish (raf'ish), a. [< raff + -ish.] Resembling or having the character of the raff or rabble; scampish; worthless; rowdy. Compare raff, n., 5.

Five or six raffish-looking men had surrounded a fair, delicate girl, and were preparing to besiege her in form.
Laurence, Guy Livingstone, xxiii.

The raffish young gentleman in gloves must measure his scholarship with the plain, clownish laddle from the parish school.
R. L. Stevenson, The Foreigner at Home.

raffle (raf'l), n. [< ME. raffe, a game at dice (= Sw. raffel, a raffle; < OF. raffe, raffle, F. raffle, a pair royal at dice (faire raffle, sweep the stakes), also a grape-stalk, < rafler, snatch, seize, carry off, < G. raffeln, snatch up, freq. of raffen, snatch, snatch away, carry off hastily: see raff, v. Cf. *raffle*².] 1. A game with dice.

Now comth hasardrie with hise apurtenaunces, as tables and raffles, of which comth deceite, false othes, chilynges, and alle ravynes, blasphemynge and reneyng of God.
Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

2. A method of sale by chance or lottery, in which the price of the thing to be disposed of is divided into equal shares, and the persons taking the shares cast lots for its possession by throwing dice or otherwise.

raffle¹ (raf'l), v.; pret. and pp. raffled, ppr. raffling. [= Sw. raffa = Dan. raffe, raffle; from the noun.] I. intrans. To try the chance of a raffle; engage in a raffle: as, to raffle for a watch.

They were raffling for his coat.
S. Butler, Satire upon Gaming.

The great Rendezvous is at night, after the Play and Opera are done; and Raffling for all Things Vendible is the great Division.
Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 176.

II. trans. To dispose of by means of a raffle: often with off: as, to raffle or raffle off a watch.

raffle² (raf'l), v.; pret. and pp. raffled, ppr. raffling. [Perhaps < Icel. hrafsla, scrape together (a slang term); cf. hrapa, hurry, hasten: see raff, v. Cf. *raffle*¹.] I. intrans. 1. To move or fidget about. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To live in a disorderly way. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

II. trans. 1. To stir (a fire).—2. To brush off (walnuts). Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

raffle³ (raf'l), n. [< *raffle*², v. Cf. raff, n.] Naut., raff; lumber; rubbish.

Her decks were heavily encumbered with what sailors call raffle—that is, the muddle of ropes, torn canvas, staves of boats and casks, . . . with which the ocean illustrates her violence. W. C. Russell, Death Ship, xxx.

raffle⁴ (raf'l), n. [Origin obscure.] Same as raffle-net.

raffled (raf'ld), a. [Origin obscure.] Having the edge finely divided or serrated.

A peculiar small cut or raffled leaf resembling an ivy, or more nearly a vine leaf.
Souidages Catalogue, p. 116, note to No. 365.

raffle-net (raf'l-net), n. A kind of fishing-net.

raffier (raf'lier), n. [< *raffle*² + -er.] One who raffles.

Rafflesia (raf-lë'zi-ä), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1821), named after Sir Stamford Raffles, British governor in Sumatra, and companion to the botanist Dr. Joseph Arnold, who discovered there the first known species, R. Arnoldi, in 1818.] A genus of apetalous parasitic plants of the order Cytinaceæ and type of the tribe Rafflesieæ, characterized by a perianth of five large entire and fleshy imbricated lobes, numerous stamens, and globose many-chambered anthers, each opening by a single pore, which form a ring at the revolute top of a column rising in the center of the flower. The flowers are dioecious, and the pistillate ones contain an ovary with a labyrinth of small cells and numerous ovules. The 4 species are natives of hot and damp jungles in the Malay archipelago. The whole plant consists of a single flower, without leaves or proper stem, growing out from the porous root or stem of species of Vicia (Cissua), at a time when the leaves and flowers of the foster-plant have withered. The flower of the parasite protrudes as a knob from the bark at first, and enlarges for some months, resembling before opening a close cabbage, and remaining fully expanded only a few days. It exhales an odor of tainted meat, securing cross-fertilization by aid of the flies thus attracted to it. The flower reaches 3 inches or more in diameter in R. Rochusa (valued by the Javanese for astringent and styptic properties), 6 inches in others, and 2 feet in R. Patma. R. Arnoldi has long been famed for its size, greatly exceeding the Victoria lily (23 inches), and even exceeding the Aristolochia Goldiana (a specimen of which at Kew, March, 1880, was 28 inches long and 16 broad). The first flower of R. Arnoldi found measured 3 feet across its flat circular top, and weighed about 15 pounds; the roundish calyx-lobes were each a foot long, and in places an inch thick; and the globular central cup was a foot across and held about 6 quarts. The fruit ripens into a chestnut-brown and truncated nut, about 6 inches thick, with irregularly furrowed and broken surface, and containing thousands of hard, curiously appendaged and lacunose seeds. The flower is flesh-colored and mottled pink and yellow within, and with brown or bluish scales beneath. It is called ambun-ambun or wonder-wonder by the Malays, and krubut, a name which they also give to another gigantic plant which grows with it, the ovoid Amorphophallus Titanum.

Rafflesia Arnoldi, parasitic on a stem.

Rafflesiaceæ (raf-lë'zi-ä'së-ë), n. pl. [NL. (Schott and Endlicher, 1832), < Rafflesia + -aceæ.] Same as Rafflesieæ, but formerly regarded as a separate order.

Rafflesieæ (raf-lë'zi-ä'së-ë), n. pl. [NL. (Robert Brown, 1844), < Rafflesia + -eæ.] A tribe of apetalous parasitic plants, constituting with the smaller tribe Hydnoreæ the order Cytinaceæ. It is characterized by the presence of scattered or imbricated scales in place of leaves, and flowers with from four to ten usually imbricated calyx-lobes, the anthers forming one, two, or three circles about a column in the center of the staminate flower, and the one or many stigmas terminating a similar column in the pistillate flower. It includes about 21 species in 6 genera, scattered through warm climates, and extending into the Mediterranean region, South Africa, and Mexico. All are indwelling parasites, issuing out of the roots or branches of various trees and shrubs. They vary in habit, having in Cytinus a colored fleshy and distinct stem and many-flowered spike, while in the other genera the whole plant consists of a single flower sessile on its embedded rhizome. They range from a minute size in Apodanthes and large in other genera to the monster flower of Rafflesia, the type. The plants are called patma-worts by some botanists.

raffing-net (raf'ling-net), n. Same as raffle-net.

raffman (raf'man), n. [< raff + man.] A dealer in miscellaneous stuff; a chandler.

Grocers and raffmen. Norwich Records. (Nares.)
raff-merchant (raf'mër'chant), n. A dealer in lumber or old articles. Also raft-merchant. [Prov. Eng.]

raft¹ (raft), n. [< ME. raft, raeft, raffe, a rafter, spar, beam, < Icel. rafrtr (rafrtr), a rafter, beam (r final being sign of nom. case); = Sw. Dan. raft, rafter; with formative -t, perhaps < Icel. raf, rafr, a roof, = OHG. rafo, MHG. rävo, G. dial. raff, a spar, rafter; cf. Gr. δορῶς, a roof, ἐπέπερ, cover. Cf. *rafter*¹.] 1. A beam; spar; rafter.

Aythir gripus a schafte
Was als rude as a raffe.
Avoyne of King Arthur, xxv.

2. A sort of float or framework formed of logs, planks, or other pieces of timber fastened or lashed together side by side, for the convenience of transporting the constituent materials down rivers, across harbors, etc. Rafts of logs to be floated to a distant point are often very large, strongly constructed, and carry huts for the numerous men required to manage them. Those of the Rhine are sometimes 400 or 500 feet long, with 200 or more hands. A cigar-shaped raft of large logs, 560 feet long, 50 feet wide, and 35 feet deep, was lost in December, 1887, under towage by sea from Nova Scotia to New York; but other large rafts have been successfully transported.

3. A structure similarly formed of any materials for the floating or transportation of persons or things. In cases of shipwreck, planks, spars, a, b, tanks or air-chambers; c, d, decks; e, fender; g, h, life-lines; i, rowlocks; j, steering and sculling rowlock; k, lashings.

barrels, etc., are often hastily lashed together to form a raft for escape. In passenger-vessels life-rafts frequently form part of the permanent equipment. See life-raft.

Where is that son
That floated with thee on the fatal raft?
Shak., C. of E., v. 1. 348.

4. An accumulation of driftwood from fallen trees in a river, lodged and compacted so as to form a permanent obstruction. Rafts of this kind exist or have existed in the Mississippi and other rivers of the western United States, the largest ever formed being that of the Red River, which during many years completely blocked the channel for 45 miles.

5. A conglomeration of eggs of some animals, as certain insects and mollusks, fastened together and forming a mass; a float. See cut under Ianthina.

A great many eggs [of the common cockroach] are laid at one time, the whole number being surrounded by a stiff chitinous coat, forming the so-called raft.
Amer. Nat., XXII. 857.

raft¹ (ráft), v. t. [*< raft*¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To transport or float on a raft.

Guns taken out of a ship to lighten her when aground should be hoisted out and rafted clear, if there is any danger of blighting on them.
Luce, Seamanship, p. 182, note.

The idea of rafting timber by the ocean.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 17.

2. To make a raft of; form into a raft.

As soon as the blubber is taken off, it is rafted—tied together with ropes in a sort of raft—and lies in the water until taken on board ship.
C. M. Seammon, Marine Mammals, p. 68.

I could see him securing these planks to one another by lashings. By the time he had rafted them, nearly an hour had passed since he had left the sandbank.
W. C. Russell, A Strange Voyage, xlv.

II. intrans. To manage a raft; work upon a raft or rafts; travel by raft.

They canoed, and rafted, and steam-boated, and travelled with packhorses.
Academy, Nov. 10, 1888, p. 801.

raft² (ráft), n. [A var. of raft, appar. by confusion with *raft*¹.] A miscellaneous collection or heap; a promiscuous lot; used slightlyingly: as, a raft of papers; a whole raft of things to be attended to. [Colloq., U. S.]

This last spring a raft of them [Irish maids] was out of employment.
Philadelphia Times, Oct. 24, 1886.

raft³ (ráft), n. [Origin uncertain; cf. raft.] A damp musty smell. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

raft-breasted (ráft'bres'ted), a. In ornith., ratite. W. K. Parker.

raft-dog (ráft'dog), n. An iron bar with ends bent over and pointed, for securing logs together in a raft. The points are driven respectively into adjacent or juxtaposed logs, which are thus bonded to each other.

raft-duck (ráft'duk), n. The scaup or blackhead duck, Aythya or Fuligula or Fulix marila; so called in the United States from its flocking closely on the water, as if forming a raft of ducks. Also called bluebill, shuffler, and flocking-fowl. See cut under scaup.—Red-headed raft-duck. Same as redhead, 2.

rafter. An obsolete preterit and past participle of reave. Chaucer.

rafter¹ (ráf'tér), n. [< ME. rafter, refter, < AS. ræfter, pl. ræftas, reftres (= MD. rafter = MLG. rafter, raffert), a beam, rafter; with formative -er, from ræft* = Icel. ræftir (rafr) = Sw. Dan. raft, a rafter, beam: see raft.] 1. In building, one of the beams which give the slope of a roof, and to which is secured the lath or other framework upon which the slate or other outer covering is nailed. The rafters extend from the eaves to the ridge of the roof, abutting at their upper ends on corresponding rafters rising from the opposite side of the roof, or resting against a crown-plate or ridge-plate as the case may be. For the different kinds of rafters in a structure, see roof, and cuts under curb-roof, jack-rafter, and pontoon.

Shepherd, I take thy word,
And trust thy honest offer'd courtesy,
Which oft is sooner found in lowly sheds
With smoky rafters than in tapstry halls.
Milton, Comus, l. 324.

2. Same as *carline*⁴, 2.—3. In anat., a trabecule or trabeculum: as, the rafters of the embryonic skull.—Binding-rafter. See binding.—Intermediate rafter, a rafter placed between the ordinary rafters, or between principal rafters, to strengthen a roof.—Principal rafter, a main timber in an assemblage of carpentry; especially, one of those rafters which are larger than the common rafters, and are framed at their lower ends into the tie-beam, and either abut at their upper ends against the king-post or receive the ends of the straining-beams when queen-posts are used. The principal rafters support the purlins, which again carry the common rafters: thus the whole weight of the roof is sustained by the principal rafters.

rafter¹ (ráf'tér), v. t. [*< rafter*¹, n.] 1. To form into or like rafters: as, to rafter timber.

—2. To furnish or build with rafters: as, to rafter a house.

A torn, worn, or formless fragment or shred of cloth; a comparatively worthless piece of any textile fabric, either wholly or partly detached from its connection by violence or abrasion: as, his coat was in *rag*s; cotton and linen *rag*s are used to make paper, and woolen *rag*s to make shoddy.

Hir ragges thel anone of drawe, . . .
She had bathe, she had reste,
And was arrailed to the beste.
Gower, Conf. Amant., l.

Cowls, hoods, and habits with their wearers toss'd,
And flutter'd into *rag*s.
Milton, P. L., III. 491.

5. A worn, torn, or mean garment; in the plural, shabby or worn-out clothes, showing rents and patches.

If you will embrace Christ in his robes, you must not think scorn of him in his *rag*s.
J. Bradford, Letters (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 111.

Drowsiness shall clothe a man with *rag*s.
Prov. xxxiii. 21.

Trust me, I prize poor virtue with a rag
Better than vice with both the Indies.
Beau. and Fl. (?), Faithful Friends, iv. 4.

The poore inhabitants were dispers'd, . . . some under tents, some under miserable huts and hovells, many without a rag or any necessary utenilla.
Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 5, 1606.

The man forget not, though in *rag*s he lies,
And know the mortal through a crown's disguise.
Akenside, Epistle to Curio.

6. Any separate fragment or shred of cloth, or of something like or likened to it: often applied disparagingly or playfully to a handkerchief, a flag or banner, a sail, the curtain of a theater, a newspaper, etc.

It cost three men's lives to get back that four-by-three flag—to tear it from the breast of a dead rebel—for the name of getting their little rag back again.
Walt Whitman, The Century, XXXVI. 827.

7. Figuratively, a severed fragment; a remnant; a scrap; a bit.

So he up with his rusty sword,
And chopped the old saddle to *rag*s.
Saddle to Rags (Child's Ballads, VIII. 267).

They [fathers] were not hearkened to, when they were heard, but heard perfunctorily, fragmentarily, here and there a rag, a piece of a sentence. Donne, Sermons, v.

Not having otherwise any rag of legality to cover the shame of their cruelty. Fuller.

8. A base, beggarly person; a ragamuffin; a tatterdemalion. [Colloq.]

Lash hence these overweening *rag*s of France,
These famish'd beggars, weary of their lives.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 328.

Out of my doore, you Witch, you Ragge, you Baggage!
Shak., M. W. of W. (folio 1623), iv. 2. 194.

9. A farthing. Halliwel. [Eng. cant.]

Jac. 'Twere good she had a little foolish money
To rub the time away with.
Host.

Not a denier.
Beau. and Fl., Captain, iv. 2.

10. A herd of colts. Strutt. [Prov. Eng.]—11. In type-founding, the bur or rough edge left on imperfectly finished type.—Coral rag, one of the limestones of the Middle Oolite, consisting in part of continuous beds of petrified corals.—Hag, tag, and rag. A Cross Raguly.

Ragusan (ra-g'ŭsan), a. and n. [Ragusa (see def.) + -an. Cf. argosy.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Ragusa in Dalmatia, on the Adriatic, a city belonging to Austria, but for many centuries prior to the time of Napoleon I. an independent republic.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Ragusa.

ragweed (rag'wēd), n. 1. Any plant of the composite genus Ambrosia; especially, the common North American species A. trifida, the great ragweed or horse-cane, and A. artemisiifolia, the Roman wormwood or hogweed. Both are sometimes called bitterweed. The former is commonly found on river-banks, has three-lobed leaves, and is sometimes 12 feet high. The latter, a much-branched plant from 1 to 3 feet high, with dissected leaves, grows everywhere in waste places, along roads, etc., and is troublesome in fields. Its pollen is regarded as a cause of hay-fever. The plants of this genus are monocious, the flowers of the two sexes borne in separate heads, the female heads producing a single flower with the ovoid involucre closed over it. The flowers are greenish and inconspicuous. See Ambrosia, 2.

2. The ragwort or St.-James-wort, Senecio Jacobæa. [Prov. Eng.]

rag-wheel (rag'hwēl), n. 1. In mach., a wheel having a notched or serrated margin.—2. A cutlers' polishing-wheel or soft disk made by clamping together a number of disks cut from some fabric.—Rag-wheel and chain, a contrivance for use instead of a band or belt when great resistance is to be overcome, consisting of a wheel with pins or cogs on the rim, and a chain in the links of which the pins catch. See cut under chain-wheel.

rag-wool (rag'wūl), n. Wool from rags; shoddy.

rag-work (rag'wērk), n. 1. Masonry built with undressed flat stones of about the thickness of a brick, and having a rough exterior, whence the name.—2. A manufacture of carpeting or similar heavy fabric from strips of rag, which are either knitted or woven together. Compare rag carpet, under rag.

ragworm (rag'wērm), n. Same as mud-worm.

ragwort (rag'wērt), n. The name of several plants of the genus Senecio; primarily, S. Jacobæa of Europe and northern Asia. This is an erect herb from 2 to 4 feet high, with bright-yellow radiate heads in a compact terminal corymb; the leaves are irregularly lobed and toothed, whence the name. Also called benedict, cankerweed, St.-James-wort, kadle-dock, Jacobæa, etc.; in Ireland fairies'-horse. Sometimes ragweed.—African ragwort. See Othonna.—Golden ragwort, a North American plant, Senecio aureus, from 1 to 3 feet high, sometimes lower, bearing corymbs of golden-yellow heads in spring; very common and extremely variable. It is said to have been a favorite vulnerary with the Indians, and is by some regarded as an emmenagogue and diuretic. Also called squaw-weed and liferoot.—Purple ragwort, the purple Jacobæa, Senecio elegans, a handsome garden species from the Cape of Good Hope: a smooth herb with pinnatifid leaves and corymbed heads, the rays purple, the disk yellow or purple.—Sea-ragwort. Same as dusty-miller, 2.—Woolly ragwort, Senecio tomentosus of the southern United States, a plant covered with scarcely deciduous hoary wool.

1, the upper part of the stem with the heads of golden ragwort (Senecio aureus); 2, the rhizome with the lower part of the stem and the leaves; 3, the achene.

rahater, v. t. An erroneous form of *rate*¹.

He neuer linned rahater of those persones that offered sacrifice for to haue good health of bodie.

Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 86. (Davies.)

Rahu (rā'hū), n. [Skt. Rāhu; derivation obscure.] In Hindu myth., the demon that is supposed to be the cause of the eclipses of the sun and moon.

Raia (rā'ā), n. [NL., also Raja, < L. raia, a ray: see ray.] A genus of batoid selachians: used with various limits. (a) By the old authors it was extended to all the species of the order or suborder Raie. (b) By modern authors it is restricted to those Raie (in the narrowest sense) which have the pectorals separated by the snout, the caudal rudimentary, and the ventrals distinct and notched. It comprises nearly 40 species, generally called skates or rays. See cuts under skate and ray.

Raia (rā'ā), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. raia, a ray: see Raia.] An order or suborder of selachians, comprising the rays or skates, and distinguished by the position of the branchial apertures on the lower surface of the body, and the depressed and disk-like trunk in combination with the outspread pectorals. Also called Batoidei.

raian (rā'an), a. and n. [< NL. Rai(a) + -an.] Same as raioid.

raible (rā'bl), r. A Scotch form of *rabble*¹.

Woe Miller neist the guard relieves,
And orthodoxy raibles. Burns, Holy Fair.

raid (rād), n. [Also rade; < ME. rade, Northern form of rode, < AS. rād, a riding, = Icel. reidh, a riding, a raid: see road, of which raid is a variant, prob. in part from the cognate Icel. form.] 1. A hostile or predatory incursion; especially, an inroad or incursion of mounted men; a swooping assault for injury or plunder; a foray.

Then he a proclamation maid,
All men to meet at Inverness.
Throw Murray land to mak a raid.
Battle of Harlaw (Child's Ballads, VII. 184).

So the ruffians growl'd,
Fearing to lose, and all for a dead man,
Their chance of booty from the morning's raid.
Tennyson, Geraint.

Hence — 2. A sudden onset in general; an irruption for or as if for assault or seizure; a descent made in an unexpected or undesired manner: as, a police raid upon a gambling-house. [Chiefly colloq.]

raid (rād), v. [< raid, n.] I. intrans. To go upon a raid; engage in a sudden hostile or disturbing incursion, foray, or descent.

The Saxons were perpetually raiding along the confines of Gaul. The Atlantic, LXV. 153.

II. trans. 1. To make a raid or hostile attack upon; encroach upon by foray or incursion. Hence — 2. To attack in any way; affect injuriously by sudden or covert assault or invasion of any kind: as, to raid a gambling-house. [Colloq.] — To raid the market, to derange prices or the course of trade, as on the stock-exchange, by exciting distrust or uncertainty with regard to values; disturb or depress prices by creating a temporary panic. [Colloq.]

raider (rā'dēr), n. [< raid + -er.] One who makes a raid; one engaged in a hostile or predatory incursion.

raign¹, v. t. [ME. reynen; by apheresis for arayn (ME. araynen, etc.).] To arraign.

And many other extorcioners and promoters in dyuers contreys within the reame was brought to London, and put in to prysons, and reyned at the Gylde Halle with Empson and Dudley. Arnold's Chronicle, p. xlii.

raign², n. and r. An obsolete spelling of reign.

Raia (rā'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Raia + -ia.] A family of hypoterm selachians, or Raie, typified by the genus Raia; the skates and rays proper. The species have a moderately broad rhombic disk, a more or less acute snout, the tail slender but not whip-like, and surmounted by two small dorsals without spines, and no electrical apparatus. The females are oviparous, eggs inclosed in quadrate corneous capsules being cast. In this respect the Raie differ from all the other ray-like selachians. The species are quite numerous, and every sea has representatives. Formerly the family was taken in a much more extended sense, embracing all the representatives of the suborder except the saw-fishes. Also Raia.

Raiine (rā'ā), n. pl. [NL., < Raia + -inæ.] A subfamily of rays, coextensive with the family Raie in its most restricted sense.

raik, v. i. See *rake*².

rail¹ (rāl), n. [*< ME. rail, raile, rayl, *regel, regol (in comp. regolsticke, a ruler), partly < AS. regol (not found in sense of 'bar' or 'rail' except as in regolsticke (> ME. regolsticke), a ruler, a straight bar, but common in the derived sense 'a rule of action,' = MD. reghel, rijghel, rijchel, richel, a bar, rail, bolt, later richgel, a bar, shelf, D. rijghel, a bar, = MLG. regel, LG. regel, a rail, cross-bar, = OHG. rigil, MHG. rigel, G. riegel, a bar, bolt, rail, = Sw. regel = Dan. rigel, a bar, bolt; partly < OF. reille, raille, roille, roile, reille, reile, reile, a bar, rail, bolt, board, plank, ladder, plow-handle, furrow, row, etc., F. dial. reille, ladder, reille, raille, plowshare (< LG.); < L. regula, a straight piece of wood, a stick, bar, staff, rod, rule, ruler, hence a rule, pattern, model: see *rule*¹. *Rail*¹ is thus a doublet of *rule*¹, derived through AS., while *rule*¹ is derived through OF., from the same L. word. Cf. *rai*².] 1. A bar of wood or other material passing from one post or other support to another. Rails, variously secured, as by being mortised to or passing through slots in their supports, etc., are used to form fences and barriers for many other purposes. In many parts of the United States rail fences are commonly made of rails roughly split from logs and laid zig-zag with their ends resting upon one another, every intersection so formed being often supported by a pair of cross-stakes driven into the ground, upon which the top rails rest.

2. A structure consisting of rails and their sustaining posts, balusters, or pillars, and constituting an inclosure or line of division: often used in the plural, and also called a raiting. The rails of massive stone, elaborately sculptured, which form the ceremonial inclosures of ancient Buddhist topes, temples, sacred trees, etc., in India, are among the most characteristic and important features of Buddhist architecture, and are the most remarkable works of this class known.

The Ground within the Rayles must bee coveredd with blake Cloth.

Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 33.

There lyeth a white marble in form of a graves-stone, environed with a raile of brasse. Sandys, Travels, p. 127.

The Bharhut raile, according to the inscription on it, was erected by a Prince Vādha Pala. . . . The Buddh Gaya raile is a rectangle, measuring 131 ft. by 98 ft.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 85.

3. In joinery, a horizontal timber in a piece of framing or paneling. Specifically — (a) In a door, sash, or any paneled work, one of the horizontal pieces between which the panels lie, the vertical pieces being called stiles. See cut under door. (b) The course of pieces into which the upper ends of the balusters of a stair are mortised. (c) In furniture-making and fine joinery, any piece of the construction passing between two posts or other members of the frame: as, the head-rail or foot-rail in a bedstead. Hence — (d) A corresponding member in construction in other materials than wood, as a tie in brass or iron furniture.

4. Naut., one of several bars or timbers in a ship, serving for inclosure or support. The raile, specifically so called, is the fence or upper part of the bulwarks, consisting of a course of molded planks or small timbers mortised to the stanchions, or sometimes to the timber-heads. The part passing round the stern is the tafraile. The forecable-rail, poop-rail, and top-rail are bars extended on stanchions across the after part of the fore-castle-deck, the fore part of the poop, and the after part of each of the tops, respectively. A pin-rail is part of a rail with holes in it for belaying-pins; and a ffe-rail is a rail around the lower part of a mast, above the deck, with similar holes. The raile of the head are curved pieces of timber extending from the bows on each side to the hull of the head, for its support.

5. One of the iron or (now generally) steel bars or beams used on the permanent way of a railway to support and guide the wheels of cars and motors. The general form now most in use for steam-railways is that known as the T-rail. But, though these rails all have a section vaguely resembling the letter T, the proportions of the different parts and the weights of the rails are nearly as various as the railways themselves. In the accompanying diagram is shown a section of a rail weighing 75 pounds per yard in length, the weight of the length of one yard being the common mode of stating the weights of rails. These weights are in modern rails sometimes as great as 80 or 85 pounds per yard, the more recent tendency having been toward heavier locomotives and heavier rails. The cut shows the comparative dimensions of the various parts. (Compare fish-joint, fish-plate, and fish, v. t., 8.) The curved junctions of the web with the head and the base are called the fillets.

Section of Rail.
a, head; b, web; c, base; the part d is at the inner side of the head, and made to correspond with the throat of the car-wheel.

6. The railway or railroad as a means of transport: as, to travel or send goods by raile. [Colloq.]

French and English made rapid way among the dragomanish officials of the raile.

W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 24.

On the question of raile charges a good deal might be written. Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 519.

The tourists find the steamer waiting for them at the end of the raile. C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 270.

7. In cotton-spinning, a bar having an up-and-down motion, by which yarn passing through is guided upon the bar and is distributed upon the bobbins.—Adhesion of wheels to rails. See adhesion.—Capped rail. See cap.—Compound rail, a railway-rail made in two longitudinal counterparts bolted together in such manner that opposite ends of each project beyond the other part to produce a lapping joint when the rails are spiked to the ties or sleepers. Also called continuous rail.—Double-headed rail, a railway-rail without flanges, with two opposite heads united by a web. It is always used with chairs, and by turning it upside down it can be used after the upper head has become so worn as to be useless.—False rail, in ship-carp., a thin piece of timber attached inside of a curved head-rail in order to strengthen it.—Fish-bellied rail, a cast-iron railway-rail having a convex or downwardly arching under surface to strengthen its middle part, after the manner of some cast-iron beams and girders. It was introduced in 1805.—Flat rail, a railway-rail of cast-iron or wrought-iron fastened by spikes to longitudinal sleepers. The cast-iron flat rail was first used in 1776.—Middle rail, in carp., that rail of a door which is on a level with the hand, and on which the lock is usually fixed, whence it is sometimes called the lock-rail. See cut under door.—Pipe rail, a rail of iron pipe joined by fittings as in pipe-fitting. Such rails, of iron or brass, are now much used in engine-rooms of ships, at the sides of locomotives, on iron bridges, elevated railways, etc.—Pipe-rail fittings, the screw-threaded fittings, including couplings, elbows, crosses, tees, flanges, etc., used in putting together pipe-railings, and usually of an ornamental pattern.—Point-rail, a pointed rail used in the construction of a railway-switch.—Rail-drilling machine, a machine for drilling holes in the web of steel rails for the insertion of fish-plate bolts.—Rail- straightening machine, a portable screw-press for straightening bent or crooked rails or iron bars.—Rail under (naul), with the lee rail submerged: as, the vessel sailed rail under.—Rolled rail, a rail made of wrought-iron or steel by rolling.—Steel-headed rail, a railway-rail having a wrought-iron base and a steel head. Such rails were too expensive for general use, and have given place to the Bessemer-steel rails. Also called steel-tipped rail.—Steel rail, a rolled-steel railway-rail. The first steel rails were manufactured in England by Mushet in 1857. The development of the use of steel rails, stimulated by the invention of the celebrated Bessemer process for making cheap mild steel from which rails of far greater durability than those of wrought-iron can be manufactured, has been rapid, and has resulted in the substitution of steel rails for wrought-iron rails on nearly all important railways in the world.—To ride on a rail. See ride.—Virginia rail fence. Same as snake fence (which see, under fence).

rail¹ (rāl), v. [ME. railen, raylen (= OHG. rigilōn, MHG. riegelen, G. riegeln), rail; cf. OF. reillier, roillier, raillier, inclose with rails, bar; from the noun. Cf. rail², v.] I. trans. 1. To inclose with rails: often with in or off.

The sayd herse must bee rayld about, and hangyd with blake cloth.

Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 33.

It is a spot railed in, and a piece of ground is laid out like a garden bed. Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 101.

Mr. Langdon . . . has now reached the railed space.

W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 150.

2. To furnish with rails; lay the rails of, as a railway; construct a railway upon or along, as a street. [Recent.]

Fifty miles of new road graded last year, which was to receive its rails this spring, will not be railed, because it is not safe for the company to make further investments in that State. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 125.

II. intrans. To fish with a hand-line over the rail of a ship or boat. [Colloq.]

In England, the summer fishing for mackerel is carried on by means of hand lines, and small boats may be seen raiding or "whiffing" amongst the schools of mackerel.

Nature, XLI. 180.

rail² (rāl), v. t. [ME. railen, raylen, < AS. as if regolian* (= D. regelen = G. regeln), set in order, rule, < regol = D. G. Sw. Dan. regel, < L. regula, a rule: see rail¹, and cf. rule. Cf. OF. reillier, roillier, rail, bar, also stripe, from the noun.] To range in a line; set in order.

Al watz rayled on red ryche golde naylez, That al glytered & glent as glen of the sunne.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), i. 603.

They were brought to London all railed in ropes, like a team of horses in a cart, and were executed, some at London, and the rest at divers places. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

Ford, Perkin Warbeck, III. 1.

rail³ (rāl), n. [Early mod. E., also rayle; < ME. rail, reil, regel, < AS. hrægcl, hrægl, a garment, dress, robe, pl. clothes, = OS. hregil = OFries. hregil, reyl, reil = OHG. hregil, clothing, garment, dress; root unknown.] 1. A garment; dress; robe: now only in the compound night-rail.—2. A kerchief.

Rayle for a woman's neck, crevechief, en quartre doubles.

And then a good grey frocke,

A kercheffe, and a raile.

Friar Bacon's Prophecie (1604). (Halliwell.)

rail⁴ (rāl), v. t. [ME. railen; < rail³, v.] To dress; clothe.

Real railed with welliche clothes.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), i. 1618.

rail⁴ (rāl), n. [Early mod. E. rayle; < OF. raale, rasle, F. rale (> G. ralle, ML. rallus), F. dial. reille, a rail; so called from its cry; cf. OF. rasle, F. rale, a rattling in the throat; < OF. raller, F. raier, rattle in the throat, < MD. ratelen, rattle, make a noise: see rattle. Cf. also D. rallen, rellen, make a noise, Sw. ralla, chatter (rallfägel, a rail), Dan. ralle, rattle.] A bird of the subfamily Rallinae, and especially of the genus Rallus; a water-rail, land-rail, marsh-hen, or crane. Rails are small marsh-loving wading birds, related to coots and gallinules. They abound in the marshes and swamps of most parts of the world, where they thread their way in the mazes of the reeds with great ease and celerity, the body being thin and compressed, and the legs stout and strong with long toes. They nest on the ground, and lay numerous spotted eggs; the young run about as soon as hatched. The common rail of Europe is Rallus aquaticus; the clapper-rail or salt-water marsh-hen of the United States is R. crepitans; the king-rail or fresh-water marsh-hen is R. elegans; the Virginia rail is R. virginianus, also called red rail, little red-breasted rail, lesser clapper-rail, small mud-hen, etc. Very generally, in the United States, the word rail used absolutely means the sora or soree, Porzana carolina, more fully called red bird, chicken-billed rail, English rail, Carolina rail, American rail, common rail, sora-rail, ortolan, Carolina crane, crake, gallinule, etc. See Crak, Porzana, and cut under Rallus.—Golden rail, a snipe of the genus Rhynchæa; a painted-snipe or rail-snipe.—

Spotted rail, the spotted crane, Porzana maruetta, also called spotted skitty and spotted water-hen.—Weka rail. See Ocydromus.

rail⁵ (rāl), v. [Early mod. E. rayle; < OF. railer, F. railer, jest, deride, mock, = Sp. rallar, grate, scrape, vex, molest, = Pg. ralar, scrape, rub, vex, < L. as if radulare*, dim. or freq. of radere, scrape, scratch: see rase¹, raze¹. Cf. L. rallum (contr. of radulum), a scraper, radula, a scraping-iron: see radula. Hence rally², railery.] I. intrans. To speak bitterly, opprobriously, or reproachfully; use acrimonious expressions; scoff; inveigh.

Thou raylest on, right withouten reason, And blaimest hem much for small encheason.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., May.

Angels . . . bring not railing accusation against them.

2 Pet. ii. 11.

A certain Spaniard . . . railed . . . extremely at me.

Coriat, Crudities, I. 126.

With God and Fate to rail at suffering easily.

M. Arnold, Empedocles on Etna.

= Syn. of rail at. To upbraid, scold or scold at or scold about, inveigh against, abuse, oburgate. Railing and scolding are always undignified, if not improper; literally, abusing is improper; all three words may by hyperbole be used for talk which is proper.

II. trans. To scoff at; taunt; scold; banter; affect by railing or railery.

Till thou canst raile the seals from off my bond,

Thou but offend'st thy lungs to speak so loud.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 139.

Such as are capable of goodness are railed into vice, that might as easily be admonished into virtue.

Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, II. 4.

rail⁶ (rāl), v. i. [Early mod. E. rayle; < ME. railen, reilen, roilen, flow, prob. a var. of roilen, roll, wander: see roil¹.] To run; flow.

Whan the Geaunte felt hym wounded and saugh the blode raile down by the lifte iye, he was nygh wode oute of witte.

Martin (E. E. T. S.), II. 342.

I saw a spring out of a rocke forth rayle.

As clear as Christall against the Sunnbe beames.

Spenser, Visions of Bellay, I. 155.

rail-bender (rāl'ben'dēr), n. A screw-press or hydraulic press for straightening rails, or for bending them in the construction of railway-curves and switches. The rail is supported upon two bearers, between which the pressure is applied. Also called rail-bending machine.

rail-bird (rāl'bērd), n. The Carolina rail or sora, Porzana carolina. [U. S.]

rail-bittern (rāl'bit'ēr), n. One of the small bitters of the genus Ardetta, as A. neoxena, which in some respects resemble rails. Coues.

rail-board (rāl'bōrd), n. A board nailed to the rail of a vessel engaged in fishing for mackerel with hand-lines.

rail-borer (rāl'bōr'ēr), n. A hand-drill for making holes in the web of rails for the fish-plate bolts.

rail-brace (rāl'brās), n. A brace used to prevent the turning over of rails or the spreading of tracks at curves, switches, etc., on railways.

rail-chair (rāl'chār), n. An iron block, used especially in Great Britain, by means of which railway-rails are secured to the sleepers. With the flat-bottomed rail common in the United States, chairs are not required, the rails being attached to the sleepers by spikes.

rail-clamp (rāl'klamp), n. A wedge or tightening-key for clamping a rail firmly in a rail-chair, so as to prevent lateral play.

rail-coupling (rāl'kup'ling), n. A bar or rod connecting the opposite rails of a railway together at critical points, as curves or switches, where a firmer connection than is afforded by the sleepers is needed.

railer¹ (rāl'ēr), n. [ME. rail¹ + -er.] One who makes or furnishes rails.

railer² (rāl'ēr), n. [Early mod. E. rayler, < F. railer, railer, jester, < railer, rail, jest, mock: see rail⁵.] One who rails, scoffs, insults, censures, or reproaches with opprobrious language.

I am so far off from deserving you,

My beauty so unfit for your affection,

That I am grown the scorn of common railers.

Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, III. 1.

Junius is never more than a railer, and very often he is third-rate even as a railer.

John Morley, Burke, p. 47.

rail-guard (rāl'gārd), n. 1. In English locomotives, one of two stout rods, reaching down to about two inches from the track, before a front wheel. In America the cow-catcher or pilot serves the same purpose.—2. A guard-rail.

railing (rāl'ing), n. [ME. raylinge; verbal n. of rail¹, v.] 1. Rails collectively; a combination of rails; a construction in which rails form an important part. Hence—2. Any openwork construction used as a barrier, parapet, or the like, primarily of wood, but also of iron bars, wire, etc.—Post and railing. See post.

railingly (rāl'ing-li), adv. In a railing manner; with scoffing or opprobrious language.

railing-post (rāl'ing-pōst), n. Same as rail-post.

railipotent (rāl'ip'ō-tēnt), a. [Irreg. < rail¹ + potent, as in omnipotent.] Powerful in railing or vituperation, or as incentive to railing; extremely abusive. [Rare.]

The most preposterous principles have, in requital, shown themselves, as an old author phrases it, valiantly railipotent.

F. Hall, Mod. Eng., Pref.

rail-key (rāl'kē), n. A wedge-piece used to clamp a rail to a chair by driving it in between the rail and the chair. Compare rail-clamp.

railery (rāl'ēr or rāl'ēr-i), n. [Early mod. E. railerie, railiery, rallery; < F. railerie, jesting, mockery, < railer, jest: see rail⁵ and rally².] 1. Good-humored pleasantry or ridicule; satirical merriment; jesting language; banter.

Let railery be without malice or heat.

B. Jonson.

When you have been abroad, Nephew, you'll understand Railery better.

Congreve, Way of the World, III. 16.

That conversation where the spirit of railery is suppressed will ever appear tedious and insipid.

Sheridan, School for Scandal, I. 1.

2. A jest. [Rare.]

They take a pleasing railery for a serious truth.

Gentleman Instructed, p. 18. (Davies.)

railleur (ra-lyēr'), n. [F. railleur, railer, jester, mocker: see railer².] One who turns what is serious into ridicule; a jester; a banterer; a mocker.

The family of the railleurs is derived from the same original with the philosophers. The founder of philosophy is confessed by all to be Socrates; and he was also the famous author of all irony.

Bp. Sprat, Hist. Royal Soc.

raily (rāl'i), n.; pl. railies (-liz). [Dim. of rail³.] Same as rail³. [Scotch.]

rail-post (rāl'pōst), n. In carp.: (a) A baluster for a stair-rail, hand-rail, or a balustrade. (b) A newel. Also called railing-post.

rail-punch (rāl'punch), n. A machine for punching holes in the webs of rails, and for analogous uses.

railroad (rāl'rōd), n. [ME. rail¹ + road.] A road upon which are laid one or more lines of rails to guide and facilitate the movement of vehicles designed to transport passengers or freight, or both. [In this sense the words railroad and railway (which are of about equal age) are synonymous; but the former is more commonly and preferably used in the United States, the latter now universally in England. In both countries steam-railroads are called roads, seldom ways. For convenience, the subject of railroads, and the various compound words, are treated in this dictionary under railway.]

The London "Courier," in detailing the advantages of rail-roads upon the locomotive steam engine principle, contains a remark relative to Mr. Rush, our present minister in London . . . "Whatever parliament may do, they cannot stop the course of knowledge and improvement! The American government has possessed itself, through its minister, of the improved mode of constructing and making rail-roads, and there can be no doubt of their immediate adoption throughout that country."

Niles's Register, April 2, 1825.

Alas! even the giddiness attendant on a journey on this Manchester rail-road is not so perilous to the nerves as that too frequent exercise in the merry-go-round of the ideal world.

Scott, Count Robert of Paris, Int., p. xi. (Oct. 15, 1831).

On Monday I shall set off for Liverpool by the railroad, which will then be opened the whole way.

Macaulay, in Trevelyan, II. 20.

Lady Buchan of Athlone writes thus in 1823: "I have a letter from Sir John, who strongly recommends my going by the railroad."

N. and Q., 7th ser., VIII. 379.

Commissioner of Railroads. See commissioner.—Elevated railroad. See railway.—Railroad euvre. See euvre.—Underground railroad. (a) See underground railway, under railway. (b) In the United States before the abolition of slavery, a secret arrangement for enabling slaves to escape into free territory, by passing them along from one point of concealment to another till they reached Canada or some other place of safety.

railroad (rāl'rōd), v. t. [ME. rail¹, < road.] To hasten or push forward with railroad speed; expedite rushing; rush: as, to railroad a bill through a legislature. [Slang, U. S.]

A New York daily some time ago reported that a common thief . . . was railroaded through court in a few days.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 758.

The Allen act, that was railroaded through at the close of the last session.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVII. 37.

railroader (rāl'rō-dēr), n. A person engaged in the management or operation of a railroad or railroads; one employed in or about the running of railroad-trains or the general business of a railroad. [U. S.]

The Inter-State Commerce Commission is endeavoring to harmonise the interests of shippers and railroaders.

The Engineer, LXVI. 18.

railroading (rāl'rō-ding), n. [< railroad + -ing]. The management of or work upon a railroad or railroads; the business of constructing or operating railroads. [U. S.]

Wonders in the science of railroading that the tourist will go far to see.

Harper's Weekly, XXXIII., Supp., p. 60.

railroad-worm (rāl'rōd-worm), n. The apple-maggot (larva of Trypeta pomonella): so called because it has spread along the lines of the railroads. [New Eng.]

rail-saw (rāl'sā), n. A portable machine for sawing off railway-rails in track-laying and repairing. The most approved form clamps to the rail to be sawn, its frame carrying a reciprocating segmental saw working on a rock-shaft, which is operated by laterally extending detachable rock-levers. It has mechanism which slowly moves the saw toward the rail. A rail can be cut off by it in fifteen minutes.

rail-snipe (rāl'sniip), n. A bird of the genus Rhyncæa (or Rostratula), as R. capensis, the Cape rail-snipe, also called painted Cape snipe and golden rail.

rail-splitter (rāl'split'ēr), n. One who splits logs into rails for making a rail fence. Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States from 1861 to 1865, who in his youth had occasionally split rails, was sometimes popularly called the rail-splitter, and clubs of his partisans assumed the name Rail-splitters. [U. S.]

Yes: he had lived to shame me from my sneer,

To lame my pencil, and confute my pen;

To make me own this hind of princes peer,

This rail-splitter a true-born king of men.

Tom Taylor, Abraham Lincoln.

railway (rāl'wā), n. [< rail + way]. 1. In mech. engin., broadly, a way composed of one or more rails, or lines of rails, for the support, and commonly also for the direction of the motion, of a body carried on wheels adapted to roll on the rail or rails, or lines of rails. The wheels of railway-cars are now more usually flanged; but in railways forming parts of machines they are sometimes grooved, or they may run in grooves formed in the rails.

2. A way for the transportation of freight or passengers, or both, in which vehicles with flanged or grooved wheels are drawn or propelled on one or more lines of rails that support the wheels of the vehicles, and guide their course by the lateral pressure of the rails against the wheels; a railroad. (See railroad.) The parts of an ordinary passenger- and freight-railway proper are the road-bed, ballast, sleepers, rails, rail-chairs, spikes, switches and switch mechanism, collectively called permanent way, and the signals; but in common and accepted usage the meaning of the terms railway and railroad has been extended to include not only the permanent way, but everything necessary to its operation, as the rolling-stock and buildings, including stations, warehouses, round-houses, locomotive-shops, car-shops, and repair-shops, and also all other property of the operating company, as stocks, bonds, and other securities. Most existing railways employ steam-locomotives; but systems of propulsion by endless wire ropes or cables, by electric locomotives, and by electromotors placed on individual cars to which electricity generated by dynamos at suitable stations is supplied from electrical conductors extending along the line, or from storage-batteries carried by the cars, have recently made notable progress. Horse-railways or tramways, in which the cars are drawn by horses or mules, are also extensively used for local passenger and freight traffic; but in many places such railways are now being supplanted by electric or cable systems.

Railway.—A new iron railway has been invented in Bavaria. On an exactly horizontal surface, on this improvement, a woman, or even a child, may, with apparent ease, draw a cart loaded with more than six quintals. . . . It is proved that those iron railings are two-thirds better than the English, and only cost half as much.

Niles's Register, Jan. 26, 1822.

Abandonment of railway. See abandonment.—Aërial, Archimedean, atmospheric, centripetal, electric railway. See the adjectives.—Elevated railway, or elevated railroad. In contradistinction to surface railway, an elevated structure, in form analogous to a bridge, used in New York and elsewhere for railway purposes, to avoid obstruction of surface roadways. The elevated structures are usually made of a good quality of steel and iron, and cars are moved on them either by steam-locomotives or by cable-traction, more commonly the former. Electricity has also been applied to the propulsion of cars on elevated railways.—Inclined railway, a railway having such a steep grade that special means other than ordinary locomotive driving-wheels are necessary for drawing or propelling cars on it. The use of locomotives with gripping-wheels engaging a rail extending midway between the ordinary rails, or having a pinion engaging the teeth of a rack-rail similarly placed, is a feature of many such railways. Cables operated by a stationary engine are also used.—Marine railway. See marine.—Military railway, a railway equipped for military service. Armored locomotives, and armor-plated cars having port-holes for rifles and some of them carrying swivel-guns, are prominent features of a military railway outfit.—Pneumatic railway. (a) A railway in which cars are propelled by air-pressure behind them. In one form of pneumatic railway the cars were pushed like pistons through a tunnel by pressure of air on the rear. The system failed of practical success from the difficulties met with in the attempt to carry it out on a large scale. Also called atmospheric railway (which see, under atmospheric). (b) A railway in which cars are drawn by pneumatic locomotives. Scarcely more success has been reached in this method than in that described above.—Portable railway, or portable railroad, a light railway-track made in detachable sections, or otherwise constructed so that it may be easily taken up, carried about, and transported to a distance, for use in military operations, in constructing roads, in building operations, in making excavations, etc. The rails are frequently of wood, or of wood plated with iron.—Prismoidal railway, a railway consisting of a single continuous beam or truss supported on posts or columns. The engine and cars run astride of the beam, the former being provided with grip-wheels to obtain the hold on the track requisite for draft.—Railway brain, a term applied to certain cases developed by railway accident, in which a traumatic neurosis is believed to be of cerebral origin.—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, an English statute of 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 20) consolidating the usual statutory provisions applicable to railway corporations, enabling them to take private property, and giving them special rights or special duties.—Railway cut-off saw. See saw.—Railway post-office. See post-office.—Railway scrip. See scrip.—Railway spine, an affection of the spine resulting from concussion produced by a railway accident. See under spine.

The railway spine has taken its place in medical nomenclature. Sci. Amer., N. S., LX. 22.

Underground railway, a railway running through a continuous tunnel, as under the streets or other parts of a city; a subterranean railway.

railway-car (rāl'wā-kār), n. Any vehicle in general (the locomotive or other motor and its tender excepted) that runs on a railway, whether for the transportation of freight or of passengers.

railway-carriage (rāl'wā-kar'āj), n. A railway-car for passenger-traffic. [Eng.]

railway-chair (rāl'wā-chūr), n. Same as rail-chair.

railway-company (rāl'wā-kum'pā-ni), n. A stock company, usually organized under a charter granted by special legislative enactment, for the purpose of constructing and operating a railway, and invested with certain special powers, as well as subject to special restrictions, by the terms of its charter.

railway-crossing (rāl'wā-kros'ing), n. 1. An intersection of railway-tracks.—2. The intersection of a common roadway or highway with the track of a railway.

railway-frog (rāl'wā-frog), n. See frog 2.

railway-slide (rāl'wā-slid), n. A turn-table. [Eng.]

railway-stitch (rāl'wā-stich), n. 1. In crochet, same as tricot-stitch.—2. In embroidery, a simple stitch usually employed in white embroidery, or with floss or filoselle.—3. In worsted-work or Berlin-wool work, a kind of stitch used on leviathan canvas, large and loose, and covering the surface quickly.

railway-switch (rāl'wā-swich), n. See switch.

railway-tie (rāl'wā-ti), n. See tie.

railway-train (rāl'wā-trān), n. See train.

raim (rām), v. t. Same as ream 2.

raiment (rā'ment), n. [Early mod. E. rayment; < ME. raiment, rayment, short for arayment, later arrayment, mod. arrayment: see arrayment. Cf. ray, by aphesis for array.] That in which one is arrayed or clad; clothing; vesture; formerly sometimes, in the plural, garments. [Now only poetical or archaic.]

On my knees I beg

That you'll vouchsafe me raiment, bed, and food.

Shak., Lear, ii. 4. 158.

Truth's Angel on horseback, his raiment of white silk powdered with stars of gold.

Middleton, Triumphs of Truth.

=Syn. Clothes, dress, attire, habiliments, garb, costume, array. These words are all in current use, while raiment and vesture have a poetic or antique sound.

raimondite (rā'mon-dit), n. [Named after A. Raimondi, an Italian scientist who spent many years in exploring Peru.] A basic sulphate of iron, occurring in hexagonal tabular crystals of a yellow color.

rain (rān), v. [Early mod. E. rayne, < ME. rein, reyn, reyme, reane, regn, rien, ren, ran, < AS. regn (often contr. rēn) = OS. regan, regin = OFries. rein = D. regen = MLG. regen = OHG. regan, MHG. regen, G. regen = Icel. Sw. Dan. regn = Goth. riḡn, rain; cf. L. rigare, moisten (see irrigation), Gr. ῥιγνέω, wet (see embrocation).] 1. The descent of water in drops through the atmosphere, or the water thus falling. In general, clouds constitute the reservoir from which rain descends, but the fall of rain in very small quantities from a cloudless sky is occasionally observed. The aqueous vapor of the atmosphere, which condenses into cloud, and falls as rain, is derived from the evaporation of water, partly from land, but chiefly from the vast expanse of the ocean. At a given temperature, only a certain amount of aqueous vapor can be contained in a given volume, and when this amount is present the air is said to be saturated. If the air is then cooled below this temperature, a part of the vapor will be condensed into small drops, which, when suspended in the atmosphere, constitute clouds. Under continued cooling and condensation, the number and size of the drops increase until they begin to descend by their own weight. The largest of these, falling fastest, unite with smaller ones that they overtake, and thus drops of rain are formed whose size depends on the thickness and density of the cloud and on the distribution of electrical stress therein. Sometimes the rate of condensation is so great that the water appears to fall in sheets rather than in drops, and then the storm is popularly called a cloud-burst. It is now generally held that dynamic cooling (that is, the cooling of air by expansion, when raised in altitude, and thereby brought under diminished pressure), if not the sole cause of rain, is the only cause of any importance, and that other causes popularly appealed to—such as the intermingling of warm and cold air, contact with cold mountain-slopes, etc.—are either inoperative or relatively insignificant. The requisite ascent of air may be occasioned either by convection currents, a cyclonic circulation, or the upward deflection of horizontal currents by hills or mountains; and rain may be classified as convective, cyclonic, or orographic, according as the first, second, or third of these methods is brought into operation to produce it. The productiveness of the soil and the maintenance of life in most parts of the earth depend largely upon an adequate fall of rain. In some regions it is more or less evenly distributed throughout the year, in others it is confined to a part of the year (the rainy season), and in others still it is entirely absent, or too slight for need, according to variation of local atmospheric conditions. In a ship's log-book abbreviated r.

A muchel wind alith mid a lutel rein.

Ancren Rīde, p. 246.

Also a man that was born in thys yle told vs that they had no Rayne by the space of x months; they sow ther whete with owt Rayne.

Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 61.

2. Figuratively—(a) A fall of any substance through the atmosphere in the manner of rain, as of blossoms or of the pyrotechnic stars from rockets and other fireworks. Blood-rain is a fall of fragments of red algae or the like, raised in large quantities by the wind and afterward precipitated. Sulphur-rain or yellow rain is a similar precipitation of the pollen of fir-trees, etc. (b) A shower, downpour, or abundant outpouring of anything.

Whilist Wealth it self doth roll

J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 38.

The former and the latter rain, in Palestine, the rains of autumn and of spring; hence, rain in its due season.—The Rainst, a tract of the Atlantic ocean formerly so called. See the quotation.

Crossing toward the west, from Africa, it is now known that between about five and fifteen north latitude is a space of ocean, nearly triangular, the other limit being about twenty (long.) and ten (lat.), which used to be called by the earlier navigators the Rains, on account of the calms and almost incessant rain always found there.

Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 115.

=Syn. 1. Rain, Haze, Fog, Mist, Cloud. A cloud resting upon the earth is called mist or fog. In mist the globules are very fine, but are separately distinguishable, and have a visible motion. In fog the particles are separately indistinguishable, and there is no perceptible motion. A dry fog is composed largely of dust-particles on which the condensed vapor is too slight to occasion any sense of moisture. Haze differs from fog and cloud in the greater microscopic minuteness of its particles. It is visible only as a want of transparency of the atmosphere, and in general exhibits neither form, boundary, nor locus. Thus, among haze, fog, mist, and rain, the size of the constituent particles or globules is a discriminating characteristic, though frequently cloud merges into fog or mist, and mist into rain, by insensible gradations.

rain (rān), v. [< ME. raynen, reinen, reynen, regnen, rinen, rynen (pret. rainde, reynede, rinde; sometimes strong, ron, roon), < AS. riḡnan, rarely regnan, usually contracted riḡnan, rīḡnan (pret. rinde; rarely strong, rān), = D. regenen = MLG. regenen = OHG. reganōn, regonōn, MHG. regenen, G. regnen = Icel. regna, riḡna = Sw. regna = Dan. regne = Goth. riḡnan, rain; from the noun: see rain 1, n.] 1. Intrans. 1. To fall in drops through the air, as water: generally used impersonally.

There it reyneth not but litle in that Contree; and for that Cause they have no Watre, but zif it be of that Flood of that Ryvere.

Manderlye, Travels, p. 45.

rain² (rân), n. [Origin obscure.] 1. A ridge. Hallivell.—2. A furrow. [Prov. Eng. in both senses.]

They reaped the corn that grew in the raime to serve that turn, as the corn in the ridge was not ready. Wynne, History of the Gwedil Family, p. 87. (Encyc. Diet.)

rain³, n. An obsolete spelling of *rein*¹.

rainball (rân'bâl), n. One of the festoons of the mammato-cumulus, or pocky cloud; so called because considered to be a sign of rain. [Prov. Eng.]

rainband (rân'band), n. A dark band in the solar spectrum, situated on the red side of the D line, and caused by the absorption of that part of the spectrum by the aqueous vapor of the atmosphere. The intensity of the rainband varies with the amount of vapor in the air, and is thus of some importance as an indication of rain. Direct-vision spectroscopes of moderate dispersion are best adapted for observing it. Pocket instruments of this kind, designed for the purpose, are called rainband-spectroscopes.

At every hour, when there is sufficient light, the intensity of the rainband is observed and recorded.

Nature, XXXV. 589.

rain-bird (rân'bêrd), n. [ME. reyne-bryde; < *rain*¹ + *bird*¹.] A bird supposed to foretell rain by its cries or actions, as the rain-crow. Many birds become noisy or uneasy before rain, the popular belief having thus considerable foundation in fact. (a) The green woodpecker, Geococcyx viridis. Also rain-fowl, rain-pie. [Eng.] (b) The large ground-cuckoo of Jamaica, Saurathera vetula; also, a related cuckoo, Piaya pluvialis.

rainbow (rân'bô), n. [ME. reinbove, reinboze, renboze, < AS. regn-boga, reuboga (= OFries. reinboga = D. regenboog = MLG. regenboze, regensboze (cf. LG. water-boog) = OHG. reganbogo, MHG. regenboze, G. regenbogen = Icel. regnbogi = Sw. regnbåge = Dan. regnbue, < regn, rain, + boga, bow: see *rain*¹ and *bow*³, n.] 1. A bow, or an arc of a circle, consisting of the prismatic colors, formed by the refraction and reflection of rays of light from drops of rain or vapor, appearing in the part of the heavens opposite to the sun. When large and strongly illuminated, the rainbow presents the appearance of two concentric arches, the inner being called the primary and the outer the secondary rainbow. Each is formed of the colors of the solar spectrum, but the colors are arranged in reversed order, the red forming the exterior ring of the primary bow and the interior of the secondary. The primary bow is formed by rays of the sun that enter the upper part of falling drops of rain, and undergo two refractions and one reflection; the secondary, by rays that enter the under part of rain-drops, and undergo two refractions and two reflections. Hence, the colors of the secondary bow are fainter than those of the primary. The rainbow is regarded as a symbol of divine beneficence toward man, from its being made the token of the covenant that the earth should never again be destroyed by a flood (Gen. ix. 13-17). Smaller bows, sometimes circular and very brilliant, are often seen through masses of mist or spray, as from a waterfall or from waves about a ship. (See fog-bow.) The moon sometimes forms a bow or arch of light, more faint than that formed by the sun, and called a lunar rainbow.

Thanne ic ofe(r)-téo hefenes mid wlene. thanne bið atawed min rén boge. betwixe than folce [vel wlene]. thanne beo ic gemenede mines weddes. that ic nelle henon forth mancyn. mid wære adrenche. Old Eng. Homilies (ed. Morris), 1st ser., xxiv. 225. (Rich.)

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

Intersecting rainbows are not uncommon. They require, of course, for their production, two sources of parallel rays; and they are seen when, behind the spectator, there is a large sheet of calm water. Tait, Light, § 165.

2. In her., the representation of a half-ring divided into seven concentric narrow rings and arched upward, each end resting on a clump of clouds. To avoid the difficulty of finding seven different tinctures, the number of concentric rings is sometimes diminished to three, usually azure, or, and gules—that is, blue, gold, and red.

3. In ornith., a humming-bird of the genus Diphlogena, containing two most brilliantly plumaged species, D. iris of Bolivia, and D. hesperus of Ecuador.—4. The rainbow-fish.—Rainbowstyle, a method of calico-printing in which the colors are blended with one another at the edges.—Spurious or supernumerary rainbow, a bow always seen in connection with a fine rainbow, lying close inside the violet of the primary bow, or outside that of the secondary one. Its colors are fainter and less pure, as they proceed from the principal bow, and finally merge in the diffused white light of the primary bow, and outside the secondary.

rainbow-agate (rân'bô-ag'ät), n. An iridescent variety of agate.

rainbow-darter (rân'bô-där'têr), n. The soldier-fish or blue darter, Percichthys cæruleus, of gorgeous and varied colors, about 2½ inches long, found in the waters of the Mississippi basin; as a book-name, any species of this genus.

rainbowed (rân'bôd), a. [< rainbow + -ed.] 1. Formed by or like a rainbow.—2. Encircled with a rainbow or halo. Davies.

See him stand

Before the altar, like a rainbowed saint.

Kingsley, Saint's Tragedy, l. 3.

rainbow-fish (rân'bô-fish), n. One of several different fishes of bright or varied coloration. (a) The blue darter, Percichthys cæruleus. [U. S.] (b) A sparoid fish, Scarus or Pseudoscarus quadripinnatus. [Bermuda.]

rainbow-hued, rainbow-tinted (rân'bô-hüd, -tint'ed), a. Having hues or tints like those of a rainbow.

rainbow-quartz (rân'bô-kwärtz), n. An iridescent variety of quartz.

rainbow-trout (rân'bô-trout), n. A variety or subspecies of the Californian Salmo gairdneri, specifically called S. irideus. It is closely related to the brook-trout of Europe, but not to that of the United States. It has been quite widely distributed by pisciculturists. In the breeding season its colors are resplendent, giving rise to the popular name.

Rainbow-trout (Salmo irideus).

rainbow-worm (rân'bô-wêrm), n. A species of tetter, the herpes iris of Bateman.

rainbow-wrasse (rân'bô-ras), n. A labroid fish, Coris julis, the only British species of that genus: so called from its bright and varied colors.

rain-box (rân'boks), n. A device in a theater for producing an imitation of the sound of falling rain.

rain-chamber (rân'châm'hêr), n. An attachment to a furnace, hearth, or smelting-works in which the fumes of any metal, as lead, are partly or entirely condensed by the aid of water.

rain-chart (rân'chärt), n. A chart or map giving information in regard to the fall and distribution of rain in any part or all parts of the world. Also called rain-map.

rain-cloud (rân'kloud), n. Any cloud from which rain falls: in meteorology called nimbus. Two general classes may be distinguished—(a) cumulonimbus, where rain falls from cumulus clouds, generally in squalls or showers, and (b) strato-nimbus, where rain falls from stratus clouds. The name is sometimes especially given, in a more restricted sense, to the ragged, detached masses of cumulus (called by Poe fracto-cumulus), or to the low, torn fragments of cloud called scud, which are characteristic associates of rain-storms. See cut under cloud.

rain-crow (rân'krô), n. A tree-cuckoo of the genus Coccyzus, either C. americanus or C. erythrophthalmus: so named from its cries, often heard in lowering weather, and supposed to predict rain. [Local, U. S.]

raindeer, n. See reindeer.

rain-doctor (rân'dok'tôr), n. Same as rain-maker.

rain-door (rân'dôr), n. In Japanese houses, one of the external sliding doors or panels in a veranda which are closed in stormy weather and at night.

raindrop (rân'drop), n. [ME. raindrope (also reines drope), < AS. regndropa (= D. dim. regendropfel, regendruppel = OHG. regentropho, MHG. G. regentropfen = Sw. regndroppe = Dan. regndraabe, raindrop), < regn, rain, + dropa, drop: see *rain*¹ and drop, n.] A drop of rain.—Raindrop glass, in ceram., a glaze with very slight drop-like bosses, used for porcelain.

rainet, n. An obsolete spelling of reign.

raines¹, n. pl. An obsolete spelling of reins.

raines², n. [Also raynes, reins; < Rennes (see def.)] A kind of linen or lawn, manufactured at Rennes in France.

She should be apparelled beautifully with pure white silk, or with most fine raines.

Bale, Select Works, p. 542. (Davies.)

rainfall (rân'fâl), n. 1. A falling of rain; a shower.—2. The precipitation of water from clouds; the water, or the amount of water, coming down as rain. The rainfall is measured by means of the pluviometer or rain-gage. The average rainfall of a district includes the snow, if any, reduced to its equivalent in water.—Rainfall chart, an isohyetal chart. See isohyetal.

rain-fowl (rân'foul), n. [ME. reyn fowle; < *rain*¹ + *fowl*¹.] 1. Same as rain-bird (a). [Eng.]—2. The Australian Scythrops norghollandiæ.

rain-gage (rân'gāj), n. An instrument for collecting and measuring the amount of rainfall at a given place. Many forms have been used; their size has been a few square inches or square feet in area, and their material has been sheet-metal, porcelain, wood, or glass. The form adopted by the United States Signal Service consists of three parts—(a) a funnel-shaped receiver, having a turned brass rim 8 inches in diameter; (b) a collecting tube, made of seamless brass tubing of 2.53 inches inside diameter, making its area one tenth that of the receiving surface; and (c) a galvanized iron overflow-cylinder, which in time of snow is used alone as a snow-gage. A cedar measuring-stick is used to measure the depth of water collected in the gage. By reason of the ratio between the area of the collecting tube and that of the receiving surface, the depth of rain is one tenth that measured on the stick. See cut under pluviometer.

rain-goose (rân'gös), n. The red-throated diver or loon, Urinator or Colymbus septentrionalis, supposed to foretell rain by its cry. [Local, British.] rain-hound† (rân'hound), n. A variety of the hound. See the quotation.

Mastiffs are often mentioned in the proceedings at the Forest Courts [in England], in company with other breeds which it is not easy now to identify, such as the rain-hound, which keeps watch by itself in rainy weather. The Academy, Feb. 4, 1888, p. 71.

raininess (rân'ni-nes), n. [< rainy + -ness.] The state of being rainy.

rainless (rân'les), a. [*< rain*¹ + -less.] Without rain: as, a rainless region; a rainless zone.

rain-maker (rân'mä'kêr), n. Among superstitious races, as those of Africa, a sorcerer who pretends to have the power of producing a fall of rain by incantation or supernatural means. Also called rain-doctor.

The African chief, with his rain-makers and magicians. The Century, XL. 303.

rain-map (rân'map), n. Same as rain-chart.

rainment† (rân'ment), n. An aphetic form of arraignment.

rain-paddock (rân'pad'ok), n. The batrachian Breviceps gibbosus, of South Africa, which lives in holes in the ground and comes out in wet weather.

The red light of flitting lanterns blotched the steady rainpour. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 572.

rain-print (rân'print), n. In geol., the print of raindrops in some aqueous rocks, formed when they were in a soft state, such as may be seen on a muddy or sandy sea-beach after a heavy shower. It is possible for the geologist to tell by inspection of the prints from what direction the wind was blowing at the time of their formation.

rain-proof (rân'prüf), n. Proof against rain; not admitting the entrance of rain or penetration by it; rain-tight; water-proof in a shower.

Their old temples. . . which for long have not been rain-proof, crumble down. Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, II. 7.

rain-quail (rân'kwäl), n. The quail Coturnix coromandelicus, of Africa and India, whose migrations are related in some way to rainy seasons.

rain-storm (rân'stôrm), n. A storm of rain; a rain.

The fells sweep skyward with a fine breadth, freshened by strong breezes; clouds and sunshine, ragged rainstorms, thunder and lightning, chase across them forever. The Atlantic, LXV. 824.

rain-tight (rân'tit), a. So tight as to exclude rain.

rain-tree (rân'trê), n. The genisaro or guango, Pithecolobium saman. It is said to be so called because occasionally in South America, through the agency of cicadas which suck its juices, it sheds moisture to such an extent as to wet the ground. Another explanation is that its foliage shuts up at night, so that the rain and dew are not retained by it. See genisaro.

rain-wash (rân'wash), n. See wash.

rain-water (rân'wätêr), n. [ME. reyn water, reinwater, < *AS. regnwæter, reñwæter (= OHG. reganwazar), < regn, rain, + wæter, water: see *rain*¹ and water.] Water that has fallen from the clouds in rain, and has not sunk into the earth.

No one has a right to build his house so as to cause the rain water to fall over his neighbour's land, . . . unless he has acquired a right by a grant or prescription. Boucher, Law Dict., II. 419.

rainy (rā'nī), a. [*< late ME. rayne, < AS. reg-nig, rēnig, rainy, < regn, rēn, rain: see rain¹.] Abounding with or giving out rain; dropping with or as if with rain; showery: as, rainy weather; a rainy day or season; a rainy sky.
A continual dropping in a very rainy day.
Prov. xxvii. 15.

Both mine eyes were rainy like to his.
Shak., Tit. And., v. 1. 117.

A rainy day, figuratively, a time of greater need or of clouded fortunes; a possible time of want or misfortune in the future: as, to lay by something for a rainy day.

The man whose honest industry just gives him a competence exerts himself that he may have something against a rainy day.
Everett, Orations, I. 285.

To reysen up a rente
That longeth to my lordes duetee.

Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 90.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Raise, Lift, Erect, Elevate, Exalt, Heighten, Heave, Hoist. Raise is the most general and the most freely figurative of these words, and in its various uses represents all the rest, and also many others, as shown in the definitions. Lift is peculiar in implying the exercise of physical or mechanical force, moving the object generally a comparatively short distance upward, but breaking completely its physical contact with the place where it was. To lift a ladder is to take it wholly off the ground, if only an inch; to raise a ladder, we may lift one end and carry it up till it is supported in some way. To lift one's head or arm is a more definite and energetic act than to raise it. We lift a child over a place; we raise one that has fallen. To erect is to set up perpendicularly; as, to erect a flagstaff. To elevate is to raise relatively, generally by an amount not large; the word is often no more than a dignified synonym for raise. To exalt is to raise to dignity; the word is thus used in a physical sense in Isa. xl. 4, "Every valley shall be exalted," and elsewhere in the Bible; but the figurative or moral sense has now become the principal one, so that the other seems antique. To heighten is to increase in height, either physically or morally; he whom we esteem already is heightened in our esteem by an especially honorable act. To heave is to raise slowly and with effort, and sometimes to throw in like fashion. To hoist is to raise a thing of some weight with some degree of slowness or effort, generally with mechanical help, to a place; as, to hoist a rock, or a flag.—14. Rear, Bring up, Raise. To rear offspring through their tenderer years till they can take care of themselves; to bring up a child in the way he should go; to raise oats and other products of the soil; to raise horses and cattle. Where were you brought up? not, where were you raised? The use of raise in application to persons is a vulgarism. Rear applies only to physical care; bring up applies more to training or education in mind and manners.

II. intrans. To bring up phlegm, bile, or blood from the throat, lungs, or stomach. [Colloq.]

raise¹ (rāz), n. [raise¹, v.] 1. Something raised, elevated, or built up; an ascent; a rise; a pile; a cairn. [Prov. Eng.]

There are yet some considerable remains of stones which still go by the name of raises.

Hutchinson, Hist. Cumberland. (Halliwell.)
That exquisite drive through Ambleside, and . . . up Dunmail Raise by the little Wythburn church.
Congregationalist, July 14, 1887.

2. A raising or lifting; removal by lifting or taking away, as of obstructions. [Colloq.]

No further difficulty is anticipated in making permanent the raise of the freight blockade in this city (St. Louis).
Philadelphia Times, April 6, 1886.

3. A raising or enlarging in amount; an increase or advance: as, a raise of wages; a raise of the stakes in gaming. [Colloq.]—4. An acquisition; a getting or procuring by special effort, as of money or chattels: as, to make a raise of a hundred dollars. [Colloq.]

raise² (rāz). A dialectal (Scotch) preterit of rise.

raiser (rā'zēr), n. [raise¹ + -er]. 1. A person who raises or is occupied in raising anything, as buildings, plants, animals, etc.

A raiser of huge melons and of pine.
Tennyson, Princess, Conclusion.

The head of the Victor Verdier type [of roses] originated with the greatest of all the raisers, Lacharme, of Lyons.
The Century, XXVI. 351.

2. That which raises; a device of any kind used for raising, lifting, or elevating anything: as, a water-raiser. Specifically—(a) In carp., same as riser. (b) In a vehicle, a support or stay of wood or metal under the front seat, or some material placed under the trimmings to give them greater thickness. (c) In whale-fishing, a contrivance for raising or buoying up a dead whale.

raisin (rā'zn), n. [ME. raisin, reisin, reysyn, reysone, reysynge, a cluster of grapes, also a dried grape, raisin, = D. rozijn, rozijn = MLG. rosijn = MHG. rasin, rosine, G. rosine = Dan. rosin = Sw. russin (ML. rosina), raisin; < OF. raisin, reisin, a cluster of grapes, a grape, a dried grape (raisins de cabas, dried grapes, raisins), F. raisin, dial. rasin, roisin, rosin, grapes (un grain de raisin, a grape; raisins de caisse, raisins), = Pr. razim, rozim, razain = Cat. rahim = Sp. racimo = Pg. racimo = It. racemo (dim. racimolo), a cluster of grapes, < L. racemus, a cluster of grapes: see raceme, a doublet of raisin.] 1. A cluster of grapes; also, a grape.

Nether in the vyneyerd thou schalt gadere reysyns and greynes fallynge down, but thou schalt levee to be gaderid of pore men and pilgrims.

Wyclif, Lev. xix. 10. (Trench.)

2. A dried grape of the common Old World species, Vitis vinifera. Only certain saccharine varieties of the grape, however, thriving in special localities, are available for raisins. The larger part of ordinary large raisins are produced on a narrow tract in Mediterranean Spain. These are all sometimes classed as Malaga raisins, but this name belongs more properly to the "desert-raisins" grown about Malaga; they are also called muscatels from the variety of grape, blooms from retaining a glaucous surface, and, in part at least, raisins of the sun or sun-raisins because dried on the vine, the leaves being removed, and sometimes the cluster-stem half-severed. When packed between sheets of paper, these are known as layer raisins. Raisins suitable for cookery, or "pudding-raisins," sometimes called brins, are produced especially at Valencia. These are cured, after cutting from the vine, in the sun, or in bad weather in heated chambers, the quality in the latter case being inferior. The clusters are often dipped in potash lye to soften the skin, favor drying, and impart a gloss. Excluding the "Corinthian raisin" (see below), the next most important source of raisins is the vicinity of Smyrna, including Chesme, near Chios. Here are produced nearly all the sultanas, small seedless raisins with a golden-yellow delicate skin and sweet aromatic flavor. Raisins are also a product of Persia, of Greece, Italy, and southern France, of the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, and California. No variety of native American grape has yet been developed suitable for the preparation of raisins. See raisin-vine.

Then Abigail made haste, and took . . . an hundred clusters of raisins.
1 Sam. xxv. 18.

I must have saffron to colour the warden pies; . . . four pounds of prunes, and as many of raisins of the sun.
Shak., W. T., iv. 3. 51.

Black Smyrna raisin, a small black variety of raisin with large seeds.—Corinthian raisin, the currant, or Zante currant, the dried fruit of the variety Corinthiaca of the grape. The cluster is about three inches long, and the berry is not larger than a pea. It is produced in very large quantities in the Morea and the neighboring islands, and is consumed in baking and cookery.—Eleme raisin, a Smyrna raisin of good size and quality, hand-picked from the stem, used chiefly for ships' stores or sent to distant markets.

raising (rā'zing), n. [ME. reysynge; verbal n. of raise¹, v.] 1. The act of lifting, elevating, etc. (in any sense of the verb). Specifically—(a) An occasion on which the frame of a new building, the pieces of which have been previously prepared, but require many hands to put into place, is raised with the help of neighbors. See house-raising and raising-bee. [Rural, U. S.] (b) In metal-work, the embossing or ornamentation of sheet-metal by hammering, spinning, or stamping. (c) A method of treating hides with acids to cause them to swell and to open the pores in order to hasten the process of tanning. (d) In dyeing, the process or method of intensifying colors.

raisin-tree (rā'zn-trē), n. The common currant-shrub, Ribes rubrum, the fruit of which is often confounded with the Corinthian raisin, or currant. [Prov. Eng.]—Japanese raisin-tree, a small rhamnaceous tree, Hovenia dulcis. The peduncle of its fruit is edible.

raisin-wine (rā'zn-wīn), n. Wine manufactured from dried grapes. Malaga wine is mostly of this kind, and the Tokay of Hungary is made from partly dried fruit. Raisin-wine was known to the ancients.

raison d'être (rā-zōn' dā'tr). [F.: raison, reason; d' for de, of, for; être, being, < être, be.] Reason or excuse for being; rational cause or ground for existence.

raisonné (rā-zo-nā'), a. [F. raisonné, pp. of raisonner, reason, prove or support by reasoning, arguments, etc.: see reason¹, v.] Reasoned out; systematic; logical: occurring in English use chiefly in the phrase catalogue raisonné (which see, under catalogue).

raivel (rāvl), n. A Scotch form of ravel¹, 3.

raj (rāj), n. [Hind. rāj, rule, < Skt. √ rāj, rule. Cf. raja².] Rule; dominion. [India.]

But Delhi had fallen when these gentlemen threw their strength into the tide of revolt, and they were too late for a decisive superiority over the British rāj.
Capt. M. Thomson, Story of Cawnpore, xvi.

Raja¹, n. Same as Raia.

raja², rajah (rā'jā), n. [Hind. rāja, < Skt. rāja, the form in comp. of rājan, a king, as in mahā-rāja, great king; akin to L. rex, king (see rex); < √ rāj, rule: see regent.] In India, a prince of Hindu race ruling a territory, either independently or as a feudatory; a king; a chief: used also as a title of distinction for Hindus in some cases, without reference to sovereignty, as nabob is for Mohammedans. The power of nearly all the rajās is now subordinate to that of British officials resident at their courts. Those who retain some degree of actual sovereignty are commonly distinguished by the title maharaja (great raja).

Rajania (rā-jā-ni-ā), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1737), an adapted form of Jan-Raja (Plumier, 1703), so called after John Ray (Latinized Raius), 1628–1705, a celebrated English naturalist, founder of a natural system of classification.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants of the order Dioscoreaceae, the yam family. It is characterized by diaceous bell-shaped or flattened six-lobed flowers, with six stamens and a three-celled ovary, ripening into a flattened broad-winged and one-celled samara. The 6 species are all natives of the West Indies. They are twining vines resembling the yam, and bear alternate leaves, either halberd- or heart-shaped or linear, and small flowers in racemes. Several species are occasionally cultivated under glass. R. pleioneura, common in woods of the larger West Indies, is there called wild yam and weave-weave.

rajaship, rajahship (rā'jā-ship), n. [cf. raja² + -ship.] The dignity or principality of a raja.

Rajidā, n. pl. Same as Raidā.

Rajput, Rajpoot (raj-pōt'), n. [Hind. rajpūt, a prince, son of a raja, < Skt. rajaputra, a king's son, a prince, < rājan, a king, + putra, son.] A member of a Hindu race, divided into numerous clans, who regard themselves as descendants of the ancient Kshatriya or warrior caste. They are the ruling (though not the most numerous) race of the great region named from them Rajputana, consisting of several different states. Their hereditary profession is that of arms, and no race in India has furnished so large a number of princely families. The Rajputs are not strict adherents of Brahmanism.

rake¹ (rāk), n. [ME. rake, < AS. raca, racu, race = MD. rake, raecke, D. rake, dim. rakel = MLG. rake, LG. rake, a rake, = Sw. raka, an oven-rake, = Dan. rage, a poker; in another form, MD. reke, D. reek = LG. reek = OHG. recho, rehho, MHG. reche, G. rechen, a rake, = Icel. reka, a shovel; from the verb represented by MD. reken, OHG. rechan, rehhan, MHG. rechen, scrape together, = Goth. rikan (pret. rak), collect, heap up (cf. rakel¹, v., which depends on the noun).] 1. An implement of wood or iron, or partly of both, with teeth or tines for drawing or scraping things together, evening a surface of loose materials, etc. In its simplest form, for use by hand, it consists of a bar in which the teeth are set, and which is fixed firmly at right angles to a handle. Rakes are made in many ways for a great variety of purposes, and the a, backpiece for holding clearer-sticks; b, steel teeth; c, pawl engaged with ratchet; d, pawl disengaged from ratchet; e, trip for pawl; f, pawl acting by its gravity to disengage ratchet; g, clearer-sticks, which clear the rake when dumping; h, ratchet; i, wood axle and cap for axle and tooth-holder; j, counter-balance for pawl; k, axle; l, "hand-up," by which the driver can raise the teeth and keep them from the ground; m, trip-rod for self-dump; n, foot-lever for holding down teeth; o, trip-lever attached to trip-rod for dumping the rake. Pressure of the foot on n locks the pawls into the ratchet; g; then axle and cap trim with the wheels until the pawls automatically disengage from the ratchet by striking d, when the teeth fall back again into original position.

teeth are inserted either perpendicularly or at a greater or less inclination, according to requirement. Their most prominent uses are in agriculture and gardening, for drawing together hay or grain in the field, leveling beds, etc. For farm-work on a large scale horse-rakes of many forms are used; the above figures represent the so-called bulky-rake.

2. An instrument of similar form and use with a blade instead of teeth, either entire, as a gamblers' or a maltsters' rake, or notched so as to form teeth, as a furriers' rake. See the quotations.

The rake [for malt] . . . is an iron blade, about 30 inches long and perhaps 2 inches broad, fixed at each end by holders to a massive wood head, to which is attached a strong wood shaft, with a cross-head handle.

Ure, Dict., III. 188.

The skin is first carded with a rake, which is the blade of an old shear or piece of a scythe with large teeth notched into its edge.

Ure, Dict., IV. 380.

Clam-rake, an instrument used for collecting the seaclam, Macra solidissima.—Under-rake, a kind of oyster-rake, used mostly through holes in the ice, with handle 15 to 20 feet long, head 1 to 2 feet wide, and iron teeth 6 to 10 inches long. [Rhode Island.]

rake¹ (rāk), v.; pret. and pp. raked, ppr. raking. [ME. raken, scrape, < *AS. racian = MD. raken = MLG. raken = Icel. Sw. raka = Dan. rage, rake; from the noun: see rake¹, n. Cf. MD. reken, OHG. rechan, rehhan, MHG. rechen, scrape together, G. rechen, rake, Goth. rikan (pret. rak), collect, heap up: see rake¹, n.] I. trans. 1. To gather, clear, smooth, or stir with or as if with a rake; treat with a rake, or something that serves the same purpose: as, to rake up hay; to rake a bed in a garden; to rake the fire with a poker or raker.

They rake these coals round in the forme of a cockpit, and in the midst they cast the offenders to broyle to death.

Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 144.

Rake well the cinders, sweep the floor,
And sift the dust behind the door.

Cowper, Epistle to Robert Lloyd.

2. To collect as if by the use of a rake; gather assiduously or laboriously; draw or scrape together, up, or in.

All was rak'd up for me, your thankful brother,
That will dance merrily upon your grave.

Fletcher, Spanish Curate, l. 1.

Who had hence raked some objections against the Christians, for these things which had not authority of Scripture.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 68.

Times when chimney-corners had benches in them, where old people sat poking into the ashes of the past, and raking out traditions like live coals.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, xviii.

3. To make minute search in, as if with a rake; look over or through carefully; ransack: as, to rake all history for examples.

The statesman rakes the town to find a plot.

Swift, On Dreams.

4. To pass along with or as if with a scraping motion; impinge lightly upon in moving; hence, to pass over swiftly; scour.

Thy thunders roaring rake the skies,
Thy fatal lightning swiftly flies.
Sandy's, Paraphrase of Ps. lxxvii.
Every mast, as it passed,
Seemed to rake the passing clouds.
Longfellow, Sir Humphrey Gilbert.

5. Milit., to fire upon, as a ship, so that the shot will pass lengthwise along the deck; fire in the direction of the length of, as a file of soldiers or a parapet; enfilade.

They made divers shot through her (being but inch board), and so raked her fore and aft as they must needs kill or hurt some of the Indians.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 228.

Raking a ship is the act of cannonading a ship on the stern or head, so as that the balls shall scour the whole length of her decks; which is one of the most dangerous incidents that can happen in a naval action.

Falconer, Marine Dict. (ed. 1778).

6t. To cover with earth raked together; bury. See to rake up, below.

Whanne thi soule is went out, & thi bodi in erthe rakid, Than thi bodi that was rank & Vndeout, Of alle men is bihtid.

Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 89.

To rake hell, to search, as it were, among the damned, implying that the person or thing referred to in the context is so bad or so extreme that an equal could scarcely be found even in hell.

This man I brought to the general, assuring his excellency that if I had raked hell I could not find his match for his skill in mimicking the covenanted.

Swift, Mem. of Capt. Creighton.

To rake up. (a) To cover with material raked or scraped together; bury by overlaying with loose matter: as, to rake up a fire (to cover it with ashes, as in a fireplace).

Here, in the sands,
Thou [a corpse] I'll rake up, the post unsanctified
Of murderous lechers.

Shak., Lear, iv. 6. 281.

The Bellows whence they blowe the fire
Of raging Lust (before) whose wanton flashes
A tender breast rak't up in shamefaced ashes.

Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 2.

(b) To draw from oblivion or obscurity, as something forgotten or abandoned; bring to renewed attention; resuscitate; revive: used in a more or less opprobrious sense: as, to rake up a forgotten quarrel.

Nobody thinks any more of the late King than if he had been dead fifty years, unless it be to abuse him and to rake up all his vices and misdeeds.

Greville, Memoirs, July 16, 1830.

To rake up old claims based on a forgotten state of things, after treaty or long use had buried them, is profligate.

Woolsey, Intro. to Inter. Law, App. III., p. 438.

II. intrans. 1. To use a rake; work with a rake, especially in drawing together hay or grain.—2. To make search with or as if with a rake; seek diligently for something; pry; peer here and there.

Those who take pleasure to be all their life time raking in the Foundations of Old Abbeys and Cathedrals.

Milton, Hist. Eng., iv.

But what pleasure is it to rake into the sores or to reprove the Vices of a degenerate age?

Stillingsfleet, Sermons, II. iii.

rake² (rāk), n. [ME. rake (also raike), < AS. racu, a path (ei-racu, a river-path), from the root of rak¹: see rake¹. Cf. rake², v.] A course, way, road, or path.

the perpendicular or the horizontal, as the mast, stem, or stern of a ship, the rafters of a roof, the end of a tool, etc. See the noun.

The stern, when viewed in the sheer plan, rakes aft, the bounding line being straight, and making an obtuse angle with the line forming the boundary of the buttock.

Thearle, Naval Arch., § 107.

II. trans. To give a rake to; cause to incline or slope. [Rare.]

Every face in it [the theater] commanding the stage, and the whole so admirably raked and turned to that centre that a hand can scarcely move in the great assemblage without the movement being seen from thence.

Dickens, Uncommercial Traveller, Journey III.

rake³ (rāk), n. [< rake³, v.] 1. Inclination or slope away from a perpendicular or a horizontal line. The rake of a ship's mast is its inclination backward, or rarely (in some peculiar rigs) forward; that of its stem or its stern (the fore rake and the rake aft of the ship) is the slope inward from the upper works to the keel: also called hang. (See cut under patamar.) The rake of a roof is its pitch or slope from the eaves. The rake of a saw-tooth is the angle of inclination which a straight line drawn through the middle of the base of the tooth and its point forms with a radius also drawn through the middle of the base of the tooth; of a cutting-tool, the slope backward and downward from the edge on either side or both sides. Rake in a grinding-mill is a sloping or want of balance of the runner, producing undue pressure at one edge.

2. In coal-mining, a series of thin layers of ironstone lying so near each other that they can all be worked together. [Derbyshire, Eng.]

rake⁴ (rāk), n. [Abbr. of rakehell, ult. of rakel.] An idle, dissolute person; one who goes about in search of vicious pleasure; a libertine; an idle person of fashion.

We have now and then rakes in the habit of Roman senators, and grave politicians in the dress of rakes.

Steele, Spectator, No. 14.

I am in a fair way to be easy, were it not for a Club of Female Rakes who, under pretence of taking their innocent rambles, forsooth, and diverting the Spleen, seldom fail to plague me twice or thrice a day to Cheapside Tea, or buy a screen. . . . These Rakes are your idle Ladies of Fashion, who, having nothing to do, employ themselves in tumbling over my Ware.

Steele, Spectator, No. 236.

rake⁴ (rāk), v. i.; pret. and pp. raked, ppr. raking. [< rake⁴, n.] To play the part of a rake; lead a dissolute, debauched life; practise lewdness.

Nor rompt'd, nor rak'd, nor star'd at public places.

Shenstone, Epil. to Dodaley's Cleone.

rake-dredge (rāk'drej), n. A combined rake and dredge used for collecting specimens in natural history. It is a heavy A-shaped iron frame, to the arms of which bars of iron armed with long, thin, sharp teeth, arranged like those of a rake, are bolted back to back. A rectangular frame of round iron, supporting a deep and fine dredge-net, is placed behind the rake, to receive and retain the animals raked from the mud or sand.

rakee, n. See raki.

rake-head (rāk'hed), n. In her., a bearing representing the head of a rake, or more usually, four or five hooks or curved teeth inserted in a short rod.

rakehell (rāk'hel), a. and n. [A corruption of rakel, simulating rake¹, v., + obj. hell, as if one so bad as to be found only by raking hell, or one so reckless as to rake hell (in double allusion to the "harrowing of hell": see harrow² and harrow¹): see rakel, and cf. to rake hell, under rakel, v.] I. a. Dissolute; base; profligate.

And farre away, amid their rakehell bands,
They spide a Lady left all succourless.

Spenser, F. Q., V. xi. 44.

II. n. An abandoned fellow; a wicked wretch; especially, a dissolute fellow; a rake.

I thought it good, necessary, and my bounden duty to acquaint your goodness with the abominable, wicked, and detestable behaviour of all these rowsey, ragged rabblement of rake-hells, that under the pretence of great misery, diseases, and other innumerable calamities, which they feign through great hypocrisy, do win and gain great alms in all places where they wily wander, to the utter deluding of the good givers.

Harman, Caveat for Cursetors, p. ii.

A sort of lewd rake-hells, that care neither for God nor the devil.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 1.

A rakehell of the town, whose character is set off with no other accomplishment but excessive prodigality, profaneness, intemperance, and lust, is rewarded with a lady of great fortune to repair his own, which his vices had almost ruined.

Swift, Against Abolishing Christianity.

rakehellionian (rāk-he-lō'ni-an), n. [< rakehell + -onian, as in Babylonian, etc.] A wild, dissolute fellow; a rakehell. [Rare.]

O'er his ample sides the rambling sprays Luxuriant shoot. Thomson, Spring, l. 794.

Our home is a rambling old place, on the outskirts of a country town. The Century, XL, 278.

3. To reel; stagger. Hallucell. [Prov. Eng.] = syn. 1. Ramble, Stroll, Saunter, Roam, Wander, Range, Stray, Ramble, by derivation, also stroll and saunter, and stray when used in this sense, express a less extended course than the others. To ramble or stroll is to go about, as fancy leads, for the pleasure of being abroad. To saunter is to go along idly, and therefore slowly. One may saunter or stroll, stray or wander, along one street as far as it goes. To ramble, roam, or roam is to pursue a course that is not very straight. One may roam, roam, or wander with some briskness or for some object, as in search of a lost child. One may wander about or stray about because he has lost his way. The wild beast rambles, roams, or roams in search of prey. Roam expresses most of definite purpose: as, to roam over Europe.

ramble (ram'bl), n. [< ramble, v.] 1. A roving or wandering movement; a going or turning about irregularly or indefinitely; especially, a leisurely or sauntering walk in varying directions.

Coming home after a short Christmas ramble, I found a letter upon my table. Swift.

In the middle of a brook, whose silver ramble
Down twenty little falls, through reeds and bramble, Tracing along, it brought me to a cave. Keats, Endymion, l.

On returning from our ramble, we passed the house of the Governor. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 57.

2. A place to ramble in; a mazy walk or tract. —3. In coal-mining, thin shaly beds of stone, taken down with the coal, above which a good roof may be met with. Gresley.

Ramicornes (rä-mi-kör'nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of ramicornis: see ramicorn.] In entom., a group of hemipterous insects, having ramified antennæ. See ramose.

ramie (ram'ē), n. [Also ramee; Malay.] A plant, the so-called China grass, Bahmeria nivea, or its fiber. The plant is a perennial shrub with herbaceous shoots, native in the Malay islands, China, and Japan. It has long been cultivated in parts of the East Indies to supply fiber for fish-nets and cloths, and in China and Japan textiles of great beauty are made from this material. (See grass-cloth.) In length, thickness, and woodiness the stems most nearly resemble hemp. The fiber is unsurpassed in strength, is in an exceptional degree unaffected by moisture, in fineness rivals flax, and has a silky luster shared only by jute. The plant can be grown in any moderate climate.—In the southern United States and as far north as New Jersey, as demonstrated by experiment. Also called cambric-grass, silk-grass, and ramie-hemp; in India, rhea. See cut under Bahmeria.

ramie-fiber (ram'ē-fi bér), n. See ramie.

ramie-plant (ram'ē-plant), n. See ramie.

ramification (ram'fi-kä'shon), n. [= F. ramification = Sp. ramificación = Pg. ramificação = It. ramificazione, < ML. ramificatio(n), < ramificare, ramify: see ramify.] 1. The act or process of ramifying, or the state of being ramified; a branching out; division into branches, or into divergent lines, courses, or parts, as of trees or plants, blood-vessels, a mountain-chain, a topic or subject, etc.—2. The manner or result of ramifying or branching; that which is ramified or divided into branches; a set of branches: as, the ramification of a coral; the ramifications of an artery or a nerve; the ramifications of the capillaries, or of nerves in an insect's wing. See cuts under Dendrocaula and embryo.

Infinite vascular ramifications, . . . revealed only by the aid of the highest powers of the microscope. Is. Taylor.

3. In bot., the branching, or the manner of branching, of stems and roots.—4. One of the branches or divergent lines or parts into which anything is divided; a division or subdivision springing or derived from a main stem or source: as, the ramifications of a conspiracy; to pursue a subject in all its ramifications.

When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their nature collateral? Johnson, Eng. Dict., Pref.

5. The production of figures resembling branches.—Point of ramification, in the integral calculus, a point on the plane of imaginary quantity where two or more values of the function become equal. Also called critical point.

It is also infinitely ramified, diversified, extending everywhere, and touching everything. D. Webster, Speech, March 18, 1834.

Ramilie (ram'i-lē), n. [< Ramillies: see def.] A name given to various articles or modes of dress, in commemoration of Marlborough's victory at Ramillies in Belgium over the French under Villeroi, in 1706: chiefly used attributively. The Ramille hat was a form of cocked hat worn in the time of George I. Its peculiarity consisted in the adjustment of the hat-brim—apparently the one in which the three cocks are nearly equal in length and similar in arrangement. The Ramille wig, worn as late as the time of George III., had a long, gradually diminishing plait, called the Ramille plait or tail, with a very large bow at the top and a smaller one at the bottom.

A peculiar-shaped hat was known as the "Ramille cock." N. and Q., 6th ser., XII. 35.

While in this country, the natural hair tied in a pig-tail and powdered passed for as good as the Ramille wig and Ramille tail. S. Dorell, Taxes in England, III. 290.

ramiparous (rā-mip'ā-rus), a. [L. ramus, a branch, + parere, produce.] Producing branches.

ramisht, a. [A corruption of *ramage*¹.] Same as *ramage*¹.

Nelson, Laws Conc. Game, p. 151. (Encyc. Dict.)

Ramism (rā'mizm), n. [L. Ramus (see def.) + -ism.] The logical doctrine of Petrus Ramus, or Pierre de la Ramée (born in Picardy, 1515; massacred on St. Bartholomew's day, 1572). The doctrine was that of Aristotle, with the omission of the more difficult and metaphysical parts, and with a few additions drawn from rhetoric and from Platonic sources (such as the doctrine of dichotomy). It was characterized by simplicity and good sense, and was set forth with some literary skill. It attracted considerable attention, owing to the unbounded hostility to Aristotle professed by Ramus, and was taught for many years in the Scottish universities and at Cambridge. John Milton wrote a Ramist logic.

In England, Cambridge alone, always disposed to reject the authority of Aristotle, and generally more open to new ideas than the sister university, was a stronghold of Ramism. R. Adamson, Encyc. Brit., XIV. 803.

Ramist (rā'mist), n. and a. [F. ramiste, a Ramist, pertaining to Ramus, L. Ramus (see Ramism).] I. n. A follower of Peter Ramus. See Ramism. The main position of Ramus was that "everything that Aristotle taught was false," but there was nothing original in his writings. He introduced into logic the dilemma, which had always been taught as a part of rhetoric, to which he greatly inclined.

II. a. Pertaining to Ramus or Ramism; characterized by or characteristic of Ramism.—Ramist consonants (French consonnes ramistes), the letters j and v: so called by French writers, because Ramus was the first, in his grammatical writings, to distinguish them as consonants from the vowels i and u.

ram-line (ram'lin), n. [L. ram (i) (see ramed) + line.] 1. In ship-building, a small rope or line used for setting the frames fair, assisting in forming the sheer of the ship, or for other similar purposes.—2. In spar-making, a line used to make a straight middle line on a spar.

You feel that the whole of him (Dryden) was better than any random specimen, though of his best, seems to prove. Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 8.

Random choice, the selection of objects, subject to the condition that they shall belong to a given class or collection, but not voluntarily subject to any other condition. The assumption is that objects so selected will in the long run occur as objects of the same kind occur in general experience. This assumption is natural, it leads to no difficulty, and no serious doubt has ever been thrown upon it. It is the fundamental postulate of the theory of probability. See probability.—Random courses, in masonry and paring, courses of stones in horizontal beds, the stones being of unequal thickness, but exactly fitted together.—Random line. (a) In local probability, an infinite straight line supposed to be chosen in such a manner that the infinitesimal probability of its cutting any limited straight line is proportional to the length of the latter. (b) In United States public land-surveying, a trial line on which temporary mile and half-mile stakes are set, for the purpose of getting the data for running the same line and setting permanent stakes at the corners.—Random point, in local probability, a point supposed to be so chosen that the infinitesimal probability of its lying within any closed surface is proportional to the solid contents of that surface.—Random-range ashler, random-tooled ashler. See ashler, 3.—Random shot, a shot not intentionally directed to any point; also, a shot with the muzzle of the gun elevated above the horizontal line.—Random stonework, in masonry, a construction formed of squared stones varying in thickness and not laid in courses. See cut under ashler.—Random tooling, the act of bringing the face of a stone to a nearly smooth surface by hewing it over with a broad-pointed chisel, which produces a series of minute waves at right angles to its path. It is called droving in Scotland.—Random work, random stonework.—Random yarn, in dyeing, yarn dipped into a bath of water with a layer of color at the top, so as to produce a clouded effect; clouded yarn.

On the large scale the random yarns are coloured in machines. W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-Printing, p. 102.

II. n. Something done or produced without definite method, or with irregular or haphazard effect. (a) In masonry, one of a number of dressed stones of irregular or unmatched sizes. See random stonework, under I.

50 tons squares, 250 tons dressed randoms, and 1000 tons 2 in. ringsmall. Engineer, LXVII. 117.

(b) In dyeing, clouded yarn. See random yarn, under I. randomly (ran'dum-li), adv. [Cf. random + *-ly*².] In a random manner; at random, or without aim, purpose, or guidance.

An infusorium swims randomly about. II. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 4.

randont, n. An obsolete form of random. randont (ran'don), v. i. [Cf. OF. randonner, run swiftly, < randon, a swift course: see random.] To stray in a wild manner or at random.

Shall leave them free to randon of their will.

Norton and Sackville, Ferrex and Porrex, l. 2.

randy (ran'di), a. and n. [Also randie, ranty; < *rand*², rant, + *-y*¹. Cf. randan.] 1. a. Disorderly; boisterous; obstreperous; riotous; also, noisily wanton. [Scotch and North. Eng.]

A merry core O' randie, gangrel bodies. Burns, Jolly Beggars.

To range the woods, to roam the park.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, Conclusion.

6. To sift; pass through a range or bolting-sieve. [Obsolete or local.]

They made a decree, and took order that no come maisters that bought and sold grain should beat this mule away from their -ranging sives.

Holland, tr. of Pliny, viii. 44.

II. intrans. 1. To constitute or be parallel to a line or row; have linear course or direction; be in or form a line: as, a boundary -ranging east and west; houses -ranging evenly with the street.

Than thei rode forth and renged close that wey where as the children foughten full sore, for the Saisnes were mo than vijm¹ in a floete. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 198.

Direct my course so right as with thy hand to show

Which way thy forests range. Drayton, Polyolbion, l. 14.

The stones are of the same thickness as the walls, and the pilasters have no capitals; there is a cornice below that ranges round, which might belong to a basement.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 135.

2. To be on a level; agree in class or position; have equal rank or place; rank correspondingly.

'Tis better to be lowly born, And range with humble livers in content, Than to be perk'd up in a glistering grief, And wear a golden sorrow.

Shak., Hen. VIII., ii. 3. 20.

This was cast upon the board, When all the full-faced presence of the Gods Ranged in the halls of Peleus. Tennyson, Ænone.

3. To go in a line or course; hence, to rove freely; pass from point to point; make a course or tour; roam; wander.

Let reason range beyond his creed.

Addison.

When I briefly speak of the Greek school of art with reference to questions of delineation, I mean the entire range of the schools from Homer's days to our own.

Ruskin, Aratra Pentelici, p. 157.

In the range of historical geography, the most curious feature is the way in which certain political names have kept on an abiding life in this region, though with singular changes of meaning.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 4.

4. Extent of operating force or activity; scope or compass of efficient action; space or distance over or through which energy can be exerted; limit of effect or of capability; extent of reach: as, the range of a gun or a shot; the range of a thermometer or a barometer (the extent of its variation in any period, or of its capacity for marking degrees of change); the range of a singer or of a musical instrument. Range in shooting is the horizontal distance to which a projectile is or may be thrown by a gun or other arm under existing conditions: distinguished from trajectory, or the curvilinear distance traversed by the projectile when the arm is elevated out of a horizontal line. The effective range depends upon the amount or the absence of elevation and the consequent trajectory. (Compare point-blank.) To get the range of a point to be fired at is to ascertain, either by calculation or by experiment, or by both, the degree of elevation for the muzzle of the piece necessary to bring the shot to bear upon it.

Far as creation's ample range extends,

The scale of sensual, mental powers ascends.

Pope, Essay on Man, l. 207.

Her warbling voice, a lyre of widest range,

Struck by all passion, did fall down and glance

From tone to tone.

Tennyson, Fair Women.

No obstacle was encountered until the gunboats and transports were within range of the fort.

U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 439.

The proposal [advocating cremation] was not to be regarded as coming within the range of a practical policy.

Nineteenth Century, XXIII. 2.

5. Unobstructed distance or interval from one point or object to another; length of course for free direct ranging through the air, as of a missile or of sight; a right line of aim or of observation, absolute or relative: as, the range is too great for effective firing; the range of vision.—6. The act of ranging; a wandering or roving; movement from point to point in space.

He may take a range all the world over.

South.

7. An area or course of ranging, either in space or in time; an expanse for movement or existence; the region, sphere, or space over which any being or thing ranges or is distributed: as, the range of an animal or a plant within geographical limits or during geological time, or of a marine animal in depth; the range of Gothic architecture; the range of a man's influence.

The free bison's amplitude of range.

Whittier, The Panorama.

Specifically—(a) A tract or district of land within which domestic animals in large numbers range for subsistence; an extensive grazing-ground: used on the great plains of the United States for a tract commonly of many square miles, occupied by one or by different proprietors, and distinctively called a cattle, stock, or sheep-range. The animals on a range are usually left to take care of themselves during the whole year without shelter, excepting when periodically gathered in a "round-up" for counting and selection, and for branding when the herds of several proprietors run together. In severe winters many are lost by such exposure.

Cowboys from neighboring ranches will ride over, looking for lost horses, or seeing if their cattle have strayed off the range.

T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 500.

(b) A course for shooting at marks or targets; a space of ground appropriated or laid out for practice in the use of firearms: distinctively called a rifle-range or shooting-range.

8. A fire-grate.

He was bid at his first coming to take off the range, and let down the cinders.

Sir R. L'Etrange, (Latham.)

9. A cooking-stove built into a fireplace, or sometimes portable but of a similar shape, having a row or rows of openings on the top for carrying on several operations at once. Fixed ranges usually have two ovens, either on each side of the fire-chamber or above it at the back, and in houses supplied with running water a hot-water reservoir or permanent boiler. The origin of the modern cooking-range may be sought in the furnaces of masonry of the ancient Romans, arranged to receive cooking-utensils on the top. Throughout the middle ages only open-chimney fires were used, until in France, in the course of the fourteenth century, built furnaces with openings above for pots began to be added in great kitchens, for convenience in preparing the soups and sauces then in greater favor than before. The range in the modern sense, involving the application of heat conducted by and reflected from iron plates, was first advanced and practically improved by Count Rumford.

It [the kitchen] was a vault ybuilt for great dispence, With many ranges reard along the wall,

And one great chimney, whose long tonnell thence

The smoke forth threw.

Spenser, F. Q., II. ix. 29.

Every thing wherupon any part of their carcase falleth shall be unclean; whether it be oven, or ranges for pots, they shall be broken down.

Lev. xl. 35.

And so home, where I found all clean, and the hearth and range, as it is now enlarged, both up.

Pepys, Diary, May 25, 1661.

10. A step of a ladder; a round; a rung. [Obsolete or local.]

The first range of that ladder which should serve to mount over all their customs.

Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

11. Naut.: (a) A large cleat with two arms or branches, bolted in the waist of ships to belay the tacks and sheets to. (b) A certain quantity of cable hauled up on deck from the chain-locker, of a length slightly greater than the depth of water, in order that the anchor, when let go, may reach the bottom without being checked.—12. In shoemaking, a strip cut from a butt or side of sole-leather.

The butt is first cut into long strips known as ranges, of varying width according to the purposes for which required.

Cre, Dict., IV. 110.

13. A bolting-sieve for meal. Cotgrave; Hall's well. [Old and prov. Eng.]—Battle-range. See battle.—Broken-range stonework, range stonework in which thicker or thinner stones are occasionally inserted, thus breaking the uniformity. Compare random stonework, under random.—Constituent of a range. See constituent.—Double-oven range, a range which has two ovens, one on each side of the fire-pot.—Point-blank range. See point-blank.—Random-range ashler. See ashler.

—Range curve. See curve.—Range stonework, masonry laid in courses. The courses may vary in height, but in each a level joint is preserved.—Single-oven range, a range having but one oven, usually at one side of the fire-pot: in contradistinction to double-oven range.

—To get the range of anything, to find by experiment and calculation the exact angle of elevation of the gun, the amount of charge, etc., necessary to throw projectiles so as to strike the object aimed at.—Syn. 1. Line, tier, file.—4. Sweep, reach.

rangé (rān-zhā'), n. [F., pp. of ranger, range, order: see range, r.] In her., arranged in order: said of small bearings set in a row fessewise, or the like. The epithet is not often needed: thus, "six mullets in bend or bendwise" is sufficient without the use of the expression "rangé in bend."

range-finder (rānj'fin'dér), n. One of various kinds of instruments for ascertaining by sight the range of an object from the point of observation.

range-heads (rānj'hedz), n. pl. Naut., the windlass-bitts.

range-lights (rānj'lits), n. pl. 1. Two or more lights, generally in lighthouses, so placed that when kept in line a fair course can be made through a channel: where two channels meet, the bringing of two range-lights into line serves to mark the turning-point into the new channel.

—2. Lights placed aboard ship at a considerable horizontal distance from each other, and in the same vertical plane with the keel. They are used to give a better indication of changes of course to approaching vessels than is afforded by the ordinary side and steaming lights.

rangement (rānj'ment), n. [OF. rangement, < renger, ranger, range: see range, r.] The act of ranging; arrangement.

Lodgement, rangement, and adjustment of our other ideas.

Waterland, Works, IV. 408.

ranger (rānj'jér), n. [Early mod. E. also ranger; < range + *-er*¹. Cf. F. rangeur, one who arranges.] 1. One who ranges, or roams, or roves about; especially, one engaged in ranging or going about for some specific purpose, as search or ward.

O where are all my rangers bold,
That I pay meat and fee
To search the forest far an' wide?

Young Akin (Child's Ballads, I. 186).

Thus fare the shivering natives of the north,
And thus the rangers of the western world.

Cowper, Task, l. 618.

Specifically—2. In England, formerly, a sworn officer of a forest, appointed by the king's letters patent, whose business it was to walk through the forest, watch the deer, prevent trespasses, etc.; now, merely a government official connected with a royal forest or park.

They [wolves] walke not widely as they were wont,
For feare of raungers and the great hunt.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., September.

The Queen, they say, is by no means delighted at her elevation. She likes quiet and retirement and busy (of which the King has made her ranger), and does not want to be a queen.

Greville, Memoirs, July 18, 1830.

3. One of a body of regular or irregular troops, or other armed men, employed in ranging over a region, either for its protection or as marauders: as, the Texan rangers. Military rangers are generally mounted, but may fight on foot if occasion requires. The name is sometimes used in the plural for a permanent body of troops, as the Connaught Rangers in the British army.

"Do you know, friend," said the scout gravely, . . . "that this is a band of rangers chosen for the most desperate service?"

J. F. Cooper, Last of Mohicans, xxxii.

A famous Texan Ranger, who had come out of the Mexican war with a few scars and many honors.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 196.

4. One who roves for plunder; a robber. [Rare.]

—5. A dog that beats the ground.—6. A sieve.

Holland.—7. A kind of fish. See the quotation.

[At Gibraltar] the Sp. besugo, a kind of sea-bream, is called in English ranger, which word, as the name of a fish, I cannot find in any book.

N. and Q., 7th ser., IV. 278.

8. A kind of seal, probably the young bay-seal. [Newfoundland.]—Partizan ranger. See partizan.

rangerine (rānj'jér-in), a. Same as rangiferine.

Rangifer tarandus (Gray), the name usually given to the Old World species of rangerine deer, of which the American woodland and barren ground caribou are believed to be mere varieties.

Amer. Cyc., XIV. 265.

rangership (rân'jêr-shîp), n. [< ranger + -ship.] The office of ranger or keeper of a forest or park. Todd.

range-stove (rân'jêr-stôv), n. A cooking-stove made like a range; a portable range.

range-table (rân'jêr-tâ'bl), n. A table for a particular firearm containing the range and the time of flight for every elevation, charge of powder, and kind of projectile.

Rangia (rân'jî-â), n. [NL., named after Rang, a French conchologist.] 1. In conch., the typical genus of Rangidae. The R. cyrenoides is common in the States bordering on the Gulf of Mexico. Also called Gnathodon. Des Moulins, 1832.

2. In Actinoptera, a genus of etenophorous aculephs, ranking as the type of a family. Agassiz, 1860.

Rangifer (rân'jî-fêr), n. [NL. (Hamilton Smith), perhaps accom. < OF. rangier, ranger, rancher, ranglier, a reindeer (appar. < Icel. hrinn = OSw. ren, reindeer), + L. fera, a wild beast.] A genus of Cervidae, containing arctic and subarctic species with large irregularly branching horns in both sexes, the brow-antler of which is highly developed, usually unsymmetrical, and more or less palmate, and very broad spreading hoofs; the reindeer. See cuts under reindeer and caribou.

rangiferine (rân'jî-fêr-in), a. [< Rangifer + -ine.] Belonging or relating to the genus Rangifer; resembling a reindeer. Also rangerine.

Rangidae (rân'jî-i-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Rangia + -idae.] 1. A family of bivalves, typified by the genus Rangia. The animal has short siphons connected at the base, a large linguiform foot, long palpi, and two pairs of gills, of which the outer is narrow and appendiculate. The shell is equivalve with salient umbones, and the hinge has two cardinal teeth and anterior and posterior lateral teeth in each valve, as well as an internal median fossa and cartilage.

2. A family of eurytomatous etenophorans, represented by the genus Rangia. It was based on an African species, and characterized by the deep indentation between the rows of locomotive flappers and a tentacle projecting from the angle of each indentation.

ranging-rod (rân'jîng-rod), n. A surveyors' rod or pole.

Rangoon creeper. See Quisqualis.

Rangoon tar. See tar.

rangy (rân'jî), a. [< range + -y.] 1. In stock-breeding, adapted for ranging or running about, or indicating such adaptation; quick or easy in movement; of roving character or capability: as, a rangy yoke of oxen (that is, good travelers, capable of making good speed, as in plowing); rangy steers (that is, steers disposed to wander away to a distance, as on a stock-range). The word is also sometimes applied to a roving person, as a lad who wanders from home, or who has a predilection for a roving life, as that of a sailor. [U. S.]

The ponies . . . used for the circle-riding in the morning have need rather to be strong and rangy.

T. Roosevelt, Hunting Trips, I.

2. Having or permitting range or scope; roomy; commodious. [U. S.]

A large rangy shed for the horses.

Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 452.

rani, ranee (rân'î), n. [Also rany, rannee, ranny; < Hind. rânî, < Skt. rājñi, queen, fem. of rāja; see raja.] In India, the wife of a raja, or a reigning princess; a queen.

Raniceps (rân'î-seps), n. [NL., < L. rana, a frog, + caput, head.] 1. In ichth., a Cuvierian Tadpole-hake (Raniceps raninus).

genus of gadoid fishes, typical of the family Ranicipitidae. R. raninus is known as the tadpole-hake.—2. In herpet., a genus of fossil labyrinthodont amphibians of the Carboniferous.

Ranicipitidae (rân'î-sî-pî-tî-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Raniceps (Ranicipit) + -idae.] A family of gadoid fishes, represented by the genus Raniceps. Their characters are mostly shared with the Gadidae, but the suborbital chain is enlarged and continued backward over the operculum, the suspensorium of the lower jaw is very oblique, and the pyloric caeca are rudimentary or reduced to two.

Ranidae (rân'î-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Rana + -idae.] A family of firmisternal salient amphibians, typified by the genus Rana, with premaxillary and maxillary teeth, subcylindrical sacral diapophyses and precoracoids, and with omosternum; the frog family. It is the most extensive family of batrachians, about 250 species, of several genera, being known. See frog, and cuts under omosternum and Rana.

raniform (rân'î-fôrm), a. [< NL. raniformis, < L. rana, a frog, + forma, form.] Frog-like; resembling or related to a frog; belonging to the Raniformes; ranine; distinguished from bufoniform.

Raniformes (rân'î-fôrm'êz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of raniformis: see raniform.] A division of batrachians, including the true frogs: distinguished from Bufoniformes.

Ranina (rân'î-nâ), n. [NL. (Lamarck, 1801), fem. sing. of raninus: see ranine.] In Crustacea, the typical genus of Raninidae, containing such frog-crabs as R. dorsipeda.

Ranina (rân'î-nâ), n. pl. [NL., < Rana + -ina.] In Günther's classification, a division of oxydactyl opisthoglossate batrachians, containing 6 families of frogs.

Raninæ (rân'î-nê), n. pl. [NL., < Rana + -inæ.] The true frogs as a subfamily of batrachians, corresponding to the family Ranidae.

ranine (rân'î-nî), a. [< F. ranin. < NL. raninus, < L. rana, a frog; see Rana.] 1. In herpet., pertaining to frogs; related or belonging to the Ranidae; raniform.—2. In anat., pertaining to the under side of the tip of the tongue, where a tumor called a ranula is sometimes formed. The ranine artery is the termination of the lingual artery, running to the tip of the tongue; it is accompanied by the ranine vein.

raninian (rân'î-nî-an), a. and n. [< ranine + -an.] 1. A pertaining to the Raninidae.

II. n. A crab of the family Raninidae.

Raninidae (rân'î-nî-dê), n. pl. [NL., < Raninal + -idae.] A family of anomalous crustaceans, typified by the genus Ranina. They have a smooth ovate-oblong carapace, the last pair of legs reduced and subdorsal, and the abdomen short, partially extended, and not folded under the thorax. The species are almost entirely confined to the tropics. See cut under Raninal.

raninoid (rân'î-nî-oid), a. Pertaining to the Raninoidea; raninian.

Raninoidea (rân'î-nî-oid'ê-â), n. pl. [NL., < Raninal + -oidea.] A superfamily of anomalous crustaceans, represented by the raninians.

ranite (rân'î-tî), n. [< Icel. Rân, a giant goddess, queen of the sea, + -ite.] A hydrated silicate of aluminium and sodium, derived from the alteration of elcolite; it occurs in southern Norway, and is essentially the same as hydronephelinite.

ranivorous (rân'î-vî'ô-rus), a. [< L. rana, a frog, + vorare, devour.] Frog-eating; subsisting habitually or chiefly upon frogs: as, the marsh-hawk is ranivorous.

rank (rangk), a. [< ME. rank, ranc, ronc, ranc, ranc, strong, proud, also rancid (influenced by OF. rance, ranci, rancid: see rancid); < AS. ranc, proud, forward, arrogant, showy, bold, valiant, = D. rantipole (ran'ti-pól), v. i.; pret. and pp. rantipoled, ppr. rantipoling. [< rantipole, n.] To run about wildly.

The elder was a termagant, imperious wench; she used to rantipole about the house, pinch the children, kick the servants, and torture the cats and dogs.
Arbuthnot.

rantism¹ (ran'tizm), n. [< Gr. παντισμός, a sprinkling, < παντιζειν, sprinkle, besprinkle.] A sprinkling; hence, a small number; a handful. [Rare.]

We, but a handful to their heap, a rantism to their baptism.
Bp. Andrews.

rantism² (ran'tizm), n. [< rant + -ism.] The practice or tenets of the Ranters; rantism. Johnson.

rantle-tree, randle-tree (ran'tl-trē, -dl-trē), n. [Cf. roan-tree, a dial. form of roan-tree; cf. also ranpick, rampick.] 1. A tree chosen with two branches, which are cut short, and left somewhat in the form of the letter Y, set close to or built into the gable of a cottage to support one end of the roof-tree.—2. A beam which runs from back to front of a chimney, and from which the crook is suspended.—3. Figuratively, a tall, raw-boned person.

If ever I see that auld randle-tree of a wife again, I'll gie her something to buy tobacco.

Scott, Guy Mannering, xxvi.

[Scotch in all uses.] rantock (ran'tok), n. The goosander, Mergus merganser. [Orkneys.]

ran-tree (ran'trē), n. A dialectal variant of roan-tree. Also rantry.

ranty (ran'ti), a. and n. [< rant + -y.] Same as randy. [Prov. Eng.]

ranula (ran'ū-lā), n.; pl. ranulae (-lē). [= F. ranule, < L. ranula, a little frog, also a small swelling on the tongue of cattle, dim. of rana, a frog: see Rana.] A cystic tumor caused by the obstruction of the duct of a small mucous gland on the under surface of the tongue, the so-called Blandin-Nuhn gland. The term has been applied, however, with considerable looseness, to other tumors in or near this place presenting some resemblance to true ranula.

ranular (ran'ū-lār), a. [= F. ranulaire; as ranula + -ar.] Of or pertaining to a ranula; of the character of a ranula.

Ranunculaceæ (rā-nung-kū-lā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1789), < Ranunculus + -aceæ.] An order of polypetalous plants of the cohort Ranales, characterized by the numerous stamens inserted on the receptacle, five deciduous and commonly colored sepals, not more than one complete circle of petals, and seeds with a minute embryo in fleshy albumen, and without an aril. They have usually many separate pistils which mature into distinct dry fruits, either achenes or follicles, or coalesce into berries. The species, estimated by some at 1,200, by Durand at 680, are included in 5 tribes and 80 genera. They occur throughout the world, but in the tropics more rarely and chiefly on mountains, elsewhere forming a conspicuous part of the flora of almost every region, especially in Europe, which contains one fifth, and in North America, which has one seventeenth, of all the species. Their wide distribution is aided by the long-continued vitality of the seeds, many of which are also remarkably slow to germinate after planting, those of several species requiring two years. They are annual or perennial herbs—rarely undershrubs, as Xanthorhiza. Many have dissected alternate or radical leaves, the petiole with an expanded sheathing base, but without stipules; Clematis is exceptional in its opposite leaves and climbing stem. The order is often known as the buttercup or crow-foot family, from the type, and contains an unusually large proportion of other characteristic plants, as the hepatica of America, the Christmas rose of Germany, and the lesser celandine of England. It includes also many of the most beautiful flowers of garden cultivation. Most of the species contain in their colorless juice an acrid and caustic principle, which sometimes becomes a dangerous narcotic poison, is often of great medicinal value (see hellebore, aconite, Hydrastis, Actæa, Cimicifuga), is usually most concentrated in the roots, but very volatile in the foliage and stems, and is dissipated by drying or in water, but intensified by the action of acids, alcohol, etc. The order was one of the earliest to be defined by botanists with substantially its present limits (as Mutisiales by Linnaeus, 1751), and has long been placed at the head of the polypetalous families of dicotyledons, standing as the first order of plants in the most widely accepted classifications, from De Candolle in 1819 to Durand in 1888.

ranunculaceous (rā-nung-kū-lā'shius), a. [< NL. ranunculaceus, < Ranunculus, q. v. Cf. Ranunculaceæ.] Of or pertaining to the Ranunculaceæ; resembling the ranunculus.

Ranunculæ (rā-nung-kū-lē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1818), < Ranunculus + -æ.] A tribe of plants of the order Ranunculaceæ. It is characterized by carpels with one ascending ovule, becoming achenes in fruit, by numerous radical leaves, and (excepting in the two species of Oxygraphis) by the additional presence of alternate stem-leaves. It includes the type genus Ranunculus, and 3 other genera embracing 8 species.

Ranunculus (rā-nung-kū-lus), n. [NL. (Kaspar Bauhin, 1623), < L. ranunculus, a medicinal plant, also called batrachion, perhaps crowfoot (> It. ranuncolo, Sp. ranunculo, Pg. ranunculo, D. ranonkel, G. Dan. Sw. ranunkel, crowfoot), dim. of rana, a frog: see Rana.] 1. A large genus of polypetalous plants, type of the order Ranunculaceæ and of the tribe Ranunculæ. It is characterized by the perfect flowers with from three to five caducous sepals, three to five or even fifteen conspicuous petals, each marked at the base by a nectar-bearing scale or pit, and by the many achenes in a head or spike, each beaked with a short persistent style. There are about 200 species, scattered throughout the world, abundant in temperate and cold regions, with a few on mountain-tops in the tropics; 15 species are British, and about 47 occur in the United States, besides at least 9 others in Alaska; 23 are found in the Atlantic States. The genus is remarkable for its development northward, extending to the Aleutian Islands and Point Barrow, and even to Fort Conger, 81° 44' north. Others extend well to the south, as the Fuegian R. bitermatus. The species have usually a perennial base or rootstock, and bear deeply divided leaves, entire in a few species, and yellow or white terminal flowers (pink in R. Andersoni of Nevada), which are generally bright and showy, and have numerous and conspicuous short yellow stamens and a smaller central mass of yellow or greenish pistils. The more common species, with bright-yellow flowers and palmately divided leaves, are known as buttercup and crowfoot, especially R. acris and R. bulbosus, which have also the old local names of butter-flower, butter-daisy, blister-plant, crow-flower, and in Scotland yellow gowan. (See also goldcup, and cut under oary.) A number of yellow species are cultivated under the name garden ranunculus, as R. speciosus, a favorite source of cut flowers, and especially the Persian R. asiaticus, with three-parted leaves, parent of a hundred varieties, mostly double, and including scarlet and other colors. R. acrifolius, a tall European species with five-parted leaves, is cultivated in white double-flowered varieties under the names bachelor's-buttons and fair-maid-of-France or -of-Kent. The bright-yellow flowers of R. insignis, a densely woolly New Zealand species, are nearly 2 inches across. Several white-flowered species are remarkable for their growth in rock-crevices amid perpetual snow, especially R. glacialis of the Alps, and also the yellow-flowered R. Thora, the mountain wolf's-bane. A few weedy species have prickly fruit, as R. arvensis of England (for which see hungeweed, hedjehog, 3, and joy, 4). Many species are so acrid as to raise blisters when freshly gathered, but are sometimes eaten, when dried, by cattle. R. sceleratus, said to be the most acrid species, is eaten boiled as a salad in Wallachia, as are also the roots of R. bulbosus, the acridity disappearing on boiling. R. auricomus (see goldlocks) is exceptional in the absence of this acrid principle, as also R. aquatilis, which sometimes forms almost the entire food of cattle. This and several other species, the water-crowfoots, are immersed aquatics with finely dissected foliage, forming deep-green feathery masses which bear white emersed flowers; among them is R. Lyallii of New Zealand, one of the most ornamental species, there known as water-lily. The yellow water-crowfoot, R. multifidus, found from North Carolina to Point Barrow, has kidney-shaped and cut-floating leaves. Several species with long and mainly undivided leaves are known as spearwort. For R. Ficaria, celebrated as one of the earliest English flowers, and as Wardsworth's flower, see celandine, 2, pilewort, and figwort. 2. See also cut under achenium.

2. [l. c.; pl. ranunculi (-li).] A plant of the genus Ranunculus.

ranverset, v. t. See reverse.

Ranvier's nodes. See nodes of Ranvier, under node.

Ranzania (ran-zā'ni-ā), n. [NL., named (in def. 1 by Nardo, 1840) after C. Ranzani, an Italian naturalist.] 1. In ichth., a genus of gymnodont fishes of the family Molidae.—2. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

ranz des vaches (rons dā vāsh). [Swiss F. (see def.), explained as lit. (a) 'the lowing of the cows': Swiss dial. ranz, connected, in this view, with G. ranzen, make a noise, drum with the fingers (cf. ranken, bray as an ass); des, comp. of de, of, and les, pl. of def. art.; vaches, pl. of vache, < L. vacca, a cow (see vac-cine); (b) in another view, 'the line of cows,' ranz being taken as a var. of rangs, pl. of rang, row, line (because the cows fall into line when they hear the alpenhorn): see *rank*².] One of the melodies or signals of the Swiss herdsmen, commonly played on the alpenhorn. It consists of irregular phrases made up of the harmonic tones of the horn, which are singularly effective in the open air and combined with mountain echoes. The melodies vary in the different cantons. They are sometimes sung.

Raoulia (rā-ō'li-ā), n. [NL. (Sir J. D. Hooker, 1867), named after E. Raoul, a French naval surgeon, who wrote on New Zealand plants in 1846.] A genus of composite plants of the tribe Inuloideæ and subtribe Gnaphaliæ. It is characterized by the solitary, sessile, and terminal heads of many flowers, which are mostly perfect and fertile, the outer circles of pistillate flowers being only one or two, or less than in the related genus Gnaphalium (the everlasting), but more than in the other next-allied genus, Helichrysum. All the flowers bear a bifid style and a pappus which is not plumose. The 14 species are mostly natives of New Zealand, and are small densely tufted plants of rocky mountainous places, resembling mosses, with numerous branches thickly clothed with minute leaves. They bear white starry flower-heads, one at the end of each short twig, closely surrounded with leaves, and in R. grandiflora and others ornamented by an involucre with white bracts. R. eximia and R. mammillaris are known in New Zealand as sheep-plants, from their growth in sheep-pastures in large white woolly tufts, readily mistaken for sheep even at a short distance.

rap¹ (rap), v.; pret. and pp. rapped or rapt, ppr. rapping. [< ME. rappen, < Sw. rappa, strike, beat, rap; cf. *rap*¹, n. Cf. MHG. freq. raffeln, G. rappeln, intr., rattle. Perhaps connected with *rap*².] I. trans. 1. To beat upon; strike heavily or smartly; give a quick, sharp blow to, as with the fist, a door-knocker, a stick, or the like; knock upon.

His hote newe chosen love he chaunged into hate,
And sodainly with myghty mace gan rap hir on the pate.
Gaucounge, In Praise of Lady Sandes.

With one great Peal they rap the Door,
Like Footmen on a Visiting Day.

Prior, The Dove, st. 9.

2. To use in striking; make a blow or blows with. [Rare.]

Dunstan, as he went along through the gathering mist, was always rapping his whip somewhere.

George Eliot, Silas Marner, IV.

3. To utter sharply; speak out: usually with out (see phrase below).

One *rap*s an oath, another deals a curse;
He never better bow'd; this never worse.
Quarles, Emblemas, i. 10.

To rap out. (a) To throw out violently or suddenly in speech; utter in a forcible or striking manner: as, to rap out an oath or a lie.

He could roundlie rap out so manie vgle othes.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 57.

The first was a judge, who rapped out a great oath at his footman.
Addison, Freeholder, No. 44.

(b) To produce or indicate by rapping sounds; impart by a series of significant raps: as, to rap out a communication or a signal: used specifically of the supposed transmission of spiritual intelligence in this way through the instrumentality of mediums. = Syn. 1. To thump, whack.

II. intrans. 1†. To deal a heavy blow or heavy blows; beat.

The elementes goume to rusche & rappe,
And smet downe churches & templis with crak.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 206.

2†. To fall with a stroke or blow; drop so as to strike.

Now, by this time the tears were raping down Upon her milk-white breast, aneth her gown.
Ross, Helenore, p. 70. (Jamieson.)

3. To strike a quick, sharp blow; make a sound by knocking, as on a door: as, to rap for admittance.

Villain, I say, knock me at this gate,
And rap me well. Shak., T. of the S., i. 2. 12.
When she cam to the king's court,
She rapit w' a ring.
Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 397).

Comes a dun in the morning and *rap*s at my door.
Shenstone, Poet and Dun.

4. To take an oath; swear; especially, to swear falsely: compare to rap out (a), above. [Thieves' cant.]

It was his constant maxim that he was a pitiful fellow who would stick at a little raping for his friend.
Fielding, Jonathan Wild, i. 13. (Davies.)

*rap*¹ (rap), n. [< ME. rap, rappe = Sw. Norw. rapp = Dan. rap, rap, smart blow; cf. rap¹, v.] 1. A heavy or quick, smart blow; a sharp or resounding knock; concussion from striking.

The right arme with a rappe reft fro the shuldurs.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 7680.

And therewith (as in great anger) he clapped his fyste on the borde a great rappe.
Hall, Edw. V.

Bolus arriv'd, and gave a doubtful tap,
Between a single and a double rap.
Colman the Younger, Broad Grins, The Newcastle Apothecary.

2. A sound produced by knocking, as at a door, or by any sharp concussion; specifically, in modern spiritualism, a ticking or knocking noise produced by no apparent physical means, and ascribed to the agency of disembodied spirits.

We may first take the raps and the "astral bells," which Mr. Sinnett seems to regard as constituting important test phenomena.
R. Hodgson, Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 261.

*rap*² (rap), v. t.: pret. and pp. rapped or rapit, ppr. raping. [< ME. rappen, < Sw. rapp, snatch, seize, carry off, = MHG. G. raffen, snatch; dial. (L.G.) rappen, snatch up, take up (> ult. E. raff).] Cf. rape¹ and rape². The pp. rapped, rapit, became confused with rapit, < L. raptus, pp. of rapere, snatch, which is not connected with the Teut. word: see rapit, rapit².] 1†. To snatch or hurry away; seize by violence; carry off; transport; ravish.

Some shall be rapit and taken alive, as St. Paul saith.
Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

Think ye that . . . they will not pluck from you whatsoever they can or reave?
Apostolic Benediction of Adrian VI., Nov. 25, 1522 (Foxe's Martyrs, II. 59).

He ever hastens to the end, and so (As if he knew it) *rap*s his hearer to
The middle of his matter.

B. Jonson, tr. of Horace's Art of Poetry.
But when these people grew niggardly in their offerings, it [the room] was rapit from thence.

Sandys, Travailes, p. 160.
Rapt in a chariot drawn by fiery steeds.
Milton, P. L., III. 522.

2. To transport out of one's self; affect with ecstasy or rapture; carry away; absorb; engross.

What, dear sir,
Thus *rap*s you? Are you well?
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 51.
I found thee weeping, and . . .
Am rapit with joy to see my Marcia's tears.
Addison, Cato, iv. 3.
Rapt into future times, the bard begun.
Pope, Messiah, i. 7.

To rap and rend (originally to rape and ren: see rape²), to seize and strip; fall on and plunder; snatch by violence.

All they could rap, and rend, and pilfer,
To scraps and ends of gold and silver.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. ii. 789.
From foe and from friend
He'd rap and he'd rend, . . .
That Holy Church might have more to spend.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 206.

*rap*³ (rap), v. t.: pret. and pp. rapped, ppr. raping. [Also rape: prob. due in part to rap¹, but in part representing ME. repen, < AS. hrepian, touch, treat, = OFries. reppa, touch, move, = MD. reppen, move, = LG. reppen, touch, move, > G. rappen, scrape, = Ice. hreppa, catch, obtain, = Sw. repa, scratch. Cf. rape⁶.] To scratch. Hallucell, [Prov. Eng.]

*rap*⁴ (rap), n. [Perhaps a particular use of rap¹. There is nothing to connect the word with MHG. G. rappe, a coin so called: see rape².] A counterfeit coin of bad metal which passed current in Ireland for a halfpenny in the reign of George I., before the issue of Wood's halfpence. Its intrinsic value was half a farthing. Hence the phrases not worth a rap, to care not a rap, implying something of no value.

It having been many years since copper halfpence or farthings were last coined in this Kingdom, they have been for some time very scarce, and many counterfeits passed about under the name of raps.

Swift, Draper's Letters, letter i.
They [his pockets] was turned out afore, and the devil a rap's left.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, i. 76.

I don't care a rap where I go.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 201.

Rap halfpenny, a rap.
It is not of very great moment to me that I am now and then imposed on by a rap halfpenny.
Blackwood's Mag., XCVI. 392.

*rap*⁵, n. A Middle English form of rope.
*rap*⁶, n. A Middle English preterit of reap.
Wyclif.

*rap*⁷ (rap), n. [Origin obscure.] A lay or skein of yarn containing 120 yards. E. H. Knight.

Rapaces (rā-pā'sez), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. rapax, rapacious: see rapacious.] 1. In mammal, the beasts of prey; carnivorous quadrupeds; the Carnivora, now called Feræ. Also Rapacia.—2. In ornith., the birds of prey; rapacious birds; the Accipitres or Raptores.

Rapacia (rā-pā'shi-ā), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. rapax: see Rapaces.] Rapacious mammals; beasts of prey: synonymous with Rapaces, 1.

rapacious (rā-pā'shus), a. [= F. rapace = Pr. rapatz = Sp. rapaz = It. rapace, < L. rapax (rapac-), rapacious, < rapere, seize: see rape².] 1. Of a grasping habit or disposition; given to seizing for plunder or the satisfaction of greed, or obtaining wrongfully or by extortion; predatory; extortionate: as, a rapacious usurer; specifically, of animals, subsisting by capture of living prey; raptorial; predaceous: as, rapacious birds or fishes.

What trench can intercept, what fort withstand
The brutal soldier's rude rapacious hand.
Rouse, tr. of Lucan's Pharsalia, vii.

A rapacious man he [Warren Hastings] certainly was not. Had he been so, he would infallibly have returned to his country the richest subject in Europe.

Macaulay, Warren Hastings.
2. Of a grasping nature or character; characterized by rapacity; immoderately exacting; extortionate: as, a rapacious disposition; rapacious demands.

Well may then thy Lord, appeased,
Redeem thee quite from Death's rapacious claim.
Milton, P. L., xi. 258.

There are two sorts of avarice: the one is but of a bastard kind, and that is the rapacious appetite of gain.

Cowley, Avarice.
= Syn. 1. Rapacious, Ravenous, Voracious. Rapacious, literally disposed to seize, may note, as the others do not, a distinctive characteristic of certain classes of animals: the tiger is a rapacious animal, but often not ravenous or voracious. Ravenous implies hunger of an extreme sort, shown in eagerness to eat. Voracious means that one eats or is disposed to eat a great deal, without reference to the degree of hunger: a glutton is voracious. Samuel Johnson tended to be a voracious eater, because in his early life he had often gone hungry till he was ravenous.

rapaciously (rā-pā'shus-li), adv. In a rapacious manner; by rapine; by violent seizure.

rapaciousness (rā-pā'shus-nes), n. The character of being rapacious; inclination to seize violently or unjustly.

rapacity (rā-pas'i-ti), n. [< F. rapacité = Pr. rapacitat = Sp. rapacidad = Pg. rapacidade = It. rapacità, < L. rapacita(t)-s, rapacity, < rapax (rapac-), rapacious: see rapacious.] The character of being rapacious; the exercise of a rapacious or predaceous disposition; the act or practice of seizing by force, as plunder or prey, or of obtaining by extortion or chicanery, as unjust gains: as, the rapacity of pirates, of usurers, or of wild beasts.

Our wild profusion, the source of insatiable rapacity.
Bolingbroke, To Pope.

In the East the rapacity of monarchs has sometimes gone to the extent of taking from cultivators so much of their produce as to have afterwards to return part for seed.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 443.

rapadura (rap-a-dō'rā), n. [Also rappadura; < Sp. P.g. rapadura, shavings or scrapings, < rapar, shave, scrape, = F. râper, OF. rasper, scrape: see rasp¹, r.] A coarse unclarified sugar, made in Mexico and some parts of South America, and cast in molds.

raparee, n. See rapparee.

Rapatea (rā-pā'tē-ā), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), from a native name in Guiana.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, the type of the order Rapateaceæ. It is characterized by an ovary with three cells and three ovules, six anthers each with a spiral appendage, and numerous flowers in a globose head with an involucre of two long leaf-like bracts dilated at the base, and each flower provided with many closely imbricated obtuse appressed bractlets. There are 5 or 6 species, natives of Guiana and northern Brazil. They bear long and narrow radical leaves from a low or robust rootstock, and flowers on a leafless scape, each with three rigid and chaff-like erect sepals, and three broad and spreading petals united below into a hyaline tube.

Rapateaceæ (rā-pā'tē-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Koernicke, 1871), < Rapatea + -aceæ.] An order of monocotyledonous plants of the series Coronarieæ, typified by the genus Rapatea. It is characterized by regular flowers with three greenish sepals and three petals, six stamens with long anthers opening by a pore, a three-celled ovary with few or solitary antrous ovules, and a lenticular embryo in farinaceous albumen. It includes about 22 species, of 6 genera, once classed among the rushes, and now placed between them and the spiderworts. They are perennial herbs, natives of Brazil, Guiana, and Venezuela, and are mostly robust marsh-plants, with long radical tapering leaves, sessile or petioled, and flowers on a naked scape, commonly in dense involucre heads resembling those of the Compositæ.

rape¹ (rāp), v. i. [< ME. rapen, < Ice. hrapa, fall, rush headlong, hurry, hasten, = Norw. rapa, slip, fall, = Dan. rappe, make haste; cf. MLG. reppen, hasten, hurry, G. refl. rappeln, hasten, hurry. Cf. rape¹, a. and n., also rape², of which rape¹ is in part a doublet.] To make haste; hasten; hurry: often used reflexively.

Pas fro my presens on payne of thi lyffe,
And rape of [from] my rewme in a rad haste,
Or thou shall lilly be lost and thou lenghter.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 1898.

"For I may nougt lette," quod that leode, and lyarde he bistrydeh,
And raped hym to Iherusalem-ward the rigte waye to ryde.
Piers Plowman (B), xvii. 79.

rape¹ (rāp), n. [ME., < rape¹, r.] Haste; precipitancy; a precipitate course.

Row forthe in a rape right to the banke,
Tit vnto Troy, tary no lengur.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), i. 5633.

So oft a day I note thy werke renewe,
It to correct and eke to rubbe and scrape;
And al is thorgh thy negligence and rape.
Chaucer, Scrivener, l. 7.

rape¹ (rāp), a. [< ME. rape = D. rap, < Sw. Norw. rapp = Dan. rap, quick, brisk: see rape¹, r.] Quick; hasty.

Than byspak his brother, that rape was of rees.
Tale of Gamelyn, l. 101.

rape¹ (rāp), adv. [ME., < rape¹, a.] Quickly; hastily.

I sey and swere hym ful rape.
Rona, of the Rose, l. 6516.

rape² (rāp), v.: pret. and pp. raped, ppr. raping. [< ME. rapen (= MD. rapen, rapcen, D. rapen, gather, = MLG. LG. rapen, snatch, seize, = Norw. rapa, tear off), a var. of rappen, seize: see rap². This verb has been partly confused with L. rapere, seize, whence ult. E. rapid, rapine, rapacious, rapit², etc.: see rap², rapit¹, rapit², etc.] 1. intrans. 1†. To seize and carry off; snatch up; seize; steal.

Ravenous fishes han sum mesure; whanne thei hungren thei rapen; whanne thei ben full they sparyn.
Wimbelton's Sermon, 1388, MS. Hatton 57, p. 16. (Hallucell.)

2. To commit the crime of rape.

There's nothing new. Menippus; as before,
They rape. extort, forswear.
Hagwood, Hierarchy of Angels (1635), p. 349. (Latham.)

II. trans. 1. To carry off violently; hence, figuratively, to enrapure; ravish.

To rape the fields with touches of her string.
Drayton, Eclogues, v.

My son, I hope, hath met within my threshold
None of these household precedents, which are strong,
And swift to rape youth to their precipice.

B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, II. 2.
2. To commit rape upon; ravish.—To rape and rent, to seize and plunder. Compare to rap and rend, under rap².

For, though ye loke never so brode and stare,
Ye shul nat winne a myte in that chaffare,
But wosten al that ye may rape and renne.
Chaucer, Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 411.

rape² (rāp), n. [*< rape*², v.] 1. The act of snatching by force; a seizing and carrying away by force or violence, whether of persons or things; violent seizure and carrying away: as, the rape of Proserpine; the rape of the Sabine women; Pope's "Rape of the Lock."

Death is cruell, suffering none escape;
Olde, young, rich, poore, of all he makes his rape.
Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 128.

Pear grew after pear,
Fig after fig came; time made never rape
Of any dality there. Chapman, Odyssey.

2. In law, the violation or carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will. Forcibly is usually understood not necessarily to mean violence, but to include negative consent. Statutes in various jurisdictions modify the definition, some by extending it to include carnal knowledge of a girl under 10 either with or without her consent. Rape is regarded as one of the worst felonies. The penalty for it was formerly death, as it is still in some jurisdictions, but is now generally imprisonment for life or for a long term of years. It is now often called criminal assault.

3. Something taken or seized and carried away; a captured person or thing. [Rare.]

Where now are all my hopes? oh, never more Shall they revive, nor Death her rapes restore!
Sandys.

Rape of the forest, in Eng. law, trespass committed in the forest by violence.

rape³ (rāp), n. [< Icel. hreppr, a district, prob. orig. 'share' or 'allotment,' < Icel. hreppa, catch, obtain, = AS. hrepian, hrepian, touch: see *rap*³.] A division of the county of Sussex, in England, intermediate between a hundred and the shire. The county is divided into six rapes.

The Rape . . . is . . . a mere geographical expression, the judicial organisation remaining in the hundred.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 45.

rape⁴ (rāp), n. [< ME. rape, also rape, *< OF. rape, also rape, later rape, F. dial. reure, rere, rape, rova = Pr. Sp. raba, rape, turnip (cf. Pg. rabido, horse-radish), = D. raap = OHG. raba, MHG. rabe, rape, rappe, rape, turnip, G. rapps, rape-seed, = LG. raap, rape; akin to OHG. ruoba, ruoppa, MHG. ruobe, rüebe, G. rübe, rape, turnip, etc., = LG. rore, rowe = Dan. roc = Sw. rofra, turnip; cf. OBulg. riepa = Serv. repa = Bohem. rzhepa = Pol. rzepa = Russ. riepa = Lith. rope, rape = Albanian repe, a turnip, < L. rapa, also rapum, a turnip, rape, = Gr. πάρις, páris, turnip; cf. Gr. πάρις, páris, a radish; πάρις, páris, a cabbage; root unknown.] 1. A turnip. Hallucell.—2. The colza, cole-seed, or rape-seed, a cruciferous plant including the Brassica campestris and B. Napus of Linnæus, the latter form now considered to be a variety, together with the common turnip, of B. campestris, which occurs in a wild state as a weed throughout Europe and Asiatic Russia. Of the two forms named, the former, sometimes called summer rape, has rough leaves, and the latter, called winter rape, smooth leaves. Rape is extensively grown in Europe and in India for its oleaginous seeds, the source of rape-oil. It is also sown for its leaves, which are used as food for sheep, and are produced in gardens for use as a salad.

rape⁵ (rāp), n. [< ME. rape = MHG. rappe, rape, G. rapp, a stalk of grapes, < OF. rape, F. rāpe = Pr. raspa = It. raspo, a stem or stalk of grapes.] 1. The stem or stalk of grapes.

Till grapes to the presse baal set Ther renneth no red wyn in rape.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 135.

2. pl. The stalks and skins of grapes from which the must has been expressed. E. H. Knight.—3. Loose or refuse grapes used in wine-making.

The juice of grapes is drawn as well from the rape, or whole grapes plucked from the cluster, and wine poured upon them in a vessel, as from a vat, where they are bruised. Ray.

4. A filter used in a vinegar-manufactory to separate the mucilaginous matter from the vinegar. It derives its name from being charged with rapes. E. H. Knight.

rape⁶ (rāp), v. t.; pret. and pp. raped, ppr. raping. [*Prob. a var. of rap*³, perhaps affected by F. rāper (= Sp. Pg. rapar), rasp: see *rasp*¹.] To scratch; abrade; scarify. [Prov. Eng.]

Interesting reading; wasn't it? I wish they'd rape the character of some other innocent—ha!

The Money-makers, p. 78.

rape⁷ (rāp), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of rope.

rape-butterfly (rāp'but'ér-flī), n. A pierian, Pieris rapæ, known in the United States as the imported cabbage-butterfly, to distinguish it from several similar native species. See cut under cabbage-butterfly, and compare figures under Pieris. [Eng.] rape-cake (rāp'kāk), n. A hard cake formed of the residue of the seed and husks of rape (see *rape*⁴) after the oil has been expressed. It is used for feeding oxen and sheep, but is inferior to linseed-cake and some other kinds of oil-cakes; it is also used in considerable quantity as a rich manure.

rapeful (rāp'fūl), a. [*< rape*² + -ful.] Given to rape or violence. [Rare.]

To teach the rapeful Hyeans marriage.

Chapman, Byron's Tragedy, iv. 1. (Nares.)

rapely (rāp'li), adv. [ME., also raply, rapliche, etc.; *< rape*¹, a., + *-ly*².] Hastily; hurriedly; quickly; rapidly.

Then seih we a Samaritan cam syttinge on a mule,
Rydyng full raply the way that he wente.

Piers Plowman (C), xx. 48.

U'psterie the champion raply anon.

Tale of Gamelyn, l. 219.

rape-oil (rāp'oil), n. A thick brownish-yellow oil expressed from rape-seed. It was formerly, as in India still, applied chiefly to illumination, but is now largely consumed for lubricating and in India-rubber manufacturing. Also called cabbage-oil, colza-oil, rape-seed oil.

rape-seed (rāp'sēd), n. The seed of the rape, or the plant itself; cole-seed.—Rape-seed oil. Same as rape-oil.

rape-wine (rāp'win), n. A poor thin wine prepared from the muck or stalks, skins, and other refuse of grapes which have been pressed.

rap-full (rap'fūl), a. and n. [*< rap*¹ + *full*¹.] 1. a. Full of wind: applied to sails when on a wind every sail stands full without lifting.

II. n. A sail full of wind: also called a smooth full.

rapfully (rap'fūl-i), adv. With beating or striking; with resounding blows; batteringly. [Rare.]

Then far of vplandish we doe view thee fird Sicil Etna,
And a seabelch grouting on rough rocks rapfully trapping.
Stanislaus, Æneid, lii.

Raphaellesque (raf'ā-el-esk'), a. [Also Raphaellesque; < Raphael (It. Raffaello), a chief painter of the Italian Renaissance (see Raphaelism), + -esque.] Of or resembling the style, color, or art of the great Renaissance painter Raphael (Raffaello Sanzio da Urbino).

A strange opulence of splendour, characterisable as half-legitimate half-meretricious—a splendour hovering between the Raphaellesque and the Japanese.

Carlyle, Sterling, l. 6.

Raphaelism (raf'ā-el-izm), n. [< Raphael (see def.) + -ism.] The principles of art introduced by Raphael, the famous Italian painter (1483–1520); the style or method of Raphael.

Raphaelite (raf'ā-el-it), n. [< Raphael + *-ite*²; see Raphaelism.] One who adopts the principles or follows the style of the painter Raphael.

Raphaelitism (raf'ā-el-i-tizm), n. [< Raphaelite + -ism.] The principles or methods of the Raphaelites; pursuit of or adherence to the style of the painter Raphael.

Raphanese (rā-fā'nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1821), < Raphanus + -ese.] A tribe of polypetalous plants of the order Cruciferae. It is characterized by an elongated unjointed indehiscent pod, which is a cylindrical or moniliform one-celled and many-seeded siliqua, or is divided into many small one-seeded cells (in one or two rows), which at length fall apart. It includes 9 genera, of which Raphanus is the type, all of them plants of the Old World, and chiefly Asiatic.

Raphanus (raf'ā-nus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. raphanus, < Gr. ῥάβανος, cabbage, radish, ῥάβανος, radish, akin to ῥάβος, ῥάβος, turnip, L. rapa, rapum, turnip: see *rape*⁴.] A genus of cruciferous plants, including the radish, type of the tribe Raphanæe. It is characterized by globose seeds, solitary in the single row of cells formed by contractions of the pods, which are closed by a pithy substance or sometimes remain continuous throughout. The 6 species are natives of Europe and temperate parts of Asia, and are branching annuals or biennials, with fleshy roots, lyrate lower leaves, and elongated bractless racemes of slender-pediceled white or yellow purplish-veined flowers, followed by erect spreading, thick, and corky or spongy pods. Some species (genus Raphanistrum, Tournefort, 1700) have a short seedless joint below, forming a stalk to the long inflated neck-like cell which composes the rest of the pod, as R. Landra, a yellow-flowered Italian weed with large radical leaves, eaten as a salad, and R. Raphanistrum, a coarse weed, the wild or field radish. See radish.

raphe (rā'fē), n. [NL., prop. raphæ; < Gr. ῥαφή, a seam, suture, < ῥάπτειν, sew: see rhapsode.] 1. In bot.: (a) In an anatropous or amphitropous (hemitropous) ovule or seed, the adnate cord which connects the hilum with the chalazae, commonly appearing as a more or less salient ridge, sometimes completely embedded in a fleshy testa of the seed. See cuts under anatropous and hemitropous. (b) A longitudinal line or rib on the valves of many diatoms, connecting the three nodules when present. (See nodule.) The usual primary classification of genera depends upon its presence or absence.—2. In anat., a seam-like union of two lateral halves, usually in the mesial plane, and constituting either a median septum of connective tissue or a longitudinal ridge or furrow; specifically, in the brain, the median lamina of decussating fibers which extends in the tegmental region from the oblongata up to the third ventricle.—Raphe of the corpus callosum, a longitudinal furrow on the median line of its dorsal surface, bounded by the mesial longitudinal striae.—Raphe of the medulla oblongata, the median septum, composed of fibers which run in part dorsoventrally, in part longitudinally, and in part across the septum more or less obliquely, together with nerve-cells.—Raphe of the palate, a linear median ridge extending from a small papilla in front, corresponding with the inferior opening of the anterior palatine foramen, back to the uvula.—Raphe of the penis, the extension of the raphe of the scrotum forward on the under side of the penis.—Raphe of the perineum, the extension of the raphe of the scrotum backward on the perineum.—Raphe of the pharynx, the median seam on the posterior wall of the pharynx.—Raphe of the scrotum, a slight median ridge extending forward to the under side of the penis, and backward along the perineum to the margin of the anus.—Raphe of the tongue, a slight furrow along the middle of the dorsal surface, terminating posteriorly in the foramen cæcum.

Raphia (rā'fi-ā), n. [NL. (Palisot de Beauvois, 1804), < raffia, the native name of the Madagascar species.] A genus of palms of the tribe Lepidocarpeæ, type of the subtribe Raphieæ (which is distinguished from the true ratan-palms, Calameæ, by a completely three-celled ovary). It is characterized by pinnately divided leaves crowning an erect and robust trunk, and by a fruit which becomes one-celled, is beaked with the three terminal stigmas, and has a thick pericarp tessellated with overlapping scales, spongy within and containing a single oblong furrowed seed with very hard osseous albumen. There are 5 species, natives of tropical Africa and Madagascar, with one, R. tædiger, the jupati-palm (which see), native in America from the mouths of the Amazon to Nicaragua. All inhabit low swampy lands and banks near tide-water. Their trunks are unarmed and of little height, but their leaves are spiny and often over 50 feet in length, the entire tree becoming thus 60 or 70 feet in height to their erect tips. The large pendulous flower-spikes reach 6 feet in length, contain flowers of both sexes, and have their numerous branches set in two opposite rows, their flower-bearing branchlets resembling flattened catkins. In fruit the spike sometimes becomes 15 feet long, and weighs 200 or even 300 pounds, bearing numerous egg-like brown and hard fruits often used as ornaments. R. Raffia, which produces the largest spadices, is known as the raffia-palm. (See raffia.) R. vinifera supplies the toddy of western tropical Africa, and its leafstalks are used in various ways.

Raphia vinifera.

Raphides, n. Plural of raphis.
Raphidia (rā-fid'i-ā), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), < Gr. ῥάφιδος (raphidos), a needle, a pin: see raphis.] A notable genus of neuropterous insects, of the family Sialidæ or giving name to the family Raphidiidæ. The prothorax is cylindrical, and the wings are furnished with a pterostigma. The larvæ differ from all other Sialidæ in not being aquatic; they live under bark. The genus is represented in North America only on the Pacific coast, although common in Europe.

raphidian (rā-fid'i-an), a. 1. In bot., of the nature of or containing raphides: as, raphidian cells in a plant.—2. In zool., of or pertaining to the genus Raphidia.
raphidiferous (raf-i-dif'ér-us), a. [< Gr. ῥάφιδος (raphidos), a needle, pin, + L. ferre, bear, carry.] In bot., containing raphides.

Raphidiidæ (raf-i-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Leach, 1824), < Raphidia + -idæ.] A family of neuropterous insects: now merged in the Sialidæ.

raphigraph (raf'i-gráf), n. [< Gr. ῥάφειν, write.] A machine intended to provide a means of communication with the blind, by the use of characters made by pricking paper with ten needle-pointed pegs, actuated by a keyboard, and operating in conjunction with mechanism for shifting the paper. The machine has proved practically valueless from its complication and its extreme slowness of operation, resulting from the requisite number of motions.

raphis (rā'fīs), n.; pl. raphides (rāf'i-dēz). [NL., < Gr. ραφίς, rafis, a needle, pin, < ράττω, sew, stitch. Cf. raphe.] In bot., one of the acicular crystals, most often composed of oxalate of lime, which occur in bundles in the cells of many plants. The term has less properly been used to include crystals of other forms found in the same situations. Also raphia.

rapid (rap'id), a. and n. [I. a. F. rapide (OF. vernacularly rade, ra) = Sp. rápido = Pg. It. rapido, swift, < L. rapidus, snatching, tearing, usually hasty, swift, lit. 'quick,' < rapere, snatch, akin to Gr. ἀρπάζειν, seize (see harry): see rap², rape². II. n. F. rapide, a swift current in a stream, pl. rapides, rapids; from the adj.] I. a. 1. Moving or doing swiftly or with celerity; acting or performing with speed; quick in motion or execution: as, a rapid horse; a rapid worker or speaker.

Part curb their fiery steeds, or shun the goal
With rapid wheels. Milton, P. L., II. 532.

Be fix'd, you rapid orbs, that bear
The changing seasons of the year.
Carew, Caelum Britannicum, IV.

Against his Will, you chain your frighted King
On rapid Rhine's divided Bed.
Prior, Imit. of Horace, III. 2.

2. Swiftly advancing; going on or forward at a fast rate; making quick progress: as, rapid growth; rapid improvement; a rapid conflagration.

The rapid decline which is now wasting my powers.
Farra, Julian Home, XIV.

3. Marked by swiftness of motion or action; proceeding or performed with velocity; executed speedily.

My father's eloquence was too rapid to stay for any man;—away it went. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, v. 3.

Thus inconsiderately, but not the less maliciously, Oldmixon filled his rapid page.
I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 416.

It pleased me to watch the curious effect of the rapid movement of near objects contrasted with the slow motion of distant ones. O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 20.

4. Gay. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] = syn. 1-3. Fast, fleet, expeditious, hasty, hurried.

II. n. A swift current in a river, where the channel is descending; a part of a river where the current runs with more than its ordinary celerity; a sudden descent of the surface of a stream, more or less broken by obstructions, but without actual cataract or cascade: usually in the plural.

No truer Time himself
Can prove you, tho' he make you evermore
Dearer and nearer, as the rapid of life Shoots to the fall. Tennyson, A Dedication.

The rapids above are a series of shelves, bristling with jutting rocks and lodged trunks of trees.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 310.

rapidamente (rā-pē-dā-men'te), adv. [It., < rapido, rapid: see rapid.] In music, rapidly; in a rapid manner.

rapidity (rā-pid'i-ti), n. [F. rapidité (cf. Sp. rapidez) = It. rapidità, < L. rapiditas (t-), rapidity, swiftness, < rapidus, rapid: see rapid.] The state or property of being rapid; celerity of motion or action; quickness of performance or execution; fast rate of progress or advance.

Where the words are not monosyllables, we make them so by our rapidity of pronunciation. Addison.

The undulations are present beyond the red and violet ends of the spectrum, for we have made them sensible through their actions on other reagents, and have measured their rapidities.
G. H. Leves, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 203.

= syn. Speed, swiftness, etc. (see quickness), haste, expedition, despatch.

rapidly (rāp'id-li), adv. In a rapid manner; swiftly; quickly; at a fast rate.

rapidness (rāp'id-nes), n. The condition of being rapid, or of acting or proceeding rapidly; rapidity.

rapido (rāp'id-dō), adv. [It.: see rapid.] In music, with rapidity or agility: commonly applied to a running passage.

rapier (rā'piēr), n. [= D. rapier, rappier = LG. rapier = G. rappier = Sw. Dan. rapier, < OF. rapiere, rapiere, F. rapier, F. dial. raipeire (ML. rapieria), a rapier; prob., as the form raspiere and various allusions indicate, of Spanish origin, a name given orig. in contempt, as if 'a poker,' < Sp. raspaderia, a raker, < raspar, rapar = Pg. rapar = OF. rasper, F. rasper, scrape, scratch, rasp, < OHG. raspōn, rasp, etc.: see rasp¹.] 1. A long, narrow, pointed, two-edged sword, used, especially in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, with a guard for the hand, adapted for both cutting and thrusting, but used chiefly for thrusting. Rapier practice was usually with a dagger or hand-buckler held in the left hand to parry the thrust. See cut under sword.

And I will turn thy falsehood to thy heart,
Where it was forged, with my rapier's point.
Shak., Rich. II., IV. 1. 40.

Who had girt unto them a Rapier and Dagger, gilt, point pendant.
Greene, Quip for an Upstart Courtier.

Some . . . will not stick to call Hercules himself a dastard, because forsooth he fought with a club and not at the rapier and dagger.
Sir J. Harrington, tr. of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso.

The offense . . . caused her Majesty [Queen Elizabeth] to . . . place selected grave citizens at every gate to cut the ruffes and break the rapier's points of all passengers that exceeded a yard in length of their rapiers.
Stowe, quoted in Encyc. Brit., IX. 70.

2. In later English usage, a fencing-sword used only for thrusting.

By a rapier is now always meant a sword for the thrust, in contradistinction to one adapted for cutting.
Encyc. Brit., IX. 70.

rapier-dancer (rā'piēr-dāns), n. A dance formerly practised in Yorkshire, England, by men in costume who represented ancient heroes and flourished rapiers, ending with a mock execution of one of their number by uniting their rapiers round his neck. See sword-dance. Halliwell.

rapier-fish (rā'piēr-fish), n. A sword-fish.
rapillo (rā-pil'ō), n. [F. rapille (Cotgrave) = It. rapillo, dross and ashes from a volcano, a kind of sand used in making mortar.] Pulverized volcanic substances.

rapine (rap'in), n. [Early mod. E. also rapin; < OF. rapine, F. rapine = Pr. rapina = Sp. rapina = Pg. It. rapina, < L. rapina, rapine, plunder, robbery, < rapere, seize: see rapid, rape².] 1. The violent seizure and carrying off of property; open plunder by armed or superior force, as in war or by invasion or raid.

They lived therefore mostly by rapin, pillaging their neighbours, who were more addicted to traffic than fighting.
Dampier, Voyages, II. 1. 107.

Plunder and rapine completed the devastations which war had begun.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xiii.

2†. Violence; force; ravishment.

Her graceful innocence, her every air
Of gesture, or least action, overawed
His malice, and with rapine sweet bereaved
His fierceness of the fierce intent it brought.
Milton, P. L., IX. 461.

= syn. 1. Plunder, spoliation, robbery, depredation. See pillage.

rapinet (rap'in), v. t. [F. rapiner, rapine, plunder; from the noun. Cf. raven², r., from the same source.] To plunder violently or by superior force.

A Tyrant doth not only rapine his Subjects, but spoils and robs Churches. Sir G. Buck, Hist. Richard III., v.

raping (rā'ping), p. a. [Ppr. of rape², r.] 1. In her., devouring or tearing its prey: said of any carnivorous beast used as a bearing. It is necessary to mention the position of the creature, as rampant, etc., and also the nature of the prey.

2. Ravishing.

Or had the Syrens, on a neighbour shore,
Heard in what raping notes she did deplore
Her buried glory. W. Browne, Pastorals, I. 5.

rapinoust (rap'i-nus), a. [= It. rapinoso, < ML. rapinosus*, < L. rapina, rapine: see rapine.] (F. ravenous, a doublet of rapinoust.) (Committing or characterized by rapine; rapacious.

rappt, v. t. An obsolete form of rap².

rappadura, n. See rapadura.

rapparee, raparee (rap-a-rē'), n. [F. rapaire, a noisy fellow, sloven, robber, thief, = Gael. rapair, noisy fellow; cf. Ir. rapal, noise; rapach, noisy: see rabble¹.] An armed Irish plunderer; in general, a vagabond.

The frequent robberies, murders, and other notorious felonies committed by robbers, rapparees, and tories, upon their keeping, hath greatly discouraged the replanting of this kingdom.

Laws of Will. III. (1695), quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 386.

The Irish formed themselves into many bodies . . . called rapparees. Bp. Burnet, Hist. Own Times, an. 1680.

The confiscations left behind them many "wood kerns," or, as they were afterwards called, rapparees, who were active in agrarian outrage, and a vagrant, homeless, half-savage population of beggars.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., VI.

rappel, v. A Middle English form of rap¹, rap², etc.

rappee (ra-pē'), n. [= G. rappe, rappch = Dan. rappe, < F. rapé, a kind of snuff, < rapé, pp. of rapier, rasp, scrape, grate: see rasp¹.] A strong kind of snuff, coarser than maccouba, of either a black or a brown color, made from the darker and ranker kinds of tobacco-leaves.

In early times the duly sauced and fermented leaves were made up into "carottes"—tightly tied up spindle-shaped bundles, from the end of which the snuff, by means of a "snuff rasp," rasped off his own supply, and hence the name "ripé," which we have still as rappée, to indicate a particular class of snuff.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 427.

rappel (ra-pel'), n. [F. rappel, OF. rapel (ML. rapellum), verbal n. of rapeler, F. rapeler, repeal, revoke: see repeal.] 1. The roll or beat of the drum to call soldiers to arms.—2. An ancient musical instrument, still used in Egypt, consisting of a ring to which are attached small bells or metal plates, forming a sort of rattle.

rappen (rap'en), n.; pl. rappen. [Swiss G. rappen, a coin of Basel, of small value, bearing the impress of a raven, < MHG. rappe, a coin first struck at Freiburg in Baden, with the head of a bird on it representing the Freiburg coat of arms, < rappe, a collateral form of rabe = E. raven: see raven¹.] A Swiss coin and denomination of money. At the present day the rappen is equivalent to a centime: thus, 100 rappen (equal to 100 centimes) make 1 franc.

Obverse. Reverse.
Rappen of Bâle, 1802; British Museum. (Size of original.)

rapper (rap'ēr), n. [F. rapier + -er.] 1. One who raps or knocks; specifically, a spirit-rapper.—2. The knocker of a door. [Rare.]—3. In coal-mining, a lever with a hammer attached at one end, placed at the mouth of a shaft or incline for giving signals to the banksman, by rapping on an iron plate.—4. An extravagant oath or lie; a "whopper." See to rap out (a), under rap¹, v. t. [Prov. Eng.]

Bravely sworn! though this is no flower of the sun, yet I am sure it is something that deserves to be called a rapper.
Bp. Parker, Reproof of Rehearsal Transposed, p. 200.

rapping (rap'ing), n. [Verbal n. of rap¹, v.] The production of sound by a rap; specifically, the sound of significant raps or knocks supposed to be produced by spirits through the instrumentality of mediums or spirit-rappers; spirit-rapping.

rapport (ra-pōrt'), v. t. [F. rappor, relate, refer: see report, v.] To have relation or reference; relate; refer. [Rare.]

When God hath imprinted an authority upon a person, . . . others are to pay the duty which that impression demands; which duty, because it *rappor*ts to God, and touches not the man, . . . extinguishes all pretences of opinion and pride. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 142.

rapport (ra-pōr'), n. [F. rappor, OF. raport, account, also resemblance, correspondence, accord, agreement, = Pg. raporte = It. rapporto, report, relation: see report, n.] 1. Harmonious relation: correspondence; accord or agreement; affinity; analogy: used as a French word, often in the phrase en rapport, in or into close relation, accord, or harmony.

It is obvious enough what *rappor*t there is, and must ever be, between the thoughts and words, the conceptions and languages of every country.
Sir W. Temple, Anc. and Mod. Learning.

2. In French law, a report on a case, or on a subject submitted; a return.

rapprochement (ra-prōsh'mōn), n. [F., reunion, reconciliation, < rapprocher, approach again, < re-, back, + approcher, approach: see approach.] A coming or bringing together or into accord; establishment of harmonious relations; reconciliation.

The present rapprochement between the Turk and the Muscovite. The Academy, Dec. 15, 1838, p. 379. He [Lewes] here seeks to effect a rapprochement between metaphysic and science. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 491.

rapsallion (rap-skal'yon), n. [< rapsallion + -ry.] Rascals collectively. [Rare.] rapsallion (rap-skal'yon), n. [< rapsallion + -ry.] A rascally, disorderly, or despicable person; a wretch or vagabond; a rascallion.

Well, rapsallions! and what now!

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 87.

There isn't any low, friendless rapsallion in this town that hasn't got me for his friend.

Hovells, Annie Kilburn, xi.

rapsallionry (rap-skal'yon-ri), n. [< rapsallion + -ry.] Rascals collectively. [Rare.]

rapt¹ (rapt), a. A preterit and past participle of rapt.

rapt² (rapt), p. a. [Early mod. E. spelling of rapped, pp. of *rap*², confused with L. raptus, pp. of rapere, seize: see *rap*², and cf. *rapt*³.] Seized with ecstasy; transported; exalted; ecstatic; in a state of rapture.

More dances my rapt heart
Than when I first my wedded mistress saw Bestride my threshold. Shak., Cor., iv. 5. 122.

Looks commercing with the skies,
Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes.

Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 40.

Their faces wore a rapt expression, as if sweet music were in the air around them.

Hawthorne, Hall of Fantasy.

rapt³ (rapt), v. t. [< L. raptare, seize and carry off, freq. of rapere, pp. raptus, seize: see *rapt*², and cf. *rap*², *rape*².] 1. To seize or grasp; seize and carry off; ravish.

The Lybian lion,

Out-rushing from his den, rapt all away.

Daniel, Civil Wars, vii. 97.

We are a man distinct . . .
From those whom custom *rapt*eth in her press.

B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

2. To transport as with ecstasy; enrapture.

So those that dwell in me, and live by frugal toil,
When they in my defence are reasoning of my soil,
As *rapt*ed with my wealth and beauties, learned grow.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xlii. 411.

rapt³ (rapt), n. [< F. rapt, OF. rat, rap = Pr. rap = Sp. Pg. rapt = It. ratto, < L. raptus, a seizure, plundering, abduction, rape, ML. also forcible violation, < rapere, pp. raptus, seize, snatch: see *rapt*², a., and cf. rapture.] 1. Transporting force or energy; resistless movement.

And therefore in this Encyclopedie and round of knowledge, like the great and exemplary wheels of heaven, we must observe two circles: that while we are daily carried about, and whirled on by the swing and rapt of the one, we may maintain a natural proper course in the slow and sober wheel of the other. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., Pref.

2. An ecstasy; a trance.

Disamulyn'g traunces and raptures.

Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 25.

He seemeth to lye as though he were in great payne or in a *rapt*e, wonderfully tormentynge hym selfe.

R. Eden, tr. of Gonzalus Ovidius (First Books on America, [ed. Arber, p. 215]).

An extraordinary rapt and act of prophesying.

Sp. Morton, Discharge of Imput. (1633), p. 174.

Raptiores (rap-tā-tō-rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of raptior, < L. raptare, seize and carry off, waste, ravage, plunder: see *rapt*², *rapt*³.] In ornith., same as Raptores. Illiger, 1811.

Raptatoria (rap-tā-tō-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL.: see Raptiores.] In entom., same as Raptoria.

raptatorial (rap-tā-tō-ri-āl), a. [< raptatory + -al.] Same as raptorial.

raptatory (rap-tā-tō-ri), a. [*< NL. raptatorius, < raptior, a robber, plunderer: see Raptiores.] In entom., formed for seizing prey; raptorial.

raptor (rap-tōr), n. Same as raptor, 1.

raptor (rap-tōr), n. [= Sp. Pg. raptor = It. rattore, < L. raptor, robber, plunderer, abductor, < rapere, pp. raptus, seize, carry off: see *rapt*², *rapt*³.] 1. A ravisher; a plunderer.

To have her harmless life by the lewd raptor split.

Drayton, Polyolbion, x. 149.

2. [cap.] [NL.] A genus of coleopterous insects.

Raptores (rap-tō-rēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. raptor, robber, plunderer: see raptor.] An order of Aves, the Accipitres of Linnaeus, the Raptores, Rapaces, or Acetomorphæ of some authors; the raptorial or rapacious birds; the birds of prey. They have an epignathous cere beak, and talons generally fitted for grasping live prey. The bill is hooked and often also toothed. The toes are four, three in front and one behind, with large crooked claws;

the outer toe is sometimes versatile. The plumage is afterhafted or not; the oil-gland is present and usually tufted. The carotids are two; the syrinx has not more than one pair of intrinsic muscles. Cæca are present (except in Cathartidae). The maxillopalatines are united to an ossified septum; the angle of the mandible is not recurved. The Raptores are found in every part of the world. There are upward of 500 species, mostly belonging to the two families Falconidae and Strigidae. The Raptores are divided into 4 suborders or superfamilies: (1) the African Gypsergastidae; (2) the American Cathartidae; (3) the cosmopolitan diurnal birds of prey, Accipitres; and (4) the cosmopolitan nocturnal birds of prey, the owls, Striges.

1, head and foot of golden eagle (Aquila chrysaetos); 2, head and foot of kestrel (Falco tinnunculus).

Raptoria (rap-tō-ri-ā), n. pl. [NL., < L. raptor, robber: see Raptores.] In entom., in Westwood's system (1839), a division of orthopterous insects; the Mantidae (which see). Westwood's Raptoria were a part of Latreille's Cursoria, the rest of which Westwood called Ambulatoria and Cursoria. Also Raptatoria.

raptorial (rap-tō-ri-āl), a. and n. [< raptori-ous + -al.] 1. a. 1. Rapacious; predatory; preying upon animals; of or pertaining to the Raptores or Raptoria.—2. Fitted for seizing and holding; prehensile: as, the raptorial beak or claws of birds; the raptorial palps of insects.—Raptorial legs, in entom., legs in which the tibiae and tarsi turn back on the femur, often fitting into it like the blade of a pocket-knife into a handle; the tibiae may also be armed with teeth or spines, thus forming very powerful seizing-organs. This type is found only in the front legs, and it is most fully developed in the Mantidae. See cut under Mantis.

II. n. A bird of prey; a member of the Raptores.

raptorious (rap-tō-ri-us), a. [*< NL. raptorius, < L. raptor, a robber, plunderer: see raptor.] In entom., same as raptorial. Kirby. [Rare.]

rapture (rap-tūr), n. [*< rapt*¹ + -ure.] 1. A violent taking and carrying away; seizure; forcible removal.

Spite of all the rapture of the sea,
This jewel holds his building on my arm.

Shak., Pericles, ii. 1. 161.

When St. Paul had his rapture into heaven, he saw fine things.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 131.

2. Violent transporting movement; a rapid carrying or going along; moving energy.

Wave rolling after wave, where way they found;
If steep, with torrent rapture; if through plain,
Soft ebbing.

Milton, P. L., vii. 299.

With the rapture of great winds to blow
About earth's shaken coignes.

Lowell, Agassiz, vi. 1.

3. A state of mental transport or exaltation; ecstasy. (a.) Ecstatic pleasure; rapt delight or enjoyment; extreme joy over or gladness on account of something.

I have never heard Praise of love or wine
That panted forth a flood of rapture so divine.

Shelley, To a Skylark.

To exercise a devilish ingenuity in inventions of mutual torture became not only a duty but a rapture.

Molloy, Dutch Republic, II. 426.

(b.) Ecstatic elevation of thought or feeling; lofty or soaring enthusiasm; exalted or absorbing earnestness.

This man, beyond a Stoic apathy, sees truth as in a rapture, and cleaves to it. Milton, Apology for Smectymnus

You grow correct that once with rapture writ.

Pope, Epil. to the Satires, l. 3.

There is a rapture on the lonely shore . . .
By the deep sea, and music in its roar.

Byron, Child Harold, iv. 178.

4. A manifestation of mental transport; an ecstatic utterance or action; an expression of exalted or passionate feeling of any kind; a rhapsody.

Her [Cassandra's] brain-sick raptures
Cannot distaste the goodness of a quarrel
Which hath our several honours all engaged
To make it gracious. Shak., T. and C., II. 2. 122.

Are not groans and tears
Harmonious raptures in th' Almighty's ears?
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 15.

5. An ecstasy of passionate excitement; a paroxysm or fit from excessive emotion. [Rare.]

Your prattling nurse
Into a rapture lets her baby cry.

Shak., Cor., II. 1. 223.

=Syn. 3. Transport, bliss, exaltation.
raptured (rap-tūrd), a. [< rapture + -ed.] In a state of rapture; characterized by rapture or ecstasy; enraptured.

Raptur'd I stood, and as this hour amaz'd,
With reverence at the lofty wonder gaz'd.

Pope, Odyssey, vi. 199.

The latent Damon drew
Such maddening draughts of beauty to his soul,
As for a while o'erwhelm'd his raptur'd thought
With luxury too-daring. Thomson, Summer, l. 1333.

That favored strain was Surrey's raptur'd line.

Scott, L. of L. M., vi. 19.

rapturist (rap-tūr-ist), n. [< rapture + -ist.] One who habitually manifests rapture; an enthusiast. [Rare.]

Such swarms of prophets and rapturists have flown out
Of those hives in some ages.

J. Spencer, Vanity of Vulgar Prophecies (1665), p. 48.

rapturous (rap-tūr-us), a. [< rapture + -ous.] Of the character of rapture; marked by rapture; exciting or manifesting rapture; ecstatically joyous or exalted: as, rapturous exultation; a rapturous look; a rapturous scene.

His welcome, before enthusiastic, was now rapturous.

Everett, Orations, I. 480.

rapturously (rap-tūr-us-li), adv. In a rapturous manner; with rapture; ecstatically.

raptus melancholicus (rap-tus mel-an-kol-i-kus), n. [< L. raptus, a seizure; melancholicus, melancholic: see *rapt*², n., and melancholic.] A motor crisis or outbreak of uncontrollable violence developed in a melancholic person from the intensity of his mental anguish.

raquet, n. See *racket*².

raquette (ra-ket'), n. [F.] A racket.—Raquette head-dress, a kind of head-dress in use toward the close of the sixteenth century, in which the hair is drawn back from the forehead and temples, and raised in a sort of crest; a kind of chignon was arranged at the back of the head and covered by a cap of fine linen, darned net embroidery, or some similar material.

rara (rā-rā), n. [S. Amer.; imitative of its cry.] A bird, the South American plant-cutter, Phytotoma rara. Also called rarita. See cut under Phytotoma.

rara avis (rā-rā ā-vis), pl. raræ aves (rā-rā ā-vēz). [L., in full rara avis in terris, 'a rare bird on earth'—a phrase applied by Horace (Sat. ii. 2, 26) to the peacock: rara, fem. of rarus, rare, uncommon; avis, bird: see *rare*¹ and Aves.] A rare bird; hence, a person or an object of a rare kind or character; a prodigy.

rare¹ (rār), a. [< ME. rare = D. raar = MLG. rār, LG. raar = G. Dan. Sw. rar, < OF. rare, rere, F. rare, dial. raire, rale, rare = Sp. Pg. It. raro, < L. rarus, thin, not dense, thinly scattered, few, rare, uncommon; root unknown.] 1. Thin; porous; not dense; of slight consistence; rarefied; having relatively little matter in a given volume: as, a rare substance; the rare atmosphere of high mountains.

The fiend
O'er bog or steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare,
With head, hands, wings, or feet pursues his way.

Milton, P. L., II. 948.

Water is nineteen times lighter, and by consequence nineteen times rarer than gold. Newton, Opticks, II. iii. 8.

2. Thinly scattered; coming or occurring at wide intervals; sparse; dispersed.

Cucumber in this moon is sown rare.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 110.

The cattle in the fields and meadows green:
Those rare and solitary, these in flocks
Pasturing at once, and in broad herds upspring.

Milton, P. L., vii. 461.

He left the barren-beaten thoroughfare,
Chose the green path that show'd the rarer foot.

Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

3. Very uncommon or infrequent; seldom occurring or to be found; hardly ever met with.

She calls me proud, and that she could not love me
Were man as rare as phoenix.

Shak., As you Like It, iv. 3. 17.

It is the rarest thing that ever I saw in any place, neyther do I think that any cittle of Christendome hath the like.

Coryat, Crudities, I. 192.

When so many have written too much, we shall the more readily pardon the rare man who has written too little or just enough.

Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 161.

Hence—4. Remarkable from uncommonness; especially, uncommonly good, excellent, valuable, fine, or the like; of an excellence seldom met with.

Good descent, rare features, virtuous partes.
Times' Whistle (E. T. S.), p. 43.
 I think my love as rare
 As any she belied with false compare.
Shak., Sonnets, cxxx.
 They write to me from England of rare News in France.
Howell, Letters, I. vi. 37.
 Ha! ha! ha! yes, yes, I think it a rare joke.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, iii. 3.

She's a rare hand at sausages; there's no one like her
 In a' the three Ridings. Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, viii.
 = Syn. 3. Rare, Scarce, infrequent, unusual. Rare implies that only few of the kind exist: as, perfect diamonds are rare. Scarce properly implies a previous or usual condition of greater abundance. Rare means that there are much fewer of a kind to be found than may be found where scarce would apply.

A perfect union of wit and judgment is one of the rarest things in the world. Burke.

Where words are scarce, they are seldom spent in vain.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 7.

Then touch'd upon the game, how scarce it was
 This season. Tennyson, Audley Court.

4. Singular, extraordinary, incomparable, choice.
rare² (râr), a. [A dial. form of rear², q. v.]
 Not thoroughly cooked; partly cooked; underdone: applied to meat: as, rare beef; a rare chop. [In common use in the United States, but now only dialectal in Great Britain.]

New-laid eggs, which Hancu's busy care Turned by a gentle fire, and roasted rare.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii. 98.

Scanty mutton scraps on Fridays, and rather more savoury, but grudging, portions of the same flesh, rotten-roasted or rare, on the Tuesdays. Lamb, Christ's Hospital.

The word rare, applied to meat not cooked enough, did sound really strange to me; but an eminent citizen of yours presently showed me that it had for it the authority of Dryden.
E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 69.

rare³ (râr), adv. [Also rear; prob. a reduction of rather (with sense of the positive rath): see rather, rathl, adv. Cf. rareripe for rathripe.]
 Early. [Prov. Eng.]

rare⁴ (râr), r. A dialectal form of rear¹. [U. S.]

rarebit (râr'bit), n. [An altered form of rabbit in the phrase Welsh rabbit, simulating an absurd derivation from rare¹ + bit, as if 'a rare delicacy.'] See Welsh rabbit, under rabbit.

raree-show (râr'ê-shô), n. [Appar. contracted from rarity-show*, < rarity + show, n. (cf. G. raritäten-kabinet, a 'cabinet of curiosities or rarities,' raritätenkasten, peep-show, D. rare-kykkas, a 'rare show,' show-box.) A peep-show; a show carried about in a box.

Thou didst look into it with as much innocency of heart as ever child look'd into a raree-show box.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, viii. 24.

rarefaction (râr-ê-fak'shon), n. [F. raréfac-tion = Pr. raréfactio = Sp. raréfacción = Pg.
raréfacção = It. raréfaczione, < L. as if raréfactio* (n.), < raréfacere, pp. raréfactus, raréfy: see raréfy.] The act or process of rarefying or making rare, or of expanding or distending a body or mass of matter, whereby the bulk is increased, or a smaller number of its particles occupy the same space; also, the state or condition so produced: opposed to condensation.
 The term is used chiefly in speaking of gases, the terms dilatation and expansion being applied in speaking of solids and liquids. There was formerly a dispute as to whether rarefaction consisted merely of an increase in the mean distance of the particles (as it is now held to do), or in an enlargement of the particles themselves, or finally in an intrusion of foreign particles. In the strictest sense, the word was understood to signify the second action.

Either we must say . . . that the selfsame body does not only obtain a greater space in rarefaction, . . . but adequately and exactly filled it, and so when rarefied acquires larger dimensions without either leaving any vacuities betwixt its component corpuscles or admitting between them any new or extraneous substance whatsoever.
 Now it is to this last (and, as some call it, rigorous) way of rarefaction that our adversary has recourse.
Boyle, Spring of the Air, I. iii.

When the rarefaction of a gas is extreme (one-millionth) its matter becomes radiant.
A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 584.

rarefactive (râr-ê-fak'tiv), a. [= F. raréfactif = Pr. raréfactiu = Sp. Pg. raréfactivo; as raré-fact(ion) + ire.] Causing rarefaction; making rarer or less dense. [Rare.]

The condition of the bone was not a tumour, but a raré-factive disease of the whole bone accompanied by new growth. Lancet, No. 3423, p. 684.

rarefiable (râr-ê-fi-a-bl), a. [(< raréfy + -able.)] Capable of being rarefied.

raréfy (râr'ê-fi), v.; pret. and pp. raréfied, ppr.
raréfyng. [Also, incorrectly, rarify; < F. raréfier = Pr. raréfier = Sp. rarificar = It. rarifi-care, < ML. as if raréficare*, < L. raréficere (> Pg. raréfizer), make thin or rare, < rarus, thin, rare, + facere, make.] I. trans. To make rare, thin, porous, or less dense; expand or enlarge without adding any new matter; figuratively, to spread or stretch out; distend: opposed to condense.

Presently the water, very much raréfied like a mist, began to rise. Court and Times of Charles I., I. 113.

For plain truths lose much of their weight when they are raréfied into subtilities. Stillington, Sermons, I. iv.

A body is commonly said to be raréfied or dilated (for I take the word in a larger sense than I know many others do) . . . when it acquires greater dimensions than the same body had before. Boyle, Works, I. 144.

Raréfyng osteitis, an osteitis in which the Haversian canals become enlarged and the bone rarefied. Also called osteoporosis.

II. intrans. To become rare; pass into a thinner or less dense condition.

Earth raréfies to dew: expanded more,
 The subtil dew in air begins to soar. Dryden.

rarely¹ (râr'li), adv. [(< rare¹, a., + -ly².)] 1.
 Seldom; not often: as, things rarely seen.

His friend always shall do best, and you shall rarely hear good of his enemy.
Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Partiall Man.

The good we never miss we rarely prize.
Cooper, Retirement, I. 406.

2. Finely; excellently; remarkably well; with a rare excellence.

I could play Ercole rarely, or a part to tear a cat in, to make all spilt. Shak., M. N. D., I. 2. 31.

Argyll has raised an hundred men,
 An hundred harness'd rarely.
Bonnie House of Airy (Child's Ballads, VI. 186).

You can write rarely now, after all your schooling, I should think. George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iii. 3.

3. In excellent health: in quasi-adjective use.
 Compare purely in like use. [Prov. Eng. and U. S.]

rarely² (râr'li), adv. [(< rare², a., + -ly².)] So as to be underdone or only partially cooked:
 said of meats: as, a roast of beef rarely cooked.

rareness¹ (râr'nes), n. [(< rare¹, a., + -ness.)]
 1. Thinness; tenuity; rarity: as, the rareness of air or vapor.—2. The state of being scarce, or of happening seldom; uncommonness; in-frequency.

If that the folly of men hadde not sette it [gold] in higher estimation for the rareness sake.

Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 6.
Rareness and difficulty give estimation
 To all things are i' th' world.
Webster, Devil's Law-Case, v. 6.

3. Uncommon character or quality; especially, unusual excellence, fineness, or the like.
 [Rare.]

Roses set in the midst of a pool, being supported by some stay; which is matter of rareness and pleasure, though of small use. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 407.

His providences toward us are to be admired for the rareness and graciousness of them. Sharp, Sermons, II. i.

rareness² (râr'nes), n. [(< rare², a., + -ness.)]
 The state of being rare or underdone in cooking.
rareripe (râr'rip), a. and n. [A reduction of rathripe, q. v.] I. a. Early ripe; ripe before others, or before the usual season: as, rareripe peaches.

II. n. An early fruit, particularly a kind of peach which ripens early.

rarify (râr'i-fi), v.; pret. and pp. raréfied, ppr.
raréfyng. A common but incorrect spelling of raréfy.

rarita (râr-rê'ti), n. [S. Amer.] Same as rara.
rarity (râr'i-ti), n.; pl. rarities (-tiz). [= OF. ra-rite, rarete, F. rarité = Pr. raritat, raretat = Sp. raridad = Pg. raridade = It. rarità = D. rariteit = G. rarität = Dan. Sw. raritet, < L. rarita (t)-s, the state of being thin or not dense, looseness of texture, tenuity, also fineness, rarity, a rare or curious thing, esp. in pl., < rarus, thin, rare: see rare¹.] 1. The condition of being rare, or not dense, or of occupying, as a corporeal substance, much space with little matter; thinness; tenuity: opposed to density: as, the rarity of a gas.

This I do . . . only that I may better demonstrate the great rarity and tenuity of their imaginary chaos.
Bentley, Sermons

A few birds . . . seemed to swim in an atmosphere of more than usual rarity.
R. L. Stevenson, Treasure of Franchard.

2. The state of being uncommon or of infrequent occurrence; uncommonness; infre-quency.

Alas, for the rarity
 Of Christian charity
 Under the sun!
Hood, Bridge of Sighs.

3. Something that is rare or uncommon; a thing valued for its scarcity or for its unusual excellence.

Gon. But the rarity of it is — which is indeed almost beyond credit.

Seb. As many vouched rarities are.
Shak., Tempest, ii. 1. 60.

How ignorant had we been of the beauty of Florence, of the monuments, urns, and rarities that yet remain.
J. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 34.

In climates where wine is a rarity intemperance abounds. Macaulay, Milton.

ras¹ (ras), n. [Ar. ras, head; cf. rais, reis, head, chief: see reis².] 1. A promontory; cape; peak:
 a term prefixed to the names of promontories or capes on the Arabian and African coasts, etc.
 —2. In Abyssinia, the title of the vizir or chief minister, and also of generals and governors.
 The ras of the empire was for a long period — down to the accession of the usurping King Theodore in 1855 — the actual ruler, the nominal Negus being merely a puppet.
 The ras commonly owed his position to superior military strength as governor of some province.

ras² (râ), n. [F.: see rash⁴.] A smooth material of wool, and also of silk: a French term

Dryden, Tyrannic Love, ProL, I. 21.

2. A rash act; a reckless or foolhardy deed.

Why not set forth, if I should do
This rashness, that which might ensue
With this old soul in organs new?

Tennyson, Two Voices.

= syn. 1. Rashness, temerity. Rashness has the vigor of the Anglo-Saxon, temerity the selectness and dignity of the Latin. Temerity implies personal danger, physical or other: as, the temerity of undertaking to contradict Samuel Johnson; temerity in going upon thin ice. Rashness is broader in this respect. Rashness goes by the feelings without the judgment; temerity rather disregards the judgment. Temerity refers rather to the disposition, rashness to the conduct. See adventurous.

For rashness is not courage. Rashness flings itself into danger without consideration or foresight. But courage counts the cost, and does not make any display of itself.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 336.

As the note of warlike preparation reached them [the Moors] in their fastnesses, they felt their temerity in thus bringing the whole weight of the Castilian monarchy on their heads.

Genesis and Exodus (E. E. T. S.), I. 2132.

That fellow . . . who insists that the shoe must fit him because it fitted his father and grandfather, and that, if his foot will not enter, he will pare and rasp it.

Landor, Imaginary Conversations, Solon and Pisistratus.

When the cane [in sugar-making] has been rasped to shreds [by a rasper], it is reduced to pulp by disintegrating apparatus.

Spons' Encyc. Manuf., II. 1879.

2. Figuratively, to affect or perform harshly, as if by the use of a rasp; grate upon; utter with a rough and jarring effect: as, to rasp one's feelings; to rasp out a refusal.

Through all the weird September-eves
I heard the harsh, reterant katydids
Rasp the mysterious silence.

J. G. Holland, Kathrina, I.

Grating songs a listening crowd endures,
Rasped from the throats of bellowing amateurs.

O. W. Holmes, An After-Dinner Poem.

II. intrans. To rub against something gratingly; produce a rasping effect: as, the vessel rasped against the quay: literally or figuratively.

Rasped harshly against his dainty nature.
Lowell, Vision of Sir Launfal, I. 6.

rasp¹ (rāsp), n. [= D. Dan. Sw. rasp = G. raspe, < OF. raspe, F. râpe (> G. raspe) (= It. raspa), a rasp, grater, < rasper, F. râper, grate, rasp, file: see *rase*¹, v.] 1. A coarse form of file, having its surface dotted with separate protruding teeth, formed by the indentations of a pointed punch. In cabinet-rasps, wood-rasps, and farmers' rasps the teeth are cut in lines sloping down from the left- to the right-hand side; in rasps for use in making boot- and shoe-lasts the teeth slope in the opposite way; and rasps for makers of gun-stocks and saddletrees are cut with teeth arrayed in circular lines or in crescent form: sometimes used figuratively.

The horses from the country were a goodly sight to see, with the rasp of winter bristles rising through and among the soft summer-coat.

R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, lix.

2. A machine or large instrument for use in rasping; a rasper.

The juice [of beet-roots] from the rasp and the press is brought into a boiler and heated by steam.

Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 210.

3. The radula or odontophore of a mollusk; the lingual ribbon. See cut under radula.—4.

A rasping surface. (a) The steel of a tinder-box. [Prov. Eng.] (b) The rough surface of the tongue of some animals.

He dismounted when he came to the cattle, and walked among them, stroking their soft flanks, and feeling in the palm of his hand the rasp of their tongues.

The Century, XXXV. 947.

rasp² (rāsp), n. [Formerly also respe, also raspis, raspise, raspice, respas (with occasional pl. raspisses), appar. orig. pl., prop. raspes (the berries), used as sing. (the bush, and later transferred to a single berry f), prob. < *rasp*¹, n., or abbr. of raspberry, < *rasp*¹ + *berry*¹, with ref. to its rough outside; cf. It. raspo, a raspberry (Florio): see *rasp*¹.] The fruit of the common (European) raspberry. See raspberry. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

The soyle of this playne bryngheth fourth ferne and bramble bushes bearynge blacke berries or wyld raspes, which two are tokens of coulede regions.

Peter Martyr (tr. in Eden's First Books on America, ed. [Arber], p. 172).

For kindes of fruites, they haue . . . rasps, strawberries, and hurtilberries.

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 477.

Rosey had done eating up her pine-apple, artlessly confessing . . . that she preferred it to the rasps and hinny-blobs in her grandmamma's garden.

Thackeray, Newcomes, xxlii.

rasp³ (rāsp), v. i. [Cf. G. räuspfern, hawk or clear the throat; prob. imitative.] To belch; eject wind from the stomach. [Old and prov. Eng.]

Let them bind gold to their aching head, drink Cleopatra's draught (precious stones dissolved), to ease their rasping stomach.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 424.

This man of nice education hath a feeble stomach, and (rasping since his last meal) doubts whether he should eat of his last meal or nothing.

Sp. Hall, Heaven upon Earth, § 26.

raspatory (ras'pā-tō-ri), n.; pl. raspatories (-riz). [< ML. raspatorium (cf. Sp. Pg. raspador, a scraper), < raspare, rasp, scrape: see *rasp*¹, v.] A surgeons' rasp; an instrument for scraping or abrading bones in surgical or anatomical operations.

raspberry (rāz'ber'i), n.; pl. raspberries (-iz). [Formerly also rasberry and raspis-berry; < *rasp*¹, or *rasp*² (see *rasp*²), + *berry*¹.] 1. The fruit of several plants of the genus Rubus, consisting of many small juicy grains or drupes, which, unlike those of the blackberry, separate from the convex receptacle together when ripe, thus giving the fruit the shape of a thimble. Besides its extensive use as a dessert fruit, the raspberry is used for jellies and jam, and its juice for flavoring, for cooling drinks, and in wines and brandies.

Herewith (at hand) taking her borne of plentie.

Fill'd with the choyse of every orchard's daintie,

As peares, plums, apples, the sweet raspis-berry.

W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, I. 5.

2. The plant that produces this berry. The common garden raspberry, the first of the name, is Rubus Idaeus, a native of Europe and Asiatic Russia—a shrub with perennial creeping rootstock, nearly erect, prickly, biennial stems, and a red pleasant fruit. It was cultivated by the Romans in the fourth century, and is the source of the best raspberries, affording many varieties, some of them yellow-fruited. The wild red raspberry, R. strigosus, of North America, is a very similar plant, but not quite so tall, the leaves being thinner, and the fruit not so firm, large, or well-flavored. It is common northward, especially on newly cleared grounds, and its fruit is much gathered; while under cultivation it has yielded several good varieties. The black raspberry, thimbleberry, or blackcap is the American R. occidentalis, a shrub with long recurved biennial stems, rooting at the tips, and a black fruit. It is very productive with little care, and affords good garden varieties.—Dwarf raspberry, an unimportant American species, Rubus triflorus, with herbaceous trailing or ascending stems, resembling a blackberry.—Flowering raspberry, a name of two American species, Rubus odoratus, the purple, and R. Nutkanus, the white flowering raspberry. The former is a rather ornamental shrub of the eastern United States, with ample three- to five-lobed leaves, and showy purple or pink flowers blooming all summer, the fruit of little worth. In England it is sometimes called Virginian raspberry. R. Nutkanus is a similar western species with white flowers; also, and better, called salmon-berry.—Himalayan raspberry, Rubus roseifolius, an East Indian species widely naturalized and cultivated in warm countries, and often grown as a greenhouse shrub, on account of its profusion of white, often double, flowers. The large fruit consists of many minute orange-red grains.—Raspberry vinegar, a drink made with sugar, vinegar, and the juice of raspberries.—Virginian raspberry. See flowering raspberry.

raspberry-borer (răz'ber-i-bör'ér), n. The larva of one of the clear-winged sphinxes or hornet-moths, Bembecia maculata, common in the United States. It bores the roots of raspberries and blackberries. The larva of a beetle, Oberia bimaculata, which also bores into the same plants, is often called by this name.

Raspberry-borer (Bembecia maculata).
a, male; b, female. (Natural size.)

raspberry-bush (răz'ber-i-büş), n. The shrub, bush, or bramble producing any of the kinds of raspberry.

raspberry-jam tree (răz'ber-i-jam trê), n. One of the Australian wattle-trees, Acacia acuminata. Its wood is used in cabinet-work, and has the odor of jam made from raspberries.

rasped (răsp't), a. [Pp. of rasp¹, v.] 1. Affected as if by rasping; hoarse or raucous, as the voice; raspy; nervous or irritable, as from continued slight provocations.—2. In bookbinding, said of book-covers which have the sharp angles taken off, but are not beveled.

rasper (răsp'pér), n. [< rasp¹ + -er¹.] 1. One who or that which rasps; a cutting scraper. Specifically—(a) A coarse file for removing the burnt crust from over-baked bread. (b) A rasping-machine; an instrument for rasping sugar-cane, beet-root, or the like to shreds; a large grater.

The typical representative of the internal system of grating is Champonnois' rasper. Spons' Enycy. Manuf., II. 1838.

2. In hunting, a difficult fence. [Colloq.]

Three fourths of our fences . . . average somewhat better than four feet in height, with an occasional rasper that will come well up to five. The Century, XXXII. 336.

3. A contrivance for taking fish, consisting of several bare hooks fastened back to back, to be jerked through the water with a line; a pull-devil. [Canada.]

rasp-house (răsp'hous), n. A place where wood is dressed or reduced to powder by rasping, for use in dyeing, etc.

We went to see the Rasp-house, where the lusty knaves are compelled to work, and the rasping of Brasil and Logwood is very hard labour. Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 19, 1641.

raspicet, n. Same as rasp².

rasping (răsp'ping), n. [Verbal n. of rasp¹, v.] A particle rasped off from a body or mass of matter. Compare filing¹, 2.

The wood itself, either reduced to shavings, raspings, or powder. W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 337.

rasping (răsp'ping), p. a. [Ppr. of rasp¹, v.] 1. Characterized by grating or scraping; as, a rasping sound; hence, irritating; exasperating.—2. In hunting, said of a fence difficult to take.

You cannot . . . make him keep his seat over a rasping fence. Dr. J. Brown, Spare Hours, 3d ser., p. 60.

raspingly (răsp'ping-li), adv. With a harsh, rasping sound or effect; in a coarse, harsh manner; gratingly; irritatingly; exasperatingly.

I told him to stay at home, quite raspingly, and he was very ready to admit that I had done him a good turn in doing so. F. H. Burnett, Pretty Polly Pemberton, vii.

rasping-machine (răsp'ping-ma-shên'), n. 1. A machine for rasping wood and bark for making dyes, tinctures, etc.; a bark-cutting machine.—2. A machine for grating beet-root, for making sugar. E. H. Knight.

rasping-mill (răsp'ping-mil), n. A saw-like machine for reducing a substance to shreds or fine particles, as a bark-cutter or a grinding-mill for beet-roots; a rasping-machine; a rasper.

raspist, n. Same as rasp².

The raspis is planted in gardens. Gerard.
Raspis are of the same virtue that common brier or bramble is of. It were good to keepe some of the juyce of raspis-berries in some wooden vessel, and to make it, as it were, raspis wine. Langham, Garden of Health, p. 522.

rasp-palm (răsp'pim), n. A common palm of the Amazon region, Iriartea exorrhiza, notable in that its stem is supported by a cone of aerial roots, of sufficient height for a man to pass beneath. These roots are covered with hard tubercles, and are used by the natives as graters, whence the name.

rasp-pod (răsp'pod), n. An Australian tree, Flindersia australis: so named from its woody capsules, covered with tubercles and used as graters.

rasp-punch (răsp'punch), n. A tool, rather more like a cold-chisel than a punch, used for forming the teeth of rasps by cutting into, and turning upward above the surface, parts of the metal before it has been hardened and tempered.

raspy (răsp'pi), a. [< rasp¹ + -y¹.] Grating; harsh; rough.

Such a raspy, untamed voice as that of his I have hardly heard. Carlyle, Misc., IV. 197. (Davies.)

rasse¹ (ras), n. [< Javanese rasa, smell, taste, < Skt. rasa, sap, taste, savor.] A kind of civet-cat; the lesser civet, a viverrine quadruped of the genus Viverricula, V. malaccensis, widely distributed in China, India, the Malay peninsula, Java, etc. It is about 20 inches long without the tail, and is sometimes called the Malacca civet. Its perfume, called by the natives dedes, is secreted in a double pouch like that of the civet; it is much valued by the Javanese. For its sake the animal is often kept in captivity. It is savage and irritable, and can inflict a very severe bite.

rasse², n. [ME.] An eminence; a mound; a summit.

On a rasse of a rok hit reste at the late.
On the mount of Maruch of Armech hills.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), II. 448.

rastral (ras'tral), n. [< rastrum + -al.] Same as rastrum.

rastrite (ras'trit), n. A zoöphyte of the genus Rastrites; a graptolite.

Rastrites (ras'tri-téz), n. [NL., < L. rastrum, a rake, + -ites.] A genus of fossil Silurian zoöphytes: same as Graptolithus.

rastrum (ras'trum), n.; pl. rastra (-trâ). [NL., < L. rastrum, a rake, hoe, mattock, < radere, scrape: see rase¹.] 1. A five-pointed pen for ruling staves for music; a music-pen.—2. A herse.

rasure (ră'zür), n. [Early mod. E. also razure; < F. rasure = Sp. Pg. It. rasura, a shaving, a blotting off, also the priest's tonsure, < L. rasura, a shaving, scraping, < radere, pp. rasus, scrape: see rase¹. Cf. crasure.] 1. The act of scraping or shaving; a rasing or erasing; a scratch. [Rare.]

With the tooth of a small beast like a rat they race some their faces, some their bodies, after diuers formes, as if it were with the scratch of a pin, the print of which rasure can neuer be done away againe during life. Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 674.

A fortified residence 'gainst the tooth of time
And rasure of oblivion. Shak., M. for M., v. 1. 13.

2t. Same as erasure.

There were many razures in the book of the treasury. Bp. Burnet.

rat¹ (rat), n. [Formerly also ratt; < ME. ratte, rotte, pl. ratte, < AS. rætt (-) = MD. ratte, D. rat = OLG. ratia, MLG. ratte, LG. ratte, also rat, rot = OHG. rato, m., ratta, f., MHG. rat, râte, m., ratte, râte, f., MHG. also ratz, ratze, G. ratze, m., = Icel. rotta = Sw. rätta = Dan. rotte, a rat; cf. F. Pr. rat = Sp. Pg. rato = It. ratto = ML. ratus, rattus; cf. also Ir. Gael. radan, Bret. raz, a rat. The relations of the Teut., Rom., and Celtic groups to one another, and the ult. source of the word, are unknown. Some refer the word to the root seen in L. radere, scratch, scrape (see rase¹, razel¹), rodere, gnaw (see rodent). The forms of the word cat are equally wide-spread.] 1. A rodent of some of the larger species of the genus Mus, as M. rattus, the black rat, and M. decumanus, the gray, brown, or Norway rat: distinguished from mouse. The distinction between rat and mouse, in the application of the names to animals everywhere parasitic with man, is obvious and familiar. But these are simply larger and smaller species of the same genus, very closely related zoologically, and in the application of the two names to the many other species of the same genus all distinction between them is lost.

2. Any rodent of the family Muridæ; a murine; in the plural, the Muridæ. In this sense, rat includes mouse. American rats or mice are a particular section of the subfamily Murine, called Stenomys, confined to America, where no other Muridæ are indigenous. Field-rats, water-rats, meadow-mice, or voles are Muridæ of the subfamily Arvicolinæ. See cuts under Arvicola, Muridæ, muskrat, Neotoma, Neotoma, and Neomys.

3. Any rodent of the suborder Myomorpha. Different animals of several families, as Dipodidæ, Zapodidæ, Saccomyidæ, Geomysidæ, Spalacidæ, are often known as rats of some kind distinguished by qualifying words or compound names. See cut under mole-rat.

4. Some other rodent, or some insectivore, marsupial, or other animal like or likened to a rat. Thus, among hystriomorphic rodents, many species of Octodontidæ are called rats: as, the spiny rats of the subfamily Echinomyinæ. Some large aquatic shrews are known as muskrats. (See Myosale.) Some rat-like marsupials are known as kangaroo-rats. (See betlong, and cuts under kangaroo-rat and Echimyæ.)

5. A person who is considered to act in some respect in a manner characteristic of rats: so called in opprobrium. Specifically—(a) A man who deserts a party or an association of any kind for one opposed to it in order to gain some personal advantage or benefit; a self-seeking turncoat; a renegade. [Colloq.]

He [Wentworth] was the first of the rats, the first of those statesmen whose patriotism had been only the coquetry of a political prostitution, and whose profligacy has taught governments to adopt the old maxim of the slave-market, that it is cheaper to buy than to breed, to import defenders from an Opposition than to rear them in a Ministry. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

(b) A workman who accepts lower wages than those current at the time and place or required by an authorized scale, or one who takes a position vacated by a striker, or one who refuses to strike when others do. [Colloq.]

The men who agree to go into the strike are always the more united and determined class. The rats who refuse suffer accordingly. The American, III. 181.

(c) A clergyman: so called in contempt. Hallivell.

6. Something suggesting the idea of a rat, as a curving roll of stuffed cloth or of crimped hair-work, with tapering ends, formerly (about 1860-70) and still occasionally used by women to puff out the hair, which was turned over it.

At one time even a small amount of natural hair easily served the purpose of covering the crescent-shaped pillows on which it was put up, the startling names of which were rats and mice. The Century, XXXVI. 769.

Alexandrian rat, a gray or rufous-backed and white-bellied variety of Mus rattus, to which the name M. alexandrinus has been applied, owing to its having been first discovered at Alexandria in Egypt, but which is not specifically distinct from the black rat.—Bamboo-rat, an Indian murine rodent mammal of the genus Rhizomys, as R. sinensis. The bay bamboo-rat is R. badius. The species are also called cane-rats. See cut under Rhizomys.—Banded rat, (a) The Anglo-Indian name of the large murine rodents of India, of the family Muridæ, subfamily Phalomyinæ, and genus Neoskia, of which there are several species, all Indian. N. griffithi is an example. See cut under Neoskia. (b) Same as banded rat.—Black rat, Mus rattus, one of the most anciently known rats, now almost cosmopolitan, and typically of a blackish color, but very variable in this respect. It is rather smaller than the Norway gray rat. In one of its varieties it is known as roof-rat (Mus tectorum) and white-bellied rat. See cut under Muridæ.—Hare-tailed rat, See lemmyng.—Maori rat, the black rat, Mus rattus, introduced and naturalized in New Zealand.—Mountain rat, the large bushy-tailed wood-rat of the Rocky Mountain region, Neotoma cinerea; the pack-rat. [U. S.]—Norway rat, the common rat, Mus decumanus.—Pack-rat, the mountain rat, Neotoma cinerea: so called on account of its curious and inveterate habit of dragging off to its hole any object it can move. [Western U. S.]—Pharaonic rat, Pharaoh's rat, the ichneumon: a phrase traceable back at least to Belon (about 1555). See Herpestes.—Also called Pharaoh's mouse.—Pouched rat. See pouched.—To have a rat in the garret, to be slightly crack-brained: same as to have a bee in one's bonnet (which see, under bee).—To smell a rat, to be suspicious that all is not right; have an inkling of some mischief, plot, or underhand proceeding.

Quoth Hudibras, "I smell a rat:
Ralpho, thou dost prevaricate."
S. Butler, Hudibras, I. l. 821.

rat¹ (rat), v.; pret. and pp. ratted, ppr. ratting. [< rat¹, n.] I. intrans. 1. To catch or kill rats; follow the business of a rat-ter or rat-catcher.—2. To go over from one party or cause to another, especially from a party or cause that is losing or likely to lose, as rats run from a falling house; desert one's party or associates for advantage or gain; become a renegade. [Colloq.]

His ci-devant friends curse the hour that he ratted. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 385.

I am fully resolved to oppose several of the clauses. But to declare my intention publicly, at a moment when the Government is in danger, would have the appearance of ratting. Macaulay, in Trevelyan, I. 275.

3. To work for less than current wages, to refuse to strike with fellow-workmen, or to take the place of one who has struck: often with indefinite it. See rat¹, n., 5 (b). [Colloq.]

II. trans. 1. To puff out (the hair) by means of a rat. See rat¹, n., 6. [Rare.]

Next morning, at breakfast, Sir Saxon was as beautifully ruffed, ratted, and crimped—as gay, as bewitching, and as defiant—as ever. Mrs. Whitney, Leslie Goldthwaite, x.

2. To displace or supplant union workers in: as, to rat an office or a shop. [Colloq.]

rat² (rat), n. [Usually in pl. rats, < ME. ratten, rags; either from the verb, ME. ratten, tear (see rat², v.), or < Icel. hrat, brati, rubbish, trash, = Norw. rat, rubbish: cf. Sw. Norw. rata, reject, refuse (see rate¹).] A rag; tatter. [Prov. Eng.]

I rattles and I clutes. Old Eng. Homilies, I. 227.

rat² (rat), v. t. [< ME. ratten = MHG. ratzen, tear; cf. rat², n.] To tear.

How wat3 thou hardy this hous for thyn vnhap [to] ne3e, In on so ratted a robe & rent at the syd3es? Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), II. 144.

rat³ (rat), v. t. [Prob. a var. of rat²; cf. drat², in similar use.] A term of oburgation, used in the imperative.

rat⁴. A Middle English contracted form of redeth, the third person singular present indicative of read. Piers Plowman.

rata (rā'tā), n. [New Zealand.] A tree of New Zealand, Metrosideros robusta, growing from 60 to 80 feet high, the wood of which is used in cabinet-work, and in civil and naval architecture. The name belongs also to M. florida, a stout-trunked climber ascending the highest trees; it is also more or less extended by settlers to other species of the genus. Besides in several cases yielding valuable wood, these trees are notable for their profusion of brilliant flowers, which are generally, as in M. robusta, scarlet. See fire-tree and Metrosideros.

ratability (rā-ta-bil'i-ti), n. [< ratable + -ity (see -bility).] The quality of being ratable. Athenæum, No. 3261, p. 535.

ratable (rā'ta-bl), a. [Also rateable; < rate² + -able.] 1. Capable of being rated, or set at a certain value.

I collect out of the abbay booke of Burton, that 20 Ore were ratable to two markes of siluer.

Camden, Remains, Money.

2. Reckoned according to a certain rate; proportional.

In conscience and credit [poets were] bound, next after the diuine praises of the Immortal gods, to yeld a like ratable honour to all such amongst men as most resembled the gods by excellencie of function.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 28.

A ratable payment of all the debts of the deceased, in equal degree, is clearly the most equitable method.

Blackstone, Com., III. 11.

3. Liable or subjected by law to be rated or assessed for taxation.

ratableness (rā'ta-bl-nes), n. Ratability.

ratably (rā'ta-blī), adv. According to rating or valuation; at a proportionate rate; proportionally.

I will thus charge them all ratably, according to their abilities, towards their maintenance.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

The shareholders of every national banking association shall be held individually responsible, equally and ratably.

National Bank Act, U. S. (ed. 1882), p. 14.

ratāfa (rat-ā-fē'ā), n. [Formerly also ratifā, ratifē, also ratāfā; = D., etc., ratifia, < F. ratifia, formerly also ratifiat (cf. F. tafia, rum, arrack), = Sp. ratifia = Pg. ratifia, < Malay araq, a distilled spirit, arrack (< Ar. araq, juice, distilled spirit: see arrack), + tafia, tafia, a spirit distilled from molasses.] 1. A sweet cordial flavored with fruits: sometimes limited to those the flavor of which is obtained from black currants, bitter almonds, or peach- and cherry-kernels.

It would make a Man smile to behold her Figure in a front Box, where her twinkling Eyes, by her Afternoon's Drams of Ratifée and cold Tea, sparkle more than her Pendants.

Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of [Queen Anne, I. 201.]

2. A kind of fancy cake or biscuit.

Give him three ratāfas, soaked in a dessert-spoonful of cream.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 1.

ratān, rattan² (ra-tan'), n. [Formerly also rotān, rotān, rotang, rottang; = D. Sw. Dan. rotting (NL. Rotang), < F. rotin, rotang = Sp. rota, < Malay rotan, ratan. The E. accent, on the last syllable, is appar. in imitation of the F.; the Malay word is accented on the first syllable.] 1. A palm of one among numerous species, mostly of the genus Calamus, a few of the genus Rhapis; a ratan-palm. The species of Calamus are prevaillingly climbing palms, attaining a length sometimes of 500 feet, with a thickness not exceeding an inch—ascending the tallest trees, falling in festoons, and again ascending. A few species are found in Africa and Australia, but they abound chiefly in the East Indies, on the mainland and islands. The species of Rhapis are erect slender canes growing in dense tufts, and are natives of China and Japan. Ratans of this habit are commercially distinguished from the climbing ones as ground-ratans.

2. The stems of the ratan collectively as an economic material. Among its chief commercial sources are Calamus Rotang, C. rudentum, C. verus, C. erectus, and C. Royleanus. The most valuable ratan is produced in Borneo. On account of its length and light, tough, flexible, and fissile character, ratan is applied to very numerous uses. In native regions the product of C. rudentum and other species is split and twisted in vast quantities into all sizes of cordage from cables to fishing-lines. Basket-making is another common use. In some places the stems of climbing ratans are used for the suspension of foot-bridges of great length. In China whole houses are made of ratan, there afforded chiefly by Rhapis flabelliformis. Matting made of split ratan is exported thence to all parts of the world. The same fiber serves also to make hats, the bottoms of rice-sieves, thread for sewing palm-leaves, etc. In recent times ratan has become an important article in western commerce. It is now not only used for walking-sticks, but extensively made into chairs and chair-bottoms, bodies for fancy carriages, fine and coarse basket-work, etc. It has almost superseded willow in making the large baskets required in manufacturing and other industries.

3. A switch or stick of ratan, especially a walking-stick.

Mr. Humley did give me a little black rattoon, painted and gilt.

Pepey, Diary, an. 1660.

ratan, rattan² (ra-tan'), v. t. [< ratan, rattan², n.] 1. To use ratan in making; cover or form with interlaced lengths of ratan.

The second class coach is finished in native ash with Moorish designed ceilings, rattaned sofa seats, and closet and toilet rooms.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LIX. 3.

2. To use a ratan upon; beat with or as with a ratan-cane. [Colloq.]

ratan-cane (ra-tan'kän), n. Same as ratan, 3.

ratanhine (rat'an-in), n. [< Braz. Pg. ratanhia (see ratany) + -ine².] An alkaloid (C₁₀H₁₃NO₃) occurring in small quantity in the extract of ratany-root.

ratany (rat'a-ni), n. [Also ratany, ratanyh, and rhatany; = F. ratanhia, < Braz. Pg. ratanhia, < Peruv. ratana, native name.] 1. A procumbent South American shrub, Krameria triandra, yielding a medicinal root. Its foliage is silver-gray with silky hairs, and it bears star-like lake-colored flowers singly in the upper axils. See Krameria and ratany-root.

2. A medicinal substance procured from this plant: same as ratany-root. — Pará, Brazilian, or Ceará ratany, a substitute for the true ratany, obtained from Krameria argentea of northeastern Brazil.

ratany-root (rat'a-ni-röt), n. The root-substance of the ratany, used in medicine for its astringent, diuretic, and detergent properties, and in the adulteration of port-wine.

rataplan (rat-a-plon'), n. [F.; imitative. Cf. rataplan³, rat-a-lat.] The sound or music of the military drum; a tattoo or "rub-a-dub."

rat-a-tat (rat'a-tat'), n. [Imitative. Cf. rat-a-lat, rat-a-lat-too.] A rattling sound or effect, as from the beating of a drum.

rat-catcher (rat'kach'er), n. One whose business is the catching of rats; a ratter.

rat-catching (rat'kach'ing), n. The catching of rats, now pursued as a business by rat-catchers, and formerly to a large extent in Great Britain, with dogs or ferrets, as a popular amusement.

rat¹ (rach), v. [An assimilated form of rack¹, or in part a var. of retch¹ or reach¹: see rack¹, v.] 1. trans. 1. To stretch or pull asunder.—2. To spot or streak. Halliwel.

[Prov. Eng. in both uses.]

II. intrans. Naut., to make a stretch or varying stretches in sailing; sail by the wind or by tacks; stand off and on.

There was a fleet of smacks ratching to the eastward on our port bow.

W. C. Russell, Jack's Courtship, xxiii.

rat¹ (rach), n. [An assimilated form of rack¹: see rack¹, n. In defs. 3 and 4, directly from the verb. Cf. dim. ratel.] 1. In a machine, a bar having angular teeth, into which a pawl drops, to prevent the machine from being reversed in motion. A circular ratch is a ratchet-wheel.—2. In clockwork, a sort of wheel having fangs, which serve to lift the detents and thereby cause the clock to strike.—3. A straight line. [Prov. Eng.].—4. A white mark on the face of a horse. [Eng.]

rat² (rach), n. [Early mod. E. also rach, rache; < ME. racche, rache, < AS. ræcc, a dog, = Icel. rakki, a dog.] A dog that hunts by scent.

As they ryde talkynge,

A rach ther come flyngynge

Overtwert the way.

Thanne seyde old and yonge,

From her first gynnynge,

They ne sawe honde never so gay.

Lybeaus Deseon (Ritson's Metr. Rom., II.).

There are in England and Scotland two kinds of hunting dogs: the first is called a racche; and this is a foot-scenting creature, both of wild beasts, birds, and fishes also which lie hid among the rocks; the female hereof is called in England a brache. Gentleman's Recreation, p. 28.

rat³ (rach), v. t. Same as rash³. [Scotch.]

rat⁴ (rach), n. [Origin obscure. Cf. ratel.] A subsoil of stone and gravel mixed with clay.

Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

ratel (rach't), p. a. [Pp. of rat³, v.] Ragged; in a ruinous state. Jamieson. [Scotch.]

ratel (rach'el), n. [Also ratel, ratelil; cf. rat⁴, ratel.] Perhaps < G. rutschel, the fragments from two masses of rock sliding one on the other, < rutschen, slide, slip.] Fragments of stone; gravelly stone; also, a hard, rocky crust below the soil. Jamieson. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

ratcher (rach'er), n. [Cf. rat⁴, ratel.] A rock. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

ratchet (rach'et), n. [< rat¹ + -et.] A detent or pivoted piece designed to fit into the teeth of a ratchet-wheel, permitting the wheel to rotate in one direction, but not in the other. A similar device so arranged as to move the wheel is termed a paw. (See ratchet-wheel, click¹, 3, pawl, and detent.) Combined with the ratchet-wheel as a means of converting a reciprocating into a rotary motion, the ratchet appears in a number of tools and gives its name to each: as, the ratchet bed-key, etc.

ratchet-brace (rach'et-bräs), n. See bracel.

ratchet-burner (rach'et-bér'nér), n. A burner for a lamp in which the wick is moved up and down by means of a wheel with notched points.

ratchet-coupling (rach'et-kup'ling), n. A device for uncoupling machinery in the event of a sudden stoppage of the motion of a driving-wheel, as by an obstruction. It consists of a ratchet-wheel inserted in a sleeve on the exterior shaft of a driving-wheel. The ratchet is efficient as long as it transmits the initial motion; but if the revolution of the driver is checked, the sleeve slips over the ratchet until the machinery loses its momentum, thus avoiding a shock.

ratchet-drill (rach'et-dril), n. A tool for drilling holes by means of a ratchet in a narrow plane where there is no room for the common brace.

ratchet-jack (rach'et-jak), n. A form of screw-jack in which the lever-socket is fitted with a pawl engaging a ratchet-wheel, so that the jack may be operated by oscillation of the lever.

ratchet-lever (rach'et-lev'er), n. A lever with a collar fitted around a ratchet-wheel which engages a pawl on the lever, used for operating a drill or screw by oscillation of the lever.

ratchet-pedal (rach'et-ped'al), n. See pedal.

ratchet-post (rach'et-pöst), n. Milit., a metallic post fastened to the rear transom of the top-carriage of a heavy gun, to serve as a support or fulcrum for the elevating-bar.

ratchet-punch (rach'et-punch), n. A punch worked by a screw which is revolved by means of a ratchet-lever.

ratchet-wheel (rach'et-hwél), n. A wheel with pointed and angular teeth, against which a ratchet abuts, used either for converting a reciprocating into a rotary motion on the shaft to which it is fixed, or for admitting of its motion in one direction only.

For both purposes an arrangement similar to that shown in the cut is employed. a is the ratchet-wheel, and b the reciprocating lever, to the end of which is jointed a small ratchet or pawl c, furnished with a catch of the same form as the teeth of the wheel, which, when the lever is moved in one direction, slides over the teeth, but in returning draws the wheel with it. The pawl c is forced into engagement with the teeth of the ratchet-wheel by the spring f. The other ratchet, d, which may be used either separately or in combination with the first, permits of the motion of the wheel in the direction of the arrow, but opposes its return in the opposite direction. Also called click-wheel. See also cut under pawl.

Ratchet-wheel.

ratchet-wrench (rach'et-rench), n. A ratchet bed-key wrench.

ratchety (rach'e-ti), a. [< ratchet + -y¹.] Like the movement of a ratchet; jerky; clicking.

Railkes . . . poured out a ratchety but vehement panegyric.

The Money-Makers, p. 128.

ratchil, n. See ratchel.

ratchment (rach'ment), n. [< rat¹ + -ment.] In arch., a flying-buttress which springs from the principals of a horse and abuts against the central or chief principal. Oxford Glossary.

rate¹ (rát), v.; pret. and pp. rated, ppr. rating. [< ME. raten, chide, scold, in comp., < Sw. rata, reject, refuse, slight, find fault with (cf. rat-gods, refuse goods), = Norw. rata, reject, cast aside as rubbish; akin to Norw. rat, refuse, rubbish, trash, = Icel. hrat, hrati, rubbish, trash, skins, stones, etc., of berries; Norw. rata, bad, worthless: see rat².] I. trans. 1. To chide with vehemence; reprove; scold; censure violently.

He shal be rated of his studying.

Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 277.

Go, rate thy minions, proud insulting boy!

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., II. 2. 84.

His mother is angry, rates him.

B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, Arg.

2. To affect by chiding or reproving; restrain by vehement censure.

No words may rate, nor rigour him remove From greedy hold of that his bloudy feast.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. ix. 31.

II. intrans. To utter vehement censure or reproof; inveigh scoldingly: with at.

Yea, the Moores, meeting with this beast, doe rate and braule at him.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 42.

Such a one
As all day long hath rated at her child,
And vext his day.

Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

rate² (rāt), n. [OF. rate, price, value, = Pr. Sp. Pg. It. rata = G. rate, < ML. rata, rate, proportion (L. pro rata parte, or pro rata portione, or simply pro rata, according to a certain part or portion (see pro rata, pro-rate)); fem. of L. ratus, determined, fixed, settled, pp. of reri (ind. reor), think, deem, judge, orig. reckon, calculate. From the same L. verb are ult. derived *E. rate*³, ratio, ration, reason, arason, *arraign*¹, etc., ratify, etc.] 1. A reckoning by comparative values or relations; proportional estimation according to some standard; relative amount, quantity, range, or degree: as, the rate of interest is 6 per cent. (that is, $6 for every $100 for every year); the rate per mile of railroad charges, expenses, or speed; a rapid rate of growth or of progress.

He lends out money gratis, and brings down
The rate of usance here with us in Venice.

Shak., M. of V., I. 3. 46.

One of the necessary properties of pure Motion is Velocity. It is not possible to think of Motion without thinking of a corresponding Rate of motion.

A. Daniell, Prin. of Physics, p. 52.

As regards travelling, the fastest rate along the high roads was ten miles an hour.

W. Besant, Fifty Years Ago, p. 5.

It was no longer practicable to levy the duties on the old plan of one rate for unrefined and another rate for refined sugars.

S. Douell, Taxes in England, IV. 31.

2. Charge or valuation according to a scale or standard; comparative price or amount of demand; a fixed measure of estimation.

A jewel that I have purchased at an Infinite rate.

Shak., M. W. of W., II. 2. 218.

I am not . . . content to part with my commodities at a cheaper rate than I accustomed; look not for it.

B. Jonson, Volpone, II. 1.

They have no Goods but what are brought from Manilla at an extraordinary dear rate. Damylar, Voyages, I. 308.

Servants could be hired of their nominal owners at a barley-corn rate.

The Century, XXXIX. 139.

3. A fixed public tax or imposition assessed on property for some local purpose, usually according to income or value: as, poor-rates or church-rates in Great Britain.

They paid the Church and Parish Rate,
And took, but read not the Receipt.

Prior, An Epitaph.

The empowering of certain boards to borrow money repayable from the local rates, to employ and pay those out of work.

H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 9.

A sewers rate, however, was known as early as the sixth year of Henry VI. (1427).

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, II. 477.

4. A proportion allotted or permitted; an allotment or provision; a regulated amount or supply.

The one right feeble through the evil rate
Of food which in her duresse she had found.

Spenser, F. Q., IV. viii. 19.

The people shall go out and gather a certain rate every day.

Ex. xvi. 4.

5. A relative scale of being, action, or conduct; comparative degree or extent of any mode of existence or procedure; proportion in manner or method: as, an extravagant rate of living or of expenditure. See at any rate, at no rate, below.

With wyse men there is rest & peace, after a blessed rate.

Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 92.

With might and delight they spent all the night,
And liv'd at a plentiful rate.

Robin Hood and the Ranger (Child's Ballads, V. 210).

Tom hinting his dislike of some trifle his mistress had said, she asked him how he would talk to her after marriage, if he talked at this rate before.

Addison.

Shak., M. N. D., III. 1. 157.

With the common rate of men there is nothing commendable but what they themselves may hope to be partakers of.

Steele, Spectator, No. 188.

8. The order or class of a vessel, formerly regulated in the United States navy by the number of guns carried, but now by the tonnage displacement. Vessels of 5,000 tons displacement and over are of the first rate, of 3,000 and above but below 5,000 tons of the second rate, of 1,000 and above but below 3,000 tons of the third rate, of less than 1,000 tons of the fourth rate. In classifying the navies of England, France, and the other principal European powers the term class is used instead of rate, and relates not so much to the actual weight or power of the ships as to arbitrary divisions of types of vessels, and to their relative importance as battle-ships, cruisers, etc.

9. In the United States navy, the grade or position of any one of the crew: same as *rating*², 2.—10. In horology, the daily gain or loss of a chronometer or other timepiece. A losing rate is called by astronomers a positive rate, because it entails a positive correction to the difference of readings of the clock-face.—At any rate, in any manner, or by any means; in any case; at all events; positively; assuredly: as, I shall stay at any rate; at any rate the claim is a valid one.

I have no friend,
Project, design, or country but your favour,
Which I'll preserve at any rate.

Fletcher (and another), False One, I. 1.

At no rate, in no manner; by no means; not at all. [Rare.]

Shalt thou performe thy worke, least thou doe draw
My heavy wrath vpon thee.

Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 16.

County rates, landing-rates, police rate, etc. See county, landing, etc.—Rate of change, in math., the ratio of an infinitesimal increment of any function to that of the independent variable. Thus, the rate of change of x^2 relatively to x is $2x$.—Rate of exchange. Same as course of exchange (which see, under exchange).—Rate of profit. See profit. (See also church-rate, poor-rate.)—8yn. 3. Assessment, impost, etc. See tax.

rate² (rāt), v.; pret. and pp. rated, ppr. rating. [*< rate*³, n.] 1. trans. 1. To reckon by comparative estimation; regard as of such a value, rank, or degree; hold at a certain valuation or estimate; appraise; fix the value or price of.

If thou be'st rated by thy estimation.

Shak., M. of V., II. 7. 26.

The frigid productions of a later age are rated at no more than their proper value.

Macaulay, Dryden.

2. To assess as to payment or contribution; fix the comparative liability of, for taxation or the like; reckon at so much in obligation or capability; set a rate upon.

Tell us (I pray you) how ye would have the sayd landes rated, that both a rente may rise thereout into the Queene, and also the souldiours paye.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

Look on my George; I am a gentleman;

Rate me at what thou wilt, thou shalt be paid.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., IV. 1. 30.

Rathke's trabeculae. See trabecula.

rathlyt, adv. [ME. also rathely, radly, radliche, < AS. hrædlíce, quickly, hastily, speedily, < hræth, quick: see rath¹.] In a rath manner; quickly; suddenly.

Thomas rathely vpe he rase.

Thomas of Erasmounde (Child's Ballads, I. 100).

Ryse we now full rathly, rest here no longer,

And I shall tell you full tye, and tary no thing.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 772.

rat-hole (rat'höl), n. 1. A hole gnawed in woodwork, etc., by a rat or rats.—2. In printing, same as pigeonhole, 6.

ratholite (rath'ö-lit), n. Same as pectolite.

rathripe (rath'rip), a. and n. [< ME. rathripe*, < AS. rædripe, hrædripe, early ripe, < hræth, quick, + ripe, ripe: see rath¹ and ripe. Cf. rareripe.] 1. a. Early ripe; ripe before the season; rare-ripe. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Such as delight in rathripe fruits.

Fuller.

Rathripe barley, barley derived from a long succession of crops on warm gravelly soil, so that it ripens earlier than common barley under different circumstances.

II. n. A rareripe. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

ratifiat, ratifiet, n. Obsolete forms of ratifia.

ratification (rat'fi-kä'shon), n. [Early mod. E. ratificacion, < OF. ratification, ratificacion, F. ratification = Pr. ratificacion = Sp. ratificacion = Pg. ratificação = It. ratificazione, < ML. ratificatio (n-), < ratificare, ratify: see ratify.] 1. The act of ratifying; the act by which a competent authority gives sanction and validity to something done by another; also, the state of being ratified; confirmation: as, the ratification of a treaty, or of a contract or promise.

The King of England sent Sir Nicholas Carew, knight, master of his horses, and Doctor Sampson, to Bononie, for the ratificacion of the league concluded at Cambray.

Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 21.

It was argued by Monroe, Gerry, Howel, Ellery, and myself that by the modern usage of Europe the ratification was considered as the act which gave validity to a treaty, until which it was not obligatory.

Jefferson, Autobiography, p. 46.

2. In law, the adoption by a person, as binding upon himself, of an act previously done in his name or on his behalf, or in such relation that he may claim it as done for his benefit, although done under such circumstances as would not bind him except by his subsequent consent, as in the case of an act done by a stranger having at the same time no authority to act as his agent, or by an agent not having adequate authority to do the act. Intention to ratify is not necessary in order to constitute a ratification, for an acceptance of the results of the act may itself be conclusive upon the party. But a knowledge of all the material circumstances is usually necessary in order to make a ratification binding.—Ratification by a wife, in Scots law, a declaration on oath made by a wife in presence of a justice of the peace (her husband being absent) that a deed she has executed has been made freely, and that she has not been induced to make it by her husband through force or fear.—Ratification meeting, in the United States, a political meeting called for the purpose of expressing approval of the nominations made by a political party, and of creating enthusiasm for their support.

ratifier (rat'fi-ër), n. One who or that which ratifies or sanctions.

Antiquity forgot, custom not known,

The ratifiers and props of every word.

Shak., Hamlet, iv. 5. 105.

ratify (rat'fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. ratified, ppr. ratifying. [< OF. ratifier, F. ratifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. ratificar = It. ratificare, < ML. ratificare, confirm, ratify, < L. ratius, fixed, settled, + -ficare, < facere, make: see rate² and -fy.] 1. To confirm; establish; settle conclusively or authoritatively; make certain or lasting.

We have ratified to them the borders of Judea.

1 Mac. xi. 34.

Covenants will be ratified and confirmed, as it were by the Stygian oath.

Bacon, Political Fables, ii., Expl.

Shaking hands with emphasis, . . . as if they were ratifying some solemn league and covenant.

Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, xvii.

2. To validate by some formal act of approval; accept and sanction, as something done by an agent or a representative; confirm as a valid act or procedure.

This Accord and final Peace signed by both Kings was ratified by their two eldest Sons.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 125.

A solemn compact let us ratify,

And witness ev'ry power that rules the sky.

Pope, Odyssey, xiv.

The unfortunate king, unable to make even a protest for the rights of his son, was prevailed on to ratify the agreement.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 677.

Ratifying convention, a convention held for the purpose of ratifying certain measures, acts, etc.: specifically used in United States politics of the conventions held by the several States of the American Union for the purpose of ratifying the Federal Constitution of 1787.

ratihabition (rat'hi-hä-bish'ön), n. [= Sp. ratihabicion = Pg. ratihabição = It. ratihabizione, < LL. ratihabito (n-), ratification at law, < L. ratius, fixed, settled (see rate²), + habere, have: see habit.] Approval, as of something done or to be done; precedent or subsequent consent; sanction; confirmation of authority or of action.

In matters criminal ratihabition, or approving of the act, does always make the approver guilty.

Jer. Taylor.

To assure their full powers, they had letters of commission or of ratihabition, or powers of attorney, such as were usually furnished to proctors or representative officers.

Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 747.

rating¹ (rä'ting), n. [Verbal n. of rate¹, v.] A scolding.

rating² (rä'ting), n. [Verbal n. of rate², v.] 1. A fixing of rates; proportionate distribution as to charge or compensation; determination of relative values or rights.

The loss by any railway company of its whole share of this traffic, in consequence of being crippled in competition by regulations as to rating.

Contemporary Rev., LI. 78.

The following table of ratings and of the number pensioned at each rate shows how the allowance is distributed among invalid survivors.

The Century, XXXVIII. 680.

2. Classification according to grade or rank; determination of relative standing; hence, rank or grade. The rating of men in the navy signifies the grade in which they are rated or entered in the ship's books. The rating of ships is the division into grades (see rate², n., 8) by which the complement of officers and certain allowances are determined.

ratio (rä'shio), n. [< L. ratio, a reckoning, account, calculation, relation, reference, reason, etc., < veri, pp. ratius, think, deem, estimate: see rate², and cf. ration and reason, from the same L. noun.] 1. The relation between two similar magnitudes in respect to quantity; the relation between two similar quantities in respect to how many times one makes so many times the other. There is no intelligible difference between a ratio and a quotient of similar quantities; they are simply two modes of expression connected with different associations. But it was contrary to the old usage to speak of a ratio as a quantity—a usage leading to intolerable complications. Thus, instead of saying that the momentum of a moving particle is the product of its mass into its velocity—a mode of expression both convenient and philosophical—the older writers say that the momenta of two particles are in the compound ratio of their masses and velocities. This language, which betrays several errors of logic, is now disused: although some writers still persist in making numbers the only subjects of addition and multiplication. By mathematicians ratio is now conceived and spoken of as synonymous with quotient.

The numbers which specify a strain are mere ratios, and are therefore independent of units.

J. D. Everett, Units and Physical Constants, p. 45.

2. Proportion of relations or conditions; coincident agreement or variation; correspondence in rate; equivalence of relative movement or change.

There has been a constant ratio kept between the stringency of mercantile restraints and the stringency of other restraints.

H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 327.

3. Reason; cause; often used as a Latin word in current Latin phrases.

In this consists the ratio and essential ground of the gospel doctrine.

Waterland.

4. In musical acoustics, the relation between the vibration-numbers of two tones. It is the physical or mathematical representation of the interval between them.—5. In civil law, an account; a cause, or the giving of judgment therein.—Alternate ratio, the ratio of the first to the third or the second to the fourth term of a proportion.—Anharmonic ratio. See anharmonic.—Arithmetical ratio. See arithmetical.—Change-ratio. See change.—Composition of ratios, the uniting of two or more simple ratios into one, by taking the product of the antecedents and the product of the consequents.—Compound ratio. See compound.—Consequent of a ratio. See consequent.—Direct ratio. (a) A ratio not inverse. (b) Loosely, a direct and simple ratio: as, the weights of bodies are in the direct ratio of their masses—that is, the weight of one is to that of another as the mass of the former is to that of the latter. Also direct proportion.—Direction ratio, duplex ratio. See the qualifying words.—Dis-similar ratios, unequal quotients.—Division of a ratio. See division.—Duplicate ratio, a ratio of squares. The old writers, instead of saying that the distance passed over by a falling body is proportional to the square of the time, say that the spaces are in the duplicate ratio of the times.—Inverse or reciprocal ratio, in math., the ratio of the reciprocals of two quantities.—Irrational ratio, a ratio of surds.—Measure of a ratio. See measure.—Mixed ratio. See mixed.—Modular ratio. See modular.—Multiplicate ratio, a ratio of powers.—Oxygen ratio, in mineral., the ratio between the number of oxygen atoms belonging to the different groups of acidic or basic compounds in the composition of a mineral. The oxygen ratio of silica, sesquioxide, and protoxide in garnet is 2:1:1. — Pedal ratio, in anc. pros., the proportion of the number of times in the arsis to that in the thesis, or vice versa. The pedal ratio ($\lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\varsigma$ $\rho\omicron\delta\omicron\kappa\omicron\varsigma$) is usually either equal or isorhythmic ratio (1:1), diplastic or double ratio (1:2), or hemiole ratio (2:3 = 1:1½). Besides these three, the ordinary pedal ratios, two others were anciently recognized—the triplastic or triple ratio (1:3), and the epitritic ratio (3:4 = 1:1¼). The dochmius, regarded as a single foot, had a pedal ratio different from all these (3:5; 5:7; 7:9). Isorhythmic, diplastic, hemiole, tripastic, epitritic, and dochmiac feet are feet having the pedal ratios just named. See foot, 11, irrational, rhythm. — Prime and ultimate ratios, phrases first introduced, at least in a system, by Newton, who preferred them to the terms suggested by his own method of fluxions. The method of prime and ultimate ratios is a method of calculation which may be considered as an extension of the ancient method of exhaustion. It may be thus explained: let there be two variable quantities constantly approaching each other in value, so that their ratio or quotient continually approaches to unity, and at last differs from unity by less than any assignable quantity; the ultimate ratio of these two quantities is said to be a ratio of equality. In general, when different variable quantities respectively and simultaneously approach other quantities, considered as invariable, so that the differences between the variable and the invariable quantities become at the same time less than any assignable quantity, the ultimate ratios of the variables are the ratios of the invariable quantities or limits to which they continually and simultaneously approach. They are called prime ratios or ultimate ratios according as the ratios of the variables are considered as receding from or approaching to the ratios of the limits. The first section of Newton's "Principia" contains the development of prime and ultimate ratios, with various propositions. — Progression with n ratios. See progression. — Quadruple ratio, the ratio of 4 to 1. — Quadruplicate ratio, a ratio of fourth powers. — Quintuple ratio, the ratio of 5 to 1. — Ratio cognoscendi (L.), a reason. — Ratio decidendi (L.), in law, the ground or reason on which a judicial decision is conceived as proceeding. The effect of such a decision as a precedent or evidence of the law is largely dependent on the ratio decidendi, which is usually indicated in the opinions of the court, but often obscurely or with conflict; hence what was the ratio decidendi is often a question for commentators and text-writers. — Ratio essendi (L.), a cause. — Rational ratio, a ratio between rational quantities. — Ratio of equality. See equality. — Ratio of exchange, in polit. econ., the proportion in which a given quantity of one commodity may be exchanged for a given quantity of another, especially when the commodities correspond in form and mode of measurement: as, the ratio of exchange between gold and silver, or between wheat and barley.

When I proposed in the first edition of this book to use Ratio of Exchange instead of the word value, the expression had been so little if at all employed by English Economists that it amounted to an innovation. . . . Yet ratio is unquestionably the correct scientific term, and the only term which is strictly and entirely correct.

W. S. Jevons, Theory of Polit. Econ., p. 89.

Ratio of greater (or lesser) inequality, the ratio of a greater quantity to a lesser one (or of a lesser to a greater). — Ratio of similitude, in geom., the ratio between corresponding dimensions of similar figures. See homothetic. — Ratio sufficiens (L.). Same as sufficient reason (which see, under reason). — Reciprocal ratio. Same as inverse ratio. — Simple ratio. (a) A ratio between first powers. (b) A ratio not compound. — Subduplicate ratio. See duple. — Subduplicate ratio, an inverse ratio of squares (nub in all names of ratio indicating the inversion of the ratio): as, the gravity of two equal masses is in the subduplicate ratio of their distances from the gravitating center. — Submultiple ratio, the ratio which exists between an aliquot part of any number or quantity and the number or quantity itself: thus, the ratio of 3 to 21 is submultiple, 21 being a multiple of 3. — To cut a line in extreme and mean ratio. See extreme. — Triple ratio, the ratio of 3 to 1.

ratiocinant (rash-i-os'i-nant), a. [< L. ratiocinantus (t)-s, ppr. of ratiocinari, reason: see ratiocinate.] Reasoning. — Ratiocinant reason. See reason.

ratiocinate (rash-i-os'i-nat), v. i.; pret. and pp. ratiocinated, ppr. ratiocinating. [< L. ratiocinatus, pp. of ratiocinari (> It. raziocinare = Sp. Pg. raziocinar = F. ratiociner), reckon, compute, calculate, consider, deliberate, meditate, reason, argue (cf. ratiocinium, a reckoning, a computation, > It. raziocinio = Sp. Pg. raziocinio, reasoning), < ratio (n-), reckoning, reason: see ratio, reason.] To reason; from two judgments to infer a third. The word usually implies an elaborate deductive operation.

ratiocinate (rash-i-os'i-nat), a. [< L. ratiocinatus, pp. of ratiocinari, reason: see the verb.] Reasoned about. — Ratiocinate reason. See reason.

ratiocination (rash-i-os-i-nā'shon), n. [< F. ratiocination = Pr. ratiocinacio = Sp. ratiocinacion = Pg. raziocinacão (cf. It. raziocinamento, raziocinio, reasoning), < L. ratiocinatio (n-), reasoning, argumentation, a syllogism, < ratiocinari, pp. ratiocinatus, reason: see ratiocinate.] 1. The mental process of passing from the cognition of premises to the cognition of the conclusion; reasoning. Most writers make ratiocination synonymous with reasoning. J. S. Mill and others hold that the word is usually limited to necessary reasoning. The Latin word is especially applied by Cicero to probable reasoning.

The great instrument that this work [spiritual meditation] is done by is ratiocination, reasoning the case with yourself, discourse of mind, cogitation, or thinking; or, if you will, call it consideration.

Baxter, Saints' Rest, iv. 8.

The schoolmen make a third act of the mind, which they call ratiocination, and we may stile it the generation of a judgement from others actually in our understanding.

A. Tucker, Light of Nature, I. i. 11.

Ratiocination is the great principle of order in thinking; it reduces a chaos into harmony; it catalogues the accumulations of knowledge; it maps out for us the relations of its separate departments; it puts us in the way to correct its own mistakes.

J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 273.

2. A mental product and object consisting of premises and a conclusion drawn from them; inference; an argumentation.

Can any kind of ratiocination allow Christ all the marks of the Messiah, and yet deny him to be the Messiah?

South.

Ratiocination denotes properly the process, but, improperly, also the product of reasoning.

Sir W. Hamilton, Logic, xv.

= Syn. Reasoning, etc. See inference.

ratiocinative (rash-i-os'i-nā-tiv), a. [< F. ratiocinatif, < L. ratiocinativus, of or belonging to reasoning, syllogistic, argumentative, < ratiocinari, reason: see ratiocinate.] Of the nature of reasoning; pertaining to or connected with the act of reasoning. The word is misused by some modern writers. See ratiocination, 2.

The conclusion is attained quasi per saltum, and without any thing of ratiocinative process.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 51.

The ratiocinative meditateness of his character.

Coleridge.

Again, it not unfrequently happens that, while the keenness of the ratiocinative faculty enables a man to see the ultimate result of a complicated problem in a moment, it takes years for him to embrace it as a truth, and to recognize it as an item in the circle of his knowledge.

J. H. Newman, Gram. of Assent, p. 159.

ratiocinatory (rash-i-os'i-nā-tō-ri), a. [< ratiocinate + -ory.] Same as ratiocinative. [Rare.] ration (rā'shon or rash'on), n. [< F. ration = Sp. racion = Pg. razão, reção = It. ragione, a ration, a rate or allowance, < L. ratio (n-), a calculation, reckoning, hence in ML. a computed share or allowance of food: see ratio, reason (which are doublets of ration), and cf. rate.] 1. An allowance of means of subsistence for a fixed period of time; specifically, in the army and navy, an allotment or apportionment of provisions for daily consumption to each officer and man, or of forage for each horse. Officers' rations are generally commuted for a money payment at a prescribed rate; and soldiers' and sailors' rations may be partly or wholly commuted under some circumstances.

2. Any stated or fixed amount or quantity dealt out; an allowance or allotment.

At this rate [two years and a half for three vowels], to master the whole alphabet, consonants and all, would be a task fitter for the central adolescence of Methuselah than for our less liberal ration of years.

Lowell, Harvard Anniversaries.

ration (rā'shon or rash'on), v. t. [< ration, n.] 1. To supply with rations; provision.

It had now become evident that the army could not be rationed by a wagon train over the single narrow and almost impassable road between Milliken's Bend and Perkins' plantation.

U. S. Grant, Personal Memoirs, I. 471.

2. To divide into rations; distribute or apportion in rations. [Rare.]

The presence of hunger began; they began to ration out the bread.

The Nation, March 9, 1871, p. 160.

rationability (rash'on-a-bil'i-ti), n. [= Sp. racionabilidad = Pg. racionabilidade = It. raziionabilità, < LL. rationabilitas (t)-s, < rationabilis, reasonable: see rationable.] The possession of reason, as the distinctive attribute of man.

Rationability, being but a faculty or specific quality, is a substantial part of a man, because it is a part of his definition, or his essential difference.

Bramhall, ii. 24. (Davies.)

rationable (rash'on-a-bl), a. [= OF. rationable = Sp. racionable = Pg. racionavel = It. raziionabile, < LL. rationabilis, reasonable, rational, < L. ratio (n-), reason: see reason.] Reasonable, as an agent or an act.

She was, I take it, on this matter not quite rationable.

Miss Edgeworth, Bellinda, xxvi.

rational (rash'on-al), a. and n. [I. a. < OF. rationel, rationel, F. rationnel = Pr. Sp. Pg. raziionale = It. raziionale, < L. rationalis, of or belonging to reason, rational, reasonable, < ratio (n-), reason: see ratio, reason. II. n. < OF. rationel, < ML. rationale, a pontifical stole, a pallium, an ornament worn over the chasuble, neut. of L. rationalis, rational: see I.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or springing from the reason, in the sense of the highest faculty of cognition.

He confesses a rational sovereignty of soul, and freedom of will in every man.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, vi.

Devout from constitution rather than from rational conviction.

Macaulay, Essays, History, p. 394.

Contradiction . . . must be absurd when it is regarded as fixed, and rational when it is regarded as superable.

Veitch, Introduct. to Descartes's Method, p. clxxviii.

2. Endowed with reason, in the sense of that faculty which distinguishes man from the brutes: as, man is a rational animal.

It is our glory and happiness to have a rational nature.

Law.

Are these men rational, or are not the apes of Borneo more wise?

Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, let. x.

He [man] is rational and moral according to the organic internal conformation of his mind.

Svedenborg, Christian Psychol. (tr. by Gorman), p. 72.

There has been an idea of good, suggested by the consciousness of unfulfilled possibilities of the rational nature common to all men.

T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 207.

3. Conformable to the precepts of reason, especially of the practical reason; reasonable; wise.

You are one
Of the deepest politics I ever met,
And the most subtly rational.

B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, III. 4.

He had his Humour as other Men, but certainly he was a solid rational Man.

Howell, Letters, I. vi. 17.

His bounties are more rational and moderate than before.

Goldsmith, Vicar, III.

4. In arith. and alg.: (a) Expressible in finite terms: applied to expressions in which no extraction of a root is left, or, at least, none such indicated which cannot be actually performed by known processes. The contraries of these are called surd or irrational quantities. Thus 2, 12½, √9, are rational quantities, and √2, √4, etc., are irrational or surd quantities, because their values can only be approximately and not accurately assigned. (b) In Euclid's "Elements" and commentaries, etc., on that work, commensurable with a given line. In senses (a) and (b) rational (Latin rationalis) translates Greek πρῶτος, expressible. It may be remarked that some inconvenience arises from the fact that words derived from Latin ratio, originally signifying an account, are used to translate words connected with Greek λόγος, whose original meaning (a word) is entirely different.

5. In anc. pros., capable of measurement in terms of the metrical unit (semeion or mora). A rational time (χρόνος πρῶτος) is a time divisible by this unit without remainder. Thus, diemic times (times of two semela) are rational, while irrational times (χρόνος ἀλογος) can be expressed only by fractions (as ¾, 1¼, 2½, 2¾) of a semion.—Geometrically rational, algebraic.—Rational and integral function. See function.—Rational certainty, cognition, cosmology. See the nouns.—Rational class of functions, a class which is relative to a group of operations produced by combinations of additions, subtractions, multiplications, and divisions.—Rational composition, in logic: (a) The composition of elements which only differ as viewed by the mind, and not as they exist, as the composition of essence and existence, of being and relation, etc. (b) The union of several objects so far as they are brought together into or under one concept.—Rational derivative. See derivative.—Rational formula. See chemical formula, under chemical.—Rational fraction, function. See the nouns.—Rational horizon. (a) The astronomical horizon. (b) The limits of rational knowledge.—Rational inference, a ratiocinative inference or syllogism.—Rational instinct, an innate idea, or natural belief.—Rational knowledge. (a) Knowledge of an object through its cause or causes.

The knowledge why or how a thing is is termed the knowledge of the cause; philosophical, scientific, rational knowledge.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., III.

(b) Knowledge springing directly or indirectly from reason, and not from experience.—Rational mechanics, the science which establishes and puts into shape the laws of motion.—Rational number, a number expressible as an ordinary fraction, in contradistinction to a continued fraction.—Rational power, proposition, ratio, etc. See the nouns.—Rational psychology. See psychology.—Rational theology, theology so far as drawn from a priori ideas.—Rational transformation, the transformation of a geometrical continuum into another, so as to make a one-to-one correspondence between the points of the two, except for a finite number of exceptional points.—Syn. Rational, Reasonable, sensible, enlightened, discreet, intelligent, sane, sound. The first two words are somewhat different, according as they refer to persons or things. As to persons, rational is the more speculative, reasonable the more practical term; rational means possessing the faculty of reason, while reasonable means exercising reason in its broader sense, in opposition to unreasonable—that is, guided by prejudice, fancy, etc. In fever the patient may become irrational and give irrational answers; when he is rational he may through weakness and fretfulness make unreasonable demands of his physician. As to things, the distinction continues between the narrower and the broader senses: a rational proposition is one that might proceed from a rational mind; a reasonable proposition is one that is marked by common sense and fairness. It is irrational to look for a coal-mine in a granite ledge; it is unreasonable to expect good work for poor pay. See absurd.

II. n. 1. A quiddity; a universal; a nature. Thus, in the first quotation "the world of rationalis" is the rational world, the system of general or possible entities. The conception is Platonic.

He, the great Father, kindled at one flame
The world of rationalis.

Young, Night Thoughts, IV.

He, the great Father, kindled at one flame
The world of rationalis.

He, the great Father, kindled at one flame
The world of rationalis.

He, the great Father, kindled at one flame
The world of rationalis.

This absolute end, prescribed by Reason necessarily and a priori, which is for all rational beings as such, can be nothing but Reason itself, or the Universe of Rationals.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 362.

2. Eccles.: (a) The breastplate of the Jewish high-priest. The name rational for the Jewish high-priest's breastplate (Hebrew choshen, an 'ornament,' according to others a 'pouch' or 'receptacle') comes from the Latin rationale, a mistaken translation in the Vulgate of the word λογος or λογεον in the Septuagint, etc., meaning an 'oracle' or 'oracular instrument,' with allusion to the consultation of the Urim and Thummim. Hence—
(b) A square plate of gold, silver, or embroidery, either jeweled or enameled, formerly worn on the breast over the chasuble by bishops during the celebration of mass. Also pectoral and rationale in both senses.

But upon the English chasuble there was to be seen, more or less often, up to the fourteenth century, an appendage, the rational, as beautiful as becoming, which is never found adorning the same Anglo-Saxon vestment.
Lock, Church of our Fathers, I. 363.

rationale (rash-on-ā-lē), n. [L., neut. sing. of rationalis, of or belonging to reason, rational: see rational.] 1. The rational basis or motive of something; that which accounts for or explains the existence of something; reason for being.

The rationale of your scheme is just:
"Pay toll here, there pursue your pleasure free."
Browning, King and Book, II. 292.

Thoroughly to realize the truth that with the mind as with the body the ornamental precedes the useful, it is needful to glance at its rationale.
H. Spencer, Education, p. 25.

2. A rational explanation or statement of reasons; an argumentative or theoretical account; a reasoned exposition.

I admire that there is not a rationale to regulate such trifling accidents, which consume much time, and is a reproach to the gravity of so great an assembly of sober men.
Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 23, 1666.

Since the religion of one seems madness unto another, to afford an account or rationale of old rites requires no rigid reader.
Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, iv.

Theological dogma is nothing in the world but a rationale of the relations in which God places Himself towards us in the very act of revealing Himself.
Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 345.

3. Same as rational, 2.
rationalisation, rationalise, etc. See rationalization, etc.

rationalism (rash-on-al-izm), n. [= F. rationnalisme = Sp. Pg. racionalismo = It. razionalismo = G. rationalismus; as rational + -ism.] 1. In general, adherence to the supremacy of reason in matters of belief or conduct, in contradistinction to the submission of reason to authority; thinking for one's self.

From the infinite variability of opinion our great writers deduced the necessity of toleration in the place of persecution and of rationalism in place of obedience to authority.
Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, ii. ¶ 4.

2. In theol.: (a) In general, the subjection of religious doctrine and Scriptural interpretation to the test of human reason or understanding; the rejection of dogmatic authority as against reason or conscience; rational latitude of religious thought or belief.

What seemed most to protect the dogma of the Church from depravation really left it without defence against the scholastic rationalism.
Caird, Philos., Kant, p. 25.

(b) More specifically, as used with reference to the modern school or party of rationalists, that system of doctrine which, in its extreme form, denies the existence of any authoritative and supernatural revelation, and maintains that the human reason is of itself, and unaided by special divine inspiration, adequate to ascertain all attainable religious truth. As a theological system rationalism regards the reason as the sole, final, and adequate arbiter of all religious questions, and is thus opposed to mysticism, which maintains the existence in man of a spiritual power transcending observation and the reasoning faculty. As a doctrinal system, it includes the doctrines founded upon rationalistic philosophy as a postulate, and embraces a denial of the authority of the Scripture and the supernatural origin of Christianity, but maintains as at least probable opinions the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul, and as indisputable facts the great principles of the moral law. As an interpretation of Scripture, it holds that the Scriptures themselves, rightly interpreted, corroborate rationalism, and thus it eliminates from them all supernatural elements. The term is, however, one of somewhat vague import, and is used with various modified meanings in modern polemical theology.

3. In metaph., the doctrine of a priori cognitions; the doctrine that knowledge is not all produced by the action of outward things upon the senses, but partly arises from the natural adaptation of the mind to think things that are true.

The form of Rationalism which is now in the ascendant resembles the theory of natural evolution in this, that as the latter finds the race more real than the individual, and the individual to exist only in the race, so the former looks upon the individual reason as but a finite manifestation of the universal reason.

W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 18.

rationalist (rash-on-al-ist), n. [= F. rationnaliste = Sp. Pg. racionalista = It. razionalista = D. G. Dan. Sw. rationalist; as rational + -ist.]

1. One who follows reason and not authority in thought or speculation; a believer in the supremacy of reason over prescription or precedent.

There is a new sect sprung up among them, and these are the rationalists; and what their reason dictates them in church or state stands for good, until they be convinced with better.
Clarendon, State Papers, II. xi., Introd.

2. In theol., one who applies rational criticism to the claims of supernatural authority or revelation; specifically, one of a school or party, originating in Germany in the eighteenth century, who maintain as an ultimate conclusion that the human reason is of itself, and unaided by special divine inspiration, adequate to ascertain all attainable truth, and who accordingly, in interpretation of the Scripture, regards it as only an illustration and affirmation, not as a divine revelation, of truth. See rationalism, 2 (b).—3. A believer in metaphysical rationalism.

rationalistic (rash-on-al-ist-ik), a. [rationalist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to rationalists or rationalism; conformable to or characterized by rationalism: as, rationalistic opinions; a rationalistic interpretation.

From the publication of the essays of Montaigne we may date the influence of that gifted and ever enlarging rationalistic school who gradually effected the destruction of the belief in witchcraft.
Lecky, Rationalism, I. 114.

Rationalistic Monarchians. See Monarchian.

rationalistical (rash-on-al-ist-ik-al), a. [rationalistic + -al.] Same as rationalistic.

rationalistically (rash-on-al-ist-ik-al-i), adv. In a rationalistic manner.

rationality (rash-on-al-i-ti), n. [rational + -ity = Sp. racionalidad = Pg. racionalidade = It. razionalità, < L. ratio + -itas, reasonableness, rationality, < L. ratio, reasonable: see rational.] 1. The rational faculty; the power of reasoning; possession of reason; intelligence.

God has made rationality the common portion of mankind.
Dr. H. More.

Yea, the highest and most improved parts of rationality are frequently caught in the entanglements of a tenacious imagination, and submit to its obstinate but delusory dictations.
Glanville, Vanity of Logomachizing, xl.

2. The character of being rational; accordance with reason; reasonableness; congruity; fitness.

Well directed intentions, whose rationalities will not bear a rigid examination.
Sir T. Browne.

"It may do good, and it can do no harm," is the plea for many actions which have scarcely more rationality than worship of a painted stone.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., App. A.

3. The exercise, result, or manifestation of reason; rational principle, motive, or causation; basis in reason.

An essay on the "Rationality of History," . . . in which history is represented as a "struggle towards rational freedom."
H. Sidgwick, Mind, XIII. 406.

The solid black vote, cast, we said, without rationality at the behest of a few scoundrels.
The Century, XXX. 676.

rationalization (rash-on-al-i-zā-shon), n. [rationalize + -ation.] 1. The act of rationalizing; a making rational or intelligible; subjection to rational tests or principles.

Lysons argues very strongly in favour of the famous story of "Whittington and his Cat," and rejects the rationalization which explains the legend by supposing Whittington's fortunes to have been made in the voyages of a mediæval cat or merchant-vessel.
Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 556.

2. In alg., the process of clearing an equation from radical signs.

Also spelled rationalisation.

rationalize (rash-on-al-iz), v.; pret. and pp. rationalized, ppr. rationalizing. [rationaliser; as rational + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To make conformable to reason; give rationality to; cause to be or to appear reasonable or intelligible.

Eusebius tells us that religion was divided by the Romans into three parts: the mythology, or legends that had descended from the poets; the interpretations or theories by which the philosophers endeavoured to rationalize, filter, or explain away these legends; and the ritual or official religious observances.
Lecky, European Morals, I. 429.

When life has been duly rationalized by science, it will be seen that among a man's duties care of the body is imperative.
H. Spencer, in Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 357.

The faculties of the mind have been rationalised into functions of the mind; so many sorts of operations, classified as observation demands.
Hodgson, Phil. of Reflection, II. 247.

2. To subject to the test of reason; explain or interpret by rational principles; treat in the manner of a rationalist: as, to rationalize religion or the Scriptures.—3. In alg., to free from radical signs.

II. intrans. To think for one's self; employ the reason as a supreme test; argue or speculate upon the basis of rationality or rationalism; act as a rationalist.

If they [certain theologians] rationalise as the remarkable school of Cambridge Platonists rationalised, it is with a sincere belief that they are only bringing out the full meaning of the doctrine which they expound.
Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, ii. ¶ 60.

To rationalise meant to apply the canons of our limited enlightenment to the unlimited ranges of actuality.
W. Wallace, Logic of Hegel, Prolegomena, vi.

In order to know, in any wide and large sense, we must rationalize.
Henry Calderwood, New Princeton Rev., III. 23.

Also spelled rationalise.

rationalizer (rash-on-al-i-zēr), n. One who rationalizes, or practises the methods of the rationalists; one who tests doctrines, principles, etc., by the light of abstract reason, or who employs reason alone in interpretation or explanation. Also spelled rationaliser.

Like many other rationalisers, he [Thomas Burnet] fancied himself to be confirming instead of weakening Scriptural authority.
Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, i. ¶ 8.

rationality (rash-on-al-i), adv. In a rational manner; in consistency with reason; reasonably: as, to speak rationality; to behave rationality.

rationalness (rash-on-al-nes), n. The state of being rational, or consistent with reason.

rationary (rash-on-ā-ri), a. [= F. rationnaire, one who receives rations, one who receives a salary, < ML. rationarius, relating to accounts, an accountant, < L. ratio + -us, a reckoning, an account, ML. allowance: see ratio.] Of or pertaining to accounts. [Rare.]

ration-money (rā-shon-mun-i), n. Money paid as commutation for rations.

Ratitæ (rā-ti-tē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. (see Aves, birds) of ratitus: see ratite.] One of the prime divisions of birds, including the ostriches, cassowaries, emus, and kiwis; the group of struthious birds, as contrasted with Carinatae, to which all other existing birds belong. The Ratitæ are flightless, with more or less rudimentary wings; the sternum is a flattened or concavo-convex buckler-like bone, without a keel, developing from paired lateral centers of ossification. Associated with this condition of the sternum is a special configuration of the scapular arch, the scapula and coracoid meeting at a very obtuse angle, or with nearly coincident axes, and clavicles being absent or defective. The bones of the palate are peculiarly arranged, the pterygoids articulating with the basisphenoid in a manner only paralleled in Carinatae in the tinamous. The Cretaceous genus Hesperornis was ratite in sternal characters, but is excluded from Ratitæ by the possession of teeth. The families of living Ratitæ usually recognized are the Struthionide, Rheide, Cassariide, and Apterygide; the genera are Struthio, Rhea, Cassarius and Dromæus, and Apteryx; the species are few. The extinct New Zealand moas (Dinornithide and Palapterygide) and the Madagascar Ephorornithide are also Ratitæ. The name was introduced by B. Merrem in 1813; it passed almost unnoticed for some years, but has lately come into almost universal use.

ratitate (rat-i-tāt), a. [ratite + -ate.] Same as ratite. [Rare.]

ratite (rā-tit), a. [ratitus, < L. ratitus, marked with the figure of a raft, < ratia, a raft.] Raft-breasted, as a bird; having a flat breast-bone or sternum with no keel; having no keel, as a breast-bone; ecarinate; of or pertaining to the Ratitæ.

ratiuncle (rā-shi-ung-kūl), n. [rat + uncle, < NL. ratiunculus*, dim. of L. ratio + -ulus, a ratio: see ratio.] A ratio very near unity.

rati-weight, n. Same as retti-weight.

rat-kangaroo (rat-kang-gā-rō'), n. A kangaroo-rat; any species of Hypsiprymnus. See ent under kangaroo-rat.

ratline, ratlin (rat'-lin), n. [Also corruptly ratling, ratling; formerly also rare-line; appar. < rat + line (corrupted to rare-line, as if 'thin line'); a seamen's joocular name, as if forming ladders for the rats to climb by. Cf. D. weeflijn, ratline, lit. 'web-line.' Naut., Ratlines (a, b).

one of a series of small ropes or lines which traverse the shrouds horizontally, thus forming the steps of ladders for going aloft.—Sheer ratline, every fifth ratline, which is extended to the swift and after shroud.

ratline-stuff (rat'lin-stuf), n. Naut., small tarred rope, of from 12 to 24 threads, from which ratlines are made.

ratling (rat'ling), n. A corruption of ratline.

ratmara (rat'ma-rā), n. [Native name.] An East Indian lichen, used in dyeing.

rat-mole (rat'möl), n. Same as mole-rat.

raton, n. An obsolete form of ratten.

ratoneri, n. See rattener.

Ratonia (rā-tō'ni-ä), n. [NL.] A former genus of Sapindaceae, now referred to Matayba. See bastard mahogany, under mahogany.

ratoon (ra-tōn'), n. [Also ratoon; = Sp. retoño, a new sprout or shoot (> retoñar, sprout anew, put forth shoots again), < Hind. ratun, a second crop of sugar-cane from the same roots.] 1. A sprout or shoot springing up from the root of a plant after it has been cropped; especially, a new shoot from the root of a sugar-cane that has been cut down. Compare plant-cane.
Plant canes generally take more time than ratoons to cause the juices to granulate.
T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide (1823), p. 344.

Next year [second crop] the cane sprouts from the stubble, and is called first ratoons. The second year it sprouts again, and is called second ratoons.
The Century, XXXV. 111.

2. The heart-leaves in a tobacco-plant. Imp. Dict.

ratoon (ra-tōn'), v. i. [= Sp. retoñar, sprout or spring up anew; from the noun: see ratoon, n.] To sprout or send up new shoots from the root after being cropped or cut down: said of the sugar-cane and some other plants.

The cocos, cassavas, and sweet potatoes will ratoon in two or three years; the negro yams are a yearly crop, but the white yams will last in the ground for several years.
T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide, p. 317.

On the Upper Coast, above New Orleans, it is customary to let the stubble ratoon but once. In Cuba it often ratoons six successive years, but the cane becomes constantly more woody and poorer in saccharine matter.
The Century, XXXV. 111.

ratount, n. An obsolete form of ratten.

rat-pit (rat'pit), n. An inclosure in which rats are baited or killed. The object is to ascertain how many rats a dog can kill in a given time, or which of two or more dogs can kill them most rapidly.

rat-poison (rat'poi-zn), n. 1. Something used to poison rats with, as a preparation of arsenic. — 2. A West African shrub, Chaillatia toxicaria, whose seeds are used to destroy rats. The genus belongs to the Chaillatiaceae, a small order allied to the Celastrineae and Rhamnaceae. In the West Indies Hamelia patens is called rat-poison.

ratsbane (rats'bān), n. [< rat's, poss. of *rat*¹, + *bane*¹, as in henbane, etc.: see *bane*¹.] 1. Rat-poison. Arsenious acid is often so called.

Wherefore . . . you see by the example of the Romans that plays are ratsbane to government of common-weales.
Pyrrhus, Histrio-Mastix, I, iv. 1.

We live like vermin here, and eat up your cheese—
Your mouldy cheese that none but rats would bite at;
Therefore 'tis just that ratsbane should reward us.
Fletcher, Sea Voyage, iv. 3.

2. A plant, Chaillatia toxicaria. See rat-poison, 2.

ratsbane (rats'bān), v. t.; pret. and pp. rats-baned, ppr. ratsbanning. [< ratsbane, n.] To poison with ratsbane.

rat-snake (rat'snāk), n. A colubrine serpent of the genus Ptyas, P. mucosus, a native of India, Ceylon, etc., attaining a length of 7 feet, frequently entering houses. Some similar snakes are also called by the same name.

rat's-tail (rat's'tāl), n. 1. Same as rat-tail. — 2. A slender rib or tongue tapering to a point, used to reinforce or stiffen a bar, plate, or the like, as on the back of a silver spoon.

ratti, n. An obsolete form of *rat*¹.

rat-tail (rat'tāl), n. and a. i. n. In farriery: (a) An excrescence on a horse's leg, growing from the pastern to the shank. (b) A disease which causes the hair of a horse's tail to fall off; also, a horse's tail thus denuded of hair. Also rat's-tail.

II. a. Same as rat-tailed.—Rat-tail file, radish, etc. See the nouns.—Rat-tail maggot. See under rat-tailed.

rattail (rat'tāl), n. 1. A fish of the genus Macrurus, as M. fabricii or M. rupestris; the onion-fish or grenadier. See cut under Macrurus. — 2. A horse which has a tail bare or nearly bared of hair.—3. One of various plants having tail-like flower-spikes, as the common plantain and the ribwort plantain, and various grasses, including species of Rottbellia in the United States and Ischæmum laxum (Andropogon nervosus) in Australia.

rat-tailed (rat'tāld), a. 1. Having a tail like a rat's; having a rat-tail, as a horse.

Here comes the wonderful one-hoss shay,
Drawn by a rat-tailed, ewe-necked bay.
O. W. Holmes, The Deacon's Masterpiece.

2. Like a rat's tail in shape.—Rat-tailed kangaroo-rat, Hypsiprymnus murinus, an Australian marsupial.—Rat-tailed larva or maggot, the larva of certain syrphid flies, ending in a long slender stigmatophorous

Rat-tailed Maggot and Fly of Eristalis tenax.

tail of two telescopic joints, forming an organ which enables the larva to breathe from the surface while lying hidden in mud, etc. The larva of Eristalis tenax is an example.—Rat-tailed serpent, Bothrops lanceolatus, a very venomous American pit-viper.—Rat-tailed shrew. See shrew.

rattan¹, n. See ratten.

rattan², n. and v. See ratan.

rattan³ (ra-tan'), n. [Imitative; cf. F. rataplan, imitation of the sound of a drum; cf. also rat-tat.] The continuous beat or reverberation of a drum; rataplan; rat-a-tat. [Rare.]

They had not proceeded far, when their ears were saluted with the loud rattan of a drum.
W. H. Ainsworth.

rattanas (rat'a-nas), n. [Native name.] A kind of coarse sacking made in Madagascar and Mauritius.

rattany, n. See ratany.

rat-tat (rat-tat'), n. Same as rat-a-tat.

A breeze always blowing and playing rat-tat
With the bow of the ribbon round your hat.
Lovell, Appledora.

rat-tat-too (rat'tat-tō'), n. An intensified form of rat-a-tat.

The rat-tat-too of a drum was heard in the distance.
Philadelphia Times, Oct. 24, 1886.

ratteen (ra-tēn'), n. [Also ratcen; = D. ratiijn = G. Sw. Dan. ratin, < F. ratine, a kind of cloth, = Sp. Pg. ratina = It. rattina; origin uncertain; prob. (like F. rate, milt, spleen) so called from its loose cellular texture and likeness to a honeycomb, < L.G. rate, honeycomb.] A kind of stuff, usually thick and resembling druggot or frieze: it is chiefly employed for linings.

ratten (rat'n), n. [Also rattan, ratton, rattin, rotten, rotton; < ME. raton, ratoun, ratone, < OF. (and F.) raton, a rat, = Sp. raton, a mouse, < ML. rato(n-), a rat: see *rat*¹. Cf. kitten as related to cat.] A rat. [Obsolete or prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

Thanne ran ther a route of ratones, as it were,
And smale mys with hem mo than a thousand.
Piers Plowman (C), l. 165.

I comawnde alle the ratons that are here bowte,
That non dwelle in this place with-inne ne with-owte.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 23.

The bald rattons

Had eaten his yellow hair.

Young Bekie (Child's Ballads, IV. 11).

"A Yorkshire burr," he affirmed, "was as much better than a Cockney's lisp as a bull's bellow than a rattan's squeak."
Charlotte Brontë, Shirley, p. 64.

ratten (rat'n), v. t. [< ratten, n. Cf. *rat*¹, v.] To play mischievous tricks upon, as an obnoxious person, for the purpose of coercion or intimidation. The members of a trades-union ratten a fellow-workman who refuses to join the union, to obey its behests, or to pay his dues, by secretly removing or breaking his tools or machinery, spoiling his materials, or the like, and ironically ascribing the mischief to rats. The practice was at one time prevalent in some of the manufacturing districts of Great Britain.

For enforcing payment of entrance-fees, contributions towards paying the fermes (dues), as well as of fines, the Craft-Gilds made use of the very means so much talked of in the case of the Sheffield Trade-Unions, namely rattening: that is, they took away the tools of their debtors.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. cxxvii.

A piece of sulphate of copper put into an indigo-vat throws it out of order, by oxidizing the white indigo and sending it—in an insoluble state—to the bottom. This is a method of rattening not unknown in dye-works.
W. Crookes, Dyeing and Calico-printing, p. 548.

Rattening, as defined by the Report of the Royal Commission, is "the abstraction of the workman's tools, so as to prevent him from earning his livelihood until he has obeyed the arbitrary orders of the union." It is satisfactory to know that this system . . . was chiefly confined to Sheffield and Manchester.

George Howell, Conflicts of Capital and Labor, vii. § 13.

rattener, rattoner, n. [< ME. ratoner, ratonere, rat-catcher, < OF. raton, a rat: see rat-ten.] A ratter or rat-catcher.

A rybidour and a rattener, a rake and hus knave.

Piers Plowman (C), vii. 371.

ratter¹ (rat'ér), n. [*< rat*¹, v., + *-er*¹.] 1. One who catches rats; a rat-catcher.—2. An animal which catches rats, as a terrier.

ratter² (rat'ér), n. [*< rat*¹, v., 2, + *-er*¹.] One who rats, or becomes a renegade; also, a workman who renders himself obnoxious to a trades-union. See rattling, 2. [Colloq.]

The Essay on Faction is no less frank in its recognition of self-interest as a natural and prevailing motive, and almost cynical in its suppression of resentment against ratters and traitors.
E. A. Abbott, Bacon, p. 84.

rat-terrier (rat'ter'i-ér), n. A small active dog used to kill rats.

rattery (rat'ér-i), n. [*< ratter*² + -y (see -ery).] The qualities or practices of a ratter; apostasy; tergiversation. [Rare.]

Such a spectacle refreshes me in the rattery and scoundrellism of public life.

Sydney Smith, Letters, 1822. (Davies.)

rattinet (rat-i-net'), n. [< F. ratine, a kind of cloth (see ratteen), + dim. -et.] A woollen stuff thinner than ratteen.

rattling (rat'ing), n. [Verbal n. of *rat*¹, v., 2.]

1. The act of deserting one's principles, and going over to the opposite party.—2. In the trades, the act of working for less than established or demanded prices, or of refusing to strike, or of taking the place of a striker.—3. A low sport consisting in setting a dog upon a number of rats confined in a tub, cage, or pit, to see how many he will kill in a given time.

rattle¹ (rat'l), v.; pret. and pp. rattled, ppr. rattling. [< ME. ratelen, rattle, clatter, etc., < *AS. hrætelan (cf. hrætelcyrft, 'rattlewort') = D. ratelen, rattle, = L.G. rateln, räteln = MHG. razzeln, rage, roar, G. rasseln (> Dan. rasle = Sw. rasla), rattle; freq. of a simple verb seen in MHG. razzen, razzen, rattle; perhaps akin to Gr. κρᾶδαιεν, swing, wave, brandish, shake; perhaps in part imitative (cf. rat-a-tat, rat-tat, in imitation of a knock at a door, *rattan*³, F. rataplan, in imitation of a drum, etc.), and in so far comparable with Gr. κρότος, a rattling noise, κροτειν, knock, rattle, κρόταλον, a rattle, κροταλίζειν, rattle (see Crotalus, rattlesnake). Cf. dial. rackie, a var. of rattle. Hence ult. *rat*⁴, Rallus, rāle.] I. intrans. 1. To give out a rapid succession of short, sharp, jarring or clattering sounds; clatter, as by continuous concussions.

The quiver rattled against him. Job xxxix. 23.

To the dread rattling thunder
Have I given fire, and lifted Jove's stout oak
With his own bolt. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 44.

"Farewell!" she said, and vanished from the place;
The sheaf of arrows shook, and rattled in the case.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., iii. 282.

Swift Astolpho to the rattling horn

His lips applies.
Hoole, tr. of Orlando Furioso, xxxiii.

One or two [rattlesnakes] coiled and rattled menacingly as I stepped near. T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXVI. 201.

2. To move or be carried along with a continuous rapid clatter; go or proceed or bear one's self noisily: often used with reference to speed rather than to the accompanying noise.

And off my mourning-robos; grief, to the grave;
For I haue gold, and therefore will be brave;
In silks I'll rattle it of every colour.
J. Cook, Green's Tu Quoque.

I'll take a good rattling gallop.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 20.

Wagons . . . rattling along the hollow roads, and over the distant hills.
Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 445.

We rattled away at a merry pace out of the town.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, xiv.

3. To speak with noisy and rapid utterance; talk rapidly or in a chattering manner: as, to rattle on about trifles.

The rattling tongue
Of saucy and audacious eloquence.
Shak., M. N. D., v. 1. 102.

The girls are handsome, dashing women, without much information, but rattling talkers.
C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 183.

II. trans. 1. To cause to make a rattling sound or a rapid succession of hard, sharp, or jarring sounds.

Her chain she rattles, and her whip she shakes.

Dryden.

Rattle his bones over the stones!

He's only a pauper whom nobody owns!

T. Noel, The Pauper's Drive.

2. To utter in sharp, rapid tones; deliver in a smart, rapid manner: as, to rattle off a string of names.

He rattles it out against Popery and arbitrary power.

Swift, Against Abolishing Christianity.

The rolls were rattled off; the short, crisp commands went forth.

The Century, XXXVII. 466.

3. To act upon or affect by rattling sounds; startle or stir up by any noisy means.

Sound but another, and another shall

As loud as thine rattle the welkin's ear.

Shak., K. John, v. 2. 172.

These places [woodlands] are generally strongholds for foxes, and should be regularly rattled throughout the season.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 395.

4. To scold, chide, or rail at noisily; berate clamorously.

If my time were not more precious

Than thus to lose it, I would rattle thee,

It may be beat thee.

Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, v. 3.

I to Mrs. Ann, and, Mrs. Jem being gone out of the chamber, she and I had a very high bout. I rattled her up, she being in bed; but, she becoming more cool, we parted pretty good friends.

Pepps, Diary, Feb. 6, 1660.

5. To shake up, unsettle, or disturb by censure, annoyance, or irritation; bring into an agitated or confused condition. [Colloq. or slang.]

The king hath so rattled my lord-keeper that he is now the most pliable man in England.

Cottingham, To Strafford (1633), quoted in Hallam's Const. Hist., II. 89.

Unpleasant stories came into my head, and I remember repeating to myself more than once (and is better than felicity of phrase), "Be careful, now: don't get rattled!"

Atlantic Monthly, LXIV. 110.

rattle¹ (rat'l), n. [*< ME. ratele, a rattle, < AS. hrætele, in comp. hrætelwyr, 'rattlewort,' a plant in whose pods the seeds rattle; = MD. ratele, D. ratel = G. rassel, a rattle; from the verb: see rattle¹, v. Cf. G. ratsche, a rattle, clapper; Sw. rassel, clank, clash, clatter, etc.] 1. A rapid succession of short, sharp, clattering sounds, as of intermittent collision or concussion.

I'll hold ten Pound my Dream is out;

I'd tell it to you but for the Rattle

Of those confounded Drums.

Prior, English Ballad on tr. of Bollean's Taking of Namur, (st. 10.)

I aren't like a bird-clapper, forced to make a rattle when the wind blows on me.

George Eliot, Adam Bede, III.

2. A rattling clamor of words; sharp, rapid talk of any kind; hence, sharp scolding or railing.

This rattle in the crystal hall

Would be enough to deaf them all.

Cotton (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 218).

Receiving such a rattle for his former contempt by the Bishop of London that he came out blubbering.

Heylin, Life of Laud, p. 257. (Davies.)

I chid the servants and made a rattle.

Swift, Journal to Stella, ix.

3. An instrument or toy contrived to make a rattling sound. The watchman's rattle, formerly used for giving an alarm, and the child's toy resembling it, consist of a vibrating tongue slipping over the teeth of a rotating ratchet-wheel, and producing much noise when rapidly twirled by the handle. Other toy rattles for children, and those used by some primitive races for various purposes, commonly consist of a box or casing, or even a hollow gourd or shell, with or without a handle, containing loose pebbles or other hard objects.

The rattles of Isis and the cymbals of Brasilea nearly enough resemble each other.

Raleigh.

They use Rattles of the shell of a certain fruit, in which they put Stones or Graines, and call them Maraca, of which they have some superstitious conceit.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 837.

Behold the child, by Nature's kindly law,

Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw.

Pope, Essay on Man, II. 276.

4. One who talks rapidly and without moderation or consideration; a noisy, impertinent talker; a jabberer.

She had not been brought up to understand the propensities of a rattle, nor to know to how many idle assertions and impudent falsehoods the excess of vanity will lead.

Jane Austen, Northanger Abbey, ix.

They call me their agreeable Rattle.

Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer.

It may seem strange that a man who wrote with so much perspicuity, vivacity, and grace should have been, whenever he took a part in conversation, an empty, noisy, blundering rattle.

Macaulay, Goldsmith.

5. The crepitaculum of the true rattlesnake, consisting of a series of horny epidermic cells of an undulated pyramidal shape, articulated one within the other at the extremity of the tail. See rattlesnake.—6. (a) An annual herb,

Rhinanthus Crista-galli, of meadows and pastures in Europe and northern Asia. It attaches itself by its fibrous roots to the roots of living grasses, etc., thus doing much damage. Its calyx in fruit is orbicular, inflated, but flattened, containing a capsule of similar form with a few large flat, generally winged seeds. This is the common or yellow rattle, also called locally penny-grass, penny-rattle, rattlebags, rattlebox, and rattle-penny. (b) One of the Old World louseworts, Pedicularis palustris, the red rattle.—The rattles. (a) Croup. (b) The death-rattle.

rattle² (rat'l), v. t.; pret. and pp. rattled, ppr. rattling. [A back formation from rattling, a corruption of ratline but taken as a verbal noun in -ing, whence the assumed verb rattle.] Naut., to furnish with ratlines.—To rattle down, to seize or fasten ratlines on (the shrouds of a vessel).

rattlebags (rat'l-bagz), n. See rattle¹, 6 (a).

rattle-barrel (rat'l-bar'el), n. In founding, a tumbling-box for castings, used to free them from sand, and sometimes to remove the cores.

rattlebox (rat'l-boks), n. 1. A toy that makes a rattling noise;

a rattle.—2. (a)

A plant, the yellow rattle. See rattle¹, 6 (a).

(b) Any of the Plant, with Flowers and Pods, of Rattlebox (Crotalaria sagittalis).

rattlebrain (rat'l-brān), n. A giddy, chattering person; a rattler.

rattle-brained (rat'l-brānd), a. Giddy; chattering; whimsical; rattle-headed.

rattlebush (rat'l-būsh), n. The wild indigo, Baptisia tinctoria, a bushy herb with inflated pods.

rattlecap (rat'l-kap), n. A giddy, volatile person; a madcap: generally said of a girl. [Colloq.]

rattled (rat'ld), a. 1. Confused; flurried. [Colloq. or slang.]—2. Affected by eating the loco or rattleweed; locoed. [Western U. S.]

rattlehead (rat'l-hed), n. A giddy, chattering person; a rattler.

rattle-headed (rat'l-hed'ed), a. Noisy; giddy; trifling.

rattle-mouse (rat'l-mous), n. [< rattle¹ + mouse. Cf. flittermouse, revemouse.] A bat.

Not unlike the tale of the rattle mouse.

Pattenham, Arte of Eng. Poese, II. 13 (18).

rattler (rat'l-er), n. A noisy, empty fellow; a trifling or impertinent chatterer.

rattle-pated (rat'l-pā'ted), a. Same as rattle-headed.

rattler (rat'l-er), n. [< rattle¹ + -er¹.] 1. One who rattles, or talks away without reflection or consideration; a giddy, noisy person.—2. Anything which causes a person to become rattled, as a smart or stunning blow. [Slang or colloq.]

And once, when he did this in a manner that amounted to personal, I should have given him a rattler for himself if Mrs. Boffin had not thrown herself betwixt us.

Dickens, Our Mutual Friend.

3. A rattlesnake. [U. S.]

We have had rattlers killed every year; copperheads less frequently.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LVI. 85.

4. A big or bold lie. [Colloq.]—5. Among cutlers, a special form of razor with a very thin blade, the faces of which are ground to an angle of fifteen degrees.—Diamond rattler, the diamond rattlesnake.

rattleran (rat'l-ran), n. The lower half of a fore quarter of beef; a plate-piece. [U. S.]

rattlesnake (rat'l-skul), n. Same as rattler.

rattlesnake (rat'l-snāk), n. [< rattle¹ + snake.] A venomous serpent of the family Crotalidae, whose tail ends in a rattle or crepitaculum; a crotaliform or solenoglyphic serpent, or pit-viper, of either of the genera Crotalus and Crotalophorus. These poisonous reptiles are confined to America, where there are many species. Those whose head is covered on top with scales like those of the back belong to the genus Crotalus; others, with the top of the head plated, belong to Crotalophorus, Caudisoma, or Sistrurus. The former are the larger species; both are equally venomous. In proportion to their size, and both have the pit between the eyes and nose characteristic of all the pit-vipers. (See cut under pit-viper.) The rattle is an epidermal or cuticular structure, representing the extreme of development of the horn or spine in which the tail of many other serpents ends. It consists of several hard horny pieces loosely articulated together, so that when rapidly vibrated they make a peculiar whurring or rattling noise. Rattlesnakes are sluggish and naturally inoffensive reptiles, only seeking to destroy their prey, like other animals. When alarmed or irritated they prepare to defend themselves by coiling in the attitude best adapted for striking with the fangs, at the same time sounding the warning rattle, during which process both the head and the tail are held erect. The snake can strike to a distance of about two thirds of its own length. The mechanism of the jaws is such that, when the mouth is wide open, the fangs are erected in position for piercing; and, when the mouth closes upon the wound the fangs have made in the flesh, a tiny stream of venom is spirted through each fang into the bitten part. (See cuts under Crotalus and poison fang.) The poison, which is specially modified saliva, is secreted in a venom-gland near the angle of the jaw, and is conveyed by a venom-duct to the tooth. It is extremely dangerous, readily killing the small animals upon which the snake feeds, and is often fatal to man and other large animals. It has an acid reaction, neutralizable by an alkali, and is harmless when swallowed, if there is no lesion of the mucous membrane, though exceedingly poisonous when introduced into the circulation. The flesh of the rattlesnake is edible, and some animals, as hogs and peccaries, habitually feed upon these snakes. Among the best-known species are the banded and the diamond rattlesnakes, which inhabit eastern as well as other regions of the United States, and sometimes attain a length of 5 or 6 feet; many similarly large ones are found in the west, among them Crotalus purpureus, of a reddish color. The commonest species of the west is the Missouri rattlesnake, C. conditatus, very widely distributed from the British to the Mexican boundary. Among the smaller species are the massasauga, Crotalophorus tereticaucis (Sistrurus catenatus), also known as the sidewinder, from its habit of wriggling obliquely. One species, C. cerastes, has a small horn over each eye.

Hinder Part of a Rattlesnake, showing the rattle, with seven "rings" and a "button."

Rattlesnake (Crotalus durissus) coiled to strike.

rattlesnake-fern (rat'l-snāk-fēr), n. One of the moonworts or grape-ferns, Botrychium Virginianum, found through a large part of North America and in the Old World. The sterile segment of the frond is broadly triangular, thin and finely divided, and of ample size or often reduced. The name is apparently from the resemblance of the fruit to the rattles of a rattlesnake.

rattlesnake-grass (rat'l-snāk-grās), n. An American grass, Glyceria Canadensis, a handsome stout species with a large panicle of drooping spikelets, which are ovate, and flat-tish but turgid, like those of Briza, the quaking-grass. It is a useful forage-grass in wet places. Sometimes called tall quaking-grass.

rattlesnake-herb (rat'l-snāk-ēr-b), n. The baneberry or cohosh. See Actaea.

rattlesnake-master (rat'l-snāk-mās'tēr), n. One of several American plants at some time reputed to cure the bite of the rattlesnake. (a) The false aloë, Agave Virginica, said to be so called in South Carolina. A tincture of this plant is sometimes used for flatulent colic. (b) According to Pursh, Liatris scariosa and L. squarrosa, in Virginia, Kentucky, and the Carolinas. (c) A species of eringo, Eryngium yuccifolium, also called, like Liatris, button-makeroot; but the plants are quite unlike. See the generic names.

rattlesnake-plantain (rat'l-snāk-plan'tān), n. Any one of the three American species of Goodyera.

rattlesnake-root (rat'l-snāk-rōt), n. A plant, Prenanthes serpentaria, also P. alba and P. altissima, the first at least Rattlesnake-master (Eryngium yuccifolium). 1, upper part of the stem with the heads; 2, a leaf; 3, a flower, with the bract.

Rattlesnake-root (Prenanthes alba). 1, the inflorescence; 2, lower part of stem with root; 3, a head, after anthesis; 4, the achenium with the pappus.

having some repute in North Carolina, etc., as a remedy for snake-bites. See Prenanthes and cancer-weed.

rattlesnake-weed (rat'l-snāk-wēd), n. A hawkweed, Hieracium venosum, of the eastern half of the United States. It has a slender stem a foot or two high, forking above into a loose corymb of a few yellow heads. The leaves, which are marked with purple veins, are situated mostly at the base. These and the root are thought to possess an astringent virtue.

rattletrap (rat'l-trap), n. A shaky, rattling object; especially, a rattling, rickety vehicle; in the plural, objects clattering or rattling against each other. [Colloq.]

Hang me if I'd ha' been at the trouble of conveying her and her rattle-traps last year across the channel.

Mrs. Gore, Castles in the Air, xxxiv.

"He'd destroy himself, and me too, if I attempted to ride him at such a rattletrap as that." A rattletrap! The quintain that she had put up with so much anxious care.

Trollope, Barchester Towers, viii.

rattleweed (rat'l-wēd), n. A plant of the genus Astragalus, in numerous species. It includes various loco-weeds, and is presumably extended to Oxytropis in the Rocky Mountain region.

rattlewing (rat'l-wing), n. The golden-eyed duck, or whistling, Clangula glaucion. Also called whistler. [Eng.]

rattlewort (rat'l-wört), n. [Not found in ME.; < AS. hrætelwyr, rattlewort, < hrætele*, a rattle, + wyr, wort: see *rattle*¹, *wort*¹.] A plant of the genus Crotalaria. Compare rattlebox, 2 (b).

rattling¹ (rat'ling), n. [Verbal n. of *rattle*¹, v.] 1. The act of making a rattle, clatter, or continuous jarring noise.

The noise of a whip, and the noise of the rattling of the wheels, and of the prancing horses, and of the jumping chariots.

Nahum iii. 2.

2. The act of berating or railing at or otherwise assailing or attacking: as, to give one a rattling.

rattling¹ (rat'ling), p. a. [Pr. of *rattle*¹, v.] 1. Making or adapted for making a rattle; hence, smart; sharp; lively in action, movement, or manners: as, a rattling rider; a rattling pace; a rattling game; a rattling girl.

He ance tell'd me . . . that the Psalms of David were excellent poetry! as if the holy Psalmist thought o' rattling rhymes in a blether, like his ain silly clinkum-clankum things that he ca's verse.

Scott, Rob Roy, xxi.

2. Bewilderingly large or conspicuous: as, rattling stakes or bets. [Colloq. or slang.]

rattling² (rat'ling), n. A corruption of ratline.

ratton, n. See ratten.

rattoner, n. See rattener.

rattoon¹, n. See ratoon.

rattoon², n. Same as ratan.

rat-trap (rat'trap), n. A trap for catching rats; also, something resembling or suggesting such a trap.—Rat-trap pedal. See pedal.

rauchwacke (rāk'wak; G. pron. rōuh'vā'ke), n. [G., < rauch, smoke (= E. reek), + wacke, a sort of stone consisting of quartz, sand, and mica: see wacke. Cf. graywacke.] Dolomite or dolomitic limestone, containing many small irregular cavities, frequently lined with crystals of brown-spar: a characteristic mode of occurrence of the Zechstein division of the Permian in various parts of Germany.

raucid (rā'sid), a. [< L. raucidus*, LL. dim. raucidulus, hoarse, < raucus, hoarse: see raucous.] Same as raucous.

Metinks I hear the old boatman [Charon] paddling by the weedy wharf, with raucid voice, bawling "sculla."

Lamb, To the Shade of Elliston.

raucity (rā'sj-ti), n. [< F. raucité, hoarseness, < L. raucita(t)s, hoarseness, also snoring, < raucus, hoarse: see raucous.] Roughness or harshness of utterance; hoarseness.

The purring of a wreathed string, and the raucity of a trumpet.

Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 700.

raucle (rā'kl), a. [A var. of rackel, rackle, rash, fearless, also stout, firm, strong: see rackle, rakel.] Coarse; harsh; strong; firm; bold. [Scotch.]

Auld Scotland has a raucle tongue.

Burns, Prayer to the Scotch Representatives.

raucous (rā'kus), a. [= F. rauque = Pr. rauc, rauch = Cat. ronc = Sp. ronco, rauco = Pg. rouco = It. rauco, < L. raucus, hoarse; cf. Skt. √ ru, cry out.] Hoarse; harsh; croaking in sound: as, a raucous voice or cry.

raucously (rā'kus-li), adv. In a raucous manner; with a croaking sound; hoarsely.

raught¹, n. An obsolete preterit and past participle of *reach*¹.

raught², n. An obsolete preterit and past participle of reck.

raun (rān), n. A dialectal form of *roe*².

raunce, n. See *rance*³.

raunceunt, v. t. A Middle English form of ransom.

raunch (rānch), v. t. Same as *ranch*¹.

raunson, n. raunson, n. and v. Middle English forms of ransom.

auracienne (rō-ras-ien'), n. In dyeing, same as orseillin.

Rausan (F. pron. rō-zōn'), n. [F.: see def.] A wine of Bordeaux, of the commune of Margaux: its best variety is the wine of Château Rausan, often exported under the name of Rausan-Margaux.

Rauwolfia (rau-wol'fī-ā), n. [NL. (Plumier, 1703), named after Leonhard Rauwolf, a German botanist and traveler of the sixteenth century.] A genus of gamopetalous plants of the order Apocynaceæ, the dogbane family, tribe Plumerieæ, and type of the subtribe Rauwolfieæ. It is characterized by a salver-shaped corolla with included stamens, an annular or cup-shaped disk, and an ovary with two carpels, each with two ovules, in fruit becoming drupaceous and united, often beyond the middle. There are about 42 species, natives of the tropics in America, Asia, and Africa, also in South Africa. They are trees or shrubs, commonly with smooth whorled leaves which are three or four in a circle, and finely and closely feather-veined. The small flowers and fruit are in cymose clusters which become lateral and commonly resemble umbels. Most species are actively poisonous: some, as R. nitida, are in repute as cathartics and emetics. Several medicinal species, with remarkably twisted roots and stems, were formerly separated as a genus Ophioxylon (Linnaeus, 1767), on account of their producing both sterile flowers with two stamens and fertile flowers with five: as R. serpentina, the East Indian serpentwood, a climber with handsome leaves, the root of which is used in India and China as a febrifuge. R. Sandwicensis, the hao of the Hawaiians, a small milky tree with white scarred branches, is unlike all other species in its leafy sepals.

ravage (rav'āj), n. [< F. ravage, ravage, havoc, spoil, < ravir, bear away suddenly: see ravish.]

Desolation or destruction wrought by the violent action of men or beasts, or by physical or moral causes; devastation; havoc; waste; ruin: as, the ravage of a lion; the ravages of fire or tempest; the ravages of an invading army; the ravages of passion or grief.

Would one think 'twere possible for love

To make such ravage in a noble soul? Addison.

And many another suppliant crying came

With noise of ravage wrought by beast and man.

Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

=Syn. Pillage, plunder, spoliation, despoliment. These words all apply not to the treatment of people directly, but to the destruction or appropriation of property.

ravage (rav'āj), v. t.; pret. and pp. ravaged, ppr. ravaging. [< F. ravager, ravage; from the noun.] To desolate violently; lay waste, as by force, storm, etc.; commit havoc on; devastate; pillage; despoil.

Cesar

Has ravaged more than half the globe, and sees

Mankind grown thin by his destructive sword.

Addison, Cato i. 1.

While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,

Mingling the ravaged landscape with the skies.

Goldsmith, Des. Vil., l. 358.

=Syn. To plunder, waste. See the noun.

ravager (rav'āj-ēr), n. [< F. ravageur, < ravage, ravage: see ravage.] One who ravages; a plunderer; a spoiler; one who or that which lays waste.

Ravaton's operation. See operation.

rave¹ (rāv), v.; pret. and pp. raved, ppr. raving. [< ME. raven, rave, talk like a madman (cf. MD. freq. ravelen, D. revelen, dote, etc.), < OF. raver, reverser, rave, dote, speak idly, F. réver, dream (cf. OF. ravasser, rave, talk idly, revé, madness), = Sp. rabiar, rave, = Pg. raivar, rage (cf. It. ar-rabbiare, rage, go mad), < LL. rabiare*, rave, rage, < L. rabies, ML. rabia, rage, < L. rabere, rave, rage: see rage, n., and cf. rage, v., practically a doublet of *rare*¹. Cf. also reverie.] I. intrans. 1. To talk like a madman; speak with delirious or passionate extravagance; declaim madly or irrationally; rage in speech.

Such ravel'd int'rests, has the knot untied? Waller.

3†. To treat confusedly; jumble; muddle.

They but ravel it over loosely, and pitch upon disputing against particular conclusions. Sir K. Digby.

4. To disentangle; disengage the threads or fibers of (a woven or knitted fabric, a rope, a mass of tangled hair, etc.); draw apart thread by thread; unravel: commonly with out: in this sense (the exact contrary of the first sense), originally with out, ravel out being equivalent to unravel.

Must I ravel out

My weaved-up folly?

Shak., Rich. II., iv. 1. 228.

The fiction pleas'd; their loves I long elude;
The night still ravel'd what the day renew'd.

Penton, in Pope's Odyssey, xix.

A favorite gown had been woven by raveling the general's discarded stockings. The Century, XXXVII. 841.

II. intrans. 1. To become entangled or snarled, as the ends of loose and dangling threads, or a mass of loose hair. Hence—2. To become involved or confused; fall into perplexity.

As you unwind her love from him,
Lest it should ravel and be good to none,
You must provide to bottom it on me.

Shak., T. G. of V., III. 2. 52.

Till, by their own perplexities involved,
They ravel more, still less resolved.

Milton, S. A., I. 306.

3. To curl up, as a hard-twisted thread. Jamieson. [Scotch.]—4. To become untwisted or disjoined, as the outer threads of a loosely made fabric or the strands of a rope; become disjoined thread by thread; fray, as a garment at the edges: commonly with out.

I ryvell out, as sylke doth, je rivle.

Palsgrave.

Hence—5. To suffer gradual disintegration or decay.

Do's my lord ravel out? do's he fret?

Marsden, The Fawne, II. 1.

And this vast Work all ravel out again
To its first Nothing. Conley, Davidels, I.

6†. To make a minute and careful examination in order to straighten what is confused, unfold what is hidden, or clear up what is obscure; investigate; search; explore.

It can be little pleasure to us to rave [sic ed. 1660, 1671; rake, ed. 1681, 1696: read ravel] into the infirmities of God's servants, and bring them upon the stage.

Bp. Sanderson, Works, I. 100.

It will be needless to ravel far into the records of elder times.

Decay of Christian Piety.

The humour of ravelling into all these mystical or entangled matters . . . produced infinite disputes.

Sir W. Temple.

ravel¹ (rav'el or rav'l), n. [Formerly or dial. also revel; < *ravel*¹, v.] 1. A raveled thread; a raveling. [Rare.]

Life goes all to ravels and tatters. Carlyle, in Froude.

2. pl. The broken threads cast away by women at their needlework. Hallivell (spelled revells).

—3. In weaving, a serrated instrument for guiding the separate yarns when being distributed and wound upon the yarn-beam of a loom, or for guiding the yarns wound on a balloon; an evenner; a separator.

Also, in Scotch spelling, raivel.

ravel² (rav'el), v. Same as *rabbie*¹. [Prov. Eng.]

ravel-bread (rav'el-bred), n. Same as raveled bread. See raveled. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

raveled, ravelled, a. [< OF. ravalé, ravallé, brought low, abated, lessened in price, pp. of ravaler, ravaller, ravailer, bring down, bring low, abate, diminish, lessen in price, < re-, back, + avaler, let down, come down: see avale.] Lower-priced: distinctively noting wheaten bread made from flour and bran together.

The raveled is a kind of cheat bread, but it retaineth more of the grosse and lesse of the pure substance of the wheat.

Harrison, p. 108. (Hallivell.)

They had four different kinds of wheaten bread: the finest called manchet, the second cheat or trencher bread, the third ravell'd, and the fourth in England called mescelin [see *maslin*²], in Scotland maschloch. The raveled was taken up just as it came from the mill, flour, bran, and all.

Arnot, Hist. of Edin. (Jamieson.)

ravelin (rav'lin), n. [Formerly also rav'lin, corruptly raveling; < OF. ravelin, F. ravelin, m., OF. also rareline, f., = Sp. revellin = Pg. revellim, < OIt. ravellino, revellino, It. rirellino, a ravelin; origin unknown; hardly, as supposed, < L. re-, back, + callum, a wall, rampart: see *call*¹. Cf. F. dial. ravelin, dim. of ravin, a ravine, hollow: see *ravine*².] A detached triangular work in fortification, with two embankments which form a projecting angle. In the figure BB is the ravelin, with A its redout, and CC its ditch. DD is the main ditch of the fortress, and E the passage giving access from the fortress to the ravelin.

We will erect

The alleged etymological connection with L. corvus, Gr. kōpāz, raven, L. cornix, Gr. κορώνη, crow, Pol. kruk, a raven, Skt. kāravā, a raven, is not made out.] I. n. 1. A bird of the larger species of the genus

Corvus, having the feathers of the throat lanceolate and distinct from one another. The plumage is entirely black, with more or less lustrous or metallic sheen; the bill and feet are ebony-black; the wings are pointed, the tail is rounded, and the nostrils are concealed beneath large tufts of antrorse plumules. The voice is raucous. The common raven is C. corax, about Raven (Corvus corax).

2 feet long and 50 inches in extent of wings. It inhabits Europe, Asia, and some other regions, and the American bird, though distinguished as C. carolinensis, is scarcely different. There are several similar though distinct species of various countries, among them C. cryptoleucus of western North America, which has the concealed bases of the feathers of the neck snowy-white. Ravens are easily tamed, and make very intelligent pets, but are thievish and troublesome. They may be taught to imitate speech to some extent. In the wild state the raven is omnivorous, like the crow; it nests on trees, rocks, and cliffs, preferring the most inaccessible places, and lays four or five greenish eggs heavily speckled with brown and blackish shades. The American raven is now almost unknown in the eastern parts of the United States, but is still abundant in the west. Ravens have from time immemorial been viewed with superstitious dread, being supposed to bring bad luck and forebode death.

The raven himself is hoarse

Ravenala (rav-e-nā'lā), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763), from a native name in Madagascar.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, of the order

Musaceae, the banana family. It is characterized by a loculicidally three-valved and three-celled capsule with numerous seeds in six rows, and by separate long and narrow sepals and petals, three of each, all similar and unappendaged. There are but 2 species, natives one of Madagascar, the other of northern Brazil and Guiana. In both the stem is sometimes short, with the leaves almost all radical, at other times forming a tall woody trunk reaching 30 feet high, ringed by leaf-scars. The handsome oblong and two-ranked leaves resemble those of the banana, and are of immense size, being considered the largest undivided leaves known, with the exception perhaps of the Victoria lily. The long concave leafstalks are divided within into small cubical chambers, about a half-inch square, filled with a clear watery sap which forms a refreshing drink, whence the name traveler's-tree, used in botanic gardens for R. Madagascariensis. The leaves are also used as a thatch for the native huts. The large flowers form a short many-flowered raceme within the spathe, and are followed by woody capsules and edible seeds with a lacerate and pulpy blue aril which yields an essential oil. See traveler's-tree.

raven-cockatoo (rā'vn-kok-g-tō'), n. A black cockatoo. See cockatoo.

ravener (rav'n-ēr), n. [< ME. raver, raviner, ravynere, ravynner, ravinour, ravynour, ravenour, < OF. ravineor, ravineor, < L. rapinator, a plunderer, robber, < rapinare, plunder, rob: see raven².] 1. One who ravens or plunders; a greedy plunderer; a devourer or pursuer.

We scorn swich raviners and hunters of fouleste things. Chaucer, Boethius, i. prose 3.

And then he is such a ravener after fruit.

B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair, i. 1.

2. A bird of prey. Holland.

U. S. Cons. Rep., No. 1x. (1886), p. 96.

2. A raw, galled, or sore place; an established sore, as on a horse; hence, soreness or sensitiveness of feeling or temper. [Colloq.]

Like savage hackney coachmen, they know where there is a raw.
De Quincey, (Webster.)

It's a tender subject, and every one has a raw on it.

Lever, Davenport Dunn.

Here is Baynes. . . in a dreadfully wicked, murderous, and dissatisfied state of mind. His chafing, bleeding temper is one raw; his whole soul one rage and wrath.

Thackeray, Philip, xviii.

3. In bot., same as *rag*¹, 3 (b). [Prov. Eng.]—To touch one on the raw, to irritate one by alluding to or joking him about any matter in respect to which he is especially sensitive.

raw² (rā), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of *roie*².

Clavers and his Highlandmen

Came down upo' the raw.

rawly (rā'li), adv. 1. In a raw, crude, unfinished, immature, or untempered manner; crudely; roughly.

Nothing is so prosaic as the rawly new.

W. W. Story, Roba di Roma, I.

2†. In an unprepared or unprovided state.

Some crying for a surgeon, some upon their wives left poor behind them, some upon the debts they owe, some upon their children rawly left.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1. 147.

rawness (rā'nes), n. [rawness, rawness, rawness, rawness; *raw*¹ + -ness.] 1. The state or quality of being raw, in any sense.

Of what Comodity such use of arte wilbe in our tounge may partly be scene by the scholasticall rawness of some newly Commen from the vniversities.

Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), I. 2.

Much if not most of this rawness in the use of English must come, not merely from defective training in schools, but from defective training at home.

The Nation, XLVIII. 392.

2†. Unprepared or precipitate manner; want of provision or foresight.

Why in that rawness left you wife and child, . . .

Without leave-taking?
Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 26.

rawnsaket, v. t. An old form of ransack.

raw-port (rā'pōrt), n. A port-hole in a small sailing vessel through which in a calm an oar can be worked.

Piers Plowman (C), viii. 7.

ray¹ (rā), n. [ME. raye, < OF. ray, rai, raid, F. rais, a spoke, ray, = Pr. rai, rai, rai, rai, spoke, ray, = Sp. rayo, a spoke, ray, thunderbolt, right line, radius, radio, radius, = Fr. radio, a spoke, ray, thunderbolt, radio, radius, = It. razzo, a spoke, ray, beam, raggio, a ray, beam, radius, radio, ray; also in fem., OF. raie, F. raie, a line, stroke, = Pr. Sp. raya, a line, streak, stroke, limit, boundary (see *ray*²); < L. radius, a staff, rod, a beam or ray, etc.: see radius.] 1. Light emitted in a given direction from a luminous body; a line of light, or, more generally, of radiant energy; technically, the straight line perpendicular to the wave-front in the propagation of a light- or heat-wave. For different waves the rays may have different wave-lengths. Thus, in a pencil or beam of light, which is conceived to be made up of an indefinite number of rays, the rays all have the same wave-length if the beam is monochromatic; but if it is of white light, the wave-lengths of the rays vary by insensible degrees from that of red to that of violet light. (See radiant energy (under energy), spectrum.) A collection of parallel rays constitutes a beam; a collection of diverging or converging rays a pencil.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene

The dark, unfathomed caves of ocean bear.

Gray, Elegy.

2. A beam of intellectual light.

A ray of reason stole

Half through the solid darkness of his soul.

Pope, Dunciad, iii. 225.

3. A stripe; streak; line.

Wrought with little raies, streames, or streaks.

Baret, Alvearie, 1580.

4. In geom., an unlimited straight line. As it is desirable to give the line different names according as it is conceived (1) as a locus of points, (2) as an intersection of planes, or (3) as an element of a plane, in 1845 the practice was begun of calling the unlimited straight line considered as a locus of points a ray. But as it was found that the word did not readily suggest that idea, owing to other associations, the practice was changed, and the line so considered is now called a range, while the word ray is taken to mean an unlimited straight line as an element of a plane. In older geometrical writings ray is synonymous with radius, while a line considered as a radial emanation is called a beam.

5. In bot.: (a) One of the branches or pedicels in an umbel. (b) The marginal part as opposed to the central part or disk in a head, umbel, or other flower-cluster, when there is a difference of structure, as in many Compositae and in wild hydrangeas. (c) A ray-flower. (d) A radius. See medullary rays, under medullary.—6. One of the ray-like processes or arms of the Radiata, as of a starfish; a radiated or radiating part or organ; an actinomere. See cuts under Asterias and Asteriidae.—7. One of the hard spinous or soft jointed processes which support and serve to extend the fin of a fish; a part of the skeleton of the fin; specifically, one which is articulated, thus contradistinguished from a hard or inarticulated one called specifically a spine; a fin-ray.—8. In entom., one of the longitudinal nervures or veins of an insect's wing.—9. pl. In her.: (a) Long indentations or dents by which a heraldic line is broken, whether dividing two parts of the escutcheon or bounding any ordinary. Compare radiant, 3 (a). (b) A representation of rays, whether issuing from the sun or from a corner of the escutcheon, a cloud, or an ordinary. They are sometimes straight, sometimes waving, and sometimes alternately straight and waving; it is in the last form that they are usually represented when surrounding the sun.—Branchial ray, branchiostegal rays. See the adjectives.—Calorific rays, heat-rays. See heat and spectrum.—Cone of rays. See cone.—Deviation of a ray of light. See deviation.—Direct rays. See direct illumination, under direct.—Divergent rays. See divergent.

—Extraordinary ray. See refraction.—Herschelian rays of the spectrum. See Herschelian.—Medullary rays. (a) See medullary. (b) Bundles of straight or collecting tubules of the kidney contained in the cortex; the pyramids of Ferrein. See tubule.—Obscure rays. See obscure and spectrum.—Ordinary ray. See refraction.—Principal ray. See principal.—Kitteric rays. See Kitteric.—Visual rays. See visual.

ray¹ (rā), v. [< OF. raier, F. rayer, mark with lines, streak, stripe, mark out, scratch, = Pr. raier = Sp. rayar, form lines or strokes, streak, = Pg. raier, radiate, sparkle, = It. raggiare, razzare, radiate, also Sp. Pg. radiar = It. radiare, radiate, sparkle; < L. radiare, furnish with spokes or beams, radiate, shine forth, < radius, a staff, rod, spoke of a wheel, ray, etc.: see ray¹, n., and cf. radiate.] I. trans. 1. To mark with long lines; form rays of or in.

Unloved, the sun-flower, shining fair,
Ray round with flames her disk of seed.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, li.

2. To shoot forth or emit; cause to shine out.

Shines o'er the rest, the pastoral queen, and rays
Her smiles, sweet-beaming, on her shepherd-king.
Thomson, Summer, l. 401.

3t. To stripe.

I will yit him a feder bedde
Rayed with golde.

Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 252.

II. intrans. To shine forth or out as in rays.

In a molten glory shrined That rays off into gloom. Mrs. Browning.

ray² (rā), n. [*< ME. raye, < OF. raie, raye, F. raie = OCat. raya = Sp. raya = It. raja, razza (cf. ML. ragadia), < L. rāia, a ray; prob. orig. ragia, akin to D. roch, rog = LG. ruche (> LG. roche), a roach, a ray, = Dan. rokke, a ray, = AS. reohhe, reohche (glossed by ML. fannus), ME. rehge, rohze, a roach: see roach¹.] 1. One of the elasmobranchiate fishes constituting the genus Raja, recognized by the flattened body, which becomes a broad disk from its union with the extremely broad and fleshy pectorals, which are joined to each other before or at the snout, and extend behind the two sides of the abdomen as far as the base of the ventrals, resembling the rays of a fan.—2. Any member of the order Hypotremi, Batoidei, or Raie, such as the sting-ray, eagle-ray, skate, torpedo, etc. See cuts under Elasmobranchii, skate, sting-ray, and torpedo.—Beaked rays, Rhinobatidae.—Clear-nosed ray, Raja eglanteria.—Cow-nosed ray, Rhinoptera quadricolor. Also called clam-cracker, corn-cracker, whippers, etc.—Fuller or fuller's ray, Raja fullonica.—Horned ray, a ray or batoid fish of the family Cephalopteridae or Mantidae: so called from the horn-like projections on the head. See cut under devil-fish.—Painted ray. See pointed.—Sandy ray, Raja circularis.—Starry ray or skate, Raja radiata.—Stingless rays, Anacanthidae.—Torpedo ray, Torpedinidae. See torpedo. (See the generic and family names; also bishop-ray, butterfly-ray, eagle-ray, sting-ray.)

ray³ (rā), n. [< ME. raye, ray, < OF. rei, rai, roi, array: see array, of which ray³ is in part an aphetic form.] Array; order; arrangement; rank; dress.

Wee brake the rayes of all the Romayne hoast,
And made the mighty Caesar leaue his boast.
Yet hee [Caesar], the worthyest Captaine euer was, Brought all in ray and fought agayne a new.

Mir. for Mags., l. 237.

And spoyling all her geares and goodly ray.

Spenser, F. Q., V. li. 50.

ray⁴ (rā), v. t. [< ME. rayen; < ray³, n. Cf. array, v., of which ray³ is in part an aphetic form. In def. 2, the same verb used (as array also was used) in an ironical application; hence, in comp., beray.] 1. To array.—2. To beray with dirt or filth; daub; defile.

Fie on . . . all foul ways! Was ever man so beaten?
was ever man so rayed?

Shak., T. of the S., iv. 1. 3.

ray⁵ (rā), n. [Early mod. E. also rey; < ME. raye; prob. a particular application of ray¹, a stripe, line, etc.] A kind of striped cloth.

Ich drow me among drapers, . . .
Among the riche rayes ich rendered a lesson.

Piers Plowman (C), vii. 217.

1525. More, in the sixteenth of Henry the eighth, Sir William Bayly then being Mayor, made a request, for that clothes of Ray (as hee alleaged) were evill wrought, his Officers might bee permitted (contrary to custome) for that yeece to weare Gounes of one colour.

Stow, Survey of London, p. 652.

Four yards of broad Cloth, rowed or striped thwart with a different colour, to make him a Goune, and these were called Rey Gounes. Stow, Survey of London, p. 652.

ray⁶ (rā), n. [< MHG. reige, reie, rei, G. reihen, reigen, a kind of dance.] A kind of dance. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

ray⁷ (rā), n. [Origin obscure.] A certain disease of sheep, also called scab, shab, or rubbers.

ray⁸ (rā), n. Same as roy.

Scho take hir lave and went hir waye,
Bothe at barone and at raye.

Perceval, 179. (Halliwell.)

Raya¹, Rayah (rā'yā), n. [= F. rayah, raia, < Ar. raya, pl. ra'ayā, people, peasants, subjects, cattle, < ra'a, pasture, feed; cf. raaya, flocks, herds. Cf. ryot, ult. the same word.] Any subject of the Sultan of Turkey who is not a Mohammedan.

raya² (rā'yā), n. [E. Ind.] An Indian broad-throat of the family Eurylæmidae, Psarisomus dalhousiei, inhabiting the Himalayas. The term is also one of the several generic designations which this species has received.

Rayah, n. See Raya¹.

rayat, rayatwari. See ryot, ryotwar.

rayed (rād), a. [< ME. rayed, rayyd, rayid; < ray¹ + -ed.] 1. Having rays or ray-like processes, as a flower-head or an animal; specifically, in zoöl.; radiate.—2. Having rays (of this or that kind): as, a many-rayed fin; a soft-rayed fish.

The third is an octagonal chapel, of which we can see but little more than the roof with its rayed tiling. Ruskin.

3t. Striped.

The sheriffs of London should give yearly rayed gowns to the recorder, chamberlain, etc.

Archæologia, XXXIX. 367.

Rayed animals. See Radiata.

rayet (rā'ēr), n. [< ME. rayere, < raye, striped cloth: see ray⁴.] A seller of ray-cloth. Piers Plowman.

rayey (rā'i), a. [< ray¹ + -ey = -y¹.] Having or consisting of rays.

The rayey fringe of her faire eyes. Cotton, Song.

ray-floret (rā'flō'ret), n. A ray-flower: used chiefly of Compositæ.

ray-flower (rā'flō'ēr), n. One of the flowers which collectively form the ray (see ray¹, 5 (b)); most often, one from the circle of ligulate flowers surrounding a disk of tubular flowers in the heads of many Compositæ.

ray-grass (rā'grās), n. A good forage-grass, Lolium perenne. Also rye-grass.

rayket, n. and v. A Middle English form of rake².

raylet. A Middle English form of rail¹, rail², etc.

rayless (rā'les), a. [< ray¹ + -less.] 1. Without rays or radiance; unilluminated; lightless; dark; somber; gloomy.

Night, sable goddess, from her ebon throne,
In rayless majesty, now stretches forth
Her leaden sceptre o'er a slumb'ring world.

Young, Night Thoughts, l. 19.

Such a rayless and chilling look of recognition.

O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, iv.

2. In bot. and zoöl., having no rays or ray-like parts.

rayont (rā'on), n. [< F. rayon, a ray, beam, < rais, a ray: see ray¹.] A beam or ray.

Shining christall which from top to base
Out of her wombe a thousand rayons threw [Out of a deepe vault threw forth a thousand rayes (ed. 1569)].

Spenser, Visions of Bellay (ed. 1591), li.

rayonnant (rā'o-nant), a. [< F. rayonnant, ppr. of rayonner, radiate, shine, < rayon, a ray: see rayon.] Radiating; arranged in the direction of rays issuing from a center. Decoration is often said to be rayonnant when, as in the case of a round dish or other circular object, the surface is divided into panels growing larger as they approach the circumference, and bounded by the radii and by arcs of larger and smaller circles.

rayonned (rā'ond), a. [< rayon + -ed.] Same as rayonnant.

raze¹ (rāz), v. t. See rase¹.

raze², n. An obsolete form of race⁴.

raze³ (rāz), n. [Origin obscure.] A swinging fence set up in a watercourse to prevent the passage of cattle. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

razed (rāzd), p. a. [Pp. of raze¹, v.] In her., same as ragged, 7.

raze⁴ (rā-zē'), n. [< F. rasé, cut down (vaisseau rasé, a vessel cut down), pp. of raser, shave, rase: see rase¹, raze¹.] A ship of war cut down to a smaller size by reducing the number of decks.

raze⁵ (rā-zē'), v. t. [< raze⁴, n.] To cut down or reduce to a lower class, as a ship; hence, to lessen or abridge by cutting out parts: as, to raze a book or an article.

The few greatcoats remaining were materially razeed for repairing rents in other garments.

Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 402.

razor (rā'zor), n. [Early mod. E. also rasour, raser; < ME. rasour, rasoure, rasoure, rasure, a razor, < OF. (and F.) rasoir = Pr. razor = OCat. rasó = It. rasoio, < ML. rasorium, a razor (cf. rasorius, razor-fish), < L. radere, pp. rasus, scrape, shave: see rase¹, raze¹.] 1. A sharp-edged instrument used for shaving the face or head.

The blade is usually made with a thick rounded back, sides hollowed or sloping to a very thin edge, and a tang by which it is pivoted to and swings freely in a two-leaved handle. The tang has a prolongation by the aid of which the razor is firmly grasped and controlled. There are also razors formed on the principle of the carpenter's plane, by the use of which the risk of cutting the skin is avoided. In Eastern countries razors are made with an immovable handle continuous with the blade. Compare rattler, 5.

Cross-sections of Razors.
a and b, ordinary forms; c, section known as "half-rattler"; d, backed razor.

My berd, myn heer that hongeth long adoun,
That never yet ne felte offensoun
Of rasour nor of shere.

Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1559.

2. A tusk: as, the razors of a boar. Johnson. —Occam's razor, the principle that the unnecessary supposition that things of a peculiar kind exist, when the observed facts may be equally well explained on the supposition that no such things exist, is unwarranted (Entia non sunt multiplicanda præter necessitatem). So called after William of Occam (died about 1349); but, as a historical fact, Occam does not make much use of this principle, which belongs rather to the contemporary nominalist William Durand de St. Pourçain (died 1332).

razorable (rā'zor-ə-bl), a. [< razor + -able.] Fit to be shaved.

Till new-born chins
Be rough and razorable.

Shak., Tempest, ii. 1. 250.

razorback (rā'zor-bak), n. 1. A porqual, fin-fish, or finner-whale, of the family Balænoptæridæ.—2. A hog whose back has somewhat the form of a sharp ridge. This formation, accompanied by long legs, is characteristic of breeds of hogs that have long been allowed to run wild in woods and waste places and feed upon mast, wild fruits, etc. The flesh of such swine, particularly that of the hams, is usually of superior quality for the table.

The razor-back of our Southern forests is only semi-civilized, and is altogether a more picturesque animal. In foraging for succulent roots he has developed a snout that will turn a double furrow with the ease and expedition of a steam-ditcher. . . . But the razor-back lacks the high courage of his untamed progenitors.

New York Tribune, Aug. 16, 1886.

razor-backed (rā'zor-bakt), a. 1. Having a sharp back; hog-backed: as, the razor-backed buffalo, a fish, Ictiobus urus, of the Mississippi valley.—2. Having a long sharp dorsal fin which cuts the water like a razor, as the porqual.

razorbill (rā'zor-bil), n. 1. The razor-billed auk, or tinker, Alca or Uta mania torda, so called from the deep, compressed, and trenchant bill. The bill is feathered for about one half its length, in the rest of its extent being vertically furrowed, and hooked at the Razorbill (Alca torda), in winter plumage.

tip: one of the furrows is white, the bill being otherwise black, like the feet; the mouth is yellow. The plumage is black on the upper parts, the lower parts from the neck in summer, and from the bill in winter, being white; there is a narrow white line from the bill to the eye, and the tips of the secondaries are white. The bird is about 18 inches long, and 27 in extent of wings. It inhabits arctic and northerly regions of both hemispheres, subsists chiefly on fish, and nests on rocky sea-coasts, laying a single egg about 3 by 2 inches, white or whitish, spotted and blotched with different shades of brown. The flesh is eatable.

2. The skimmer or cutwater, Rhynchops nigra. See skimmer and Rhynchops.

razor-billed (rā'zor-bıld), a. Having a bill likened to a razor in any way: specifically noting certain birds.—Razor-billed auk. See razorbill, 1.—Razor-billed curassow, a bird of the genus Mitua, as M. tuberosa of Guiana.

razorblade (rā'zor-blād), n. A long, slim oyster. [Connecticut.]

razor-clam (rā'zor-klam), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Solenidae, especially of the genera Ensis, Solen, or Siliqua; a razor-fish or razor-shell: so called from its shape. See cut under Ensis.

razor-fish (rā'zor-fish), n. 1. A fish of the family Labridae, Xyrichtys lineatus, of the West Indies, occasional on the southern coast of the United States.—2. A related fish, Xyrichtys novacula, of the Mediterranean.—3. A razor-clam: so called from the shape of the shell, which resembles a razor. The common razor-fish of Great Britain is Ensis siliqua, also called spout-fish and razor-shell. Siliqua patula is a Californian species, used for food.

razor-grass (rā'zor-grās), n. A West Indian nut-rush, Scleria scindens, with formidable cutting leaves.

razor-grinder (rā'zor-grīn'dēr), n. The night-jar: same as grinder, 3.

razor-hone (rā'zor-hōn), n. A fine hone used for sharpening or setting razors. See hone, 1.

razor-paper (rā'zor-pā'pēr), n. Smooth unsized paper coated on one side with a composition of powdered crocus and emery, designed as a substitute for a strop.

razor-paste (rā'zor-pāst), n. A paste of emery-powder or the like, for spreading on the surface of a razor-strop to give it its sharpening property.

razor-shell (rā'zor-shel), n. The shell of a razor-fish; a bivalve mollusk of the genera Ensis, Solen, or Siliqua: so called from the shape of the shell, which resembles a razor. Compare razor-fish, 3.

razor-stone (rā'zor-stōn), n. Same as novaculite.

razor-strop (rā'zor-strop), n. An implement for sharpening razors. See strop. Also called razor-strap.

razure (rā'zhūr), n. [= F. rasure, < L. rasura, < radere, pp. rasus, scrape: see rasc, 1.] See rasure.

razzia (rat'si-ā), n. [< F. razzia = Pg. gazia, gaziva, a raid; < Algerian Ar. ghazia (Turk. ghazya) (pron. nearly razia in Algeria, the initial letter gh being represented by the F. r grassé), a military expedition against infidels, a crusade, a military incursion.] Properly, a military raid intended for the subjection or punishment of hostile or rebellious people by the carrying off of cattle, destruction of crops, etc.; by extension, any plundering or destructive incursion in force. Razzias were formerly common in Arabian countries. They were practised by the Turkish authorities in Algeria and other provinces against tribes or districts which refused to pay taxes; and the word was adopted, and the practice continued for a time, by the French in Algeria after its conquest.

It was probable he should hand the troops over to John Jones for the razzia against the Moulvie.
W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 27.

Rb. The chemical symbol of rubidium.

R. O. An abbreviation of Roman Catholic.

R. D. An abbreviation (a) of Royal Dragoons; (b) of Rural Dean.

R. E. An abbreviation (a) of Royal Engineers; (b) of Royal Exchange.

re¹ (rā), n. [See gamut.] In solmization, the syllable used for the second tone of the scale. In the scale of C this tone is D—a tone which is therefore sometimes called re in France and Italy.

re² (rē), n. [L. abl. of res, thing, case, matter, affair: see res, 2.] A word used in legal language in the phrase in re: as, 'in re Bardell vs. Pickwick,' in the case of Bardell against Pickwick: often elliptically re: as, re Bardell vs. Pickwick; re Brown.

re- [ME. re- = OF. re-, F. re-, ré- = Sp. Pg. re- = It. re-, ri-, < L. re-, before a vowel or h generally red-, but later also re- (the form red- also occurring in red-dere, render, and, assimilated, in rel-ligio, religion, rel-liquia, relics, rec-cidere, fall back, and with a connecting vowel in red-ricus, living again), an inseparable prefix, back, again, against: see def. The OF. and It. form re- often appears as ra- by confusion with the true ra- (< L. re- + ad-), and the following consonant is often doubled, as in OF. repeller, < L. repellere, repel; It. rappresentare, < L. repræsentare, represent; etc. Words with the prefix ra- in OF. usually appear with re- in E., except when the accent has receded, as in rally, 1.] An inseparable prefix of Latin origin (before a vowel usually in the form red-), meaning 'back,' 'again.'

It occurs in a great number of verbs and derived adjectives and nouns taken from the Latin, and is also common as an English formative. It denotes (a) a turning back ('back'), as in recede, recur, remit, repeel, etc.; (b) opposition ('against'), as in reluctant, repugnant, etc.; (c) restoration to a former state ('back,' 'again,' English un-), as in restitution, relegate, redintegrate or reintegrate, and with some words of non-Latin origin, as in recall, remind, renew, etc.; (d) transition to an opposite state, as in reprobate, retract, revel, etc.; (e) repetition of an action ('again'), as in revise, resume, etc., becoming in this use an extremely common English formative, applicable to any English verb whatever, whether of Latin origin, as in re-act, re-enter, re-engage, re-address, re-appear, re-produce, re-unite, etc., or of Anglo-Saxon or other origin, as in re-bind, re-build, re-duce, re-fill, re-fit, re-hate, re-light, re-line, re-load, re-set, re-solve, etc. In many words taken from the Latin, either directly or through the Old French, the force of re- (red-) has been lost, or is not distinctly felt, in English, as in receive, reception, recommend, recover, reduce, redeem, recuperate, recreate, refer, rejoice, relate, religion, remain, renown, repair, repair, report, request, require, and other words containing a radical element not used in the particular sense concerned, or not used at all, in English. Some of these words, as recover, recreate, are distinguished from English formations with the clear prefix re-, again, often written distinctively with a hyphen, as in re-cover, re-create, etc. In many instances the prefix, by shifting of accent and change of sound, or loss of adjacent elements, loses the character of a prefix, as in rebel, a. relic, relict, remnant, rest, restive, etc., and in words from Old French in which the prefix re- combines with the prefix a- in the form ra-, not recognized as an English prefix, as in rally, rabate, etc. In some other words also re- is reduced to r-, as in ransom (doublet of redemption), rampart, recount, etc. The prefix re- is found in many words formed in Old French from non-Latin elements, as in regret, regard, reward, etc. As an English formative re- may be prefixed to a primitive verb, adjective, or noun, or to derivatives, indifferently, and such secondary forms as reestablishment, reaction, etc., may be analyzed either as re- + establishment, re- + action, etc., or as reestablish + -ment, re- + -ion, etc. Prefixed to a word beginning with e, re- is separated by a hyphen, as re-establish, re-estate, re-edify, etc.; or else the second e has a dieresis over it: as, re-establish, re-embarc, etc. The hyphen is also sometimes used to bring out emphatically the sense of repetition or iteration: as, re-sung and re-sung. The dieresis is not used over other vowels than e when re- is prefixed: thus, reinforce, reunite, rebofish.

reabsorb (rē-ab-sōrb'), v. t. [= F. réabsorber; as re- + absorb.] To draw or take in anew by absorption, imbibition, or swallowing, as something previously ejected, emitted, or put forth.

During the embryo stage of the higher vertebrate temporary organs appear, serve their purpose awhile, and are subsequently reabsorbed.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 458.

reabsorption (rē-ab-sōrp'shōn), n. [= F. ré-absorption; as re- + absorption.] The act of reabsorbing, or the state of being reabsorbed.
reaccommode (rē-ā-kom'ō-dāt), v. t. [< re- + accommodate.] To readjust; resettle; bring into renewed order.

King Edward . . . discovering the Disturbance made by the Change of Place, instantly sends a charge that Part, without giving them Time to re-accommode themselves.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 121.

reaccuse (rē-ā-kūz'), v. t. [< re- + accuse.] To accuse again or afresh; make a renewed accusation against.

Herford, . . . who re-accus'd
Norfolk for words of treason he had us'd.
Daniel, Civil Wars, I. 60.

reach¹ (rēch), v.; pret. and pp. reached (formerly raught), ppr. reaching. [Also dial., with shortened vowel, retch, and unassimilated reck; < ME. rechen (pret. raughte, raghte, raght, rehte, rehte, pp. raught, raugt), < AS. ræcan, ræcean (pret. ræhte), reach, get into one's power, = OFries. reka, reisia, reza = MD. reijcken, D. reiken = MLG. reken, LG. reiken = OHG. reihhen, reichen, MHG. G. reichen, reach, extend, stretch out. The word has been more or less associated with the group to which belong rack, rake, raz, retch, etc., Goth. rahan, etc., stretch, and L. reg-cre, por-rigere, Gr. ῥέγειν, stretch, but an orig. connection is on phonetic grounds improbable.] I. trans. 1. To hold or stretch forth; extend outward.

Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side.
John xx. 27.

He shall flourish,
And, like a mountain cedar, reach his branches
To all the plains about him.
Shak., Hen. VIII., v. 5. 53.

To his
She reached her hands, and in one bitter kiss
Tasted his tears.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 307.

2. To deliver by or as if by the outstretched hand; hand out or over; extend out to.

First, Christ took the bread in his hands; secondarily, he gave thanks; thirdly, he broke it; fourthly, he raught it them, saying, Take it.
Tyndale, Ana. to Sir T. More, etc. (Parker Soc., 1850), [p. 241.]

The prince he reacht Robin Hood a blow.
Robin Hood and the Stranger (Child's Ballads, v. 415).

Reach a chair;
So; now, methinks, I feel a little ease.
Shak., Hen. VIII., iv. 2. 3.

I stand at one end of the room, and reach things to her woman.
Steele, Spectator, No. 137.

3. To make a stretch to; bring into contact by or as if by stretching out the hand; attain to by something held or stretched out: as, to reach a book on a shelf; to reach an object with a cane.

He slough man and horse whom that he raught with his axe that he heilde with bothe handes.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), II. 288.

Wilt thou reach stars, because they shine on thee?
Shak., T. G. of V., iii. 1. 156.

4. To take, seize, or move by stretching out the hand, or by other effort.

Than Troilell with tene the tourfer beheld, . . .
Reiches his reynis & his roile [rowel] strykes,
Caires to the kyng with a kant wille.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 10215.

The damesell hym thanked, and raught hym vp be the honde.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 697.

Lest therefore his now bolder hand
Reach also of the tree of life, and eat,
And live for ever.
Milton, P. L., xi. 94.

5. To attain to by movement or progress; arrive at, physically or mentally; come or get to: as, to reach a port or destination; to reach high office or distinction; to reach a conclusion by study or by reasoning.

And through the Tyrrhene Sea, by strength of toiling oars, Raught Italy at last.
Dryden, Polyolbion, i. 325.

He must have reached a very advanced age.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 98.

He [Dante] has shown us the way by which that country far beyond the stars may be reached.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 124.

6. To extend to in continuity or scope; stretch or be prolonged so as to extend to, literally or figuratively; attain to contact with or action upon; penetrate to.

There is no mercy in mankind can reach me.
Fletcher, Bonduca, iv. 3.

Thy desire . . . leads to no excess
That reaches blame, but rather merits praise.
Milton, P. L., iii. 697.

The loss might be repaired again; or, if not, could not however destroy us by reaching us in our greatest and highest concern.
South, Sermons, II. I.

When he addresses himself to battle against the guardian angels, he stands like Teneriffe or Atlas; his stature reaches the sky.
Carlyle.

7. To come or get at; penetrate or obtain access to; extend cognizance, agency, or influence to: as, to reach a person through his vanity.

The fineness and fullness of his [George Fox's] words have often struck even strangers with admiration, as they used to reach others with consolation.
Penn, Rise and Progress of Quakers, v.

It is difficult indeed in some places to reach the sense of the inspired writers.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. ix.

He [Atterbury] could be reached only by a bill of pains and penalties.
Macaulay, Francis Atterbury.

8. To attain to an understanding of; succeed in comprehending.

But how her fawning partner fell I reach not,
Unless caught by some springe of his own setting.
Middleton, Women Beware Women, v. 1.

Sir P. I reach you not.
Lady P. Right, sir, your polley
May bear it through this.
B. Jonson, Volpone, iv. 1.

II. intrans. 1. To stretch; have extent in course or direction; continue to or toward a term, limit, or conclusion.

By hym that raughte on rode [the cross].
Piers Plowman (C), v. 179.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven.
Gen. xxviii. 12.

Thus far the fable reaches of Proteus, and his flock, at liberty and unrestrained.
Bacon, Physical Fables, vii., Expl.

They [consequences] reach only to those of their posterity who abet their forefathers' crime, and continue in their infidelity. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. v.

There are the wide-reaching views of fruitful valleys and of empurpled hill-sides. D. G. Mitchell, Wet Days at Edgewood, Pliny's Country [Places].

In the distance . . . the mountains reach away in faint and fainter shades of purple and brown. Harper's Weekly, Jan. 19, 1889.

2. To extend in amount or capacity; rise in quantity or number; amount; suffice: with to or unto.

What may the king's whole battle [army] reach unto? Shak., I Hen. IV., iv. 1. 129.

Every one was to pay his part according to his proportion towards yr purchas, & all other debts, what yr profite of yr trade would not reach too. Bradford, Plymouth Plantation, p. 215.

A very exceptional grant was made, two fifteenths and tenths first, and then another sum of the same amount, reaching, according to Lord Bacon, to £120,000. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 360.

3. To make a stretch to or toward something, as with the hand or by exertion; stretch forward or onward; make a straining effort: as, to reach out for an apple; to reach at or after gain.

Ful semely after hire mete she raughte. Chaucer, Gen. Prolog. to C. T., l. 136.

He slytte the shelde as fer as that he raught, and the kynge Ban sente hym a stroke with Corsehouse, his goode swerde. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), II. 344.

One may reach deep enough, and yet Find little. Shak., T. of A., III. 4. 15.

Off the first that (without right or reason) Attempt Rebellion and do practice Treason, And so at length are iustly tumbled down Beneath the foot, that raught about the Crown. Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, l. 1.

Why was I not contented? Wherefore reach At things which, but for thee, O Latinian! Had been my dreary death? Keats, Endymion, III.

4. To attain; arrive; get, as to a point, destination, or aim.

Festus, . . . whose ears were unacquainted with such matter, heard him [the apostle Paul], but could not reach unto that whereof he spake. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, III. 8.

The wind being very great at S. W., he could reach no farther than Cape Ann harbour that night. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 115.

5†. To turn; start forth.

Up he sterte, and on his weye he raughte, Till she agayn hym by the lappe caughte. Chaucer, Troilus, II. 447.

6. Naut., to sail with the wind free.

reach¹ (rēch), n. [*< reach*¹, v.] 1. A continuous stretch or course; an uninterrupted line of extension or continuity: as, a reach of level ground; an inland reach of the sea; a reach of a river (a straight course between bends); a reach of a canal (the part between locks, having a uniform level).

And, on the left hand, hell With long reach interposed. Milton, P. L., x. 322.
The silver Pheas's glittering rills they lost, And skimm'd along by Ellis' sacred coast, Then cautious through the rocky reaches wind, And, turning sudden, shun the death designed. Pope, Odyssey, xv.

We walk'd Beside the river's wooded reach. Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxi.

2. Limit or scope of stretch or extension; power of reaching by the outstretched hand or any other agency; the act of or capacity for reaching: as, the reach of the arm; to be within one's reach, or within the reach of the law.

All others have a dependent being, and within the reach of destruction. Sir T. Browne, Urn-burial, v.

Out of the reach of danger, he [Junius] has been bold; out of the reach of shame, he has been confident. Johnson, Thoughts on late Trans. in the Falkland Islands.

Poor the reach, The undisguised extent, of mortal sway! Wordsworth, Canute and Alfred, on the Sea-Shore.

The study of spectra has opened a new world of research, and added some reach to our physics and chemistry as the telescope brought to vision.

C. A. Young, The Sun, p. 67.

Most of the villages of Egypt are situated upon eminences of rubbish, which rise a few feet above the reach of the inundation. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 24.

3. Effective extent or scope; range of capacity or ability; power of accomplishment; grasp; penetration; comprehension.

Men more audacious and precipitant then of solid and deep reach. Milton, Reformation in Eng., II.

Be sure yourself and your own reach to know, How far your genius, taste, and learning go. Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 153.

Groves that inspire the Nightingale to trill And modulate, with subtle reach of skill Elsewhere unmatched, her ever-varying lay. Wordsworth, Sonnets, III. 6.

His [Wordsworth's] mind had not that reach and elemental movement of Milton's.

Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 241.

4. A reaching out for something; forecast in aim or purpose; a scheme of effort for some end.

I have brains That beat above your reaches. Fletcher, Mad Lover, I. 1.

The Duke of Parma had particular reaches and ends of his own underhand to cross the design. Bacon.

Others Think heaven a world too high for our low reaches. Chapman, Caesar and Pompey, IV. 3.

5. The pole connecting the rear axle to the bolster of a wagon or other vehicle; a coupling-pole. See cut under hound, 7.—6. Naut., the distance sailed between tacks: same as board, 13 (c).—7. An extended point of land; a promontory. [Local, U. S.]—Head reach, the distance to windward traversed by a vessel while tacking. reach² (rēch), v. A variant of *retch*². [Prov. Eng.] reachable (rē'cha-bl), a. [*< reach*¹ + -able.] Capable of being reached; within reach.

reacher (rē'chēr), n. 1. One who or that which reaches, or is capable of or serves for reaching.

Hold in your rapier; for, though I have not a long reacher, I have a short hilt.

Greene and Lodge, Looking Glass for Lond. and Eng.

He . . . spoke to Jennings, the reacher of the records, that he should let him have any record. Life of A. Wood, p. 205.

2†. An exaggeration; a "stretcher." [Slang.]

I can hardly believe that reacher, which another writeth of him, that "with the palms of his hands he could touch his knees, though he stood upright." Fuller, Worthies, Monmouthshire, II. 435.

reaching-post (rē'ching-pōst), n. In rope-making, a post fixed in the ground at the lower end of a rope-walk.

reachless (rēch'les), a. [*< reach*¹ + -less.] Beyond reach; unattainable; lofty.

To raise her silent and inglorious name Unto a reachless pitch of praises light. Bp. Hall, A Defence to Envy.

reach-me-down (rēch'mē-doun'), a. [*< reach*¹, v., + me, indirect object, + *down*¹, adv. Cf. pick-me-up.] Ready-made. [Colloq., Eng.]

You know in the Palais Royal they hang out the most splendid reach-me-down dressing gowns, waistcoats, and so forth. Thackeray, Philip, xiv.

reacquit (rē-ā-kwīt'), v. t. [< re- + acquite.] To pay back; give a return to or for; requite.

You shall assuredly find the gentleman very honest and thankful, and me ready to re-acquite your courtesy and favour to him so shewn, in that I possibly may. G. Harvey, Four Letters, I.

react (rē-akt'), v. [< re- + act, v. Cf. F. réagir, react.] I. trans. To act or perform anew; re-enact: as, to react a play.

II. intrans. 1. To exert, as a thing acted upon, an opposite action upon the agent.

If fire doth heate water, the water reacteth againe . . . upon the fire and cooleth it. Sir K. Digby, Treatise of Bodies (1644), xvi.

Great minds do indeed re-act on the society which has made them what they are; but they only pay with interest what they have received. Macaulay, Dryden.

Every opinion reacts on him who utters it. It is a thread-ball thrown at a mark, but the other end remains in the thrower's bag. Emerson, Compensation.

2. To act, after being acted upon, in a manner directly opposed to the first action, and in increased measure. Thus, when the body has been chilled by a bath, it is said to react in becoming warmer than before; and, in like manner, when misfortune stimulates the mind to greater efforts, the mind is said to react.

3. To act mutually or reciprocally upon each other, as two or more chemical agents.

reaction (rē-ak'shon), n. [= F. réaction = Sp. reacción = Pg. reacção = It. reazione; as re- + action.] 1. Any action in resistance or response to the influence of another action or power; reflexive action or operation; an opposed impulse or impression.

Of reaction in local motion, that each agent must suffer in acting and act in suffering.

Sir K. Digby, Treatise of Bodies (1644), xvi. Sense being nothing else, as some conceit, but motion, or rather re-action of a body pressed upon by another body. Dr. H. More, Immortal. of Soul (1662), l. 12.

Attack is the re-action; I never think I have hit hard, unless it re-bounds. Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1775.

Every trespass produces a reaction, partly general and partly special—a reaction which is extreme in proportion as the trespass is great. H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 484.

2. In dynamics, a force called into being along with another force, being equal and opposite to it. All forces exist in pairs; and it is a fundamental law (Newton's third law of motion) in mechanics that "action and reaction are always equal and contrary," or that the mutual actions of two bodies are always equal and exerted in opposite directions. This law was announced, in the form that the quantity of motion is preserved in all percussion, simultaneously in 1689 by Christian Huygens, John Wallis, and Sir Christopher Wren, but was experimentally proved by Wallis only.

3. Action contrary to a previous influence, generally greater than the first effect; in politics, a tendency to revert from a more to a less advanced policy, or the contrary.

The violent reaction which had laid the Whig party prostrate was followed by a still more violent reaction in the opposite direction. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., II.

4. In chem., the mutual or reciprocal action of chemical agents upon each other.—Achilles tendon reaction, the contraction of the calf-muscles evoked by tapping the Achilles tendon.—Amphigenous, amphotheric, etc., reaction. See the adjectives.—Color-reaction, in chem., a reaction which causes a characteristic development or change of color: used in testing.—Diazo-reaction. Same as Ehrlich's reaction.—Ehrlich's reaction, a reaction in the urine of typhoid and other patients in which it strikes a deep dark red on being treated with a mixture containing sodium nitrite, sulphuric acid, and hydrochloric acid, and alkalinized with ammonia. Also called Ehrlich's test, and diazo-reaction.—Law of action and reaction. See action.—Paradoxical reaction. See paradoxical.—Reaction of degeneration, a modification of the normal reaction of nerve and muscle to electric stimuli, observable in cases where the lesion lies in the motor nerve or its immediate central or peripheral terminations. The complete form presents (a) total loss of irritability of the nerve below the lesion; (b) on direct stimulation of the muscle, (1) loss of irritability for very brief currents, such as induction-shocks; (2) retention and even increase of irritability for making and breaking of currents of longer duration (this galvanic irritability also becomes lost in the terminal stages of the severest forms); (3) increase of irritability for making currents at the anode as compared with the cathode, so that the anode closing contraction may exceed the cathode closing contraction; (4) a sluggishness of contraction and relaxation.

reactionary (rē-ak'shon-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. réactionnaire; as reaction + -ary.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to reaction in general; consisting of or characterized by reflex or reciprocal action; reactive.

The reactionary excitement that gave her a proud self-mastery had not subsided.

George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, vi. 10.

Specifically—2. Of or pertaining to political reaction; favoring reaction: as, reactionary principles or movements.

The poverty and suffering of millions of the working classes came in aid of the reactionary party and the more egotistical line of policy.

W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 1st ser., p. 33.

II. n.; pl. reactionaries (-riz). A promoter of reaction; specifically, one who attempts to check, undo, or reverse political action.

The reactionaries and conservatives of Sweden—and there are many of them in this old country—are afraid that free Norway will lead Sweden into the path of reforms.

Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 804.

reactionist (rē-ak'shon-ist), n. [< reaction + -ist.] A favorer of reaction; an advocate of old methods or principles; a reactionary.

Those who are not afraid of the nickname of reactionists will be slow to condemn her [Austria] for the maintenance of a principle on which she has grown into power.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 239.

reaction-period (rē-ak'shon-pē-ri-ōd), n. Same as reaction-time.

reaction-time (rē-ak'shon-tim), n. The time between the application of a stimulus and some reaction, as when a signal is rendered on the perception of some sensation. The reduced reaction-time is the part of this which is consumed in perception and willing, as distinct from what is consumed in transmission and in the period of muscular latency.

reaction-wheel (rē-ak'shon-hwēl), n. See turbine.

reactive (rē-ak'tiv), a. [= F. réactif; as re- + act + -ive.] Pertaining to or causing reaction; acting reflexively or reciprocally; resulting from reflex action.

Ye fish, assume a voice, with praises fill The hollow rock and loud reactive hill.

Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, VII. Knowledge of Sanscrit . . . will be kept alive by the reactive influence of Germany and England.

Maine, Village Communities, p. 25.

This equilibration between new outer forces and reactive inner forces, which is thus directly produced in individuals.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 296.

reactively (rē-ak'tiv-ly), adv. By reaction.

reactiveness (rē-ak'tiv-nes), n. The quality of being reactive.

reactivity (rē-ak'tiv-i-ti), n. [< reactive + -ity.] The state of being reactive; the process or course of reaction, as from a diseased condition.

The occurrence of colour, therefore, is more frequently than not concomitant with a high degree of reactivity. Nature, XXXVII. 503.

read¹ (rēd), v.; pret. and pp. read (rēd), ppr. reading. [Early mod. E. also reed, reede, rede; <

Some compare Skt. √ rādhi, be successful, Russ. radū, glad, happy, ready, Lith. rodas, willing, etc. Hence *read*¹, n., *riddle*¹, aread, etc. The verb read in the already obsolete sense 'counsel, advise,' was much affected by Spenser, and in the early modern and ME. spelling rede which he used has likewise been much affected by his archaizing imitators; but there is no historical ground for a difference in spelling. The pret. read (red) should be written red, as it was formerly; it is exactly parallel with led, pret. of *lead*¹, and with let, pret. of *let*¹ (inf. formerly lete, with long vowel).] I. trans. 1†. To counsel; advise; recommend.

And she thus brenneth bothe in love and drede,
So that she nyste what was best to rede.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 679.

And seththe he radde religioun the rule for to holde—
"Leste the kyng and his counsell ȝor comen apere,

Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 499.

Specifically—(a) One who reads for examination or criticism: an examiner of that which is offered or proposed for publication: as, an editorial or a publisher's reader. (b) One who is employed to read for correction for the press; a proof-reader. (c) One who recites before an audience anything written: as, an elocutionary reader. Particularly—(d) One whose office it is to read before an audience; an officer appointed to read for a particular purpose: a lector; a lecturer. (1) In the early church, the Greek Church, the Roman Catholic Church, and some other churches, a member of one of the minor clerical orders, appointed to read Scripture lessons in the church. The order of reader existed as early as the second century. At an early date it was not unusual to admit young boys, even of five or six, to the office of reader, but by the sixth century the age of eighteen was required by law. In the Roman Catholic Church this order is little more than one of the steps to the priesthood. The reader (lector) ranks above a door-keeper and below an exorcist, and the form of ordination is the delivery to him of the book from which he is to read. In the Greek Church the reader (anagnost) ranks below a subdeacon, and it is his office, as it was in the early church, to read the Epistle, the deacon reading the Gospel. In the Church of England the order fell into abeyance after the Reformation, but lay readers were frequently licensed, especially in churches or chapels without a clergyman. They could not minister the sacraments and other rites of the church, except the burial of the dead and the churching of women, nor pronounce the absolution and benediction. Of late years, however, bishops have regularly admitted candidates to the office of reader by delivery of a copy of the New Testament. In the American Episcopal Church lay readers conduct services in vacant churches or under a rector by his request with license from the bishop for a definite period (a year or less). They cannot give absolution or benediction, administer sacraments, nor use the occasional offices of the church except those for the burial of the dead and visitation of the sick and prisoners, nor deliver sermons of their own composition. (2) One who reads the law in a Jewish synagogue. (3) In the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, the English Inns of Court, etc., a lecturer, or, where there are two grades of lecturers, a lecturer of the higher grade, the others being called sub-lectors or lecturers.

4. A reading-book for schools; a book containing exercises in reading.—Gentle reader, lay reader, etc. See the adjectives.

readership (rē'dēr-ship), n. [< reader + -ship.] The office of reader. See reader, 3 (d) (3).

3. Just now; at once.

A tydinge for to here . . .

That shal nat now be redely,

For it no nede is redely.

Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 2137.

=Syn. See ready.

readiness (red'i-nes), n. [Early mod. E. readiness, redynes; < ME. redinesse, redynesse; < ready + -ness.] 1. The condition of being ready; the state of being adapted or in condition for immediate use or action; present preparedness or fitness; ready availability or qualification.

At the Archynale there be closed within, always in a redynesse to set forth what they will.

Sir R. Gylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 7.

If it [death] be not now, yet it will come: the readiness is all.

Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 234.

Probed many hearts, beginning with his own,

And now was far in readiness for God.

Browning, Ring and Book, l. 16.

2. Ready action or movement; instant facility or aptitude; promptness; quickness: as, readiness of thought or of speech; readiness in off-hand drawing.

I thought, by your readiness in the office, you had continued in it some time.

Shak., M. for M., ii. 1. 275.

Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 274.

=Syn. 2. Readiness, Facility, Expertness, Knack, promptitude, aptness, preparation, preparedness, inclination. The first four words agree in meaning that the person can do a thing with ease and quickness. Readiness emphasizes promptitude: as, readiness in repartee. Facility by derivation emphasizes ease, whether partly natural or wholly acquired. (See ease, n.) Expertness is facility acquired: as, expertness with the pen, at figures, in working a sewing-machine; it is primarily physical, and especially manual, but also mental. Knack is a familiar word, applying to facility or expertness viewed as a happy and rather surprising possession of skill or faculty.

reading (rē'ding), n. [< ME. redynge, ræding, reading, < AS. ræding, reading, a reading, a passage or lesson, also rule, government; verbal n. of rædan, counsel, rule, read: see read¹.] 1. The act of interpreting; interpretation; exposition, as of a riddle or dream; interpretation of signs, marks, or the like; a rendering or discovery of what is signified by the state or marking of an instrument, by arbitrary signs of any kind, or by the existing condition or action of anything: as, the readings of a steam-indicator; a correct reading of the sky (as to weather); or of a person's countenance or proceedings.

For instance, if the freezing-point is lowered, we must subtract the amount of fall from each reading.

J. Troubridge, New Physics, p. 187.

Take the readings of the two pegs [in adjusting a field level], which will give their true difference of level.

Sci. Amer. Supp., p. 8905.

2. The particular interpretation given to a composition of any kind, an event or a series of events, etc.; also, a rendering in speech, act, or performance; delineation; representation.

You charm me, Mortimer, with your reading of my weaknesses. By-the-by, that very word Reading, in its critical use, always charms me. An actress's reading of a chamber-maid, a dancer's reading of a hornpipe, a singer's reading of a song, a marine-painter's reading of the sea, the kettle-drum's reading of an instrumental passage, are phrases ever youthful and delightful.

Dickens, Our Mutual Friend, iii. 10.

For Englishmen in their own tongue to have from such a man [Von Ranke] a reading of the most critical period of English history would be a boon of incalculable value.

Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 58.

His reading of Bach's Italian Concerto was a scramble, so far as the first and last movements were concerned.

The Academy, June 29, 1889, p. 456.

3. The act of perusing that which is written or printed; perusal.

You write with ease to show your breeding,

But easy writing's curst hard reading.

Sheridan, Clio's Protest.

4. The utterance or recital of recorded words, either from the record (as a printed page) or from memory; specifically, a public lecture or lecture: as, to give readings from the poets, or upon law or philosophy. See read¹, v. i., 6. The Jews had their weekly readings of the law.

Hooker.

The readings [in the Inns of Court] were from the very first deemed of vital importance, and were delivered in the halls with much ceremony.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 88.

5. That which is read or to be read; any written or printed medium of thought or intelligence; recorded matter or material.

It is in newspapers that we must look for the main reading of this generation.

De Quincy, Style, l.

Remembering his early love of poetry and fiction, she unlocked a bookcase, and took down several books that had been excellent reading in their day.

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, ix.

6. The indication of a graduated instrument: as, the reading of a barometer.—7. Textual structure or construction; a form, expression, or collocation in a writing, or in a particular copy or impression of it; a version: as, the various readings of a passage in Shakspeare; the reading seems to be corrupt.

When you meet with several Readings of the Text, take heed you admit nothing against the Tenets of your Church.

Selden, Table-Talk, p. 22.

Disjunctive reading. See disjunctive.—Penny reading, an amateur entertainment consisting of readings, recitations, music, etc., admission to which is only one penny: common in the British Islands, where such entertainments seem to have been introduced about 1830.—Reading sgrotat. See sgrotat.—Reading notice. See notice.

reading (rē'ding), p. a. Inclined to read; having a taste for reading; of a studious disposition: as, a reading community.—Reading man. See man.

Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

reading-book (rē'ding-buk), n. [*< ME. ræding-bok, < AS. ræding-bōc, reading-book, lectionary, < ræding, reading, + bōc, book.] 1. A lectionary.—2. A book containing selections to be used as exercises in reading.

reading-boy (rē'ding-boi), n. In printing, a boy employed to read copy to a proof-reader; a reader's assistant: in the United States called copy-holder.

reading-desk (rē'ding-desk), n. A desk adapted for use in reading; specifically, a high desk for holding a book or manuscript to be read by a person while standing; in a church, same as lectern, 1.

He feared he should acquaint himself badly in St. Ewold's reading-desk.

Trollope, Barchester Towers, xxiii.

reading-glass (rē'ding-glās), n. A magnifying lens set in a frame with a handle, for use in reading fine print, or for persons with defective vision.

reading-lamp (rē'ding-lamp), n. A lamp especially adapted for use in reading; specifically, a form of lamp for use in public reading or speaking, arranged so that its light is concentrated upon the reading-desk.

reading-pew (rē'ding-pū), n. In English churches, a pew from which to read part of the service; especially, after the Reformation, an inclosure in the body of a church, with a door, seat, and desk or desks, used instead of the older and later form of reading-desk or stalls.

reading-room (rē'ding-rōm), n. 1. An apartment appropriated to reading; a room furnished with newspapers, periodicals, etc., to which persons resort for reading.—2. A room or closet set apart for the use of professional proof-readers.

reading-stand (rē'ding-stand), n. A stand to support a book. (a) Same as reading-table. (b) Same as reading-desk.

reading-table (rē'ding-tā'bl), n. A table providing support for a heavy book or books, when in use, and frequently space for other books needed for consultation, and the like. There are many patterns, some having a revolving top.

readjourn (rē-ā-jēr'n'), v. t. and i. [< F. réajourner, readjourn; as re- + adjourn. Cf. re-journ.] To adjourn again.

Parliament assembling again . . . was then re-adjourned by the king's special command till Tuesday next.

Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie, p. 443.

readjournalment (rē-ā-jēr'n-ment), n. [< F. réajournement, readjournalment; as readjourn + -ment.] A succeeding adjournment; adjournment anew.

readjust (rē-ā-just'), v. t. [< re- + adjust.] 1. To settle again; put in order again, as what had been decomposed.

The beau sheathed his hanger, and readjusted his hair.
Fielding.

2. To adjust in a new way; make a different adjustment, arrangement, or settlement of.

The problem these gentlemen had to solve was to readjust the proportion between their wants and their income.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, li. 4.

My scheme, your better knowledge broke,
Presently readjusts itself, the small Proportioned largelier, parts and whole named new.
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 221.

readjuster (rē-a-jus'tēr), n. [< readjust + -er.] 1. One who readjusts, or takes part in a readjustment of something.—2. [cap.] Specifically, a member of a party in Virginia, formed about 1878, under the leadership of General William Mahone, and originally composed principally of Democrats, for the forcible readjustment of the debt on terms dictated by the State without the consent of the bondholders. The exceptional losses of the State in the civil war made the large debt previously contracted very burdensome; and the amount of its liability was in dispute with the State of West Virginia, which had been set off from Virginia without a decision of this question. The Readjusters elected the State government in 1879, and also United States senators for the terms 1881-7 and 1883-9, in opposition to the Conservative Democrats, or Funders; but the party failed to effect a permanent settlement of the debt, and was merged in the Republican party about 1882.

Further news from Virginia indicates that the Repudiators, or Readjusters, as they call themselves, have elected a majority of the General Assembly.

The Nation, Nov. 13, 1879, p. 317.

readjustment (rē-a-jus'tment), n. [< readjust + -ment.] 1. The act of readjusting, or the state of being readjusted.—2. Specifically, in U. S. politics, the political schemes of the Readjusters.

readmission (rē-ad-mish'on), n. [< F. réadmission = Sp. readmisión = Pg. readmissão; as re + admission.] The act of admitting again; the state of being readmitted; renewed admission.

In an exhausted receiver, animals that seem as they were dead revive upon the readmission of fresh air. Arbutnot.

readmit (rē-ad-mit'), v. t. [= F. réadmettre = Sp. readmitir = Pg. readmittir = It. riammettere, readmit; as re + admit.] To admit again.

Whose ear is ever open, and his eye
Gracious to re-admit the suppliant.

Milton, S. A., l. 1178.

readmittance (rē-ad-mit'ans), n. [< re + admittance.] Permission to enter again; readmission.

Humbly petitioning a readmittance into his college.

T. Warton, Sir T. Pope, p. 24. (Latham.)

readvance (rē-ad-vāns'), v. i. [< re + advance, v.] To advance again or afresh.

Which if they miss, they yet should readvance
To former height.

B. Jonson, Epigrams, xxxv., To Sir H. Goodyere.

readvertency (rē-ad-vér'ten-si), n. [< re + advertency.] The act of advertent to or reviewing again. [Rare.]

Memory he does not make to be a recovery of ideas that were lost, but a re-advertency or reapplication of mind to ideas that were actually there, though not attended to.

Norris, Reflections on Locke, p. 9.

ready (red'i), a. and n. [< ME. redy, redi, rædi, rædig, i-redi, ready, prepared, prompt, near, < AS. ræde (rare and uncertain), usually geræde, ready, swift, prompt, easy, plain (suffix -e becoming -i by confusion with the common adj. suffix ME. -i, -y, > E. -y); = OFries. rede, red = D. ree = MLG. rēde, reide, rēt, reit, LG. rede, reed = OHG. bi-reiti, MHG. bereite, be-reit, G. be-reit, ready, prepared, = Icel. g-reithr ("ga-reithr"), ready (whence ult. E. graith, grade), = OSw. reda, Sw. be-red = Dan. rede, be-redt, ready; perhaps = Goth. garaidis, set, appointed; cf. raidjan, appoint, ga-raidjan, enjoin, command, ga-raideins, an ordinance, rule, authority. In all thy best attire. B. Jonson, Volpone, ii. 8.

A man may make him redy in such clothes

Without a candle.

Middleton (and others), The Widow, iii. 3.

=Syn. Ready. Easy; disposed, apt, expert, handy, skillful, clever, smart; expeditious, unhesitating. So many of the meanings of ready convey the idea of a movement of mind, and especially a consent of the will, that there is a tendency to use other words where disposition is not included. Hence it is better to say this may readily be seen, than this may redily be seen. See quotation from Locke under readily. Easy of approach; easy to be done; redy to hear. All the senses of redy, active or passive, grow out of that of being prepared.

II. n. 1. Ready money; cash: usually with the definite article. [Slang.]

Lord Strutt was not flush in redy, either to go to law, or clear old debts. Arbutnot, Hist. John Bull. (Latham.)

2. The condition of being ready. [Colloq.]

3. The position of a soldier's weapon following the command "Make ready!" or "Ready!" [Colloq.]

[The hunter] beats patiently and noiselessly from the leeward . . . with his rifle at the redy.

T. Roswell, Hunting Trips, p. 119.

A good ready, a state of being fully ready or prepared; a good condition of readiness. [Colloq.] ready (red'i), v. t.; pret. and pp. readied, ppr. readying. [< ME. redien, redyen (= D. redden, prepare, dress, = MLG. reden, reiden = MHG. reiten, reiden; cf. ME. beredien = G. be-reiten = Sw. be-reda = Dan. be-rede, prepare, get ready, etc.); < ready, a.] 1. To make ready; put into proper condition or order; dispose; arrange; prepare. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Tharefore what-so-euer thou bee that redies the for to lufe Gode, . . . haue in mynde besely for to halde the name of Ihesu in thi mynde.

Hampden, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 3.

And, having readied all these costly things,
In a poore pedlers trusse he packs his wares.

Heywood, Troia Britannica (1600). (Nares.)

2†. To direct.

For, for the gretnesse of the Erthe and of the See, men may go be a 1000 and a 1000 toward the parties that he can crowde redye him peritely toward the parties that he can fro, but zif it were be aventure and happ, or be the grace of God.

Manderly, Travels, p. 155.

ready-made (red'i-mād), a. 1. Previously made and now ready for use; furnished or obtained in a formed state; specifically, in trade, made ready for chance sale, and not made to order for a particular person: as, ready-made clothing; ready-made opinions or excuses.

When he hears

The tale of horror, to some ready-made face
Of hypocritical assent he turns.

Shelley, Queen Mab, iii.

The provision-man had honestly the effect of having got for the day only into the black coat which he had bought ready-made for his first wife's funeral.

Houelle, Annie Kilburn, xxii.

2. Pertaining to articles prepared beforehand: as, the ready-made department of a tailor's or shoemaker's business. [Trade use.] ready-man (red'i-man), n. One of the men sent aloft in a man-of-war to prepare for evolutions with spars or sails.

ready-pole (red'i-pōl), n. A bar fixed across a chimney to support the pot-hook. It is now commonly of iron, but was formerly made of wood. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.] ready-reckoner (red'i-ek'nēr), n. A book of tabulated calculations, giving the value of any number of things from the lowest monetary unit upward, as also the interest on any sum of money for any period from a day upward, etc.; a book of tables to facilitate calculations.

I could almost think from the preface (but such deductions are very deceptive) that the earliest of the books which are now called ready reckoners, meaning those which have totals at given prices ready cast up, was the following: London 1693. Wm. Leybourn, Panarithmologia; being a mirror for merchants, a briefvate for bankers, a treasure for tradesmen, a mate for mechanics, and a sure guide for purchasers, sellers, or mortgagers of land, leases, annuities, rents, pensions, etc., in present possession or reversion, and a constant concomitant fitted for all men's occasions.

De Morgan.

The Clerk in Eastcheap cannot spend the day in verifying his Ready-Reckoner; he must take it as verified, true and indisputable.

Carlyle.

reaf, n. [Usually in Sc. spelling reaf, reif; < ME. ref, ræf, reaf, reze, < AS. ræf, spoil, plunder: see reave.] Spoil; plunder; robbery.

Meaning to live by reaf of other men's goods, wherein they have no maner of propertie.

Holinshed, Chron. (Nares.)

The man that wons yon foreste intill,

He lives by reaf and felonie!

Song of the Outlaw Murray (Child's Ballads, VI. 32).

reaffirm (rē-a-fēr'm'), v. t. [= F. réaffirmer; as re + affirm.] To affirm again.

I close with re-affirming the truth that I have aimed to impress.

Channing, Perfect Life, p. 25.

reaffirmance (rē-a-fēr'mans), n. [< reaffirm + -ance.] Renewed affirmation; reaffirmation.

A reaffirmance after such revocation. Ayliffe, Parergon.

reaffirmation (rē-af-ēr-mā'shon), n. [< reaffirm + -ation.] Renewed affirmation; a repeated affirmation.

The great movement of thought which characterises the nineteenth century is a movement through negation to reaffirmation, through destruction to reconstruction.

E. Caird, Hegel, p. 1.

reafforest (rē-a-for'est), v. t. [< re + afforest.] To convert anew into a forest; renew the forest-growth of; reforest.

The Legislature was obliged to take steps to reafforest considerable tracts.

The American, VII. 229.

reafforestation (rē-a-for-es-tā'shon), n. [< reafforest + -ation.] A second afforestation; promotion of renewed forest-growth.

Even partial reafforestation in Brescia.

The Century, XXXI. 536.

reagency (rē-ā-jen-si), n. [< re- + agency.] Action of or as of a reagent; reflex agency or activity; counter-agency; reaction.

Still, the mind, when acted on, is only excited to self-agency, to manifest what it is in itself, in the way of reagency. H. B. Smith, Christian Theology, p. 173.

reagent (rē-ā-jent), n. [< re- + agent. Cf. re-act.] 1. One who or that which exerts reflex action or influence; an agency that produces reciprocal effects; a cause or source of counter-results.

These tools have some questionable properties. They are reagents. Machinery is aggressive. The weaver becomes a web, the machinist a machine.

Emerson, Works and Days.

2. In chem., a substance used to effect chemical change in another substance for the purpose of identifying its component parts or of ascertaining its percentage composition. Thus, the infusion of galls is a reagent which indicates iron in solution by a dark-purple precipitate. Barium chloride is a reagent which separates sulphuric acid from a solution in the insoluble form of barium sulphate which can be weighed, and from the weight of which the actual amount of sulphuric acid can readily be deduced.

3. Anything used for the treatment of a substance under investigation to render its nature or condition more evident. Ordinarily the object is to see what changes are thus produced, but the word is used more loosely, as in hardening reagents. — Nessler's reagent, a reagent used to detect and determine minute quantities of ammonia, particularly in water. It consists of a strongly alkaline solution of potassium iodide and mercuric chloride. A few drops added to a few fluidounces of water will cause a slight reddish-yellow tinge if one part of ammonia is present in twenty million parts of water.

reagravation (rē-ag-rā-vā'shon), n. [< reagravate + -ion.] In Rom. Cath. eccles. law, the last monitory, published after three admonitions and before the excommunication.

reagree (rē-a-grē'), v. [< re- + agree.] I. intrans. To agree again; become reconciled.

II. trans. To cause to agree again; reconcile.

And fain to see that glorious holiday
Of union which this discord reaggred.

Daniel, Civil Wars, vii. 111.

reakt, v. i. An obsolete spelling of *reck*¹.

reaket, n. [Perhaps an erroneous form for wrack or wreck, or an error for reake, q. v.: see wrack, wreck.] A kind of plant. [The word occurs only in the passage quoted, where it is used as a translation of Latin ulva, seaweed.]

The bore is yll in Laurente soyle,
That feedes on reakes and reedes;
Sontymes frome goodly pleasant vine
A sower teudrell speedes.

Drant, tr. of Horace's Satires, ii. 4.

reakst. See to play rex, under rex.

reaks-player, n. One who plays reaks (rex). Cotgrave.

real¹ (rē'al), a. and n. [*< ME. real, reall, < OF. real, reel, F. réel = Pr. Sp. Pg. real = It. reale, < ML. realis, belonging to the thing itself (in the disputes of the Nominalists and Realists), < L. res, a thing; perhaps allied to Skt. √ rā, give. Hence realize, realization, realism, realist, reality, etc.; also, from L. res, E. rebus, republic, republican, etc.] I. a. 1. Actual; genuine; true; authentic; not imaginary, artificial, counterfeit, or factitious: as, real lace.*

I waked, and found
Before mine eyes all real, as the dream Had lively shadow'd. Milton, P. L., viii. 310.

Homer tells us that the blood of the gods is not real blood, but only something like it.

Addison, Spectator, No. 275.

The hatred of unreality was uppermost with Carlyle; the love of what is real with Emerson.

O. W. Holmes, Emerson, iv.

It is probable that the American inventor of the first anæsthetic has done more for the real happiness of mankind than all the moral philosophers from Socrates to Mill.

Lecky, Europ. Morals, I. 91.

The Teutonic words are all of them real words, words which we are always wanting.

E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 163.

2. Of genuine character; not pretended or pretending; unassumed or unassuming.

Phoebe's presence made a home about her. . . . She was real!

Hawthorne, Seven Gables, ix.

Real kings hide away their crowns in their wardrobes, and affect a plain and poor exterior.

Emerson, Works and Days.

3. Specifically, in philos., existing in or pertaining to things, and not words or thought merely; being independent of any person's thought about the subject; possessing characters independently of the attribution of them by any individual mind or any number of minds; not resulting from the mind's action: opposed to imaginary or intentional. Real differs from actual, inasmuch as what is only in word or in posse, in so far as it has a power of developing into a definite actuality, is real, and independent of what we may think about it. Real objects are either external to the mind, when they are independent altogether of our thought, or they are internal, when they depend upon thought, but not upon thought about them.

The term real (realis), though always importing the existent, is used in various significations and oppositions. . . . 1. As denoting existence, in contrast to the nomenclature of existence—the thing as contradistinguished from its name. Thus we have definitions and divisions real, and definitions and divisions nominal or verbal. 2. As expressing the existent as opposed to the non-existent—a something in contrast to a nothing. In this sense the diminutions of existence, to which reality in the following significations is counterposed, are all real. 3. As denoting material or external, in contrast to mental, spiritual, or internal, existence. This meaning is improper. . . . 4. As synonymous with actual; and this (a) as opposed to potential, (b) as opposed to possible existence. 5. As denoting absolute or irrelative, in opposition to phenomenal or relative, existence; in other words, as denoting things in themselves and out of relation to all else, in contrast to things in relation to, and as known by, intelligences, like men, who know only under the conditions of plurality and difference. In this sense, which is rarely employed and may be neglected, the real is only another term for the unconditioned or absolute—rō ōntos ōn. 6. As indicating existence considered as a subsistence in nature (ens extra animam, ens nature), it stands counter to an existence considered as a representation in thought. In this sense, reale, in the language of the older philosophy (Scholastic, Cartesian, Gassendian), as applied to esse or ens, is opposed to intentionale, notionale, conceptibile, imaginarium, rationis, cognitionis, in anima, in intellectu, prout cognitum, ideale, etc.; and corresponds with a parte rei as opposed to a parte intellectus, with subjectivum as opposed to objectivum, with proprium, principiale, fundamentale as opposed to vicarium, with materiale as opposed to formale, and with formale in seipso and entitativum as opposed to representativum, etc. Under this head, in the vacillating language of our more recent philosophy, real approximates to, but is hardly convertible with, objective, in contrast to subjective in the signification there prevalent. 7. In close connection with the sixth meaning, real, in the last place, denotes an identity or difference founded on the conditions of the existence of a thing in itself, in contrast to an identity or difference founded only on the relation or point of view in which the thing may be regarded by the thinking subject. In this sense it is opposed to logical or rational, the terms being here employed in a peculiar meaning. Thus a thing which really (re) or in itself is one and indivisible may logically (ratione) by the mind be considered as diverse or plural. Sir W. Hamilton, Reid's Works, Note B, § 1, 5, foot-note.

Ideas of substances are real when they agree with the existence of things.

Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxx. 5.

We substitute a real for a dramatic person, and judge him accordingly.

Lamb, Artificial Comedy.

For the first time the ideal social compact was real.

Emerson, Hist. Discourse at Concord.

4†. Sincere; faithful; loyal.

Then the governor told them. If they were real, as they professed, he should expect their ready and free concurrence with him in all affairs tending to the public service.

Memoirs of Colonel Hutchinson (1643). (Nares.)

5†. Relating to things, not to persons; not personal.

Many are perfect in men's humours that are not greatly capable of the real part of business.

Bacon.

6. In law, pertaining to or having the quality of things fixed or immovable. See real estate, etc., below. — Chattel real. See chattel. — Covenant real. See covenant. — Real abstraction. See abstraction. — Real action in law. See action. — Real assets. See assets. 1. — Real attribute, an attribute known by ordinary observation, generalization, and abstraction, and signified by a term of first intention: opposed to a notional attribute, which is signified by a term of second intention. — Real burden, in Scots law, a burden in money imposed on the subject of a right, as on an estate, in the deed by which the right is constituted, and thus distinguished from a personal burden, which is imposed merely on the receiver of the right. — Real character. See character. — Real component of a force. See component. — Real composition. (a) The union of objects having existences distinct from one another. (b) In Eng. eccles. law, an agreement made between the owner of lands and the parson or vicar, with consent of the ordinary, that such lands shall be discharged from payment of tithes, in consequence of other land or recompense given to the parson in lieu and satisfaction thereof. Also called composition of tithes. — Real concordance. See concordance. 3. — Real contract. See contract. — Real convenience, the agreement of a thing with itself. — Real definition, the definition of a thing—that is to say, of a species—by stating the components of its essence, or its place in natural classification. For the nominalists there could be no real definition, in the proper sense; hence, finding the definitions so called useful, they invented new definitions of the phrase. The real definition, for Leibnitz and Wolf, is the definition from which the possibility of the thing defined follows; for Kant, the definition which sets forth the possibility of the thing from its essential marks; for Mill, the definition of a name with an implied assumption of the existence of the thing. — Real degradation. See degradation. 1 (a). — Real distinction. (a) A distinction independent of any person's thought. (b) A distinction between real objects. The Scotists made subtle and elaborate definitions of this phrase. — Real diversity, division, ens, essence. See the nouns. — Real estate, in law: (a) Land, including with it whatever by nature or artificial annexation inheres with it as a part of it or as the means of its enjoyment, as minerals on or in the earth, standing or running water, growing trees, permanent buildings, and fences. In this sense the term refers to those physical objects of ownership which are immovable. (b) The ownership of or property in lands, etc.; any legal or equitable interest in lands, etc., except some minor, temporary, or inchoate rights which by the laws of most jurisdictions are deemed to be personal estate. "At common law, any estate in lands, etc., the date of the termination of which is not determined by or ascertainable from or at the date of the act which creates it, is real estate." (Robinson.) The line between the two classes of property is differently drawn in detail, according as the object of the law is to define what shall be taxed, or what shall go to the heir in case of intestacy as distinguished from what shall go through the administrator to the next of kin, or what shall come within the rules as to recording titles, or other purposes. — Real evidence, exchange, focus, fugue. See the nouns. — Real horse-power. Same as indicated horse-power (which see, under horse-power). — Real identity, the non-difference in reality of the extremes of a relation. — Real immunity (eccles.). See immunity. 3. — Real induction. See induction. 5. — Real laws, laws which directly and indirectly regulate property, and the rights of property, without changing the state of the person. — Real noon. Same as apparent noon (which see, under apparent). — Real partition, the mental separation of an object into parts which might be physically separated. — Real poinding, possibility, power, precision, presence, privilege. See the nouns. — Real property. Same as real estate. — Real quality, quantity, relation, representative, restriction, right. See the nouns. — Real question, a question where the attribute in regard to whose presence or absence inquiry is made is a real one. — Real science or philosophy. (a) A science or philosophy that is caused in the mind by a real thing, as physics, mathematics, metaphysics; a speculative science: opposed to practical science, which is caused in the mind by an idea of a thing to be brought about. (b) A science which has determinate reality for its object, and is conversant about existences other than forms of thought: in this sense, mathematics is not a real science. — Real services. Same as predial services (which see, under predial). — Real things, in law, things substantial and immovable, and the rights and profits annexed to or issuing out of them. — Real truth, the agreement of a judgment with its object: opposed to formal truth, which consists in the agreement of a reasoning with the principles of logic. — The real stuff, the genuine thing; that which is really what is represented or supposed: used especially of liquors. [Colloq.]

In this exhibition there are, of course, a certain number of persons who make believe that they are handling your round tokay—giving you the real imperial stuff, with the seal of genuine stamped on the cork.

Thackeray, Men and Pictures.

Real warrantice. See warrantice. — Syn. 1 and 2. Real, Actual, Positive, veritable, substantial, essential. Real applies to that which certainly exists, as opposed to that which is imaginary or feigned: as, real cause for alarm; a real occurrence; a real person, and not a ghost or a shadow; real sorrow. Actual applies to that which is brought to be or to pass, as opposed to that which is possible, probable, conceivable, approximate, estimated, or guessed at. Actual has a rather new but natural secondary sense of present. Positive, from the idea of a thing's being placed, fixed, or established, is opposed to uncertain or doubtful.

II. n. 1. That which is real; a real existence or object; a reality.

While it is true that correlatives imply each other, it is not true that all correlatives imply Reals. . . . The only meaning we can attach to Reality is that every Real has a corresponding feeling or group of feelings.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 19.

2†. A realist.

Scotists, Thomists, Reals, Nominals.

Barton, Anat. of Mel., p. 677.

The real. (a) Reality. (b) The real thing; the genuine article. [Colloq.]

A cynic might suggest as the motto of modern life this simple legend,—"Just as good as the real."

C. D. Warner, Backlog Studies, p. 4.

real¹ (rē'al), adv. [< real¹, a.] Really; truly; very; quite. [Colloq., Eng. and U. S.]

real^{2†} (rē'al), a. [*< ME. real, rial, rial, ryall, ryell, roial, royal, regal, < AF. reial, roial, OF. real, F. réel (used only in certain antique locutions), = Sp. Thus, real as a prince is in his hallo, Leve I this chauntecleer in his pasture.

Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 364.

Sir, I could wish that for the time of your vouchsafed abiding here, and more real entertainment, this my house stood on the Muses' hill.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, ii. 1.

Real, magnanimous, bountious.

Marston, Antonio and Mellida, I. ii. 1.

real³ (rā-ā'l'), n.; pl. reales (rā-ā'les). [Also rial; < Sp. real, a coin so called, lit. 'royal,' < L. regalis, regal, royal: see real², royal, regal¹.] A subsidiary silver coin and money of account in Spain and Spanish-American countries.

The current real of Spain (real de vellón) is one quarter of the peseta or franc, and worth about 5 United States cents. The Mexican real, corresponding to the old Spanish real de plata, is one eighth of a dollar (Mexican peso), and reckoned at 124 cents. The latter coin, both Spanish and Mexican, circulated largely in the United States down to about 1850, being called a Spanish or Mexican shilling in New York, a levy (see levy, 1) in the South, etc.

real¹ (ré'al), n. [Cuban, perhaps < Sp. real, royal: see real², real³. (Cf. OF. real, a kind of sturgeon.)] The big-eyed herring, or saury, Elops saurus. [Cuba.]

reales, n. Plural of real³.

realgar (ré'al'gär), n. [Also resalgar, < ME. resalgar, rysagar, rosalgar; = OF. realgal, reagal, riagal, realgal, risagal, F. realgar = Sp. realgar = Pg. realgar = It. risigallo (ML. risigallum), < Ar. rahj al-ghar, realgar, lit. 'powder of the mine,' mineral powder (so called because derived orig. from silver-mines): rahj, rehj, dust, powder; al, the; ghär (gär), cavern, mine. (Cf. Ar. rahj asfar, orpiment.)] Arsenic disulphid (As₂S₂), a combination of an equal number of sulphur and arsenic atoms; red sulphuret of arsenic, which is found native in transparent crystals, and also massive. Realgar differs from orpiment in that orpiment is composed of two equivalents of arsenic and three of sulphur, and has a yellow color. Realgar, also called red arsenic or ruby sulphur, is prepared artificially for use as a pigment and for making white fire, which is a mixture of 2 parts of ruby sulphur and 10 parts of niter.

realism (ré'al-izm), n. [= F. réalisme = Sp. Pg. It. realismo = G. realismus, < NL. realismus; as real¹ + -ism.] 1. The doctrine of the realist, in any of the senses of that word. See especially realist, n., 1.

(1) Extreme realism taught that universals were substances or things, existing independently of and separately from particulars. This was the essence of Plato's theory of ideas. . . . (2) Moderate realism also taught that universals were substances, but only as dependent upon and inseparable from individuals, in which each inhered: that is, each universal inhered in each of the particulars ranged under it. This was the theory of Aristotle, who held that the τὸν τι or individual thing was the first essence, while universals were only second essences, real in a less complete sense than first essences. He thus reversed the Platonic doctrine, which attributed the fullest reality to universals only, and a merely participative reality to individuals. . . . (3) Extreme nominalism taught that universals had no substantive or objective existence at all, but were merely empty names or words. [See nominalism.] (4) Moderate nominalism or conceptualism taught that universals have no substantive existence at all, but yet are more than mere names signifying nothing; and that they exist really, though only subjectively, as concepts in the mind, of which names are the vocal symbols. . . . (5) [The medieval schoolmen] Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus, and others fused all these views into one, and taught that universals exist in a threefold manner: universalia ante rem, as thoughts in the mind of God; universalia in re, as the essence [quiddity] of things, according to Aristotle; and universalia post rem, as concepts in the sense of moderate nominalism. This is to-day the orthodox philosophy of the Catholic Church, as opposed to the prevailing exclusive conceptualism of the Protestant world. . . . In contrast with all the views above presented, another and sixth view will now be stated. . . . (6) Relationism or scientific realism teaches that universals, or genera and species, are, first, objective relations of existence among objectively existing things; secondly, subjective concepts of these relations, determined in the mind by the relations themselves; and thirdly, names representative both of the relations and of the concepts, and applicable alike to both. This is the view logically implied in all scientific classifications of natural objects, regarded as objects of real scientific knowledge. F. E. Abbot, Scientific Theism, Int.

2. In literature and art, the representation of what is real in fact; the effort to exhibit the literal reality and unvarnished truth of things; treatment of characters, objects, scenes, events, circumstances, etc., according to actual truth or appearance, or to intrinsic probability, without selection or preference over the ugly of what is beautiful or admirable: opposed to idealism and romanticism. Compare naturalism.

I wish the reader particularly to observe, throughout all these works of Tintoret, the distinction of the imaginative verity from falsehood on the one hand, and from realism on the other. Ruskin, Modern Painters, III. ii. 3.

A far fuller measure of the ease and grace and life of the realism which Giotto had taught. D. G. Mitchell, Bound Together, ii.

By realism I mean simply the observation of things as they are, the familiarity with their aspect, physical and intellectual, and the consequent faculty of reproducing them with approximate fidelity. Contemporary Rev., L. 241.

Exact realism. See Herbartianism.—Hypothetic realism. See hypotheticism.—Natural realism, the doctrine that in sensation (if not also in volition) we have a direct consciousness of a real object other than ourselves, so that we are as sure of the existence of the outer world as we are of our own, or even of the presence of ideas.

In the act of sensible perception, I am conscious of two things;—of myself as the perceiving subject, and of an external reality . . . as the object perceived. . . . I am conscious of knowing each of them, not mediately, in something else, as represented, but immediately in itself, as existing. . . . Each is apprehended equally, and at once, in the same indivisible energy . . . and . . . each is apprehended out of, and in direct contrast to, the other. . . . The contents of the fact of perception, as given in consciousness, being thus established, what are the consequences to philosophy, according as the truth of its testimony is, or is not, admitted? On the former alternative, the veracity of consciousness, in the fact of perception, being unconditionally acknowledged, we have established at once, without hypothesis or demonstration, the reality of mind and the reality of matter; while no concession is yielded to the sceptic, through which he may subvert philosophy in manifesting its self-contradiction. The one legitimate doctrine, thus possible, may be called natural realism or natural dualism. . . . If the testimony of consciousness to our knowledge of an external world existing be rejected with the idealist, but with the realist the existence of that world be affirmed, we have a scheme which—as it by many various hypotheses endeavours on the one hand not to give up the reality of an unknown material universe, and on the other to explain the ideal illusion of its cognition—may be called the doctrine of cosmthetic idealism, hypothetical realism, or hypothetical dualism. This last [system] . . . is the one which . . . has found favour with the immense majority of philosophers. Sir W. Hamilton, Reid's Works, Note A, § 1, 10.

realist (ré'al-ist), n. and a. [= F. réaliste = Sp. Pg. It. realista = G. realist, < NL. realista; as real¹ + -ist.] 1. A logician who holds that the essences of natural classes have some mode of being in the real things: in this sense distinguished as a scholastic realist: opposed to nominalist. As soon as intellectual development had reached the point at which men were capable of conceiving of an essence, they naturally found themselves realists. But reflection about words inclined them to be nominalists. Thus, a controversy sprang up between these sects in the eleventh century (first in the Irish monasteries, and then spread through the more civilized countries of northern Europe), and was practically settled in favor of the realists toward the end of the twelfth century. During the fourteenth century a reaction from the subtleties of Scotus produced a revival of nominalistic views, which were brought into a thoroughgoing doctrine by Occam, his followers being distinguished as terminists from other schools of nominalists. At the time when scholasticism came to a rather violent end, owing to the revival of learning, the terminists were in the ascendant, though some of the universities were Scotist. The Cartesian did not profess to be a realist; and Leibnitz was a decided nominalist; while the whole weight of the English school (Occam, Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, Hume, Hartley, Reid, Brown, the Mills, and others) went in the same direction. At the present day philosophy seems to be, and science certainly is, prevaillingly realistic. See quotation under realism, 1.

2. A philosopher who believes in the real existence of the external world as independent of all thought about it, or, at least, of the thought of any individual or any number of individuals.—3. In literature and art, a believer in or a practiser of realism; one who represents persons or things as he conceives them to be in real life or in nature; an opponent of idealism or romanticism.

How hard and meagre they seem, the professed and finished realists of our own day, ungraced by that spiritual candor which makes half the richness of Ghirlandaio! H. James, Jr., Trans. Sketches, p. 298.

4. One who advocates technical as opposed to classical education; one who upholds the method of the real-schools. [A German use.]

II. a. Of or pertaining to realism; realistic; naturalistic.

realistic (ré'al-ist'ik), a. [< realist + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the realists in philosophy; characteristic of speculative realism.

The realistic tendency—the disposition to mistake words for things—is a vice inherent in all ordinary thinking. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 122.

2. Exhibiting or characterized by realism in description or representation; objectively real or literal; lifelike, usually in a bad or depreciatory sense: as, a realistic novel or painting; a realistic account of a murder.

A bit of realistic painting, in the midst of a piece of decorative painting, would offend us, and yet the realistic bit would add a certain amount of veracity. P. G. Hamerton, Graphic Arts, v.

Realistic they are in the nobler sense: that is, they are true to nature without being slavish copies of nature. C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 91.

Realistic dualism. See dualism.

realistically (ré'al-ist'ik-ly), adv. In a realistic manner; in a manner that has regard to the actual appearance of objects or circumstances, or the real facts of existence.

reality¹ (ré'al'i-ti), n.; pl. realities (-tiz). [= F. réalité = Sp. realidad = Pg. realidade = It. realtà, < ML. realitas (-t)-s, < realis, real: see real¹. Cf. reality².] 1. The being real; truth as it is in the thing; objective validity; independence of the attributions of individual thought; positively determinate being.

Hee exhorted him to believe the reality of the sacrament after the consecration. Foze, Martyrs, p. 1159, an. 1543.

Reality shall rule, and all shall be as they shall be forever. Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., iii. 24.

For this, in reality, is the port of Acre, where ships lie at anchor. Pucke, Description of the East, II. i. 56.

In the English plays alone is to be found the warmth, the mellowness, and the reality of painting. Macaulay, Dryden.

Nothing can have reality for us until it enters within the circle of Feeling, either directly through perception, or indirectly through Intuition. Conception is the symbolical representation of such real presentation. G. H. Leves, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 11.

2. That which is real or genuine; something that really is or exists, as opposed to what is imagined or pretended; an essential verity or entity, either in fact or in representation.

Of that skill the more thou know'st,
The more she will acknowledge thee her head,
And to realities yield all her shows. Milton, P. L., viii. 575.

Only shadows are dispensed below,
And Earth has no reality but woe. Cooper, Hope, I. 68.

They who live only for wealth, and the things of this world, follow shadows, neglecting the great realities which are eternal on earth and in heaven. Sumner, Orations, I. 194.

3. In law, same as reality¹. [Now rare.]—Absolute reality. See absolute.—Empirical reality, the reality of an object of actual or conditionate experience.

What we insist on is the empirical reality of time, that is, its objective validity, with reference to all objects which can ever come before our senses. What we deny is that time has any claim to absolute reality, so that, without taking into account the form of our sensuous condition, it should by itself be a condition or quality inherent in things; for such qualities as belong to things by themselves can never be given to us through the senses. Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller.

Objective reality, truth; reference to a real object. This is the sense in which this phrase is used by Kant. At an earlier date it would have meant existence in the mind. With later writers it means nearly the same as absolute reality.—Practical reality, in the Kantian philosophy, that force in a postulate of the practical reason by which it becomes the source of the possibility of realizing the summum bonum.

I have, indeed, no intuition which should determine its objective theoretic reality of the moral law, but not the less it has a real application, which is exhibited in concrete in intentions or maxims: that is, it has a practical reality which can be specified, and this is sufficient to justify it even with a view to noumena. Kant, Critique of Practical Reason, tr. by T. K. Abbott, [p. 146.]

Reality of laws, a legal phrase for all laws concerning property and things.—Subjective reality, real existence in the mind.

Time has subjective reality with regard to internal experience; that is, I really have the representation of time, and of my determinations in it.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 37.

Theoretical reality, in the Kantian philosophy, validity as a hypothesis.—Transcendental reality. Same as absolute reality. = Syn. 1 and 2. Verity (see real¹). Reality means that a thing certainly is; truth applies to the correctness of what is said or believed about the thing, the conformity of such report or belief to reality. The reality of a danger; the actuality of the arrival of help; the truth about the matter.

reality², n. Same as reality¹.

Our reality to the emperor. Fuller.

realizability (ré'al-i-zä-bil'i-ti), n. [< realizable + -ity (see -bility).] Capability of being realized. [Rare.]

realizable (ré'al-i-zä-bl), a. [< F. réalisable; as realize + -able.] Capable of being realized.

realization (ré'al-i-zä'shon), n. [< OF. realisation, F. réalisation; as realize + -ation.] 1. A bringing or coming into real existence or manifestation, as of something conceived or imagined: as, the realization of a project.

The realization of the rights of humanity in the nation is the fulfillment of righteousness. E. Mulford, The Nation, vi.

The desire is the direction of a self-conscious subject to the realization of an idea. T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 151.

2. Perception of the reality or real existence of something; a realizing sense or feeling: as, the realization of one's danger.

An intrinsic and awful realization of eternal truths. Elay Burns, Memoir of W. C. Burns, p. 98.

3. The act of realizing upon something; conversion into money or its equivalent; exchange of property for its money value. [Trade use.]

4. The act of converting money into land or real estate. Imp. Dict. Also spelled realisation.

realize (ré'al-iz), v.; pret. and pp. realized, ppr. realizing. [< OF. realiser, F. réaliser = Sp. Pg. realizar; as real¹ + -ize.] I. trans. 1. To make or cause to become real; bring into existence or fact: as, to realize a project, or a dream of empire.

His [Clive's] dexterity and resolution realized, in the course of a few months, more than all the gorgeous visions which had floated before the imagination of Dupleix. Macaulay, Lord Clive.

restore to life, as a person dead or apparently dead: as, to reanimate a person apparently drowned.

We are our re-animated ancestors, and antedate their resurrection. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xv.

We may suppose that the creative power returns and reanimates some among the dead.

Isaac Taylor, Nat. Hist. Enthusiasm, p. 66.

2. To revive when dull or languid; invigorate; infuse new life or courage into: as, to reanimate disheartened troops; to reanimate drowsy senses or languid spirits.

Variety reanimates the attention, which is apt to languish under a continual sameness.

Sir J. Reynolds, Discourses, viii.

II. intrans. To revive; become lively again. [Rare.]

"There spoke Miss Beverley!" cried Delville, reanimating at this little apology. Miss Burney, Cecilia, ix. 5.

reanimation (rē-an-i-mā'shōn), n. [reanimate + -ion.] The act or operation of reanimating, or reviving from apparent death; the act or operation of giving fresh spirits, courage, or vigor; the state of being reanimated.

Having opened his father's casque, he was rejoiced to see him give symptoms of reanimation.

Scott, Annals of Gelerstein, xxxvi.

reannex (rē-ā-neks'), v. t. [re- + annex.] To annex again; annex what has been separated; reunite.

King Charles was not a little inflamed with an ambition to repurchase and re-annex that duchy.

Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 40.

reannexation (rē-an-ek-sā'shōn), n. [reannex + -ation.] The act of annexing again.

reanoint (rē-ā-noint'), v. t. [re- + anoint.] To anoint again or anew.

And Edward, . . .
Proud in his spoils, to London doth repair,
And, reanointed, mounts th' Imperial chair.
Drayton, Miseries of Queen Margaret.

reanswer (rē-ān'sēr), v. t. [re- + answer.] 1. To answer again; make a renewed reply to.—2. To answer or satisfy as a return; correspond to; equal; balance.

Bid him therefore consider of his ransom; which must proportion the losses we have borne, . . . which in weight to re-answer, his pettiness would bow under.

Shak., Hen. V., iii. 6. 138.

reap (rēp), v. [ME. repen, reopen, ripen (pret. rap, rep, pl. repen, ropen, pp. repen, ropen, later reaped), < AS. ripan, a variable verb, being in part strong (pret. pl. ripon), also geripau (pret. pl. geripon), also with short vowel ripan, Anglian riopan, rioppa, hrioppa, hrippan (pret. rēp*, pl. rēpon), and in part (and appar. orig.) weak, rīpan (pret. rīpte*, not found), reap (cf. rip, rīp, a reaping, harvest): appar. a particular use of ripan, prop. rīpan (pret. pl. rīpton, rēpton), plunder, spoil, = OHG. rousen, MHG. rousen, reusen, rōusen, G. raufen, pluck, pull, etc., = Goth. raupjan, pluck. Cf. D. rapen, reap, gather.] I. trans. 1. To cut with a sickle or other implement or machine; cut down and gather: used specifically of cutting grain: as, to reap wheat or rye.

When ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field. Lev. xix. 9.

That which they reapt on the land was put into store-houses built for that purpose.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 876.

And no Man ever reapt his Corn,
Or from the Oven drew his Bread,
Ere Hinds and Bakers yet were born,
That taught them both to sow and knead.

Prior, Alma, i.

2. To cut a crop of grain, or something likened to such a crop, from; clear by or as if by reaping.

His chin new reap'd
Show'd like a stubble-land at harvest-home.

Shak., I. Hen. IV., i. 3. 34.

3. Figuratively, to gather in by effort of any kind; obtain as a return or recompense; garner as the fruit of what has been done by one's self or others.

They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind.

Hos. viii. 7.

Of our labours thou shalt reap the gain.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 7. 20.

He cannot justly expect to reape aught but dishonour and dispraise.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, v.

Do thou the deeds I die too young to do,
And reap a second glory in thine age!

M. Arnold, Sohrab and Rustum.

II. intrans. 1. To perform the act or operation of reaping; cut and gather a harvest.

Yf y repe, [I] ouere-reche, other gat hem red that repen
To see to me with here sykel: that ich saw neuere.

Piers Plowman (C), vii. 270.

Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap. Micah vi. 15.

I would the globe from end to end Might sow and reap in peace.

Tennyson, Epilogue.

2. Figuratively, to gather the fruit of labor or works; receive a return for what has been done.

For wel I wot that ye han herbefore

Of makynge [poetry] ropen, and lad away the corne.

Chaucer, Good Women, l. 74.

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Ps. cxvii. 5.

reapt (rēp), n. [Early mod. E. also repe; < ME. reepe, rep, rip, < AS. rip, rīp, a reaping, a crop, harvest (also in comp., as rip-man, harvester, rip-tima, harvest), also a sheaf of grain, etc., < ripan, rīpan, reap: see reap, v.] A sheaf of grain. [Prov. Eng.]

As mych as oone reape.

Towneley Mysteries, p. 13. (Halliwel.)

reaper (rē'pēr), n. [ME. repare, riperre, < AS. ripere, a reaper, < ripan, reap: see reap, v.] 1. One who reaps; one who cuts grain with a sickle or other implement or machine; hence, one who gathers in the fruits of his own or others' labor or work.

When brown August o'er the land
Call'd forth the reapers' busy band.

Scott, Rokeby, vi. 35.

In the vast field of criticism on which we are entering,
Innumerable reapers have already put their sickles.

Macaulay.

Only reapers, reaping early
In among the bearded barley,
Hear a song that echoes cheerly.

Tennyson, Lady of Shalott, l.

2. A machine for cutting grain; a reaping-machine.—The reaper, an ancient siphon, to the following effect: If you are to reap, it is not true that perhaps you will reap and perhaps not, but you will certainly reap. On the other hand, if you are not to reap, it is not true that perhaps you will reap and perhaps not, but you will certainly not. Thus you will either necessarily reap, or necessarily not reap, and the statement that there is a "perhaps" is false.

reap-hook (rēp'hūk), n. Same as reaping-hook. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

reaping-hook (rē'ping-hūk), n. A curved blade with a short handle for reaping; a sickle; specifically, a sickle without the notched edge which formerly distinguished that implement.

The reapers in Palestine and Syria still make use of the reaping-hook in cutting down their crops: and "All their hand" with the corn, and those who bind up the sheaves their "bosom."—Ps. cxlix. 7; Ruth ii. 5.

Killo.

reaping-machine (rē'ping-mā-shēn'), n. A harvesting-machine for grain-crops; a mechanical reaper drawn over a field of standing grain by horses. The reaping-machine is a modified mowing-machine or mower, both mower and reaper being harvesters; the two machines are identical in their Reaping-machine.

a, driving-wheel; b, pole; c, whiffletrees; d, driver's seat; e, cutter-bar, arranged at front edge of platform f and carried by the latter; g, supporting wheel for outside extremity of the platform; h, tilting-lever, by which the front edge of the platform may be depressed for cutting grain that is lodged; i, rakes; j, cam-mechanism for operating rakes; k, outside divider, which separates the standing grain; l, inside divider, which separates the cut grain on the ground from that on the platform. The grain as cut falls on the platform, and is formed into gables by the rakes i, j, etc., which move from the front to the rear of the platform after reaching the position shown at i.

mechanism for cutting down the standing grain, of which mechanism the essential feature is the reciprocating knife moving within the fingers of a finger-bar. The reaper is distinguished from the mower by the addition of a reel for bending the grain down upon the knives, and by a platform, a raking mechanism, a discharging mechanism or dropper (by which the gables or sheaves are thrown out of the machine), and a binding mechanism; of these devices any or all may be present in one machine. Reaping-machines are often distinguished according to their attachments: thus, a dropper is a reaping-machine that automatically throws out the cut grain at intervals; a self-raker or a self-binder, sometimes called a harvester and binder, is one with a raking or a binding attachment. The discharging mechanism or dropper is a device for causing the platform upon which the grain falls when cut to throw off its load. The raking attachment consists of a series of rakes moving over the platform to gather the grain into gables and sweep it off upon the ground. The binding attachment consists essentially of an endless-belt elevator for lifting the cut grain, and a pair of curved arms for gathering and compressing it into a bundle and holding it while the binding mechanism proper draws wire or twine around it, twists the wire or loops and knots the twine, cuts the bundle from the wire or twine, and discharges the bound sheaf.

reapman (rēp'man), n. [ME. repman, < *AS. ripman (Anglian hripepan), a harvestman, < rip, harvest, + man, man.] A reaper; a harvestman.

Oon daywerk of a goode repman may gete
V strik, a feebler for III may swete.

Palladius, Husbandrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 158.

reapparel (rē-ā-par'el), v. t. [re- + apparel, v. Cf. reparel.] To apparel or clothe again or anew.

Then [at the resurrection] we shall all be invested, re-apparelled, in our own bodies.

Donne, Devotions, Expostulation, xiv.

reapparition (rē-ā-pā-rish'ōn), n. [re- + apparition.] A renewed apparition; a coming again; reappearance. [Rare.]

There would be presented the phenomena of colonies, reapparitions, and other faunal dislocations in the vertical and horizontal distribution of fossil remains.

Winchell, World-Life, p. 281.

reappear (rē-ā-pēr'), v. i. [= It. riappare; as re- + appear. Cf. OF. rapparoître, F. réapparaître, reappear.] To appear again or anew; return to sight or apprehension; be seen again, in either the same or a different example.

The law of harmonic sounds reappears in the harmonic colors.

Emerson, Nature, v.

Energy . . . only vanishes to reappear under some other form.

W. L. Carpenter, Energy in Nature, p. 12.

The river that reappears at Ombia is an old friend.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 238.

reappearance (rē-ā-pēr'āns), n. [reappear + -ance.] A new appearance; another coming into view or apprehension: as, the reappearance of Encke's comet.

reapplication (rē-ā-pi-kā'shōn), n. [re- + application.] The act of applying again, or the state of being reapplied.

A readvertency or reapplication of mind to ideas that are actually there.

Norris, Reflections on Locke, p. 9. (Latham.)

reapply (rē-ā-pli'), v. t. and i. [re- + apply.] To apply again.

reappoint (rē-ā-pōint'), v. t. [re- + appoint.] To appoint again.

reappointment (rē-ā-pōint'ment), n. [reappoint + -ment.] A renewed appointment.

reapportion (rē-ā-pōr'shōn), v. t. [re- + apportion.] To apportion again; make a new apportionment.

reapportionment (rē-ā-pōr'shōn-ment), n. [reapportion + -ment.] A renewed apportionment; a new proportional distribution or arrangement: as (in the United States), the reapportionment of members of Congress or of Congressional districts under a new census.

reapproach (rē-ā-prōch'), v. [re- + approach.] I. intrans. To come near again.

II. trans. To bring near together again.

We were able to produce a lovely purple, which we can destroy or recompose at pleasure, by severing and re-approaching the edges of the two irises.

Boyle, Works, i. 738.

reap-silver (rēp'sil'vēr), n. [ME. repsilver; < reap, n., + silver.] Money paid by feudal serfs or tenants to their lord as a commutation for their services in reaping his crops.

rear (rēr), v. [Early mod. E. also reer, rere, also dial. rare; < ME. reren, < AS. rēran (= leel. reisa = Goth. raisjan), cause to rise, lift up, establish, rouse, elevate, etc.; causative of risan (pret. rās), rise: see rise, and cf. raise, which is from the leel form (reisa) of the same verb. The change of the orig. medial s to r occurs also in were (pl. of was), earl, iron, lorn, etc.] I. trans. 1. To raise, lift, or hoist by or as if by main strength; bring to or place in an elevated position; set or hold up; elevate; bear aloft.

Off with the traitor's head,
And rear it in the place your father's stands.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 6. 86.

And higher yet the glorious temple rear'd
Her pile.

Milton, P. R., iv. 546.

2. To form by raising or setting up the parts of; lift up and fix in place the materials of; erect; construct; build.

Saint dauid aboute this holl gerde a strong wal let reer.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 28.

O'er his Grave a Monument they rear'd.

Congrave, Iliad.

3. To raise from a prostrate state or position; uplift; exalt.

The Ladie, hearing his so courteous speech,
Gan reare her eyes as to the chearefull light.

Spenser, F. Q., vi. ii. 42.

In adoration at his feet I fell Submit; he rear'd me.

Milton, P. L., viii. 316.

rearwardly (rēr'wārd-li), adv. In a rearward direction; toward the rear; rearward. [Objective.]

Having a handle . . . extending rearwardly beyond the suction tube. The Engineer, LXV. 374.

reascend (rē-ā-sen'd'), v. i. and t. [< re- + ascend.] To ascend, mount, or climb again.

Taught by the heavenly Muse to venture down
The dark descent, and up to reascend.

Milton, P. L., iii. 20.

He mounts aloft and reascends the skies. Addison.

reascension (rē-ā-sen'shən), n. [< re- + ascension.] The act of reascending; a remounting.

reascent (rē-ā-sen't'), n. [< re- + ascent.] A rise of ground following a descent.

Hence the declivity is sharp and short,

And such the reascend. Cowper, Task, i. 327.

reason¹ (rē'zn), n. [< ME. reson, resoun, resoun, raison, reason, raisoun, raisoun, F. raison, F. dial. raison = Pr. razo, rasio = Cat. raho = Sp. rason = Pg. razão = It. ragione, < L. ratio(n-), reckoning, list, register, sum, affair, relation, regard, course, method, etc., also the faculty of reckoning, or of mental action, reason, etc., < reri, pp. ratus, think: see rate. ² *Reason*¹ is a doublet of ratio and ration.] 1. An idea acting as a cause to create or confirm a belief, or to induce a voluntary action; a judgment or belief going to determine a given belief or line of conduct. A premise producing a conclusion is said to be the reason of that conclusion; a perceived fact or reflection leading to a certain line of conduct is said to be a reason for that conduct; a cognition giving rise to an emotion or other state of mind is said to be a reason of or for that state of mind.

And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you. 1 Pet. iii. 15.

Give you a reason on compulsion! If reasons were as plentiful as blackberries, I would give no man a reason upon compulsion. Shak., I Hen. IV., ii. 4. 264.

2. A fact, known or supposed, from which another fact follows logically, as in consequence of some known law of nature or the general course of things; an explanation.

No sooner sighed but they asked one another the reason; no sooner knew the reason but they sought the remedy. Shak., As you Like it, v. 2. 39.

Not even the tenderest heart, and next our own,

Knows half the reasons why we smile or sigh. Keble, Christian Year, 24th Sunday after Trinity.

3. An intellectual faculty, or such faculties collectively. (a) The intellectual faculties collectively. (b) That kind and degree of intelligence which distinguishes man from the brutes.

And at the end of the days I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, and I blessed the most High. . . . At the same time my reason returned unto me. Dan, iv. 36.

O judgement! thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason.

Shak., J. C., iii. 2. 110.

For smiles from reason flow,

To brute denied. Milton, P. L., ix. 239.

(c) The logical faculties generally, including all that is subservient to distinguishing truth and falsehood, except sense, imagination, and memory on the one hand, and the faculty of intuitively perceiving first principles, and other lofty faculties, on the other.

The knowledge which respecteth the Faculties of the Mind of man is of two kinds: the one respecting his Understanding and Reason, and the other his Will, Appetite, and Affection; whereof the former produceth Position or Decree, the latter Action or Execution. . . . The end of Logic is to teach a form of argument to secure reason, and not to entrap it; the end of Morality is to procure the affections to obey reason, and not to invade it; the end of Rhetoric is to fill the imagination to second reason, and not to oppress it. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

But God left free the will; for what obeys Reason is free, and reason he made right,
But bid her well be ware, and still erect;
Lest, by some fair-appearing good surprised,
She dictate false, and misinform the will
To do what God expressly hath forbid.

Milton, P. L., ix. 352.

We may in reason discover these four degrees: the first and highest is the discovering and finding out of proofs; the second, the regular and methodical disposition of them, and laying them in a clear and fit order, to make their connection and force be plainly and easily perceived; the third is the perceiving of their connection; and the fourth is a making a right conclusion.

Locke, Human Understanding, iv. 17, § 3.

(d) The faculty of drawing conclusions or inferences, or of reasoning.

When she rates things, and moves from ground to ground,
The name of reason she obtains by this;
But when by reason she the truth hath found,
And standeth fix'd, she understanding is.

Sir J. Davies, Immortal, of Soul, § 25.

The Latins called accounts of money rationes, and accounting rationatio; and that which we in books of accounts call items they call nomina, that is, names; and thence it seems to proceed that they extended the word ratio to the faculty of reckoning in all other things. The Greeks have but one word, λόγος, for both speech and reason; not that they thought there was no speech without reason, but no reasoning without speech. . . . Out of all which we may define, that is to say determine, what that is which is meant by this word reason, when we reckon it amongst the faculties of the mind. For reason, in this sense, is nothing but reckoning.

Hobbes, Leviathan, i. 4.

(e) The faculty by which we attain the knowledge of first principles; a faculty for apprehending the unconditioned.

Some moral and philosophical truths there are so evident in themselves that it would be easier to imagine half mankind run mad, and joined precisely in the same species of folly, than to admit anything as truth which should be advanced against such natural knowledge, fundamental reason, and common sense. Shaftesbury.

Reason is the faculty which supplies the principles of knowledge a priori.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Muller, p. 11.

4. Intelligence considered as having universal validity or a catholic character, so that it is not something that belongs to any person, but is something partaken of, a sort of light in which every mind must perceive.—5. That which recommends itself to enlightened intelligence; some inward intimation for which great respect is felt and which is supposed to be common to the mass of mankind; reasonable measure; moderation; right; what mature and cool reflection, taking into account the highest considerations, pronounces for, as opposed to the prompting of passion.

You shall find me reasonable: if it be so, I shall do that that is reasonable. Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 218.

Reason is the life of the law; nay, the common law itself is nothing else but reason. Sir E. Coke, Institutes.

To subdue

By force who reason for their law refuse,

Right reason for their law, and for their King

Messiah, who by right of merit reigns.

Milton, P. L., vi. 41.

Many are of opinion that the most probable way of bringing France to reason would be by the making an attempt upon the Spanish West Indies.

Addison, Present State of the War.

6. A reasonable thing; a rational thing to do; an idea or a statement conformable to common sense.

And telle he moste his tale as was reason,
By forward and by composicioun,
As ye han herd.

Chaucer, Prol. to Knight's Tale (ed. Morris), l. 847.

It is not reason that we should leave the word of God and serve tables. Acts vi. 2.

Men cannot retire when they would, neither will they when it were reason. Bacon, Great Place.

7. The exercise of reason; reasoning; right reasoning; argumentation; discussion.

Your reasons at dinner have been sharp and sententious.

I follow'd her; she what was honour knew,

And with obsequious majesty approved

My pleaded reason. Milton, P. L., viii. 510.

8. The intelligible essence of a thing or species; the quiddity.

That other opinion, that asserts that the abstract and universal rationes, reasons, of things, as distinct from phantasms, are nothing else but mere names without any signification, is so ridiculously false that it deserves no confutation at all.

Cudworth, Eternal and Immutable Morality, iv. 1.

9. In logic, the premise or premises of an argument, especially the minor premise.

A premiss placed after its conclusion is called the Reason of it, and is introduced by one of those conjunctions which are called causal: viz., "since," "because," &c.

Whately, Logic, i. § 2.

By *reason*¹. (a) For the reason that; because.

'Tis not unusual in the Assembly to revoke their Votes, by reason they make so much hast.

Sclden, Table-Talk, p. 108.

(b) By right or justice; properly; justly.

And, as my body and my beste ougte to be my liegis,

So rithfully be reason my rede shulde also.

Richard the Redeless, Prol.

By reason of, on account of; for the cause of.

And by reason of gentill fader ought come gentill issue.

Mertin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 600.

The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow.

Ps. xc. 10.

Mr. Bradford and Mr. Collier of Plymouth came to Boston, having appointed a meeting here the week before, but by reason of foul weather were driven back.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, i. 166.

The Parliament is adjourned to Oxford, by reason of the Sickness which increaseth exceedingly.

Hovell, Letters, i. Iv. 20.

I cannot go so fast as I would, by reason of this burden that is on my back.

Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, p. 89.

We elected a president, as many of the ancients did their kings, by reason of his height.

Addison, Spectator, No. 108.

Discourse of reason, the operation or faculty of reasoning, or the conscious and voluntary use of beliefs already had to determine others.

O God! a beast, that wants discourse of reason,
Would have mourn'd longer. Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 150.

Discursive reason, reason in the sense 3 (d); the dialectic faculty, or faculty of drawing conclusions and inferences. Compare intuitive reason, below.

Whence the soul

Reason receives, and reason is her being,

Discursive or intuitive; discourse

Is ofttest yours, the latter most is ours,

Differing but in degree, of kind the same.

Milton, P. L., v. 487.

Diversity of *reason*¹. See diversity.—Ens of reason. See ens.—False reason, an inconclusive reason.—Feast of reason. (a) Delightful intellectual discourse.

There St. John mingles with my friendly bowl

The feast of reason and the flow of soul.

Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. l. 128.

(b) [caps.] In French hist., an act of worship of human reason, represented by a woman as the goddess of Reason, performed on November 10th, 1793, in the cathedral of Notre Dame, and also in other churches (renamed temples of Reason) in France on that and succeeding days. The worship of Reason was designed to take the place of the suppressed Christian worship; recognition of the Supreme Being was restored through the influence of Robespierre.—Generative reason. See generative.—In reason. (a) In the view or estimation of reason; reasonably; justly; properly.

His unjust unkindness, that in all reason should have quenched her love. Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 250.

The Oath which binds him to performance of his ought in reason to contain the sum of what his chief trust and Office is. Milton, Eikonoklastes, vi.

(b) Agreeable to reason; reasonable; just; proper: as, I will do anything in reason.—Intuitive reason, reason in the sense 3 (e); the noetic faculty, or sense of primal truth. See quotation under discursive reason.—Logical reason, discursive reason.—Objective reason. See objective.—Out of reason, without or beyond reason; devoid of cause or warrant.

If we desyre no redresse of dedis before,

We may boldly vs hyld with hostis out of Reason.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 2222.

Practical reason. See practical.—Principle of sufficient reason, the proposition that nothing happens without a good and sufficient reason why it should be as it is and not otherwise. This doctrine denies, first, that anything happens by chance or spontaneity, and, second, that anything happens by irrational and brute force. It is inextricably bound up with the principle of the identity of indiscernibles. It requires that there should be a general reason why the constants of nature should have the precise values they have. It is in conflict with every form of nominalism, teaching that general reasons are not only real, but that they exclusively govern phenomena; and it appears to lead logically to an idealism of a Platonic type. It is not the mere statement that everything has a cause, but that those causes act according to general and rational principles, without any element of blind compulsion. The principle was first enunciated by Leibnitz in 1710, and has met with extraordinary favor, the more so as it has often been misunderstood.—Pure reason, reason strictly a priori; reason quite independent of experience. See pure, 8.

Reason is pure if in reasoning we admit only definitions and propositions known a priori.

Baumeister, Philosophia Definitiva (trans.), 2d ed., 1738, § 823.

Pure reason is that faculty which supplies the principles of knowing anything entirely a priori.

Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 11.

Ratiocinant reason. (a) A reason or cause as it exists in the mind: opposed to ratiocinate reason.

I have not asked this question without cause causing, and reason truly very ratiocinant.

Urquhart, Rabelais, III. vi. (Davies.)

(b) The human understanding; the discursive reason.—Ratiocinate reason, a reason as an element of the quiddity of things, according to the Aristotelian conception: opposed to ratiocinant reason.—Reason of state, a political motive for a public act which cannot be accounted for publicly; a concealed ground of action by a government or a public officer in some matter concerning the state's welfare or safety, or the maintenance of a policy.—Relation of reason. See relation.—Right reason, reason in sense 5, above.—Rime nor reason. See rime.—Speculative reason, reason employed about supersensuous things.—Subjective reason, reason which is determined by the subject or agent.—Sufficient reason. See principle of sufficient reason, above.—Theoretical reason, reason as productive of cognition.—There is no reason but, there is no reason why not; it is inevitable; it cannot be helped.

There is no reason but I shall be blind.

Shak., T. G. of V., II. 4. 212.

To do one reason. (a) To do what is desired, or what one desires; act so as to give satisfaction.

Lord Titus, by your leave, this maid is mine.

. . . [I am] resolved withal

To do myself this reason and this right.

Shak., Tit. And., i. 1. 279.

Strike home, and do me reason in thy heart. Dryden.

(b) See do.—To have reason, to have reason or right on one's side; be in the right. [A Gallicism.]

Mr. Mechlin has reason. Foote, Commissary, III. 1.

To hear reason, to yield to reasoning or argument; accept a reason or reasons adduced; act according to advice.

Con. You should hear reason.

D. John. . . . What blessing brings it?

Con. If not a present remedy, at least a patient sufferance.

Shak., Much Ado, i. 3. 6.

To stand to reason. See stand.—Syn. 1. Inducement, etc. (see motive), account, object, purpose, design.

*reason*¹ (rē'zn), v. [< ME. resonen, < OF. raisonner, raisonner, raisnier, reason, argue, discourse, speaking, F. raisonner, reason, argue, reply, = Pr. razonar, razonar = Cat. rahonar = Sp. razonar = Pg. razoar = It. ragionare, reason, < ML. rationare, reason, argue, discourse, speak, calculate, < L. ratio(n-), reason, calculation: see *reason*¹, n. Cf. arason.] I. intrans. 1. To exercise the faculty of reason; make rational deductions; think or choose rationally; use intelligent discrimination.

He [the serpent] hath eaten and lives,
And knows, and speaks, and reasons, and discerns, Irrational till then. Milton, P. L., ix. 765.

We only reason in so far as we note the resemblances among objects and events.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 415.

2. To practise reasoning in regard to something; make deductions from premises; engage in discussion; argue, or hold arguments.

Let us dispute again,
And reason of divine Astrology.
Marlowe, Doctor Faustus, ii. 2.

Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord.
Isa. i. 18.

3†. To hold account; make a reckoning; reckon.

Since the affairs of men rest still incertain,
Let's reason with the worst that may befall.
Shak., J. C., v. 1. 97.

4. To hold discourse; talk; parley.

They reasoned among themselves, saying, This is the heir: come, let us kill him. Luke xx. 14.

But reason with the fellow,
Before you punish him. Shak., Cor., iv. 6. 51.

II. trans. 1. To reason about; consider or discuss argumentatively; argue; debate.

Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Mark ii. 8.
Condescends, even, to reason this point. Brougham.

2. To give reasons for; support by argument; make a plea for: often with out: as, to reason out a proposition or a claim.

This boy, that cannot tell what he would have,
But kneels and holds up hands for fellowship,
Does reason our petition with more strength
Than thou hast to deny't. Shak., Cor., v. 3. 176.

3. To persuade by reasoning or argument.

Men that will not be reasoned into their senses may yet be laughed or drolled into them. Sir R. L'Estrange.

4†. To hold argument with; engage in speech or discussion; talk with; interrogate.

reason², n. An obsolete spelling of *raisin*¹. In the following passage it is apparently applied to some other fruit than the grape.

A medlar and a hartichoke,
A crab and a small reason.
Cotgrave, Wits Interpreter (1671), p. 219. (Nares.)

reasonable (rē'zn-ā-bl), a. [ME. resonable, resunabel, resnabyl, resnable, runnable, < OF. resonable, raisonnable, regnale, resnable, rationable, F. raisonnable = Pr. razonable = Cat. rahonable = Sp. razonable = Pg. razoavel = It. ragionabile, < L. rationabilis, reasonable, < ratio(n-), reason, calculation: see *reason*¹ and -able.] 1. Having the faculty of reason; endowed with reason; rational, as opposed to brute.

If he have wit enough to keep himself warm, let him bear it for a difference between himself and his horse; for it is all the wealth that he hath left, to be known a reasonable creature. Shak., Much Ado, i. 1. 71.

2. Characterized by the use of reason; amenable to reason or sound sense; not senseless, foolish, or extravagant in thought or action.

His manners might no man amend;
Of tongue she was trew and reasonable,
And of his semblant soft and stable.
Yvaine and Gavaine (Ritson's Metr. Rom., i. 10), l. 208.
[Piers Plowman, Notes, p. 17.]

The adjective reasonable . . . denotes a character in which reason (taking it in its largest acceptance) possesses a decided ascendancy over the temper and passions; and implies no particular propensity to a display of the discursive power, if indeed it does not exclude the idea of such a propensity. D. Stewart, Human Mind, ii. 10, note.

3. Conformable to or required by reason; due to or resulting from good judgment; rationally sound, sensible, natural, etc.

Ther doth no wyghte nothing so reasonable
That mys harme in her [jealousy's] ymagynynge.
Chaucer, Complaint of Venus, l. 35.

I beseech you . . . present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. Rom. xii. 1.

A law may be reasonable in itself, though a man does not allow it. Swift.

The terrors of the child are quite reasonable, and add to his loveliness. Emerson, Courage.

4. Not exceeding the bounds of reason or common sense; moderate; tolerable.

I will marry her upon any reasonable demands.
Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 233.

5. Moderate in amount or price; not high or dear: as, reasonable charges or prices; reasonable goods.—6. In law, befitting a person of reason or sound sense; such as a prudent man would exercise or act upon in his own affairs: as, reasonable care; reasonable diligence; reasonable cause.—7†. Calculable; computable; hence, detailed; itemized.

And reckene byfore reson a reasonable acounte,
What one hath, what another hath, and what hy hadde bothe. Piers Plowman (C), xiv. 35.

8†. Talkative; ready in conversation.

Lo! how goodly spak this knight . . .
I . . . gan me aequynte
With him, and fond him so trefable,
Right wonder skilful and reasonable.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 534.

Proof beyond a reasonable doubt, such proof as will produce an abiding conviction to a moral certainty, so that a prudent man would feel safe to act upon that conviction in matters of the highest concern to his personal interests.—Reasonable aid, a euphemistic expression for aid, 3, corresponding to the term benevolence as used for forced loans or gifts.—Reasonable alms. See alms.—Reasonable doubt, in law, doubt for which a pertinent reason can be assigned; that state of a case which, after the entire comparison and consideration of the evidence, leaves the minds of jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction, to a moral certainty, of the truth of the charge. Shaw, C. J.—Reasonable dower. See *dower*², 2 = Syn. Rational, Reasonable. See rational.

reasonable (rē'zn-ā-bl), adv. [< reasonable, a.] Reasonably.

I have a reasonable good ear in music. Let's have the tongs and the bones. Shak., M. N. D., iv. 1. 31.

The Library of the Sorbonne is a very long and large Gallery, reasonable well stored with Books.
Lider, Journey to Paris, p. 128.

reasonableness (rē'zn-ā-bl-nes), n. The character of being reasonable; conformity to or compliance with the requirements of reason; agreeableness to rational ideas or principles.

The method of inwardness and the secret of self-re-nouncement, working in and through this element of mildness, produced the total impression of his [Jesus's]
"epieikeia," or sweet reasonableness.
M. Arnold, Literature and Dogma, vii. § 5.

reasonably (rē'zn-ā-bli), adv. [ME. resonably, renably; < reasonable + -ly.] 1. In a reasonable manner; agreeably to reason; with good sense or judgment.

And spoke as renably and faire and wel
As to the Phitonissa did Samuel.
Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 211.

The abuse of the judicial functions that were properly and reasonably assumed by the House was scandalous and notorious.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., iii.

2. Within the bounds of reason; with good reason or cause; justly; properly.

Whate'er Lord Harry Percy then had said . . .
May reasonably die. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., i. 3. 74.

It might seem that an egg which has succeeded in being fresh has done all that can reasonably be expected of it.
H. James, Jr., Little Tour, p. 218.

3. To a reasonable extent; in a moderately good degree; fairly; tolerably.

Verely she was heled, and left her stylytes thore,
And on her fete wente home reasonably well.
Joseph of Arimathe (E. E. T. S.), p. 47.

As a general rule, Providence seldom vouchsafes to mortals any more than just that degree of encouragement which suffices to keep them at a reasonably full exertion of their powers. Hawthorne, Seven Gables, iii.

reasoned (rē'znd), p. a. Characterized by or based upon reasoning; following a logical or rational method; carefully argued or studied.

reasoner (rē'zn-ēr), n. [*< reason*¹ + -er.] Cf. F. raisonneur = Pr. razonador = Sp. razonador = Pg. raciador = It. ragionatore, < ML. ratio- nator, a reasoner, < rationare, reason: see *reason*¹, v.] One who reasons or argues, or exercises his reasoning powers; one who considers a subject argumentatively.

They are very bad reasoners, and vehemently given to opposition. Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii. 2.

reasonfully (rē'zn-fūl-i), adv. [ME., < *reason*¹ + -ful + -ly.] With full reason; most reasonably.

So then reasonfulli maye we sey that mercy both right and lawe passeth. Testament of Love, iii.

reasoning (rē'zn-ing), n. [Verbal n. of *reason*¹, v.] 1. The use of the faculty of reason; discriminative thought or discussion in regard to a subject; rational consideration.—2. A presentation of reasons or arguments; an argumentative statement or expression; a formal discussion.

Hear now my reasoning, and hearken. Job xlii. 6.

3†. Discussion; conversation; discourse.

Then there arose a reasoning among them, which of them should be greatest. Luke ix. 46.

Chain of reasoning. See chain.—Deductive, dia- grammatic, dilemmatic, Fermatian reasoning. See the adjectives.—Syn. Reasoning, Argumentation. Reasoning is much broader than argumentation. The latter is confined to one side of the question, or, in another sense, supposes a proposition, supported by arguments on the affirmative side and attacked by arguments on the negative. Reasoning may be upon one side of a proposition, and is then the same as argumentation; but it may also be the method by which one reaches a belief, and thus a way of putting together the results of investigation:
as, the reasoning in Euclid, or in Butler's Analogy; the reasoning by which a thief justifies himself in stealing.

A piece of reasoning is like a suspended chain, in which link is joined to link by logical dependence.
J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 158.

A poem does not admit argumentation, though it does admit development of thought. Coderidge, Table-Talk.

reasonless (rē'zn-les), a. [*< reason*¹ + -less.] 1. Lacking the faculty of reason; irrational, as an animal. [Rare.]

The reasonless creatures [the two kine] also do the will of their maker.
Bp. Hall, Contemplations (ed. Tegg, 1836), II. 144.

2. Deficient in reason or judgment; lacking in good sense; unreasoning. [Archaic.]

When any of them [animals] dieth, it is . . . buried in a holy place, the reasonless men howling and knocking Reaumuria (rē-ō-mū'ri-i), n. [NL. (Linnaeus, 1762), named after René A. F. de Reaumur (1683-1757), a French naturalist.] 1. A genus of polypetalous shrubs of the order Tamarisci- neæ and type of the tribe Reaumurieæ. It is characterized by numerous stamens which are free or somewhat united into five clusters, from five to ten bracts close to the calyx, five awl-shaped styles, and densely hairy seeds. There are about 12 species, natives of the Mediterranean region and of central Asia. They are generally very branching and procumbent undershrubs, with small or cylindrical crowded leaves and terminal solitary flowers, which are sometimes showy and red or purple.

Several species are occasionally cultivated as ornamental shrubs. R. verniculata, a pink flowered species, is used as an external remedy for the itch.

2. In entom., a genus of dipterous insects.
Desvoidy, 1830.

Reaumurieæ (rē'ō-mū-rī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Ehrenberg, 1827), cf. Reaumuria + -æ.] A tribe of polypetalous plants of the order Tamarisci- neæ, the tamarisk family, characterized by free petals, long-haired seeds, and solitary axillary or terminal flowers. It includes 2 genera, Hololachne, a monotypic undershrub of the salt marshes of central Asia, and Reaumuria.

to a ball of lead which is suspended by a string from a pole. Hallivell. [Prov. Eng.]

re baptism (rē-bap'tizm), n. [cf. re- + baptism.]

A new or second baptism. It has always been the generally accepted teaching that to perform the ceremony on one known to have been really baptized already is sacrilegious; and what is or may be baptism is permissible only because the validity of the previous ceremony has been denied, or because the fact of its administration, or the manner in which it was performed, is disputed or doubtful. Conditional or hypothetical baptism is administered in the Roman Catholic Church to all candidates coming from Protestant churches, under a form beginning "If thou hast not been baptized," the question of the validity of Protestant baptism being held in abeyance. Such re-baptism is also administered in the Anglican churches in special cases, as where the candidate himself desires it. Baptist churches require re-baptism of all who have not been immersed in profession of faith.

rebaptist (rē-bap'tist), n. [cf. re- + baptist.]
One who baptizes again, or who undergoes baptism a second time; also, a Baptist or Anabaptist.

Some for rebaptist him bespatter,
For dipping rider oft in water.
T. Brown, Works, IV. 270. (Davies.)

rebaptization (rē-bap-ti-zā'shon), n. [= F. re- baptisation; as rebaptize + -ation.] The act of rebaptizing; renewed or repeated baptism.

St. Cyprian . . . persisted in his opinion of rebaptiza- tion until death. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 313.

rebaptize (rē-bap-tiz'), v. t. [cf. OF. rebaptiser, rebaptizer, F. rebaptiser = Sp. rebautizar = Pg.
rebaptizar = It. ribattezzare, cf. LL. rebaptizare, baptize again, cf. re-, again, + baptizare, baptize:
see baptize.] 1. To baptize again or anew; repeat the baptism of.

Cyprian was no hereticke, though he beleueed rebaptiz- ing of them which were baptised of heretics.
Fore, Martyrs, p. 1468, an. 1555.

2. To give a new name to, as at a second baptism.

Of any Paganism at that time, or long before, in the Land we read not, or that Pelagianism was rebaptiz'd.

Rebated their sharp steel.
Beau. and Fl. (C), Faithful Friends, iii. 3.

2. To beat down; beat to bluntness; make obtuse or dull, literally or figuratively; blunt; bate.

One who . . .
 . . . doth rebate and blunt his natural edge
 With profits of the mind, study and fast.
Shak., M. for M., I. 4. 60.
 Thou wilt belie opinion, and rebate
 The ambition of thy gallantry.
Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, I. 2.
 But the broad belt, with plates of silver bound,
 The point rebated, and repelled the wound.
Pope, Iliad, xl. 304.
 3. To set or throw off; allow as a discount or abatement; make a drawback of. See the rebate² (rē-bāt'), n. [An altered form of rabate: see rabate and rabbet.] 1. A longitudinal space or groove cut back or sunk in a piece of joinery, timber, or the like, to receive the edge of some other part.

On the periphery at the socket end [of the brush] a shallow rebate is formed, to receive the binding string.
Spon's Encyc. Manuf., I. 544.

2. A kind of hard freestone used in pavements. Elves.—3. A piece of wood fastened to a handle, used for beating mortar. Elves.

rebate³ (rē-bāt'), v. t.; pret. and pp. rebated, ppr. rebating. [rebate², n.] To make a rebate or rabbet in, as a piece of joinery or other work; rabbet.

rebated (rē-bā'ted), p. a. 1. In her., cut short: noting any ordinary, especially a cross, characterized by having one or more of its arms too short to reach the edge of the field.—2. Blunt.

rebatement (rē-bāt'ment), n. [rebate¹ + -ment.] 1. The act of rebating, or the state of being rebated; a blunting; abatement; drawback. [Rare.]—2. In her.: (a) A cutting off, or shortening, as of one arm of a cross, or the like. (b) Same as abatement, in the sense of degradation of or dishonorable addition to a coat-armor.—3. A narrowing.

For without in the wall of the house he made narrowed rests [margin: narrowings, or *rebate*ments] round about, that the beams should not be fastened in the walls of the house.
1 Ki. vi. 6.

In the description of the side-chambers of the temple, the rebatement signifies the narrowing of the walls which left a ledge for the joists of the upper chambers to rest on.
W. A. Wright, Bible Word-Book, p. 497.

rebato^t, n. Same as rabato.

rebaudt, rebawdet, rebaudryt. Obsolete forms of ribald, ribaldry.

rebec, rebeck (rē'bēk), n. [(a) Early mod. E. also rebeke; < ME. rebecke, rebecke, rebeke, < OF. rebec, rebecke, rebec = Pg. rebeca = It. ribecca, ribecca (ML. rebecca, rebecca); also with diff. terminations, (b) F. dial. rebay = Pr. rabey; (c) Sp. rebel = Pg. rabil, arabil; (d) ME. rebiere, ribiere, rubibe, ribible, < OF. rebebe, rebeshe, reberbe, It. ribeba, ribebla, < Ar. rabāba = Hind. rabāb, rubāb, Pers. rabāb, rubāb, a rebec, a fiddle with one or two strings.] 1. A musical instrument, the earliest known form of the viol class. It had a pear-shaped body, which was solid above, terminating in a slender neck and a carved head, and hollow below, with sound-holes and a sound-post. The number of strings was usually three, but was sometimes only one or two. They were tuned in fifths, and sounded by a bow. The tone was harsh and loud. The rebec is known to have been in use in Europe as early as the eighth century. Its origin is disputed, but is usually attributed to the Moors of Spain. It was the precursor of the true viol in all its forms, and continued in vulgar use long after the latter was artistically established.

When the merry bells ring round,
 And the jocund rebecks sound
 To many a youth, and many a maid.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 94.

2†. An old woman: so called in contempt. Compare ribibe, 2.

II. n. 1. A person who makes war upon the government of his country from political motives; one of a body of persons organized for a change of government or of laws by force of arms, or by open defiance.

Know whether I be dextrous to subdue
 Thy rebels, or be found the worst in heaven.
Milton, P. L., v. 742.

For rebellion being an opposition not to persons, but authority, which is founded only in the constitution and laws of the government, those, whoever they be, who by force break through, and by force justify their violation of them, are truly and properly rebels.
Locke, Civil Government, l.

Kings will be tyrants from policy, when subjects are rebels from principle.
Burke.

Hence—2. One who or that which resists authority or law; one who refuses obedience to a superior, or who revolts against some controlling power or principle.

As reason is a rebel unto faith, so passion unto reason.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, l. 19.

She shall die unshrived and unforgiven,
 A rebel to her father and her God.
Shelley, The Cenci, iv. 1.

= Syn. 1. Traitor, etc. See insurgent, n.
rebel (rē-bēl'), v. i.; pret. and pp. rebelled, ppr. rebelling. Cf. rebel, a.] To make war against one's government, or against anything deemed oppressive, by arms or other means; revolt by active resistance or repulsion.

In his days Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up, and Jehoikim became his servant three years: then he turned and rebelled against him.
2 Ki. xxiv. 1.

Of those too high aspiring, who rebell'd
 With Satan.
Milton, P. L., vi. 890.

Our present life, in so far as it is healthy, rebels once for all against its own final and complete destruction.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, I. 231.

rebel-dom (rē-bēl-dum), n. [rebel + -dom.] 1. A seat of rebellion; a region or sphere of action controlled by rebels. [Rare.]—2. Rebellious conduct. [Rare.]

Never mind his rebel-dom of the other day; never mind about his being angry that his presents were returned.
Thackeray, Virginians, li.

rebellert (rē-bēl'ēr), n. [rebel, v., + -er¹.] One who rebels; a rebel.

God . . . shal . . . scourge and plague this nation, beeing nowe many a long dale a continuall rebellert agaynst God.
J. Udall, On Luke xxi.

rebellion (rē-bēl'yon), n. [ME. rebellion, < OF. rebellion, F. rebellion = Sp. rebelion = Pg. rebellião = It. ribellione, < L. rebellio(n), a renewal of war, revolt, rebellion, < rebellis, making war again: see rebel, a.] 1. War waged against a government by some part of its subjects; armed opposition to a government by a party of citizens, for the purpose of changing its composition, constitution, or laws; insurrectionary or revolutionary war.

He told me that rebellion had had luck,
 And that young Harry Percy's spur was cold.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., l. 1. 41.

Then shall you find this name of liberty
 (The watch-word of rebellion ever us'd . . .)
 By new-turn'd servitude.
Daniel, Civil Wars, li. 15.

2. The act of rebelling or taking part in a rebellious movement; open or armed defiance to one's government; the action of a rebel.

Boling. On what condition stands it [my fault], and wherein?

York. Even in condition of the worst degree,
 In gross rebellion, and detested treason.

Shak., Rich. II., li. 3. 100.

From all sedition, privy conspiracy, and rebellion, . . .
 Good Lord, deliver us. Book of Common Prayer, Litany.

Hence—3. Revolt against or defiance of authority in general; resistance to a higher power or to an obligatory mandate; open disobedience or insubordination; determination not to submit.

For he addeth rebellion unto his sin; he . . . multiplieth his words against God.
Job xxxiv. 37.

Civil rebellion, in Scots law, disobedience to letters of horning. See horning.—Commission of rebellion, in law. See commission.—Shays's rebellion, an insurrection in Massachusetts, under the lead of Daniel Shays, directed against the State authorities, which broke out in 1786 and was suppressed in 1787.—The Great Rebellion, in Eng. hist., the war waged by the Parliamentary army against Charles I. from 1642 till his execution in 1649, and the subsequent maintenance by armed force of a government opposed to the excluded sovereign Charles II. till the Restoration (1660).—The Rebellion, in U. S. hist., the civil war of 1861-5. See civil.—Whisky Insurrection or Rebellion. See insurrection. = Syn. Sedition, Revolt, etc. See insurrection.

rebellious (rē-bēl'yus), a. [rebelli(ous) + -ous.] 1. Acting as a rebel, or having the disposition of one; defying lawful authority; openly disobedient or insubordinate.

Rebellious subjects, enemies to peace,
 Profaners of this neighbour-stained steel.
Shak., R. and J., l. 1. 88.

2. Pertaining to or characteristic of a rebel or rebellion; of rebel character, relation, or use.

These are his substance, sinews, arms, and strength,
 With which he yoketh your rebellious necks.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., li. 8. 64.

3. Hard to treat or deal with; resisting effort or operation; refractory: applied to things.—Rebellious assembly, in old Eng. law, a gathering of twelve persons or more, intending, going about, or practising unlawfully, and of their own authority, to change any laws of the realm, or to destroy any property, or do any other unlawful act. = Syn. 1. Insubordinate, disobedient.  Of reboant whirlwinds.
Tennyson, Supposed Confessions.

reboation (rē-bō-ā'shon), n. [ML. reboatio(n), < L. reboare, resound, bellow back: see reboant.] A resounding; the return of a loud sound.

I imagine that I should hear the reboation of an universal groan.
Ep. Patrick, Divine Arithmetick (1659), p. 2. (Latham.)

succession of bearings which make up the name or a word expressing the profession or office of the bearer. The origin of many bearings in early heraldry is such an allusion; and on the other hand many proper names have been derived from the bearings, these having been granted originally to persons having a name or territorial designation which a descendant, perhaps of a younger branch, abandoned for the allusive surname suggested by the bearing: thus, in the case of the name Tremain, and the bearing of three human hands, either the bearing or the name may have originated the other. Also called allusive arms.

Rebus of Bishop Oldham ("widom"), Exeter Cathedral.

Excellent have been the concept[s] of some citizens, who, wanting arms, have coined themselves certain devices as neere as may be alluding to their names, which we call rebus.

H. Peacham, The Gentleman's Exercise (1634), p. 155. (Skeat.)

(b) A motto in which a part of the phrase is expressed by representations of objects instead of by words. In a few rare cases the whole motto is thus given. Such mottos are not commonly borne with the escutcheon and crest, but form rather a device or impress, as the figure of a sun-dial preceded by the words "we must," meaning "we must die all."

You will have your rebus still, mine host.

B. Jonson, New Inn, l. 1.

rebus (rē-bus), v. t. [< rebus, n.] To mark with a rebus; indicate by a rebus. Fuller, Ch. Hist., IV. iv. 34.

rebut (rē-but'), v.; pret. and pp. rebutted, ppr. rebutting. [Early mod. E. rebutte; < OF. rebuter, repulse, drive back, reject, F. rebouter, also rebuter = Pr. rebuter = It. ributare, repulse, reject; as re- + butte.] I. trans. 1†. To repel by force; rebuff; drive back.

He . . . rusht upon him with outrageous pryde;
Who him rencounting therce, as hauke in flight,
Perforce rebutted backe. Spenser, F. Q., I. xi. 53.

Philosophy lets her light descend and enter wherever there is a passage for it; she takes advantage of the smallest crevice, but the rays are rebutted by the smallest obstruction.

Landor, Imaginary Conversations (Epicurus, Leontion, and Temissa).

2. To thrust back or away, as by denial; refuse assent to; repel; reject.

The compliment my friend rebutted as best he could, but the proposition he accepted at once.

Poe, Tales, I. 218.

3. To repel by evidence or argument; bring counter-arguments against; refute, or strive to refute; much used in legal procedure.

Some of them he has objected to; others he has not attempted to rebut; and of others he has said nothing.

D. Webster, Speech, Senate, June 27, 1834.

4†. To withdraw; used reflexively.

Doe backe rebutte, and ech to other yealdeth land.
Spenser, F. Q., I. ii. 15.

II. intrans. 1. In law, to make an answer, as to a plaintiff's surrejoinder. Compare surrebut.

The plaintiff may answer the rejoinder by a surrejoinder; upon which the defendant may rebut.

Blackstone, Com., III. xx.

2. In curling, to make a random stroke with great force, in the hope of gaining some advantage in the striking and displacement of the stones about the tee.

rebuttable (rē-but'ā-bl), a. [< rebut + -able.] That may be rebutted.

rebuttal (rē-but'al), n. [< rebut + -al.] 1. The act of rebutting; refutation; confutation; contradiction.

There is generally preserved an amazing consistency in the delusion, in spite of the incessant rebuttals of sensation.

Warren, Diary of a Physician, xiv.

2. In law, that part of a trial in which the plaintiff endeavors to meet the defendant's evidence by counter-evidence.

rebutter¹ (rē-but'ēr), n. [< rebut + -er.] One who rebuts or refutes. [Rare.]

rebutter² (rē-but'ēr), n. [< OF. rebouter, inf. used as noun: see rebut.] An act of rebutting; specifically, in law, an answer, such as a defendant makes to a plaintiff's surrejoinder. Compare surrebutter.

recadency (rē-kā-den-si), n. [< re- + cadency. Cf. L. recidere, fall back: see recidivous.] The act of falling back or descending again; relapse. [Rare.]

Defection is apt to render many sincere progressions in the first fervor suspected of unsoundness and recadency.

W. Montague, Devoute Essays, Address to the Court.

recalcitrance (rē-kāl'si-trans), n. [< recalcitrant + -ce.] Refusal of submission; obstinate noncompliance or nonconformity; refractoriness.

recalcitrant (rē-kāl'si-trant), a. [= F. récalcitrant = It. ricalcitrante, < L. recalcitrant (t)-s, < recalcitrare, kick back: see recalcitrate.] Refusing to submit; exhibiting repugnance or opposition; not submissive or compliant; refractory.

recalcitrate (rē-kāl'si-trāt), v.; pret. and pp. recalcitrated, ppr. recalcitrating. [< L. recalcitratus, pp. of recalcitrare (> OF. recalcitrer, F. récalcitrer = Sp. Pg. recalcitrar = It. ricalcitrare), kick back, deny access, < re-, back, + calcitrare, kick.] I. intrans. To show repugnance or resistance to something; refuse submission or compliance; be refractory.

Wherefore recalcitrated against that will
From which the end can never be cut off?

Louffellow, tr. of Dante's Inferno, ix. 94.

II. trans. To kick against; show repugnance or opposition to. [Rare.]

The more heartily did one disdain his disdain, and recalcitrate his tricks.

De Quincey.

recalcitration (rē-kāl'si-trā'shōn), n. [< recalcitrare + -ion.] The act of recalcitrating; opposition; repugnance.

Inwardly chuckling that these symptoms of recalcitration had not taken place until the fair malecontent was, as he mentally termed it, under his thumb, Archibald coolly replied, "That the hills were none of his making."

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xli.

recalesce (rē-ka-les'), v. i.; pret. and pp. recalesced, ppr. recalescing. [< L. re-, again, + calere, grow hot, inceptive of calere, be hot: see calid.] To show renewed ealescence; resume a state of glowing heat.

recalcescence (rē-ka-les'ēns), n. [< recalesce + -ence.] Renewed ealescence; reglow; specifically, in physics, a phenomenon exhibited by iron as it cools gradually from a white heat (point of high incandescence): at certain temperatures, as at 1,000°, the cooling seems to be arrested, and the iron glows more brilliantly for a short time. It has also been found that certain other properties of the metal, magnetic and electrical, undergo a sudden change at these points of recalcescence.

recall (rē-kāl'), v. t. [< re- + call.] 1. To call back from a distance; summon or cause to return or to be returned; bring back by a call, summons, or demand: as, to recall an ambassador or a ship; we cannot recall our lost youth.

If Henry were recall'd to life again.

These news would cause him once more yield the ghost.

Shak., 1 Hen. VI., l. 1. 66.

At the expiration of six years he was suddenly recalled to his native country by the death of his father.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 5.

2. To call back to mind or perception; renew the memory or experience of; bring again, as something formerly experienced.

How soon

Would highth recall high thoughts!

Milton, P. L., iv. 95.

I recall it, not see it;

Could vision be clearer?

Lowell, Fountain of Youth.

3. To revoke; take back, as something given or parted with; countermand: abrogate; cancel: as, to recall a decree or an order; to recall an edition of a book.

Passed sentence may not be recall'd.

Shak., C. of E., l. 1. 148.

The doore of grace turns upon smooth hinges wide opening to send out; but soon shutting to recall the precious offers of mercy to a nation.

Milton, Church-Government, l. 7.

The Gods themselves cannot recall their gifts.

Tennyson, Titonus.

=Syn. 3. Recant, Abjure, etc. (see renounce); Repeal, Rescind, etc. (see abolish).

recall (rē-kāl'), n. [< recall, v.] 1. A calling back; a summons to return; a demand for re-appearance, as of a performer after he has left the stage (usually indicated by long-continued applause): as, the recall of an ambassador; the recall of an actor.—2. A calling back to mind; the act of summoning up the memory of something; a bringing back from the past.

The recall, resuscitation, or reproduction of ideas already formed takes place according to fixed laws, and not at random.

Mind, XII. 161.

3. Revocation; countermand; retraction; abrogation.

Those indulgent laws

Will not be now vouchsafed; other decrees

Against thee are gone forth without recall.

Milton, P. L., v. 885.

'Tis done, and, since 'tis done, 'tis past recall.

Dryden, Spanish Friar, iii. 3.

4. A musical call played on a drum, bugle, or trumpet to summon back soldiers to the ranks or to camp.—5. A signal-flag used to recall a boat to a ship.

recallable (rē-kāl'ā-bl), a. [< recall + -able.] Capable of being recalled, in any sense.

Delegates recallable at pleasure.

Madison.

The glow of a gorgeous sunset continues to be recallable long after faintly coloured scenes of the same date have been forgotten.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 99.

recallment, recalment (rē-kāl'ment), n. [< recall + -ment.] The act of recalling, or the state of being recalled. [Rare.]

I followed after,

And asked, as a grace, what it all meant?

If she wished not the rash deed's recalment?

Browning, The Glove.

recant (rē-kant'), v. [< OF. recanter, rechancier, sing again, = Pr. rechantar = Pg. recantar = It. ricantare, sing again, < L. recantare, sing back, reccho, also sing again, repeat in singing, recant, recall, revoke, charm back or away. < re-, back, + cantare, sing: see chant and cant.] I. trans. 1†. To sing over again; utter repeatedly in song.

They were wont ever after in their wedding songs to recant and resound this name — Thalassius.

Holland, tr. of Plutarch, p. 704.

2. To unsay; contradict or withdraw formally (something which one had previously asserted); renounce; disavow; retract: as, to recant one's opinion or profession of faith.

Which duke . . . did recant his former life.

Fabian, Chron. (ed. Ellis), II. 712, an. 1553.

We have another manner of speech much like to the repentant, but doth not as the same recant or unsay a word that hath bene said before.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 180.

He shall do this, or else I do recant.

The pardon that I late pronounced here.

Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 391.

=Syn. 2. Abjure, Forneear, etc. See renounce.

II. intrans. To revoke a declaration or proposition; unsay what has been said; renounce or disavow an opinion or a dogma formerly maintained; especially, to announce formally one's abandonment of a religious belief.

And many, for offering to maintain these Ceremonies, were either punish'd or forced to recant.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 304.

It is against all precedent to burn

One who recants; they mean to pardon me.

Tennyson, Queen Mary, iv. 2.

recantation (rē-kant'ā'shōn), n. [= Sp. recantacion = Pg. recantação = It. ricantazione; < L. as if recantatio*(n)-, < recantare, recant: see recant.] The act of recanting; retraction; especially, solemn renunciation or abjuration of a doctrine or religious system previously maintained, with acknowledgment that it is erroneous.

Your lord and master did well to make his recantation.

Shak., All's Well, ii. 3. 195.

Cranmer, it is decided by the Council

That you to-day should read your recantation

Before the people in St. Mary's Church.

Tennyson, Queen Mary, iv. 2.

recanter (rē-kant'ēr), n. One who recants.

The public body, which doth seldom

Play the recanter. Shak., T. of A., v. 1. 149.

Pr. recapitular = F. récapituler), go over the main points of a thing again, < L. re-, again, + capitulum, a head, main part, chapter (> ML. capitulare, capitulate): see capitulate.] I. trans. To repeat, as the principal things mentioned in a preceding discourse, argument, or essay; give a summary of the principal facts, points, or arguments of; mention or relate in brief.

When they met, Temple began by recapitulating what had passed at their last interview.

Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

=Syn. Recapitulate, Repeat, Recite, Rehearse, Reiterate. Recapitulate is a precise word, applying to the formal or exact naming of points that have been with some exactness named before: as, it is often well, after an extended argument, to recapitulate the heads. In this it differs from repeat, recite, rehearse, which are freer in their use. To reiterate is to say a thing a second time or oftener.

II. intrans. To repeat in brief what has already been said.

recapitulation (rē-kā-pit'ū-lā'shōn), n. [< OF. recapitulacion, recapitulation, F. récapitulation = Sp. recapitulacion = Pg. recapitulação = It. ricapitolazione, < LL. recapitulatio(n)-] (technical as trans. of Gr. ἀνακεφαλαιώω, < L. recapitulare, recapitulate: see recapitulate.] 1. The act or process of recapitulating.

D. Fer. Were e'er two friends engag'd in an adventure So intricate as we, and so capricious?
D. Jul. Sure never in this world; methinks it merits A special recapitulation. Digby, Elvira, iii.

2. In rhet., a summary or concise statement or enumeration of the principal points or facts in a preceding discourse, argument, or essay. Also anacephalæsis, enumeration. See epanodos.

Such earnest and hasty heaping up of speeches be made by way of recapitulation, which commonly is in the end of every long tale and Oratio, because the speaker seems to make a collection of all the former material points, to bind them as it were in a bundle and lay them forth to enforce the cause. Putterham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 198.

recapitulative (rē-kā-pit'ū-lā-tiv), a. [< recapitulate + -ive.] Of or pertaining to recapitulation; resulting from or characterized by recapitulation; giving a summary of the chief parts or points.

It has been shown that these [rudimentary structures] are the last recapitulative remnant of an independent series of structures developed outside the spore in the fern. Nature, xlii, 316.

recapitulator (rē-kā-pit'ū-lā-tor), n. [< recapitulate + -or.] One who recapitulates.

recapitulatory (rē-kā-pit'ū-lā-tō-ri), a. [< recapitulate + -ory.] Of the nature of or containing recapitulation.

This law is comprehensive and recapitulatory (as it were) of the rest concerning our neighbour, prescribing universal justice toward him. Barrow, Expos. of the Decalogue.

recaption (rē-kāp'shon), n. [< re- + caption.] The act of retaking; reprisal; in law, the retaking, without force or violence, of one's own goods, chattels, wife, or children from one who has taken them and wrongfully detains them. Also called reprisal.—Writ of recaption, a writ to recover property taken by a second distress pending a replevin for a former distress for the same rent or service.

recapture (rē-kāp'tūr), v. t. [< re- + capture, v.] To capture back or again; retake, particularly a prize which had been previously taken.

recarburization (rē-kār'bū-rī-zā'shon), n. [< recarburize + -ation.] The adding of carbon to take the place of that removed.

recarburize (rē-kār'bū-rīz), v. t. [< re- + carburize.] To restore to (a metal) the carbon previously removed, especially in any metallurgical operation connected with the manufacture of iron or steel.

recarnify (rē-kār'ni-fi), v. t. [< re- + carnify.] To convert again into flesh.

Looking upon them [a herd of kine] quietly grazing up and down, I fell to consider that the flesh which is daily dish'd upon our Tables is but concocted Grass, which is recarnified in our Stomachs and transmuted to another flesh. Hovell, Letters, ii, 50.

recarriage (rē-kār'āj), n. [< re- + carriage.] A carrying back or again; repeated carriage.

Another thing there is in our markets worthy to be looked unto, and that is the recarriage of graine from the same into lofts and cellars.
Harrison, Descrip. of Eng., ii, 18 (Hollinshed's Chron., i).

recarry (rē-kār'i), v. t. [< re- + carry.] To carry back, as in returning; carry again or in a reversed direction.

When the Turks besieged Malta or Rhodes, . . . pigeons are then related to carry and recarry letters.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, i, 1.

recast (rē-kāst'), v. t. [< re- + cast.] 1. To throw again.

In the midst of their running race they would cast and recast themselves from one to another horse.
Florio, tr. of Montaigne, p. 155.

2. To cast or found again; as, to recast cannon.—3. To cast or form anew; remodel; remold; as, to recast a poem.

Your men of close application, though taking their terms from the common language, find themselves under a necessity of recasting them in a mould of their own.
A. Tucker, Light of Nature, i, l. 6.

Not painlessly doth God recast
And mould anew the nation.
Whittier, "Ein Feste Burg ist unser Gott"

4. To cover anew with plaster: said of an old wall or building.—5. To compute anew; recalculate; as, to recast an account.

recast (rē-kāst'), n. [< recast, v.] A fresh molding, arrangement, or modification, as of a work of art, a writing, etc.

Popular feeling called for a diaskéuē, or thorough recast. De Quinicy, Homer, iii.

recchelest, a. A Middle English form of reckless.

recede (rē-sēd'), v. i.; pret. and pp. receded, ppr. receding. [< OF. receder, F. receder = It. recedere, < L. recedere, go back, withdraw, retreat, < re-, back, + cedere, go: see cede.] 1. To move back; retreat; withdraw; fall away.

The world receded from her rising view,
When heaven approach'd as earthly things withdrew.
Crabbe, Works, iv, 186.

2. To withdraw an affirmation, a belief, a demand, or the like; turn back or aside.

It is plain that the more you recede from your grounds, the weaker do you conclude.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii, 369.

3. To have a backward inclination, slope, or tendency: as, a receding coast-line; a receding chin. = Syn. 1. To retire, retrograde, give way. See retreat.

recede (rē-sēd'), v. t. [< re- + cede.] To cede back; grant or yield to a former possessor: as, to recede conquered territory.

recedence (rē-sēd'ens), n. [< recede + -ence.] Same as recession. [Rare.]

The beaded brown kelp deepens to bronze in . . . the wet, rich, pulpy recedence of the ebb.

Harper's Mag., LXXII, 94.

receipt (rē-sēt'), n. [Formerly also recet (the p being inserted in imitation of the L. original, and the proper spelling being recet, like conceit, deceit); (a) < ME. recet, recet, recete, recete, recete, recete, < AF. receite, OF. recete, recete, recete, recete, F. receite = Pr. recepta = Sp. recepta = Pg. recepta = It. ricetta, f., receipt, recipe, < ML. recepta, f., receipt, recipe, money received, a treasury, a right of pasture, lit. (sc. res, a thing) 'a thing received', fem. of L. receptus, pp. of recipere, receive; (b) in defs. 5 and 6, also reset (see reset), < ME. recet, recet, recet, recet, recet, recet, < OF. recet, recet, recet, recet, recet, recet, etc., = Sp. recepto = It. ricetto, m., a retreat, refuge, abode, asylum (see recheat), < L. receptus, m., a receiving, place of retreat, refuge, < recipere, pp. receptus, receive: see recipere. Cf. reset and recheat, doublets of receipt; cf. also receipt.] 1. A thing received; that which is received by transfer; the amount or quantity of what is received from other hands: as, the receipts of cotton at a port.

Three parts of that receipt I had for Calais Disbursed I duly to his highness' soldiers.
Shak., Rich. II., i, 1, 126.

He wintered for the second time in Dublin; where his own pieces, and Macklin's "Love-a-la-Mode," brought great receipts to Crow-Street theatre.
W. Cooke, Memoirs of S. Foote, i, 51.

2. The act or state of receiving by transfer or transmission; a taking of that which is delivered or passed over; a getting or obtaining: as, the receipt of money or of a letter; he is in the receipt of a good income.

Christ in us is that receipt of the same medicine whereby we are every one particularly cured.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v, 55.

Villain, thou did'st deny the gold's receipt.
Shak., C. of E., ii, 2, 17.

3. A written acknowledgment of having received something specified, with date, source, signature, and such other particulars as the case requires. A receipt may be for something received as a trust or a purchase, or for money or other valuable thing taken either in part or in full payment of a debt. At common law a mere unsealed receipt, though expressed to be in full for a debt, does not by its own force operate to discharge the debt if the payment in fact be of a part only. A receipt is not deemed a contract within the rule that a written contract cannot be varied by oral evidence.

4. A formula or prescription for the making of something, or the production of some effect; a statement of that which is to be taken or done for some purpose: distinguished from recipe by the common restriction of that word to medical or related uses: as, a receipt for a pudding; a receipt for gaining popularity.

Come, sir, the sight of Golde
Is the most sweet recet for melancholy,
And will relieve your spirits.
Heywood, Woman Killed with Kindness (Works, ed. Pearson, 1874, ii, 107).

We have the receipt of fern-seed, we walk invisible.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii, 1, 96.

No Receipt can Human-kind relieve,
Doom'd to decrepit Age without Reprieve.
Congreve, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love.

5. Reception; admittance; a granting of entrance or admission.

He wayted hym aboute, & wyldc hit hym thoht,
A seze no synne of resette.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), i, 2164.
Ther [in heaven] entrec non to take reest,
That bereg any spot.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), l, 1066.
Come, cave, become my grave; come, death, and lend Receipt to me within thy bosom dark.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

6. A place for the reception of persons or things; a place where anything is received or taken in; a station or a receptacle for lodging.

Men han made a litylle Receyt, besyde a Pylere of that Chirche, for to receyve the Ofringys of Pilgrymes.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 112.

Go forth, tary we not behynd,
Vnto som recet nye the wodes lynde,
Wher we mow thys tym receyved to be.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), i, 159.

He saw Levi . . . sitting at the receipt of custom [place of toll, R. V.]. Mark ii, 14.

Memory, the warder of the brain,
Shall be a fume, and the receipt of reason
A limbeck only. Shak., Macbeth, l, 7, 66.

7. Power of receiving or taking in; extent of accommodation; fitness for holding or containing.

The foresaid ships were of an huge and incredible capacity and receipt.
Hakluyt's Voyages, l, 593.

In things of great receipt with ease we prove Among a number one is reckon'd none.
Shak., Sonnets, cxxvii.

Such be the capacity and receipt of the mind of man.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i, 9.

Accountable receipt. See accountable. = Syn. Recipe, etc. See reception.

receipt (rē-sēt'), v. t. [Also in technical legal use reset (see reset); < ME. recetten, reseten; from the noun: see receipt, n.] 1. To receive; harbor.

And ge hit make, and that me greves,
A den to reset inne theves.
Cumor Mundt, MS. Coll. Trin. Cantab., f. 91. (Hallivell.)

My lorde hym recetted in hys castell
For the dewkys dethe oton.
MS. Cantab., ff. ii, 38, f. 220. (Hallivell.)

2. To give a receipt for; acknowledge in writing the payment of: as, to receipt a bill (usually by writing upon the bill "Received payment" and the creditor's signature).

receiptable (rē-sēt'ā-bl), a. [< receipt + -able.] Capable of being receipted; for which a receipt may be granted.

receipt-book (rē-sēt'būk), n. A book containing receipts, in either sense 3 or sense 4.

receiptment (rē-sēt'ment), n. [< receipt + -ment.] In old Eng. law, the receiving or harboring of a felon with knowledge on the part of the harbinger of the commission of a felony. Burrill.

receiptor (rē-sēt'tor), n. [< receipt + -or.] One who gives a receipt; specifically, in law, a person to whom property is bailed by an officer, who has attached it upon mesne process, to answer to the exigency of the writ and satisfy the judgment, the obligation of the receiptor being to have it forthcoming on demand. Wharton.

recet, n. A former spelling of receipt (and of the ultimately identical recheat).

receivability (rē-sē-va-bil'i-ti), n. [< receivable + -ity (see -ibility).] The quality of being receivable. Imp. Dict.

receivable (rē-sē-va-bl), a. [< F. recevable (cf. Pg. recebível = It. riceverole), receivable; as receive + -able.] 1. Capable of being received; fit for reception or acceptance.—2. Awaiting receipt of payment; that is to be paid: as, bills receivable. See bill payable, bill receivable, under bill.

receivableness (rē-sē-va-bl-nes), n. The character of being receivable; capability of being received.

receive (rē-sēv'), v.; pret. and pp. received, ppr. receiving. [Early mod. E. also receere, receure; < ME. receiven, receyven, reseyven, reseygen, reseyven, resayven, resaren, < OF. recever, recevoir, receivre, F. recevoir = Pr. recebre = Sp. recibir = Pg. receber = It. ricevere, receive, < L. recipere, pp. receptus, take back, get back, regain, recover, take to oneself, admit, accept, receive, take in, assume, allow, etc., < re-, back, + capere, take: see capacious. Cf. conceive, deceive, perceive. Hence ult. (from the L. verb) receipt, receptacle, recipe, etc.] 1. trans. 1. To take from a source or agency of transmission; get by transfer: as, to receive money or a letter; to receive gifts.

They be like Gray Friars, that will not be seen to receive bribes themselves, but have others to receive for them.

Latimer, 5th Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

Son, remember that thou in thy lifetime receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things.

Luke xvi. 25.

2. To take or get from a primary source: as, to receive favors or a good education; to receive an impression, a wound, or a shock.

Receives not thy nose court-odour from me?

Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 757.

The idea of solidity we receive by our touch. Locke.

No Norman or Breton ever saw a Mussulman, except to give and receive blows on some Syrian field of battle.

Macaulay, Von Ranke's Hist. Popes.

3. To take notice of on coming or appearing; greet the advent of; salute or treat upon approach: as, to receive an actor with applause; to receive news joyfully.

To Westmynstur the kyng be water did glide, Worshypfully resaygid with procession in frett, Resaygid with reverence, his dewte not denyce.

M.S. Bibl. Reg. 17 D. xv. (Hallivell.)

My father was received with open arms by all his old friends.

Lady Holland, Sydney Smith, vi.

4. To take or consider favorably; admit as credible, worthy, acceptable, etc.; give admission or recognition to: as, to receive a person into one's friendship; a received authority.

What he hath seen and heard, that he testifieth; and no man receiveth his testimony.

John iii. 32.

He is a Gentleman so receiv'd, so courted, and so trusted.

Steele, Tender Husband, i. 1.

Every person who should now leave received opinions . . . might be regarded as a chimerical projector.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 4.

5. To admit for intercourse or entertainment; grant audience or welcome to; give a friendly reception to: as, to receive an ambassador or guests.

The quen with hire companie com him a-gens, & resaygid as reali as swiche rinkes ouzt.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), i. 3039.

It was so fre that Men received there alle maniere of Fugityves of other places for here evyl Dedis.

Manderile, Travels, p. 66.

They kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold. Acts xxviii. 2.

6. To take in or on; give entrance to; hold; contain; have capacity for: as, a box to receive contributions.

The brasen altar that was before the Lord was too little to receive the burnt offerings.

1 Ki. viii. 64.

This cave, fashion'd
By provident Nature in this solid rock
To be a den for beasts, alone receives me.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, iv. 1.

7. To perceive; comprehend; take into the mind.

To be received plain, I'll speak more gross.

Shak., M. for M., II. 4. 82.

8. In law: (a) To take by transfer in a criminal manner; accept the custody or possession of from a known thief: as, to receive stolen goods.

You must restore all stolln goods you receiv'd.

Fletcher (and another), Love's Cure, v. 2.

(b) To admit as pertinent; take into consideration; permit the reception of: as, the court refused to receive the evidence, and ordered it to be stricken out.—To receive the canvas. See canvas.—To receive the cof. See cof.—Syn. 1 and 2. Receive, Take, Accept. These words are in the order of strength in regard to the willingness with which the thing in question is received, etc., but none of them is warm. One may receive a letter, a challenge to a duel, a remittance, detriment, or a wound; the word thus may be wholly neuter. One may take cold, but, more often, take that which he might refuse, as a present, a bribe, offense, a pinch of snuff, or an orange. One may accept one's fate, but even then the word means a mental consent, a movement of mind; more often it means to receive with some willingness, as to accept a proposition, an invitation, or an offer. An offer, etc., may be received and not accepted.

II. intrans. 1. To be a receiver or recipient; come into custody or possession of something by transfer.

Every one shall receive of thy words. Deut. xxxiii. 3.

Freely ye have received, freely give. Mat. x. 8.

2. To give, or take part in holding, a reception; greet and entertain visitors, especially at certain fixed times.

As this name was called the person presented advanced, bowed first to the prince and then separately to the two members of the royal family who were receiving with him.

T. C. Crauford, English Life, p. 38.

received (rē-sēv'd'), a. In entom., projecting between other parts.—Received scutellum, a scutellum which lies between the bases of the elytra, as in most beetles.

receivedness (rē-sē'ved-nes), n. The state of being received; general allowance or belief.

Others will, upon account of the receivedness of this opinion, think it rather worth to be examined, than acquiesced in. Boyle.

receiver (rē-sē'vēr), n. [Early mod. E. also recciver, reccaver; < ME. resaver, reccycour, < OF. receveur, reccaveur, F. receveur, < recevoir, receive: see receive.] 1. One who or that which receives, in any general sense; a recipient; a receptacle; a taker or container of anything transmitted: as, a receiver of taxes; a receiver for odds and ends.

We are receivers through grace and mercy, authors through merit and desert we are not, of our own salvation. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v., App. 1.

But in this thankless World the Givers

Are envy'd ev'n by the Receivers.

Cowley, Pindaric Odes, l. 11.

This invention covers a combined grass receiver and dumper to catch and carry the grass while the lawn mower is being operated.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LXII. 364.

2. An officer appointed to receive public money; a treasurer; specifically, a person appointed by a court of equity or other judicial tribunal to take, pending litigation, the custody and management or disposal of property in controversy, or to receive the rents and profits of land or the produce of other property.—3. One who, for purposes of profit or concealment, takes stolen goods from a thief, knowing them to be stolen, thus making himself a party to the crime.

Were there noe receivers, there would be noe thieves.

Spenser, State of Ireland.

4. In chem.: (a) A vessel for receiving and containing the product of distillation. (b) A vessel for receiving and containing gases.—5. The glass vessel placed on the plate of an air-pump, in order to be exhausted of air: so named because it is the recipient of those things on which experiments are made. See air-pump.—6. The receiving magnet of an electric telegraph, the receiving apparatus of a telephone, or the like.—Exhausted receiver. See exhaust.—Florentine receiver. See Florentine.—Knitting-needle receiver, an apparatus consisting of a magnetizing coil with a knitting-needle in its axis, used by Reis as a telephonic receiver. The action of this receiver depends on Page's discovery that an iron bar gives a sharp click when magnetized; the rapid succession of clicks in the receiver, corresponding to the successive make-and-breaks of the Reis transmitter, reproduces the sound.—Mail-bag receiver and discharger. See mail-catcher.—Receiver and manager. See manager, 4.—Receiver of the fines, formerly, in England, an officer who received the money of all such as compounded with the crown on original writs sued out of Chancery.—Receiver's certificates, evidences of debt, issued by a receiver of property in litigation, for the discharge of obligations incurred in the management of it, to be redeemed out of its proceeds when finally disposed of or restored to its owners. Such certificates may be authorized by the proper court, and made a lien upon the property, when the expenses connected with it cannot be otherwise met without detriment.—Receivers of wreck, officers appointed by the British Board of Trade for the preservation of wreck, etc., for the benefit of the shipping interests. They were formerly called receivers of wrecks of admiralty.

receiver-general (rē-sē'vēr-jen'ē-rāl'), n. In some countries or states, an officer who receives the public revenues in general or in a particular territory: in some of the United States, an additional title of the State treasurer.

receivership (rē-sē'vēr-ship), n. [receiver + -ship.] The office of a receiver of public money, or of money or other property in litigation; the collection and care of funds awaiting final distribution by legal process.

receiving (rē-sē'ving), n. [ME. reccyving; verbal n. of receive, v.] The act of one who receives, in any sense of that verb.—Receiving apparatus or instrument, in teleg., any appliance used at a telegraph-station, by the action of which the signals transmitted from another station are rendered perceptible to any of the senses of the receiving operator.—Receiving tubes of the kidney, the straight tubules of the kidney.

receiving-house (rē-sē'ving-hous), n. A house where letters or parcels are received for transmission; a place of deposit for things to be forwarded; a depot. [Great Britain.]

receiving-magnet (rē-sē'ving-mag'net), n. See magnet.

receiving-office (rē-sē'ving-of'is), n. In Great Britain, a branch post-office where letters, parcels, etc., may be posted, but from which no delivery is made to persons addressed.

receiving-ship (rē-sē'ving-ship), n. A ship stationed permanently in a harbor to receive recruits for the navy until they can be transferred to a cruising ship.

receiving-tomb (rē-sē'ving-tōm), n. Same as receiving-vault.

receiving-vault (rē-sē'ving-vālt), n. A building or other structure in which the bodies of the dead may be placed temporarily when it is impossible or inconvenient to inter them in the usual manner.

recency (rē'sen-si), n. [ML. recentia, < L. recen(t)-s, new, fresh: see recent.] The state or quality of being recent; recentness; newness; lateness; freshness.

So also a scirrhus in its recency, whilst it is in its augment, requirith milder applications than the confirmed or inveterate one. Wieman, Surgery, i. 19.

An impression of recency is given which some minds are clearly unable to shake off.

Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 198.

recense (rē'sens'), v. t.; pret. and pp. recensed, ppr. recensing. [OF. recenser, number, count, peruse, muster, review, F. recenser, number, take the census of, = Pr. recensar = Pg. recensar, examine, survey, < L. recensere, recount, examine closely, review, muster, revise, etc., < re-, again, + censere, think, deem, judge: see census.] To review; revise. [Rare.]

Sixtus and Clemens, at a vast expence, had an assembly of learned divines to recense and adjust the Latin Vulgate. Bentley.

recension (rē-sen'shon), n. [F. recension, < L. recensio(n)-, an enumeration, reviewing, recension, < recensere, review: see recense.] 1. Review; examination; enumeration. [Obsolete or rare.]

In this recension of monthly flowers, it is to be understood for the whole period that any flower continues, from its first appearing to its final withering.

Evelyn, Calendarium Hortense, January.

2. A critical or methodical revision, as of the text of a book or document; alteration of a text according to some authority, standard, or principle; a reëditing or systematic revision.

He who . . . spends nine years in the elaboration and recension of his book . . . will find that he comes too late.

G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xxi.

3. A text established by critical or systematic revision; an edited version.

The genuine ballad-book thus published was so successful that in less than ten years three editions or recensions of it appeared.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., i. 115.

Using the ancient versions in this way, we can recover a recension (or recensions) differing more or less widely from that represented by the traditional Hebrew text.

Contemporary Rev., L. 595.

4. A critical examination, as of a book; a review; a critique.

He was . . . bitterly convinced that his old acquaintance Carr had been the writer of that deprecatory recension which was kept locked in a small drawer of Mr. Casaubon's desk, and also in a small dark closet of his verbal memory.

George Eliot, Middlemarch, xxi.

recensionist (rē-sen'shon-ist), n. [recension + -ist.] One who reviews or revises, as the text of an ancient author; an editor.

recent (rē'sent), a. [OF. recent, F. recent = Pr. recent = Sp. reciente = Pg. It. recente, < L. recen(t)-s, fresh, new; (a) in one view, < re- + -cen(t)-s, supposed to be allied to W. *cyn*t, first, earliest, Skt. kanyāns, smaller, kanyishā, smallest (cf. Russ. po-chinatti, begin); (b) in another view, orig. ppr. from a root rec* = Zend √ rag, come (cf. recens a victoria, 'just coming from a victory'; Rhodo recentis Romani venerunt, 'they came to Rome just from Rhodes,' etc.: see def. 5).] 1. Of or pertaining to time just before the present; not long past in occurrence or existence; lately happening or being; newly appearing, done, or made: as, recent events; recent importations; recent memories; recent news; a recent speech.—2. Of modern date, absolutely or relatively; not of primitive or remote origin; belonging to or occurring in times not far removed.—3. Still fresh in quality or existence; not old or degenerate; unchanged by time; said of things liable to rapid change, as newly gathered plants or specimens in natural history.

The odour [of essential oils] is seldom as pleasant as that of the recent plant. Ure, Dict., III. 45d.

4. In geol., of or pertaining to the epoch regarded as the present from a geological point of view. Strata so called contain few, if any, fossils belonging to extinct species. The alluvial formations in the valleys are generally of recent formation, as well as most of the superficial detrital material. The deposits which belong to the Post-tertiary, or which are more recent than the Tertiary, are with difficulty classified, except for purposes of local geology. In glaciated regions, the traces of the former presence of ice adds variety to the phenomena, and complexity to the classification, of the various forms of detrital material. The existence of very ancient remains and works of man is a further element of interest in the geology of the recent formations.

5. Lately come; not long removed or separated. [Poetical and rare.]

Shall I not think that, with disorder'd charms,
All heav'n beholds me recent from thy arms?
Pope, Iliad, xiv. 382.

Amphitryon recent from the nother sphere.
Leiris, tr. of Statius's Thebaid, viii.

= Syn. 1. Late, Fresh, etc. See new.
recently (rē'sent-li), adv. At a recent time; newly; lately; freshly; not long since: as, advices recently received; a town recently built or repaired; an isle recently discovered.

recentness (rē'sent-nes), n. The state or quality of being recent; newness; freshness; recency; lateness of origin or occurrence: as, the recentness of alluvial land; the recentness of news or of events.

recept (rē'sept), n. [< L. receptum, neut. of receptus, pp. of recipere, receive: see receive. Cf. receipt.] That which is received; especially, something taken into the mind from an external source; an idea derived from observation. [Recent.]

The bridge between recept and concept is equally impassable as that between percept and concept.

Athenæum, No. 3193, p. 12.

receptacle (rē-sep'tā-kl), formerly also res'ep-tā-kl, n. [< OF. receptacle, F. réceptacle = Pr. receptacle = Sp. receptáculo = Pg. receptáculo = It. ricettacolo, recettaculo, < L. receptaculum, a receptacle, place to receive or store things in, < recipere, pp. receptus, receive, hold, contain: see receive.] 1. That which receives or holds anything for rest or deposit; a storing-place; a repository; a container; any space, open or closed, that serves for reception and keeping.

As in a vault, an ancient receptacle,
Where, for these many hundred years, the bones
Of all my buried ancestors are pack'd.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 3. 39.

Least his neighbor's country might be an harbrough or receptacle of his foes and adulteraries.
Hall, Edw. III., an. 10.

2. In bot.: (a) In a single flower, the more or less enlarged and peculiarly developed apex of the peduncle or pedicel, upon which all the organs of the flower are directly or indirectly Various Forms of Receptacle (r).

borne: the Linnæan and usual name: same as the more specific and proper torus of De Candolle and the thalamus of Tournefort. The receptacle varies in size and texture. In form it may be convex or conical (as most often), elongated, as in Magnolia, or concave, as in the rose; it may develop into a stipe, gynobase, disk, carpophore, or hypanthium (see these words), or it may greatly enlarge in fruit, as in the strawberry. As belonging to a single flower, sometimes termed proper receptacle. (b) In an inflorescence, the axis or rachis of a head or other short dense cluster; most often, the expanded disk-like summit of the peduncle in Compositæ (dandelion, etc.) on which are borne the florets of the head, surrounded by an involucre of bracts; a clinanthium. In contrast with the above, sometimes called common receptacle. (c) In an ovary, same as placenta. 4. (d) Among cryptogams—(1) In the vascular class, the placenta. (2) In Marchantiaceæ, one of the umbrella-like branches of the thallus, upon which the reproductive organs are borne. (3) In Fucaceæ, a part of the thallus in which conceptacles (see conceptacle) are congregated. They are either terminal portions of branches or parts sustained above water by air-bladders. (4) In Fungi, sometimes same as stroma; in Ascomycetes, same as pycnidium. 1 (also the stalk of a discocarp); in Phalloidæ, the inner part of the sporophore, supporting the gleba. (5) In lichens, the cup containing the soredia. The term has some other analogous applications.—3. In zool. and anat., a part or an organ which receives and contains or detains a secretion; a receptaculum: as, the gall-bladder is the receptacle of the bile.

receptacula, n. Plural of receptaculum.

receptacular (rē-sep-tak'ū-lār), a. [= F. réceptaculaire, < L. receptaculum, a receptacle: see receptacle.] 1. In bot., of or pertaining to a receptacle.—2. In zool. and anat., serving as a receptacle or reservoir; pertaining to a receptaculum.

receptaculite (rē-sep-tak'ū-lit), n. [< NL. Receptaculites.] A fossil of the genus Receptaculites.

Receptaculites (rē-sep-tak'ū-lit'ēz), n. [NL. (DeFrance, 1827), < L. receptaculum, a receptacle (see receptacle), + -ites (see -ite2).] The typical genus of Receptaculitidæ.

Receptaculitidæ (rē-sep-tak'ū-lit'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Receptaculites + -idæ.] A family of fossil organisms, typified by the genus Receptaculites, of a very doubtful nature. They have been referred by many to the silicious sponges; but the skeleton was originally calcareous, and the silicious examples are the result of fossilization. They are of a spherical or pyriform shape, with a central closed cavity and an upper and lower pole, and the wall is composed of pillar-like spicules at right angles to the surface and expanded at their outer ends into rhomboidal summit-plates forming a mosaic-like outer layer. The species lived in the seas of the Silurian and Devonian epochs. Also called Receptaculidæ.

receptaculum (rē-sep-tak'ū-lum), n.; pl. receptacula (-lā). [L.: see receptacle.] In zool., anat., and bot., a receptacle; a reservoir of fluid; a saccular or vesicular organ to receive and retain a fluid.—Receptaculum chyl., a dilatation of the thoracic duct, situated upon the body of the first or second lumbar vertebra, into which the lymphatics of the lower extremities and the lacteals of the intestine discharge. Also called receptaculum Pecqueti, cistern or reservoir of Pecquet, lacteal sac.—Receptaculum ganglii petrosi, a depression in the lower border of the petrous portion of the temporal bone, for the lodgment of the petrous ganglion.—Receptaculum Pecqueti. Same as receptaculum chyl.—Receptaculum seminis, in zool., a spermatheca in the female; any kind of seminal vesicle which may receive semen from the male and store it up. See cut under Nematoidæ.

receptary (res'ep-tā-ri), a. and n. [= *OF. receptaire = Sp. recetario = It. ricettario, a book of prescriptions or receipts, < ML. receptarius, adj. (as a noun receptarius, m., a receiver, collector), < recepta, a receipt, prescription: see receipt.] 1. Commonly received or accepted but not proved; uncertain. [Rare.]

Baptista Porta, in whose works, although there be contained many excellent things, and verified upon his own experience, yet are there many also receptary and such as will not endure the test. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 8.

II. n. 1. A collection of receipts.

Receptaire [F.], a receptary: a note of physical receipts. Colgrave.

2. A thing commonly received but not proved; an assumption; a postulate. [Rare.]

Nor can they which behold the present state of things, and controversy of points so long received in divinity, condemn our sober enquiries in the doubtful apertinencies of arts and receptaries of philosophy.

Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., to the Reader.

receptibility (rē-sep-ti-bil'i-ti), n. [< F. réceptibilité = Pg. receptibilidade = It. recettibilità; as receptible + -ity (see -ility).] 1. The quality of being receptive; receptableness.

The peripatetic matter is a pure unacted power, and this concolted vacuum a mere receptibility.

Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, xvi.

2t. Something that may be received or believed in. Imp. Dict.

receptible (rē-sep'ti-bl), a. [< OF. receptible = Pg. receptível = It. recettibile, < LL. receptibilis, that may be acquired again, recoverable, < L. recipere, pp. receptus, acquire, recover, receive: see receive.] Capable of or suited for being received; receivable. Imp. Dict.

Pretending so commanded, to consult
About the great reception of their King, Thither to come. Milton, P. L., v. 769.

5t. A retaking; recapture; recovery.

He was right glad of the French King's reception of those Townes from Maximilian. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 44.

6t. Power or capacity of receiving; receptivity; susceptibility.

That were to extend
His sentence beyond dust and nature's law,
By which all causes else, according still
To the reception of their matter, act,
Not to the extent of their own sphere.
Milton, P. L., x. 807.

7. In astrol., the interchange of the dignities of two planets, owing to each being in the other's house or exaltation.—Syn. 1 and 3. Reception, Receipt, Recipe. Reception is used of a person or a thing: as, he got a very gracious reception; receipt of a thing: as, the reception or, better, the receipt of news or a letter; recipe, in medicine or, latterly, in cooking. We say a receipt or recipe for making a cake, a recipe for money paid.

reception-room (rē-sep'shon-rūm), n. A room for the reception of visitors.

receptive (rē-sep'tiv), a. [*< OF. receptif = Sp. Pg. receptivo = It. ricettivo, recettivo = G. receptiv, < NL. receptivus, < L. recipere, pp. receptus, receive: see receive.] Having the quality of or capacity for receiving, admitting, or taking in; able to hold or contain.

The soul being in this sort, as it is active, perfected by love of that infinite good, shall, as it is receptive, be also perfected with those supernatural passions of joy, peace, and delight. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, i. 11.

To acquire knowledge is to receive an object within the sphere of our consciousness. The acquisitive faculty may therefore, also, be called a receptive faculty.

Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xxi.

I am somehow receptive of the great soul. . . . More and more the surges of everlasting nature enter into me. Emerson, Essays, 1st ser., p. 208.

The outer layer of rods and cones (baccillary) is undoubtedly the true receptive layer. Le Conte, Sight, p. 58.

The act of receding, or going back or away; withdrawal; retirement; recession. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Men . . . have made too untimely a departure and too remote a recess from particulars.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 164.

Every day of sin, and every criminal act, is a degree of recess from the possibilities of heaven.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 182.

Pliny hath an odd and remarkable passage concerning the death of men and animals upon the recess or ebb of the sea.

Sir T. Browne, To a Friend.

The access of frost in the autumn, and its recess in the spring, do not seem to depend merely on the degree of cold.

Jefferson, Notes on Virginia (1787), p. 132.

2. A state of being withdrawn or retired; seclusion; privacy.

In these are faire parks or gardens call'd villas, being only places of recess and pleasure at some distance from the streets, yet within the walls.

Evelyn, Diary, May 6, 1645.

Good verse recess and solitude requires.

Dryden.

3. A time of withdrawal or retirement; an interval of release from occupation; specifically, a period of relief from attendance, as of a school, a jury, a legislative body, or other assembly; a temporary dismissal.

Before the Revolution the sessions of Parliament were short and the recesses long.

Macaulay, Sir William Temple.

It was recess as I passed by, and forty or fifty boys were creating such a hubbub in the school-yard.

The Century, XXVIII. 12.

4. A place of retirement or seclusion; a remote or secret spot or situation; a nook; hence, a hidden or abstruse part of anything: as, the recesses of a forest; the recesses of philosophy.

Departure from this happy place, our sweet

Recess. Milton, P. L., xi. 304.

I went to Dorking to see Mr. Charles Howard's amphitheatre, garden, or solitary recess, environed by a hill.

Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 1, 1655.

Every man who pretends to be a scholar or a gentleman should . . . acquaint himself with a superficial scheme of all the sciences, . . . yet there is no necessity for every man of learning to enter into their difficulties and deep recesses.

Watts, Improvement of Mind, I. xx. § 10.

The pair

Frequent the still recesses of the realm

Of Hela, and hold converse undisturb'd.

M. Arnold, Balder Dead.

Decay of Christian Piety.

recipomotor (rē-sip'i-ō-mō'tor), a. [Irreg. < L. recipere, receive, + motor, mover.] Receiving a motor impulse or stimulus; afferent, as a nerve, in an ordinary sense: correlated with liberomotor and dirigomotor. See motor.

Each afferent nerve is a recipio-motor agent.

H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 18.

reciprocal (rē-sip'rō-kal), a. and n. [*< NL. as if *reciprocatus, < L. reciprocus, returning, alternating, reciprocal (> It. Pg. reciproco = Sp. reciproco = OF. reciproque, > obs. E. reciprock); perhaps lit. 'moving backward and forward,' < *recus (< re-, back, + adj. formative -cus: see -ic) + procus (< pro, forward, + adj. formative -cus). Cf. reciprocous, reciprock.] I. a. 1. Moving backward and forward; alternating; reciprocating.*

The stream of Jordan, south of their going over, was not supplied with any reciprocal or refluxing tide out of the Dead Sea.

Fuller, Pisgah Sight, II. 1. 17. (Davies, under refluxous.)

Obedient to the moon, he spent his date

In course reciprocal, and had his fate

Link'd to the mutual flowing of the seas.

Milton, Second Epitaph on Hobson the Carrier.

2. Mutually exchanged or exchangeable; concerning or given or owed by each (of two or more) with regard to the other or others: as, reciprocal aid; reciprocal rights, duties, or obligations; reciprocal love or admiration.

Let our reciprocal vows be remembered.

Shak., Lear, IV. 6. 267.

The Liturgy or service . . . consisteth of the reciprocal acts between God and man.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, II. 378.

I take your gentle offer, and withal

Yield love again for love reciprocal.

Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, I. 2.

The king assured me of a reciprocal affection to the king my master, and of my particular welcome to his court.

Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Life (ed. Howells), p. 129.

The liberty of the enemy's fishermen in war has been protected by many French ordinances, and the English observed a reciprocal indulgence.

Woolsey, Introd. to Inter. Law, § 170.

There is much the same relation of reciprocal dependence between judgment and reasoning as between conception and judgment.

J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 414.

3. Having an interchangeable character or relation; mutually equivalent or correspondent; concordant; agreeing.

Knowledge and power are reciprocal.

Bacon, Physical Fables, x., Expl., note.

Sometimes a universal affirming may be converted saving the quantity, to wit when consisting of reciprocal terms: as, every man is a rational animal, and therefore every rational animal is a man.

Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman, I. 32.

He [the king] must guide the vast and complicated machine of government, to the reciprocal advantage of all his dominions.

A. Hamilton, Works, II. 56.

Thence came her friends of either sex, and all

With whom she lived on terms reciprocal.

Crabbe, Works, V. 51.

Reciprocal consecution. See consecution. — Reciprocal cross, a reciprocal hybrid.

A reciprocal cross is a double cross between two species or varieties, one form being used in one case as the father and in the other case as the mother.

W. K. Brooks, Law of Heredity, p. 126.

Reciprocal determinant, diagrams, equation. See determinant, diagram, etc. — Reciprocal ellipsoid of expansion. See ellipsoid. — Reciprocal figures in geom., two figures of the same kind (triangles, parallelograms, prisms, pyramids, etc.) so related that two sides of the one form the extremes of an analogy of which the means are the two corresponding sides of the other. — Reciprocal functions, hybrids, matrix. See function, etc. — Reciprocal polars, two curves such that the polar of any point on either (with respect to a fixed conic) is a tangent of the other. — Reciprocal pronoun, a pronoun expressing mutual or reciprocal relation, such as Greek ἀλλήλοις (of each other, of one another). — Reciprocal proportion. See proportion. — Reciprocal quantities, in math., those quantities which, multiplied together, produce unity. — Reciprocal ratio. See ratio. — Reciprocal screws, a pair of screws so related that a wrench about one produces no twist about the other. Given any five screws, a screw reciprocal to them all can be found. — Reciprocal terms, in logic, those terms that have the same signification, and consequently are convertible and may be used for each other. = Syn. Reciprocal, Mutual.

There is a theoretical difference between these words, although it often is not important. That is mutual which is a common act on the part of both persons at the same time. Mutual is not properly applicable to physical acts or material things, as blows or gifts. Reciprocal means that one follows another, being caused by it, with emphasis upon that which is viewed as caused: as, reciprocal love or hate. See remarks under mutual as to the propriety of using mutual for common.

II. n. 1. That which is reciprocal to another thing.

No more

Ye must be made your own reciprocals

To your loved city and fair severals

Of wives and houses.

Chapman, tr. of Homer's Hymn to Apollo.

Love is ever rewarded either with the reciprocal, or with an inward or secret contempt.

Bacon, Love (ed. 1887).

2. In math., the quotient resulting from the division of unity by the quantity of which the quotient is said to be the reciprocal. Thus, the reciprocal of 4 is $\frac{1}{4}$, and conversely the reciprocal of $\frac{1}{4}$ is 4; the reciprocal of 2 is $\frac{1}{2}$, and that of $\frac{1}{2}$ is 2 ($a + x$). A fraction made by inverting the terms of another fraction is called the reciprocal of that other fraction: thus, $\frac{1}{2}$ is the reciprocal of $\frac{2}{1}$. — Polar reciprocals. Same as reciprocal polars. See I.

reciprocality (rē-sip'rō-kal'i-ti), n. [< reciprocal + -ity.] The state or character of being reciprocal.

An acknowledged reciprocality in love sanctifies every little freedom.

Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, II. 1.

reciprocally (rē-sip'rō-kal-i), adv. 1. In a reciprocal manner; with reciprocating action or effect; alternatingly; interchangeably; correspondingly.

The Aristotelians . . . believe water and air to be reciprocally transmutable.

Boyle, Works, II. 342.

Virtue and sentiment reciprocally assist each other.

Goldsmith, Cultivation of Taste.

Faults in the life breed errors in the brain,

And these reciprocally those again.

Courper, Progress of Error, I. 565.

2. In a reciprocal ratio or proportion; inversely. Thus, in bodies of the same weight the density is reciprocally as the magnitude — that is, the greater the magnitude the less in the same proportion the density, and the less the magnitude the greater in the same proportion the density. In geometry two magnitudes are said to be reciprocally proportional to two others when one of the first pair is to one of the second as the remaining one of the second is to the remaining one of the first.

reciprocalness (rē-sip'rō-kal-nes), n. The state or character of being reciprocal.

reciprocant (rē-sip'rō-kant), n. [< L. reciprocant(t)-s, ppr. of reciprocare, move back and forth: see reciprocate.] 1. The contravariant expressing the condition of tangency between the primitive quantie and an adjoint linear form. — 2. A differential invariant: a function of partial differential coefficients of n variables connected by a single relation, this function being such that, if the variables are interchanged in cyclical order, it remains unchanged except for multiplication by some nth root of unity into some power of the same root of the continued product of the first differential coefficients of one of the variables relatively to all the others.

For an example, see Schwarzian, n. — Absolute reciprocant, one whose extrinsic factor reduces to unity, so that the interchange of variables produces no change except multiplication by a root of unity. — Binary reciprocant, one having two variables. — Characteristic of a reciprocant, the root of unity with which it becomes multiplied on interchange of the variables. — Character of a reciprocant, its kind with respect to its characteristic. — Circular reciprocant, a reciprocant which, equated to zero, gives the equation of a locus which is its own inverse with respect to every point. — Degree of a reciprocant, the number of factors (differential coefficients) in that term which has the greatest number. Thus, if that term is $(D_x y)^a (D_y y)^b (D_{xy} y)^c$, the degree is $a + b + c$. — Even reciprocant, one whose characteristic is 1. — Extent of a reciprocant, the weight of the most advanced letter which it contains. — Homogeneous reciprocant, a reciprocant all the terms of which are of the same degree in the differential coefficients. — Homographic binary reciprocant, one which remains unaltered when x and y are changed respectively into $(Lx + M)/(x + N)$ and $(Py + Q)/(y + R)$, where the capitals are constants. — Integrable reciprocant, a reciprocant which, equated to zero, gives an equation which can be integrated. — Isobaric reciprocant, a reciprocant having the sum of the orders of the differential coefficients the same in all the terms. — Odd reciprocant, one whose characteristic is not 1. — Orthogonal reciprocant, one which remains unchanged by an orthogonal transformation of the variables. — Type of a reciprocant, the combination of its character, weight, degree, and extent. — Weight of a reciprocant, the sum of the orders, each diminished by two, of the factors (differential coefficients) of the term having the greatest weight. Thus, if that term is $(D_x y)^a (D_y y)^b (D_{xy} y)^c$, the weight is $-a + c + 2d$.

reciprocantive (rē-sip'rō-kant-iv), a. [< reciprocant + -ive.] Pertaining to a reciprocant.

reciprocate (rē-sip'rō-kāt), v.; pret. and pp. reciprocated, ppr. reciprocating. [< L. reciprocatus, pp. of reciprocare, move back and forth, reverse (> It. reciprocare = Sp. Pg. reciprocac = F. réciproquer, reciprocate, interchange), < reciprocus, reciprocal: see reciprocal.] I. trans.

1. To cause to move back and forth; give an alternating motion to.

The sleeve is reciprocated from a rock shaft journaled in the lower aligning ends of the main frame.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LXII. 75.

2. To give and return mutually; yield or perform each to each; interchange: as, to reciprocate favors.

For 'tis a union that bespeaks

Reciprocated duties.

Courper, Friendship, I. 48.

At night men crowd the close little caffè, where they reciprocate smoke, respiration, and animal heat.

Howells, Venetian Life, III.

3. To give or do in response; yield a return of; requite correspondingly.

It must happen, no doubt, that frank and generous women will excite love they do not reciprocate.

Margaret Fuller, Woman in 19th Cent., p. 140.

II. intrans. 1. To move backward and forward; have an alternating movement; act interchangeably; alternate.

One brawny smith the puffing bellows plies,
And draws and blows reciprocating air.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 249.

2. To act in return or response; do something equivalent or accordant: as, I did him many favors, but he did not reciprocate. [Colloq.]—

Reciprocating engine, a form of engine in which the piston and piston-rod move back and forth in a straight line, absolutely or relatively to the cylinder, as in oscillating-cylinder engines: in contradistinction to rotatory engine. See rotatory.—Reciprocating force. See force.—Reciprocating motion, in mach., a contrivance frequently employed in the transmission of power from one part of a machine to another. A rigid bar is suspended upon a center or axis, and the parts situated on each side of the axis take alternately the positions of those on the other. See cut under pitman.—Reciprocating propeller, a propeller having a paddle which has a limited stroke and returns in the same path.—Reciprocating proposition. See proposition.

reciprocation (rē-sip-rō-kā'shən), n. [< F. réciproca-tion = Sp. reciprocación = Pg. reciprocacão = It. reciprocazione. < L. reciprocatio(n)-, a going back upon itself, a returning by the same way, a retrogression, alternation, reflux, ebb, < reciprocare, pp. reciprocatus, move back and forth: see reciprocate.] 1. A going back and forth; alternation of movement.

When the bent spring is freed, when the raised weight falls, a converse series of motions must be effected, and this . . . would lead to a mere reciprocation [of force].

W. R. Grove, Cor. of Forces, p. 24.

2. The act of reciprocating; interchange of acts; a mutual giving and returning: as, the reciprocation of kindnesses.

We do therefore lie, in respect of each other, under a reciprocation of benefits.

Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, Prol.

3. In logic, the relation of two propositions each the converse of the other.—Polar reciprocation, in geom., the process of forming the polar reciprocal of a figure.

reciprocative (rē-sip-rō-kā-tiv), a. [< reciprocate + -ive.] Of a reciprocating character; giving and taking reciprocally.

Our four-handed cousins apparently credit their biped kinsmen with reciprocative tendencies.

Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 111.

reciprocatory (rē-sip-rō-kā-tō-ri), a. [< reciprocate + -ory.] Going backward and forward; alternating in direction or in action; reciprocating: opposed to rotatory.

Impart a reciprocatory motion to the carriage.

C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 457.

A rotatory movement could be combined with the reciprocatory one.

Dredge's Electric Illumination, I. 388.

reciprocity (res-i-pros'i-ti), n. [*< F. réciprocité = Sp. reciprocidad = Pg. reciprocidade = It. reciprocità, < ML. reciprocita(-)s, < L. reciprocus, reciprocal: see reciprocal.] 1. Reciprocal action or relation; free interchange; mutual responsiveness in act or effect: as, reciprocity of benefits or of feeling; reciprocity of influence.

By the Convention of 1815 a reciprocity of intercourse was established between us and Great Britain.

D. Webster, Speech, Jan. 24, 1832.

2. Equality of commercial privileges between the subjects of different governments in each other's ports, with respect to shipping or merchandise, to the extent established by treaty.

On the Continent, after the fourteenth century, a system of reciprocity was frequently established between the several towns, as for instance in 1365 at Tournay.

English Guilds (E. E. T. S.), p. cxxix.

The reciprocity stipulations in our previous treaties were thought to operate disadvantageously to American navigation in the case of the Hanse towns, especially in regard to tobacco.

E. Schuyler, Amer. Diplomacy, p. 432.

Another illustration may be found in the history of reciprocity with Canada.

G. F. Edmunds, Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 428.

3. In the Kantian philos., mutual action and reaction in the strict mechanical sense.

Reciprocity, which, as a pure conception, is but the relation of parts or species in a generic whole, becomes . . . invariable coexistence, or coexistence according to a universal rule.

E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 412.

Glance once again at reciprocity and causality. The one is a necessary to and fro; the other only a necessary fro.

J. H. Stirling, Mind, X. 65.

4. In geom., the mutual relationship between points and straight lines in a plane, or points and planes in space, etc.; duality.—Hermite's law of reciprocity (named from the French mathematician Charles Hermite, born 1822), the proposition that the number of invariants of the *n*th order in the coefficients possessed by a binary quantic of the *p*th degree is equal to the number of invariants of the order p in the coefficients possessed by a quantic of the *n*th degree.—Law of reciprocity of prime numbers. See law.—Plane bi-rational reciprocity, a one to one correspondence between the elements of a field of points and those of a field of rays.—Quadratic reciprocity. See quadratic.—Reciprocity treaty, a treaty granting equal privileges of commercial intercourse in certain specified particulars to the people of the countries concerned. The reciprocity treaty between Great Britain and the United States, existing from 1854 to 1860, provided for freedom of trade in certain commodities, chiefly raw or half-manufactured products, between the latter country and the Canadian provinces. It was abrogated on previous notice given under its terms by the United States. The United States government formed a similar treaty with that of Hawaii in 1876.—Syn. 1. Exchange, interchange, reciprocation.

reciprocity, a. [Also reciproque; < OF. reciproque, F. réciproque = Pr. reciproco = Sp. reciproco = Pg. It. reciproco. < L. reciprocus, reciprocal: see reciprocos and reciprocal.] Reciprocal.

Twixt whom and them there is this reciprocity commerce.

B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, v. 2.

reciprocous (rē-sip-rō-kōr'nus), a. [< L. reciprocicornis, having horns curved backward, < reciprocus, turning back the same way (see reciprocal), + cornu, a horn: see corn² and horn.] Having horns turned backward and then forward, as a ram. This form is characteristic of the sheep tribe, though not peculiar to it. See arietiform, and cuts under bighorn, argali, anadad, and orix.

reciprocos (rē-sip-rō-kus), a. [< L. reciprocos, turning back the same way: see reciprocal.] Reciprocal.

For the removing of which impurity the cardinal acquainted Taylor "That he had devised to make the band reciprocos and equal."

Strophe, Memorials, Hen. VIII., I. l. 5.

reciproquet, a. See reciprocal.

recision (rē-sizh'on), n. [< OF. recision, F. recision = Sp. recisión = Pg. recisión = It. recisione, < L. recisio(n)-, a cutting off, retrenchment, diminution, < recidere, pp. recisus, cut off, < re-, back, again, + cadere, cut.] 1. The act of cutting off. Colgrave.—2. Specifically, in surg., same as resection.

recital (rē-sī'tal), n. [< recite + -al.] 1. The reciting or repeating of something previously prepared; especially, an elocutionary recitation; the rhetorical delivery before an audience of a composition committed to memory: as, the recital of a poem; a dramatic recital.—2. A telling over; a narration; a relation of particulars about anything, either orally or in writing: as, the recital of evidence.

Some men . . . give us in recitals of disease

A doctor's trouble, but without the fees.

Cowper, Conversation, l. 313.

He poured out a recital of the whole misadventure.

Houells, Undiscovered Country, p. 154.

3. That which is recited; a story; a narrative: as, a harrowing recital.—4. In law: (a) That part of a deed which rehearses the circumstances inducing or leading to its execution. (b) Any incidental statement of fact in a deed or contract: as, a recital is evidence of the fact recited, as against the party making it.

—5. A musical performance or concert, vocal or instrumental, especially one given by a single performer, or a concert consisting of selections from the works of some one composer: as, a Wagner recital; a piano recital.—Syn. 2 and 3. Relation, Narrative, etc. (see account), repetition, speech, discourse.

recitation (res-i-tā'shən), n. [< OF. recitation, F. recitation = Sp. recitación = Pg. recitação = It. recitazione, < L. recitatio(n)-, a reading aloud of judicial decrees or literary works, < recitare, pp. recitatus, read aloud, recite: see recite.] 1. The act of reciting or repeating what has been committed to memory; the oral delivery of a composition without the text, especially as a public exercise or performance.

—2. The rehearsal by a pupil or student of a lesson or exercise to a teacher or other person; a meeting of a class for the purpose of being orally examined in a lesson.—3. In music: (a) Same as recitative. (b) Same as reciting-note.—Mystic recitation. See mystic.

recitationist (res-i-tā'shən-ist), n. [< recitation + -ist.] One who practises recitation; a public reciter of his own or others' compositions.

The youth who has heard this last of the recitationists deliver one of his poems will recall in future years the fire and spirit of a veteran whose heart was in his work.

Sedman, Poets of America, viii. § 3.

recitation-room (res-i-tā'shən-rōm), n. A room for college or school recitations.

recitative (res'i-tā-tēv'), a. and n. [< F. récitatif, n., < It. recitativo, n., a recitative in music;

as recite + -ative.] I. a. In music, in the style of a recitative; as if spoken.

II. n. In music: (a) A form or style of song resembling declamation—that is, in which regularity of rhythmic, melodic, and harmonic structure is reduced to the minimum. It is a union of song and speech, with the emphasis sometimes on one element and sometimes on the other, but with a careful avoidance of technical "form" in the musical sense. The division into phrases is properly governed by rhetorical reasons only. The strictly tonal and metrical qualities of a balanced melody are usually but meagerly represented. The sequence of harmonies and of tonalities is often entirely unrestricted. An unaccompanied recitative (recitativo secco) has only a few detached instrumental chords, or a basso continuo, to suggest or sketch the harmonic basis of the melody. Accompaniments of this sort have been given at different periods to different instruments, such as the harpsichord, the violoncello, or the string orchestra alone. An accompanied recitative (recitativo stromentato) has a continuous instrumental background, which occasionally becomes highly descriptive or dramatic, and may be assigned to a full orchestra. This variety of recitative passes over insensibly into the arioso and the aria parlante. The recitative was invented, in the latter part of the sixteenth century, in the course of an attempt by certain Florentine musicians to recover the dramatic declamation of the ancient Greeks. Its recognition as a legitimate style of composition opened the way for the development of the dramatic forms of the opera and the oratorio, in both of which it has always retained a prominent place. Its value in such extended forms is due to its adaptability to descriptive, explanatory, and epic matter generally, as well as to strictly dramatic utterance of every kind. It has been customary to introduce lyric arias by recitatives; but in the operatic works of the present century the formal distinction between recitative and aria has been more or less abandoned as arbitrary. The melos of Wagner is an intermediate form, capable of extension in either direction. Also recitation.

What they call Recitative in Music is only a more tunable Speaking; it is a kind of Prose in Music.

Congreve, Semele, Arg.

Ballads, in the seventeenth century, had become the delight of the whole Spanish people. . . . The blind beggar gathered alms by chanting them, and the puppet-showman gave them in recitative to explain his exhibition.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 77.

(b) A section, passage, or movement in the style described above.

recitatively (res'i-tā-tēv'li), adv. In the manner of recitative.

recitativo (rā-chē-tā-tēv'vō), n. [It., a recitative in music: see recitative.] Recitative.

She tripp'd and laugh'd, too pretty much to stand; . . . Then thus in quaint recitativo spoke.

Pope, Dunciad, iv. 52.

recite (rē-sit'), v.; pret. and pp. recited, ppr. reciting. [< OF. reciter, F. reciter = Pr. Sp. Pg. recitar = It. recitare, < L. recitare, read aloud, recite, repeat from memory, < re-, again, + citare, cite: see cite.] I. trans. 1. To repeat or say over, as something previously prepared or committed to memory; rehearse the words of; deliver orally: as, to recite the Litany; to recite a poem.

All the parties concerned were then called together: and the fedtah, or prayer of peace, used in long and dangerous journeys, was solemnly recited and assented to by them all.

Bruce, Source of the Nile, II. 504.

2. In music, to deliver in recitative.

The dialogue (in the first opera) was neither sung in measure, nor declaimed without Music, but recited in simple musical tones.

Barney, Hist. Music, IV. 18.

3. To relate the facts or particulars of; give an account or statement of; tell: as, to recite one's adventures or one's wrongs.

Till that, as comes by course, I doe recite

What fortune to the Briton Prince did lite,

Pursuing that proud Knight.

Spenser, F. Q., VI. vi. 17.

Lest the world should task you to recite

What merit lived in me. Shak., Sonnets, lxxii.

"I make," cries Charley, reciting the shield, "three merions on a field or, with an earl's coronet."

Thackeray, Virginians, xxxii.

4. To repeat or tell over in writing; set down the words or particulars of; rehearse; cite; quote.

Which booke (de Ratione Studii et de Liberis Educandis) is oft recited, and much prayed, in the fragments of Nonius, even for authoritie sake.

Ascham, The Scholemaster, II.

Incianus, the merry Greeke, reciteth a great number of them (prophecies), devised by a cozening companion, one Alexander.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 218.

The thoughts of gods let Granville's verse recite.

Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 425.

To recite one's beads. See to bid beads, under bead.—Syn. 3. Cite, Adduce, etc. (see quote). Rehearse, Reiterate, etc. (see recapitulate); enumerate, detail.

II. intrans. To make a recitation or rehearsal; rehearse or say over what has been learned: as, to recite in public or in a class.

They recite without book.

E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, II. 126.

recitet (rē-sit'), n. [< recite, v.] Recital.

All former recites or observations of long-lived races.

Sir W. Temple, Health.

reciter (rē-sī'tēr), n. [< OF. reciteur, recitator, F. récitateur = It. recitatore, < L. recitator, a reciter, < recitare, recite: see recite.] One who recites or rehearses; a narrator or declaimer, especially of what has been previously written or told.

Narrative songs were committed to memory, and delivered down from one reciter to another.

Ips. Percy, On Anc. Metrical Romances, § 1. (Latham.)

reciting-note (rē-sī'ting-nōt), n. In chanting, a note or tone on which several or many syllables are recited in monotone. In Gregorian music this tone is regularly the dominant of the mode, but in Anglican chants it may be any tone. Usually every chant contains two, or a double chant four, reciting-notes.

reck (rek), v.; pret. and pp. recked (formerly raught). [*Formerly also reck, sometimes misspelled urack; < ME. recken, rekken, assimilated rechen, later forms, with shortened vowel, of reken, assimilated rechen (pret. roughete, roughete, rozte, roughete, rohte), < AS. reccan, reccan (pret. rohte), care, reck, = OS. rökian = MLG. röken, rüken, LG. röken, rüken, rochen = OHG. ruohhan, ruochan, ruochen, MHG. ruochen (also, in comp., OHG. geruochan, MHG. geruochen, G. geruhen) = Icel. rækja, reck, regard, etc. (cf. Here, as recluse as the Turkish Spy at Paris, I am almost unknown to every body.
Goldsmit, To Rev. Thomas Contarine.

II. n. 1. A person who withdraws from the world to spend his days in seclusion and meditation; specifically, a member of a religious community who is voluntarily immured for life in a single cell. The life of a monastic recluse was a privilege accorded only to those of exceptional virtue, and only by express permission of the abbot, chapter, and bishop. In earlier monasticism, the recluse was immured in a cell, sometimes underground, and usually within the precincts of the monastery. He was to have no other apparel than that which he wore at the time of his incarceration. The doorway to the cell was walled up, and only a sufficient aperture was left for the conveyance of provisions, but so contrived as not to allow the recluse to see or be seen. Later monasticism greatly modified this rigor. 2. a. A place of seclusion; a retired or quiet situation; a hermitage, convent, or the like.

It is certain that the church of Christ is the pillar of truth, or sacred recluse and peculiar asylum of Religion.
J. Wise, The Churches' Quarrel Espoused.

recluset (rē-klōz'), v. t. [< ME. reclusen; < reclude, a.] To shut up; seclude; withdraw from intercourse.

Religious out-rydiers reclused in here cloistres.
Piers Plowman (C), v. 116.

I had a shrewd Disense hung lately upon me, proceeding, as the Physicians told me, from this long reclused Life.
Howell, Letters, ii. 29.

reclusely (rē-klōs'li), adv. In a recluse manner; in retirement or seclusion from society; as a recluse. Lee, Eccles. Gloss.

recluseness (rē-klōs'nes), n. The state of being recluse; retirement; seclusion from society.

A kind of calm recluseness is like rest to the overlabour'd man.
Feltham, On Eccles. ii. 11. (Resolves, p. 349).

reclusion (rē-klō'zhon), n. [< F. reclusion = Sp. reclusion = Pg. reclusão = It. reclusione, < ML. reclusio(n)-, < LL. recludere, pp. reclusus, shut up; see reclude and reclude.] 1. A state of retirement from the world; seclusion. Johnson. — 2. Specifically, the life or condition of a recluse or immured solitary.

reclusive (rē-klō'siv), a. [< recluse + -ive.] Affording retirement from society; recluse.

And if it sort not well, you may conceal her . . .
In some reclusite and religious life.
Shak., Much Ado, iv. 1. 244.

reclusory (rē-klō'sō-ri), n. [< pl. reclusories (-riz).] [= Sp. It. reclusorio, < ML. reclusorium, < LL. recludere, pp. reclusus, shut up, close: see reclude.] The abode or cell of a recluse.

recoct (rē-kokt'), v. t. [< L. recoctus, pp. of recoquere, cook again, < re-, again, + coquere, cook: see cook, v.] To cook over again; hence, to vamp up or renew.

Old women and men, too . . . seek, as it were, by Medea's charms, to recoct their corps, as she did Jason's, from feeble deformities to sprightly handsomeness.
Jer. Taylor (?), Artif. Handsomeness, p. 71.

recoction (rē-kok'shōn), n. [< recoct + -ion.] A second coction or preparation. Imp. Dict.

recognisable, recognise, etc. See recognizable, etc.

recognition (rek-og-nish'on), n. [< OF recognition, F. reconnaissance = It. ricognizione, ricognizione, < L. recognitio(n)-, < recognoscere, pp. recognitus, recognize, know again: see recognize.] 1. The act of recognizing; a knowing again; consciousness that a given object is identical with an object previously cognized.

Every species of fancy hath three modes: recognition of a thing as present, memory of it as past, and foresight of it as to come. N. Greig.

Sense represents phenomena empirically in perception, imagination in association, apperception in the empirical consciousness of the identity of these reproductive representations with the phenomena by which they were given therefore in recognition.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason, tr. by Müller, p. 115.

A person's recognition of a colour is in part an act of inference. J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 67.

2. A formal avowal of knowledge and approval or sanction; acknowledgment; as, the recognition of one government by another as an independent sovereignty or as a belligerent.

The lives of such saints had, at the time of their earthly memorials, solemn recognition in the church of God.
Hooker.

This Byzantine synod assumed the rank and powers of the seventh general council; yet even this title was a recognition of the six preceding assemblies.
Gibbon, Decline and Fall, xlix.

On the 4th he was received in procession at Westminster, seized the crown and sceptre of the Confessor, and was proclaimed king by the name of Edward IV. . . . From the 4th of March the legal recognition of Edward's royal character begins, and the years of his reign date.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 355.

That a man's right to the produce of his brain is equally valid with his right to the produce of his hands is a fact which has yet obtained but a very imperfect recognition.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 155.

3. Cognizance; notice taken; acceptance.

The interesting fact about Apollonius is the extensive recognition which he obtained, and the ease with which his pretensions found acceptance in the existing condition of the popular mind. Froude, Sketches, p. 103.

4. In Scots law, the recovery of lands by the proprietor when they fall to him by the fault of the vassal; or, generally, any return of the feu to the superior, by whatever ground of eviction. = Syn. 1. See recognize.

recognition (rē-kog-nish'on), n. A repeated cognition.

recognitive (rē-kog'ni-tiv), a. [< L. recognitus, pp. of recognoscere, recognize, + -ive. Cf. cognitive.] Recognizing; recognitory.

recognitor (rē-kog'ni-tor), n. [< AF. recognitor, < ML. recognitor, < L. recognitus, pp. of recognoscere, recognize: see recognize.] In lat., one of a jury impaneled on an assize; so called because they acknowledge a disseizin by their verdict. The recognitor was a witness rather than a juror in the modern sense.

The inquests by Recognitors which we hear of from the time of the Conqueror onwards—the sworn men by whose oaths Domesday was drawn up—come much more nearly [than compurgators] to our notion of Jurors, but still they are not the thing itself.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, v. 303.

recognitory (rē-kog'ni-tō-ri), a. [< L. recognitus, pp. of recognoscere, recognize, + -ory.] Pertaining to or connected with recognition.

A pun and its recognitory laugh must be co-instantaneous. Lamb, Distant Correspondents.

recognizability (rek-og-ni-zā-bil'i-ti), n. [< recognizable + -ity (see -ility).] The state of being recognizable; capacity for being recognized.

recognizable (rek'og-ni-zā-bl or rē-kog'ni-zā-bl), a. [< recognize + -able. Cf. OF. reconnoissable, F. reconnoissable.] Capable of being recognized, known, or acknowledged. Also spelled recognisable.

recognizably (rek'og-ni-zā-bli or rē-kog'ni-zā-bli), adv. So as to be recognized.

recognizance (rē-kog'ni-zāns or rē-kon'i-zāns), n. [< ME. recognisance, reconysaunce, < OF. reconnoissance, reconnoissance, reconnoissance, reconnoissance, reconnoissance, etc., F. reconnoissance (> E. reconnoissance) = Pr. reconaissance, regonoyssensa = Pg. reconhecenga = It. riconoscenza, < ML. recognoscencia, a recognizing, acknowledgment, an obligation binding one over to do some particular act, < L. recognoscen(t)-, pp. of recognoscere, recognize: see recognize. Cf. cognizance.] 1. The act of recognizing; acknowledgment of a person or thing; avowal; recognition.

The great bell that heaves
With solemn sound—and thousand others more,
That distance of recognizance bereaves,
Make pleasing music and not wild uproar.
Krass, Sonnet, "How many Bards."

2. Mark or badge of recognition; token.

She did gratify his amorous works
With that recognizance and pledge of love
Which I first gave her [a handkerchief].
Shak., Othello, v. 2. 214.

3. In law: (a) An obligation of record entered into before some court of record or magistrate duly authorized, conditioned to do some particular act, as to appear at court, to keep the peace, or pay a debt.

He was bounden in a recognysaunce
To paye twenty thousand sheild anon.
Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, l. 330.

This fellow might be in 's time a great buyer of land, with his statutes, his recognizances, his fines, his double vouchers, his recoveries. Shak., Hamlet, v. 1. 113.

(b) The verdict of a jury impaneled upon assize.—To enter into recognizances. See enter.

recognizant (rē-kog'ni-zant or rē-kon'i-zant), a. [< OF. reconnoissant, ppr. of reconnoistre, etc., recognize: see recognize.] Recognizing; perceiving.

The laird did his best to help him; but he seemed no-wise recognizant.
George MacDonald, Warlock o' Glenwarlock, xv.

recognition (rē-kog-ni-zā'shōn), n. [< recognize + -ation.] The act of recognizing.

recognize (rek'og-niz), v. [< pret. and pp. recognized, ppr. recognizing. [With accom. term. -ize (as if from recognize), after OF. reconnoistre, F. reconnoître (> E. reconnoiter) = Pr. reconnoicer, reconocer = Sp. reconocer = Pg. reconhecer = It. riconoscere, < L. recognoscere, know again, recall to mind, recognize, examine, certify, < re-, again, + cognoscere, know: see cognition. Cf. cognize.] 1. trans. 1. To know (the object) again; recall or recover the knowledge of; perceive the identity of with something formerly known or in the mind.

Then first he recogniz'd the æthereal guest;
Wonder and joy alternate fire his breast.
Fenton, in Pope's Odyssey, l. 415.

To recognize an object is to identify it with some object previously seen. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 223.

2. To avow or admit a knowledge of, with approval or sanction; acknowledge or accept formally: as, to recognize one as ambassador; to recognize a government as an independent sovereignty or as a belligerent.

He brought several of them . . . to recognize their sense of their undue procedure used by them unto him.
Bp. Fell, Life of Hammond. (Latham.)

Only that State can live in which injury to the least member is recognized as damage to the whole.
Emerson, Address, Soldiers' Monument, Concord.

Holland, immediately after the surrender of Yorktown, had recognized the independence of America, which had as yet only been recognized by France.
Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xv.

3. To indicate one's acquaintance with (a person) by a salute: as, to pass one without recognizing him.—4. To indicate appreciation of: as, to recognize merit.—5. To review; re-examine; take cognizance of anew.

However their causes speed in your tribunals, Christ will recognize them at a greater. South.

6. To acknowledge; admit or confess as an obligation or duty.

It is more to the purpose to urge that those who have so powerful an engine [as the press] in their hands should recognize their responsibility in the use of it.

H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 87.

= Syn. 2-4. Recognize, Acknowledge. The essential difference between these words lies in the difference between letting in to one's own knowledge (recognize) and letting out to other people's knowledge (acknowledge). Hence the opposite of recognize is disown or some kindred word: that of acknowledge is conceal or deny. To recognize an obligation and to acknowledge an obligation differ precisely in this way. The preacher may be able to make a man recognize, even if he cannot make him acknowledge, his need of moral improvement. See acknowledge.

II. intrans. In law, to enter an obligation of record before a proper tribunal: as, A. B. recognized in the sum of twenty dollars.

Also spelled recognise.

recognize² (rē-kog'niz), v. t. To cognize again.

By the aid of Reasoning we are guided in our search, and by it re-cognize known relations under somewhat different attendant circumstances.

G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 172.

recognizee (rē-kog-ni-zē' or rē-kon-i-zē'), n. [*< recognize*¹ + -ee.] In law, the person to whom a recognizance is made.

The recognizance is an acknowledgment of a former debt upon record, the form whereof is "that A. B. doth acknowledge to owe to our lord the king, to the plaintiff, to C. D., or the like, the sum of ten pounds". . . . In which case the king, the plaintiff, C. D., &c., is called the recognizee, "is cui cognoscitur"; as he that enters into the recognizance is called the cognitor, "is qui cognoscit."

Blackstone, Com., II. xx.

recognizer (rē-kog-ni-zēr), n. [*< recognize*¹ + -er.] Cf. recognizer.] One who recognizes.

recognizingly (rē-kog-ni-zing-li), adv. With recognition; consciously; appreciatively.

I know not if among all his "friends" he [John Wilson] has left one who feels more recognizingly what he was . . . than I.

recognizer (rē-kog-ni-zor or rē-kon-i-zor), n. [*< OF. recognisour, F. reconnaisseur; as *recognize*¹ + -or.] In law, one who enters into a recognizance.

The Examiner [Boyle] might have remembered . . . who it was that distinguished his style with "ignore" and "recognosce," and other words of that sort, which nobody has yet thought fit to follow him in.

Bentley (quoted in F. Hall's Mod. Eng., p. 118).

recoil¹ (rē-koi'), v. [Early mod. E. also recoyle, recule; < ME. recoilen, reculen, < OF. reculer, F. reculer, draw back, go back, recoil, retire, defer, drive off (= Pr. Sp. regular = Pg. recuar = It. regolare, rincolare), < ML. regularis, go backward, < L. re-, back, + culus (> F. cul), the hinder parts, posteriors; cf. Ir. Gael. cúl, the back, hinder part, = W. cil, back, a retreat.] I. intrans. 1. To draw back; go back; retreat; take a sudden backward motion after an advance.

We were with violence and rage of the sayde tempest constreyned to recoyle and turne backwardes, and to seke some haun vpon the coste of Turkey.

Sir R. Gylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 59.

Ye both forwarded be; therefore a whyle

I read you rest, and to your bowres recoyle.

Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 17.

Looking on the lines

Of my boy's face, methoughts I did recoil

Twenty-three years, and saw myself unbreech'd.

Shak., W. T., i. 2. 154.

Their manner is, when any will invade them, to allure and drawe them on by flying and recoiling (as if they were afraid).

Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 489.

His men were compelled to recoil from the dense array of German pikes.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 12.

2. To start or draw back, as from anything repulsive, distressing, alarming, or the like; shrink.

First Fear his hand, its skill to try,

Amid the chords bewildered laid,

And back recoiled, he knew not why,

E'en at the sound himself had made.

Collins, The Passions.

The heart

Recoils from its own choice.

Corper, Task, i. 467.

3. To fall, rush, start, bound, or roll back, as in consequence of resistance which cannot be overcome by the force impressed; return after a certain strain or impetus: literally or figuratively.

These dread curses, like the sun 'gainst glass,

Or like an overcharged gun, recoil.

Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 2. 331.

Revenge, at first though sweet,

Bitter ere long, back on itself recoils.

Milton, P. L., ix. 172.

4t. To fall off; degenerate.

Be revenged;

Or she that bore you was no queen, and you

Recoil from your great stock.

Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 128.

II.† trans. To drive back.

Mariners and merchants with much toyle
Labour'd in vaine to have secur'd their prize, . . .
But neither toyle nor travell might her backe recoyle.

Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 19.

recoil¹ (rē-koi'), n. [Early mod. E. also recule; < OF. recul, recul, backward movement, retreat, F. recul, recoil, rebound, = Pg. recuo, a recoil; from the verb.] 1t. A drawing back; retreat.

Where, having knowledge of Omoro his recule, he pursued him.

Holinshead, Descrip. of Ireland. (Nares.)

2. A backward movement; a rebound: literally or figuratively.

With impetuous recoil and jarring sound

The infernal doors.

Milton, P. L., ii. 880.

The recoil from formalism is scepticism.

P. W. Robertson.

Who knows it not — this dead recoil

Of weary fibres stretched with toil?

O. W. Holmes, Midsummer.

3. Specifically, the rebound or resilience of a firearm or a piece of ordnance when discharged.

Like an unskilful gunner, he usually misses his aim, and is hurt by the recoil of his own piece.

Sheridan, The Duenna, i. 3.

Energy of recoil. See energy. — Recoil-check. See check.

recoil² (rē-koi'), v. t. [< re- + *coil*¹.] To coil again.

He [the driller] then reverses the motion, uncoils it [the cable], and recoils it up the other way.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 116.

recoiler (rē-koi'lēr), n. One who recoils or falls back.

Bp. Hackett, Abp. Williams, p. 98.

recoil-escapement (rē-koi'es-kap-ment), n. In horol., an escapement in which after each beat the escape-wheel recoils, or moves backward slightly: opposed to a dead-beat escapement, in which the escape-wheel rests dead, or without motion in the interval between the beats.

recoilment (rē-koi'ment), n. [Formerly also recoilment; < OF. (and F.) reculement, < reculer, recoil: see *recoil*¹.] The act of recoiling.

The sharp pains of the stone were allay'd by that heaviness of sense which the recoilment of serious moisture into the habit of the body and insertions of the nerves occasion'd.

Hammond, in Bp. Fell.

recoil-pallet (rē-koi'pal'et), n. One of the pallets which form an essential part of the mechanism of a recoil-escapement.

Recoil pallets — and dead ones too — should only just clear the teeth.

Sir E. Beckett, Clocks and Watches, p. 79.

Encyc. Brit., VIII. 679.

2. Specifically, in U. S. hist., the process by which, after the civil war, the States which had seceded were restored to the rights and privileges inherent in the Union. The period of reconstruction extended from 1865 to about 1870. —3. That which is reconstructed. [Rare.]

A fleet of above thirty vessels, all carrying cannon, was in about three months little less than created, though a few of the largest were reconstructions, having been first framed and sent over from Great Britain.

Belsham, Hist. Great Britain, an. 1777.

Reconstruction Acts, two acts of Congress, of which the first, entitled "an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States," was passed over the President's veto on March 2d, 1867; and the second, a supplementary act, was passed later in the same month. These acts embodied the congressional plan of reconstruction, providing that every State should remain under military government until certain acts should be performed. The principal conditions were that each State should hold a convention and frame a constitution; that this constitution must be ratified by popular vote and approved by Congress; that the new State legislature must ratify the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution; and that when the requisite number of States had ratified this amendment, any State which had fulfilled all requirements should be readmitted to the Union, and entitled to congressional representation. By 1870 all the seceding States were readmitted, but they were not all represented in Congress until 1871.

reconstructionary (rē-kōn-strukt'shōn-ār-i), a. [< reconstruction + -ary.] Of or pertaining to reconstruction, especially to reconstruction in the southern United States; as, "reconstructionary influence," Congregationalist, June 17, 1886. [Rare.]

Let not your recreations be lavish spenders of your time; but choose such which are healthful, short, transient, recreative.

Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, l. 1.

In this "Manual of Sins" . . . our recreative monk has introduced short tales, some grave and some he deemed facetious, which convey an idea of domestic life and domestic language.

I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 138.

recreatively (rek'rē-ā-tiv-li), adv. In a recreative manner; with recreation or diversion. Imp. Dict.

recreativeness (rek'rē-ā-tiv-nes), n. The quality of being recreative, refreshing, or diverting.

recrement (rek'rē-ment), n. [*< OF. recement, F. récrement = Sp. Pg. recemento, refuse, < L. recementum, dross, slag, < cernere, < re-, back, + cernere, pp. cretus, separate: see concern, concrete, and cf. excrement¹.] 1. Superfluous matter separated from that which is useful; dross; scoria; spume.

Of all the visible creatures that God hath made, none is so pure and simple as light; it discovers all the foulness of the most earthly recements, it mixeth with none of them.

Bp. Hall, Remains, p. 41.

2. In med., a fluid which, after having been separated from the blood, is returned to it, as the saliva, the secretion of serous membranes, etc.

recremental (rek'rē-men'tal), a. [< recement + -al.] Consisting of or pertaining to recement; recementitious. Armstrong, Art of Preserving Health, iii. 254.

recrementital (rek'rē-men-tish'al), a. [< F. récrementital; as recement + -it-ial.] Same as recrementitious.

recrementitious (rek'rē-men-tish'us), a. [= Sp. Pg. recementicio; as recement + -it-ious.] Drossy; consisting of superfluous matter separated from that which is valuable. Boyle, Works, I. 645.

recruit¹ (rē-kro'), v. t. [*< recrue, < OF. recrue, recrue, a supply, spare stores, recruit, F. recrue, supply, addition, recruit, levy: see recruit.] To recruit.

One Intire troop with some other odd troopers, and some stragling foot, that were to recruit other companies.

Prince Rupert's beating up of the Rebel Quarters at Postcomb and Chinner (1643), p. xvi. (Davies.)

recriminate (rē-krim'i-nāt), v. [< ML. recriminatus, pp. of recriminare (> It. recriminare = Sp. Pg. recriminar = OF. recriminer, F. récriminer), accuse in return, < L. re-, back, + criminari, accuse: see criminate.] I. intrans. To return one accusation with another; retort a charge; charge an accuser with a like crime.

Such are some of the personalities with which Decker recriminated. I. D'Israeli, Calamities of Authors, II. 339.

II. trans. To accuse in return. [Rare.]

Did not Joseph lie under black infamy? he scorned so much as to clear himself, or to recriminate the strumpet.

South.

recrimination (rē-krim-i-nā'shon), n. [< OF. recrimination, F. récrimination = Sp. recriminación = Pg. recriminação = It. recriminazione, < ML. recriminatio(n-), < recriminare, recriminate: see recriminate.] 1. The act of recriminating; the meeting of an accusation by a counter-accusation: as, to indulge in mutual recriminations.

Let us endeavour to remove this objection, not by recrimination (which is too easy in such cases), but by living suitably to our holy Religion.

Stillingsfleet, Sermons, II. vi.

Short-sighted and injudicious, however, as the conduct of England may be in this system of aspersions, recrimination on our part would be equally ill-judged.

Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 76.

2. In law, an accusation, brought by an accused person against the accuser, of being in a similar guilt as charged, or derelict in a corresponding duty; a counter-accusation.

recriminative (rê-krim'i-nâ-tiv), a. [< recriminate + -ive.] Of the nature of or pertaining to recrimination; indulging in recrimination; recriminatory. Imp. Dict.

recriminator (rê-krim'i-nâ-tor), n. [Cf. F. récriminateur = Sp. recriminador, one who recriminates, recriminating; as recriminate + -or.] One who recriminates; one who accuses the accuser of a like crime.

recriminatory (rê-krim'i-nâ-tô-ri), a. [= F. récriminateur = Pg. recriminatório; as recriminate + -ory.] Retorting accusation; recriminating.

They seem to have been so entirely occupied with the defence of the French directory, so very eager in finding recriminatory precedents to justify every act of its intolerable insolence. Burke, A Regicide Peace, iii.

recrossed (rê-krôst'), a. In her.: (a) Having the ends crossed. (b) Same as crossed when noting a crosslet: thus, a cross crosslet recrossed is the same as a cross crosslet crossed.

recrucify (rê-kro'si-fi), v. t. [< re- + crucify.] To crucify again.

By it [wilful sin] we do, as the Apostle teaches, recrucify the Son of God, and again expose Him to open shame. Barrow, Works, vi. 79.

recrudency (rê-kro'den-si), n. [As recrud(esce) + -ency.] Same as recrudescence.

recrudescence (rê-kro-des'), v. t.; pret. and pp. recrudesced, ppr. recrudescing. [= Pg. recrudesce, < L. recrudesce, become raw again, < re-, back, again, + crudesce, grow harsh, < crudus, raw: see crude.] 1. To become raw or exacerbated again.—2. To revive; become alive again; be renewed.

Ideas which have made no part of the waking life are apt to recrudescence in the sleep-waking state. Mind, ix. 118.

recrudescence (rê-kro-des'ens), n. [< F. recrudesce = Sp. Pg. recrudescencia; as recrudescent(t) + -ce.] 1. The state of being recrudescent, or becoming raw or exacerbated again. Hence—2. A reopening; renewal; a coming into existence anew; a fresh outbreak.

The king required some regulations should be made for obviating the recrudescence of those ignorant abuses for the future that had been so scandalous before. Roger North, Examen, p. 632. (Davies.)

That recrudescence of military organization which followed the Conquest. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 525.

3. In med., increased activity of a disease or morbid process after partial recovery.

A kind of recrudescence [of scarlet fever] but without the reappearance of the rash, would seem possible up to the eighth week. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 1392.

4. In bot., the production of a fresh shoot from the top of a ripened spike.

recrudescency (rê-kro-des'en-si), n. [As recrudescence (see -cy).] Same as recrudescence. Browning, Ring and Book, i. 578.

recrudescent (rê-kro-des'ent), a. [= Pg. recrudescente, < L. recrudescent(-is), ppr. of recrudesce, break out afresh, become raw again, < re-, again, + crudesce, become raw.] 1. Growing raw, sore, or painful again.—2. Coming into existence or renewed vigor again.

recruit (rê-krôt'), v. [Formerly also recrute; = D. recruten = G. recruten = Dan. rekrutere = Sw. rekrytera, < OF. recruter, levy, prop. recluter, mend, = Pg. recrutar, reclutare, levy, = Sp. reclutare, complete, supply, also recruit, = It. reclutare, complete, levy, < ML. reclutare (after Rom.), recruit, orig. mend, patch, < L. re- + Teut. (AS.) clūt (> OF. clut), clout, lit. 'rag,' 'piece': see clout.] The orig. sense was forgotten, and confusion ensued with OF. recree, recreue, a supply, spare stores, etc., recrue, a levy of troops, prop. an addition, supply, fem. of recreu, F. recru, pp. of recroître, recroistre, grow again, < L. re-, again, + crescere, grow, increase: see crease, increase, etc. Cf. accrue, recrue, crew.] 1. To repair by fresh supplies; supply lack or deficiency in.

Her cheeks glow the brighter, recruiting their colour. Granville, Phyllis Drinking.

2. To restore the wasted vigor of; renew the health, spirits, or strength of; refresh: as, to recruit one's health.

And so I began the world anew; and, by the blessing of God, was again pretty well recruited before I left this town. R. Knox (Arber's Eng. Garner), i. 385.

I sat down and talked with the family while our guide recruited himself with a large dish of thick sour milk. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 419.

3. To supply with new men; specifically, to supply with new men for any deficiency of troops; make up by enlistment: as, to recruit an army.

His [Amurath's] forces, . . . though daily recruited by the new supplies which came to them, yet mouldered away. North, tr. of Thevet's Lives.

The Frank population of Cyprus . . . was either constantly diminishing or recruited by arrivals from the West. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 168.

4. To provision; take supplies on board of, as a vessel: as in the phrase to recruit ship. = Syn. Reinforce, replenish.

II. intrans. 1. To gain new supplies of anything lost or wasted; gain flesh, health, spirits, etc.

My master, said I, honest Thomas . . . is come to Bath to recruit. Yes, sir, I said to recruit—and whether for men, money, or constitution, you know, sir, is nothing to him, nor any one else. Sheridan, The Rivals, ii. 1.

2. To gain new supplies of men for any object; specifically, to raise new soldiers.

When a student in Holland he there met Carstairs, on a mission into that country to recruit for persons qualified to fill the chairs in the several universities of Scotland. Sir W. Hamilton.

3. To enter port for supplies, as a vessel.

recruit (rê-krôt'), n. [= D. recrūt = G. recrūt = Dan. rekrut = Sw. rekryt, < OF. recrute = Sp. recluta = Pg. recruta = It. recluta, recruit; from the verb, confused in OF. with recrue, a supply, recrue, a levy of troops.] 1. A fresh supply of anything wasted or used, as of provisions and supplies on shipboard, etc.

Carrying also plentiful recruits of provisions. Beverly, Virginia, i. ¶ 9.

A Recruit of new People. Howell, Letters, i. l. 38.

The state is to have recruits to its strength, and remedies to its distempers. Burke.

2. A soldier or sailor newly enlisted to supply the deficiency of an army or a navy; one who has newly filled a vacancy in any body or class of persons.

The powers of Troy With fresh recruits their youthful chief sustain. Dryden.

3. A substitute for something wanting. [Rare.]

Whatever Nature has in worth deny'd, She gives in large recruits of needful pride. Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 206.

Port of recruit (naut.), a recruiting-station.

recrutorial (rê-kro'tal), n. [< recruit + -al.] A renewed supply of anything lost or exhausted, especially of strength or vigor, bodily or mental. [Rare.]

Shortly after this communion Mr. Chalmers sought relief and recrutorial in an excursion to Fifehire. W. Hanna, Chalmers, II. 65.

recruiter (rê-kro'ter), n. One who recruits.

recruthood (rê-krôt'hüd), n. [< recruit + -hood.] The condition of a recruit; the state or the period of being a recruit. [Rare.]

Old soldiers who read this will remember their green recruthood and smile assent. The Century, XXIX. 108.

recruiting-ground (rê-kro'ting-ground), n. A place or region where recruits are or may be obtained.

The murderers of Cæsar had turned the provinces which they governed into one vast recruiting-ground for a last decisive struggle. W. W. Capes, The Early Empire, Int.

recruiting-party (rê-kro'ting-pär'ti), n. A number of soldiers, in charge of an officer or a non-commissioned officer, who are detached from their regiment or post for the purpose of enlisting recruits.

recruiting-sergeant (rê-kro'ting-sär'jent), n. A sergeant deputed to enlist recruits.

recruitment (rê-kro'tment), n. [< F. recrute-ment = Sp. reclutamiento = Pg. recrutamento, the act of recruiting; as recruit + -ment.] The act or business of recruiting; the act of raising new supplies of men for an army or a navy.

The theoretical recruitment is partly voluntary and partly by lot for the militia. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 40.

Rec. Sec. An abbreviation of Recording Secretary.

recti, a. [ME., < L. rectus, straight, direct, right: see right.] Direct; immediate.

Thus ys mede and mercede as two manere relations, Rect and indrect. Piers Plowman (C), iv. 336.

rect. An abbreviation of (a) in pharmacy, (rectificatus) rectified; (b) rector.

recta, n. Plural of rectum.

rectal (rek'tal), a. [< rectum + -al.] Pertaining to or connected with the rectum or straight gut: as, rectal parts or organs; rectal disease, operation, instrument; rectal action, evacuation.—Rectal alimentation, the administration of enemata containing food specially prepared for absorption by the mucous membrane of the large intestine.—

Rectal anæsthesia, the administration of ether or other anesthetics by the rectum.—Rectal chemise. See chemise.—Rectal crises, paroxysms of pain in the rectum, often with tenesmus, and sensations as of a foreign body, met with in cases of locomotor ataxia.—Rectal diaphragm, the sheet of muscles closing the rectal outlet of the pelvis, consisting of the sphincter ani externus superficially, and a deeper layer composed of the levator ani and coccygeus.—Rectal fissure, a very painful crack-like opening in the mucous membrane of the lower part of the rectum.—Rectal glands. See gland.

rectalgia (rek-tal'ji-ä), n. [NL., < rectum, rectum, + Gr. algos, pain.] Neuralgia of the rectum: same as proctalgia.

rectangle (rek'tang-gl), a. and n. [< OF. (and F.) rectangle = Sp. rectángulo = Pg. rectangulo = It. rettangolo, rectangular, a rectangle, < LL. rectangulum, having a right angle, < rectus, right, + angulus, an angle: see right and angle.] 1. a. Rectangular; right-angled.

If all Athens should decree that . . . in rectangle triangles the square which is made of the side that subtendeth the right angle is equal to the squares which are made of the sides containing the right angle, . . . geometers . . . would not receive satisfaction without demonstration thereof. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 7.

II. n. 1. A quadrilateral plane figure having all its angles right angles and its opposite sides consequently equal. When the adjacent sides are equal, it is a square. The area of a rectangle is equal to the product of two adjacent sides; thus, if its sides measure 6 feet and 4 feet, its area is 24 square feet.

2. The product of two lengths. Thus, especially in old books, "the rectangle under two lines" is spoken of, meaning substantially the product of their lengths.

3. a. A right angle.

Th' acute, and the rect-Angles too, Stride not so wide as obtuse Angles do. Sylvestre, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii. The Columns.

rectangled (rek'tang-gl), a. [< rectangle + -ed.] 1. Having a right angle or right angles; right-angled.—2. In her., forming a right angle, or broken twice, forming two right angles: said of a heraldic line and also of a division of the field so bounded by it: as, a chief rectangled.—Fesse rectangled. See fesse.

rectangular (rek-tang'gü-lär), a. [= F. rectangulaire = Sp. Pg. rectangular, < L. rectangulus, rectangled: see rectangle.] Right-angled; having an angle or angles of ninety degrees.—Rectangular coordinates, in analytical geom.. See coordinate.—Rectangular hyperbola, a hyperbola whose asymptotes are at right angles to one another.—Rectangular map-projection. See projection.—Rectangular solid, in geom., a solid whose axis is perpendicular to its base.

rectangularity (rek-tang'gü-lär-i-ti), n. [< F. rectangulairité; as rectangular + -ity.] The quality or state of being rectangular or right-angled; rectangularity.

rectangularly (rek-tang'gü-lär-li), adv. In a rectangular manner; with or at right angles.—Rectangularly polarized, in optics, oppositely polarized.

rectangularness (rek-tang'gü-lär-nex), n. Rectangularity. Imp. Dict.

recti, n. Plural of rectus.

recticruræus (rek'ti-kro-rë-us), n.; pl. recticruræi (-i). [NL., < L. rectus, straight, + crurus (crur-), leg: see cruræus.] The straight muscle of the front of the thigh; the rectus femoris. Cous.

rectifiable (rek'ti-fi-a-bl), a. [< F. rectifiable = Sp. rectificable = Pg. rectificavel; as rectify + -able.] 1. Capable of being rectified, corrected, or set right: as, a rectifiable mistake.—2. In geom., said of a curve admitting the construction of a straight line equal in length to any definite part of the curve.

rectification (rek'ti-fi-kä'shon), n. [< OF. (and F.) rectification = Pr. rectificatio = Sp. rectificación = Pg. rectificação = It. rettificazione, < ML. rectificatio(n-), < rectificare, rectify: see rectify.] The act or operation of rectifying. (a) The act of correcting, amending, or setting right that which is wrong or erroneous: as, the rectification of errors, mistakes, or abuses.

The proper rectification of the expression would be to insert the adverb as. H. Blair, Rhetoric, xxii.

(b) The process of refining a substance by repeated or fractional distillation: it is in this way freed from other substances which are either more or less volatile than Rectangle.

Argent, a Chief Rectangled gules.

Rectangular Hyperbola.

itself, or from non-volatile matters: as, the rectification of spirits. The concentration of sulphuric acid in platinum or glass vessels is sometimes (improperly) called rectification.

The process of rectification is generally done by redistilling, and filtering through alternate layers of woollen blankets, sand, and granulated bone or maple charcoal. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 80.

(c) In geom., the determination of a straight line whose length is equal to a given portion of a curve; the finding a formula for the length of the arc of a given curve.—Rectification of a globe, in astron. and geog., the adjustment of it preparatory to the solution of a proposed problem.

rectified (rek'ti-fid), p. a. [Pp. of rectify.] 1. Made right; corrected.

Be just therefore to thyself all the way, pay thyself, and take acquaintances of thyself, all the way, which is only done under the seal and in the testimony of a rectified conscience. Donne, Sermons, ix.

2. In hort., developed in a desired direction, as when plain tulips are propagated till they sport into variegated forms.

Some of the progeny "break," that is, produce flowers with the variegation which is so much prized. The flower is then said to be "rectified." Encyc. Brit., XII. 259.

rectifier (rek'ti-fi-er), n. [< rectify + -er.] 1. One who or that which rectifies. (a) One who corrects or amends.

Fast friend he was to reformation, . . .
Next rectifier of wry law.

S. Butler, Hudibras, I. li. 432.

(b) One who refines a substance by repeated distillations or by filtering or any other method; specifically, one who rectifies liquors. (c) In the distillation of alcoholic liquors: (1) A vessel or receptacle in which a second distillation is carried on, to condense the liquor and increase its alcoholic strength, or to flavor it by exposing the flavoring substance to the vaporized spirit. (2) A cylindrical vessel continuous with a primary still, in which repeated distillations occur till the alcohol reaches the desired strength. Also called rectifying column, and simply column. (d) An instrument formerly used for indicating the errors of the compass. Falconer.

rectify (rek'ti-fi), v. t.; pret. and pp. rectified, ppr. rectifying. [Early mod. E. rectifie, rectifye; < OF. (and F.) rectifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. rectificar = It. rettificare, < ML. rectificare, make right, rectify, < L. rectus, straight (= E. right), + -ficare, < facere, make.] 1. To make right or straight; correct when wrong, erroneous, or false; amend: as, to rectify errors, mistakes, or abuses: sometimes applied to persons.

I meant to rectify my conscience.
Shak., Hen. VIII., II. 4. 203.
I onlie strive
To rectifie abuses which deprive
The Gospell of his propagation
And plentiful increase.

Times Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 16.
To rectify a common-wealth with debauched people is impossible.
Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 106.

When an authentic watch is shown,
Each man winds up and rectifies his own.

Suckling, Aglaure, Epil.
This morning I received from him the following letter, which, after having rectified some little orthographical mistakes, I shall make a present of to the public.

Addison, Husbands and Wives.

Specifically—2. In distilling: (a) To remove impurities from (an alcoholic distillate) and raise to a required proof or strength by repeated distillation. As flavoring materials are often added during rectification in the manufacture of gin, cordials, factitious brandy, etc., the term rectify has been extended to the performance of these processes. Hence—(b) To bring (a spirit) by repeated distillation to the strength required, and at the same time to impart to it the desired flavor. See rectifier.—3. In chemical manuf. and in phar.: (a) To separate impurities from (a crystalline body) by dissolving and recrystallizing it, sometimes repeatedly, and sometimes also with intermediate washing of the crystals. (b) To raise (a liquid) to a prescribed strength by extraction of some part of its liquid components. Distillation under ordinary atmospheric pressure or in a vacuum, and absorption of water by substances having strong affinity for water, as caustic lime, calcium chloride, etc., when such substances do not affect the chemical constitution of the substances under treatment, are common processes employed in rectification. (c) To remove impurities from (solutions) by filtering them through substances absorbent of dissolved impurities, but non-absorbent of, and chemically inactive upon, the substance to be purified. Of such materials bone-black is a typical example, especially in sugar-refining. (d) To purify by one or more resublimations.—4. In math., to determine the length of (a curve, or a part of a curve) included between two limits.—5. In the use of the globes, to place (a globe) in such a position that the solution of a given problem may be effected with it.—Rectifying developable, or rectifying developable surface of a non-plane curve, a developable surface such that, when it is unrolled into a plane with the curve to which it belongs, the latter is unrolled into a right line: it is perpendicular to the normal and the osculating planes.—Rectifying edge, the cuspidal edge of the rectifying developable.—Rectifying line, the line common to two consecutive rectifying planes.—Rectifying plane, a plane tangent to the rectifying surface.—To rectify alcoholic liquors. See def. 2.—To rectify a sun-dial. See the quotation.

To rectify the dial (using the old expression, which means to prepare the dial for an observation).

Encyc. Brit., VII. 161.

To rectify the course of a vessel, in nav., to determine its true course from indications of the ship's compass, by correcting the errors of the compass due to magnetic variations and local attractions.—To rectify the globe, in astron. and geog., to bring the sun's place in the ecliptic on a globe to the brass meridian, or otherwise to adjust it in order to prepare it for the solution of any proposed problem.—Syn. 1. Improve, Better, etc. (see amend), redress, adjust, regulate.

Rectigrade (rek-tig'rā-dē), n. pl. [NL.: see rectigrade.] A group of spiders; the rectigrade spiders. Also Rectigrada, Rectigrades.

rectigrade (rek'ti-grād), a. [< L. rectus, straight, + gradi, step: see grade.] Walking straight forward, as a spider; pertaining to the Rectigrade: correlated with laterigrade, saltigrade, etc.

rectilinear (rek-ti-lin'ē-āl), a. [Cf. It. rettilineo = OF. (and F.) rectiligne; *< ML. rectilineus, having a straight line, < L. rectus, straight, right, + linea, a line: see right and line, n.] Same as rectilinear.

rectilinearly (rek-ti-lin'ē-āl-i), adv. Same as rectilinearly.

rectilinear (rek-ti-lin'ē-ār), a. [< L. rectilinus, rectilinear (see rectilinear), + -ar.] Straight-lined; bounded by straight lines; consisting of a straight line or of straight lines; straight: as, a rectilinear figure or course. Also rectilinear.

Whenever a ray of light is by any obstacle turned out of its rectilinear way, it will never return to the same rectilinear way, unless perhaps by very great accident.

Newton, Opticks.

Rectilinear lens, motion, etc. See the nouns.—Rectilinear muscle. See muscle, 2.

rectilinearity (rek-ti-lin'ē-ār'i-ti), n. [< rectilinear + -ity.] The state of being rectilinear.

rectilinearly (rek-ti-lin'ē-ār-li), adv. In a rectilinear manner or direction; in a right line. rectilinearness (rek-ti-lin'ē-ār-nes), n. The quality or condition of being rectilinear. W. B. Grey, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 230.

rectilinear (rek-ti-lin'ē-us), a. [= *OF. (and F.) rectiligne = Sp. rectilíneo = Pg. rectilíneo = It. rettilineo, < ML. rectilineus: see rectilinear.] Rectilinear. Ray, Works of Creation, i.

rectinerved (rek'ti-nērvd), a. [< L. rectus, straight, + nervus, nerve, + -ed.] In bot., having nerves running straight from their origin to the apex or to the margin: said mostly of parallel-nerved leaves.

rection (rek'shon), n. [< L. rectio(n)], a leading, guiding, government, direction, < regere, pp. rectus, rule, govern: see regent.] In gram., the influence or power of a word in consequence of which another word in the sentence must have a certain form, in regard to number, case, person, mode, or the like; government.

rectipetality (rek'ti-pe-tal'i-ti), n. [< L. rectus, straight, + petere, seek (see petition), + -al + -ity.] In bot., the inherent tendency of stems to grow in a right line, as indicated by Voechting's experiments with the clinostat. Even parts grown crooked incline to straighten when freed from deflecting influences. This general tendency is modified, however, by an irregularity called heterauxesis (which see).

rectirostral (rek-ti-ros'tral), a. [Cf. F. rectirostre; < L. rectus, straight, + rostrum, beak, + -al.] Having a straight bill or beak, as a bird.

rectischial (rek-tis'ki-ak), a. [< NL. rectum + ischium + -ac.] Same as ischio-rectal.

rectiserial (rek-ti-sē-ri-āl), a. [< L. rectus, straight, + series, a row: see serial.] 1. Disposed in a right line; rectilinear or straight, as a row or series of parts.—2. In bot., disposed in one or more straight ranks: specifically used by Bravais, in contrast with curviserial (which see), to describe those forms of phyllotaxy in which a second leaf soon stands exactly over any given leaf, and thus all fall into right lines.

rectitic (rek-tit'ik), a. [< rectitis + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with rectitis.

rectitis (rek-ti'tis), n. [NL., < rectum + -itis.] Inflammation of the rectum.

rectitude (rek'ti-tūd), n. [< OF. rectitude, rectitudo, F. rectitude = Pr. rectitut = It. rettitudine, < L. rectitudo (-in-), straightness, uprightness, < rectus, straight, = E. right: see right.] 1.

Straightness: as, the rectitude of a line. Johnson.

Young pines, bent by . . . snowfalls or other accident, in seeking to recover their rectitude, describe every graceful form of curve or spiral. A. B. Alcott, Tablets, p. 12.

2. Rightness of principle or practice; uprightness of mind; exact conformity to truth, or to the rules prescribed for moral conduct by either divine or human laws; integrity; honesty; justice.

Of the rectitude and sincerity of their life and doctrine to judge rightly, we must judge by that which was to be their rule. Milton, Reformation in Eng., I.

Provided they "keep o' the wholy side of the law," the great majority are but little restrained by regard for strict rectitude. II. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 405.

3. Correctness; freedom from error, as of conduct.

Perfectly conscious of the rectitude of her own appearance, (she) attributed all this mirth to the oddity of mine. Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 2.

=Syn. 2. Integrity, Uprightness, etc. (see honesty), principle, equity.

recto (rek'tō), n. [1. < L. recto, abl. of rectum, right: see right, n. 2. For recto folio, 'the right page,' opposed to verso folio, 'the opposite page': L. recto, abl. of rectus, right; folio, abl. of folium, a leaf, sheet: see folio.] 1. In law, a writ of right, now abolished.—2. In printing, the right-hand page of an open book: opposed to the left-hand, reverso or verso. In books as commonly printed, the odd folios, pages 1, 3, 5, 7, etc., are the rectos; the even folios, pages 2, 4, 6, 8, etc., the reversos.

Junius had seen books of this kind printed by Coster (the beginnings of his labours) on the rectos of the leaves only, not on both sides. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 689.

recto-. In composition, rectal; of the rectum. rectocele (rek'tō-sēl), n. [< NL. rectum, rectum, + Gr. κῆλη, tumor.] Prolapse of the rectovaginal wall through the vagina. Compare proctocele.

rectogenital (rek-tō-jen'i-tal), a. [< NL. rectum, rectum, + L. genitalis, genital.] Of or pertaining at once to the rectum and to the genitalia: as, the rectogenital chamber.

rector (rek'tor), n. [= OF. retteur, recteur, F. recteur = Pr. Sp. rector = Pg. rector, reitor = It. rettore, < L. rector, a ruler, director, rector, < regere, pp. rectus, rule: see regent.] 1. A ruler or governor. [Rare.]

The rector of the university called to counsell all the doctors regentes that were that time at Tholouse. Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 22.

Reason (which in right should be The special rector of all harmony).

B. Jonson, Poetaster, v. 1.

Who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting?
Milton, Areopagitica (ed. Hales), p. 24.

2. In the Ch. of Eng., a clergyman who has the charge of a parish and full possession of all the rights and privileges attached thereto. He differs from the vicar in that the latter is entitled only to a certain proportion of the ecclesiastical income specially set apart to the vicarage. The latter, again, differs from the curate (in the narrower or popular sense of that word), who is subject to the incumbent, whether rector or vicar, and the amount of whose salary is determined not by the law, but by the patron of the benefice, or by the incumbent employing him. Abbreviated Rect.

The bishops that are spoken of in the time of the primitive Church, all such as parsons or rectors of parishes are with us. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 13.

3. In the United States, a clergyman in charge of a parish in the Protestant Episcopal Church.—4. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., an ecclesiastic in charge of a congregation, a college, or a religious house; specifically, the superior of a Jesuit seminary or college.

His wife . . . fled . . . to Saint Jacques le Grand: . . . her death . . . was faithfully confirmed by the rector of the place. Shak., All's Well, iv. 3. 69.

5. The chief elective officer of some universities, as in France and Scotland. In Scotland rector is also the title of the head master of an academy or important public school: in England, of the heads of Exeter and Lincoln colleges, Oxford. In the United States it is a title assumed by the principals of some private schools: as, the rectors of St. John's and St. Paul's. In Germany rector is the title of the head of a higher school; the chief officer of a university is styled rector magnificus or, when the prince of the country is the titular head, rector magnificissimus.

The rector . . . in the first instance was head of the faculty of arts. . . . It was not until the middle of the 14th century that the rector became the head of the collective university (of Paris). Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 835.

6. The presiding officer or chairman of certain guilds and associations.

Many artists . . . as rectors represented the greater and lesser art guilds in the city government (of Siena). C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 51.

Lay rector, in the Ch. of Eng., a layman who receives and possesses the rectorial tithes of a benefice. See Glossary. —Missionary rector, in the Rom. Cath. Ch., a priest appointed by the bishop to certain parishes in England, in the United States to the charge of any parish.—Rector of a Board of Trustees, the presiding officer.

rectorage (rek'tor-āj), n. [OF. rectorage, < rector + -age.] A rector's benefice. Compare vicarage.
*Sic pastoris vult be well content
 To leif vpon the fer les rent,
 Nor hes sum Vicare for his waige,
 Or Rector for his Rectorage.*
Lauder, Dewtie of Kyngis (E. E. T. S.), l. 326.

rectorate (rek'tor-āt), n. and a. [F. rectorat = Sp. rectorado = Pg. reitorado = It. rettorato, < ML. rectoratus, the office of a rector, < L. rector, a rector: see rector.] 1. n. The office or rank of rector; the period of incumbency of a rector.

His two rectorates in our city, from 1829 to 1845, saw the beginning of a successful revolt against the leadership of Evangelicals. The American, X. 297.

II. a. Same as rectorial.

His very instructive rectorate address on The Backwardness of the Ancients in Natural Science.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 263.

rectress, rectress (rek'tor-es, -tres), n. [F. rectress + -ess.] 1. A female rector or ruler; a governess. [Rare.]

Be thou alone the rectress of this isle,
 With all the titles I can thee entitle.

Drayton, Legend of Matilda, st. 39.

Great mother Fortune, queen of human state,
Rectress of action, arbitress of fate.

B. Jonson, Sejanus, v. 4.

2. A rector's wife. [Humorous.]

In this way the worthy Rectress consoled herself.

Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xlviii.

Also rectrix.

rectorial (rek-tō-ri-al), a. [F. rector + -ial.] Of or pertaining to a rector or a rectory.—Rectorial tithes, tithes payable to the rector, ordinarily those of corn, hay, and wood. Also great tithes.

The tithes of many things, as wood in particular, are in some parishes rectorial, and in some vicarial tithes.
Blackstone, Com., l. xi.

rectorship (rek'tor-ship), n. [F. rector + -ship.] 1. The office or rank of a rector.—2. Rule; direction; guidance.

Why, had your bodies
 No heart among you? or had you tongues to cry
 Against the rectorship of judgement?

Shak., Cor., II. 3. 213.

rectory (rek'tor-i), n.; pl. rectories (-iz). [OF. rectorie = Sp. rectoria = Pg. reitoria = It. rettoria, < ML. rectoria, the office or rank of a rector, < L. rector, a rector: see rector.] 1. A parish church, parsonage, or spiritual living, with all its rights, tithes, and glebes.—2. A rector's mansion or parsonage-house.

The Rectory was on the other side of the river, close to the church, of which it was the fitting companion.

George Eliot, Felix Holt, xxiii.

rectoscope (rek'tō-skōp), n. [NL. rectum, rectum, + Gr. σκοπεῖν, view.] A speculum used for rectal examination.

rectostenosis (rek'tō-stē-nō'sis), n. [NL., < rectum (see rectum) + Gr. στενός, stricture: see stenosis.] Stricture of the rectum.

rectotomy (rek-tot'ō-mi), n. [NL. rectum, rectum, + Gr. -τομία, < τέμνειν, temnein, cut.] The operation for dividing a rectal stricture.

recto-urethral (rek'tō-ū-rē-thral), a. Pertaining to the rectum and to the urethra: as, the recto-urethral space (a vertical triangular interval between the membranous urethra above and the rectum below, with the apex at the prostate gland).—Recto-urethral fistula, a fistula connecting the rectum and the urethra.

recto-uterine (rek-tō-ū'tē-rin), a. Of or belonging to the rectum and the uterus.—Recto-uterine folds or ligaments, semilunar folds of peritoneum passing one on each side from the rectum to the posterior upper surface of the uterus, forming the lateral walls of the rectovaginal pouch.—Recto-uterine fossa, the space between the uterus and the rectum above the borders of the recto-uterine folds.—Recto-uterine pouch. See pouch.

rectovaginal (rek-tō-vaj'i-nal), a. Of or belonging to the rectum and the vagina.—Rectovaginal fistula, a fistulous opening between the rectum and the vagina.—Rectovaginal hernia. Same as rectocele.—Rectovaginal pouch. See pouch.—Rectovaginal septum, the tissues separating the rectum and the vagina.

rectovesical (rek-tō-ves'i-kal), a. [NL. rectum + E. vesical.] Of or belonging to the rectum and the bladder.—Rectovesical fascia. See fascia.—Rectovesical folds, the posterior false ligaments of the bladder, lunate folds of peritoneum between the bladder and the rectum in the male. Also called semilunar folds of Douglas.—Rectovesical fossa, the pouch of peritoneum lying between the bladder and the rectum.—Rectovesical pouch. See pouch.

rectress, n. See rectress.

rectrices, n. Plural of rectrix.

rectricial (rek-trish'al), a. [NL. rectrix (rectric-), a tail-feather (see rectrix), + -ial.] Of or pertaining to rectrices.

rectrix (rek'triks), n.; pl. rectrices (rek-tri'sēz). [L. rectrix, directress, governess, mistress, fem. of rector, ruler, governor: see rector.] 1. Same as rectress.

A late queen rectrix prudently commanded.

Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa. (Latham.)

2. In ornith., a tail-feather; one of the long or large quill-feathers of a bird's tail: so called from its use in directing or steering the course of a bird in flight, like a rudder. The rectrices are comparable to the similar large flight-feathers of the wing, called remiges. In the Saururæ, or Jurassic birds with long lizard-like bony tail, the rectrices are biserially or distichously arranged in a row on each side of the caudal vertebrae. In all modern birds they are set together in a fan-like manner upon the pygostyle. (See Eurhipidura.) In a few birds they are rudimentary, as in crebes. The most frequent number by far is twelve, which prevails (with few anomalous exceptions) throughout the great order Passeres, and also in very many other birds of different orders. In many picarian birds the number is ten; in a very few eight. In various water-birds the rectrices run up to higher numbers, twenty-four being probably the maximum. There is normally always an even number, these feathers being paired. In size, shape, and texture they are endlessly varied, giving rise to all the different shapes a bird's tail presents.

rectum (rek'tum), n.; pl. recta (-tā). [= F. rectum = Sp. Pg. recto = It. retto, < NL. rectum, abbr. of L. rectum intestinum, the straight intestine: rectum, neut. of rectus, straight: see right.] In anat. and zool., a terminal section of the intestine, ending in the anus: so called from its comparatively straight course in man; the lower bowel: more fully called intestinum rectum. In man the rectum is the continuation of the sigmoid flexure of the colon, beginning about opposite the promontory of the sacrum, a little to the left side, and running through the pelvis to the anus. It is supported by a proper duplication of peritoneum, the mesorectum, and other fasciae. Its structure includes well-developed longitudinal and circular muscular fibers, the latter being aggregated into a stout internal sphincter muscle near the lower end. In animals whose colon has no special sigmoid flexure there is no distinction of a rectum from the rest of the large intestine; and the term applies only to any given or taken terminal section of the bowel, of whatever character. In mammals above monotremes the rectum is entirely shut off from the urogenital organs, ending in a distinct anus; but in most animals it ends in a cloaca common to the digestive and urogenital systems. The rectum receives the refuse of digestion, and retains the feces until voided. See cuts under intestine, peritoneum, Pulmonata, Pycnogonida, Appendicularia, and Blattidæ.—Columns of the rectum. See column.

rectus (rek'tus), n.; pl. recti (-tī). [NL., abbr. of L. rectus musculus, straight muscle: rectus, straight: see right.] In anat., one of several muscles so called from the straightness of their course, either in their own axis or in the axis of the body or part where they lie.—Recti capitis, five pairs of small muscles, the anterior major and minor, posterior major and minor, and the lateralis, all arising from the lower part of the occipital bone and inserted into the transverse processes of the upper cervical vertebrae.—Rectus abdominis externus. Same as pyramidalis (a).—Rectus abdominis internus, the straight muscle of the abdomen, in the middle line in front, mostly inclosed in an aponeurotic sheath formed by the tendons of other abdominal muscles, usually intersected by several transverse tendons, and extending from the pubis to the sternum. In some animals to the top of the sternum.—Rectus femoris, the anterior part of the quadriceps extensor. It is a fusiform, bipennate muscle, arising by two heads from the ilium, and inserted into the base of the patella. See cut under muscle.—Rectus lateralis, the lateral straight muscle of the head, arising from the transverse process of the axis, and inserted into the jugular process of the occipital.—Rectus medialis oculi. Same as rectus oculi internus.—Rectus oculi externus, inferior, internus, superior, the external, inferior, internal, superior straight muscle of the eyeball, turning the ball outward, downward, inward, or upward. See cut under eyeball.—Rectus sternalis, in man, an occasional slip lying lengthwise upon the sternum, representing the prolongation upward of the rectus abdominis externus, as is normal in many animals.—Rectus thoracis, in man, an occasional slip, similar to the last, but lying deep-seated, supposed to represent the continuation upward of the rectus abdominis internus.

recubant (rek'ū-bant), a. [L. recubant (t-), ppr. of recubare, lie back: see recubation.] Lying down; reclining; recumbent.

recubation (rek'ū-bā'shon), n. [L. recubare, pp. recubatus, lie upon the back, lie back, recline: see recumbent.] The act of lying down or reclining. [Rare.]

 By soft recumbency of outstretched limbs,
 Was bliss reserved for happier days.

Courper, Task, l. 82.

2. Rest; repose; idleness.

When the mind has been once habituated to this lazy recumbency and satisfaction, . . . it is in danger to rest satisfied there.
Locke.

3. The act of reposing or resting in confidence.

There are yet others [Christians] who hope to be saved by a bare act of recumbency on the merits of Christ.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. xiv.

recumbent (rè-kum'bent), a. [L. recumbent (t-), ppr. of recumbere, lie back, recline, < re-, back, + cubare, lie: see cumbent.] 1. Leaning; reclining.

The Roman recumbent . . . posture in eating was introduced after the first Punic war.
Arbuthnot, Ancient Coins, p. 134.

2. Reposing; inactive; idle; listless.

What smooth emollients in theology
Recumbent virtue's downy doctors preach!
Young, Night Thoughts, iv. 644.

3. In zool. and bot., noting a part that leans or reposes upon anything.—Recumbent hairs, in entom., hairs that lie partly against the surface, but are not pressed close to it.

recumbently (rè-kum'bent-li), adv. In a recumbent manner or posture.

recuperability (rè-kū'pè-rā-bil'i-ti), n. [F. recuperable + -ity (see -ility).] Ability to recuperate; power of recuperation. [Rare.]

A state of almost physiological recuperability.
Allen and Neurol., VII. 463.

recuperable (rè-kū'pè-rā-bl), a. [ME. recuperable, < OF. recuperable = Sp. recuperable = Pg. recuperavel, < ML. recuperabilis*, < L. recuperare, recover, recuperate: see recuperate, recover. Cf. recoverable.] Recoverable; that may be regained.

And hard it is to ravyshe a treasure
 Which of nature is not recuperable.

Lydgate, The Tragedies.

Therefore, if thou yet by counsaile arte recuperable,
 Flee thou from idleness and away be stable.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, l. 13.

recuperate (rè-kū'pè-rāt), v.; pret. and pp. recuperated, ppr. recuperating. [L. recuperatus, pp. of recuperare, recuperare (> It. recuperare = Sp. Pg. recuperar = F. recupérer), get again, regain, recover, revive, restore, ML. also intr., revive, convalesce, recover: see recover, the older form in E.] 1. trans. To recover; regain: as, to recuperate one's health or spirits.—2. To recoup. [Rare.]

More commonly he [the agent] paid a fixed sum to the clergyman, and recuperated himself by a grinding tyranny of the tenants.

In anat., turned back in its course, and running in a direction the opposite of its former one: specifically noting the inferior laryngeal branch of the pneumogastric. See the following phrases.—4. In entom., turning back toward the base: as, a recurrent process.—Posterior interosseous recurrent artery, a branch of the posterior interosseous artery which gives off branches in the region of the olecranon which anastomose with the superior profunda, posterior ulnar recurrent, and radial recurrent arteries.—Radial recurrent artery. See radial.—Recurrent arteries of the deep palmar arch, branches which pass from the upper side of the palmar arch and anastomose with branches of the anterior carpal arch.—Recurrent branch of the ophthalmic nerve, a small branch arising near the Gasserian ganglion, and running backward across the fourth nerve to be distributed in the tentorium.—Recurrent fever. See fever.—Recurrent fibroid tumor. Same as small spindle-cell sarcoma. See sarcoma.—Recurrent laryngeal. See laryngeal.—Recurrent mania. Same as periodical mania.—Recurrent nerve. Same as meningeal nerve (which see, under nerve).—Recurrent nerve of the inferior maxillary, a branch from the inferior maxillary as it passes through the foramen ovale, which passes back into the skull through the foramen spinosum, giving rise to two branches, one going to the great wing of the sphenoid, the other to the mastoid cells.—Recurrent nerve of the superior maxillary, a branch given off from the superior maxillary near its origin, which passes to the dura mater and middle meningeal artery.—Recurrent nerve of an insect's wing. (a) A branch which is more or less turned toward the base of the wing, in a direction contrary to the nerve from which it arises. Many of these recurrent nervures are distinguished. (b) A vein of the wing which, after running toward the apex, is bent or curved back toward the base, as in many Coleoptera.—Recurrent pulse. See pulse.—Recurrent radial artery, an artery which arises from the radial artery near its origin, and anastomoses with the anterior terminal branch of the superior profunda.—Recurrent sensibility, the sensibility manifested by the anterior root of a spinal nerve. This is due to fibers derived from the posterior root.—Recurrent tibial arteries. (a) The posterior, arising near the perforation of the interosseous membrane, and anastomosing with the lower articular popliteal arteries. (b) The anterior, a larger branch, arising just behind the perforation of the interosseous membrane, and anastomosing with the lower articular popliteal arteries.—Recurrent ulnar arteries. (a) The anterior, arising from the upper part of the ulnar, and joining the anastomotic branch of the brachial. (b) The posterior, arising a little lower than the anterior (though they often have a common origin), and communicating with the inferior profunda, the anastomotic, and posterior interosseous recurrent.

II. n. Any recurrent nerve or artery.

recurrently (rĕ-kūr'ent-li), adv. In a recurrent manner; with recurrence.

For a long time I had under observation a middle-aged man who, throughout his life, has recurrently been tormented by this parasite. B. W. Richardson, Preventive Medicine, p. 508.

recurring (rĕ-kūr'ing), p. a. Returning again.

—Recurring continued fraction. See continued fraction, under continued.—Recurring decimal. See decimal.—Recurring series, in alg., a series in which the coefficients of the successive powers of x are formed from a certain number of the preceding coefficients according to some invariable law. Thus, $a + bx + (a + bx)^2 +$

$(a + 2bx)^2 + (2a + 3b)x^3 + (3a + 5b)x^4 + \dots$ is a recurring series.—Recurring utterances, a form of aphasia in which the patient can repeat only the word last uttered when taken ill.

recursant (rĕ-kēr'sant), a. [< L. recursan (t)-s, ppr. of recursare, run or hasten back, come back, return, recur, freq. of recurrere, run back, recur: see recur.] In her., turned in a way contrary to the usual position, or with the back displayed instead of the front. Thus, an eagle recursant shows the back of the bird with the wings crossed.—Displayed recursant. See displayed.

recursion (rĕ-kēr'shon), n. [< L. recursio (n)-, a running back, return, < recurrere, pp. recursus, run back, return: see recur.] Return. [Rare.]

When the receiver was full of air, the included pendulum continued its recursions about fifteen minutes. Boyle, Works, I. 61.

recurvant (rĕ-kēr'vant), a. [< L. recurvan (t)-s, ppr. of recurvare, bend or curve backward, turn back: see curve.] In her., of a serpent, coiled up, with the head projecting from the folds; bowed-embowed.

recurvate (rĕ-kēr'vāt), v. t. [< L. recurvatus, pp. of recurvare, bend backward, curve back: see curve.] Same as recurve. Imp. Dict.

recurvate (rĕ-kēr'vāt), a. [< L. recurvatus, pp.: see recurvate, v.] In bot. and zool., recurved.

recurvation (rĕ-kēr-vā'shon), n. [< recurvate + -ion.] The act or process of recurving; the state of being curved up or back: opposed to decuration: as, the recurvation of a bird's bill. Also recurvature, recurvity.

By a serpentine and trumpet recurvation, it [the wind-pipe] ascendeth again into the neck. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., III. 27.

recurvature (rĕ-kēr'vā-tūr), n. [< recurvate + -ure.] Same as recurvation.

recurve (rĕ-kēr'vĕ), v. [= OF. recorber, recurber, recourber, F. recourber = Pr. Pg. recurar, < L. recurvare, bend or curve backward, turn up or back, < re-, back, + curvare, curve: see curve, v.] I. trans. To curve back; turn backward. Also recurvate.

II. intrans. To be recurved.

recurved (rĕ-kēr'vd'), p. a. 1. In bot., curved back or downward: as, a recurved leaf, petal, etc.—2. In zool., bent upward: the opposite of decurved: as, the recurved beak of the avoset.

recurviroster (rĕ-kēr-vi-ros'tēr), n. [< NL. recurvirostris, < L. recurvus, bent or curved back, crooked (see recurvus), + rostrum, beak, bill: see rostrum.] A bird of the genus Recurvirostra; an avoset.

Recurvirostra (rĕ-kēr-vi-ros'trā), n. [NL., fem. of recurvirostris: see recurviroster.] A genus of prehistoric limicoline gallinaceous birds, type of the family Recurvirostridae, having a long and very slender depressed and recurved bill, extremely long slender legs, and four toes, the three front ones of which are webbed; the avosets. The body is depressed, and the under parts are clothed with thick plumage like a duck's, so that the birds swim with ease by means of their webbed feet. See avoset. Also called Avocetta.

recurvirostral (rĕ-kēr-vi-ros'trāl), a. [As recurviroster + -al.] Having a recurved bill, as an avoset; belonging to the genus Recurvirostra; pertaining to a recurviroster.

Recurvirostridae (rĕ-kēr-vi-ros'tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Recurvirostra + -idae.] A family of wading birds with long and slender bill and legs, typified by the genus Recurvirostra, and divided into the Recurvirostrinae and Himantopodinae; the avosets and stilts.

Recurvirostrinae (rĕ-kēr'vi-ros'tri-nē), n. pl. [NL., < Recurvirostra + -inae.] A subfamily of Recurvirostridae, having the characters of the genus Recurvirostra, as distinguished from those of Himantopus, and including only the avosets.

recurvity (rĕ-kēr'vi-ti), n. [< L. recurvus, bent back (see recurvus), + -ity.] Same as recurvation. Bailey.

recurvo-patent (rĕ-kēr'vō-pat'ent), a. [< L. recurvus, bent back, + patent (t)-s, open, spreading: see *patent*¹.] In bot., bent back and spreading.

recurvus (rĕ-kēr'vus), a. [= Pg. recurvo = It. ricurvo, < L. recurvus, bent or curved back, < re-, back, + curvus, curve: see curve.] Bent backward.

recusance (rek'ū-zans), n. [< recusan (t) + -ce.] Same as recusancy.

The parliament now passed laws prohibiting Catholic worship, and imposing a fine of one shilling, payable each Sunday, for recusance. W. S. Gregg, Irish Hist. for Eng. Readers, p. 54.

recusancy (rek'-ū-zan-si), n. [As recusance (see -cy).] 1. Obstinate refusal or opposition.

It is not a recusancy, for I would come; but it is an excommunication, I must not.

Donne, Devotions, III., Expostulation.

If any one, or two, or ten, or twenty members of congress should manifest symptoms of recusancy, . . . the weird sisters of ambitious hearts shall play before their eyes images of foreign missions, and departments, and benches of justice.

R. Choate, Addresses, p. 339.

2. The state of being a recusant.

The papists made no scruple of coming to our churches; recusancy was not then so much as a chrisom, not an embryo.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 98.

There is also an inferior species of recusancy (refusing to make the declaration against popery enjoined by statute 30 Car. II. st. 2, when tendered by the proper magistrate).

Blackstone, Com., IV. iv.

We shall see that mere recusancy was first made punishable, later on in the reign, by the Second Act for Uniformity of Edward.

R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv., note.

3. The tenets of the recusants, or adherence to those tenets.

The penalties of recusancy were particularly hard upon women, who . . . adhered longer to the old religion than the other sex.

Hallam, Const. Hist., vii., note.

recusant (rek'-ū-zant or rek'-kū-zant), a. and n. [OF. recusant, F. recusant = Sp. Pg. recusante = It. ricusante, < L. recusant (-s), ppr. of recusare, reject, object: see recuse.] 1. a. Obstinate in refusal; specifically, in Eng. hist., refusing to attend divine service in Anglican churches, or to acknowledge the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown.

No recusant lord might have a vote in passing that act.

Clarendon.

II. n. 1. One obstinate in refusing; one who will not conform to general opinion or practice.

The last rebellious recusants among the family of nations.

De Quincy.

He that would not take the oath should be executed, though unarmed; and the recusants were shot on the roads, . . . or as they stood in prayer.

Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 411.

2. Specifically, in Eng. hist., one who refused to attend divine worship in Anglican churches, or to acknowledge the ecclesiastical supremacy of the crown. Heavy penalties were inflicted on such persons, but they pressed far more lightly on the simple recusant or nonconformist than on the Roman Catholic recusant, the chief object being to secure national unity and loyalty to the crown, in opposition to papal excommunications, which declared British subjects absolved from their allegiance (as in 1570), and to plots against the government. The name recusant, though legally applied to both Protestants and Roman Catholics, was in general given especially to the latter.

As well those restrained . . . as generally all the papists in this kingdom, not any of them did refuse to come to our church, and yield their formal obedience to the laws established. And thus they all continued, not any one refusing to come to our churches, during the first ten years of her Majesty's (Queen Elizabeth's) government. And in the beginning of the eleventh year of her reign, Cornwallis, Beddingfield, and Silyarde were the first recusants, they absolutely refusing to come to our churches. And until they in that sort began, the name of recusant was never heard of amongst us.

Sir Edward Coke (in 1607), in Blunt, Annotated Book of [Common Prayer, p. 24.]

recusation (rek'-ū-zā-shon), n. [OF. recusation, F. recusation = Pr. recusacion = Sp. recusacion = Pg. recusação = It. ricusazione, < L. recusatio (-n), a declining, refusal, objection, protest, also nausea, rejection, < recusare, pp. recusatus, object, decline, reject: see recuse.] In law, the interposition of an objection or challenge for cause to a judge or arbitrator, or to an expert appointed by a court; also, the objection or challenge so presented.

He [Bonner], to deface his Authority (as he thought), did also then exhibit in writing a Recusation of the Secretaries Judgment against him.

Foze, Martyrs, II. 35, an. 1549.

recusative (rē-kū-zā-tiv), a. [< recuse + -ative.] Tending or prone to recuse or refuse; refusing; denying; negative. [Rare.]

The act of the will produces material and permanent events; it is acquisitive and effective, or recusative and destructive, otherwise than it is in any other faculties.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, IV. i. 1.

recuse (rē-kūz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. recused, ppr. recusing. [OF. recuser, F. recuser = Pr. Sp. Pg. recusar = It. ricusare, < L. recusare, object, decline, reject, refuse, protest against, plead in defense, < re-, back, + causa, a cause: see cause. Cf. accuse.] To refuse; reject; specifically, in law, to reject or challenge (a judge or juror) as disqualified to act.

Yet she [the queen] nevertheless persisting in her former wilfulness and in her Appeal, which also by the said Judges was likewise recused, incontinently departed out of the Court.

Bp. Burnet, Records, I. ii., No. 28.

A judge may proceed notwithstanding my appeal, unless I recuse him as a suspected judge. Ayliffe, Faregon.

recussion (rē-kush'on), n. [< L. recutere, pp. recussus, strike back, beat back, etc., < re-, back, + cutere, strike, shake: see quash. Cf. conclusion, discussion, percussion.] The act of beating back. Bailey.

red¹ (red), a. and n. [ME. red, reed, rede, earlier read, reod, < AS. read = OS. rōd = OFries. rād = D. rood = MLG. rōt, LG. rod = OHG. The long vowel remains, however, in the surnames Read, Reade, Redd, Reid, which represent old forms of the adj., and the existence of which as surnames explains the almost total absence of the expected surname Red, parallel to Black, Brown, White, etc. As a noun, cf. ME. rede, redness, = OHG. rōti, G. röthe, redness, red; from the adj.] 1. a. Of a bright, warm color resembling that of blood or of the highest part of the primary rainbow. See II.

Drops rede as ripe cherries,
That fro his fleshe gan lave.

Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 217.

The ladye blushed scarlet redde,
And fette a gentill sighte.

Sir Caudine (Child's Ballads, III. 181).

Your colour, I warrant you, is as red as any rose.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., II. 4. 28.

2. Ultra-radical; revolutionary; violent: from the use of a red flag as a revolutionary emblem: as, a red republican.

Ev'n tho' thrice again
The red foul-fury of the Seine Should pile her barricades with dead.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxvii.

The Social Democratic Federation has degenerated into a red Anarchist organization. The Nation, XLVII. 450.

Black-breasted red game. See game. — Neither flesh, fowl nor good red herring, nondescript; lacking distinctive character; neither one thing nor another: same as neither hay nor grass. — Order of the Red Eagle. See eagle. — Red adder. Same as copperhead, 1. Bartlett. — Red admiral. See admiral, 5. — Red alga, red or purplish seaweeds constituting the class Phaeophyceae. Also known as the Rhodospirae and Rhodospiraeae. See Rhodospiraeae and Alga. — Red ant, a small ant of a red color, as Pharaoh's ant and some similar species. See ant under Monomorium. — Red antimony. Same as kermesite. — Red arsenic. Same as realgar. — Red ash, band-fish, bark bay. See the nouns. — Red bat, the common New York bat, Lasurus or Atalapha novboracensis, a small reddish bat of wide distribution in North America, and one of the most abundant in eastern parts of the United States. It is rather larger than the brown bat, Vesperugo subulatus, and easily recognized by its coloration and the densely furry interfemoral membrane. — Red bead-vine. See Rhynchosia. — Red bear-cat, the panda or wuh. See cut under panda. — Red beds, a conspicuous formation in the Rocky Mountains; a series of deep-red, sandy, gypsiferous strata lying upon the Carboniferous, and generally considered to be of Triassic age. They are often eroded into fantastic and picturesque forms. — Red beech, beefwood, birch, bird's-eye. See the nouns. — Red body, in ichth., an aggregation of capillaries forming a gland-like body.

These tufts of radiating capillaries are much localized at various places, as in Esocidae; or the tufts are so aggregated as to form gland-like red bodies, the capillaries reuniting into larger vessels, which again ramify freely round the border of the red body.

II. n. 1. A color more or less resembling that of blood or the lower end of the spectrum. Red is one of the most general color-names, and embraces colors ranging in hue from rose aniline to scarlet isleide of mercury and red lead. A red yellower than vermilion is called scarlet; one much more purple is called crimson. A very dark red, if pure or crimson, is called maroon; if brownish, chestnut or chocolate. A pale red—that is, one of low chroma and high luminosity—is called a pink, ranging from rose-pink, or pale crimson, to salmon-pink, or pale scarlet.

2. A red pigment. The most useful reds for painting are carmine, obtained from the cochineal-insect; the lakes and madders, of vegetable origin; vermilion, chrome-red, Indian red, and burnt sienna.
3. An object of a red color, as wine, gold, etc.

Now kepe yow fro the whyte and fro the rede,
And namely fro the whyte wyne of Lepe,
That is to selle in Fish strete or in Chepe.
Chaucer, Pardoner's Tale, l. 100.

No pint of white or red
Had ever half the power to turn
This wheel within my head.

Tennyson, Will Waterproof.

4. Specifically, a red cent. See under I. [Slang, U. S.]—5. A red republican (which see, under republican).—6. Pl. The catamenial discharges; menses.—Adrianople red. Same as Turkey red.—Alizarin red. In leather-manuf., a pale flesh-color produced by rubbing the cleansed and trodden skins with a solution of alizarin or extract of madder in weak soda-lye, and rinsing in water. C. T. Davis, Leather, p. 735.—Aniline red. Same as fuchsin.—Anisole red. A coal-tar color of the oxy-azo group, formerly used in dyeing silk and wool, but not now a commercial product.—Antimony red. A sulphid of antimony suggested as a pigment, but not permanent; used for coloring rubber and the heads of friction-matches.—Aurora red. A light red, like that of the spinel ruby.—Barwood red. See baricood.—Bengal red. A coal-tar color used in dyeing. It produces brilliant reds similar to those of eosin, but more blue in tone. It is the alkali salt of tetraiododichloro-fluorescein. Also called rose benale.—Bristol red. A dye for stuffs, in favor in the sixteenth century.

Her kytel Brytowe red.

Skelton, Elynour Rummyng, l. 70.

Brown red. Same as red ocher (which see, under ocher).—Cadmium red. An artists' pigment composed of the cadmium sulphid. It is more orange in hue than vermilion, but is very brilliant and permanent.—Chica or chico red. See chico, 1.—Cobalt red. A phosphate of cobalt sometimes used as an artists' color. It is durable, but poor in hue.—Congo red. A coal-tar color used in dyeing. It may be applied to cotton and wool, producing a bright scarlet fast to soap, but not to light or acids. It is a sodium salt of a tetra-azo dye from benzidine.—Corallin red. A coal-tar color used in dyeing, produced by treating aurin with ammonia at a high temperature. It is used by calico- and woollen-printers, but is quite fugitive. See coralline, 3.—English red. Same as Venetian red.—Fast red. A coal-tar color used in dyeing a garnet-red on woollen. It is of complex composition, and belongs to the azo-group. Also known in commerce as roccelin, oreddin, rubidin, and rauracienne.—French red. A coal-tar color used in dyeing, being a mixture of claret-red and naphthol orange.—Indian red. An important pigment used by artists and house-painters. Originally it was a natural earth rich in oxide of iron, brought from India. It is now prepared artificially by heating iron sulphate in a reverberatory furnace. The sulphuric acid is driven off, and the iron is immediately oxidized to the red oxide. The color varies from a purple to a light-yellowish red, according to the temperature at which the process is conducted. It is a color of much body, and is very permanent. Also called Indian ocher.—Jewelers' red. See jeweler.—Light red. A light yellowish-red oxide of iron prepared similarly to Indian red. It is also sometimes made by calcining Oxford ocher. It is used as an artists' pigment.—Madder red. See madder.—Magdala red. A coal-tar color used to produce bright pinks on silk. It is the hydrochlorid of the base rosa-naphthylamine.—Mars red. A pigment used by artists. It is somewhat similar in composition and color to Indian red.—Mock Turkey red. See baricood.—Naphthalene red. See naphthalene.—New red. See fuchsin.—Paris red. Same as mauvein.—Peony red. Same as corallin red.—Persian red. Same as the normal form of Indian red.—Phenol red. Same as coccin.—Piccolpasso red. A name given to the deep red of the Italian majolica, obtained by the use of silicate of alumina, in which there is much oxide of iron, and applied upon the yellow enamel already fired: so called from Piccolpasso, a sixteenth-century writer on Italian potteries.—Pompador red. See rose pompador, under rose.—Pompeian red. See Pompeian.—Prussian red. Same as Venetian red.—Saturine red. Same as red lead (which see, under lead).—Spanish red. Same as Venetian red.—Turkey red. An intense scarlet red produced on fabrics by dyeing with the color-giving principles of the madder-root. This has been almost entirely superseded by exactly the same color produced on fabrics by means of artificial alizarin. See alizarin. Also called Adrianople red.—Turkey-red oil. An oil with which cloth is treated in dyeing the color called Turkey red. It is prepared by mixing castor-oil with dilute sulphuric acid; the acid is then washed away with a solution of common salt, and the fatty acids saponified with ammonia. The oil consists chiefly of ammonium sulpho-richolate. Compare Gal-tipol oil, under oil.—Venetian red. An important pigment used by artists and house-painters. Formerly it was a natural earth simulating Indian red. It is now made by calcining a mixture of lime and iron sulphate, the resulting product being a mixture of calcium sulphate and oxide of iron in nearly equal proportions. It is somewhat darker than brick-red in color, and is very permanent. (See also chrome-red, claret-red.) red¹ (red), v. t.; pret. and pp. redded, ppr. redding. Howell, Vocall Forrest, p. 32.

2. Explanation; rendering.

When they used [to carry branches] in procession about their altars, they used to pray "Lord, save us; Lord, prosper us"; which hath occasioned the reddition of "Hoschannah" to be, amongst some, that prayer which they repeated at the carrying of the "Hoschannah," as if itself did signify "Lord, save us."

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 288.

3. In law, a judicial acknowledgment that the thing in demand belongs to the demandant, and not to the adversary. [Rare.]

redditive (red'i-tiv), a. [< L. redditivus, of or belonging to the apodosis (in gram.), consequential (cf. reddito, the apodosis of a clause), < reddere, pp. redditus, give back: see reddition.] Conveying a reply; answering: as, redditive words.

For this sad sequel is, if not a relative, yet a redditive demonstration of their misery: for after the infection of sin follows that infliction of punishment.

Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 261.

reddle (red'l), n. [Also raddle; var. of ruddle¹, q. v.] An earthy variety of hematite iron ore. It is fine-grained, and sufficiently compact to be cut into strips, which are used for various purposes, as for marking sheep and drawing on board. This material is found in several localities in England, and much more rarely in the United States, where it is generally called red chalk.

Reddle spreads its lively hues over everything it lights on, and stamps unmistakably, as with the mark of Cain, any person who has handled it for half an hour.

T. Hardy, Return of the Native, l. 9.

reddleman (red'le-man), n.; pl. reddlemen (-men). [< reddle + -man.] A dealer in riddle or red chalk, usually a sort of peddler. Also raddleman, ruddleman.

Ruddleman then is a Reddleman, a trade (and that a poor one) only in this county (Rutland), whence men bring on their backs a pack of red stones, or ochre, which they sell to the neighbouring countries for the marking of sheep.

Fuller, Worthies, Rutlandshire, III. 38.
Reddlemen of the old school are now but seldom seen. Since the introduction of railways Wessex farmers have managed to do without these somewhat spectral visitants, and the bright pigment so largely used by shepherds in preparing sheep for the fair is obtained by other routes.

T. Hardy, Return of the Native, I. 9.

reddock (red'ok), n. Same as ruddock. [Prov. Eng.] red-dog (red'dog), n. The lowest grade of flour produced in the roller-milling processes. Originally the term was applied to a poor flour made from middlings; now it is applied to the lowest grade produced by the new-process milling.

reddour, n. See redour.

red-drum (red'drum), n. The southern red-fish, or red-bass, Sciaenops ocellatus, an important food-fish of the Atlantic coast of the United States from Chesapeake Bay southward. See out under redfish.

rede⁴, a. An obsolete variant of ready.

redcraft (red'kräft), n. [A pseudo-archaism, purporting to represent a ME. rede-craft* or AS. ræd-craft*, which was not in use.] The art or power of reasoning; logic. Barnes.

red-edge (red'ej), n. A bivalve mollusk of the family Lucinidae, Codakia tigrina. [Florida.]

redeem (rê-dêm'), v. t. [Early mod. E. redeme; < OF. redimer, vernacularly raembre, reembre, raimbre, raimbre, etc., F. redimer = Sp. redimir = Pg. remir = It. redimere, < L. redimere, buy back, redeem, < red-, back, + emere, buy, orig. take: see emption, exempt, etc. Hence ult. redemption, ransom, etc.] 1. To buy back; recover by purchase; repurchase.

If a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold.

Lev. xxv. 29.

2. Specifically—(a) In law, to recover or disencumber, as mortgaged property, by payment of what is due upon the mortgage. Commonly applied to the property, as in the phrase "to redeem from the mortgage"; but sometimes applied, with the same meaning, to the encumbrance: as, "to redeem the mortgage." (b) In com., to receive back by paying the obligation, as a promissory note, bond, or any other evidence of debt given by a corporation, company, or individual.—3. To ransom, release, or liberate from captivity or bondage, or from any obligation or liability to suffer or be forfeited, by paying an equivalent: as, to redeem prisoners, captured goods, or pledges.

Alas, sweet wife, my honour is at pawn;
And, but my going, nothing can redeem it.

Shak., 2 Hen. IV., II. 3. 8.

Prepare to die to-morrow; for the world Cannot redeem ye.

Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, v. 2.

Thrice was I made a slave, and thrice redeem'd
At price of all I had.

Beau. and Fl., Captain, II. 1.

One Abraham, found a Delinquent, redeems himself for seven hundred Marks.

Baker, Chronicles, p. 82.

If a pawnbroker receives plate or jewels as a pledge or security for the repayment of money lent thereon on a day certain, he has them upon an express contract or condition to restore them if the pledger performs his part by redeeming them in due time.

Blackstone, Com., II. xxx.

4. To rescue; deliver; save, in general.

Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

Ps. xxv. 22.

How if . . .
I wake before the time that Romeo
Come to redeem me?

Shak., R. and J., IV. 3. 32.

That valiant gentleman you redeem'd from prison.

Fletcher, Beggars, Bush, IV. 3.

Six thousand years of fear have made you that
From which I would redeem you.

Tennyson, Princess, IV.

5. In theol., to deliver from sin and spiritual death by means of a sacrifice offered for the sinner. See redemption (c).

I learn to believe in . . . God the Son, who hath redeemed me, and all mankind.

Book of Common Prayer, Catechism.

Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us.

Gal. III. 13.

6. To perform or fulfil, as a promise; make good by performance: as, to redeem an obligation.

Had he lived, I doubt not that he would have redeemed the rare promise of his earlier years.

O. W. Holmes, Old Vol. of Life, p. 69.

7. To make amends for; atone for; compensate for.

This feather stirs; she lives; if it be so,
It is a chance which does redeem all sorrows
That ever I have felt.

Shak., Lear, v. 3. 266.

You have shewn much worth this day, redeem'd much error.

Fletcher, Bouduca, v. 5.

Passages of considerable beauty, especially in the last two acts, frequently occur; but there is nothing to redeem the absurdity of the plot.

Gifford, Int. to Ford's Plays, p. xxii.

To redeem defeat by new thought, by firm action, that is not easy.

Emerson, Success.

A touch of wolf in what showed whitest sheep,
A cross of sheep redeeming the whole wolf.

Browning, Ring and Book, I. 27.

8. To improve, or employ to the best advantage.

Redeeming the time, because the days are evil.

Eph. v. 16.

He [Voltaire] worked, not by faith, but by sight, in the present moment, but with indefatigable energy, redeeming the time.

J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 78.

9. To restore; revive.

Hee wyll redeeme our deadly drowping state.

Gascogne, De Profundis, The Auctor.

redeemable (rê-dê-ma-bl), a. [< redeem + -able.]

1. Capable of being redeemed; admitting of redemption.—2. Capable of being paid off; subject to a right on the part of the debtor to discharge, satisfy, recover, or take back by payment: as, a redeemable annuity.

Every note issued is receivable by any bank for debt due, and is redeemable by the national government in coin if the local bank should fail.

Harper's Mag., LXXX. 458.

Redeemable rights, in law, those conveyances in property or in security which contain a clause whereby the grantor, or any other person therein named, may, on payment of a certain sum, redeem the lands or subjects conveyed.

redeemableness (rê-dê-ma-bl-nes), n. The state of being redeemable. Johnson.

redeemer (rê-dê-mër), n. [< redeem + -er.]

1. One who redeems, ransoms, or atones for another. See redemption.

And his redeemer challeng'd for his foe,
Because he had not well maintain'd his right.

Spenser, F. Q., II. v. 20.

Specifically—2. [cap.] The Saviour of the world, Jesus Christ.

The precious image of our dear Redeemer.

Shak., Rich. III., II. 1. 123.

Christian liberty purchas'd with the death of our Redeemer.

Milton, Eikonoklastes, xlii.

My Redeemer and my Lord,
I beseech thee, I entreat thee,
Guide me in each act and word.

Longfellow, Golden Legend, II.

Congregation of the Redeemer, one of several Roman Catholic fraternities, the most famous of which is entitled the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. See Redemptorist.—Order of the Redeemer, an order of the kingdom of Greece, founded in 1834.

redeeming (rê-dê-ming), p. a. [Pr. of redeem.]

Saving; making amends; noting what is good as exceptional to what is generally bad: as, there is not a single redeeming feature in the scheme.

redeemless (rê-dêm'les), a. [< redeem + -less.]

Incapable of being redeemed; without redemption; irrecoverable; incurable.

The duke, the hermit, Lodowick, and myself
Will change his pleasures into wretched
And redeemless misery.

Without counsel or wisdom; wild.

For drede of hire drem [she] deulfulli quaked, . . .
& romed than redli al redles to hure chapel,
& godly be-sought God to gode turne hire sweuen.

William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), I. 2915.

Now, Richard the redeles, reweth [have pity] on zou-self,
That lawlesse ledyn zoure lyf, and zoure peple bothe.

Richard the Redeless (ed. Skeat), I. 1.

The opponents of Eadward . . . dreaded that he would "govern by his own unbridled will," that he would be, in a word, what they afterwards called Æthelred—a king redeless, or uncounselled.

J. R. Green, Conq. of England, p. 339.

redeliver (rê-dê-liv'ër), r. t. [< OF. redelivrer; as re- + deliver¹.] 1. To deliver back; return to the sender; restore.

But at the coming of Cesar, when things were altered, the Heduanae had their hostages redelivered, their old alyes and confederates restored, new brought in by Cesar.

Golding, tr. of Cesar, fol. 154.

My lord, I have remembrances of yours
That I have longed long to redeliver.

Shak., Hamlet, III. 1. 94.

Having assembled their forces, [they] boldly threatened at our Ports to force Smith to redeliver seven Salvages, which for their villanies he detained prisoners.

Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 171.

2. To deliver again; liberate a second time.

Imp. Dict.

redelivery (rê-dê-liv'ër-i), n. [< re- + delivery.]

The act of delivering back; also, a second deliverance or liberation.

They did at last procure a sentence for the redelivery of what had been taken from them.

Clarendon, Life, an. 1665.

redemand (rê-dê-mând'), r. t. [< OF. (and F.) redemandar = Pr. redemandar = It. redomandare; as re- + demand, v.] To demand the return of; also, to demand a second time.

They would say, God hath appointed us captains of these our bodily forts, which, without treason to that majesty, were never to be delivered over till they were redemanded.

Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, IV.

Our Long-boats, sent to take in fresh Water, were assail'd in the Port, and one taken and detain'd: which being redemanded, answer was made, That neither the Skiff nor the Seamen should be restor'd.

Milton, Letters of State, May, 1658.

She sang the Bell Song with brilliant effect, and it was redemanded.

New York Tribune, March 8, 1837.

redemand (rê-dê-mând'), n. [< redemand, v.]

The repetition of a demand; also, a demand for the return of anything.

redemise (rê-dê-miz'), v. t. [< re- + demise.] redemise (rê-dê-miz'), n. [< redemise, v.] Reconveyance; the transfer of an estate back to the person who has demised it: as, the demise and redemise of an estate in fee simple, fee tail, or for life or years, by mutual leases.

redemptible (rê-demp'ti-bl), a. [< L. redemptus, pp. of redimere, redeem: see redeem and -ible.] Capable of being redeemed; redeemable.

redemption (rê-demp'shun), n. [< ME. redempcion, < OF. redemption, redemptio, F. redemption = Pr. redempcio = Sp. redencion = Pg. redempção = It. redenzione, < L. redemptio (-n-), a buying back or off, a releasing, ransoming, redemption, < redimere, buy back, redeem: see redeem. Cf. ransom, a reduced form of the same word.] The act of redeeming, or the state of being redeemed; ransom; repurchase; deliverance; release: as, the redemption of prisoners of war, of captured goods, etc.

But peaceful measures were also employed to procure the redemption of slaves; and money sometimes accomplished what was vainly attempted by the sword.

Sumner, Orations, I. 232.

Such a sacrifice
Alone the fates can deem a fitting price
For thy redemption.

William Morris, Earthly Paradise, I. 318.

Specifically—(a) In law, the recovering or disencumbering of property by one who had a right to it subject to the encumbrance or defeasible conveyance, as where a debtor by paying his debt gets back a pledge or a mortgaged estate; also, the right of redeeming and reentering. (b) In com., payment to the holders by the issuer of notes, bills, or other evidences of debt. (c) In theol., deliverance from sin and its consequences by the obedience and sacrifice of Christ the Redeemer. The word redemption presupposes that man is in a state of bondage to the powers of evil—either spiritual powers external to himself, or evil passions and propensities within himself, or both—and that he can be delivered from them only by the sacrifice and suffering of another. This suffering is regarded as the price or ransom paid to redeem the captive. Thus, redemption is substantially equivalent to salvation, but involves the idea of a new and additional right over man acquired by God; and the doctrine of redemption includes the doctrines of atonement, justification, regeneration, and sanctification.

The Mount of Calvary, where our Saviour Criste was crucified and suffred dethe for our redemption.

Sir R. Gylfiorde, Fylgrymage, p. 26.

Which held thee dearly as his soul's redemption.

Shak., 3 Hen. VI., II. 1. 102.

By sin man was principally bound to God, as relates to punishment, because he had principally sinned against God; but he was bound to the devil as a tormentor, to whom he was justly delivered by God's permission; but the price of redemption ought to be paid to the principal, not to the intervening agent, and therefore Christ exhibited His death as the price of our redemption to God the Father for our reconciliation, and not to the devil.

Durandus, in Owen's Dogmatic Theology, p. 279.

Brethren of the Redemption of Captives. See brother.
— Covenant of redemption. In New Eng. theol. See covenant.— Equity of redemption. See equity.

redemptionary (rē-demp'shon-ā-ri), n.; pl. redemptionaries (-riz). [< redemption + -ary.] One who is or may be redeemed or set at liberty by paying a compensation; one who is or may be released from a bond or obligation by fulfilling the stipulated terms or conditions.

None other than such as have adventured in the first voyage, or shall become adventurers in this supply at any time hereafter, are to be admitted in the said society, but as redemptionaries, which will be very chargeable.

Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 176.

redemptioner† (rē-demp'shon-ēr), n. [< redemption + -er.] One who redeemed himself or purchased his release from debt or obligation to the master of a ship by his services, or one whose services were sold to pay the expenses of his passage to America.

Sometimes they [indentured servants] were called redemptioners, because, by their agreement with the master of the vessel, they could redeem themselves from his power by paying their passage. Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 405.

Poor wretch! . . . he had to find out what the life of a Redemptioner really was, by bitter experience.
J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 247.

See Liquidambar, I.—Red-gum tree, one of several species of Eucalyptus—E. resinifera, E. calophylla, E. tereticornis, E. rostrata, and others: so named from the red gum which they exude. E. resinifera, next to the blue-gum, is most frequently planted in Europe for sanitary purposes. E. rostrata is exceptionally 200 feet high, and its timber is one of the best of eucalyptus woods, being heavy, hard, and strong, and very durable in all situations. It is employed for railway-ties, piles, many ship-building purposes, etc.

red-gum† (red'gum), n. [A corruption of red-gound, q. v.] An unimportant red papular eruption of infants. Also called gum-rash and strophulus.

Their heads are hid with skulls,

Their Limbs with Red-gums.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, II., The Furies.

I found Charlotte quite in a fuss about the child: she was sure it was very ill: it cried and fretted, and was all over pimples. So I looked at it directly, and "Lord! my dear," says I, "it is nothing in the world but the red-gum."

Jane Austen, Sense and Sensibility, xxxvii.

red-haired (red'härd), a. [= Icel. raudhærdr; as red† + hair + -ed.] Having red or reddish hair.

red-hand (red'hand), a. Same as red-handed.

red-handed (red'han'ded), a. With red or bloody hands; hence, in the very act, as if with red or bloody hands: said originally of a person taken in the act of homicide, but extended figuratively to one caught in the perpetration of any crime: generally in the phrase to be taken red-handed.

I was pushed over by Pumblechook, exactly as if I had that moment picked a pocket, or fired a rick; indeed it was the general impression in court that I had been taken red-handed; for as Pumblechook shoved me before him through the crowd I heard some people say, "What's he done?" and others, "He's a young 'un too."

Dickens, Great Expectations, xlii.

redhead (red'hed), n. [< red† + head, n.] 1. A person having red hair.—2. redia (rē'di-ā), n.; pl. rediae (-ē). [NL., so called after Redi, an Italian naturalist.] The second larval stage of some fluke-worms or Trematoda, as Distoma, intervening between the condition of the ciliated embryo and the more advanced form known as cercaria. A redia is a sporocyst, containing the germs of other rediae, which eventually develop into cercariae. The redia of Distoma is also known as king's yellow worm. See cercaria (with cut) and Distoma.

From each ovum [of Distoma] issues a ciliated larva, showing the rudiments of . . . a Redia. The perfect Redia . . . bursts, and these new zooids (cercariae) are set free. . . . Several generations of Rediae may intervene between the third and fourth stages; or the mature animal may appear at the close of this stage, having undergone no Cercarian metamorphosis.

Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 180.

redient (rē'di-ent), a. [< L. redien(t)-s, ppr. of redire, go back, return, < red-, back, + ire, go: see iter.] Returning. E. H. Smith. [Rare.]

redout¹, n. [< ME. redour, redur, also raddour, reddour, reddur, < OF. rador, rador, radeur, violence, rapidity, < rade, < L. rapidus, rapid (see rapid); prob. confused also with raidour, radeur, roideur, stiffness, < L. rigidus, stiff, rigid: see rigid.] Violence; roughness.

His londea, his legemen, out of lyne broght;

His suster into seruage & to syn put;

And other redurs full ryte in his rewme dyd.

Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), I. 1806.

But trewely no fors of thi redour

To hym that over hymself hath the maystrye.

Chaucer, Fortune, I. 14.

redout^{1†}, v. See redoubt¹.

redout², n. [The form redoubt is erroneous, due to confusion with redoubt¹ and redoubtable; prop. redout (= D. G. redoute = Sw. redutt = Dan. redute), formerly also reduit (and, after L., redut); < OF. reduit, m., reduite, f., F. réduit, also (fem. It.) redoute = Sp. reducto = Pg. reducto, reduto = It. ridotta, a retreat, refuge, redout, < ML. reductus (> E. reduct), a retreat, refuge, redout, < L. reducere, bring back: see reduce.] In fort., a general name for nearly every class of works wholly inclosed and undefended by reëntering or flanking angles. The word is, however, most generally used for a small inclosed work of various form—polygonal, square, triangular, or even circular—serving mainly as a temporary field-work. The name is also given to a central or retired work constructed within another, to serve as a place of retreat for the defenders: in this sense generally reduit. Redouts are usually provided with parapet, ditch, scarps, banquettes, etc., as in regular fortification. They are especially useful in fortifying the tops of hills, in commanding passes, or in feeling the way through a hostile or wooded country.—Demilune redout, a redout placed within the demilune. = Syn. See fortification.

redout³ (rê-dout'), a. [< OF. redut, < L. reductus, brought back, pp. of reducere, bring back: see reduce. Cf. redout², n.] In her., bent in many angles: noting a cross with hooked extremities, in the form of the fylfot or swastika.

redoutable, a. See redoubtable.

redowa (red'ô-ä), n. [< F. redowa, < Bohem. rejdownak, rejdownachka, the dance so called, < rejdownati, turn, turn around, bustle about.] 1. A Bohemian dance, which has two forms—the rejdownak, resembling the waltz or the mazurka, and the rejdownachka, resembling the polka.—2. Music for such a dance or in its rhythm, which is properly triple and quick, but in another form is duple, and readily assimilated to that of the polka.

red-paidle, n. The lumpsucker. [Scotch.]

redpoll (red'pöl), n. [Also redpole: so called from the red color on the head; < red¹ + poll¹.] 1. A small fringilline bird of the genus Ægiptus (or Acanthis), the male of which has a crimson poll, a rosy-red breast, and the plumage streaked with flaxen and dusky brown and white. The bill is small, conic, acute, with a nasal ruff; the wings are pointed; the tail is emarginate. Several species inhabit the arctic and north temperate regions of Europe, Asia, and America. The common redpoll is Æ. linaria; the mealy redpoll is Æ. canescens; the American mealy redpoll is Æ. exilis.

Redpoll (Ægiptus linaria).

2. The red-poll warbler, or palm-warbler, of North America, Dendroica palmarum, having a chestnut-red poll: more fully called yellow red-poll. See palm-warbler.

red-poll (red'pôld), a. Having a red poll, or the top of the head red.

redraft (rê-draft'), v. t. [< re- + draft.] To draft or draw anew.

redraft (rê-draft'), n. [< redraft, v.] 1. A second draft or copy. — 2. A new bill of exchange which the holder of a protested bill draws on the drawer or indorsers, by which he reimburses to himself the amount of the protested bill with costs and charges.

redraw (rê-drâ'), v. [< re- + draw.] I. trans. To draw again; make a second draft or copy of.

II. intrans. In com., to draw a new bill of exchange to meet another bill of the same amount, or, as the holder of a protested bill, on the drawer or indorser.

redress (rê-dres'), v. [< ME. redressen, < OF. redresser, redrecer, redrecier, redresser, F. redresser, set up again, straighten, < re-, again, + dresser, direct, dress: see dress.] I. trans. 1. To set up or upright; make erect; reërect.

Right as floures, thogh the cold of nyghte
Yeclosed, stoupen on her stalkes lowe,
Redressen hem again the sonne brighte.

Chaucer, Troilus, li. 969.

2. To set right again; restore; amend; mend.

Redress me, mooder, and me chastise;
For certeynly my Faderes chastisinge,
That dar I nought abiden in no wise.

Chaucer, A. B. C., l. 129.

As broken glass no cement can redress,
So beauty blemish'd once 's for ever lost.

Shak., Pass. Pilgrim, l. 178.

In yonder spring of roses intermix'd
With myrtle, find what to redress till noon.

Milton, P. L., li. 219.

3. To put right, as a wrong; remedy; repair, relieve against, as an injury: as, to redress injuries; to redress grievances. See redress, n., 2.

And redress vs the damage that he don has,
By Paris his proude son, in our prise londia.

Destruction of Troy (R. E. T. S.), l. 4917.

Orisons or prayers is for to seyn a pitous wyl of herte that redresseth it in God and expreseth it by word outward to remoeven harmes.

Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

The state of this unconstant world . . . bringeth forth daily such new evils as must of necessity by new remedies be redrest.

Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vi. 2.

Their duty
And ready service shall redress their needs,
Not prating what they would be.

Fletcher, Valentinian, li. 3.

He who best knows how to keep his necessities private is the most likely person to have them redressed.

Goldsmith, The Bee, No. 3.

4. To relieve of anything unjust or oppressive; bestow relief upon; compensate; make amends to.

Redres mans sowle from alle mysery,
That he may enter the eternal glory.

Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 82.

Will Gaul or Muscovite redress ye?

Byron, Child Harold, li. 76.

II. † intrans. To rise again; reërect one's self.

Yet like the valliant Palme they did sustaine
Their peisant weight, redressing vp againe.

Hudson, tr. of Du Bartas's Judith, li.

redress (rê-dres'), n. [< OF. redresse, redresce, redrece, redress; from the verb: see redress, v.] 1. A setting right again; a putting into proper order; amendment; reformation.

The redress of boistrous & sturdie courages by perswasion.

Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poetrie, p. 19.

The father, with sharpe rebukes seasoned with louing lookes, causeth a redress and amendment in his childe.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 150.

For us the more necessary is a speedy redress of ourselves.

Hooker.

2. Deliverance from wrong, injury, or oppression; removal of grievances or oppressive burdens; undoing of wrong; reparation; indem-nification. In its most general sense redress includes whatever relief can be afforded against injustice, whether by putting an end to it, by compensation in damages, by punishing the wrong-doer, or otherwise.

Is not the sword the most violent redress that may be used for any evill?

Spenser, State of Ireland.

Be factious for redress of all these griefs.

Shak., J. C., i. 3. 118.

Fair majesty, the refuge and redress
Of those whom fate pursues and wants oppress.

Dryden, Æneid, i. 838.

Think not
But that there is redress where there is wrong,
So we are bold enough to seize it.

Shelley, The Cenci, iii. 1.

Ring in redress to all mankind.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvi.

To every one o' my grievances law gave Redress. Browning, Ring and Book, l. 237.

—Syn. 2. Relief, amends, compensation.

redress (rê-dres'), v. t. [< re- + dress.] To dress again, in any sense: as, to redress furniture or leather; to redress a wound.

redressal (rê-dres'al), n. [< redress + -al.] The act of redressing. Imp. Dict.

redresser (rê-dres'er), n. One who gives redress.

Don Quixote of the Mancha, the righter of wrongs, the redresser of injuries.

Shelton, Don Quixote, iv. 25. (Latham.)

redressible (rê-dres'i-bl), a. [< redress + -ible.] Capable of being redressed. Imp. Dict.

redressive (rê-dres'iv), a. [< redress + -ive.] Affording redress; giving relief. [Rare.]

Can I forget the generous band
Who, touch'd with human woe, redressive search'd
Into the horrors of the gloomy jail?

Thomson, Winter, l. 360.

redressless (rê-dres'les), a. [< redress + -less.] Without redress or amendment; without relief.

redressment (rê-dres'ment), n. [*< OF. redrece-ment, redressement, F. redressement; as redress
+ -ment.*] Redress; the act of redressing.

red-ribbon (red'rib'on), n. The band-fish.

redrive (rê-driv'), v. t. [< re- + drive.] To drive back; drive again. Southey.

red-roan (red'rôn), a. See roan.

red-robin (red'rob'in), n. The red-rust, Puccinia graminis. [Eng.]

redroot (red'rôt), n. 1. An American shrub, Ceanothus Americanus, the New Jersey tea. The stems are from 1 to 3 feet high from a dark-red root, the leaves ovate or oblong-ovate, the small white flowers gathered in rather pretty dense clusters at the ends of leafy shoots. The name is more or less extended to other members of the genus.

2. A herbaceous plant, Lachnanthes tinctoria, of the Hæmodoraceæ, or bloodwort family. It grows in wet sandy places in the eastern United States near the coast. It has a simple stem with sword-shaped leaves mostly from near the base, and woolly flowers, yellow within, crowded in a dense compound cyme. The root is red, and has been used in dyeing. Upon authority adduced by Darwin ("Origin of Species," ch. i.), the root of this plant is fatally poisonous to white pigs which eat it, but not to black; the statement, however, requires confirmation. Also paintroot.

3. The alkanet, Alkanna tinctoria. — 4. One of the pigweeds, Amarantus retroflexus. [U. S.]

redruthite (red'rôth-it), n. [< Redruth, in Cornwall, England, + -ite]. Copper-glance: same as chalcocite.

redsear (red'sêr), v. i. [< red + sear (†)]. To break or crack when too hot, as iron under the hammer: a word used by workmen. Also redshare.

red-seed (red'sêd), n. Small crustaceans, as ostracodes, copepods, etc., which float on the surface of the sea, and upon which mackerel, men-haden, etc., feed. Some red-seed is said to injure the fish.

red-shafted (red'shâf'ted), a. Having red shafts of the wing- and tail-feathers: specifically applied to Colaptes mexicanus, the red-shafted woodpecker or Mexican flicker, related to the common flicker or yellow-shafted woodpecker. It abounds in western North America.

redshank (red'shank), n. [< red + shank.]

1. The fieldfare, Turdus pilaris. [Local, Eng.] — 2. A wading bird of the family Scolopacidae and genus Totanus, having red shanks. The common redshank is T. calidris, about 11 inches long, com-

Irish, in allusion to their dress leaving the legs exposed.

Mamertinus . . . dooth note the Redshanks and the Irish (which are properlie the Scots) to be the onlie enimies of our nation.

Harrison, Descrip. of Britain, p. 6 (Hollinshed's Chron., l.). And when the Redshanks on the borders by Incursions made, and rang'd in battell stood

To beare his charge, from field he made them fle,
Where fahle Moine [in Galway] did blush with crimson blood.

Mir. for Maga. (England's Eliz., st. 106).

They lay upon the ground covered with skins, as the red-shanks do on heather. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 527.

Though all the Scottish hinds would not bear to be compared with those of the rich counties of South Britain, they would stand very well in competition with the peasants of France, Italy, and Savoy, not to mention the mountaineers of Wales, and the red-shanks of Ireland.

Smollett, Humphrey Clinker, ii. 41. (Davies.)

redshanks (red'shanks), n. 1. Same as herb-robert. — 2. See Polygonum.

redshare (red'shâr), v. i. A variant of redsear.

red-short (red'shört), a. Noting iron or steel when it is of such a character that it is brittle at a red heat.

The former substance [sulphur] rendering the steel more or less brittle when hot (red-short or hot-short).

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 283.

red-shortness (red'shört'nes), n. In metal, the quality or state of being red-short.

Red-shortness is often the result of the presence of an undue proportion of sulphur in the metal.

W. H. Greenwood, Steel and Iron, p. 10.

The cold-shortness or red-shortness of iron or steel is due principally to an admixture of oxide of iron.

Sci. Amer., N. S., LX. 408.

red-shouldered (red'shöl'derd), a. Having the "shoulder"—that is, the carpal angle or bend of the wing—red, as a bird. The red-shouldered blackbird is Agelaius gubernator, common in western North America, where it replaces to some extent the common red-winged blackbird, from which it differs in having the scarlet patch on the wing not bordered with buff. The red-shouldered buzzard is Buteo lineatus, one of the commonest of the large hawks of the United States, having the lesser wing-coverts reddish when adult. — Red-shouldered falcon, the adult red-shouldered buzzard.

red-sided (red'si'ded), a. Having red on the sides: specifically noting the red-winged thrush, Turdus iliacus.

redsides (red'sidz), n. A small cyprinoid fish, Notropis or Lythrurus ardens, common in the streams of the southern United States. Also called redfin.

redskin (red'skin), n. A Red Indian; a North American Indian.

The Virginia frontiersmen were angry with the Pennsylvania traders for selling rifles and powder to the redskins.

The Atlantic, LXIV. 819.

red-spider (red'spi'dér), n. A small red mite or acarine, Tetranychus telarius, formerly called Acarus telarius, now placed in the family Tetranychidae: found in conservatories.

red-staff (red'stáf), n. A millers' straight-edge, used in dressing millstones. The true edge, reddened by ochre, is gently rubbed on the stone, and the projecting points are thus detected, even when the irregularity of surface is very minute.

redstart (red'stärt), n. [< red + start]. One of several entirely different birds which have the tail more or less red. (a) A small sylvine bird, Ruticilla phœnicura, of Europe, Asia, and Africa, related to the redbreast and bluthroast. Also firetail, red-tail, etc. A similar species, R. titys or tithys, is known as the black redstart. (b) In the United States, a fly-catching warbler, Setophaga ruticilla, of the family Sylviolidae or Mniotiltidae. The male is lustrous blue-black, with white belly and vent, the sides of the breast, the lining of the wings, and much of the extent of the wing- and tail-feathers fiery orange or flame-color, the bill and feet black. The female is mostly plain olivaceous, with the parts which are orange in the male clear pale yellow. The length is 5½ inches, the extent 7½. This beautiful bird abounds in woodland in eastern North America; it is migratory and insectivorous, has a singular song, builds a neat nest in the fork of a branch, and lays four or five eggs, which are white, speckled with shades of reddish brown.—Blue-throated redstart. Same as bluethroat. redstreak (red'strēk), n. 1. A sort of apple, so called from the color of the skin.

Redshank (Totanus calidris).

European Redstart (Ruticilla phœnicura).

The redstreak, of all cyder fruit, hath obtained the preference. Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. Cider pressed from redstreak apples.

Herefordshire redstreak made of rotten apples at the Three Cranes, true Brunswick Mum brew'd at S. Katharines. Character of a Coffee-house (1673), p. 3. (Hallivell.)

redtail (red'tāl), n. and a. 1. Same as redstart (a.).—2. The red-tailed buzzard, Buteo borealis, one of the commonest and largest hawks of North America, when adult having the upper side of the tail bright chestnut-red. The plumage otherwise is very variable, not only with age, but also according to geographical distribution, there being several varieties or local races in western parts of the continent. It is commonly known as hen-hawk or chicken-hawk, and the young, without the red tail, is the white-breasted hawk. The male is from 19 to 22 inches long, and 48 inches or more in spread of wing; the female is 21 to 24 inches long, and spreads 56 inches. See cut under Buteo.

II. a. Having a red tail.

red-tape (red'tāp'), a. [< red tape: see tape.] Pertaining to or characterized by official routine or formality. See red tape, under tape.

Exposures by the press and criticisms in Parliament leave no one in ignorance of the vices of red-tape routine. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 55.

We working men, when we do come out of the furnace, come out not tinsel and papier maché, like those fops of red-tape statesmen, but steel and granite.

Kingley, Alton Locke, iv. (Davies.)

red-taped (red'tāpt'), a. [< red tape + -ed.] Same as red-tape. Nature, XLII. 106.

red-tapery (red'tāp'e-ri), n. [< red tape + -ery.] Same as red-tapism.

red-tapism (red'tāp'izm), n. [< red tape + -ism.] Strict observance of official formalities; a system of vexatious or tedious official routine.

He at once showed . . . how little he had of the official element which is best described as red-tapism.

T. W. Reid, Cabinet Portraits, p. 52.

He loudly denounces the Technovnik spirit—or, as we should say, red-tapism in all its forms.

D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 261.

red-tapist (red'tāp'ist), n. [< red tape + -ist.] 1. A clerk in a public office. Quarterly Rev.—

2. One who adheres strictly to forms and routine in official or other business.

You seem a smart young fellow, but you must throw over that stiff red-tapist of yours, and go with Public Opinion and Myself. Bulwer, My Novel, x. 20. (Davies.)

In no country is the red-tapist so out of place as here. Every calling is filled with bold, keen, subtle-witted men, fertile in expedients and devices, who are perpetually inventing new ways of buying cheaply, underselling, or attracting custom.

W. Mathews, Getting on in the World, p. 99.

red-thighed (red'thīd), a. Having or characterized by red thighs.—Red-thighed locust. See locust.

red-throated (red'thrō'ted), a. Having a patch of red on the throat: as, the red-throated diver, Colymbus or Urinator septentrionalis.

red-thrush (red'thrush), n. The redwing, Turdus iliacus.

red-tipped (red'tipt), a. Having the wings tipped with red: as, the red-tipped clearwing, a British moth, Sesia formicæformis.

redtop (red'top), n. A kind of bent-grass, Agrostis vulgaris (A. alba, var. vulgaris). The species is common throughout the northern parts of the Old World, and is thoroughly naturalized in America. It is marked to the eye by its large light panicle of minute spikelets on delicate branches, which is of a reddish hue. Other varieties, called florin, white bent, etc., have a whitish top and a longer ligule. Redtop, at least in the United States, is a highly valued pasture-grass, and is also sown for hay. It forms a fine turf, and is suitable for lawns. Also called fine bent, finetop-grass, and herd's grass. [U. S.]—False redtop, the fowl meadow-grass, Poa serotina, which has somewhat the aspect of redtop.—Northern or mountain redtop, Agrostis exarata, a species found from Wisconsin to the Pacific, allied to the common redtop, and giving promise of similar service in its own range.—Tall redtop, a tall reddish wiry grass, Tridax cuprea, found in the United States.

red-tubs (red'tubz), n. The saphirine gurnard, Trigla hirundo. [Local, Eng.] redub (rē-dub'), v. t. [Early mod. E. also redoub; < OF. redoubier, redauber (also radauber, radouber, F. radouber), repair, mend, fit, < re-, again, + douber (adouber), mend, repair, etc.: see dub.] To repair or make reparation for; make amends for; requite.

Whiche damage . . . neither with treasure ne with power can be redoubed.

Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, li. 14.

I doubt not by Goddes grace so honestly to redubbe all thynges that have been anys.

Ellis, Literary Letters, p. 4.

O Gods, redubbe them vengeance lust.

Phaer, Æneid, vi.

Whether they [monks] will conform themselves gladly, for the redubbing of their former trespasses, to go to other houses of their coat, where they shall be well received.

State Papers, I. 540, in R. W. Dixon's Hist. Church of Eng., vii., note.

redubbert (rē-dub'ēr), n. [*Also redubbor; < OF. redoubier, radoubier, one who mends or repairs a ship, < redoubier, radouber, mend: see redub.] One who bought stolen cloth and so altered it in color or fashion that it could not be recognized.

reduce (rē-dūs'), v. t.; pret. and pp. reduced, ppr. reducing. [< ME. reducen, < OF. reducier, vernacularly reduire, F. reduire = Pr. reduzir, reduire = Cat. reduir = Sp. reducir = Pg. reducir = It. ridurre, < L. reducere, lead or bring back, draw back, restore, replace, bring to a certain condition, reduce, < re-, back, + ducere, lead, bring: see duct. Cf.educt, reduit, redout.] 1. To lead or bring back; restore; resolve to a former state.

Therupon he reduced to their memorie the battalies they had fought.

Abate the edge of traitors, gracious Lord,

That would reduce these bloody days again.

Shak., Rich. III., v. 5. 36.

A good man will go a little out of his road to reduce the wandering traveller; but if he will not return, it will be an unreasonable compliance to go along with him to the end of his wandering.

Jer. Taylor, Rule of Conscience, II. iii. 19.

Mr. Cotton . . . did spend most of his time, both publicly and privately, to discover . . . errors, and to reduce such as were gone astray.

Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 304.

And 'cause I see the truth of his affliction, Which may be your's, or mine, or any body's, Whose passions are neglected, I will try My best skill to reduce him.

Shirley, Hyde Park, v. 1.

It were but right

And equal to reduce me to my dust.

Milton, P. L., x. 748.

2. In surg., to restore to its proper place, or so that the parts concerned are brought back to their normal topographical relations: as, to reduce a dislocation, fracture, or hernia.—3. To bring to any specified state, condition, or form: as, to reduce civil affairs to order; to reduce a man to poverty or despair; to reduce glass to powder; to reduce a theory to practice; to reduce a Latin phrase to English.

Being inspired with the holy spirits of God, they [the 72 Interpreters chosen by Eleazar out of each tribe] reduced out of Hebrue into Greeke all the partes of the olde Testament.

Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 380.

Do you then blame and finde faulte with soe good an Acte in that good pope as the reducing of such a greate people to Christianitie?

Spenser, State of Ireland.

He had beene a peace-maker to reduce such and such, which were at oddes, to amitie.

Purchase, Pilgrimage, p. 453.

Reduce'd to practice, his beloved rule

Would only prove him a consummate fool.

Cowper, Conversation, l. 139.

Holland was reduced to such a condition that peace was her first necessity.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., p. 463.

4. In metal. and chem., to bring into the metallic form; separate, as a metal, from the oxygen or other mineralizer with which it may be combined, or change from a higher to a lower degree of oxidation: as, to reduce the ores of silver or copper.—5. To atone for; repair; redress.

Till they reduce the wrongs done to my father.

Marlowe.

6. To bring down; diminish in length, breadth, thickness, size, quantity, value, or the like: as, to reduce expenses; to reduce the quantity of meat in diet; to reduce the price of goods; to reduce the strength of spirit; to reduce a figure or design (to make a smaller copy of it without changing the form or proportion).

He likes your house, your housemaid, and your pay;

Reduce his wages, or get rid of her,

Tom quits you.

Cowper, Truth, l. 211.

7. To bring to an inferior condition; weaken; impoverish; lower; degrade; impair in fortune, dignity, or strength: as, the family were in reduced circumstances; the patient was much reduced by hemorrhage.

Yet lo! in me what authors have to brag on!

Reduced at last to bias in my own dragon.

Pope, Dunciad, iii. 286.

The Chamber encroached upon the sovereign, thwarted him, reduced him to a cypher, imprisoned him, and slew him.

W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 93.

I dare say he was some poor musician, or singer, or a reduced gentleman, perhaps, for he always came after dusk, or else on bad, dark days.

Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 331.

8. To subdue, as by force of arms; bring into subjection; render submissive: as, to reduce mutineers to submission; Spain, Gaul, and Britain were reduced by the Roman arms.

Charles marched northward at the head of a force sufficient, as it seemed, to reduce the Covenanters to submission.

Macaulay, Nugent's Hampden.

Montpensier was now closely besieged, till at length, reduced by famine, he was compelled to capitulate.

Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., li. 2.

The fortresses garrisoned by the French in Spain were reduced; but at what a prodigious expenditure of life was this effected!

Encyc. Brit., IX. 457.

9. To bring into a class, order, genus, or species; bring within certain limits of definition or description.

I think it [analogy between words and reason] very worthy to be reduced into a science by itself.

Bacon, Advancement of Learning, li. 236.

Zanchius reduceth such Infidels to four chief sects.

Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 508.

I shall . . . reduce these authors under their respective classes.

Addison, Of the Christian Religion, § l. 1.

The variations of languages are reduced to rules.

Johnson, Dict.

10. To show (a problem) to be merely a special case of one already solved.—11. To change the denomination of (numbers): as, to reduce a number of shillings to farthings, or conversely (see reduction (i)); change the form of (an algebraic expression) to one simpler or more convenient.—12. To prove the conclusion of (an indirect syllogism) from its premises by means of direct syllogism and immediate inference alone.—13. To adjust (an observed quantity) by subtracting from it effects due to the special time and place of observation, especially, in astronomy, by removing the effects of refraction, parallax, aberration, precession, and nutation, changing a circummeridian to a meridian altitude, and the like.—14. In Scots law, to set aside by an action at law; rescind or annul by legal means: as, to reduce a deed, writing, etc.—15. Milit., to take off the establishment and strike off the pay-roll, as a regiment. When a regiment is reduced, the officers are generally put upon half-pay.—Reduced eye, an ideal eye in which the two nodal points of the refractive system are considered as united into one, and also the two principal points: this simplifies the mathematical treatment of certain problems.—Reduced form of an imaginary, the form $r(\cos \phi + i \sin \phi)$, first used in 1823 by Cauchy.—Reduced hub. See hub, 7.—Reduced inertia of a machine. See inertia and machine.—Reduced iron, metallic iron in a fine powder, obtained by reducing ferric oxide by hydrogen at a dull-red heat. Also called powder of iron, iron-powder, iron by hydrogen.—Reduced latitude. Same as geocentric latitude (which see, under latitude).—Reduced reaction-time. See reaction-time.—Reducing flame, in blowpipe analysis. See flame, 1.—Reducing square. See square.—To reduce the square (mult.), to bring back a battalion which has been formed in a square to its former position in line or column.—Farroe.—To reduce to the ranks (mult.), to degrade, for misconduct, to the condition of a private soldier.—Syn. 6. To lessen, decrease, abate, curtail, shorten, abridge, contract, retrench.

reducible (rē-dū'sa-bl), a. [= OF. reduisable; as reduce + -able. Cf. reducible.] Same as reducible.

They [young students] should be habituated to consider every excellence as reducible to principles.

Sir J. Reynolds, Discourses, I. viii.

reducement (rē-dūs'ment), n. [= Sp. reducimiento = It. riducimento; as reduce + -ment.]

1. The act of reducing; a bringing back; restoration.

This once select Nation of God . . . being ever since incapable of any Coalition or Reducement into one Body politic.

Howell, Letters, li. 8.

By this we shall know whether yours be that ancient Prelacy which you say was first constituted for the reducement of quiet and unanimity into the Church.

Milton, Church-Government, i. 6.

2. Reduction; abatement.

After a little reducement of his passion, and that time and further meditation had disposed his senses to their perfect estate.

History of Patient Griel, p. 40. (Halliwell.)

reducent (rê-dû'sent), a. and n. [< L. reducent(-t)s, ppr. of reducere: see reduce.] I. a. Tending to reduce.

II. n. That which reduces. Imp. Dict.

reducer (rê-dû'ser), n. 1. One who or that which reduces, in any sense.

The last substances enumerated are those in general use as reducers or developors in photography.

Silver Stainbeam, p. 95.

An accumulator is indeed merely a chemical converter which is unequalled as a pressure-reducer.

Electric Rev. (Eng.), XXV. 583.

2. A joint-piece for connecting pipes of varying diameter. It may be of any form, straight, bent, etc. Also called reducing-coupling.

reducibility (rê-dû-sibil'i-ti), n. [< reducible + -ity (see -ibility).] Reducibleness; reducibility.

a. reducer, connecting the pipe of larger diameter b with the pipe of smaller diameter c.

The theorem of the reducibility of the general problem of transformation to the rational is, however, stated without proof in this paper.

Encyc. Brit., XIII. 70.

It was, however, quite evident from . . . the history and the complete reducibility of the tumour, that it must be a pulmonary hernia.

Lancet, No. 3429, p. 1002.

reducible (rê-dû'si-bl), a. [< OF. reducibile = Sp. reducible = Pg. reducible = It. riducibile; as reduce + -ible. Cf. reducible.] Capable of being reduced; reducible.

In the new World they have a World of Drinks; for there is no Root, Flower, Fruit, or Pulse but is reducible to a notable Liquor.

Howell, Letters, ii. 54.

The line of its motion was neither straight nor yet reducible to any curve or mixed line that I had met with among mathematicians.

Boyle, Works, III. 683.

I have never been the less satisfied that no cause reducible to the known laws of nature occasioned my sufferings.

Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 198.

Reducible circuit. See circuit.—Reducible hernia, a hernia whose contents can be returned by pressure or posture.

reducibleness (rê-dû'si-bl-nes), n. The quality of being reducible.

The reducibleness of ice back again into water.

Boyle, Works, III. 50.

reducibly (rê-dû'si-bli), adv. In a reducible manner.

reducine (rê-dû'sin), n. [< reduce + -ine.] A decomposition product of urochrome.

reducing-coupling (rê-dû'sing-kup'ling), n. Same as reducer, 2.

reducing-press (rê-dû'sing-pres), n. An auxiliary press used in sheet-metal work to complete shapes that have been partially struck up.

reducing-scale (rê-dû'sing-skål), n. A form of scale used by surveyors to reduce chains and links to acres and roods by inspection, and also in mapping and drawing to different scales; a surveying-scale.

reducing-T (rê-dû'sing-tê), n. A T-shaped pipe-coupling, having arms different from the stem in diameter of opening. It is used to unite pipes of different sections. Also written reducing-tee.

reducing-valve (rê-dû'sing-valv), n. In steam-engine, a peculiar valve controlled by forces acting in opposite directions. The parts are so arranged that the valve opens to its extreme limit only when the pressure on the delivery side is at a prescribed minimum, closing the part in the valve-seat more or less when this minimum is exceeded. The pressure on the delivery side of the valve is thus kept from varying (except between very narrow limits) from its predetermined pressure, although the pressure on the opposite side may be variable, and always higher than on the delivery side. Such valves are much used for maintaining lower pressures in steam-heating and -drying apparatus than is carried in the boiler. They are also used in automatic air-brakes for railways and in other pneumatic machines, and, in some forms, as gas-regulators for equalizing the pressure of gas delivered to gas-burners, etc. Also called pressure-reducing valve.

reduct (rê-duk't), r. t. [< L. reductus, ppr. of reducere, lead or bring back: see reduce.] To reduce.

All the kynes host there beying assembled and reducte into one company.

Hall, Edw. IV., an. 10.

Pray let me reduct some two or three shillings for points and ribbands.

B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iv. 5.

reduct (rê-duk't), n. [< ML. reductus, a withdrawing-place: see reduct.] In building, a little piece or cut taken out of a part, member, etc., to make it more uniform, or for any other purpose; a quirk. Guill.

reductibility (rê-duk-ti-bil'i-ti), n. [= F. reductibilité; as reduct + -ibility.] The quality of being reducible; reducibleness. Imp. Dict.

reductio ad absurdum (rê-duk'shi-ô ad ab-sêr'-dum), [L.: reductio, a leading, reduction; ad, to; absurdum, neut. of absurdus, absurd: see absurd.] A reduction to an absurdity; the proof of a proposition by proving the falsity of its contradictory opposite: an indirect demonstration.

In geometry the reductio ad absurdum consists in drawing a figure whose parts are supposed to have certain relations, and then showing that this leads to a conclusion contrary to a known proposition, whence it follows that the parts of the figure cannot have those relations. Thus, in Euclid's "Elements" the proposition that if a triangle has two angles equal the sides opposite those angles will be equal is proved as follows. In the triangle ABC, let the angles ABC and ACB be equal. Then, suppose AB to be greater than AC. Lay off BD = AC and join DC. Then, comparing the two triangles ACB and DBC, we have in the former the sides AC and BC and their included angle ACB equal in the latter to the sides DB and CB and their included angle DBC. Hence, these two triangles would be equal, or the part would be equal to the whole. This proof is a reductio ad absurdum. This kind of reasoning is considered somewhat objectionable as not showing the principle from which the proposition flows; but it is a perfectly conclusive mode of proof, and, in fact, is in all cases readily converted into a direct proof. Thus, in the above example, we have only to compare the triangle ABC with itself, considering it as two triangles according as the angle B is named before C or vice versa. In the triangle ABC the angles B and C with the included side BC are respectively equal in the triangle ACB to the angles C and B with the included side CB; hence the other parts of the triangles are equal, and the side AC opposite the first angle B in the first triangle is equal to the side AB opposite the first angle C in the second triangle.

reduction (rê-duk'shon), n. [< OF. reduction, F. réduction = Pr. reductio = Sp. reducción = Pg. redução = It. riduzione, < L. reductio(n)], a leading or bringing back, a restoring, restoration, < reducere, lead or bring back: see reduce, reduct.] The act of reducing, or the state of being reduced. (a) The act of bringing back or restoring.

For reduction of your majesty's realm of Ireland to the unity of the Church. Ep. Burnet, Records, II. ii.

(b) Conversion into another state or form: as, the reduction of a body to powder; the reduction of things to order. (c) Diminution: as, the reduction of the expenses of government; the reduction of the national debt; a reduction of 25 per cent. made to wholesale buyers.

Let him therefore first make the proper reduction in the account, and then see what it amounts to.

Waterland, Works, VI. 186.

(d) Conquest; subjugation: as, the reduction of a province under the power of a foreign nation; the reduction of a fortress. (e) A settlement or parish of South American Indians converted and trained by the Jesuits.

Governing and civilizing the natives of Brazil and Paraguay in the missions and reductions, or ministering, at the hourly risk of his life, to his coreligionists in England under Elizabeth and James I., the Jesuit appears alike devoted, indefatigable, cheerful, and worthy of hearty admiration and respect. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 649.

The Indians [under the Jesuits in Paraguay] were gathered into towns or communal villages called bourgen or reductions, where they were taught the common arts, agriculture, and the practice of rearing cattle. Johns Hopkins Univ. Studies, 8th ser., IV. 32.

(f) The bringing of a problem to depend on a problem already solved. (g) The transformation of an algebraic expression into another of a simpler kind. (h) The lowering of the values of the numerator and denominator of a fraction, or of the antecedent and consequent of a ratio, by dividing both by the same quantity. (i) The conversion of a quantity expressed in terms of one denomination so as to express it in terms of another denomination. Ascending reduction is conversion to terms of larger units; descending reduction, conversion to terms of smaller units. (j) The proof of the conclusion of an indirect syllogism from its premises by means of a direct syllogism and immediate inferences. This is said to be a reduction to the mode of direct syllogism employed. (k) A direct syllogism proving, by means of conversions and other immediate inferences, that the conclusion of an indirect syllogism follows from its premises. (l) The act or process of making a copy of a figure, map, design, draft, etc., on a smaller scale, preserving the original proportions; also, the result of this process. (m) In surgery, the operation of restoring a dislocated or fractured bone to its former place. (n) Separation of a metal from substances combined with it: used especially with reference to lead, zinc, and copper, and also applied to the treatment of iron ore, as when steel is made from it by a direct process. (o) In astronomy, the correction of observed quantities for instrumental errors, as well as for refraction, parallax, aberration, precession, and nutation, so as to bring out their cosidical significance. A similar process is applied to observations in other physical sciences. (p) In Scots law, an action for setting aside a deed, writing, etc.—Apagogical reduction, in logic, a reduction in which the contradictory of the conclusion becomes one of the premises, and the contradictory of one of the premises the conclusion. Apagogical reduction is an application of the reductio ad absurdum, and is also called reductio per impossibile. Example:

Baroco.
All M is P.
Some S is not P.
Ergo, Some S is not M.
Reductio per impossibile.
All M is P.
All S is M.
Ergo, All S is P.

Charles-Zeuthen reduction, a method of finding how many figures fulfill certain conditions, by the consideration of degenerate figures composed of simpler figures with lower constants. Thus, in this way we readily find that the number of cones touching five given cones in a plane is 3.264.—Iron-reduction process. See process.—Long reduction, in logic, a reduction in which the major premise of the original syllogism becomes the minor premise, and vice versa, and in which one of the premises and the conclusion are converted. Example:

Camestres.
All M is P.
No S is P.
Ergo, No S is M.
Long Reduction.
No P is S.
All M is P.
Ergo, No M is S.

Ostensive reduction, that reduction which has for its premises the original premises or their conversions, and for its conclusion the original conclusion or its converse.

—Reduction and reduction-improvement, in Scots law, the designations given to the two varieties of rescissory actions. See improvement.—Reduction redutive, an action in which a decree of reduction which has been erroneously or improperly obtained is sought to be reduced.

—Reduction to the ecliptic, the difference between the anomaly of a planet reckoned from its node and the longitude reckoned from the same point.—Short reduction, in logic, a reduction which differs from the original syllogism only in having one of its premises converted. The following is an example:

Cesare.
No M is P.
All S is P.
Ergo, No S is M.
Short Reduction.
No P is M.
All S is P.
Ergo, No S is M.

=Syn. (c) Lessening, decrease, abatement, curtailment, abridgment, contraction, retrenchment.

reduction-compasses (rê-duk'shon-kum'pas-êz), n. pl. Proportional dividers, or whole-and-half dividers.

reduction-formula (rê-duk'shon-fôr'mû-lä), n. In the integral calculus, a formula depending on integration by parts, reducing an integral to another nearer to one of the standard forms.

reduction-works (rê-duk'shon-wêrks), n. sing. and pl. A metallurgical establishment; smelting-works.

reductive (rê-duk'tiv), a. and n. [= F. réductif = Sp. Pg. reductivo = It. riduttivo, < L. reductus, ppr. of reducere, lead or bring back: see reduce, reduct.] I. a. Having the property, power, or effect of reducing; tending to reduce.

Inquire into the repentance of thy former life particularly: whether it were of a great and perfect grief, and productive of fixed resolutions of holy living, and reductice of these to act. Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iv. 6.

Reduction redutive. See reduction.—Reductive conversion, in logic, a conversion of a proposition in which there is some modification of the subject or predicate: as, no man is a mother, therefore no mother is some man. See conversion.—Reductive principle, a principle by which an indirect syllogism is reduced to a direct mood. The reductive principles were said to be conversion, transposition, and reductio per impossibile.

II. n. That which has the power of reducing.

So that it should seem there needed no other reductive of the numbers of men to an equality than the wars that have happened in the world.

Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 215.

reductively (rê-duk'tiv-li), adv. By reduction; by consequence.

Love, and simplicity, and humility, and usefulness: . . . I think these do reductively contain all that is excellent in the whole conjugation of Christian graces.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 44.

reducti, n. See reduct.
redundance (rê-dun'dans), n. [< OF. redondance, F. redondance, redondance = Sp. Pg. redundancia = It. ridondanza, < L. redundantia, an overflow, superfluity, excess, < redundan(t)s, redundant: see redundant.] 1. The character of being redundant; superfluity; superabundance.

He is a poor unwieldy wretch that commits faults out of the redundance of his good qualities.

Steele, Tatler, No. 27.

2. That which is redundant or in excess; anything superfluous.

redundancy (rê-dun'dan-si), n. [As redundance (see -cy).] Same as redundance.

The mere Redundancy of youth's contentedness. Wordsworth, Prelude, vi.
=Syn. Verbosity, Tautology, etc. (see pleonasm); surplussage.

redundant (rê-dun'dant), a. [< OF. redondant, F. redondant, redondant = Sp. Pg. redundante = It. ridondante, < L. redundan(t)s, ppr. of redundare, overflow, rebound: see rebound.] 1. Rolling or flowing back, as a wave or surge.

On his rear,
Circular base of rising folds, that tower'd
Fold above fold, a surging maze! his head . . .
Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass Floated redundant. Milton, P. L., ix. 503.

2. Superfluous; exceeding what is natural or necessary; superabundant; exuberant.

Notwithstanding the redundant oil in fishes, they do not increase fat so much as flesh. Arbutus, Alimentum, iv. 1.

With foliage of such dark redundant growth.

Couper, Task, i. 226.

A farmer's daughter, with redundant health.

Crabbe, Works, VIII. 216.

3. Using or containing more words or images than are necessary or useful: as, a redundant style.

Where the author is redundant, mark those paragraphs to be retrenched. Watts.

Redundant chord or interval, in music, same as augmented chord or interval—that is, one greater by a half-step than the corresponding major chord or interval. Also pluperfect, extreme, superfluous chord or interval. So redundant fourth, fifth, sixth, etc.—Redundant hyperbola, a curve having three or more asymptotes. Redundant number, a number the sum of whose divisors exceeds the number itself.

redundantly (rē-dun'dant-li), adv. In a redundant manner; with superfluity or excess; superfluously; superabundantly.

red-underwing (red'un'der-wing), n. A large British moth, Catocala nupta, expanding three inches, having the under wings red bordered with black. See underwing.

reduplicate (rē-dū'pli-kāt), v. [< ML. (LL. in derived noun) reduplicatus, pp. of reduplicare (> It. reduplicare = Sp. Pg. reduplicar), redouble, < L. re-, again, + duplicare, double, duplicate: see duplicate. Cf. double.] I. trans. 1. To double again; multiply; repeat.

That reduplicated advice of our Saviour.

Bp. Pearson, Expos. of Creed, xii.

Then followed that ringing and reduplicated laugh of his, so like the joyous bark of a dog when he starts for a ramble with his master.

Lowell, The Century, XXXV. 514.

2. In philol., to repeat, as a syllable or the initial part of a syllable (usually a root-syllable). See reduplication.

II. intrans. In philol., to be doubled or repeated; undergo reduplication: as, reduplicating verbs.

reduplicate (rē-dū'pli-kāt), a. [= F. redupliqué = Sp. Pg. reduplicado = It. reduplicato, < ML. reduplicatus, pp.: see the verb.] I. Redoubled; repeated; reduplicative.

Reduplicate words are formed of repetitions of sound, as in murmur, singsong. S. S. Haldeman, Etymology, p. 23.

2. In bot.: (a) Valvate, with the edges folded back so as to project outward: said of petals and sepals in one form of estivation. (b) Describing an estivation so characterized. Also reduplicative.

reduplication (rē-dū'pli-kā'shon), n. [= F. reduplicatio = Sp. reduplicacion = Pg. reduplicação = It. reduplicazione, < L. reduplicatio(n-), < (ML.) reduplicare, redouble, reduplicate: see reduplicate.] I. The act of reduplicating, redoubling, or repeating, or the state of being reduplicated.

Jesus, by reduplication of his desire, fortifying it with a command, made it in the Baptist to become a duty.

Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 97.

The memory-train is liable to change in two respects, which considerably modify its structure: viz., (1) through the evanescence of some parts, and (2) through the partial recurrence of like impressions, which produces reduplications of varying amount and extent in other parts.

J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 61.

2. In rhet., a figure in which a verse ends with the same word with which the following begins.

—3. In philol.: (a) The repetition of a syllable (usually a root-syllable), or of the initial part, often with more or less modification, in various processes of word-formation and inflection. In our languages, it is especially the perfect tense that exhibits reduplication: thus, Gothic hathald, Latin cecini, Greek τέφεννα, Sanskrit babhāra; but also the present tense: thus, Latin stato, Greek ἵδωμι, Sanskrit dadāmi, etc.; and elsewhere. (b) The new syllable formed by reduplication.—4. In logic, an expression affixed to the subject of a proposition, showing the formal cause of its possession of the predicate: as, "man, as an animal, has a stomach," where the expression "as an animal" is the reduplication.—5. In anat. and zool., a folding of a part; a folded part; a fold or duplication, as of a membrane, of the skin, etc. Also reduplicature.—Attic reduplication, in Gr. gram., reduplication in the perfect of some verbs beginning with α, ε, ο, by prefixing the first two letters of the stem to the same letters with temporal augment: as ἀλάληφα from ἀλέφω, ἀκήκοα from ἀκούω. A similar reduplication is found in the second aorist (ἔγαγον from ἀγω) and in the present (ἀπαίσιμω). This reduplication did not especially characterize the Attic as distinguished from contemporary dialects, but was called Attic by late grammarians as opposed to the less classic form used in their own days.

reduplicative (rē-dū'pli-kā-tiv), a. [< F. reduplicatif = Sp. Pg. reduplicativo = It. reduplicativo, < NL. reduplicativus, < ML. reduplicare, reduplicate: see reduplicate.] I. Containing or effecting reduplication, in any sense.

Some logicians refer reduplicative propositions to this place, as "Men, considered as men, are rational creatures"—that is, because they are men. Watts, Logic, II. 2.

2. In bot., same as reduplicate, 2.

reduplicature (rē-dū'pli-kā-tūr), n. [< reduplicate + -ure.] Same as reduplication, 5. [Rare.]

The body [in Phyllopoda] is either cylindrically elongated and clearly segmented, without free reduplicature of the skin, e. g. Branchipus, or it may be covered by a broad and flattened shield. Claus, Zoology (trans.), p. 416.

Reduviidae (rē-dū-vī-i-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Stephens, 1829), < Redurius + -idae.] An important family of predaceous bugs, named from the genus Redurius. They have the thoracic segments concentrated, the coxae short, two ocelli, four-jointed antennae, a three-jointed rostrum, three-jointed tarsi, and long strong legs, of which the anterior are sometimes prehensile. It is a large and wide-spread family, containing a great variety of forms grouped into nine subfamilies and many genera. Throughout their life they are predaceous and feed on other insects. A very few species, like Conorhinus sanguinivorus, suck the blood of warm-blooded animals. See also cuts under Conorhinus, Harpactor, Pirates, and Redurius.

reduvioid (rē-dū-vī-oid), a. and n. [< Redurius + -oid.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Reduviidae; resembling a reduviid.

II. n. A member of the family Reduviidae.

Reduvius (rē-dū-vi-us), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1776), < L. reduvia, a hangnail.] A genus of heteropterous insects, typical of the family Reduviidae, formerly of very large extent, but now restricted to species which have the postocular section of the head longer than the antecular section, and the first joint of the head scarcely shorter than the second. About 50 species are now included, most of them African. A few are European, and one only is found in America. R. personatus is a European species, an inch long, known as the fly-bug, of a dark-brown color with reddish legs.

redux (rē'duks), a. [L., that leads or brings back, also led or brought back, < reducere, lead or bring back: see reduce.] I. Led or brought back, as from a distance, from captivity, etc.: as, "Astrea Redux" (the title of a poem by Dryden on the restoration and return of Charles II.).

Lady Laura Standish is the best character in "Phineas Finn" and its sequel "Phineas Redux."

Trollope, Autobiog., xvii.

2. In med., noting the return of certain physical signs, after their disappearance in consequence of disease.

redware (red'wār), n. A seaweed, Laminaria digitata, the common tangle.

red-wat (red'wot'), a. [< red¹ + wat, a Sc. form of wet: see wet.] Wetted by something red, as blood. [Scotch.]

The hand of her kindred has been red-wat in the heart's blude o' my name; but my heart says, Let bygones be bygones. Blackwood's Mag., VII. 384.

redwater (red'wā'tēr), n. A disease of cattle, also called hemoglobinuria, or hemoglobinemia, because the coloring matter (hemoglobin) of the red blood-corpuscles which have been broken up in the system appears in the urine, and imparts to it a pale-red or a dark-red, portwine color. The disease prevails in various countries in undrained, unimproved meadows and in woods, whence it is also called wood-evil. According to some, it is caused by the ingestion of food growing in such localities; others attribute it to rheumatic attacks, resulting from exposure. Redwater is also a prominent symptom of Texas cattle-fever, and occasionally accompanies anthrax in cattle. It is rarely observed among sheep and swine.

red-water tree (red'wā'tēr trē), n. The sassy-bark tree. See Erythrophloeum.

redweed (red'wēd), n. 1. The corn-poppay, Papaver Rhæas, whose red petals have been used as a dye. Also applied locally to various reddish-stemmed plants. [Eng.]—2. A species of Phytolacca, or pokeweed. [West Indies.] red-whelk (red'hwelk), n. A whelk, Chrysodomus antiquus. See cut under reversed. [Local, Eng.] red-whiskered (red'hwis'kērd), a. Having red whiskers: applied in ornithology to several birds: as, the red-whiskered bulbul, Otocompsa jocosa of India.

redwing (red'wing), n. 1. The red-winged thrush of Europe, Turdus iliacus.—2. The red-winged marsh-blackbird of America, Agelaius phoeniceus. See Agelaius and blackbird.

red-winged (red'wingd), a. Having red wings, or red on the wings.

red-withe (red'with), n. A high-climbing vine of tropical America, Combretum Jacquinii. [West Indies.] redwood (red'wūd), n. 1. The most valuable of Californian timber-trees, Sequoia sempervirens, or its wood. It occupies the Coast ranges, where exposed to ocean fogs, from the northern limit of the State to the southern borders of Monterey county, but is most abundant north of San Francisco. It is the only congener of the famous big or mammoth tree, which it almost rivals in size. It grows commonly from 200 to 300 feet high, with a straight cylindrical trunk, naked to the height of 70 or Branch with Cones of Redwood (Sequoia sempervirens). a, a cone; b, a seed.

100 feet; the diameter is from 8 to 12 feet. The bark is from 6 to 12 inches thick, of a bright cinnamon color; the wood is of a rich brownish red, light, straight-grained, easily worked and taking a fine finish, and very durable in contact with the soil. It is the prevailing and most valuable building-timber of the Pacific coast; in California it is used almost exclusively for shingles, fence-posts, railway-ties, telegraph-poles, wine-butts, etc.

2. The name is also applied to various other trees. Thus, the East Indian redwoods are Sonneratia febrifuga, also called East Indian mahogany; Pterocarpus santalinus, the red sandalwood (see sandalwood); and P. indicus (including P. dalbergioides), the Andaman redwood, or padouk. The last is a lofty tree of India, Burma, the Andaman Islands, etc., with the heart-wood dark-red, close-grained, and moderately hard, used to make furniture, gun-carriages, carts, and for many other purposes. Other trees called redwood are Cornus mas, of Turkey; Rhamnus Erythroxylon, the Siberian buckthorn; Melania Erythroxylon of the Sterculiaceæ, an almost extinct tree of St. Helena; the Jamaican Laplacea (Gordonia) Hernandezii of the Ternstroemiaceæ; Colubrina ferruginea, a rhamnaceous tree of the Bahamas; Occhia arborea of the Cape of Good Hope; Ceanothus spinosus, a shrub or small tree of southern California; and any tree of the genus Erythroxylon. Redwood is also a local name of the Scotch pine. See *pine*¹.

red-wood (red'wūd), a. [Also red-wud; < red¹ intensive (cf. red-mad, etc.) + wood², mad: see wood².] Stark mad. [Scotch.]

An' now sho's like to rin red-wud

About her Whisky.

Burns, Prayer to the Scotch Representatives.

ree¹ (rē), r. t. [Also rie; supposed to be a dial. reduction of *riddle*².] To riddle; sift; separate or throw off. [Prov. Eng.]

After malt is well rubbed and winnowed, you must then ree it over in a sieve. Mortimer, Husbandry.

ree² (rē), a. [*< ME. ree, reh, < AS. hreoh, hrioh, contr. hreó, fierce, wild, stormy, troubled, = OS. hre, wild.] 1. Wild; outrageous; crazy. [Prov. Eng.]—2. Half-drunk; tipsy. [Prov. Eng.] ree³ (rē), n. [Cf. ree², a.] A state of temporary delirium. [Prov. Eng.] ree⁴ (rē), n. [Origin obscure.] A river; a flood. [Prov. Eng.] ree⁵ (rē), interj. A reduction (as an exclamation) of reet, dialectal form of right: used in driving horses.

reebok (rā'bok), n. [< D. reebok = E. roebuck: see roebuck.] A South African antelope, Pelea capreola: so called by the Dutch colonists. The horns are smooth, long, straight, and slender, and so sharp at the point that the Hottentots and Bushmen use them for needles and bodkins. The reebok is nearly 5 feet in length, 24 feet high at the shoulder, of a slighter and more graceful form than most other antelopes, and extremely swift. Also reh-bok and rheebok.

reecht, n. [< ME. reche, reech, an assimilated form of reek, smoke: see reek¹.] Smoke.

Such a rothun of a reche roa.

Alliterative Poems (E. E. T. S.), II. 1009.

reechily, adv. [< reechy + -ly2.] Smokily; squalidly.

And wash his face, he lookt so reechily.

Like bacon hanging on the chimney rooffe.

D. Belchier, See me and See me not, sig. C. 2 b. (Nares.)

reëcho (rē-ek'ō), v. [Early mod. E. re-echo; < re- + echo.] I. intr. To echo back; sound back or reverberate again.

A charge of snuff the wily virgin threw; . . .
And the high dome re-echoes to his nose.

Pope, R. of the L., v. 86.

II. trans. To echo back; return; send back; repeat; reverberate again: as, the hills reëcho the roar of cannon.

The consecrated roof
Re-echoing pious anthems! Cowper, Task, l. 343.

reëcho (rē-ek'ō), n. [< reëcho, v.] The echo of an echo; a second or repeated echo.

The hills and valleys here and there resound
With the re-echoes of the deepe-mouth'd bound.

W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, l. 4.

reechy (rē'chi), a. [An assimilated form of reeky.] Tarnished with smoke; sooty; foul; squalid; filthy.

The kitchen malkin pins
Her richest lockram 'bout her reechy neck.

Shak., Cor., ll. 1. 225.

reed¹ (rēd), n. [< ME. reed, red, reod, irreg. rehēd, rehēd, < AS. hreōd = OD. ried, D. riet = MLG. rē, LG. ried = OHG. hriot, riot, MHG. riet, G. ried, riet, a reed; root unknown.] 1. Any tall broad-leaved grass growing on the margins of streams or in other wet places; especially, any grass of one of the genera Phragmites, Arundo, or Ammophila. The common reed is Phragmites communis, a stately grass from 5 to 12 feet high, found in nearly all parts of the world. It serves by its creeping root-stocks to fix alluvial banks; its stems form perhaps the most durable thatch, and are otherwise useful; and it is planted for ornament. See the generic names, and phrases below. Compare reed-grass.

He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens. Job xl. 21.

We glided winding under ranks
Of iris, and the golden reed.

Tennyson, In Memoriam, ciii.

2. Some one of other more or less similar plants. See phrases below.—3. A musical pipe of reed or cane, having a mouthpiece made by slitting the tube near a joint, and usually several finger-holes; a rustic or pastoral pipe; hence, figuratively, pastoral poetry. See cut under *pipe*¹.

I'll . . . speak between the change of man and boy
With a reed voice. Shak., M. of V., iii. 4. 67.

Sound of pastoral reed with oaten stops.

Milton, Comus, l. 345.

Now she tries the Reed, anon attempts the Lyre.
Congreve, Epistle to Lord Halifax.

4. In music: (a) In musical instruments of the oboe and clarinet classes, and in all kinds of organs, a thin elastic plate or tongue of reed, wood, or metal, so fitted to an opening into a pipe as nearly to close it, and so arranged that, when a current of air is directed through the opening, the reed is drawn into or driven against it so as to close it, but immediately springs back by its own elasticity, only to be pressed forward again by the air, thus producing a tone, either directly by its own vibrations or indirectly by the sympathetic vibrations of the column of air in the pipe. When the reed is of metal, the pitch of the tone depends chiefly on its size; but when of reed or cane, it may be so combined with a tube that the pitch shall depend chiefly on the size of the air-column. A free reed is one that vibrates in the opening without touching its edges; a beating or striking reed is one that extends slightly beyond the opening. In orchestral instruments, the wood wind group includes several reed-instruments, which have either double reeds (two wooden reeds which strike against each other, as in the oboe, the bassoon, the English horn, etc.), or a single reed (a wooden reed striking against an opening in a wooden mouthpiece or beak, as in the clarinet, the basset-horn, etc.). A pipe-organ usually contains one or more sets of reed-pipes, the tongues of which are nearly always striking reeds of brass. (See reed-pipe.) A reed-organ is properly a collection of several sets of reeds, the tongues of which are free reeds of brass. (See reed-organ.) In the brass wind group of instruments, with but few exceptions, the tone is produced by the player's lips acting as free membranous reeds within the cup of the mouthpiece. The mechanism of the human voice, also, is essentially a reed-instrument, the vocal cords being simply free membranous reeds which may be stretched within the tube of the larynx. The quality of the tone produced by a reed varies indefinitely, according to the material and character of the reed itself, the method in which it is set in vibration, and especially the arrangement of the tube or cavity with which it is connected. The accompanying fig. 1 shows the construction of an organ-reed: a is the reed-block, which is used in its proper slot in the reed-board; b, the metal tongue, which is set in sonorous vibration when air is forced through the opening c. Fig. 2 shows the mouthpiece of a clarinet, in which a is the reed, held to the body of the mouthpiece by the split-hands b, which are drawn tight by the screws c. Air entering between the reed and the margin of an opening which it covers causes it to produce a musical tone, the pitch of which is varied partly by the position of the mouthpiece in the mouth and partly by the action of the keys. Fig. 3 shows the mouthpiece of an oboe, and similar reeds are used for bassoons and bagpipes. The reed is made of two counterparts of the same shape bound together by the thread a. The lower and middle parts of the mouthpiece are circular in cross-section, but the upper part c, the reed proper, is flattened. Air forced through this opening causes the reed to emit a harsh tone, which is softened in quality by the tube of the instrument. (b) In reed-instruments of the oboe class, and in both pipe- and reed-organs, the entire mechanism immediately surrounding the reed proper, consisting of the tube or box the opening or eschallot of which the reed itself covers or fills, together with any other attachments, like the tuning-wire of reed-pipes. (See reed-organ and reed-pipe.) In the clarinet the analogous part is called the beak or mouthpiece. (c) Any reed-instrument as a whole, like an oboe or a clarinet: as, the reeds of an orchestra. (d) In organ-building, same as reed-stop.—5. A missile weapon; an arrow or a javelin: used poetically.

Reeds.

With cruel skill the backward Reed
He sent, and, as he fled, he slew.
Prior, To a Lady, st. 8.
The viewless arrows of his thoughts were headed
And wing'd with flame,
Like Indian reeds blown from his silver tongue.
Tennyson, The Poet.

6. Reeds or straw prepared for thatching; thatch: a general term: as, a bundle of reed.—7. A long slender elastic rod of whalebone, ratan, or steel, of which several are inserted in a woman's skirt to expand or stiffen it.—8. In mining, any hollow plant-stem which can be filled with powder and put into the cavity left by the withdrawal of the needle, to set off the charge at the bottom. Such devices are nearly or entirely superseded by the safety-fuse. Also called spire.—9. An instrument used for pressing down the threads of the woof in tapestry, so as to keep the surface well together.—10. A weavers' instrument for separating the threads of the warp, and for beating the weft up to the web. It is made of parallel slips of metal or reed, called dents, which resemble the teeth of a comb. The dents are fixed at their ends into two parallel pieces of wood set a few inches apart.

The reed for weaving the same is measured in an equally complex manner, for the unit of length is 37 inches, and according to the number of hundreds of dents or splits it contains, so is the reed called. For instance, a "fourteen-hundred reed" means that 37 inches of a reed of that number, no matter what length, contains 1400 dents, or about 38 per inch. A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 329.

11. In her., a bearing representing a weavers' reed. See *slay*².—12. A Hebrew and Assyrian unit of length, equal to 6 cubits, generally taken as being from 124 to 130 inches.

A measuring reed of six cubits long, of a cubit and a handbreadth each. Ezek. xl. 5.

13. Same as rennet-bag. W. B. Carpenter.—14. In arch., carp., etc., a small convex molding; in the plural, same as reeding, 2.

The three pillars [of the temple] which stand together are fluted; and the lower part, filled with cablins of reeds, is of one stone, and the upper part of another.

Pococke, Description of the East, II. ii. 160.

Canary reed, the reed canary-grass. See Phalaris.—Dutch reeds, in the arts, the stems of several kinds of horsetail or scouring-rush (Equisetum) used, on account of their silicious crust, to polish wood and even metals.—Egyptian reed, the papyrus.—Fly-reed, in weaving, a reed of a fly-shuttle loom, provided with springs which limit the force with which the reed strikes the weft-thread to a constant or very nearly a constant quantity, and thus produce a greater uniformity of texture.—Great reed, a reed of the genus Arundo, especially Arundo Donax.—Harmonic reed. See harmonic.—Indian reed, the canna or Indian-shot.—New Zealand reed, a fine ornamental grass, Arundo conspicua, blooming earlier than pampas-grass.—Number of the reed, set of the reed, in weaving. See number.—Paper reed. See paper-reed.—Reed bent. See *bent*².—Reed bent-grass. Same as small reed (which see, below).—Reed meadow-grass. See meadow-grass.—Reed of hemp. Same as boon.—Sea-reed, or sea-sand reed, the marram or mat-grass, Ammophila arundinacea.—Small reed, any species of Calamagrostis or of Deyuzia, including the useful blue-joint grass.—Trumpet-reed, Arundo occidentalis, of tropical America (West Indies).—Wood-reed, Calamagrostis Epipycios, of the northern parts of the Old World.

reed¹ (rēd), v. t. [< ME. reden; < reed¹, n.] 1. To thatch. Compare *reed*¹, n., 6.

Where houses be reeded,
Now pare of the moss, and go beat in the reed.

Tusser, Husbandry.

2. In carp., arch., etc., to fashion into, or decorate with, reeds or reeding.

reed², a. An obsolete form of *red*¹ (still extant in the surname Reed).

reed³, v. and n. An obsolete form of *reed*¹.

reedbeer, n. [< reed¹ + beer as in pillow-beer, etc.] A bed of reeds.

A place where reedes grow: a reedbeere.

Nonneculator. (Nares.)

reed-bird (rēd'bērd), n. 1. The bobolink, Dolichonyx oryzivorus: so called in the late summer and early fall months, when the male has exchanged his black-and-buff dress for a plain yellowish streaked plumage like that of the female, and when it throngs the marshes in great flocks, becomes very fat, and is highly esteemed for the table. The name reed-bird obtains chiefly in the Middle States, where the birds haunt the fields of water-oats or wild rice (Zizania aquatica); further south, where it similarly throngs the rice-fields, it is called rice-bird. It is known as butter-bird in the West Indies, and is also called ortolan. See bobolink, Dolichonyx, ortolan.—2. A reed-warbler.

reedbuck (rēd'buk), n. [Tr. D. rietbok.] A name of several kinds of aquatic African antelopes; specifically, Eleotragus arundinaceus. Also rietbok.

reed-bunting (rēd'bun'ting), n. The black-headed bunting, Emberiza schaniolus. It is a common bird of Europe, frequenting the reeds of marshes and fens, and is about six inches long. Also called reed-sparrow.

reedent (rē'dn), a. [< reed¹ + -en².] Consisting of a reed or reeds; made of reeds.

Through reeden pipes convey the golden flood,
T' invite the people [bees] to their wonted food.

Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iv. 385.

reeder (rē'dēr), n. [< ME. redere, redare; < reed¹ + -er¹.] 1. One who thatches with reeds; a thatcher. Prompt. Parr., p. 426.—2. A thatched frame covering blocks or tiles of dried china-clay, to protect them from the rain while permitting free ventilation.

A number of thatched gates or reeders.
Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 687.

reed-gound, n. See redgound.
reed-grass (rēd'grās), n. [= D. rietgras = G. riet (ried-) gras; as reed¹ + grass.] 1. The bur-reed, Spartanum ramosum.—2. Any one of the grasses called reeds, and of some others, commonly smaller, of similar habit. See phrases.—Salt reed-grass, Spartina polytachya, a tall stout salt-marsh grass with a dense oblong purplish raceme, found along the Atlantic coast of the United States.—Small reed-grass. Same as small reed (which see, under *reed*¹).—Wood reed-grass, either of the two species of Cinna, C. arundinacea and C. pendula, northern grasses in America, the latter also in Europe. They are graceful sweet-scented woodland grasses, apparently of no great value.

reedification (rē-ed'i-fi-kā'shon), n. [= OF. reedification, F. réedification = Sp. reedificación = Pg. reedificação = It. riedificazione; as re- + edification.] The act or operation of rebuilding, or the state of being rebuilt.

The town was compellid to help to the Reedification of It.
Leland, Itinerary (1789), III. 11.

reedify (rē-ed'i-fi), v. t. [Early mod. E. also reedify; ME. reedifyen; < OF. reedifier, F. réedifier = Sp. Pg. reedificar = It. riedificare, < LL. reedificare, build again, rebuild, < L. re-, again, + edificare, build: see edify.] To rebuild; build again after destruction.

The ruin'd walls he did reedifye.
Spenser, F. Q., II. x. 46.

Return'd from Babylon by leave of kings
Their lords, whom God disposed, the house of God
They first re-edify.
Milton, P. L., xii. 850.

reediness (rē'di-nēs), n. The state or property of being reedy, in any sense.

It [the larynx organ] possesses great freedom from reediness in sound.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LVIII. 402.

Common Reed (Phragmites communis).
1, flowering plant; 2, the panicle;
3, a spikelet.

The greater number of these tests are to detect reediness, lamination, or looseness in the fibrous structure of the iron, these defects occurring more frequently in angles, T, and beam irons than in plates.

Thearle, Naval Arch., § 332.

reedling (rē'ding), n. [< ME. redyng; verbal n. of reed¹, v.] 1. Thatching. [Obsolete or prov. Eng.]

Redyngs of howses. Arundinacio.

Prompt. Parv., p. 427.

2. In arch., a series of small convex or beaded moldings designed for ornament; also, the convex fluting or cabling characterizing some types of column.

These [external walls of Wuswus at Wurka] were plastered and covered by an elaborate series of reedings and square sinkings, forming a beautiful and very appropriate mode of adorning the wall of a building that had no external openings. J. Ferguson, Hist. Arch., I. 162.

3. The milling on the edge of a coin.—4. In silk-weaving. See the quotation.

Reeding and harnessing are subsidiary processes in putting the warp in proper shape on the loom. These consist in putting each warp-thread through its proper slit in the reed and eyelet in the harness.

Harper's Mag., LXXI. 256.

reed-instrument (rēd'in'strō-ment), n. A musical instrument the tone of which is produced by the vibration of a reed; especially, an orchestral instrument of the oboe or of the clarinet family.

reed-knife (rēd'nif), n. A long knife-shaped implement of metal for reaching and adjusting the tuning-wires of reed-pipes in a pipe-organ. Also called tuning-knife.

reedless (rēd'les), a. [< reed¹ + -less.] Destitute of reeds.

Youths tumbled before their parents were,
Whom foul Cocytus reedless banks enclose. May.

reedling (rēd'ling), n. [< reed¹ + -ling¹.] The bearded tit, Panurus or Calamophilus biarmicus, a common bird of Europe and Asia: so called from frequenting reeds. Also called reed-pheasant.

reed-mace (rēd'mās), n. The cattail; any plant of the genus Typha, chiefly T. latifolia and T. angustifolia, the great and the lesser reed-mace, the two species known in England and North America. T. latifolia is the common plant. It is a tall, straight, erect aquatic with long flag-like leaves and long dense spikes of small flowers, brown when mature. The abundant down of the ripened spikes makes a poor material for stuffing pillows, etc.; the leaves were formerly much used by coopers to prevent the joints of casks from leaking, and have been made into mats, chair-bottoms, etc. It is so named either directly from its reed-like character and the resemblance of its head to a mace (club), or (Prior, "Popular Names of British Plants") from its being placed in the hands of Christ as a mace or scepter in pictures and in statues. Less properly called bulrush. In the United States known almost exclusively as cattail or cattail flag.

reed-mote (rēd'mōt), n. Same as fescue, 1. Halliwel. [Prov. Eng.]

reed-moth (rēd'mōth), n. A British moth, Macrogaster arundinis.

reed-motion (rēd'mō'shōn), n. In weaving, the mechanism which, in power-looms, moves the batten, carrying the reed for beating up the weft between the threads of the warp. The term has also been inappropriately applied to a "stop-motion" whereby, when the shuttle is trapped in its passage through the warp, the movement of the batten is stopped, to prevent breaking warp-threads by the impact of the reed against the shuttle. See stop-motion.

reed-organ (rēd'ōr'gan), n. A musical instrument consisting essentially of one or more graduated sets of small free reeds of metal, which are sounded by streams of air set in motion by a bellows, and controlled from a keyboard like that of the pianoforte. The two principal varieties are the harmonium, which is common in Europe, and the so-called American organ, the chief essential difference between which is that the former is sounded by a compression-bellows driving the air outward through the reeds, and the latter by a suction-bellows drawing it inward through them. The tone of the harmonium is usually keener and more nasal than that of the American organ. The apparatus for compressing or exhausting the air, and for distributing the current among the various sets of reeds and among the channels belonging to the various digitals of the keyboard, is not essentially different from that of a pipe-organ, though on a much smaller scale. (See organ.) The bellows, however, is usually operated by means of alternating treadles. The keyboard is exactly similar to that of the pipe-organ or the pianoforte, and has a compass of about four or five octaves. The tone-producing apparatus consists of one or more sets of small brass vibrators or reeds (see illustration); the pitch of the tone depends on the size of their vibratile tongues, and its quality on their proportions and on the character of the resonating cavities with which they are connected. Each set of vibrators constitutes a stop, the use of which is controlled by a stop-knob. The possible variety of qualities is rather limited. The treadles operate feeders, which are connected with a general bellows, so that the current of air may be maintained at a constant tension; but in the harmonium the waste-valve of the bellows may be closed by drawing a stop knob called the expression-stop, so that the force of the tones may be directly varied by the rapidity of the treadling. In the American organ the force of the tones is varied by a lever, operated by the player's knee, which opens or closes a shutter in the box inclosing the vibrators. The harmonium sometimes has a mechanism called the percussion, providing a little hammer to strike the tongue of each reed as its digital is depressed, thus setting it into vibration very prompt-a, case; b, stop-rail and stops; c, music-rack; d, keyboard; e, one of the pedals or treadles; f, one of the pedal- or treadle-straps which operate the bellows; g, h, pedal-spring which lifts the pedal after the latter has been relieved from the pressure of the foot; i, bellows-spring which opens the bellows after compression; j and k, upper and lower boards of wind-chest, inclosing space into which air is delivered from the bellows; l, reed-board, which supports the reeds in slots formed therein (see cut under reed¹); m, n, swells (see cut below); o, reed-valve; p, valve-spring which closes the valve after the latter is opened by push-pin shown in the cut below. There is one of these valves for each key, admitting wind to one or more reeds of a set or such sets of reeds as are allowed to act by the stops pulled out, and of a particular tone corresponding with the key; q, stop-arm; r, key-frame.

ly. A tremulant is often introduced, consisting of a revolving fan, by which the current of air is made to oscillate slightly. More than one manual keyboard and a pedal keyboard, with separate stops for each, as in the pipe-organ, occur in large instruments. Occasionally a set of pipes is also added. Various devices for sustaining tones

a, stop-rail; b, stop-knob; c, stop-arm; d, rock-lever, connected at n to the lever r, the latter being pivoted to a rail at s. A downwardly projecting arm engages the crank of another rock-lever h, connecting with and actuating the stop-valve w; e, f, swells; l, reed-valve opened by the push-pin v, and closed by the spring m.

in the bass after the fingers have left the digitals, or for emphasizing the treble, are sometimes introduced. Pianofortes are made with a harmonium attached (sometimes called an æolian attachment). The reed-organ has become one of the commonest of musical instruments. Its popularity rests upon its capacity for concerted music, like the pianoforte and pipe-organ, combined with simplicity, portability, cheapness, and stability of intonation. Artistically regarded, its tone is apt to be either weak and negative or harsh and unsympathetic. A variety of recent invention, the vocalion, has a remarkably powerful and mellow tone.

reed-palm (rēd'pām), n. A ratan-palm; a palm of the genus Calamus.

reed-pheasant (rēd'fēz'ant), n. The bearded titmouse or reedling, Panurus biarmicus: so called in allusion to the long tail. Also called simply pheasant. [Norfolk, Eng.]

reed-pipe (rēd'pip), n. In organ-building, a pipe whose tone is produced by the vibration of a reed or tongue: opposed to flue-pipe. Such pipes consist of a foot or mouthpiece containing the reed, and a tubular body furnishing a column of air for sympathetic vibration. The term reed is applied to both the vibratile tongue and the mechanism immediately surrounding it.

In the latter sense, a reed consists of a metal tube connecting the foot and the body of the pipe; at its lower end is an oblong opening or eschallot, over or in which is fixed the brass tongue or reed proper. The effective length of the tongue is controlled by a movable spring or tuning-wire, the head of which projects outside the pipe-foot. The pitch of the tone depends primarily upon the vibrating length of the tongue, but is modified by the length of the air-column in the body of the pipe. A reed-pipe, therefore, is tuned both on the reed and on the top of the pipe. The quality of the tone depends somewhat on the form of the tongue, but chiefly on that of the body as a whole. The force of the tone depends on the pressure of the air-current, on the size of the inlet to the foot, and on the exact adjustment of the tongue to the eschallot. Most reed-pipes have striking reeds, but free reeds are occasionally used. A set of reed-pipes is called a reed-stop.

reed-pit (rēd'pit), n. [ME. reede pytte; < reed¹ + pit¹.] A fen. Prompt. Parv. (Halliwel).

reed-plane (rēd'plān), n. In joinery, a concave-sole plane used in making beads.

reed-sparrow (rēd'spar'ō), n. Same as reed-bunting. [Local, Eng.]

reed-stop (rēd'stop), n. In organ-building, a set or register of reed-pipes the use of which is controlled by a single stop-knob: opposed to flue-stop. Each partial organ usually has one or more such stops, though they are less invariable in the pedal organ than in the others. They are generally intended to imitate some orchestral instrument, as the trumpet (usually placed in the great organ), the oboe (usually in the swell organ), the clarinet (usually in the choir organ), the trumpet (usually in the pedal organ), the cornet, the clarion, the contrabass, etc. They may be of eight-feet, four-feet, or sixteen-feet tone. (See organ.) Reed-stops are especially valuable because of their powerful, incisive, and individual quality, which is suited both for solo effects and for the enrichment of all kinds of combinations. The most peculiar reed-stop is the vox humana. A reed-stop is often called simply a reed.

reed-thrush (rēd'thrush), n. The greater reed-warbler, Acrocephalus turdoides.

Specimens of the . . . reed-thrush, to use its oldest English name.

Yarrell, Brit. Birds (4th ed.), I. 365. (Encyc. Diet.)

reed-tussock (rēd'tus'ōk), n. A British moth, Orgyia canosa. See tussock.

reed-wainscot (rēd'wān'skōt), n. A British moth, Nonagria canaga.

reed-warbler (rēd'wār'blēr), n. One of a group of Old World sylvine birds, constituting the genus Acrocephalus. The species to which the name specially applies is A. streperus or A. arundinaceus, also called Calamohorpe or Salicaria arundinacea. Another species, A. turdoides, is known as the greater reed-warbler, reed-thrush, and reed-wren.

reed-work (rēd'wērk), n. In organ-building, the reed-stops of an organ, or of a partial organ, taken collectively: opposed to flue-work.

reed-wren (rēd'ren), n. 1. The greater reed-warbler.—2. An American wren of the family Troglodytidae and genus Thryothorus, as the great Carolina wren, T. carolinensis, or Bewick's wren, T. bewicki. There are many species, chiefly of the subtropical parts of America, the two named being the only ones which inhabit much of the United States.

reedy (rē'di), a. [< reed¹ + -y¹. Cf. AS. hreodih, reedy.] 1. Abounding with reeds.

Ye heathy wastes, immix'd with reedy fens.
Burns, Elegy on Miss Burnet.

2. Consisting of or resembling a reed.

With the tip of her reedy wand
Making the sign of the cross.
Longfellow, Blind Girl of Castèl Cullè, I.

3. Noting a tone like that produced from a reed-instrument. Such tones are usually somewhat nasal, and are often thin and cutting.

The blessed little creature answered me in a voice of such heavenly sweetness, with that reedy thrill in it which you have heard in the thrush's even-song, that I hear it at this moment. O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, ix.

4. Noting a quality of iron in which bars or plates of it have the nature of masses of rods imperfectly welded together.

reef (rēf), n. [Formerly riff; < D. rif = MLG. rif, ref, LG. rif, reff (> G. riff), a reef, = Icel. rif = Dan. rev, a reef, sand-bank; akin to Icel. rifa, a fissure, rift, rent, = Sw. refva, a strip, cleft, gap; Sw. refvel, a sand-bank, = Dan. revle, a sand-bank, bar, shoal, a strip of land, a lath; prob. from the verb, Icel. rifa, etc., rive, split: see rivel. Cf. rif¹.] 1. A low, narrow ridge of rocks, rising ordinarily but a few feet above the water. A reef passes by increase of size into an island. The word is especially used with reference to those low islands which are formed of coralline debris. See atoll, and coral reef, below.

Atolls have been formed during the sinking of the land by the upward growth of the reefs which primarily fringed the shores of ordinary islands.

Darwin, Coral Reefs, p. 165.

The league-long roller thundering on the reef.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

2. Any extensive elevation of the bottom of the sea; a shoal; a bank: so called by fishermen.

The riff, or bank of rocks, on which the French fleet was lost, runs along from the east and to the northward about three miles. Dampier, Voyages, I., an. 1681, note.

3. In Australia, the same as lode, rein, or ledge of the Cordilleran miner: as, a quartz-reef (that is, a quartz-vein).

Many a promising gold field has been ruined by having bad machinery put up on it. Reefs that would have paid handsomely with good machinery are abandoned as unpayable, and the field is deserted.

H. Finch-Hatton, Advance Australia, p. 218.

4. A kind of commercial sponge which grows on reefs. [A trade-name.]

British Consul Little of Havana says, according to the "Journal of the Society of Arts," that the classes [of sponges] included are sheep wool, velvet, hard-head, yellow, grass, and glove. Very little reef, if any, is found in Cuba. Science, XIV. 351.
